

AMERICAN CASEBOOK SERIES®

CIVIL PROCEDURE CASES AND MATERIALS

Thirteenth Edition

Jack H. Friedenthal, Arthur R. Miller,
John E. Sexton, Helen Hershkoff,
Adam N. Steinman & Troy A. McKenzie

PREFACE

This Thirteenth Edition offers an up-to-date and accessible approach to the study of Civil Procedure. Students tend to find Civil Procedure the most mysterious of their law school courses. Our goal in this edition is to present the material in a clear and engaging manner that also is challenging and rigorous. Because courses in Civil Procedure vary greatly as to the hours allotted, the extent to which they are mandatory or optional, and the law school year or years when students are expected to enroll in them, we have designed this edition for maximum flexibility in terms of an individual classroom’s coverage, depth, sensibility, and emphasis.

This revised edition reflects up-to-date amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and covers important new Supreme Court cases on personal jurisdiction, federal jurisdiction, and other topics relevant to the first-year course. The edition addresses not simply doctrinal change, but also the still uncertain effects of new technology, globalism, and privatization on the system of civil justice. The edition also responds to the many helpful comments from judges, practitioners, colleagues, and students at the large number of schools in which earlier editions have been used. Our conversations confirm our own conclusion that the book is and continues to be a highly successful teaching tool, and we have preserved the basic format and much of the material from the Twelfth Edition. In our view, many older cases continue to serve as excellent teaching vehicles because of their length, focus, or open-ended nature. Where we have deleted earlier material, our preference has been to substitute contemporary cases in which the facts are interesting, in which the conflicting policies seem to be in a state of equilibrium, or in which the context has extrinsic fascination, rather than materials that offer a tight monograph on various aspects of procedure. In addition, we have streamlined and synthesized some earlier notes and cases to make room for cutting-edge issues and to allow the students to self-assess and to engage in strategic thinking.

The Thirteenth Edition, like its predecessors, places substantial emphasis on the operation of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, but also includes state and foreign examples to enable a comparative approach. The materials in this volume refer to and are augmented by a Supplement, which contains not only the federal statutes and rules governing procedure, but also selected state provisions for comparison. A number of other materials, such as Advisory Committee notes, proposed rule alterations, and local court rules, also are included. The Supplement contains a litigation flow chart and an illustrative litigation problem, showing how a case develops in practice and samples of the documents that actually might have formed a portion of the record. These samples are not designed as models to be emulated. To the contrary, they often contain defects intended to encourage criticism from students in light of knowledge they have obtained from the cases and classroom discussion. The Supplement also includes complaints from two principal cases and one note case.

The cases and excerpts from other materials have been edited carefully to shorten them and to clarify issues for discussion. With regard to footnotes, the same numbering appears in the casebook as appears in the original sources; our footnotes are indicated by letters. Our omissions are indicated with asterisks, and where there might be any ambiguity, we provide clarifying information in a footnote.

The authors are deeply grateful to a host of people who have assisted us in the preparation of this volume, the earlier editions, and the Supplements. Among our students deserving special mention for the aid they have provided in preparing earlier editions of the book are Sam L. Abram, Brandon Adoni, Christopher J. Asta, Alessandra Baniel-Stark, Kim Barry, Prudence C. Beatty, Gabriel Bedoya, James J. Beha, Jeffrey A. Benjamin, Lina Bensman, Adrienne Lee Benson, John M. Bentil, Richard B. Bernstein, Michael Blasie, Barry B. Boyer, André Brewster, James M. Brockway, Matt Brown, Michael Broyde, William M. Burns, Bertram Carp, Sanford Caust-Ellenbogen, Anna L. Cavnar, Jeffrey J. Chapman, Daniel Chazin, Tan Yee Cheung, Caroline P. Cincotta, Adam S. Cohen, Stephanie Cohen, Steven Cohen, Ellen K. Connell, Diane Costa, Thomas F. Coyle, Russell C. Crane, Stavan Shivraj Desai, Sarah Dowd, David Drueding, Devon Edwards, Gary Eisenberg, Seth K. Endo, Lisa Fair, David E. Firestone, Raymond Fisher, Grant H. Franks, Kelly A. Frawley, Amelia Frenkel, Monte Frenkel, Patrick P. Garlinger, Stacy Gershwind, Lisa E. Goldberg, Robert H. Goldman, Steven F. Goldman, Ashley K. Goodale, Amanda W. Goodin, Kurt Gosselin, Chelsea Goulet, Susanna R. Greenberg, Debra L. Greenberger, Kimberly M. Greene, Kevin A. Griffin, Edward Hartnett, Daniel M. Hennefeld, Nancy Louise Hoffman, Steve Hsieh, Wendy B. Jacobs, Colin Johnson, Drew Johnson-Skinner, Joe J. Kalo, Mary Kay Kane, Lonnie Keene, Christopher D. Kercher, Tarek M. Khanachet, Amy Kimpel, Jessica M. Kumm, Pearlina M. Kyi, Nicolas Kyriakides, Daniel Laguardia, Fredrick W. Lambert, Joshua Lee, Judyann M. Lee, Susan S. Lee, Callie Lefevre, Xiang Li, Kevin J. Lynch, Alexandra A. Magness, Christopher Mahon, Shirin Malkani, Maureen P. Manning, Jeanette E. Markle, Claire Martirosian, Christen M. Martosella, John J. McGonagle, Matthew McGrath, Kiran H. Mehta, Lisabeth C. Meletta, Franklin N. Meyer, Gary Meyerhoff, Tara Mikkilineni, Joy E. Milligan, Andrew Moore, Chris C. Morley, Jennifer Nevins, Etan Newman, John Nichols, Greg G. Oehler, Marcy Oppenheimer, Jennifer Pariser, Dawn A. Pederson, Avi Perry, Kate Elizabeth Phillips, Will Piner, Norman A. Platt, Martin C. Recchuite, Christopher Reich, Rafael Reyneri, James E. Rossman, Beth A. Rotman, Max Sarinsky, Gene L. Schlack, Gregory S. Schmolka, Marc Schuback, Daniel Schwartz, Melissa Siegel, Linda J. Silberman, Donna Silverberg, Robert Silvers, William Slomanson, Roger D. Smith, Michael A. Sochynsky, David A. Stein, Brian A. Stern, Benjamin M. Stoll, Christopher M. Straw, Robert M. Swan, Reuben B. Teague, Eva A. Temkin, Mara E. Trager, Lee Turner-Dodge, Gregory Tuttle, Christopher R. Utecht, Jacqueline Veit, Michael Vitiello, Ellison S. Ward, Sisi Wu, Yifei Zheng, Benjamin Zhu, Nir Zicherman, and Gail Zweig.

For their help in preparing updates to the Twelfth Edition that have informed this Thirteenth Edition, we thank the following students of New York University School of Law: Claire Bartholomew, Amitav Chakraborty, Sarah Coco, Eric Cohen, Elizabeth Crimmins, Peter Devlin, Darby Dietrich, Mallory Edel, Edward Eisenman, Michael Ellis, Lily Fagin, Zoe Farkas, Joshua Fattal, Robert Gianchetti, Ariel Geist, Evan Gilbert, Pooja Go, William Goldstein, Brooke Gottlieb, Ross Guilder, Julie Hong, Eliza Hopkins, Elizabeth Jánszky, Ian Kalish, Andrew Kaufman, Michael Klurfield, Jeremy Koegel, Michael Kowiak, Lauren Krakovyak, Allison Lehrer, Alexander Levin, Madeline Leibin, Freddy Levenson Hannah Littman, Andrew Marnell, Raj Mathur, Nathaniel Mattison, Jacqueline Matysczyk, Robertson “Mac” McAnulty, Vinayak Mehrotra, Leah Motzkin, Ryan Mullally, Kristin Mulvey, Ignatius Nam, Kartik Naram, Laura Narefsky, Zachary Newman, Adin Pearl, Kyrsten Ponturo, Julia Popkin, Yujung “Iris” Ryu, Zachary Sanders, Bethany Saul, Loren Scolaro, Samuel Seham, Emily Several, and Lauren Sherman, Nathan Small, Sabrina Solow, Skylar Spear, Samuel Steinbock-Pratt, Tina Szpicek, Samuel Turner, Andrew Vaccaro, Samuel Vitello, Brooks Weinberger, David Weiss, Jonathan Wieder, Amberly Wilenski, Simon Williams, Seung Hyun (Sam) Yang, and Sher-Min Yang.

Louis Higgins, our editor, deserves special mention for his work on this and earlier editions. We are grateful to Gregory J. Olson and his production team, and we thank Roxanne Birkel for her work on prior editions.

We warmly acknowledge Tiffany Scruggs and Kristin Silberman for their administrative support. We have been assisted on prior editions by Ian Brydon, Robert Anselmi, John Easterbrook, Dan Evans, Rachel Jones, Silah Karim, Michael Malavarca, Erica Tate, and Stephen Wagner, to whom we express great appreciation. We are grateful to Annmarie Zell and Sarah Jaramillo for preparation of the earlier indices. We thank Gretchen Feltes, Jessica Freeman, Christine Park, Dana Rubin, and Linda Ramsingh for their exemplary library support on this and earlier editions.

We extend deep appreciation to Jo Anne Friedenthal, Stephen Loffredo, and Jenny Carroll for personal encouragement and intellectual support.

Finally, we sincerely thank our many colleagues and students across the legal community for the countless excellent suggestions they have offered. Their contributions have been instrumental in the preparation of this Thirteenth Edition.

J.H.F.
A.R.M.
J.E.S.
H.H.
A.N.S.
T.A.M.

February 2022

TABLE OF CASES

The principal cases are in bold type.

5 Unlabeled Boxes, United States v., 1274

A.F.A. Tours, Inc. v. Whitchurch, 318

Abdulwali v. Washington Metro Area Transit Auth., 941

Abelesz v. OTP Bank, 234

ABKCO Industries, Inc. v. Lennon, 172

Adam v. Saenger, 89

Adams v. Davison-Paxon Co., 463

Adams v. Hemmenway, 565

Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., 1013, 1014

Adinolfe v. United Techs. Corp., 647

Advanced Tactical Ordnance Systems, LLC v. Real Action Paintball, Inc., 204

Aetna Casualty & Surety Co. v. Yeatts, 1166

Affanato v. Merrill Bros., 972

AG Servs. of America v. Nielsen, 1060

Agent Orange Product Liability Litigation, In re, 538

Aguchak v. Montgomery Ward Co., 251

Alderman v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 46

Aldinger v. Howard, 359

Alexander v. Kramer Bros. Freight Lines, Inc., 50

Allapattah Services, Inc. v. Exxon Corp., 366

Allegretti, In re Petition of, 903

Allen v. McCurry, 1267, 1366

Allen v. United States, 55, 57

Allen v. Wright, 720

Alliance for the Wild Rockies v. Cottrell, 1190

Allied Chem., n Operating Unit of Allied Corp. v. Niagara Mohawk Power Corp., 1324

Allison v. Citgo Petro. Corp., 833

Allred v. Chynoweth, 1318

Allstate Insurance Co. v. Charneski, 467

Allstate Insurance Co. v. Hague, 106, 517

AMC Demolition Specialists, Inc. v. Bechtel Jacobs Co., 1092

Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 825, 829, 853

American Can Co. v. Mansukhani, 1190

American Civil Liberties Union v. Department of Defense, 1179

American Elec. Power Co., Inc. v. Connecticut, 538

American Express Co. v. Italian Colors Restaurant, 893, 1401

American Home Products Corp. v. Johnson & Johnson, 1092

American Indemnity Co. v. Hale, D.C.W.D.Mo., 776

American Institute of Certified Public Accountants v. Affinity Card, Inc., 264

American Ky. Express Co., United States v., 1246

American Life Ins. Co. v. Stewart, 1055, 1059
American Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals v. Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus, 931
American Well Works Co. v. Layne & Bowler Co., 339
Americold Realty Trust v. Conagra Foods, Inc., 313
Amgen Inc. v. Connecticut Retirement Plans and Trust Funds, 823, 1035
Anderson v. City of Bessemer, 72, 1147, 1150, 1257
Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 1009, 1012, 1027
Anderson v. Linton, 519
Andrews v. America’s Living Centers, LLC, 1038
Anheuser-Busch, Inc. v. John Labatt Ltd., 662
Ankenbrandt v. Richards, 324
Apple iPhone Antitrust Litigation, In re, 678
Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., 302
Arizona v. California, 304, 1315
Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 523
Armco, Inc. v. Penrod-Stauffer Bldg. Sys., Inc., 268
Armour v. Knowles, 943
Armstrong v. LaSalle Bank Nat. Ass’n, 418
Armstrong v. Pomerance, 222
Arnstein v. Porter, 1010
Artis v. District of Columbia, 379
Asahi Metal Industry Co., Ltd. v. Superior Court, 134, 143
Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 628
Astoria Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Solimino, 1380
AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 890
Atkinson, United States v., 52
Atlantic City Electric Co. v. General Electric Co., 1237
Atlantic Marine Construction Co., Inc. v. U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas, 433
Atlantic Richfield Co. v. Christian, 301
Atlas Roofing Co. v. Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission, 1070
Aviation Supply Corp. v. R.S.B.I. Aerospace, Inc., 1193
Avista Mgmt., Inc. v. Wausau Underwriters Ins. Co., 6
Aybar v. Aybar, 197
B.R. De Witt, Inc. v. Hall, 1358
Bailey v. Central Vermont R., Co., 542
Baker v. General Motors Corp., 1260, 1360
Baker v. St. Paul Travelers Ins. Co., 978
Baldwin v. Cole, 572
Baldwin v. Iowa State Traveling Men’s Ass’n, 235, 1273
Baltimore & Carolina Line, Inc. v. Redman, 1125
Baltimore & Ohio R.R. Co. v. Baugh, 448
Baltimore S. S. Co. v. Phillips, 355
Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 527
Bank of America National Trust & Savings Association v. Parnell, 531
Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 93
Bank of California National Ass’n v. Superior Court, 747
Bank of China v. NBM L.L.C., 1189
Bank of the United States v. Deveaux, 304, 457
Bank of the United States v. Planters’ Bank of Georgia, 330
Bard IVC Filters Products Liability Litigation, In re, 910
Barrett v. Sec’y of Health & Human Servs., 1182
Bartholet v. Reishauer A.G. (Zurich), 647
Bass v. Hoagland, 1043, 1044
Bates v. C & S Adjusters, Inc., 404
Batson v. Kentucky, 1100
be2 LLC v. Ivanov, 203
Beacon Theatres, Inc. v. Westover, 1054
Beeck v. Aquaslide ‘N’ Dive Corp., 688
Beggerly, United States v., 1182
Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 617
Bendix Aviation Corp. v. Glass, 1060
Bennis v. Michigan, 295
Bensusan Restaurant Corp. v. King, 200
Bereslavsky v. Caffey, 1092
Berger v. Compaq Comput. Corp., 826
Bernhard v. Bank of America Nat. Trust & Savings Ass’n, 1327
Bernhardt v. Polygraphic Co., 464, 521
Best Life Assur. Co. of California v. Comm’r of Internal Revenue, 1267
Biggs v. Public Service Coordinated Transport, 679
Bi-Metallic Investment Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 285
Bingaman v. Dep’t of the Treasury, 1304
Birmingham Fire Fighters Ass’n 117 v. City of Birmingham, 1240
Bittinger v. Tecumseh Products Co., 1353
Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 338
Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer Co., 446, 448
Black Horse Lane Assoc., L.P. v. Dow Chem. Corp., 978
Blackmer v. United States, 89
Blair Holdings Corp. v. Rubinstein, 315
Blair v. Cleveland Twist Drill Co., 736
Blair v. Commissioner, 1301
Blonder-Tongue Laboratories, Inc. v. University of Illinois Foundation, 1330, 1333
BNSF Railway Co. v. Tyrrell, 170

Bobby v. Bies, 1306
Boechler, P.C. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 303
Boeing Co. v. Van Gemert, 852
Bogosian v. Gulf Oil Corp., 966
Bon Air Hotel, Inc. v. Time, Inc., 971
Boone v. Lightner, 1210
Booth v. City of Dallas, 912
Bors v. Johnson & Johnson, 197
Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc., 1256
Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. v. Montana Ore Purchasing Co., 332
Bowditch v. City of Boston, 1170
Bowles v. Osmoste Utilities Services, Inc., 663
Bowles v. Russell, 1242
Boyle v. United Technologies Corp., 531
BP P.L.C. v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, 388
Brand Jewelers, Inc., United States v., 269
Breedon v. Richmond Community College, 653
Bridgeport Music, Inc. v. Still N The Water Pub, 142
Briggs v. State, 1321
Bright v. Bechtel Petroleum, Inc., 383
Briones v. Riviera Hotel & Casino, 1177
Briseno v. ConAgra Foods, Inc., 834
Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. v. Superior Court of California, San Francisco County, 173
Brookshire v. Powell, Mo., 1201
Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. v. Jacobson, 662
Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 1228
Brown v. Cinemark USA, Inc., 847
Brown v. Western Ry. of Alabama, 544
Bruckman v. Hollzer, 1060
Brunsden v. Humphrey, 1264
Buchanan v. Warley, 808
Buchel-Ruegsegger v. Buchel, 316
Buckeye State Mut. Ins. Co. v. Moens, 783
Budinich v. Becton Dickinson & Co., 1241
Burden v. Check Into Cash of Kentucky, LLC, 1093
Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 127
Burlington Northern R.R. Co. v. Ford, 399
Burlington Northern R.R. Co. v. Woods, 485
Burnham v. Superior Court, 190, 223, 278
Bush, In re, 1292
Bushel v. Miller, 572
Business Guides, Inc. v. Chromatic Communications Enterprises, Inc., 704
Byrd v. Blue Ridge Rural Electric Cooperative, Inc., 462
Byrum v. Ames & Webb, Inc., 1297
C.M. Lane Lifeboat Co., United States v., 791
Cable & Computer Technology, Inc. v. Lockheed Saunders, Inc., 927
Calder v. Jones, 126
California Dept. of Water Resources v. Powerex Corp., 374
California Packing Corp. v. Kelly Storage & Distributing Co., 605
California v. Sierra Club, 1364
Calloway v. Marvel Entertainment Group, 710
Canada Life Assurance Co. v. LaPeter, 1193
Capron v. Van Noorden, 29
Carbone v. Cable News Network, Inc., 516
Carden v. Arkoma Assocs., 313
Carey v. Bayerische Hypo-Und Vereinsbank AG, 431
Carlsbad Technology, Inc. v. Hif Bio, Inc., 388
Carnegie-Mellon Univ. v. Cohill, 387
Carnival Cruise Lines, Inc. v. Shute, 198
Carter v. Jury Commission of Greene County, 1101
Cascade Natural Gas Corp. v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 789
Case v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co., 37
Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 830
Caterpillar Inc. v. Lewis, 389
Catrett v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 1023
Cavanaugh, In re, 826
Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 1009, 1017
Cement Antitrust Litigation, In re, 1238
Central Associated Carriers v. Nickelberry, 732
Chambers v. Nasco, Inc., 714
Chan v. Korean Air Lines, Ltd., 418
Charter Fed. Savs. Bank v. United States, 1305
Chauffeurs, Teamsters and Helpers Local 391 v. Terry, 1074
Cheney v. United States District Court, 1236
Cherney v. Holmes, 1000
Chester, N.Y., Town of v. Laroe Estates, Inc., 793
Chicago & Rock Island Railroad Co. v. McKean, 1249
Chicago, City of v. International College of Surgeons, 386
Chicago, R.I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Martin, 380
Chicot County Drainage District v. Baxter State Bank, 391
Chrysler Corp. v. Carey, 975
Chrysler Corp. v. Fedders Corp., 1197

Cine Forty-Second Street Theatre Corp. v. Allied Artists Pictures Corp., 969
Clark v. Paul Gray, Inc., 365
Clay v. Field, 323
Clay v. Sun Insurance Office Ltd., 523
Clearfield Trust Co. v. United States, 528
Clifford, Helvering v., 1302
Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 461, 1223
Colby v. Umbrella, Inc., 644
Cold Metal Process Co. v. United Engineering & Foundry Co., 1221
Cole’s Wexford Hotel, Inc. v. Highmark Inc., 911
Coleman v. American Export Isbrandsten Lines, Inc., 233
Colgrove v. Battin, 1094
Columbia Pictures Television, Inc. v. Krypton Broadcasting of Birmingham, Inc., 1204
Comas v. United Telephone Co. of Kansas, 919
Combe v. City of London, 589
Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 823
Commercial Union Ins. Co. of New York v. Adams, 782
Commodity Futures Trading Comm’n v. Lake Shore Asset Mgt. Ltd., 1190
Compton v. Henrie, Tex., 1099
Conaughty v. Nichols, 597
Conetta v. National Hair Care Centers, 1003
Conley v. Gibson, 612, 645
Connecticut v. Doeher, 286
Connectu LLC v. Zuckerberg, 312
Contestible v. Brookshire, Mo., 1200
Convergent Technologies Securities Litigation, In re, 927
Cooper Industries, Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc., 1250
Cooper Tire & Rubber Co. v. McCall, 197
Cooper v. Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, 814, 886
Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 1228
Cooter & Gell v. Hartmarx Corp., 704
Copar Pumice Co., Inc., United States v., 1229
Copper Antitrust Litig., In re, 833
Coppo v. Van Wieringen, 1152
Corcoran v. City of Chicago, 1248
CoreCivic Inc. v. Candide Grp. LLC, 516
Cortez Byrd Chips, Inc. v. Bill Harbert Construction Co., 409
Costello v. United States, 1284
Cote v. Wadel, 313
Coughlin v. Lee, 980
Coulas v. Smith, 1041
Coury v. Prot, 311
Covey v. Town of Somers, 250
Cresswell v. Sullivan & Cromwell, 316
Crest Hill Land Development, LLC v. The City of Joliet, 679
Crogate’s Case, 559
Cromwell v. County of Sac, 1261, 1287
Crow Tribe of Indians v. Repsis, 1305
Crusco v. Strunk Steel Co., 274
CSX Transportation, Inc. v. General Mills, Inc., 1379
Cullen v. Auto-Owners Insurance Co., 644
Cummings v. General Motors Corp., 918
Cunningham v. Hamilton County, 1227
Curtis v. Loether, 1067
Curtis v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 912
Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. General Electric Co., 1222
D.H. Overmyer Co. v. Frick, 251
Daar v. Yellow Cab Co., 849
Daimler AG v. Bauman, 167
Dairy Queen, Inc. v. Wood, 1061
Daniel v. American Bd. of Emergency, Med., 408
Danner v. Anskis, 739
Dart Cherokee Basin Operating Co. v. Owens, 385, 871
David v. Crompton & Knowles Corp., 687
Davis v. Piper Aircraft Corp., 699
Day & Zimmermann, Inc. v. Challoner, 517
Day v. Edwards, 569
Day v. McDonough, 683
De Gazelle Group, Inc. v. Tamaz Trading Establishment, 268
Deacon’s Bench, Inc. v. Hoffman, 1285
Del Prado v. B.N. Development Co., Inc., 1204
Dellums v. Powell, 973
Deloitte LLP, United States v., 955
Delta Air Lines, Inc. v. August, 1407
Denman v. Spain, 1117
Deposit Bank of Frankfort v. Board of Councilmen of City of Frankfort, 1274
Depuy Orthopaedics, Inc., In re, 418
Des Moines Navigation & Railroad Co. v. Iowa Homestead Co., 74
Deyo v. Internal Revenue Service, 646
Dial Co. v. News Co., 1411
Diaz v. Paterson, 294, 1187, 1197
Dice v. Akron, Canton & Youngstown R. Co., 540

Diederich v. American News Co., 466
Digital Equip. Corp. v. Desktop Direct, Inc., 1227
Dillon v. Numismatic Funding Corp., 165
DiMichel v. South Buffalo Ry. Co., 42
Dimick v. Schiedt, 1171
Diniero v. United States Lines Co., 53
Dioguardi v. Durning, 608
DIRECTV, Inc. v. Imburgia, 1401
Discover Bank v. Superior Court, 893
Diversified Industries, Inc. v. Meredith, 964
Dobson v. Masonite Corp., 1088
Doe v. Tobias, 1343
Donatelli v. National Hockey League, 79
Donovan v. City of Dallas, 1193
Donovan v. Penn Shipping Co., 499
Doutre v. Niec, 1173
Drakeford, United States ex rel. v. Tuomey Healthcare System, Inc., 1061
Dred Scott v. Sandford, 311
Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., In re, 845
Dry Clime Lamp Corp. v. Edwards, 235
Duk v. MGM Grand Hotel, Inc., 1157
Dukes v. Wal-Mart, Inc., 885
Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 1373
Duplan Corp. v. Deering Milliken, Inc., 964
Dura Pharmaceuticals, Inc. v. Broudo, 620, 654
Durant v. Servicemaster Co. Trugreen, Inc., 323
Durfee v. Duke, 392
Dusenbery v. United States, 247
DVComm, LLC v. Hotwire Communications, LLC, 976
Dyer v. MacDougall, 1031, 1169
E.I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co. v. Ladner, 520
Eagle Star Ins. Co. v. Maltes, 323
Earle M. Jorgenson Co. v. T.I. United States, Ltd., 739
East v. Romine, Inc., 1253
Economy Electric Company v. Automatic Electric Power and Light Plant, 33
Edgar v. Slaughter, 971
Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Company, Inc., 1100
EEOC v. Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, 887
EEOC v. University of Notre Dame Du Lac, 913
Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 814, 823, 842
Eitel v. McCool, 1045
Eldee-K Rental Properties, LLC v. DirecTV Inc., 408
Electrical Fittings Corp. v. Thomas & Betts Co., 1243
Elena v. Municipality of San Juan, 647
Ellenwood v. Marietta Chair Co., 408
Elliott v. Peirsol’s Lessee, 390
Ellis Canning Co. v. International Harvester Co., 717
Elmendorf v. Taylor, 759
Elsevier, Inc. v. Siew Yee Chew, 267
EM Ltd. v. Republic of Argentina, 1202
Eminence Capital, LLC v. Aspeon, Inc., 678
Empire Healthchoice Assurance, Inc. v. McVeigh, 351
Enochs v. Lampasas County, 378
Epic Systems Corp. v. Lewis, 1401
Eramo v. Rolling Stone LLC, 910
Erickson v. Pardus, 645
Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 445
Esposito v. Piatrowski, 1038
Ettelson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 1056
Everett v. Verizon Wireless, Inc., 323
Evergreens, The v. Nunan, 1307
Exceletech, Inc. v. Williams, 1205
Executive Software North America, Inc. v. United States District Court for the Central District of California, 374
Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Allapattah Services, Inc., 365
Ezra Charitable Trust, The v. Rent-Way, Inc., 719
Factors etc., Inc. v. Pro Arts, Inc., 524
Fahim v. Marriott Hotel Services, Inc., 997
Fairmount Glass Works v. Cub Fork Coal Co., 1167
Fashion Page, Ltd. v. Zurich Ins. Co., 264
Fassett v. Sears Holdings Corp., 905
Federated Department Stores, Inc. v. Moitie, 1273
Fejzulai v. Sam’s West, Inc., 515
Ferens v. John Deere Co., 415
Fetter v. Beal, 73
Fidelity National Financial, Inc. v. Friedman, 1204
Fidrych v. Marriott International, Inc., 197
Fine v. Facet Aerospace Prods. Co., 906
Finley v. Kesling, 1359
Finley v. United States, 361
First Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 1326
First Nat. Bank v. Reynolds, 769
Firstier Mortgage Co. v. Investors Mortgage Insurance Co., 1241

Fisch v. Manger, 1170
Fisher v. Ford Motor Co., 1128
Fisher v. Petr Konchalovsky Foundation, 267
Flaks v. Koegel, 970
Flexner v. Farson, 92, 196
Flintkote Company v. Acia PLC, 518
Florida Hosp. Waterman v. Stoll, 903
Flowers v. Flowers, 1097
Floyd v. Laws, 1158
Flynt, United States v., 996
Foman v. Davis, 690
Fontenot v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 1150
Ford Motor Co. v. Montana Eighth Judicial District Court Ford Motor Co. v. Bandemer, 175
Ford Motor Co. v. Myers, 519
Ford v. C.E. Wilson & Co., 1060
Ford v. Ford, 1362
Franca v. United States, 1039
Franchise Tax Bd. of State of California v. Construction Laborers Vacation Trust for Southern California, 384
Franco v. Mabe Trucking Co., 417
Frommeyer v. L. & R. Construction Co., 736
Fuentes v. Shevin, 280
Furnco Construction Corp. v. Waters, 889
G. Heileman Brewing Co. v. Joseph Oat Corp., 995
Gaffney v. Illingsworth, 1172
Gallick v. Baltimore & Ohio R.R. Co., 1141
Galloway v. Superior Court, 1096
Galloway v. United States, 1111
Ganis Corp. of Cal. v. Jackson, 134
Garcia v. General Motors Corp., 1342
Garcia v. Hilton Hotels International, Inc., 664
Garrison v. United States, 1167
Garrity v. State Board of Administration, 598
Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc., 492
Gateway Bottling, Inc. v. Dad’s Rootbeer Co., 669
GCIU Employer Retirement Fund v. Chicago Tribune, 1040
Geffen v. Winer, 1175
Gelboim v. Bank of America Corp., 795
General Elec. Co. v. Wabash Appliance Corp., 1087
General Motors LLC Ignition Switch Litigation, In re, 419
General Telephone Co. of Southwest v. Falcon, 812, 813, 821, 824, 888
Gibbons v. Pepper, 558
Gillispie v. Goodyear Service Stores, 606
Ginsberg v. Williams, 1151
Gjellum v. City of Birmingham, 1381
Glass v. S & M NuTec, LLC, 886
Global Naps, Inc. v. Verizon New England Inc., 364
Gluck v. Ansett Austl. Ltd., 919
Godby, State ex rel. v. Chambers, 273
Goldberg v. Kelly, 284
Goldberg v. Pacific Indemnification Co., 516
Golden Eagle Distributing Corp. v. Burroughs Corp., 713
Goldlawr, Inc. v. Heiman, 417
Gooch v. Life Inv’rs Ins. Co. of Am., 842
Goodyear Dunlop Tires Operations, S.A. v. Brown, 162
Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. v. Haeger, 976
Google LLC v. Oracle America, Inc., 1250
Google LLC, In re, 409
Google v. Oracle, 1090
Gordon v. Harper, 573
Grable & Sons Metal Products, Inc. v. Darue Engineering & Manufacturing, 342
Grace v. MacArthur, 88
Grand Jury Subpoena (Mark Torf/ Torf Environmental Management), In re, 953
Granfinanciera, S.A. v. Nordberg, 1072
Grannis v. Ordean, 241
Gratz v. Bollinger, 824
Gray v. American Radiator & Standard Sanitary Corp., 107
Great Lakes Rubber Corp. v. Herbert Cooper Co., 731
Green’s Estate, In re, 1168
Greenbaum v. United States, 688
Greene v. Lindsey, 247
Greenleaf v. Birth, 1114
Greenville, Ill., City of v. Syngenta Crop Protection, LLC, 904
Gregg v. Georgia, 158
Grey v. Hayes-Sammons Chem. Co., 521
Griffin v. McCoach, 783
Griggs v. Miller, 1198
Grimes v. Miller, 1209
Grisham, State ex rel. v. Allen, 660
Grunin v. Int’l House of Pancakes, 842
Grupo Dataflux v. Atlas Global Group, L.P., 390
Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo, S.A. v. Alliance Bond Fund, Inc., 1192
Guaranty Trust Co. v. York, 454

Preface

Guilford National Bank v. Southern R. Co., 938
Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 420
Gulfstream Aerospace Corp. v. Mayacamas Corp., 1240
Gully v. First Nat. Bank in Meridian, 344
Gunn v. Minton, 347
H.K. Huilin International Trade Co., Ltd. v. Kevin Multiline Plymer Inc., 315
Hackethal v. National Casualty Co., 651
Hadges v. Yonkers Racing Corp., 706
Haines v. Kerner, 645
Hall Street Associates, L.L.C. v. Mattel, Inc., 1406
Hall v. Chicago and Northwestern Ry. Company, 1154
Hall v. Earthlink Network, Inc., 322
Hall v. Hall, 795
Hall v. Pickard, 570
Hallock, Helvering v., 1267
Halpern v. Schwartz, 1298
Halpert v. Appeby, 269
Hamer v. Neighborhood Housing Services of Chicago, 303, 1242
Hames v. Rust, 1168
Hammond Packing Co. v. Arkansas, 970
Hancock Oil Co. v. Independent Distributing Co., 766
Hankins v. Finnel, 1202
Hanlon v. Chrysler Corp., 851
Hanna v. Plumer, 468
Hanover Logansport, Inc. v. Robert C. Anderson, Inc., 1311
Hansberry v. Lee, 804
Hanson v. Denckla, 103, 221
Hanson v. Hunt Oil Co., 690
Harden v. Hillman, 1163
Harris v. Avery, 720
Harris v. Balk, 208
Harris, In re, 1195
Harrison v. Springdale Water & Sewer Commission, 1284
Harry Barfield Co., United States v., 1164
Hart Steel Co. v. Railroad Supply Co., 1274
Hart v. American Airlines, Inc., 1357
Hartford Accident & Indem. Co. v. Ace Am. Reinsur. Co., 1187
Harvard Trust Co. v. Bray, 235
Haywood v. Drown, 302
Hazel-Atlas Glass Co. v. Hartford-Empire Co., 1180, 1182
Head v. Hargrave, 61
Hearns v. San Bernadino Police Dept., 646
Hedrick v. Daiko Shoji Co., 157
Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia, S.A. v. Hall, 162
Heller v. City of Dallas, 921
Henderson ex rel. Henderson v. Shinseki, 303
Henry Schein, Inc. v. Archer & White Sales, Inc., 1406
Herrera v. Wyoming, 1305
Herring v. United States, 1181
Herron v. Southern Pacific Co., 465
Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 312
Hess v. Pawloski, 91
Heyward-Robinson Co., United States v., 725
Hiatt v. Yergin, 1084
Hickman v. Taylor, 898, 944
Hicks v. United States, 68
Hinderlider v. La Plata River & Cherry Creek Ditch Co., 527
Hoagland v. Sandberg, Phoenix & Von Gontard, P.C., 313
Hobson v. Hansen, 787
Hoffman v. Blaski, 410
Hogan v. Fischer, 698
Holley v. Techtronic Indus. N. Am., Inc., 312
Holmberg v. State, Division of Risk Management, 1318
Holtman v. Butterfiled, 1088
Home Depot U.S.A., INC. v. Jackson, 382
Home Owners Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Northwestern Fire & Marine Insurance Co., 1298
Homestead Co. v. Railroad, 74
Hooker Chemicals & Plastics Corp., United States v., 793
Hooper v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 416
Horst, Helvering v., 1302
Horton v. Continental Can Co., 765
Housing Authority for La Salle County v. Young Men’s Christian Association of Ottawa, 1316
Howard v. Kerr Glass Mfg. Co., 1001
Howlett v. Rose, 302
Howmedica Osteonics Corp., In re, 438
Huffman v. Pursue, Ltd., 1193
Hughes v. Fetter, 301
Hulson v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway, 1177
Hunt v. Imperial Merch. Servs., Inc., 844
Hurn v. Oursler, 355
Hutchinson, People v., 1162
Hutton v. Fisher, 1175

Hy Cite Corp. v. badbusinessbureau. com, L.L.C., 201
Hyatt v. Rock, 915
I.M. Wilson, Inc. v. Otvetstvennostyou “Grichko”, 267
IBM, Corp., United States v., 983
Iglesias v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, 364
Imamura v. General Electric Co., 431
Ingraham v. United States, 681
Inset Systems, Inc. v. Instruction Set, Inc., 200
Institutional Invs. Group v. Avaya, Inc., 657
Insurance Co. of North America v. S/S “Hellenic Challenger”, 262
Insurance Corp. of Ireland, Ltd. v. Compagnie des Bauxites de Guinee, 194
International Broth. of Teamsters v. United States, 1254
International Ore & Fertilizer Corp. v. SGS Control Services, Inc., 1246
International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 95
Inwood Laboratories, Inc. v. Ives Laboratories, Inc., 1255
Iraola & CIA S.A. v. Kimberly-Clark Corp., 314
ISI Intern. Inc. v. Borden Ladner Gervais LLP, 233
Islamic Republic of Iran v. Pahlavi, 429
J. McIntyre Machinery, Ltd. v. Nicastro, 143
J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 1103
Jack Faucett Assocs. v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 1341
Jackson v. L & F Martin Landscape, 417
Jackson v. Laureate, Inc., 996
Jackson-Platts v. General Electric Capital Corp., 1205
Jacobson v. Miller, 1284
Jacynicz v. 73 Seaman Assocs., 1194
James v. City of Wilkes-Barre, 686
James v. Verizon Services Corp., 409
Japanese Electronic Prods. Antitrust Litigation, In re, 1065
Jeffries v. Glacier State Tel. Co., 1319
Jennings v. Stephens, 1247
Jeub v. B/G Foods, Inc., 763
Jinks v. Richland County, S.C., 379
John R. Sand & Gravel Co. v. United States, 303
Johns v. City of Los Angeles, 1162
Johns-Manville Corp., In re, 865
Johnson v. City of Shelby, Miss., 644
Johnson v. Mammoth Recreations, Inc., 996
Johnson v. Manhattan Ry Co., 795
Johnson v. NPAS Solutions, LLC, 851
Johnson v. TheHuffingtonPost.com, Inc., 201
Jones v. Coty Inc., 515
Jones v. Flowers, 248
Jones v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 364
Jones v. Governor of Florida, 284
Jones v. Morris Plan Bank of Portsmouth, 1275
Jones v. Singing River Health Serv. Found., 825
Jones v. Winsor, 594
Jorgensen v. York Ice Mach. Corp., 1163
Josephson, In re, 1234
JPMorgan Chase Bank v. Traffic Stream (BVI) Infrastructure Limited, 306
Kadic v. Karadzic, 276
Kalb v. Feuerstein, 391
Kalish v. Karp & Kalamotousakis, LLP, 845
Kamen v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 710
Kane v. New Jersey, 90
Kassner v. 2nd Avenue Delicatessen, Inc., 997
Katz v. Eli Lilly & Co., 1343
Kay v. Lamar Advertising of South Dakota, Inc., 943
Kealoha v. Tanaka, 1163
Kearns v. Ford Motor Company, 647
Keck v. Alibaba.com, Inc., 267
Keeton v. Hustler Magazine, Inc., 124
Kegerise v. Susquehanna Township School District, 684
Keith v. Volpe, 698
Kelley v. Curtiss, 1295
Kelly v. Checker White Cab, Inc., 47
Kennedy v. Silas Mason Co., 49
Kerotest Mfg. Co. v. C-O-Two Co., 1331
Kerr v. United States District Court, 913, 1235
Kimbell Foods, Inc., United States v., 530
Kindred Nursing Centers Limited Partnership v. Clark, 1402
King v. Whitmer, 715
King Vision Pay Per View, Ltd. v. J.C. Dimitri’s Restaurant, Inc., 680
Kinsey v. Preeson, 1208
Kirkeby v. Superior Court of Orange County, 1197
Kirven v. Chemical Co., 1280
Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Electric Mfg. Co., 517
Klay v. Humana, Inc., 830
Klipsch Group, Inc. v. ePro E-Commerce Ltd., 978
Klonoski v. Mahlab, 898
Kode v. Carlson, 1157

Preface

Koenig v. Waukesha State Bank, 1210
Kokkonen v. Guardian Life Insurance Co. of America, 379
Kona Technology Corp. v. Southern Pacific Transportation Co., 1001
Korean Air Lines Disaster of Sept. 1, 1983, In re, 418
Kossick v. United Fruit Co., 527
Kramer v. Caribbean Mills, Inc., 317
Kremer v. Chemical Construction Corp., 1372
Krieger v. Ownership Corporation, 1000
Kronisch v. United States, 975
Krupski v. Costa Crociere S.P.A., 695
Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co., 448
Kukanskis v. Griffith, 1197
Kulko v. Superior Court, 126
La Buy v. Howes Leather Co., 1006, 1231
Lacks v. Lacks, 297
Lamb v. Schmitt, 275
Lambert v. Nutraceutical Corp., 847
Lamberts, United States ex rel. v. Stokes, 1311
Lamine v. Dorrell, 577
Lamonds v. General Motors Corp., 966
Lamps Plus, Inc. v. Varela, 1401
Lanfear v. Home Depot, Inc., 416
Lang v. Shaw, 273
Lansford-Coaldale Joint Water Authority v. Tonolli Corp., 1145
Larson v. AT&T Mobility LLC, 843
Larson v. Neimi, 1158
LASA Per L’Industria Del Marmo Societa Per Azioni v. Alexander, 735
Lassiter v. Department of Social Services, 296
Latham v. Rutley, 559
Laurel Gardens, LLC v. Mckenna, 233
Lauro Lines S.R.L. v. Chasser, 1227
Lavender v. Kurn, 63
Le Maistre v. Leffers, 1210
Leal v. McHugh, 647
Leame v. Bray, 570
Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 616
Leighton v. One William Street Fund, Inc., 1150
Lenz v. Wagner, 793
Leroy v. Great Western United Corp., 405
Lesnik v. Public Industrials Corp., 727
Letz v. Letz, 1205
Lexecon Inc. v. Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach, 418
Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. Wetzel, 1214
Liberty Oil Co. v. Condon Nat. Bank, 1060
Lightfoot v. Cedant Mortgage Corp., 329
Lincoln Property Co. v. Roche, 305
Linden v. CNH America, LLC, 1177
Linderman Machine Co. v. Hillenbrand Co., 1283
Link v. Wabash Railroad Co., 972, 1039
Lisk v. Lumber One Wood Preserving, LLC, 515
Lively v. Wild Oats Markets, Inc., 384
Livingston v. City of Chicago, 933
Livingston v. Jefferson, 401, 408
Lorillard v. Pons, 1078
Louisiana Power & Light Co. v. City of Thibodaux, 523
Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Mottley, 331, 334
Lucky Brand Dungarees, Inc. v. Marcel Fashions Group Inc., 1282
Lumbermen’s Mutual Casualty Co. v. Wright, 474
Lunn v. Commonwealth, 1195
Luse v. United States, 681
Luv N’ care, Ltd. v. Insta-Mix, Inc., 143
Lydig Construction, Inc. v. Martinez Steel Corp., 1188
Lynch v. Merrell-National Labs. Div. of Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 1356
M. Prusman, Ltd. v. Ariel Maritime Group, Inc., 265
M/S Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 198
Macaulay v. Anas, 998
MacDermid, Inc. v. Deiter, 204
Mach. Co. v. Freeman, 384
MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., 519
Magna Poertrain de Mexico S.A. de C.V. v. Momentive Performance Materials USA LLC, 197
Magnani v. Trogi, 1153
Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd. v. Tellabs, Inc., 899
Mallgren v. Microsoft Corp., 678
Mallory v. Norfolk Southern Railway Co., 197
Mancia v. Mayflower Textile Servs. Co., 915
Manhattan Egg Co. v. Seaboard Terminal & Refrig. Co., 600
Manley v. Ingram, 417
Mansfield, C. & L. M. Ry. Co. v. Swan, 387
Marcelli v. Walker, 1182
Marcus v. BMW of N. Am., LLC, 834
Marek v. Chesny, 1408
Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., 1084, 1089

Preface

Marks v. United States, 158
Marrese v. American Academy of Orthopaedic Surgeons, 913, 1371
Marsh v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 1169
Marshall v. Marshall, 325
Marshall v. National Football League, 851
Marshalsea, The Case of the, 390
Martel, In re, 1292
Martin v. International Olympic Committee, 1191
Martin v. Wilks, 794, 1344
Mas v. Perry, 309
Mason v. American Emery Wheel Works, 518
Masters v. Wilhelmina Model Agency, Inc., 852
Mathews v. Eldridge, 284
Mathews v. New York Racing Association, Inc., 1270
Matrixx Initiatives, Inc. v. Siracusano, 658
Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Epstein, 1371
Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 1009, 1029
Mavrix Photo, Inc. v. Brand Technologies, Inc., 203
Mayo v. Bangor Area School Dist., 687
Mayor v. Cooper, 362
McCants v. Ford Motor Co., 1037
McCarty v. First of Georgia Ins. Co., 1274
McCurry v. Chevy Chase Bank, 644
McDonald v. E.J. Lavino Co., 793
McDonald v. Mabee, 92, 244, 245
McDonough Power Equipment, Inc. v. Greenwood, 1164
McFarlane v. Esquire Mag., 417
McGee v. International Life Insurance Co., 102
McGillvary v. Holom, 267
McGowan v. Homeward Residential, Inc., 662
McInnes v. California, 1381
McKenna v. Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., 521
McKesson v. Doe, 523
McLean Contracting Co. v. Waterman S.S. Corp., 1002
McLimans v. City of Lancaster, 1152
Mendoza, United States v., 1343
Mennonite Board of Missions v. Adams, 246
Merck Sharp & Dohme Corp. v. Albrecht, 1089
Meredith v. City of Winter Haven, 523
Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Thompson, 341
Merrill v. Yeomans, 1087
Merritt v. Faulkner, 646
Merritt-Chapman & Scott Corp. v. Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co., 1192
Mesa v. California, 330
Mesnick v. Gen. Elec. Co., 1012
Messenger v. United States, 1039
Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Robertson-Ceco Corp., 172
MF Global Holdings Ltd. Investment Litigation, In re, 419
Michaelson v. United States ex rel. Chicago, ST. P., M. & O. R. Co., 1066
Microsoft Corp. v. Baker, 847, 1238
Miedreich v. Lauenstein, 268
Migra v. Warren City School District Board of Education, 1370
Miller v. Fenton, 1086, 1090
Miller v. Sam Houston State University, 980, 995
Milliken v. Meyer, 88
Mims v. Arrow Financial Services, LLC, 352
Minarik Electric Co. v. Electro Sales Co., Inc., 1305
Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Bombolis, 541
Minnesota v. Mille Lac Band of Chippewa Indians, 1305
Minnesota v. Northern Securities Co., 1364
Mirfasihi v. Fleet Mortg. Corp., 841
Mississippi Pub. Corp. v. Murphree, 470
Mississippi, United States v., 745
Mitchell v. Federal Intermediate Credit Bank, 1279
Mitchell v. W.T. Grant Co., 283
Mobile & O.R. Co. v. Matthews, 1264
Mohawk Industries, Inc. v. Carpenter, 1226
Moloney v. United States, 963
Monell v. Dep’t of Soc. Servs., 359
Monroe v. City of Charlottesville, 825
Monroe v. Pape, 1368
Montana v. United States, 1344
Monterey, City of v. Del Monte Dunes, 1082
Moore v. Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., 340
Moore v. Moore, 692
Moore v. New York Cotton Exchange, 727
Moore v. Publicis Groupe SA, 933
Mora v. Zeta Interactive Corp., 910
Morgantown, W.Va., City of v. Royal Ins. Co., 1056
Morley v. Gaisford, 570
Morris v. Calhoun, 273
Moser, United States v., 1299

Moses H. Memorial Hospital v. Mercury Construction Corp., 1400
Moses v. Macferlan, 578
Mosley v. General Motors Corp., 743
Mulero-Abreu v. Puerto Rico Police Dept., 998
Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 212, 237
Mullins v. Dir. Dig., LLC, 839
Murphy Bros. v. Michetti Pipe Stringing, Inc., 100
Murphy v. Gallagher, 1371
Murray v. Kindred Nursing Centers West LLC, 1026
Mussat v. Iqvia, INC., 883
Nachshin v. AOL, LLC, 850
Nagravision SA v. Gotech Int’l Tech. Ltd., 267
Nandjou v. Marriott International, Inc., 430
National Ass’n of Music Merchants, Musical Instruments and Equipment Antitrust Litigation, In re, 899
National Development Co. v. Triad Holding Corp., 257
National Equipment Rental, Ltd. v. Szukhent, 257
National Exchange Bank, United States v., 529
National Football League Players Concussion Injury Litig., In re, 867
National Hockey League v. Metropolitan Hockey Club, Inc., 971, 974
National Satellite Sports, Inc. v. Eliadis, Inc., 1298
Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc. v. New York State Department of Environmental Conservation, 792
Neary v. Regents of The University of California, 1315
Necaise v. Chrysler Corp., 521
Neely v. Martin K. Eby Construction Co., 1115
Nelson v. Colorado, 295
Nelson v. Miller, 109
Nelson v. Park Industries, Inc., 157
Nemariam v. Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia, 431
Nesbit v. Riverside Independent District, 1277
Netsphere, Inc. v. Baron, 1194
New Destiny Dev. Corp. v. Piccione, 1197
New England Merchants National Bank v. Iran Power Generation and Transmission Co., 266
New Hampshire v. Maine, 1306
New Mexico ex rel. Balderas v. Real Estate Law Center, P.C., 460
New York Life Ins. Co. v. Dunlevy, 772
New York Telephone Co. v. Maltbie, 1244
New York Times Co. v. Connor, 126
New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 1028, 1256
Newman-Green, Inc. v. Alfonzo-Larrain, 316
Newton v. Bank of McKenney, 1210
Nicastro v. McIntyre Machinery America, Ltd., 144, 148
Nick v. Morgan’s Foods, Inc., 992
Nixon v. Sirica, 1236
Nixon, United States v., 1227
NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 1068
Nolan v. Transocean Air Lines, 522
Noll v. eBay, Inc., 841
Nollenberger v. United Air Lines, Inc., 1140
Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Ayers, 864
North Georgia Finishing, Inc. v. Di-Chem, Inc., 283
Northern Mariana Islands v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, 1205
Novella v. Westchester County, 822
Nowak v. XAPO, Inc., 267
Nuesse v. Camp, 789
Nunley v. Pettway Oil Co., 1130
Nwosun v. General Mills Restaurants, Inc., 1378
O’Connor v. Varney, 1280
O’Gara v. Equifax Information Services, LLC, 911
O’Keefe, United States v., 930
O’Regan v. Schermerhorn, 608
Office Depot, Inc. v. Zuccarini, 234
Ogle v. Barnes, 570
Olcott v. Delaware Flood Co., 416
Olympia Express, Inc. v. Linee Aeree Italiane, S.P.A., 1093
One 1987 BMW 325, United States v., 998
One Assortment of 89 Firearms, United States v., 1318
Oppenheimer Fund, Inc. v. Sanders, 843
Opperman v. Path, Inc., 653
Orsini v. Wallace, 1003
Ortega v. Star-Kist Foods, Inc., 366
Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 828, 860
Ortiz v. Jordan, 1125
Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 328
Osborn v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 385
Oswalt v. Scripto, Inc., 157
Otto Candies, LLC v. Citigroup, Inc., 431
Owen Equipment & Erection Co. v. Kroger, 360
Pacific Pictures Corp., In re, 964
Padovani v. Bruchhausen, 999
Page v. Democratic Nat’l Comm., 316
Painter v. Fred Whitaker Co., 1095
Palmdale, City of v. State Bd. of Equalization, 1316

Pan American Fire & Casualty Co. v. Revere, 773
Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litigation, In re, 1273
Papasan v. Allain, 619
Parker v. Hoefler, 1365
Parker v. Hulme, 1086
Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 1061, 1334
Parks v. Ross, 1114
Parra v. PacifiCare of Arizona, Inc., 379
Parsons Steel, Inc. v. First Alabama Bank, 1378
Parsons v. Bedford, 1114
Partmar Corp. v. Paramount Pictures Theatres Corp., 1244
Patrick v. Sedwick, 1178
Patterson v. Saunders, 1297
Patton v. United States, 1093
Pavelic & Leflore v. Marvel Entertainment Group, 704
Payne v. S. S. Nabob, 998
Peacock Records, Inc. v. Checker Records, Inc., 1181
Pena-Rodriguez v. Colorado, 1163
Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. United States, 903
Pennington v. Fourth National Bank, 207
Pennoyer v. Neff, 79, 190
Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Co. of Philadelphia v. Gold Issue Mining & Milling Co., 196
Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Chamberlain, 67
Pennzoil Co. v. Texaco, Inc., 1192
Perdue v. Kenny A. ex rel. Winn, 852
Perkins v. Benguet Consol. Mining Co., 165
Peterson, In re, 1004
Petro-Hunt, L.L.C. v. United States, 1268
Pfau v. Forster & Garbus, Matter of, 270
Pharmaceutical Indus. Average Wholesale Price Litig., In re, 849
Philadelphia & Reading Ry. Co. v. McKibbin, 94
Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 873
Philos Technologies, Inc. v. Philos & D, Inc., 1182
Pierce v. Carey, 596
Pierson v. Dean, Witter, Reynolds, Inc., 1093
Pina v. Children’s Place, 1036
Pincay v. Andrews, 1178
Pioneer Inv. Servs. Co. v. Brunswick Associates Ltd. Partnership, 1177, 1242
Piper Aircraft Co. v. Reyno, 421, 437, 439
Pippen v. NBCUniversal Media, LLC, 661
Pitcher v. Rogers, 1156
Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc. v. Center for Medical Progress, 516
Planned Parenthood of S. Ariz. v. Neely, 698
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 1267
Plumhoff v. Rickard, 1035
Poitra v. School District No. 1 in the County of Denver, 979
Pollack, Pretrial Conferences, 989
Poller v. CBS, Inc., 1011
Polycast Technology Corp. v. Uniroyal, Inc., 923
Pomerantz v. Clark, 522
Popham v. City of Kennesaw, 1145
Porter & Dietsch, Inc. v. FTC, 1320, 1324
Powerex Corp. v. Reliant Energy Services, Inc., 388
Powers v. Ohio, 1101
Powers, Requests for Instructions, 1129
Prado-Steiman v. Bush, 847
Preiser v. Rodriguez, 1367
Printed Terry Finishing Co. v. City of Lebanon, 1164
Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 40, 752
Provincial Gov’t of Marinduque v. Placer Dome, Inc., 432
Public Health Equipment & Supply Co., Inc. v. Clarke Mosquito Control Systems, Inc., 997
Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 1252
Purnell v. City of Akron, 791
Pusey & Jones Co. v. Hanssen, 455
Putman v. Erie City Mfg. Co., 521
Pyle v. Selective Insurance Co. of America, 933
Queen v. City of Bowling Green, 912
Quercia v. United States, 1131
Rachal v. Hill, 1334
Ragan v. Merchants Transfer & Warehouse Co., 460
Ram Constr. Co. v. American States Ins. Co., 1146
Randone v. Appellate Department of the Superior Court of Sacramento County, 1188
Rankin v. Fidelity Insurance Trust & Safe Deposit Co., 1088
Ratliff v. Cooper Laboratories, Inc., 196
Reasor-Hill Corp. v. Harrison, 399
Redman v. RadioShack Corp., 853
Redondo Construction Corp. v. Izquierdo, 379
Reed, In re, 903
Reedsburg Bank v. Apollo, 793
Reeves v. Crownshield, 1205
Reeves v. Sanderson Plumbing Products, Inc., 1120
Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 186

Rennie & Laughlin, Inc. v. Chrysler Corp., 671
Republic of Argentina v. NML Cap., Ltd., 1202
Republic of Panama v. BCCI Holdings (Luxembourg) S.A., 233
Republic of Sudan v. Harrison, 268
Republic of the Philippines v. Pimentel, 762, 783
Research Automation, Inc. v. Schrader-Bridgeport Intern., Inc., 415
Resolution Trust Corp. v. Fountain Circle Assocs., 1193
Resolution Trust Corp. v. Southern Union Co., Inc., 978
Reynolds v. National Football League, 828
Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., In the Matter of, 831
Rice v. City of Chicago, 1045
Rice’s Toyota World, Inc. v. Southeast Toyota Distributors, Inc., 925
Richards v. Jefferson County, 1351
Richardson-Merrell, Inc. v. Koller, 1227
Rio Properties, Inc. v. Rio International Interlink, 266
Riordan v. State Far, m. Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 662
Rios v. Davis, 1296
Rivera v. Martin J. Donnelly Antique Tools, 975
Rivet v. Regions Bank, 1274
Roadway Express, Inc. v. Piper, 968
Robb v. John C. Hickey, Inc., 1155
Robbins & Myers, Inc. v. J.M. Huber Corp., 921
Roberts v. Ross, 1147, 1149
Robinson v. Meyer, 608
Rocha v. Great American Insurance Co., 1132
Roche v. Evaporated Milk Association, 1232
Rodriguez De Quijas v. Shearson/ American Express, 1400
Rodriguez v. FDIC, 527, 539
Rogers v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 1038
Roling v. E*Trade Sec., LLC, 886
Roller v. Holly, 251
Romero v. Allstate Ins. Co., 934
Rose v. Giamatti, 317
Rosenberg Bros. & Co. v. Curtis Brown Co., 98, 191
Ross v. Bernhard, 1063
Ross v. Johnson, 572
Rourke v. Amchem Products, Inc., 1359
Rudell v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., 1284
Ruhrgas AG v. Marathon Oil Co., 314, 387
Rush v. City of Maple Heights, 1262
Rush v. Savchuk, 222
Rusidoff v. DeBolt Transfer, Inc., 1156
Russell v. Place, 1293
Ryan, United States v., 1227
Ryder v. Jefferson Hotel Co., 741
Sadat v. Mertes, 316
Safir v. Gibson, 1320
Salahuddin v. Cuomo, 646, 670
Salve Regina College v. Russell, 525
Sampson v. Murray, 1190
San Francisco, City and County of v. Tutor-Saliba Corp., 919
Sandvik AB v. Advent Int’l Corp., 439
Santa Monica, City of v. Gonzalez, 1194
Schering Plough Corp. ERISA Litig., In re, 824
Schiavone v. Fortune, 695
Schlagenhauf v. Holder, 935, 1235
Schonfeld v. Hilliard, 661
Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 925
Schroeder v. City of New York, 246
Schuylkill and Dauphin Improvement Co. v. Munson, 1115
Schwartz v. Public Administrator, 1358
Schwimmer Electronics Co. v. Sony Corp., 1124
Scott v. Harris, 1032
Scott, an Infant, by His Next Friend v. Shepherd, an Infant, by Guardian, 565
Scottsdale Insurance Co. v. Tolliver, 516
Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Mackey, 1216, 1219
Sebelius v. Auburn Regional Medical Center, 303
SEC v. China Intelligent Lighting & Electronics, Inc., 267
SEC v. Everest Management Corp., 1336
SEC v. Koenig, 1133
SEC v. Monarch Funding Corp., 1310
Semtek International Inc. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 539, 1373
September 11 Litigation, In re, 1397
Servicios Azucareros de Venezuela, C.A. v. John Deere Thibodaux, Inc., 311
Sewing Machine Cos., Case of the, 75
SG Cowen Securities Corp. v. U.S. Dist. Court for Northern Dist. of CA., 918
Shady Grove Orthopedic Associates v. Allstate Insurance Co., 502
Shaffer Equipment Co., United States v., 898
Shaffer v. Heitner, 210
Shamrock Oil & Gas Corp. v. Sheets, 381
Shaumyan v. O’Neill, 294
Shaw v. Merritt-Chapman & Scott Corp., 677

Shaw v. Toshiba Am. Info. Sys., Inc., 849
Sheffield v. City of Boston, 669
Sheila Roberts Ford, In re Petition of, 900
Shelley v. Kraemer, 808
Shields v. Barrow, 751, 760
Shives v. Sample, 607
Shoshone Mining Co. v. Rutter, 339
Shutts v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 882
Sibbach v. Wilson & Co., 477, 936
Siegert v. Gilley, 632
Silverman Partners, L.P. v. First Bank, 1189
Silvestri v. General Motors Corp., 975
Simmons v. Abruzzo, 669
Sinclair v. Fotomat Corp., 646
Sinochem International Co. Ltd. v. Malaysia International Shipping Corp., 432
Sisney v. Best Inc., 644
Sivnksty, State ex rel. v. Duffield, 272
Skelly Oil Co. v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 334
Skinner v. Switzer, 644
Slade’s Case, 575
Slocum v. New York Life Insurance Co., 1126, 1127
Smith Kline & French Labs. Ltd. v. Bloch, 429
Smith v. Barry, 1240, 1241
Smith v. Café Asia, 963
Smith v. Kansas City Title & Trust Co., 340
Smith v. North American Rockwell Corp., 744
Smith v. Times Publishing Co., 1166
Smith v. Vulcan Iron Works, 1239
Smuck v. Hobson, 787
Snead v. American Export-Isbrandtsen Lines, 43
Sniadach v. Family Finance Corp. of Bay View, 279
Snyder v. Harris, 869
Snyder v. Phelps, 1105
Société Internationale pour Participations Industrielles et Commerciales v. Rogers, 971
Sonesta Int’l Hotels Corp. v. Wellington Assocs., 1189
Sonner v. Premier Nutrition Corp., 460
Sopp v. Smith, 1161
Sorcia v. Holder, 417
Sorrentino v. ASN Roosevelt Ctr., LLC, 871
Sosa v. Airprint Systems, Inc., 997
Southern Construction Co. v. Pickard, 729, 733
Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. United States, 1286
Southland Corp. v. Keating, 1400
Southwest Airlines Co. v. Texas Int’l Airlines, 1325
Spano v. Boeing Co., 825
Sparrow v. United Air Lines, Inc., 616
Spectacor Management Group v. Brown, 732
Sporn v. Hudson Transit Lines, 723
Spradling v. City of Tulsa, 1304
Sprint Communications Co., v. APCC Services, Inc., 720
St. Paul Mercury Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co., 320
Stadin v. Union Elec. Co., 792
Stahle v. CTS Corp., 523
Standard Fire Ins. Co. v. Knowles, 871
Stangle v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 1297
Stanley, United States v., 1238
State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. v. Tashire, 778
State Farm Mutual Auto. Ins. Co. v. Fayda, 911
State Stove Mfg. Co. v. Hodges, 521
Staton v. Boeing Co., 851
Stauffer Chemical Co., United States v., 1304, 1343
Stearn v. Malloy, 222
Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 387
Stewart Organization, Inc. v. Ricoh Corp., 486
Stewart v. Ramsay, 275
Stoddardt v. Express Services, 996
Stolt-Nielson S.A. v. Animalfeeds International Corp., 890
Stoner v. New York Life Ins. Co., 466
Storms v. Lowe’s Home Centers, Inc., 941
Strangborough & Warners Case, 551
Strauder v. West Virginia, 1104
Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 305
Strike 3 Holdings, LLC v. Doe, subscriber assigned IP address 108.51.209.163, 915
Sun Oil Co. v. Wortman, 301
Sunnen, Commissioner v., 1300, 1306
Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 1320
Supervisors of Kewaunee County v. Decker, 596
Supreme Tribe of Ben-Hur v. Cauble, 869
Surowitz v. Hilton Hotels Corp., 699
Swanson v. Citibank, N.A., 672
Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 614
Swift v. Moseley, 574

Preface

Swift v. Tyson, 442
Swiss American Bank, Ltd., United States v., 234
Synanon Church v. United States, 1309
Szantay v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 478
T. B. Harms Co. v. Eliscu, 335
Tafflin v. Levitt, 301
Tagger v. Strauss Grp. Ltd., 315
Tait v. Western Md. R. Co., 1301
Tatman v. Collins, 981
Taylor v. Hawkinson, 1343
Taylor v. Sommers Bros. Match Co., 403
Taylor v. Sturgell, 883, 1349
TC Heartland LLC v. Kraft Food Group Brands LLC, 409
Teamsters v. United States, 814, 817
Teletronics Pacing Sys, Inc., In re, 823
Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd., 654
Temple v. Synthes Corp., 40, 41
Tennessee v. Union & Planters’ Bank, 332
Tetra Technologies, Inc. v. Continental Ins. Co., 1223
Teva Pharmaceuticals USA, Inc. v. Sandoz, Inc., 1090
Texas Dep’t of Comm’y Affairs v. Burdine, 1108
Texas Employers’ Ins. Ass’n v. Price, 59
Text Messaging Antitrust Litig., In re, 642
Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills, 330
Textile Workers Union, etc. v. Allendale Co., 790
Textron Inc. and Subsidiaries, United States v., 955
TG Plastics Trading Co., Inc. v. Toray Plastics (America), Inc., 1093
The Mary, 242
Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co., 1095
Thompson v. Hamilton Motor Co., 680
Thompson v. Thompson, 1361
Thrasher v. United States Liab. Ins. Co., 298
Tice v. American Airlines, Inc., 1353
Tickle v. Barton, 31
Title v. United States, 1180
Tolan v. Cotton, 1034
Toledo, A.A. & N.M. Ry. v. Pennsylvania Co., 1191
Tom Doherty Associates, Inc. v. Saban Entertainment, Inc., 1191
Tompkins v. Central Laborers’ Pension Fund, 647
Torres v. Oakland Scavenger Co., 1241
Torres v. Time Manufacturing Company, 941
Touchcom, Inc. v. Bereskin & Parr, 232
Tozer v. LTV Corp., 532
Tran v. New Rochelle Hospital Medical Center, 46
Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Hughes, 1045
TransUnion LLC v. Ramirez, 872
Trapp v. King, 1174
Travelers Health Association v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 112
Travelers Indemnity Co. v. Bailey, 391
Travelers Property Casualty v. Good, 323
Trbovich v. United Mine Workers of America, 792
Treinies v. Sunshine Mining Co., 782
Triple Up Limited v. Youku Tudou Inc., 202
Tri-State Dev., Ltd. v. Johnston, 1187
Troupe v. Chicago, D. & G. Bay Transit Co., 51
Troy Bank v. G.A. Whitehead & Co., 323
Trustees of Construction Industry and Laborers Health and Welfare Trust v. Desert Valley Landscape Maint. Inc., 379
Tuazon v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 430
Tull v. United States, 1070
Tulsa Professional Collection Services, Inc. v. Pope, 246
Tunick v. Safir, 524
Turkmen v. Hasty, 641
Turner v. Hudson Transit Lines, Inc., 976
Turner v. Rogers, 296
Twin Disc, Inc. v. Lowell, 732
Twin Flames Universe.com, Inc. v. Cole, 203, 417
Tyson Foods, Inc. v. Bouaphakeo, 830, 873
U.S. Bancorp Mortgage Co. v. Bonner Mall Partnership, 1315
Underwriters National Assurance Co. v. North Carolina Life & Acc. & Health Ins. Guar. Ass’n, 392
Union Carbide Corp. Gas Plant Disaster at Bhopal, India in Dec., 1984, In re, 432
Union Paving Co. v. Downer Corp., 733
United Artists Corp. v. Masterpiece Productions, Inc., 727
United Carbon Co. v. Binney & Smith Co., 1087
United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 353
United Shoe Machinery Corp., United States v., 956
United States Financial Secs. Litigation, In re, 1065
United Steelworkers of America v. R.H. Bouligny, Inc., 313
Unitherm Food Systems, Inc. v. Swift-Eckrich Inc., 1175
University of Tennessee v. Elliott, 1380
Upjohn Co. v. United States, 956
Utah Construction & Mining Co., United States v., 1323
V.L. v. E.L., 1365

Preface

Vacold LLC v. Cerami, 918
Vaden v. Discover Bank, 334
Vaise v. Delaval, 1161
Valente v. Pepsico, Inc., 964
Van Cauwenberghe v. Biard, 1227
Van Dusen v. Barrack, 415
Vanover v. NCO Financial Services, Inc., 1269
Vasu v. Kohlers, Inc., 1262
Veale v. Warner, 553
Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 330
Vespe, United States v., 984
Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 649
Victor-American Fuel Co. v. Peccarich, 1143
Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 719, 792
Visa Intern. Service Ass’n v. JSL Corp., 1180
Vizzini v. Ford Motor Co., 1175
Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft v. Schlunk, 266
Vuitton et Fils, Matter of, 1191
Wachovia Bank, N.A. v. Schmidt, 313
Walden v. Fiore, 159
Waldon v. Marshall, Y.B., 575
Walgrave v. Ogden, 573
Walker v. Armco Steel Corp., 271, 480
Walker v. City of Hutchinson, 246
Wallace B. Roderick Revocable Living Tr. v. XTO Energy, Inc., 823
Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 810, 829
Walsh v. U.S. Bank, 644
Ward v. Macauley, 573
Ward v. Race Horse, 1305
Warne v. Hall, 644
Warner v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co., 751
Washington v. Trump, 1191
Waste Mgmt. Holdings, Inc. v. Mowbray, 846
Water Splash, Inc. v. Menon, 266
Watson v. Fort Worth Bank & Trust, 821
Watson v. Lowcountry Red Cross, 925
Weisgram v. Marley Co., 1117
Wells v. Simonds Abrasive Co., 301
West v. Aurora City, 382
West v. Conrail, 271
West v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 975
Westgate-California Corp., In re, 1298
Weyerhaeuser Co. v. Brantley, 661
Whited v. Phillips, 273
Whittlestone, Inc. v. Handi-Craft Co., 669
Wichita & Affiliated Tribes of Oklahoma v. Hodel, 786
Wilkerson v. McCarthy, 1123
Wilko v. Swan, 1399
Will v. Hallock, 1224
Will v. United States, 1235
William Inglis & Sons Baking Co. v. ITT Continental Baking Co., 698
Williams v. Florida, 1093
Williams v. Holland, 570
Wilson v. Citigroup, 714
Wilson v. Smith, 565
Wingerter v. Maryland Cas. Co., 1156
Winter v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 1190
Winters v. Travia, 941
Wirtz v. International Harvester Co., 1128
Wiwa v. Royal Dutch Petroleum Co., 431
Wojtas v. Capital Guardian Trust Co., 1037
Wonneman v. Stratford Secs. Co., 963
Wood, United States v., 1240
Woods v. Interstate Realty Co., 461
Woodward v. Leavitt, 1161
Word v. Colley, Tex.Civ.App., 1296
World Trade Center Disaster Site Litig., In re, 1006
World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 114
Worthington v. Wilson, 698
Wright v. Illinois & Mississippi Telegraph Co., 1161
Wuchter v. Pizzutti, 245
Wyeth v. Levine, 1089
Wyman v. Newhouse, 276
Yamaha Motor Corp. v. Calhoun, 1238
Yastrab v. Apple Inc., 653
York v. State of Texas, 234
Younger v. Harris, 1193
Zahn v. International Paper Co., 365, 371, 870
Zaldivar v. City of Los Angeles, 703
Zdanok v. Glidden Co., 1333
Ziervogel v. Royal Packing Co., 659
Ziglar v. Abbasi, 641

Zippo Manufacturing Co. v. Zippo Dot Com, Inc., 200
Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 932, 975
Zurich American Insurance Co. v. Staffing Concepts National Inc., 1204

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

1 Pollock & Maitland, The History of English Law 138 (2d ed. 1911), 1050
2 Holdsworth, A History of English Law 339 (3d ed. 1923), 555
3 Davis, Administrative Law Treatise § 25.01 (1958), 600
4 Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1057, p. 191 (1969), 483
4A Wright, Miller & Steinman, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1073 (4th ed.), 201
5 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1215 (3d ed. 2004), 673
5 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1216 (3d ed. 2004), 619
5 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1219, 644
5 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1219 (3d ed. 2004 and Supp. 2010), 645
5 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1271, 681, 682
5 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1283, 647
5C Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1388, 670
6 Wigmore, Evidence §§ 1845, 1846 (3d ed. 1940), 45
6 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1401, 1282
6 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1428 (3d ed.), 699
6 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1443 (3d ed.), 764
7 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1701 (3d ed.), 772
7 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1702 (3d ed.), 766
7A Wright Miller, & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1763, 822
7A Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1757 (4th ed.), 885
7A Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1759 (4th ed.), 810
7A Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1765, 859
7A Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1767 (4th ed.), 825
7C Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1901 (3d ed.), 787
7C Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1917 (3d ed.), 793
8 Wright, Miller & Marcus, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2017 (3d ed.), 963
8B Wright, Miller & Marcus, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2201 (3d ed.), 930
9 Charles A. Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Frank W. Elliot, Federal Practice & Procedure § 2571 (3d ed.), 1146
9 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2302 (4th ed.), 1052
9 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2370 (4th ed.), 1039
9 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure §§ 2361–2368 (4th ed.), 1037
9B Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2503 (3d ed.), 1140
9C Wright & Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure § 2587 (3d ed.), 1258
10A Wright & Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure § 2728 (4th ed.), 1027
10A Wright, Miller, Kane & Marcus, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2686 (3d ed.), 1045
11A Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2951, 1190
12 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure, § 3001, 1313
13D Wright, Miller & Freer, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3657.3 (3d ed.), 312, 378
14A Wright, Miller & Hershkoff, Federal Practice and Procedure §§ 3651–3660.1 (4th ed.), 600
14B Wright, Miller & Steinman, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3722.3 (4th ed.), 385
14B Wright, Miller, Cooper & Steinman, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction and Related Matters: § 3721 (3d ed.), 384
14D Wright, Miller & Freer, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3827 (4th ed.), 417
15A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3902.1, 1245
18 Charles Alan Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Edward H. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4421 (1981), 1310
18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4406, 1261
18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4409 (3d ed.), 1278
18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4414, 1279
18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4415, 1274
18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4420, 1293
18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4424, 1310
18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure §§ 4401–4415, 1260
18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4439 (3d ed.), 1285
18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4449, 1325
18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4463, 1325, 1326
18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4464, 1333
18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4465.4, 1343
18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction and Related Matters § 4428, 392
18B Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure §§ 4467, 4469, 1359
18B Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction and Related Matters §§ 4468, 4472, 1373
19 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4507 (3d ed.), 521
47 Am Jur.2d Judgments § 647 (2d ed.), 1340
Abramowicz & Stearns, Defining Dicta, 57 Stan.L.Rev. 953 (2005), 1268
Abrams & Barber, Domicile Dismantled, 92 Ind.L.J. 387 (2017), 312
Adams, World-Wide Volkswagen v. Woodson—The Rest of the Story, 72 Neb.L.Rev. 1122 (1993), 123
Alberstein, Forms of Mediation and Law: Cultures of Dispute Resolution, 22 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 321 (2007), 1388
Allen, Price & Donison, Federal Discovery Under the 2000 Amendments to Rule 26, 3 Sedona Conf.J. 211 (2002), 920
Allman, Conducting E-Discovery After the Amendments: The Second Wave, 10 Sedona Conf.J. 215 (2009), 931
Allred, Depositions and a Case Called Savard, 63 A.F.L.Rev. 1 (2009), 985
Alquist, Balancing the Checklist: Connecticut’s Legislative Response to Connecticut v. Doe, 26 Conn.L.Rev. 721 (1994), 294
American Law Inst., Preliminary Study of Complex Litigation, Report, 61 (1987), 803
American Law Institute, Principles of the Law of Aggregate Litig. § 1.02, cmt. a (2010), 796
American Law Institute, Principles of the Law of Aggregate Litig. § 3.07 (2010), 850
American Law Institute, Principles of the Law of Aggregate Litig. § 3.13 (2010), 852

Anderson, Where Have You Gone, Spot Mozingo? A Trial Judge’s Lament over the Demise of the Civil Jury Trial, 4 Fed.Cts.L.Rev. 99 (2010), 1048, 1049
Andre, Compulsory (Mis)joinder: The Untenable Intersection of Sovereign Immunity and Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19, 60 Emory L.J. 1157 (2011), 786
Appendix, State Bans on Debtors’ Prisons and Criminal Justice Debt, 129 Harv.L.Rev.F. 153 (2016), 1195
Arnold, A Historical Inquiry into the Right to Trial by Jury in Complex Civil Litigation, 128 U.Pa.L.Rev. 829 (1980), 1065
Arnold, A Modest Replication to a Lengthy Discourse, 128 U.Pa.L.Rev. 986 (1980), 1066
Aviel, Family Law and the New Access to Justice, 86 Fordham L.Rev. 2279 (2018), 1273
Baicker-McKee, Mountain or Molehill?, 55 Duq.L.Rev. 307 (2017), 913
Barnes, In Defense of Asbestos Tort Litigation: Rethinking Legal Process Analysis in a World of Uncertainty, Second Bests, and Shared Policy-Making Responsibility, 34 L. & Soc. Inquiry 5 (2009), 865
Barnette, Ghost in the Machine: Zubulake Revisited and Other Emerging E-Discovery Issues Under the Amended Federal Rules, 18 Rich.J.L. & Tech. 11 (2012), 964
Barrett, Procedural Common Law, 94 Va.L.Rev. 813 (2008), 539
Bartell, The Attorney-Client Privilege and the Work-Product Doctrine, in ALI-ABA Civil Procedure and Litigation in Federal and State Courts, vol. I, at 507 (1987), 956
Bassett & Perschbacher, The Roots of Removal, 77 Brooklyn L.Rev. 1 (2011), 381
Bassett, Implied “Consent” to Personal Jurisdiction in Transnational Class Litigation, 2004 Mich. St.L.Rev. 619, 882
Bassett, The Forum Game, 84 N.C.L.Rev. 333 (2006), 416
Beale, Equity in America, 1 Cambridge L.J. 21 (1921), 583
Beale, Note—Connecticut v. Doeher and Procedural Due Process Values: The Sniadach Tetrad Revisited, 79 Cornell L.Rev. 1603 (1994), 1187
Bearden, Employing the Prima Facie Standard in Third Party Debt Collection Default Judgments, 48 Urb. Law. 365 (2016), 1045
Begleiter, Serve the Cheerleader—Serve the World: An Analysis of Representation in Estate and Trust Proceedings and Under the Uniform Trust Code and Other Modern Trust Codes, 43 Real Prop.Tr. & Est.L.J. 311 (2008), 1344
Behnke, Work-Product Immunity and Dual-Purpose Documents, 2011 Mich.St.L.Rev. 1569, 954
Bell, The Power to Award Sanctions: Does It Belong in the Hands of Magistrate Judges, 61 Alb.L.Rev. 433 (1997), 1003
Bell, Varner & Gottschalk, Automatic Disclosure in Discovery—The Rush to Reform, 27 Ga.L.Rev. 1 (1992), 918
Bellia, Jr., State Courts and the Making of Federal Common Law, 153 U.Pa.L.Rev. 825 (2005), 537
Benham, Twombly and Iqbal Should (Finally!) Put the Distinction Between Intrinsic and Extrinsic Fraud Out of Its Misery, 64 SMU L.Rev. 649 (2011), 1183
Benish, Pennoyer’s Ghost: Consent, Registration Statutes, and General Jurisdiction after Daimler AG v. Bauman, 90 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1609 (2015), 196
Benson, Stricken: The Need for Positive Statutory Law to Prevent Discriminatory Peremptory Strikes of Disabled Jurors, 103 Cornell L.Rev. 437 (2018), 1105
Berkowitz, The Problematic Role of the Special Master: Undermining the Legitimacy of the September 11th Compensation Fund, 24 Yale L. & Pol’y Rev. 1 (2006), 1396
Bissett & Heinen, Accurately Instructed in the Law: Finding State Jury Instructions, 94 Mich.B.J. 48 (Nov. 2015), 1129
Black & Gross, Making It Up As They Go Along: The Role of Law in Securities Arbitration, 23 Cardozo L.Rev. 991 (2002), 1402
Black, Trashing the Presumption: Intervention on the Side of the Government, 39 Env’tl.L. 481 (2009), 793
Black, Calibrating the Scales of Justice: Studying Judges’ Behavior in Bench Trials, 68 Ind.L.J. 1119 (1993), 1110
Bloom & Hershkoff, Federal Courts, Magistrate Judges, and the Pro Se Plaintiff, 16 Notre Dame J.L. Ethics & Pub.Pol’y 475 (2002), 1003
Blume, A Rational Theory for Joinder of Causes of Action and Defences, and for the Use of Counterclaims, 26 Mich.L.Rev. 1 (1927), 722, 725
Blume, Free Joinder of Parties, Claims, and Counterclaims, 2 F.R.D. 250 (1943), 740
Blume, Required Joinder of Claims, 45 Mich.L.Rev. 797 (1947), 723
Bone, “To Encourage Settlement”: Rule 68, Offers of Judgment, and the History of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 102 Nw.U.L.Rev. 1561 (2008), 1410
Bone, Forum Shopping and Patent Law—A Comment on TC Heartland, 96 Tex.L.Rev. 141 (2017), 410
Bone, Justifying Class Action Limits: Parsing the Debates Over Ascertainability and Cy Pres, 65 U.Kan.L.Rev. 913 (2017), 850
Bone, Mapping the Boundaries of the Dispute: Conceptions of Ideal Lawsuit Structure from the Field Code to the Federal Rules, 89 Colum.L.Rev. 1 (1989), 740
Bone, Rethinking the “Day in Court” Ideal and Nonparty Preclusion, 67 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 193 (1992), 1349
Bone, Statistical Adjudication: Rights, Justice, and Utility in a World of Process Scarcity, 46 Va.L.Rev. 561 (1993), 850
Bone, The Process of Making Process: Court Rulemaking, Democratic Legitimacy, and Procedural Efficacy, 87 Geo.L.J. 887 (1999), 601
Bone, The Puzzling Idea of Adjudicative Representation: Lessons for Aggregation Litigation and Class Actions, 79 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 577 (2011), 1356
Bookman, Litigation Isolationism, 67 Stan.L.Rev. 1081 (2015), 429
Boskey & Braucher, Jurisdiction and Collateral Attack: October Term, 1939, 40 Colum.L.Rev. 1006 (1940), 392
Boskey & Gressman, Recent Reforms in the Federal Judicial Structure—Three-Judge District Courts and Appellate Review, 67 F.R.D. 135 (1975), 1229
Boso, Dignity, Inequality, and Stereotypes, 92 Wash.L.Rev. 1119 (2017), 1105
Bowen, Progress in the Administration of Justice During the Victorian Period, 1 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 516 (1907), 584
Boyarin, Court-Connected ADR—A Time of Crisis, A Time of Change, 95 Marq.L.Rev. 993 (2012), 1398
Bradt & Rave, The Information-Forcing Role of the Judge in Multidistrict Litigation, 106 Calif.L.Rev. 1259 (2017), 869
Bradt, “A Radical Proposal”: The Multidistrict Litigation Act of 1968, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 831 (2017), 417
Bradt, Something Less and Something More: MDL’s Roots as a Class Action Alternative, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1711 (2017), 419
Brazil, Hosting Mediations as a Representative of the System of Civil Justice, 22 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 227 (2007), 1388
Brazil, Should Court-Sponsored ADR Survive?, 21 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 241 (2006), 1389
Breaux, Analysis of the Proposed Amendments to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 45 Pertaining to Nonparty Subpoenas for Documents, 50 Hous.L.Rev. 191 (2012), 930
Breitenstein, The Ideal Homestead Exemption: Avoiding Asset Conversion and Fraud but Still Protecting Dependents, 58 Drake L.Rev. 1121 (2010), 1203
Brilmayer, Related Contacts and Personal Jurisdiction, 101 Harv.L.Rev. 1444 (1988), 101
Bronsteen & Fiss, The Class Action Rule, 78 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1419 (2003), 800
Brooks & Rose, Saving the Neighborhood: Racially Restrictive Covenants, Law, and Social Norms (2013), 808
Brougham, Present State of the Law 70 (1828), 560
Brown, A Community of Court ADR Programs: How Court-Based ADR Programs Help Each Other Survive and Thrive, 26 Just. Sys.J. 327 (2005), 1399
Brown, Casting Lots: The Illusion of Justice and Accountability in Property Allocation, 53 Buff.L.Rev. 65 (2005), 6
Brownell, Note—Rethinking the Restatement View (Again!): Multiple Independent Holdings and the Doctrine of Issue Preclusion, 37 Val.U.L.Rev. 879 (2003), 1298
Brunet, Judicial Mediation and Signaling, 3 Nev.L.Rev. 233 (2002–2003), 1411
Brunet, The Triumph of Efficiency and Discretion Over Competing Complex Litigation Policies, 10 Rev.Litig. 273 (1991), 794
Burbank & Farhang, Class Actions and the Counterrevolution Against Federal Litigation, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1495 (2017), 803
Burbank, Proportionality and the Social Benefits of Discovery: Out of Sight and Out of Mind?, 34 Rev.Litig. 647 (2015), 898
Burbank, The Bitter with the Sweet: Tradition, History, and Limitations on Federal Judicial Power—A Case Study, 75 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1291 (2000), 1192
Burbank, The Rules Enabling Act of 1934, 130 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1015 (1982), 28, 453, 600
Burch & Williams, Repeat Players in Multidistrict Litigation: The Social Network, 102 Cornell L.Rev. 1445 (2017), 420
Burch, Constructing Issue Classes, 10 Va.L.Rev. 1855 (2015), 833
Burch, Financiers as Monitors in Aggregate Litigation, 87 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1273 (2012), 419
Burch, Monopolies in Multidistrict Litigation, 70 Vand.L.Rev. 67 (2017), 796
Burch, Optimal Lead Plaintiffs, 64 Vand.L.Rev. 1109 (2011), 826
Burch, Remanding Multidistrict Litigation, 75 La.L.Rev. 399 (2014), 795
Burger, Isn’t There a Better Way?, 68 A.B.A.J. 274 (1982), 1383

Burger, Remarks at the Midyear Meeting of the American Bar Association (Feb. 13–14, 1984), reprinted in, 52 U.S.L.W. 2471 (Feb. 28, 1984), 1383

Burger, Thinking the Unthinkable, 31 Loyola L.Rev. 205 (1985), 1051

Burns, The Death of the American Trial 85 (2011), 1047

Cabraser & Issacharoff, The Participatory Class Action, 92 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 846 (2017), 842, 866, 868

Calabresi, Federal and State Courts: Restoring a Workable Balance, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1293 (2003), 524

California Law Revision Commission, Recommendation and Study Relating to Taking Instructions into the Jury Room, pp. C-15–C-17 (1956), 1136

Cameron & Johnson, Death of a Salesman? Forum Shopping and Outcome Determination Under International Shoe, 28 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 769 (1995), 100

Cammatt, Deadbeats, Deadbrokes, and Prisoners, 18 Geo. J. on Poverty L. & Pol’y 127 (2011), 1204

Campbell & Poidevin, Complex Cases and Jury Trials: A Reply to Professor Arnold, 128 U.Pa.L.Rev. 965 (1980), 1065

Capper, The Need for Mareva Injunctions Reconsidered, 73 Fordham L.Rev. 2161 (2005), 1192

Carlisle, Getting a Full Bite of the Apple: When Should the Doctrine of Issue Preclusion Make an Administrative or Arbitral Determination Binding in a Court of Law?, 55 Fordham L.Rev. 63 (1986), 1382

Carpenter, Active Judging and Access to Justice, 93 Notre Dame L.Rev. 647 (2017), 1110

Carpenter, Family Farm Advocacy and Rebellious Lawyering, 24 Clinical L.Rev. 79 (2017), 899

Carrell & Bales, Considering Final Offer Arbitration to Resolve Public Sector Impasses in Times of Concession Bargaining, 28 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 1 (2013), 1390

Carrington, “Substance” and “Procedure” in the Rules Enabling Act, 1989 Duke L.J. 281, 460

Carrington, Asbestos Lessons: The Consequences of Asbestos Litigation, 26 Rev.Litig. 583 (2007), 865

Carrington, Making Rules to Dispose of Manifestly Unfounded Assertions: An Exorcism of the Bogy of Non-Trans-Substantive Rules of Civil Procedure, 137 U.Pa.L.Rev. 2067 (1989), 28

Carrington, Renovating Discovery, 49 Ala.L.Rev. 51 (1997), 904

Carrington, The Power of District Judges and the Responsibility of Courts of Appeals, 3 Ga.L.Rev. 507 (1969), 1250

Case Note, “Root, Root, Root for the Home Team”: Pete Rose, Nominal Parties and Diversity Jurisdiction, 66 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 148 (1991), 318

Cavanagh, Issue Preclusion in Complex Litigation, 29 Rev.Litig. 859 (2010), 796, 1293

Cavanagh, Making Sense of Twombly, 63 S.C.L.Rev. 97 (2011), 642

Cavanagh, Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: The Case Against Turning Back the Clock, 162 F.R.D. 383 (1995), 703

Chadbourn & Levin, Original Jurisdiction of Federal Questions, 90 U.Pa.L.Rev. 639 (1942), 331

Chafee, Interpleader in the United States Courts, 41 Yale L.J. 1134 (1932), 773

Chafee, Interstate Interpleader, 33 Yale L.J. 685 (1924), 773

Chafee, Modernizing Interpleader, 30 Yale L.J. 814 (1921), 771

Chafee, The Federal Interpleader Act of 1936, 45 Yale L.J. 963 (1936), 773

Chase, Hershkoff, Silberman, Sorabji, Stürner, Taniguchi & Varano, Civil Litigation in Comparative Context (Chase & Hershkoff, eds., 2d ed. 2017), 90, 266, 797, 895

Chasin, Modernizing Class Action Cy Pres Through Democratic Inputs: A Return to Cy Pres Comme Possible, 163 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1463 (2015), 849

Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction (7th ed. 2016), 316, 333

Cheng, When 10 Trials are Better than 1000: An Evidentiary Perspective on Trial Sampling, 160 U.Pa.L.Rev. 955 (2012), 850

Childress, Standards of Review Primer: Federal Civil Appeals, 293 F.R.D. 156 (2013), 1125

Choi & Thompson, Securities Litigation and Its Lawyers: Changes During the First Decade after the PSLRA, 106 Colum.L.Rev. 148 (2006), 658

Chud & Berman, Six-Member Juries: Does Size Really Matter?, 67 Tenn.L.Rev. 743 (2000), 1094

Clark & Landers, Sniadach, Fuentes and Beyond: The Creditor Meets the Constitution, 59 Va.L.Rev. 355 (1973), 282, 1186

Clark, Ascertaining the Laws of the Several States: Positivism and Judicial Federalism After Erie, 145 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1459 (1997), 452, 523

Clark, Code Pleading § 38 (2d ed. 1947), 608

Clark, Pleading Negligence, 32 Yale L.J. 483 (1923), 605

Clark, Pleading Under the Federal Rules, 12 Wyo.L.J. 177 (1958), 639

Clark, Simplified Pleading, 2 F.R.D. 456 (1941), 612

Clark, State Law in the Federal Courts: The Brooding Omnipresence of Erie v. Tompkins, 55 Yale L.J. 267 (1946), 452

Cleary, Res Judicata Reexamined, 57 Yale L.J. 339 (1948), 1272

Clermont & Eisenberg, Do Case Outcomes Really Reveal Anything About the Legal System? Win Rates and Removal Jurisdiction, 83 Cornell L.Rev. 581 (1998), 381

Clermont & Eisenberg, Exorcising the Evil of Forum-Shopping, 80 Cornell L. Rev. 1507 (1995), 416

Clermont & Eisenberg, Trial by Jury or Judge: Transcending Empiricism, 77 Cornell L.Rev. 1124 (1992), 1091

Clermont & Eisenberg, Xenophilia or Xenophobia in U.S. Courts? Before and After 9/11, 4 J. Empirical Legal Stud. 441 (2007), 306

Clermont & Palmer, Exorbitant Jurisdiction, 58 Me.L.Rev. 474 (2006), 143

Clermont & Yeazell, Inventing Tests, Destabilizing Systems, 95 Iowa L. Rev. 821 (2010), 642

Clermont, Common-Law Compulsory Counterclaim Rule: Creating Effective and Elegant Res Judicata, 79 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1745 (2004), 733, 1284

Clermont, Governing Law on Forum-Selection Agreements, 66 Hastings L.J. 643 (2015), 439

Clermont, Jurisdictional Fact, 91 Cornell L.Rev. 973 (2006), 1089

Clermont, Litigation Realities Redux, 84 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1919 (2009), 381, 416, 1092

Clermont, Res Judicata as Requisite for Justice, 68 Rutgers U.L. Rev. 1067 (2016), 1270

Clermont, Restating Territorial Jurisdiction and Venue for State and Federal Courts, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 411 (1981), 398

Clermont, Reverse-Erie, 82 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1 (2006), 544

Clermont, Surveying Work Product, 68 Cornell L.Rev. 755 (1983), 953

Clermont, Three Myths about Twombly-Iqbal, 45 Wake Forest L. Rev. 1337 (2010), 642

Clopton, Procedural Retrenchment and the States, 106 Calif.L.Rev. 411 (2018), 644

Coben & Thompson, Disputing Irony: A Systematic Look at Litigation About Mediation, 11 Harv.Negot.L.Rev. 43 (2006), 1395

Coffee, Jr., Class Action Accountability: Reconciling Exit, Voice, and Loyalty in Representative Litigation, 100 Colum.L.Rev. 370 (2000), 844

Cohen, Revisiting Against Settlement: Some Reflections on Dispute Resolution and Public Values, 78 Fordham L.Rev. 1143 (2009), 1410

Cohen, The Broken Compass, The Requirement that a Case Arise “Directly” Under Federal Law, 115 U.Pa.L.Rev. 890 (1967), 352

Coleman, One Percent Procedure, 91 Wash.L.Rev. 1005 (2016), 796

Collins, Jurisdictional Exceptionalism, 93 Va.L.Rev. 1829 (2007), 317

Collins, The Unhappy History of Federal Question Removal, 71 Iowa L.Rev. 717 (1986), 331, 381

Comment, Procedural History of the Agent Orange Product Liability Litigation, 52 Brooklyn L.Rev. 335 (1986), 538

Comment, The Litigant and the Absentee in Federal Multiparty Practice, 116 U.Pa.L.Rev. 531 (1968), 751

Comment, Verification of Complaint in Stockholders’ Derivative Suits under Rule 23(b), 114 U.Pa.L.Rev. 614 (1966), 703

Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, Arbitration Study: Report to Congress Pursuant to Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protections Act (March 2015), 1404, 1405

Cook, Statements of Fact in Pleading Under the Codes, 21 Colum.L.Rev. 416 (1921), 605

Cooper, Extraordinary Writ Practice in Criminal Cases: Analogies for the Military Courts, 98 F.R.D. 593 (1983), 1213

Cooper, Iqbal’s Retro Revolution, 46 Wake Forest L. Rev. 937 (2011), 713

Cooper, King Arthur Confronts Twiqy Pleading, 90 Or.L.Rev. 955 (2012), 643

Corn, Pendent Venue: A Doctrine in Search of a Theory, 68 U.Chi.L.Rev. 931 (2001), 409

Countryman, The Bill of Rights and the Bill Collector, 15 Ariz.L.Rev. 521 (1973), 1186

Cover, For James Wm. Moore: Some Reflections on a Reading of the Rules, 84 Yale L.J. 718 (1975), 28

Cox & Thomas, Does the Lead Plaintiff Matter? An Empirical Analysis of Lead Plaintiffs in Securities Class Actions, 106 Colum.L.Rev. 1587 (2006), 826

Crick, The Final Judgment as a Basis for Appeal, 41 Yale L.J. 539 (1932), 1218

Croley, Summary Jury Trials in Charleston County, South Carolina, 41 Loy.L.A.L.Rev. 1585 (2008), 1394

Crowne, The Alternative Dispute Resolution Act of 1998: Implementing a New Paradigm of Justice, 76 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1768 (2001), 1398

Currie, Civil Procedure: The Tempest Brews, 53 Calif.L.Rev. 25 (1965), 1330

Currie, Mutuality of Collateral Estoppel: Limits of the Bernhard Doctrine, 9 Stan.L.Rev. 281 (1957), 1259, 1330, 1340

Currie, The Federal Courts and the American Law Institute, Part II, 36 U.Chi.L.Rev. 268 (1969), 331

Currie, Thoughts on Directed Verdicts and Summary Judgments, 45 U.Chi.L.Rev. 72 (1977), 1017

Curry & Ward, Are Twombly & Iqbal Affecting Where Plaintiffs File? A Study Comparing Removal Rates by State, 45 Tex.Tech.L.Rev. 827 (2013), 644

Daiker, No J.D. Required: The Critical Role and Contributions of Non-Lawyer Mediators, 24 Rev. Litig. 499 (2005), 1388

Dalton, Domestic Violence, Domestic Torts and Divorce: Constraints and Possibilities, 31 New Engl.L.Rev. 319 (1997), 1272

Dana, Jr., Court-Connected Alternative Dispute Resolution in Maine, 57 Me.L.Rev. 349 (2005), 1398

Davis & Hershkoff, Contracting for Procedure, 53 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 507 (2011), 199, 1386

de Vries & Lowenfeld, Jurisdiction in Personal Actions—A Comparison of Civil Law Views, 44 Iowa L.Rev. 306 (1959), 90

Degnan & Barton, Vouching to Quality Warranty: Case Law and Commercial Code, 51 Calif.L.Rev. 471 (1963), 762

Degnan, Federalized Res Judicata, 85 Yale L.J. 741 (1976), 540

Degnan, Livingston v. Jefferson—A Freestanding Footnote, 75 Calif.L.Rev. 115 (1987), 408

Delgado, Dunn, Brown, Lee & Hubbert, Fairness and Formality: Minimizing the Risk of Prejudice in Alternative Dispute Resolution, 1985 Wis.L. Rev. 1359, 1402

Deubert, Cohen & Lynch, Protecting and Promoting the Health of NFL Players: Legal and Ethical Analysis and Recommendations, 7 Harv. J.Sports & Ent.L. 1 (2016), 869

Developments in the Law—Discovery, 74 Harv.L.Rev. 940 (1961), 904

Developments in the Law—Multiparty Litigation in the Federal Courts, 71 Harv.L.Rev. 877 (1958), 762, 783

Developments in the Law—Res Judicata, 65 Harv.L.Rev. 818 (1952), 1295

Developments in the Law—State-Court Jurisdiction, 73 Harv.L.Rev. 911 (1960), 236

Developments in the Law—Statutes of Limitations, 63 Harv.L.Rev. 1177 (1950), 270

Devine, Clayton, Dunford, Seying & Pryce, Jury Decision Making, 7 Psychol. Pub. Pol’y & L. 622 (2001), 1094

Diamond & Ryken, The Modern American Jury: A One Hundred Year Journey, 96 Judicature 315 (May–June 2013), 1136

Diamond, Revisiting the Unanimity Requirement: The Behavior of the Non-Unanimous Civil Jury, 100 Nw.U.L.Rev. 201 (2006), 1138

Diamond, Vidmar, Rose, Ellis & Murphy, Juror Discussions During Civil Trials: Studying an Arizona Innovation, 45 Ariz.L.Rev. 1 (2003), 1137

Diller & Morawetz, Intracircuit Nonacquiescence and the Breakdown of the Rule of Law: A Response to Estreicher and Revesz, 99 Yale L.J. 801 (1990), 1304

Dobbs, The Validation of Void Judgments: The Bootstrap Principle, Part I, 53 Va.L.Rev. 1003 (1967), 392

Dodge, Disaggregative Mechanisms: Mass Claims Resolution Without Class Actions, 63 Emory L.J. 1253 (2014), 796

Dodson & Klebba, Global Civil Procedure Trends in the Twenty-First Century, 34 B.C. Int’l & Comp.L.Rev. 1 (2011), 992

Dodson, A New Look: Dismissal Rates of Federal Civil Claims, 9 Judicature 127 (2012), 643

Dodson, Comparative Convergences in Pleading Standards, 158 U.Pa.L.Rev. 441 (2010), 643

Dodson, Federal Pleading and State Presuit Discovery, 14 Lewis & Clark L.Rev. 43 (2010), 903

Dodson, Hybridizing Jurisdiction, 99 Calif.L.Rev. 1439 (2011), 663

Dodson, In Search of Removal Jurisdiction, 102 Nw.U.L.Rev. 55 (2008), 385

Dodson, New Pleading, New Discovery, 109 Mich.L.Rev. 53 (2010), 628, 903

Doernberg, The Trojan Horse: How the Declaratory Judgment Act Created a Cause of Action and Expanded Federal Jurisdiction While the Supreme Court Wasn’t Looking, 36 UCLA L.Rev. 529 (1989), 335

Doernberg, There’s No Reason for It; It’s Just Our Policy: Why the Well-Pleaded Complaint Rule Sabotages the Purposes of Federal Question Jurisdiction, 38 Hastings L.J. 597 (1987), 334

Doernberg, What’s Wrong with this Picture?: Rule Interpleader, the Anti-Injunction Act, In Personam Jurisdiction, and M.C. Escher, 67 U.Colo.L.Rev. 551 (1996), 773

Dooley, National Juries for National Cases: Preserving Citizen Participation in Large-Scale Litigation, 83 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 411 (2008), 1097

Dorf, Dicta and Article III, 142 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1997 (1994), 1267

Dudley, Jr. & Rutherglen, Deforming the Federal Rules: An Essay on What’s Wrong with the Recent Erie Decisions, 92 Va.L.Rev. 707 (2006), 492

Dumas, Jury Trials: Lay Jurors, Pattern Jury Instructions, and Comprehension Issues, 67 Tenn.L.Rev. 701 (2000), 1129

Dunham, Southland Corp. v. Keating Revisited: Twenty-Five Years in Which Direction?, 4 Charleston L.Rev. 331 (2010), 1400

Dylan, Bob, Like A Rolling Stone, on Highway 61 Revisited (Columbia Records 1965), 720

Easterbrook, Discovery as Abuse, 69 B.U.L.Rev. 635 (1989), 620, 621

Easterbrook, Justice and Contract in Consent Judgments, 1987 U.Chi.Legal F. 19, 1315

Edelman, Nagareda & Silver, The Allocation Problem in Multiple-Claimant Representations, 14 Sup.Ct.Econ.Rev. 95 (2006), 848

Edwards, Alternative Dispute Resolution: Panacea or Anathema?, 99 Harv.L.Rev. 668 (1986), 1395

Eisenberg & Clermont, Plaintiphobia in the Supreme Court, 100 Cornell L.Rev. 193 (2014), 1035

Eisenberg & Miller, Attorney Fees in Class Action Settlements: An Empirical Study, 1 J. Empirical Legal Stud. 27 (2004), 852

Eisenberg & Miller, Incentive Awards to Class Action Plaintiffs: An Empirical Study, 53 UCLA L.Rev. 1303 (2006), 851

Eisenberg & Miller, The Flight from Arbitration: An Empirical Study of Ex Ante Arbitration Clauses in the Contracts of Publicly Held Companies, 56 DePaul L.Rev. 335 (2007), 1404

Eisenberg, Miller & Germano, Attorneys’ Fees in Class Actions: 2009–2013, 92 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 937 (2017), 852

Eisenberg, Miller & Sherwin, Arbitrator’s Summer Soldiers: An Empirical Study of Arbitration Clauses in Consumer and Nonconsumer Contracts, 41 U.Mich.J.L. Reform. 871 (2008), 1403

Eisenberg, Private Ordering Through Negotiation: Dispute-Settlement and Rulemaking, 89 Harv.L.Rev. 637 (1976), 1387

Ely, The Irrepressible Myth of Erie, 87 Harv.L.Rev. 693 (1974), 479

Engdahl, The Classic Rule of Faith and Credit, 118 Yale L.J. 1584 (2009), 1361

Engstrom & Gelbach, Legal Tech, Civil Procedure and the Future of Adversarialism, 169 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1001 (2021), 6

Engstrom, Nora Freeman, The Diminished Trial, 86 Fordham L.Rev. 2131 (2018), 1047

Engstrom, Nora Freeman, The Trouble with Time Limits, 106 Geo. L.J. 933 (2018), 1110

Entman, More Reasons for Abolishing Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 17(a): The Problem of the Proper Plaintiff and Insurance Subrogation, 68 N.C.L.Rev. 893 (1990), 719

Epstein, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly: How Motions To Dismiss Become (Disguised) Summary Judgments, 25 Wash.U.J.L. & Pol’y 61 (2007), 628

Erichson, Of Horror Stories and Happy Endings: The Rise and Fall of Preclusion-Based Compulsory Party Joinder Under the New Jersey Entire Controversy Doctrine, 9 Seton Hall Const. L.J. 757 (1999), 747

Erickson, Heightened Procedure, 102 Iowa L.Rev. 61 (2016), 918

Estreicher & Revesz, Nonacquiescence by Federal Administrative Agencies, 98 Yale L.J. 679 (1989), 1304

Fagan & Ash, New Policing, New Segregation: From Ferguson to New York, 10 Geo.L.J. Online 33 (2017), 1196

Fairman, An Invitation to the Rulemakers—Strike Rule 9(b), 38 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 281, (2004), 653

Fairman, Heightened Pleading, 81 Texas L. Rev. 551 (2002), 652

Fallon, Grabill & Wynne, Bellwether Trials in Multidistrict Litigation, 82 Tul.L.Rev. 2323 (2008), 850

Feeherry & Zuckerman, Note—Procedural Due Process—The Prior Hearing Rule and the Demise of Ex Parte Remedies, 53 B.U.L.Rev. 41 (1973), 1186

Fellows & Hardock, Federal Court Special Masters: A Vital Resource in the Era of Complex Litigation, 31 Wm. Mitchell L.Rev. 1269 (2005), 1006

Fifoot, History and Sources of the Common Law—Tort and Contract (1949), 551, 565, 571, 579

Final Report of the Seventh Circuit’s American Jury Project 15 (Sept. 2008), 1134

First Report of the Commissioners on Practice and Pleadings (New York) 73 (1848), 590

Fisher & Ury, Getting to Yes: Negotiating Agreement Without Giving In 73 (1981), 1387

Fisher, Going for the Blue Ribbon: The Legality of Expert Juries in Patent Litigation, 2 Colum. Sci. & Tech.L.Rev. 1 (2001), 1066, 1096

Fiss, Against Settlement, 93 Yale L.J. 1073 (1984), 1410

Fiss, The Political Theory of the Class Action, 53 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 21 (1996), 809

Fitzpatrick, Do Class Action Lawyers Make Too Little?, 158 U.Pa.L.Rev. 2043 (2010), 853

Flango, Litigant Choice Between State and Federal Courts, 46 S.C.L.Rev. 961 (1995), 307

Fletcher, “Common Nucleus of Operative Fact” and Defensive Set-Off: Beyond the Gibbs Test, 74 Ind.L.J. 171 (1998), 364

Fletcher, The Comparative Rights of Indispensable Sovereigns, 40 Gonz.L.Rev. 1 (2005), 786

Floreay, Making Sovereigns Indispensable: Pimentel and the Evolution of Rule 19, 58 UCLA L. Rev. 667 (2011), 786

Folk & Moyer, Sequestration in Delaware: A Constitutional Analysis, 73 Colum.L.Rev. 749 (1973), 217

Ford, Imprisonment for Debt, 25 Mich.L.Rev. 24 (1926), 1208

Foremaster, The Movant’s Burden in a Motion for Summary Judgment, 1987 Utah L.Rev. 731, 1026

Foschio, A History of the Development of the Office of United States Commissioner and Magistrate Judge System, 1999 Fed.Cts.L.Rev. 4 (1999), 1002

Frank, Courts on Trial 141 (1950), 1139

Frank, The Jury Wants to Take the Podium—But Even with the Authority to Do So, Can It? An Interdisciplinary Examination of Jurors’ Questioning of Witnesses at Trial, 38 Am.J.Trial Advoc. 1 (2014), 1111

Frankfurter, Distribution of Judicial Power Between United States and State Courts, 13 Cornell L.Q. 499 (1928), 308

Freedman, Imprisonment for Debt, 2 Temple L.Q. 330 (1928), 1195

Freer, Exodus from and Transformation of American Civil Litigation, 65 Emory L.J. 1491 (2016), 1399

Freyer, Harmony & Dissonance: The Swift & Erie Cases in American Federalism (1981), 444

Friedenthal & Gardner, Judicial Discretion to Deny Summary Judgment in the Era of Managerial Judging, 31 Hofstra L.Rev. 91 (2002), 1009, 1026

Friedenthal, Cases on Summary Judgment: Has There Been a Material Change in Standards?, 63 Notre Dame L.Rev. 770 (1988), 1016, 1031

Friedenthal, Joinder of Claims, Counterclaims and Cross-Complaints: Suggested Revision of the California Provisions, 23 Stan.L.Rev. 1 (1970), 723

Friedenthal, Miller & Kane, Civil Procedure § 2.16 (5th ed.), 404

Friedenthal, Secrecy in Civil Litigation: Discovery and Party Agreements, 9 J.L. & Pol’y 61 (2000), 965

Friedenthal, The Crack in the Steel Case, 68 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 258 (2000), 388

Friedenthal, Whom to Sue—Multiple Defendants, 5 Am. Jur. Trials 1 (1966), 747

Friendly, “Some Kind of Hearing,” 123 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1267 (1975), 284

Friendly, The Historic Basis of the Diversity Jurisdiction, 41 Harv.L.Rev. 483 (1928), 305

Fullerton, Exploring the Far Reaches of Mandamus, 49 Brooklyn L.Rev. 1131 (1983), 1236

Galanter, Worlds of Deals: Using Negotiation to Teach about Legal Process, 34 J. Legal Educ. 268 (1984), 1384

Gallagher, Vetoing Class Actions, 24 Rev. Litig. 527 (2005), 828

Gallanter, The Vanishing Trial: An Examination of Trials and Related Matters in Federal and State Courts, 1 J. Empirical Legal Stud. 459 (2004), 1047

Gardner, Retiring Forum Non Conveniens, 92 N.Y.U. L.Rev. 390 (2017), 432

Garrett, The Public Interest in Corporate Settlements, 58 B.C.L.Rev. 1483 (2017), 899

Garth, Conflict and Dissent in Class Actions: A Suggested Perspective, 77 Nw.U.L.Rev. 492 (1982), 848

Gavil, Civil Rights and Civil Procedure: The Legacy of Conley v. Gibson, 52 How.L.J. 1 (2008), 614

Gelbach & Kobayashi, The Law and Economics of Proportionality in Discovery, 50 Ga.L.Rev. 1093 (2016), 900

Gelbach, Can the Dark Arts of the Dismal Science Shed Light on the Empirical Reality of Civil Procedure?, 2 Stan. J. Complex Litig. 223 (2014), 643

Gelbach, Material Facts in the Debate Over Twombly and Iqbal, 68 Stan.L.Rev. 39 (2016), 643

Gendleman, The Equal Protection Clause, the Free Exercise Clause and Religion-Based Peremptory Challenges, 63 U.Chi.L.Rev. 1639 (1996), 1105

Gensler & Rosenthal, Managing Summary Judgment, 43 Loy.Chi.L.J. 517 (2012), 1036

Gensler, Diversity Class Actions, Common Relief, and the Rule of Individual Valuation, 82 Or.L.Rev. 295 (2003), 323

Gensler, Judicial Case Management: Caught in the Crossfire, 60 Duke L.J. 669 (2010), 991

Gergen, The Jury’s Role in Deciding Normative Issues in the American Common Law, 68 Fordham L.Rev. 407 (1999), 1088

Gertner, Losers’ Rules, 122 Yale L.J.Online 109 (2012), 1036

Gifford & Jones, Keeping Cases from Black Juries: An Empirical Analysis of How Race, Income In-equality, and Regional History Affect Tort Law, 73 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 557 (2016), 1105

Gilles & Friedman, After Class: Aggregate Litigation in the Wake of AT&T Mobility v. Concepcion, 79 U.Chi.L.Rev. 623 (2012), 893, 1401

Gilles & Friedman, Exploding the Class Action Agency Costs Myth: The Social Utility of Entrepreneurial Lawyers, 155 U.Pa.L.Rev. 103 (2006), 844

Gilles & Friedman, The Radical Majoritarianism of Rule 23(b)(2), 65 U. Kan.L.Rev. 989 (2017), 828

Ginsburg, Special Findings and Jury Unanimity in the Federal Courts, 65 Colum.L.Rev. 256 (1965), 1140

Glover, Mass Litigation Governance in the Post-Class Action Era: The Problems and Promise of Non-Removable State Actions in Multi-District Litigation, 6 J. Tort L. 3 (2014), 797

Glover, The Federal Rules of Civil Settlement, 87 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1713 (2012), 995

Gluck & Burch, MDL Revolution, 96 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1 (2021), 418, 796

Gluck, Intersystemic Statutory Interpretation: Methodology as “Law” and the Erie Doctrine, 120 Yale L.J. 1898 (2011), 522

Gluck, Unorthodox Civil Procedure: Modern Multidistrict Litigation’s Place in the Textbook Understandings of Procedure, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1669 (2017), 796

Glynn, Discontent and Indiscretion: Discretionary Review of Interlocutory Orders, 77 Notre Dame L.Rev. 175 (2001), 1239

Graves, Marshall v. Marshall: The Past, Present, and Future of the Probate Exception to Federal Jurisdiction, 59 Ala.L.Rev. 1643 (2008), 325

Green & Matasar, The Supreme Court and the Products Liability Crisis: Lessons from Boyle’s Government Contractor Defense, 63 S. Calif.L.Rev. 637 (1989–1990), 537

Green, Repressing Erie’s Myth, 96 Calif.L.Rev. 595 (2008), 452

Greenbaum, Jacks or Better to Open: Procedural Limitations on Co-Party and Third-Party Claims, 74 Minn.L.Rev. 507 (1990), 723

Grillo, The Mediation Alternative: Process Dangers for Women, 100 Yale L.J. 1545 (1991), 1388

Gross, Settling for a Judge: A Comment on Clermont & Eisenberg, 77 Cornell L.Rev. 1178 (1992), 1091

Gross, When Perception Changes Reality: An Empirical Study of Investors’ Views of the Fairness of Securities Arbitration, 2008 J.Disp. Resol. 349, 1402

Hadfield, Framing the Choice Between Cash and the Courthouse: Experiences with the 9/11 Victim Compensation Fund, 42 Law & Soc’y Rev. 645 (2008), 1397

Hague, Fraud on the Court and Abusive Discovery, 16 Nev.L.J. 707 (2016), 1183

Haiber, Removing the Bias Against Removal, 53 Cath. U.L.Rev. 609 (2004), 381

Hamabe, Functions of Rule 12(b)(6) in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: A Categorization Approach, 15 Campbell L.Rev. 119 (1993), 612

Hannaforad-Agor, Judicial Nullification? Judicial Compliance and Non-Compliance with Jury Improvement Efforts, 28 N. Ill. U.L. Rev. 407 (2008), 1136

Hans & Albertson, Empirical Research and Civil Jury Reform, 78 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1497 (2003), 1092

Hans, Empowering the Active Jury: A Genuine Tort Reform, 13 Roger Williams U.L.Rev. 39 (2008), 1136

Hans, Hannaforad & Munsterman, The Arizona Jury Reform Permitting Civil Jury Trial Discussions: The Views of Trial Participants, Judges, and Jurors, 32 U.Mich.J.L.F. 349 (1999), 1137

Hans, Judges, Juries, and Scientific Evidence, 16 J.L. & Pol’y 19 (2007), 1066

Harel & Stein, Auctioning for Loyalty: Selection and Monitoring of Class Counsel, 22 Yale L. & Pol’y Rev. 69 (2004), 845
Harper, Mediator as Peacemaker: The Case for Activist Transformative-Narrative Mediation, 2006 J.Disp. Resol. 595, 1396
Harrington, The Law-Finding Function of the American Jury, 1999 Wis.L.Rev. 377, 1084
Hart, And the Chill Goes On—Federal Civil Rights Plaintiffs Beware: Rule 11 vis-à-vis 28 U.S.C. § 1927 and the Court’s Inherent Power, 37 Loy.L.A.L.Rev. 645 (2004), 714
Hartnett, Taming Twombly, Even After Iqbal, 158 U.Pa.L.Rev. 473 (2010), 713
Hasday, Federalism and the Family Reconstructed, 45 UCLA L.Rev. 1297 (1998), 325
Hay, Transient Jurisdiction, Especially Over International Defendants: Critical Comments on Burnham v. Superior Court of California, 1990 U.Ill.L.Rev. 593, 231
Hayes, Crogate’s Case: A Dialogue in Ye Shades on Special Pleading, in 9 Holdsworth, A History of English Law 417 (2d ed. 1938), 559
Hazard & Moskovitz, An Historical and Critical Analysis of Interpleader, 52 Calif.L.Rev. 706 (1964), 771
Hazard, Indispensable Party: The Historical Origin of a Procedural Phantom, 61 Colum.L.Rev. 1254 (1961), 752
Hazard, Preclusion as to Issues of Law: The Legal System’s Interest, 70 Iowa L.Rev. 81 (1984), 1304
Hazard, Revisiting the Second Restatement of Judgments: Issue Preclusion and Related Problems, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 564 (1981), 1292
Hazard, Taruffo, Sturmer & Gidi, Introduction to the Principles and Rules of Transnational Civil Procedure, 33 N.Y.U. J. Int’l L. & Pol. 769 (2001), 643
Heckman, Collateral Estoppel as the Answer to Multiple Litigation Problems in Federal Tax Law: Another View of Sunnen and The Evergreens, 19 Case W.Res.L.Rev. 230 (1967), 1308
Heiser, Due Process Limitations on Pre-answer Security Requirements for Nonresident Unlicensed Insurers, 88 Neb.L.Rev. 494 (2010), 1188
Helm, Hans & Reyna, Trial by Numbers, 27 Cornell J.L. & Pub. Pol’y 107 (2017), 1066
Hensler, From Sea to Shining Sea: How and Why Class Actions Are Spreading Globally, 65 U.Kan.L.Rev. 965 (2017), 895
Hensler, Happy 50th Anniversary, Rule 23! Shouldn’t We Know You Better After All This Time?, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1599 (2017), 804
Hensler, Our Courts, Ourselves: How the Alternative Dispute Resolution Movement Is Re-Shaping Our Legal System, 108 Penn St.L.Rev. 165 (2003), 1388, 1412
Hersch & Viscusi, Punitive Damages: How Judges and Juries Perform, 33 J.Legal Stud. 1 (2004), 1092
Hershkoff & Kahan, Forum-Selection Provisions in Corporate “Contracts,” 93 Wash.L.Rev. 101 (2018), 222
Hershkoff & Miller, Courts and Civil Justice in the Time of COVID: Emerging Trends and Questions to Ask, 23 N.Y.U.J.Legis. & Pub.Pol’y 321 (2021), 6
Hershkoff, Shady Grove: Duck-Rabbits, Clear Statements, and Federalism, 74 Alb.L.Rev. 1703 (2011), 515
Hershkoff, State Courts and the “Passive Virtues”: Rethinking the Judicial Function, 114 Harv.L.Rev. 1833 (2001), 719
Heuer & Penrod, Instructing Jurors: A Field Experiment with Written and Preliminary Instructions, 13 Law & Hum. Behav. 409 (1989), 1136
Hines, Codifying the Issue of Class Action, 16 Nev.L.J. 625 (2016), 848
Hoffman, How Many Plaintiffs Are Enough? Venue in Title VII Class Actions, 42 U.Mich.J.L. Reform 843 (2009), 886
Hoffman, Using Presuit Discovery to Overcome Barriers to the Courthouse, 34 Litigation 31 (2008), 903
Hollander-Blumoff & Tyler, Procedural Justice in Negotiation: Procedural Fairness, Outcome Acceptance, and Integrative Potential, 33 L. & Soc. Inq’y 473 (2008), 1387
Holley, Narrative Highground: The Failure of Intervention as a Procedural Device in Affirmative Action Litigation, 54 Case W.Res.L.Rev. 103 (2003), 793
Horton, Arbitration as Delegation, 86 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 437 (2011), 1412
Huang, Mandatory Disclosure: A Controversial Device with No Effects, 21 Pace L.Rev. 203 (2000), 918
Hubbard, Testing for Change in Procedural Standards with Application to Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, 42 J. Legal Stud. 35 (2013), 645
Hutchinson, Class Actions: Joinder or Representational Device?, 1983 Sup. Ct. Rev. 459, 799
Hynes, Credit Markets, Exemptions, and Households with Nothing to Exempt, 7 Theoretical Inquiries L. 493 (2006), 1203
Ides, Foreword: A Critical Appraisal of the Supreme Court’s Decision in J. McIntyre Machinery, Ltd. v. Nicaastro, 45 Loy.L.A.L.Rev. 341 (2012), 786
Ides, The Supreme Court and the Law To Be Applied in Diversity Cases: A Critical Guide to the Development and Application of the Erie Doctrine and Related Problems, 163 F.R.D. 19 (1995), 453
Idleman, The Emergence of Jurisdictional Resequencing in the Federal Courts, 87 Cornell L.Rev. 1 (2001), 388
Ingham, Employment Arbitration: The Repeat Player Effect, 1 Emp. Rts. & Emp. Pol’y J. 189 (1997), 1403
Issacharoff & Loewenstein, Unintended Consequences of Mandatory Disclosure, 73 Tex.L.Rev. 753 (1995), 918
Issacharoff & Nagareda, Class Settlements Under Attack, 156 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1649 (2008), 851
Issacharoff, Private Claims, Aggregate Rights, 2008 Sup.Ct.Rev. 183, 786
Jackson, Full Faith and Credit—The Lawyer’s Clause of the Constitution, 45 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1945), 190
Jackson, What Price “Due Process,” 5 N. Y. L. Rev. 435 (1927), 191
James, Consent Judgments as Collateral Estoppel, 108 U.Pa.L.Rev. 173 (1959), 1313
Jarvey, Boilerplate Discovery Objections: How They Are Used, Why They Are Wrong, and What We Can Do About Them, 61 Duke L.Rev. 913 (2013), 929
Jefferson, Brennan Lecture—Liberty and Justice for Some: How the Legal System Falls Short in Protecting Basic Rights, 88 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1953 (2013), 646
Johnson, Why Alienage Jurisdiction? Historical Foundations and Modern Justifications for Federal Jurisdiction Over Disputes Involving Noncitizens, 21 Yale J. Int’l L. 1 (1996), 306
Jokela & Herr, Special Masters in State Court Complex Litigation: An Available and Underused Case Management Tool, 31 Wm. Mitchell L.Rev. 1299 (2005), 991
Jones, Finishing a Friendly Argument: The Jury and the Historical Origins of Diversity Jurisdiction, 82 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 997 (2007), 305
Judicial Conference Committee of the United States, Summary Report of the Judicial Conference Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure 30 (2005), 912
Judicial Conference of the United States, Civil Litigation Management Manual 69 (2d ed. 2010), 1393
Judicial Improvements and Access to Justice Act, Pub. L. No. 100–702, 102 Stat. 4642 (1988), 315
Juenger, Judicial Jurisdiction in the United States and in the European Communities: A Comparison, 82 Mich.L.Rev. 1195 (1984), 90
Julian, Charles E. Clark and Simple Pleading: Against a “Formalism of Generality,” 104 Nw.U.L.Rev. 1179 (2010), 604
Jung, Note—Textron: The False Choice Between Financial Transparency and Litigant Confidentiality, 7 N.Y.U.J.L. & Bus. 393 (2010), 955
Kahan & Silberman, Matsushita and Beyond: The Role of State Courts in Class Actions Involving Exclusive Federal Claims, 1996 Sup.Ct.Rev. 219, 882, 1372
Kahan, Hoffman & Braman, Whose Eyes Are You Going To Believe? Scott v. Harris and the Perils of Cognitive Illiberalism, 122 Harv.L.Rev. 837 (2009), 1034
Kalven & Rosenfield, The Contemporary Function of a Class Suit, 8 U.Chi.L.Rev. 684 (1941), 801
Kamp, The History Behind Hansberry v. Lee, 20 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 481 (1987), 808
Kane, Civil Jury Trial: The Case for Reasoned Iconoclasm, 28 Hastings L.J. 1 (1976), 1065
Kane, Of Carrots and Sticks: Evaluating the Role of the Class Action Lawyer, 66 TexasL.Rev. 385 (1987), 845
Kane, Original Sin and the Transaction in Federal Civil Procedure, 76 Texas L. Rev. 1723 (1998), 731
Kapeliuk, The Repeat Appointment Factor: Exploring Decision Patterns of Elite Investment Arbitrators, 96 Cornell L.Rev. 47 (2010), 1403
Kaplan, Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1961–1963 (II), 77 Harv.L.Rev. 801 (1964), 765
Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (I), 81 Harv.L.Rev. 356 (1967), 761
Kaufman, Masters in the Federal Courts: Rule 53, 58 Colum.L.Rev. 452 (1958), 1006
Kaye & Weissman, Interactive Judicial Federalism: Certified Questions in New York, 69 Fordham L.Rev. 373 (2000), 521
Keefe & Roscia, Immunity and Sentimentality, 47 Cornell L.Q. 471 (1947), 276
Kelleher, The December 1993 Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure—A Critical Analysis, 12 Touro L. Rev. 7 (1995), 990
Kelso, A Report on the California Appellate System, 45 Hastings L.J. 433 (1994), 1218
Kennedy, Federal Rule 17(a): Will the Real Party in Interest Please Stand?, 51 Minn.L.Rev. 675 (1967), 719
Kepper, Contractual Waiver of Seventh Amendment Rights: Using the Public Rights Doctrine to Justify a Higher Standard of Waiver for Jury Waiver Clauses than for Arbitration Clauses, 91 Iowa L.Rev. 1345 (2006), 1093
Kim, Arbitrating Statutory Rights in the Union Setting: Breaking the Collective Interest Problem Without Damaging Labor Relations, 65 U.Chi.L. Rev. 225 (1998), 1382

Kiralfy, The Action on the Case 3 (1951), 565
Klonoff & Herman, The Class Action Fairness Act: An Ill-Conceived Approach to Class Settlements, 80 Tul.L.Rev. 1695 (2006), 852
Klonoff, Class Actions for Monetary Relief Under Rule 23(b)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(B): Does Due Process Require Notice and Opt-out Rights?, 82 Geo. Wash.L.Rev. 798 (2014), 840
Klonoff, Class Actions Part II: A Respite from the Decline, 92 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 971 (2017), 803
Klonoff, Making Class Actions Work: The Untapped Potential of the Internet, 69 U.Pitt. L.Rev. 727 (2008), 841
Koeltl, Progress in the Spirit of Rule 1, 60 Duke L.J. 537 (2010), 601
Koh, The “Gants Principles” for Online Dispute Resolution: Realizing the Chief Justice’s Vision for Courts in the Cloud, 62 B.C.L.Rev. 2768 (2021), 6
Korn, Civil Jurisdiction of the New York Court of Appeals and Appellate Divisions, 16 Buffalo L.Rev. 307 (1967), 1218
Kotler, Reappraising the Jury’s Role as Finder of Fact, 20 Ga.L.Rev. 123 (1985), 1139
Kovach, Privatization of Dispute Resolution: In the Spirit of Pound, But Mission Incomplete: Lessons Learned and a Possible Blueprint for the Future, 48 S.Tex.L.Rev. 1003 (2007), 1395
Kramer, Choice of Law in Complex Litigation, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 547 (1996), 882
Kramer, Consent Decrees and the Rights of Third Parties, 87 Mich.L.Rev. 321 (1988), 1349
Kramer, The Lawmaking Power of the Federal Courts, 12 Pace L.Rev. 263 (1992), 478
Kritzer, Marshall & Zemans, Rule 11: Moving Beyond the Cosmic Anecdote, 75 Judicature 269 (1992), 704
Krock, In the Nation: A Momentous Decision of the Supreme Court, N.Y. Times, May 3, 1938, at 22, 453
Kruse, Learning from Practice: What ADR Needs from a Theory of Justice, 5 Nev.L.J. 389 (2004–2005), 1395
Kurland, The Supreme Court, the Due Process Clause and the In Personam Jurisdiction of State Courts—From Pennoyer to Denckla: A Review, 25 U. Chi.L.Rev. 569 (1958), 94
LaCroix, Federalists, Federalism, and Federal Jurisdiction, 30 L. & Hist.Rev. 205 (2012), 326
Lahav, Bellwether Trials, 76 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 576 (2008), 1344
Lahav, The Case for “Trial by Formula”, 90 Tex.L.Rev. 571 (2012), 1006
Lambros, The Summary Jury Trial and Other Alternative Methods of Dispute Resolution, 1394
Lande, Getting the Faith: Why Business Lawyers and Executives Believe in Mediation, 5 Harv. Negot.L.Rev. 137 (2000), 1389
Landsman, ADR and the Cost of Compulsion, 57 Stan.L.Rev. 1593 (2005), 1404, 1412
Landsman, Nothing for Something? Denying Legal Assistance to Those Compelled to Participate in ADR Proceedings, 37 Fordham Urb.L.J. 273 (2010), 1399
Langbein, The Disappearance of Civil Trial in the United States, 122 Yale L.J. 522 (2012), 1009, 1048, 1049
Langbein, The German Advantage in Civil Procedure, 82 U.Chi.L.Rev. 823 (1985), 991
Langton & Cohen, Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Dep’t of Justice, Civil Bench and Jury Trials in State Courts, 2005, at 9 & tbl.10 (2008), 1047
Larsen, Specificity and Juror Agreement in Civil Cases, 69 U.Chi.L.Rev. 379 (2002), 1140
Laughlin, Learning from the Past? Or Destined to Repeat Past Mistakes?: Lessons from the English Legal System and Its Impact on How We View the Role of Judges and Juries Today, 14 Widener L.Rev. 357 (2009), 1110
Lea, Superstition and Force 252 (3d ed. 1878), 550
Lee, Pleading and Proof: The Economics of Legal Burdens, 1997 B.Y.U.L.Rev. 1, 612
Legislation: Recent Trends in Joinder of Parties, Causes, and Counterclaims, 37 Colum.L.Rev. 462 (1937), 740
Lemos, Aggregate Litigation Goes Public: Representative Suits by State Attorneys General, 126 Harv.L.Rev. 486 (2012), 830
Lerner, The Transformation of the American Civil Trial: The Silent Judge, 42 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 195 (2000), 1132
Leslie, The Need to Study Coupon Settlements in Class Action Litigation, 18 Geo.J. Legal Ethics 1395 (2005), 852
Leslie, The Significance of Silence: Collective Action Problems and Class Action Settlements, 59 Fla.L.Rev. 71 (2007), 851
Leubsdorf, Unmasking Mullane: Due Process, Common Trust Funds, and the Class Action Wars, 66 Hastings L.J. 1693 (2015), 809
Leval, Judging Under the Constitution: Dicta About Dicta, 81 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1249 (2006), 1268
Levin, Equitable Clean-up and the Jury: A Suggested Orientation, 100 U.Pa.L.Rev. 320 (1951), 1054
Levmore & Fagan, Semi-Confidential Settlements in Civil, Criminal, and Sexual Assault Cases, 103 Cornell L.Rev. 311 (2018), 965, 1410
Levy, Lis Pendens and Procedural Due Process: A Closer Look After Connecticut v. Doeher, 51 Md.L.Rev. 1054 (1992), 294
Lipsky, How Corporate America Uses Conflict Management: The Evidence from a New Survey of the Fortune 1000, 30 Alternatives to High Cost Litig. 139 (2012), 1389
Long & Johnson, People v. Property: Race Restrictive Covenants in Housing (1947), 808
Louis, Federal Summary Judgment Doctrine: A Critical Analysis, 83 Yale L.J. 745 (1974), 1016
Lowenfeld, In Search of the Intangible: A Comment on Shaffer v. Heitner, 53 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 102 (1978), 209
Lucas, The Direct and Collateral Estoppel Effects of Alternative Holdings, 50 U.Chi.L.Rev. 701 (1983), 1295
Lund, Federally Chartered Corporations and Federal Jurisdiction, 36 Fla.St.U.L.Rev. 317 (2009), 313
MacKenzie III & Bromberg, Jr., Jury Misconduct: What Happens Behind Closed Doors, 62 Ala.L.Rev. 623 (2011), 1162
Macclin, Promoting Settlement, Foregoing the Facts, 14 N.Y.U. Rev.L. & Soc. Change 579 (1986), 1410
Mai & Rafael, The High Price of Using Justice Fines and Fees to Fund Government in New York (Vera Institute of Justice 2020), 1196
Main, Procedural Constants: How Delay Aversion Shapes Reform, 15 Nev.L.J. 1597 (2015), 991
Main, Reconsidering Procedural Conformity Statutes, 35 W.St.U.L.Rev. 75 (2007), 28
Maine, Early Law and Custom 389 (1886), 604
Maitland, Equity, Also the Forms of Action at Common Law (1909), 550, 561, 579
Malveaux, Class Actions at the Crossroads: An Answer to Wal-Mart v. Dukes, 5 Harv.L. & Pol’y Rev. 375 (2011), 833
Malveaux, Front Loading and Heavy Lifting: How Pre-Dismissal Discovery Can Address the Detrimental Effect of Iqbal on Civil Rights Cases, 14 Lewis & Clark L.Rev. 65 (2010), 917
Manesh, The New Class Action Rule: Procedural Reforms in an Ethical Vacuum, 18 Geo.J.Legal Ethics 923 (2005), 845
Manual for Complex Litigation § 20.131 (4th ed. 2004), 795
Marcus & Senger, ADR and the Federal Government: Not Such Strange Bedfellows After All, 66 Mo.L.Rev. 709 (2001), 1398
Marcus, Conflict Among Circuits and Transfers Within the Federal Judicial System, 93 Yale L.J. 677 (1984), 416
Marcus, Cure-All For an Era of Dispersed Litigation? Toward a Maximalist Use of the Multidistrict Litigation Panel’s Transfer Power, 82 Tul.L.Rev. 2245 (2008), 418
Marcus, Flawed But Noble: Desegregation Litigation and Its Implications for the Modern Class Action, 6 Fla.L.Rev. 657 (2011), 829
Marcus, The Past, Present, and Future of Trans-Substantivity in Federal Civil Procedure, 59 De Paul L.Rev. 371 (2010), 601
Marcus, The Puzzling Persistence of Pleading Practice, 76 Tex.L.Rev. 1749 (1998), 617
Marcus, The Short Life and Long Afterlife of the Mass Tort Class Action, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 156 (2017), 866
Marder, Bringing Jury Instructions into the Twenty-First Century, 81 Notre Dame L.Rev. 449 (2006), 1129, 1136
Marple, Removal to Federal Court Based on Misjoinder of Parties, 41 Tex. Tech L.Rev. 551 (2009), 385
Marrow, Determining If Mandatory Arbitration Is “Fair”: Asymmetrically Held Information and the Role of Mandatory Arbitration in Modulating Uninsurable Contract Risks, 54 N.Y.L.Sch.L.Rev. 187 (2010), 1403
Mastro, Preventing the “Google Mistrial”: The Challenge Posed by Jurors Who Use the Internet and Social Media, 37 No. 2 Litigation 23 (2011), 1137
Matasar, Rediscovering “One Constitutional Case”: Procedural Rules and the Rejection of the Gibbs Test for Supplemental Jurisdiction, 71 Calif.L.Rev. 1399 (1983), 364
Maxeiner, Cost and Fee Allocation in Civil Procedure, 58 Am.J.Comp.L. 195 (2010), 7
McCann, Tips for Authenticating Social Media Evidence, 100 Ill.B.J. 482 (2012), 943
McCaskill, The Modern Philosophy of Pleading: A Dialogue Outside the Shades, 38 A.B.A. J. 123 (1952), 612

McCoid, Procedural Reform and the Right to Jury Trial, 116 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1 (1967), 1061, 1080

McDonald, Alternative Pleading: I, 48 Mich.L.Rev. 311 (1950), 646

McFarland, Dictum Run Wild: How Long-Arm Statutes Extended to the Limits of Due Process, 84 B.U.L.Rev. 491 (2004), 107

McGovern, Resolving Mature Mass Tort Litigation, 69 B.U.L.Rev. 659 (1989), 830

McKelway, Profiles—Place and Leave With, New Yorker, August 24, 1935, 253

McKenzie, Toward a Bankruptcy Model for Nonclass Aggregate Litigation, 87 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 960 (2012), 865

McKinley, Top State Judge Tightens Rules on Debt Collection, N.Y. Times, May 1, 2014, 1046

McRobbie, Move Over Work Product—It’s Time for Some Real Discovery: A Call for a Cost-Allocating Amendment to Rule, 26(b)(3), 54 Emory L.J. 1407 (2005), 953

Meltzer, State Court Forfeitures of Federal Rights, 99 Harv.L.Rev. 1128 (1986), 525

Menkel-Meadow, Pursuing Settlement in an Adversary Culture: A Tale of Innovation Co-opted or “The Law of ADR,” 19 Fla.St.U.L.Rev. 1 (1990), 1398

Menkel-Meadow, The Lawyer as Problem Solver and Third-Party Neutral: Creativity and Non-Partisanship in Lawyering, 72 Temple L.Rev. 785 (1999), 1396

Metzler, Jr., A Lively Debate: The Eighth Circuit and the Forum Defendant Rule, 36 Wm. Mitchell L.Rev. 1638 (2010), 384

Michael, The Basic Rules of Pleading, 5 Record of N.Y.C.B.A. 175 (1950), 1120

Michelman, The Supreme Court and Litigation Access Fees: The Right to Protect One’s Rights—Part I, 1973 Duke L.J. 1153, 4

Millar, Civil Procedure of the Trial Court in Historical Perspective 481 (1952), 1185

Millar, Counterclaim Against Counterclaim, 48 Nw.U.L.Rev. 671 (1954), 734

Millar, Notabilia of American Civil Procedure 1887–1937, 50 Harv.L.Rev. 1017 (1937), 766

Millar, The Joinder of Actions in Continental Civil Procedure, 28 Ill.L.Rev. 26, 177 (1933), 740

Miller & Crump, Jurisdiction and Choice of Law in Multistate Class Actions After Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 96 Yale L.J. 1 (1986), 882

Miller & Kazmar, Psychology Research and Public Opinion Do Not Support Proposed Changes to the Jury System, 30 Hamline L.Rev. 285 (2007), 1094

Miller, A Modest Proposal for Securities Pleading After Tellabs, 7 L. & Contemp. Probs. 93 (2012), 657

Miller, An Economic Analysis of Rule 68, 15 J.Legal Stud. 93 (1986), 1409

Miller, Are the Federal Courthouse Doors Closing? What’s Happened to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure?, 43 Tex.Tech.L.Rev. 587 (2011), 715, 897, 899

Miller, Artful Pleading: A Doctrine in Search of Definition, 76 Tex.L.Rev. 1781 (1998), 335, 384, 1274

Miller, Confidentiality, Protective Orders, and Public Access to the Courts, 105 Harv.L.Rev. 427 (1991), 965

Miller, From Conley to Twombly to Iqbal: A Double Play on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 60 Duke L.J. 1 (2010), 680, 683, 1036, 1405

Miller, Of Frankenstein Monsters and Shining Knights: Myth, Reality, and the “Class Action Problem,” 92 Harv.L.Rev. 664 (1979), 802

Miller, Pleading After Tellabs, 2009 Wis.L.Rev. 507 (2009), 657

Miller, Simplified Pleading, Meaningful Days in Court, and Trials on the Merits: Reflections on the Deformation of Federal Procedure, 88 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 286 (2013), 603, 641, 894, 1384

Miller, The Adversary System: Dinosaur or Phoenix, 69 Minn.L.Rev. 1 (1984), 990

Miller, The August 1983 Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 33 (Federal Judicial Center 1984), 912

Miller, The Pretrial Rush to Judgment: Are the “Litigation Explosion,” “Liability Crisis,” and Efficiency Clichés Eroding Our Day in Court and Jury Trial Commitments?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982 (2003), 654, 987, 1009, 1010, 1048, 1066, 1088, 1356, 1394

Miller, What Are Courts For? Have We Forsaken the Procedural Gold Standard?, 78 La.L.Rev. 739 (2018), 418, 796, 1048, 1391

Milsom, Historical Foundations of the Common Law (1969), 549, 551, 556, 565

Minzer, Saving Stare Decisis: Preclusion, Precedent, and Procedural Due Process, 2010 BYU L.Rev. 597 (2010), 1356

Mishkin, the Federal “Question” in the District Courts, 53 Colum.L.Rev. 157 (1953), 326

Mitchell & Kunsch, Of Driver’s Licenses and Debtor’s Prison, 4 Seattle J. for Soc.Just. 439 (2005), 1209

Mize, Hannaford-Agor & Waters, National Center for State Courts, The State-of-the-States Survey of Jury Improvement Efforts: A Compendium Report (2007), 1096, 1097, 1105, 1136

Mnookin & Kornhauser, Bargaining in the Shadow of the Law: The Case of Divorce, 88 Yale L.J. 950 (1979), 1387

Mohammedi, Sharia-Compliant Wills: Principles, Recognition, and Enforcement, 57 N.Y.L.Sch.L.Rev. 259 (2012/2013), 1391

Moore, Collateral Attack on Subject-Matter Jurisdiction: A Critique of the Restatement (Second) of Judgments, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 534 (1981), 391

Moore, Conflict of Jurisdiction, 23 La.L.Rev. 29 (1962), 1192

Moore, The Heightened Standard of Ascertainability: An Unnecessary Hurdle to Class Action Certification, 122 Penn. St.L.Rev. 247 (2017), 839

Morantz, There’s No Place Like Home: Homestead Exemption and Judicial Constructions of Family in Nineteenth-Century America, 24 L. & Hist.Rev. 245 (2006), 1203

Morris & Wiener, Civil Arrest: A Medieval Anachronism, 43 Brooklyn L.Rev. 383 (1976), 1195

Morris, Studies in the History of American Law 46 (2d ed. 1959), 565

Morrison, The Necessity of Tradeoffs in a Properly Functioning Civil Procedure System, 90 Or.L.Rev. 993 (2012), 5

Moskowitz, Discovering Discovery: Non-Party Access to Pretrial Information in the Federal Courts 1938–2006, 78 U.Colo.L.Rev. 817 (2007), 964

Moskowitz, Rediscovering Discovery: State Procedural Rules and the Level Playing Field, 54 Rutgers L.Rev. 595 (2002), 920

Mullenix, Creative Manipulation of Federal Jurisdiction: Is There Diversity After Death?, 70 Cornell L.Rev. 1011 (1985), 314

Mullenix, The Pervasive Myth of Pervasive Discovery Abuse: The Sequel, 39 B.C.L.Rev. 683 (1998), 898

Mulligan & Staszewski, The Supreme Court’s Regulation of Civil Procedure: Lessons from Administrative Law, 59 UCLA L.Rev. 1188 (2012), 5

Mulligan, You Can’t Go Holmes Again, 107 Nw.U.L.Rev. 237 (2012), 352

Nadelmann, Full Faith and Credit to Judgments and Public Acts, 56 Mich.L.Rev. 33 (1957), 1361

Nader, Controlling Processes in the Practice of Law: Hierarchy and Pacification in the Movement to Re-Form Dispute Ideology, 9 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 1 (1993), 1395

Nagaraj, Comment, The Marriage of Family Law and Private Judging in California, 116 Yale L.J. 1615 (2007), 1392

Nagareda, Aggregate Litigation Across the Atlantic and the Future of American Exceptionalism, 62 Vand.L.Rev. 1 (2009), 895

Nagareda, Autonomy, Peace, and Put Options in the Mass Tort Class Action, 115 Harv.L.Rev. 747 (2002), 865

Nagareda, Bootstrapping in Choice of Law After the Class Action Fairness Act, 74 UMKC L.Rev. 661 (2006), 517

Nagareda, Class Certification in the Age of Aggregate Proof, 84 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 97 (2009), 813

Nagareda, Embedded Aggregation in Civil Litigation, 95 Cornell L.Rev. 1105 (2010), 1356

Nagareda, Mass Torts in an Age of Settlement (2007), 866

Nagareda, The Litigation-Arbitration Dichotomy Meets the Class Action, 86 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1069 (2011), 893

Nash, The Uneasy Case for Transjurisdictional Adjudication, 94 Va.L.Rev. 1869 (2008), 524

Neiderman & Reed, Vouching In Under the U.C.C.: Its History, Modern Use, and Questions About Its Continued Viability, 23 J.L. & Com. 1 (2003), 762

Nelles & Huber, Pleading Securities Fraud Claims: The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly, 45 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 653 (2014), 657

Nelson, A Critical Guide to Erie Railroad v. Tompkins, 54 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 921 (2013), 453

Nelson, The Persistence of General Law, 106 Colum.L.Rev. 503 (2006), 453

Neuborne, The Myth of Parity, 90 Harv.L.Rev. 1105 (1977), 308

Noland, Finding Fault with Defaults: New York Courts’ Inconsistent Application of Issue Preclusion to Default Judgments, 31 Cardozo L.Rev. 941 (2010), 1292

Nolan-Haley, Mediation: The “New Arbitration,” 17 Harv. Negot.L.Rev. 61 (2012), 1389

Noll, Regulating Arbitration, 105 Calif.L.Rev. 985 (2017), 1405

Note, Attachment of Corporate Stock: The Conflicting Approaches of Delaware and the Uniform Stock Transfer Act, 73 Harv.L.Rev. 1579 (1960), 208

Note, Claim Preclusion in Modern Latent Disease Cases: A Proposal for Allowing Second Suits, 103 Harv.L.Rev. 1989 (1990), 1273

Note, Exclusive Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts in Private Civil Actions, 70 Harv.L.Rev. 509 (1957), 339

Note, Filling the Void: Judicial Power and Jurisdictional Attacks on Judgments, 87 Yale L.J. 164 (1977), 393

Note, Nonmutual Issue Preclusion Against States, 109 Harv.L.Rev. 792 (1996), 1343

Note, Procedural Due Process—The Prior Hearing Rule and the Demise of Ex Parte Remedies, 53 B.U.L.Rev. 41 (1973), 282

Note, State Bans on Debtors’ Prisons and Criminal Justice Debt, 129 Harv.L.Rev. 1024 (2016), 1196

Note, The Changing Role of the Jury in the Nineteenth Century, 74 Yale L.J. 170 (1964), 1084

Note, The Evolution and Scope of the Doctrine of Pendent Jurisdiction in the Federal Courts, 62 Colum.L.Rev. 1018 (1962), 358

Note, The Res Judicata Implications of Pendent Jurisdiction, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 608 (1981), 1378

Note, The Right to a Nonjury Trial, 74 Harv.L.Rev. 1176 (1961), 1066

Note, The Right to Jury Trial Under Merged Procedures, 65 Harv.L.Rev. 453 (1952), 1083

Noyes, The Persistent Problem of Purposeful Availment, 45 Conn.L.Rev. 41 (2012), 159

O’Malley, Impeaching a Jury Verdict, Juror Misconduct, and Related Issues: A View from the Bench, 33 J.Marshall L.Rev. 145 (1999), 1163

Oakley & Coon, The Federal Rules in State Courts: A Survey of State Court Systems of Civil Procedure, 61 Wash.L.Rev. 1367 (1986), 601

Oakley, A Fresh Look at the Federal Rules in State Courts, 3 Nev.L.J. 354 (2002/03), 601, 991

Oakley, Kroger Redux, 51 Duke L.J. 663 (2001), 364, 765

Oakley, The Story of Owen Equipment v. Kroger: A Change in the Weather of Federal Jurisdiction, in Civil Procedure Stories 81 (Clermont ed., 2d ed. 2008), 361

Olds, Give It to Me Uniformly: West Virginia Wants Initial Disclosure, 115 W.Va.L.Rev. 363 (2012), 920

Oliver, Jr., Alternate Dispute Resolution and Minorities in the Federal Courts, 39 Cap.U.L.Rev. 805 (2011), 1395

Order of the Supreme Court Amending the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (April 22, 1993), reprinted in 146 F.R.D. 404 (1993), 705

Pace & Zakaras, Where the Money Goes: Understanding Litigant Expenditures for Producing Electronic Discovery, RAND Institute for Civil Justice (2012), 933

Panoff, Debtors, Creditors, Default Judgments, & Discretion: Why Rule 62(b)(4) Will Become One of the Most Important Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 44 Creighton L.Rev. 227 (2010), 1204

Parness, Improving Judicial Settlement Conferences, 39 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 1891 (2006), 995

Parrish, Duplicative Foreign Litigation, 78 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 237 (2010), 1193

Percy, Making a Federal Case of It: Removing Civil Cases to Federal Court Based on Fraudulent Joinder, 91 Iowa L.Rev. 189 (2005), 385

Perdue, Sin, Scandal and Substantive Due Process: Personal Jurisdiction and Pennoyer Reconsidered, 62 Wash.L.Rev. 479 (1987), 87

Perino, Did the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act Work?, 2003 U.Ill.L.Rev. 913, 654

Peterson, The Misguided Law of Compulsory Counterclaims in Default Cases, 50 Ariz.L.Rev. 1107 (2008), 732

Pew Charitable Trusts, The, How Debt Collectors Are Transforming the Business of State Courts, May 2020, 1046

Pfander & Damrau, A Non-Contentious Account of Article III’s Domestic Relations Exception, 92 Notre Dame L.Rev. 117 (2016), 324

Pfander, Interlocutory Review by Agreement of the Parties: A Preliminary Analysis, 105 Nw.U.L.Rev. 1043 (2011), 1227

Pfander, Protective Jurisdiction, Aggregate Litigation, and the Limits of Article III, 95 Calif.L.Rev. 1423 (2007), 330

Pfander, Supplemental Jurisdiction and Section 1367: The Case for Sympathetic Textualism, 148 U.Pa.L.Rev. 109 (1999), 365

Pfautz, What Would a Reasonable Jury Do? Jury Verdicts Following Summary Judgment Reversals, 115 Colum.L.Rev. 1255 (2015), 1036

Pham & Donovan, Fairer, Faster, Better II: An Empirical Assessment of Consumer Arbitration (2020), 1404

Pielemeier, Due Process Limitations on the Application of Collateral Estoppel Against Nonparties to Prior Litigation, 63 B.U.L.Rev. 383 (1983), 1349

Pike, Objections to Pleadings Under the New Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 47 Yale L.J. 50 (1937), 671

Pinahs, Diversity Jurisdiction and Injunctive Relief: Using a “Moving-Party Approach” to Value the Amount in Controversy, 95 Minn.L.Rev. 1930 (2011), 324

Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law (5th ed. 1956), 555, 556, 576

Polasky, Collateral Estoppel—Effects of Prior Litigation, 39 Iowa L.Rev. 217 (1954), 1308

Posner, Economic Analysis of Law (9th ed. 2014), 4, 1091

Posner, The Summary Jury Trial and Other Alternative Methods of Alternative Dispute Resolution: Some Cautionary Observations, 53 U.Chi.L.Rev. 366 (1986), 1394

Preis, Reassessing the Purposes of Federal Question Jurisdiction, 42 Wake Forest L.Rev. 247 (2007), 326

Purcell, Jr., Litigation and Inequality: Federal Diversity Jurisdiction in Industrial America, 1870–1958 (1992), 322

Purcell, Jr., Reconsidering the Frankfurterian Paradigm: Reflections on Histories of Lower Federal Courts, 24 Law & Soc. Inquiry 679 (1999), 334

Purcell, Jr., The Story of Erie: How Litigants, Lawyers, Judges, Politics, and Social Change Reshape the Law, in Civil Procedure Stories 21 (Clermont ed., 2d ed. 2008), 453

Quek, Mandatory Mediation: An Oxymoron? Examining the Feasibility of Implementing a Court-Mandated Mediation Program, 11 Cardozo J. Conflict Resol. 479 (2010), 1389

Rack, A Letter to My Successor, 26 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 429 (2011), 1396

Radin, The Authenticated Full Faith and Credit Clause: Its History, 39 Ill.L.Rev. 1 (1994), 1361

Ratner, Class Conflicts, 92 Wash.L.Rev. 785 (2017), 825

Reardon, Note, Pleading in the Information Age, 85 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 2170 (2010), 899

Recent Case, 131 Harv.L.Rev. 666 (2017), 1196

Recent Cases, 125 Harv.L.Rev. 634 (2011), 203

Recent Developments in Alternative Forms of Dispute Resolution, 100 F.R.D. 512 (1984), 1394

Reda, The Cost-and-Delay Narrative in Civil Justice Reform: Its Fallacies and Functions, 90 Or.L.Rev. 1085 (2012), 898, 991, 1394

Redish & Karaba, One Size Doesn’t Fit All: Multidistrict Litigation, Due Process, and the Dangers of Procedural Collectivism, 95 B.U.L.Rev. 109 (2015), 796

Redish & Kastanek, Settlement Class Actions, The Case-or-Controversy Requirement, and the Nature of the Adjudicatory Process, 73 U.Chi.L.Rev. 545 (2006), 865

Redish, Reassessing the Allocation of Judicial Business Between State and Federal Courts: Federal Jurisdiction and “The Martian Chronicles,” 78 Va.L.Rev. 1769 (1992), 308

Redish, Seventh Amendment Right to Jury Trial: A Study in the Irrationality of Rational Decision Making, 70 Nw.U.L. Rev. 486 (1975), 1051

Reggio, Removal and Remand: A Guide to Navigating Between the State and Federal Courts, 23 Miss.L.Rev. 97 (2004), 381

Reiber & Weinberg, The Complexity of Complexity: An Empirical Study of Juror Competence in Civil Cases, 78 U.Cin.L.Rev. 929 (2010), 1066

Reich, The New Property, 73 Yale L.J. 733 (1964), 279

Reinert, Measuring the Impact of Plausibility Pleading, 101 Va.L.Rev. 2117 (2015), 643

Reinert, Pleading as Information-Forcing, 75 L. & Contemp.Probs. 1 (2012), 642

Reinert, Screening Out Innovation: The Merits of Meritless Litigation, 89 Ind.L.J. 1191 (2014), 715

Reinert, The Costs of Heightened Pleading, 86 Ind.L.J. 119 (2011), 903

Rendleman, Beyond Contempt: Obligor to Injunctions, 53 Texas L.Rev. 873 (1975), 1192

Rennie, The End of Interrogatories: Why Twombly and Iqbal Should Finally Stop Rule 33 Abuse, 15 Lewis & Clark L.Rev. 191 (2011), 929

Report of the Committee on the Operation of the Jury System of the Judicial Conference of the United States, 42 F.R.D. 353 (1967), 1096

Report of the Federal Courts Study Committee 38 (April 2, 1990), 307

Report of the Mediator on the Mediation and the Settlement Efforts of the Parties in the Cases Previously Docketed Under 21 MC 97, 1397

Resnik, “Naturally” Without Gender: Women, Jurisdiction, and the Federal Courts, 66 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1682 (1991), 324

Resnik, A2J/A2K: Access to Justice, Access to Knowledge, and Economic Inequalities in Open Courts and Arbitrations, 96 N.C.L.Rev. 605 (2018), 1404

Resnik, Changing Practices, Changing Rules: Judicial and Congressional Rulemaking on Civil Juries, Civil Justice, and Civil Judging, 49 Ala.L.Rev. 133 (1997), 1095

Resnik, Compared to What?: ALI Aggregation and the Shifting Contours of Due Process and of Lawyers’ Powers, 79 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 628 (2011), 796

Resnik, Curtis & Hensler, Individuals within the Aggregate: Relationships, Representation, and Fees, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 296 (1996), 852

Resnik, Garlock & Wang, Collective Preclusion and Inaccessible Arbitration: Data, Nondisclosure, and Public Knowledge, 24 Lewis & Clark L.Rev. 611 (2020), 1405

Resnik, Judicial Selection and Democratic Theory: Demand, Supply, and Life Tenure, 26 Cardozo L.Rev. 579 (2005), 1003
Resnik, Lawyers’ Ethics Beyond the Vanishing Trial: Unrepresented Claimants, De Facto Aggregations, Arbitration Mandates, and Privatized Processes, 85 Fordham L.Rev. 189 (2017), 7
Resnik, Managerial Judges, 96 Harv.L.Rev. 374 (1982), 990
Resnik, The Privatization of Process: Requiem for and Celebration of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure at 75, 162 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1793 (2014), 1391
Resnik, Trial as Error, Jurisdiction as Injury: Transforming the Meaning of Article III, 113 Harv.L.Rev. 924 (2000), 1003, 1048
Resnik, Uncovering, Disclosing, and Discovering How the Public Dimensions of Court-Based Processes Are at Risk, 81 Chi.-Kent L.Rev. 521 (2006), 1410
Resnik, Whose Judgment? Vacating Judgments, Preferences for Settlement, and the Role of Adjudication at the Close of the Twentieth Century, 41 UCLA L.Rev. 1471 (1994), 1316
Restatement (First) Judgments § 10, 390
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 11, Reporter’s Note (1982), 393
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 12 (1982), 77
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 13, cmt. f (1982), 1274
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 20(1) (1982), 1284
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 22 (1982), 1284
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 24 (1982), 1277
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 24, cmt. a (1982), 1268, 1269
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 24, cmt. d (1982), 1277
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 25, cmt. e (1982), 1378
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 26, cmt. g (1982), 1278
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 27 (1982), 1289
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 27 cmt. j (1982), 1309
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 28(1) (1982), 1297
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 28(5)(c) (1982), 1317
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 28, cmt. b (1982), 1304
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 28, cmt. j (1982), 1291
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 65 (1982), 391
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 68, cmt. e (Tent. Draft No. 4, 1977), 1289
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 68.1(e)(i) (Tent. Draft No. 4, 1977), 1324
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 83(2) (1982), 1323
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 85, cmt. b (1982), 1292
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 86, cmt. g (1982), 1359
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 87 (1982), 1373
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 88(2) (Tentative Draft No. 2, 1975), 1336
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 88(2), cmt. d (Tentative Draft No. 2, 1975), 1336
Restatement (Second) Judgments § 88(3) (Tent. Draft No. 2, 1975), 1335
Restatement (Second) Judgments §§ 12, 69 (1982), 390
Restatement (Second) Judgments §§ 17–19 (1982), 1260
Restatement (Second) Judgments §§ 41, 54, 59–60 (1982), 1325
Reuben, Public Justice: Toward a State Action Theory of Alternative Dispute Resolution, 85, 1398
Reynolds, Games, Dystopia, and ADR, 27 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 477 (2012), 1383
Rhode, Class Conflicts in Class Actions, 34 Stan.L.Rev. 1183 (1982), 841
Rhodes, The Battle Lines of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) and the Effects on a Pro Se Litigant’s Ability to Survive a Motion to Dismiss, 22 St. Thomas L. Rev. 527 (2010), 645
Richey, Rule 16 Revised, and Related Rules: Analysis of Recent Developments for the Benefit of Bench and Bar, 157 F.R.D. 69 (1994), 990
Richman, Lively & Mell, The Pleading of Fraud: Rhymes Without Reason, 60 S. Calif. L. Rev. 959 (1987), 653
Risinger, Honesty in Pleading and its Enforcement: Some “Striking” Problems with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11, 61 Minn.L.Rev. 1 (1976), 703
Ritz, Holt & Larue, Rewriting the History of the Judiciary Act of 1789: Exposing Myths, Challenging Premises, and Using New Evidence (1990), 444
Robertson, Appellate Review of Discovery Orders in Federal Court: A Suggested Approach for Handling Privilege Claims, 81 Wash.L.Rev. 733 (2006), 1236
Robertson, Judging Jury Verdicts, 83 Tul.L.Rev. 157 (2008), 1170
Robertson, The Facebook Disruption: How Social Media May Transform Civil Litigation and Facilitate Access to Justice, 65 Ark.L.Rev. 75 (2012), 900
Robertson, Transnational Litigation and Institutional Choice, 51 B.C.L.Rev. 1081 (2010), 429
Rose & Abramson, Data, Race, and the Courts: Some Lessons on Empiricism from Jury Representation Cases, 2011 Mich.St.L.Rev. 911, 1096
Rosenberg, Individual Justice and Collectivizing Risk-Based Claims in Mass-Exposure Cases, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 210 (1996), 848
Rosenberg, Mandatory-Litigation Class Action: The Only Option for Mass Tort Cases, 115 Harv.L.Rev. 831 (2002), 865
Rossein & Hope, Disclosure and Disqualification Standards for Neutral Arbitrators: How Far to Cast the Net and What Is Sufficient to Vacate Award, 81 St. John’s L.Rev. 203 (2007), 1402
Rothwell & Perry, Biased appraisals and the devaluation of housing in Black neighborhoods, Brookings (Nov. 17, 2021), 677
Rottman, Flango, Cantrell, Hansen & LaFountain, State Court Organization 1998 tbl 42 (2000), 1095
Rowe, Authorized Managerialism Under the Federal Rules—And the Extent of Convergence with Civil-Law Judging, 36 Sw.U.L.Rev. 191 (2007), 995
Rowe, Debates over Group Litigation in Comparative Perspective: What Can We Learn from Each Other?, 11 Duke J.Comp. & Int’l L. 157 (2001), 894
Rowe, Not Bad for Government Work: Does Anyone Else Think the Supreme Court Is Doing a Halfway Decent Job in Its Erie-Hanna Jurisprudence?, 73 Notre Dame L.Rev. 963 (1998), 492
Rowe, Predicting the Effects of Attorney Fee Shifting, 47 Law & Contemp.Probs. 139 (1984), 1409
Rubenstein, The Concept of Equality in Civil Procedure, 23 Cardozo L.Rev. 1865 (2002), 399
Rubenstein, The Fairness Hearing: Adversarial and Regulatory Approaches, 53 UCLA L.Rev. 1435 (2006), 850
Rubenstein, The Myth of Superiority, 16 Const. Comment. 599 (1999), 308
Russel, Due Process of Law, 14 Yale L.J. 322 (1905), 237
Rutherglen, Better Late Than Never: Notice and Opt Out at the Settlement Stage of Class Actions, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 258 (1996), 851
Rutherglen, Reconstructing Erie: A Comment on the Perils of Legal Positivism, 10 Const. Comment. 285 (1993), 452
Ryan, It’s Just Not Worth Searching for Welcome Mats with a Kaleidoscope and a Broken Compass, 7 Tenn.L.Rev. 659 (2008), 352
Sabatino, ADR as “Litigation Lite”: Procedural and Evidentiary Norms Embedded Within Alternative Dispute Resolution, 47 Emory L.J. 1289 (1998), 1398
Sachs, Finding Law, 107 Calif.L.Rev. 527 (2019), 453
Sachs, Pennoyer Was Right, 95 Texas L. Rev. 1249 (2017), 190
Sack, Conflict of Laws in the History of English Law, in 3 Law: A Century of Progress 342 (1937), 556
Sander, The Multidoor Courthouse, National Forum, Vol. LXIII, No. 4, Fall 1983, 1386
Sander, Varieties of Dispute Processing, in The Pound Conference: Perspectives on Justice in the Future 65 (Levin & Wheeler eds. 1979), 1386
Sanders, Jr., Time to Close the Collection Agency: Addressing the Abuse of Bad Check Laws, 2 Charleston L.Rev. 215 (2007), 1209
Sanner & Tobias, Rule 11 and Rule Revision, 37 Loy.L.A.L.Rev. 573 (2004), 703
Sarat, The “New Formalism” in Disputing and Dispute Processing, 21 Law & Soc’y Rev. 695 (1987–1988), 1386
Schaller, Secrets of the Trade: Tactical and Legal Considerations from the Trade Secret Plaintiff’s Perspective, 29 Rev.Litig. 729 (2010), 899
Scheidlin & Redgrave, The Evolution and Impact of the New Federal Rule Governing Special Masters, 51 Fed.Law. 34 (Feb. 2004), 1006

Scheindlin & Wangkeo, Electronic Discovery Sanctions in the Twenty-First Century, 11 Mich.Telecomm. & Tech.L.Rev. 71 (2004), 974
Schmertz, Written Depositions Under the Federal and State Rules as Cost-Effective Discovery at Home and Abroad, 16 Vill.L.Rev. 7 (1970), 925
Schnapper, Judges Against Juries—Appellate Review of Federal Civil Jury Verdicts, 1989 Wis.L.Rev. 237, 1250
Schneider, Illiberal Construction of Pro Se Pleadings, 159 U.Pa.L.Rev. 585 (2011), 646
Schneider, The Dangers of Summary Judgment: Gender and Federal Litigation, 59 Rutgers L.Rev. 705 (2007), 1036
Schuh, Curbing Judicial Discretion in Pretrial Conferences, 20 Lewis & Clark L. Rev. 647 (2016), 991
Schwartz, Communicating with Juries: Problems and Remedies, 69 Calif.L.Rev. 731 (1981), 1129
Scodro, Note—Arbitrating Novel Legal Questions: A Recommendation for Reform, 105 Yale L.J. 1927 (1996), 1403
Scott, Collateral Estoppel by Judgment, 56 Harv.L.Rev. 1 (1942), 732
Scott, Trial by Jury and the Reform of Civil Procedure, 31 Harv.L.Rev. 669 (1918), 1084
Scott, Two Models of the Civil Process, 27 Stan.L.Rev. 937 (1975), 5
Seinfeld, The Federal Courts as a Franchise: Rethinking the Justifications for Federal Question Jurisdiction, 97 Calif.L.Rev. 95 (2009), 326
Seinfeld, The Puzzle of Complete Preemption, 155 U.Pa.L.Rev. 537 (2007), 384
Semtek, Forum Shopping, and Federal Common Law, 77 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1027 (2002), 540
Seville, Peter Pan’s Rights: “To Die Will Be an Awfully Big Adventure,” 51 J. Copyright Soc’y U.S.A. 1 (2003), 256
Sexton, A Post-Upjohn Consideration of the Corporate Attorney-Client Privilege, 57 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 443 (1982), 963
Shackmurove, Policing Boilerplate: Reckoning and Reforming Rule 34’s Popular—Yet Problematic—Construction, 37 N.Ill.U.L.Rev. 23 (2017), 930
Shannon, Enforcing Forum-Selection Clauses, 66 Hastings L.J. 777 (2015), 438
Shapiro, Civil Procedure: Preclusion in Civil Actions 102 (2001), 1325
Shapiro, Class Actions: The Class as Party and Client, 73 Notre Dame L.Rev. 913 (1998), 799
Shapiro, Federal Diversity Jurisdiction: A Survey and a Proposal, 91 Harv.L.Rev. 317 (1977), 307
Shapiro, Federal Rule 16: A Look at the Theory and Practice of Rulemaking, 137 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1969 (1989), 988
Shapiro, Should a Guilty Plea Have Preclusive Effect?, 70 Iowa L.Rev. 27 (1984), 1293
Shapiro, Some Thoughts on Intervention Before Courts, Agencies, and Arbitrators, 81 Harv.L.Rev. 721 (1968), 787
Shavell, The Appeals Process as a Means of Error Correction, 24 J. Legal Stud. 379 (1995), 1217
Shell, Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel Effects of Commercial Arbitration, 35 UCLA L.Rev. 623 (1988), 1382
Shepard, Creditors’ Contempt, 2011 BYU L.Rev. 1509 (2011), 1209
Sherman & Fairman, Interplay Between Mediation and Offer of Judgment Rule Sanctions, 26 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 327 (2011), 1410
Sherman, Amending Complaints to Sue Previously Misnamed or Unidentified Defendants after the Statute of Limitations Has Run: Questions Remaining from the Krupski Decision, 15 Nev.L.J. 1329 (2015), 698
Sherman, Group Litigation Under Foreign Legal Systems: Variations and Alternatives to American Class Actions, 52 DePaul L.Rev. 401 (2002), 894
Sherman, The BP Oil Spill Litigation and the Evolving Supervision of Multidistrict Judges, 30 Miss. College L.Rev. 237 (2011), 418
Sherman, Transnational Perspectives Regarding the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 56 J. Legal Educ. 510 (2006), 643
Sherry, Hogs Get Slaughtered at the Supreme Court, 2011 Sup.Ct.Rev. 1, 822
Sherry, Wrong, Out of Step, and Pernicious: Erie as the Worst Decision of All Time, 39 Pepp.L.Rev. 129 (2011), 453
Sherwin, The Story of Conley: Precedent by Accident, in Civil Procedure Stories 282 (Clermont ed., 2d ed. 2008), 613
Shestowsky, Disputants’ Preferences for Court-Connected Dispute Resolution Procedures: Why We Should Care and Why We Know So Little, 23 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 549 (2008), 1398
Shestowsky, Procedural Preferences in Alternative Dispute Resolution, 10 Psychol. Pub. Pol’y & L. 211 (2004), 1396
Shreve, Preclusion and Federal Choice of Law, 64 Tex.L.Rev. 1209 (1986), 1285, 1360
Shulman, The Demise of Swift v. Tyson, 47 Yale L.J. 1336 (1938), 453
Shweder, Judicial Limitations on ADR: The Role and Ethics of Judges Encouraging Settlements, 20 Geo.J.Legal Ethics 51 (2007), 1411
Silberman, Masters and Magistrates, Part I: The English Model, 50 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1070 (1975), 1002
Silberman, Masters and Magistrates, Part II: The American Analogue, 50 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1297 (1975), 1002
Silver & Dinkin, Incentivizing Institutional Investors to Serve as Lead Plaintiffs in Securities Fraud Class Actions, 57 DePaul L.Rev. 471 (2008), 826
Simowitz, Siting Intangibles, 48 N.Y.U. J. Int’l L. & Pol. 259 (2015), 209
Simpler III, The Unjust “Web” We Weave: The Evolution of Social Media and Its Psychological Impact of Juror Impartiality and Fair Trials, 36 Law & Psychol. Rev. 275 (2012), 1137
Simpson-Wood, A Litmus Test for Pioneer: Ethical Considerations and the Delegation Situation, 31 J.Legal Prof. 171 (2007), 1178
Simpson-Wood, Has the Seductive Siren of Judicial Frugality Ceased to Sing?: Dataflux and Its Family Tree, 53 Drake L.Rev. 281 (2005), 390
Sloan & Gotfryd, Eliminating the 100 Mile Limit for Civil Trial Witnesses: A Proposal to Modernize Civil Trial Practice, 140 F.R.D. 33 (1992), 985
Sloviter, A Federal Judge Views Diversity Jurisdiction Through the Lens of Federalism, 78 Va.L.Rev. 1671 (1992), 524
Smith, Civil Jury Trial: A Scottish Assessment, 50 Va.L.Rev. 1076 (1964), 1050
Smith, Structural and Functional Aspects of the Jury: Comparative Analysis and Proposals for Reform, 48 Ala.L.Rev. 441 (1997), 1130
Sobol, Fighting Fines & Fees, Borrowing from Consumer Law to Combat Criminal Justice Debt Abuses, 88 U.Colo.L.Rev. 841 (2017), 1209
Solimine & Hines, Deciding To Decide: Class Action Certification and Interlocutory Review by the United States Courts of Appeals under Rule 23(f), 41 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 1531 (2000), 846
Solimine & Lippert, Deregulating Voluntary Dismissals, 36 U.Mich.J.L.Reform 367 (2003), 1038
Solomon & Hunnafor-Agor, Introduction: The Civil Jury as a Political Institution, 55 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 715 (2014), 1051
Solomon, The Political Puzzle of the Civil Jury, 61 Emory L.J. 1331 (2012), 1088
Solum, Procedural Justice, 78 S.Calif.L.Rev. 181 (2004), 4
Soucek & Lamons, Heightened Pleading Standards for Defendants: A Case Study of Court-Counting Precedent, 70 Ala.L.Rev. 875 (2019), 684
Sovern, Reconsidering Federal Civil Rule 9(b): Do We Need Particularized Pleading Requirements in Fraud Cases?, 653
Spencer, Plausibility Pleading, 49 B.C.L.Rev. 431 (2008), 713
Spindler, Why Shareholders Want Their CEOs To Lie More After Dura Pharmaceuticals, 95 Geo.L.J. 653 (2007), 654
St. Eve & Zuckerman, Ensuring an Impartial Jury in the Age of Social Media, 11 Duke L. & Tech Rev. 1 (2012), 1137
Stancil, Substitute Equality and Procedural Justice, 102 Iowa L.Rev. 1633 (2017), 1004
Steckler, Management of the Jury, 28 F.R.D. 190 (1960), 1161
Steinberg & Gomez-Cornejo, Blurring the Lines Between Pleading Doctrines: The Enhanced Rule 8(a)(2) Plausibility Pleading Standard Converges with the Heightened Fraud Pleading Standards under Rule 9(b) and the PSLRA, 30 Rev. Litig. 1 (2010), 658
Steinberg, A Theory of Civil Problem-Solving Courts, 93 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1579 (2018), 7
Steinberg, The Motion To Transfer and the Interests of Justice, 66 Notre Dame L.Rev. 443 (1990), 415
Steinman, After Steel Co.: “Hypothetical Jurisdiction” in the Federal Appellate Courts, 58 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 855 (2001), 387
Steinman, Appellate Courts and Civil Juries, 2021 Wisc.L.Rev. 1, 1252
Steinman, Atlantic Marine Through the Lens of Erie, 66 Hastings L.J. 795 (2015), 439
Steinman, Claims, Civil Actions, Congress & the Court: Limiting the Reasoning of Cases Construing Poorly Drawn Statutes, 65 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 1593 (2008), 408
Steinman, Irregulars: The Appellate Rights of Persons Who Are Not Full-Fledged Parties, 38 Ga.L.Rev. 411 (2005), 1245
Steinman, Notice Pleading in Exile, 41 Cardozo L.Rev. 1057 (2020), 640
Steinman, Reinventing Appellate Jurisdiction, 48 B.C.L.Rev. 1237 (2007), 388, 1228
Steinman, The Lay of the Land: Examining the Three Opinions in J. McIntyre Machinery, Ltd. v. Nicastro, 63 S.C.L.Rev. 481 (2012), 158
Steinman, The Pleading Problem, 62 Stan.L.Rev. 1293 (2010), 628, 639

Steinman, The Rise and Fall of Plausibility Pleading?, 69 Vand.L.Rev. 333 (2016), 642

Steinman, What Is the Erie Doctrine? (And What Does it Mean for the Contemporary Politics of Judicial Federalism?), 84 Notre Dame L.Rev. 245 (2008), 452, 501

Stengel, The Asbestos End-Game, 62 N.Y.U.Ann. Surv. Am.L. 223 (2006), 864

Stephen, The Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions (Tyler ed. 1882), 547, 557, 558

Sterk, The Muddy Boundaries Between Res Judicata and Full Faith and Credit, 58 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 47 (2001), 1361

Sternlight, ADR Is Here: Preliminary Reflections on Where It Fits in a System of Justice, 3 Nev.L.J. 289 (2002–03), 1384

Sternlight, Is Binding Arbitration a Form of ADR?: An Argument That the Term “ADR” Has Begun To Outlive Its Usefulness, 2000 J.Disp. Resol. 97, 1384

Sternlight, Is the U.S. Out on a Limb? Comparing the U.S. Approach to Mandatory Consumer and Employment Arbitration to That of the Rest of the World, 56 U. Miami L. Rev. 831 (2002), 1404

Sternlight, Rethinking the Constitutionality of the Supreme Court’s Preference for Binding Arbitration: A Fresh Assessment of Jury Trial, Separation of Powers, and Due Process Concerns, 72 Tul.L.Rev. 1 (1997), 1403

Stevens, Venue Statutes: Diagnosis and Proposed Cure, 49 Mich.L.Rev. 307 (1951), 395

Stewart & Sunstein, Public Programs and Private Rights, 95 Harv.L.Rev. 1193 (1982), 338

Stipanowich, ADR and the “Vanishing Trial”: The Growth and Impact of “Alternative Dispute Resolution,” 1 J. Empirical Legal Stud. 843 (2004), 1384

Stipanowich, Arbitration: The “New Litigation,” 2010 U.Ill.L.Rev. 1, 1391, 1395

Stone & Miceli, The Impact of Frivolous Lawsuits on Deterrence: Do They Have Some Redeeming Value?, 10 J.L.Econ. & Pol’y 301 (2014), 715

Strier, Making Jury Trials More Truthful, 30 U.C.Davis L.Rev. 95 (1996), 1137

Strier, The Educated Jury: A Proposal for Complex Litigation, 47 DePaul L.Rev. 49 (1997), 1096

Subrin & Main, Braking the Rules: Why State Courts Should Not Replicate Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 67 Case W.Res.L.Rev. 501 (2016), 28

Subrin, How Equity Conquered Common Law: The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in Historical Perspective, 135 U.Pa.L.Rev. 909 (1987), 601

Subrin, Reflections on the Twin Dreams of Simplified Procedure and Useful Empiricism, 35 W.St.U.L.Rev. 173 (2007), 991

Subrin, The Limitations of Transsubstantive Procedure: An Essay on Adjusting the “One Size Fits All” Assumption, 87 Denv.U.L.Rev. 377 (2010), 643

Subrin, Uniformity in Procedural Rules and the Attributes of a Sound Procedural System: The Case for Presumptive Limits, 49 Ala.L.Rev. 79 (1997), 920

Sullivan, Enforcement of Government Antitrust Decrees by Private Parties: Third Party Beneficiary Rights and Intervenor Status, 123 U.Pa.L.Rev. 822 (1975), 793

Sunderland, Joinder of Actions, 18 Mich.L.Rev. 571 (1920), 717

Sunderland, Problems Connected with the Operation of a State Court System, 1950 Wis.L.Rev. 585, 300

Sunderland, The Theory and Practice of Pre-Trial Procedure, 36 Mich.L.Rev. 215 (1937), 989

Sunderland, Verdicts General and Special, 29 Yale L.J. 253 (1920), 1139

Susman & Jolly, An Empirical Study on Jury Trial Innovations (2016), 1136

Swank, The National Child Non-Support Epidemic, 2003 Mich. St. DCL L.Rev. 357, 1203

Swank, The Pro Se Phenomenon, 19 BYU J.Pub.L. 373 (2005), 1003

Sward, Values, Ideology and the Evolution of the Adversary System, 64 Ind.L.J. 301 (1988/1989), 5

Symposium: Secrecy in Litigation, 81 Chi.-Kent L.Rev. 305 (2006), 965

Taft, Possible and Needed Reform in Administration of Justice in Federal Courts, 8 A.B.A.J. 601 (1922), 305

Tarpley, ADR, Jurisprudence, and Myth, 17 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 113 (2001), 1387

Thayer, The Jury and Its Development, 5 Harv.L.Rev. 249 (1892), 1050

The Sedona Conference, Best Practices Commentary on the Use of Search and Information Retrieval Methods in E-Discovery, 8 Sedona Conf.J. 189 (2007), 964

The Supreme Court, 1971 Term—Right to Hearing before Taking of Property, 86 Harv.L.Rev. 85 (1972), 280

Thibaut & Walker, A Theory of Procedure, 66 Calif.L.Rev. 541 (1978), 5

Thibaut & Walker, Procedural Justice (1975), 1396

Thomas, A Limitation on Congress: “In Suits at Common Law,” 71 Ohio St.L.J. 1071 (2010), 1053

Thomas, Re-Examining the Constitutionality of Remittitur Under the Seventh Amendment, 64 Ohio St.L.J. 731 (2003), 1173

Thomas, The Missing American Jury: Restoring the Fundamental Constitutional Role of the Criminal, Civil, and Grand Juries (2016), 1117

Thomas, The Seventh Amendment, Modern Procedure, and the English Common Law, 82 Wash.U.L.Q. 687 (2004), 1117

Thomas-Jensen, Certification after Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona: A Survey of Federal Appellate Courts’ Practices, 87 Denv.U.L.Rev. 139 (2009), 523

Thornburg, Just Say “No Fishing”: The Lure of Metaphor, 40 U.Mich.J.L. Reform 1 (2006), 898

Tidmarsh, Exiting Litigation, 41 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 263 (2010), 1399

Tidmarsh, The Story of Hansberry: The Rise of Modern Class Actions, in Civil Procedure Stories 217 (Clermont ed., 2d ed. 2008), 808

Tobias, Rule 19 and the Public Rights Exception to Party Joinder, 65 N.C.L.Rev. 745 (1987), 786

Tobias, The 1993 Revision to Federal Rule 11, 70 Ind.L.J. 171 (1994), 704

Tobias, The 2000 Federal Civil Rules Revisions, 38 San Diego L.Rev. 875 (2001), 898

Twitchell, The Myth of General Jurisdiction, 101 Harv.L.Rev. 610 (1988), 172

Tyler, Procedural Justice and the Courts, 44 Ct.Rev. 26 (2007–2008), 5

Upchurch, Can Granny Have a New Home? Resolving the Dilemma of Dementia and Domicile in Federal Diversity Jurisdiction Cases, 79 U. Colo.L.Rev. 545 (2008), 314

Van Hecke, Trial by Jury in Equity Cases, 31 N.C.L.Rev. 157 (1953), 1067

Vandavelde, Ideology, Due Process and Civil Procedure, 67 St. John’s L.Rev. 265 (1993), 1187

Varol, Structural Rights, 100 Geo.L.J. 1001 (2017), 1130

Vestal, The Restatement (Second) of Judgments: A Modest Dissent, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 464 (1981), 1290

von Mehren & Trautman, Jurisdiction to Adjudicate: A Suggested Analysis, 79 Harv.L.Rev. 1121 (1966), 101, 162

Vreeland, Public Interest Groups, Public Law Litigation, and Federal Rule 24(a), 57 U.Chi.L.Rev. 279 (1990), 792

Waggoner, Fifty Years of Bernhard v. Bank of America Is Enough: Collateral Estoppel Should Require Mutuality But Res Judicata Should Not, 12 Rev. Litig. 391 (1993), 1333

Waggoner, Peremptory Challenges and Religion: the Unanswered Prayer for a Supreme Court Opinion, 36 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 285 (2004), 1105

Wald, Summary Judgment at Sixty, 76 Tex.L.Rev. 1897 (1998), 1009

Walker, Wyoming’s Statutory Exemption on Wage Garnishment: Should It Include Deposited Wages?, 6 Wyo.L.Rev. 53 (2006), 1203

Waltz, Opinion Work Product: A Critical Analysis of Current Law and a New Analytical Framework, 73 Or.L.Rev. 385 (1994), 954

Wandell, Geolocation and Jurisdiction: From Purposeful Availment to Avoidance and Targeting on the Internet, 16 J.Tech.L. & Pol’y 275 (2011), 203

Ward, Mandatory Court-Annexed Alternative Dispute Resolution in the United States Federal Courts: Panacea or Pandemic?, 81 St. John’s L.Rev. 77 (2007), 1389

Ware, Arbitration Clauses, Jury-Waiver Clauses, and Other Contractual Waivers of Constitutional Rights, 67 Law & Contemp. Probs. 167 (2004), 1093

Warren, New Light on the History of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789, 37 Harv.L.Rev. 49 (1923), 446

Wasserman, Legal Process in a Box, or What Class Action Waivers Teach Us About Law-Making, 44 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 391 (2012), 1403

Wasserman, Mixed Signals on Summary Judgment, 2014 Mich.St.L.Rev. 1331 (2015), 1035

Waxse, Cooperation—What Is It and Why Do It?, 18 Richmond J.L. & Tech. 8 (2012), 915

Webber, The Plight of the Individual Investor in Securities Class Actions, 106 Nw.U.L.Rev. 157 (2012), 826

Webster, The Limits of Collateral Estoppel in Tax Court Litigation, 8 B.U.J.Tax Law 43 (1990), 1305

Weidemaier, Judging-Lite: How Arbitrators Use and Create Precedent, 90 N.C.L.Rev. 1091 (2012), 1402

Weidemaier, Toward a Theory of Precedent in Arbitration, 51 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 1895 (2010), 1402

Weinberg, The Right to be Taken Seriously, 67 U. Miami L.Rev. 149 (2012), 247

Weiner, The Civil Jury and the Law-Fact Distinction, 54 Calif.L.Rev. 1867 (1966), 1084

Weinstein & Wiener, Of Sailing Ships and Seeking Facts: Brief Reflections on Magistrates and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 62 St. John’s L.Rev. 429 (1988), 1003
Weinstein, Some Benefits and Risks of Privatization of Justice Through ADR, 11 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 241 (1996), 1412
Weinstein, The Power and Duty of Federal Judges to Marshall and Comment on the Evidence in Jury Trials and Some Suggestions on Charging Juries, 118 F.R.D. 161 (1988), 1132
Weintraub, A Map Out of the Personal Jurisdiction Labyrinth, 28 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 531 (1995), 152
Welsh, Musings on Mediation, Kleenex, and (Smudged) White Hats, 33 U. La Verne L.Rev. 5 (2011), 1396
Welsh, The Current Transitional State of Court-Connected ADR, 95 Marq.L.Rev. 873 (2012), 1399
Welsh, The Thinning Vision of Self-Determination in Court-Connected Mediation: The Inevitable Price of Institutionalization?, 6 Harv.Negot.L.Rev. 1 (2001), 1388
West, The Limits of Process, in Getting to the Rule of Law: Nomos L, 32 (Fleming ed. 2011), 6
Westen & Lehman, Is There Life for Erie After the Death of Diversity?, 78 Mich.L.Rev. 311 (1980), 480
Wheatman & LeClercq, Majority of Class Action Publication Notices Fail to Satisfy Rule 23 Requirements, 30 Rev. Litig. 53 (2010), 840
Whitt, The Split on Sanctioning Pro Se Litigants Under 28 U.S.C. § 1927: Choose Wisely When Picking a Side, Eighth Circuit, 73 Mo.L.Rev. 1365 (2008), 714
Whittier, Notice Pleading, 31 Harv.L.Rev. 501 (1918), 590
Whittier, The Theory of a Pleading, 8 Colum.L.Rev. 523 (1908), 598
Wigmore, The Judicial Function, in Science of Legal Method (1917), 1
Willing, Hooper & Niemic, An Empirical Analysis of Rule 23 to Address the Rulemaking Challenges, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 74 (1996), 803, 852
Winship, Cooperative Interbranch Federalism: Certification of State-Law Questions by Federal Agencies, 63 Vand.L.Rev. 181 (2010), 523
Wistrich, Guthrie & Rachlinski, Can Judges Ignore Inadmissible Information? The Difficulty of Deliberately Disregarding, 153 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1251 (2005), 1108
Wofford, The Effect of Gender and Relational Distance on Plaintiff Decision Making in the Litigation Process, 51 L. & Soc’y Rev. 966 (2017), 1389
Wolff, Federal Jurisdiction and Due Process in the Era of the Nationwide Class Action, 156 U.Pa.L.Rev. 2035 (2008), 882
Wolff, Is There Life After Concepcion? State Courts, State Law, and the Mandate of Arbitration, 56 St. Louis U.L.J. 1269 (2012), 893
Wolff, Preclusion in Class Action Litigation, 105 Colum.L.Rev. 717 (2005), 890
Wood, Short Circuiting the Justice System: How Defendants are Misusing Writs of Execution, 39 Pepp.L.Rev. 747 (2012), 1202
Wood, The Changing Face of Diversity Jurisdiction, 82 Temp.L.Rev. 593 (2009), 304
Woodward, Definiteness and Particularity in Patent Claims, 46 Mich.L.Rev. 755 (1948), 1086
Woolhandler & Collins, Federal Question Jurisdiction and Justice Holmes, 84 Notre Dame L.Rev. 2151 (2009), 339
Wright & Kane, Law of Federal Courts § 84 (8th ed. 2017), 924
Wright & Kane, Law of Federal Courts § 85 (8th ed. 2017), 925
Wright, Estoppel by Rule: The Compulsory Counterclaim Under Modern Pleading, 38 Minn.L.Rev. 423 (1954), 730, 732, 1281
Wright, Expert Discovery Returns to the Past, 58 Fed.Law. 32 (Jan. 2011), 967
Wright, Instructions to the Jury: Summary Without Comment, 1954 Wash.U.L.Q. 177, 1132
Wright, Miller & Marcus, Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil § 2181 at 344 (2d ed.1994), 928
Wunderlich, The Importance of the Prefiling Phase for Securities-Fraud Litigation, 45 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 739 (2014), 658
Wyatt & Bales, The Presence of Third Parties at Rule 35 Examinations, 71 Temp.L.Rev. 103 (1998), 941
Yablon & Landsman-Roos, Predictive Coding: Emerging Questions and Concerns, 64 S.C.L.Rev. 633 (2013), 933
Yeazell, The Misunderstood Consequences of Modern Civil Process, 1994 Wis.L.Rev. 631, 633 n.3, 1047
Young, Erie As a Way of Life, 52 Akron L.Rev. 193 (2018), 453
Young, Vanishing Trials, Vanishing Juries, Vanishing Constitution, 40 Suffolk L.Rev. (2006), 1048
Zalman & Tsoudis, Plucking Weeds from the Garden: Lawyers Speak About Voir Dire, 51 Wayne L.Rev. 163 (2005), 1095
Zeisel, H., H. Kalven, & B. Buchholtz, Delay in the Court 79 (1959), 1340
Zwiler & Reeves, The Search for Clarity in Federal Pleading Standards: Are We Close to Limiting the Intended (and Unintended) Consequences of Twombly and Iqbal?, 13 Sedona Conf.J. 135 (2012), 917

CHAPTER 1

A SURVEY OF THE CIVIL ACTION

This chapter provides a thematic and doctrinal framework for studying civil procedure. The materials examine how adversarial assumptions about party autonomy influence the design of judicial procedures. They also explore the ways in which adversarial decisionmaking differs from other methods of resolving disputes. Another theme we consider is that of federalism: the relation between the federal government and its national court system, and that of the states and their separate judicial systems. The materials then offer a nuts-and-bolts picture of a civil action, tracing a lawsuit from its commencement and the service of the summons to the entry of judgment and subsequent appeals. As you read these materials, keep in mind the historical context of your studies. Procedural doctrine dates back to medieval times, and its evolution reflects changes in social, economic, and political conditions. Likewise, changes in procedure have influenced public expectations about important concepts such as fairness, participation, and justice. The materials invite you to take a critical view of civil procedure and to ask how the rules and doctrine that you are studying can be improved.

A. THE CONCERN AND CHARACTER OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

Courts exist to provide a decision “by an agent of state power, [of] a controversy existing between two individuals (or the State and an individual), by rational (not merely personal) considerations, purporting to rest on justice and law (i.e. the community’s general sense of order).” Wigmore, The Judicial Function, in Science of Legal Method xxvi, xxviii (1917). Although this definition contains some question-begging elements that need definition themselves, it provides a starting point for understanding the United States judicial system. For now, it will suffice to recognize the following points about courts:

- (1)The judicial process deals with actual controversies between real parties and also helps to express abstract values for society.
- (2)Courts draw on public power to resolve controversies.
- (3)This resolution proceeds not arbitrarily but according to some standards of general application.

2

- (4)These standards are applied in a proceeding that follows some fixed lines set out by a system of rules known as procedure.

In resolving the legal disputes that are presented, courts apply two types of law—substantive and procedural. Other courses (such as Torts and Contracts) deal with the substantive rights and duties that regulate everyday relationships. This course, by contrast, will explore the procedures used by courts to resolve disputes about those substantive rights and duties. Our focus will be on how attorneys in the United States frame their cases in order to bring them properly before a particular court, and how the case proceeds from its commencement until a judgment is reached and enforced.

It is interesting but sometimes frustrating that the line separating the substantive law from the procedural law is not clear in every instance. Certainly a requirement that all papers filed with a particular court be on 8½ by 14-inch paper is a procedural rule. Equally certain is that the elements of the law of assault and battery are substantive. But not every legal rule can be so easily classified. For example, a statute of limitations (which determines the length of time a party has to sue on a claim) may appear at first glance to be purely procedural. But upon closer examination, it becomes clear that the length of a jurisdiction’s statute of limitations is as much a product of public policy, and will affect plaintiff’s ability to recover, as any purely “substantive” provision of the jurisdiction’s law. As a student of civil procedure, keep your eye on the substance-procedure dichotomy, but also remain wary of its rigid application.

This course deals with the procedural questions presented in civil suits; the aspects of criminal suits will not concern us. The principal difference between civil and criminal suits is that the former generally are initiated and litigated by private parties attempting to vindicate their legal rights vis-à-vis other private parties. The community thus is seeking to provide a method for resolving the disputes that arise out of private relations, which include commercial and personal interactions. Criminal suits are instituted and prosecuted by the government (on behalf of “the People”) in an effort to punish those individuals whose conduct has violated the community’s moral judgments as expressed in its penal law. Government involvement, however, is not always an indicator of a criminal suit since the government often is a party to civil suits (for example, when an agency brings an action to enforce regulations), and can be either a plaintiff or a defendant.

The most distinctive element of our procedure for resolving legal controversies is the adversary system. The central feature of this system is the almost total responsibility placed on the parties to the controversy for beginning suit, for shaping the issues, and for presenting evidence. The judge who presides over the proceeding is conceptualized as that of a passive umpire. By contrast, the courts in civil law countries employ what traditionally was known as an inquisitorial system, although that term has fallen out of use as obscuring, rather than clarifying, important features. Under this model, the court conducts an active and independent inquiry into the merits of each case, which may include having the judge question and examine witnesses, as well as order certain fact finding.

3

It has been argued that the trend in the United States is toward increasing the affirmative or active functions of the court. This is evidenced by the participation of the judge as an active case manager with respect to such matters as pretrial discovery and the settlement process. Nonetheless, primary responsibility for and control of almost all phases of the adversarial proceeding still remain with the parties.

Despite criticisms of the adversary system, this mode of decisionmaking continues to exist in many parts of the world. Four explanations typically are put forward to explain its perseverance:

- (1)A truer decision is reached as the result of a contest directed by interested parties.
- (2)The parties, who after all are the ones principally interested in the controversy’s resolution, should bear the major burden of the time and energy required.
- (3)Although impartial investigation may be better when no final decision need be reached, setting up sides makes easier the type of yes-or-no decision that is thought to be necessary in most lawsuits.
- (4)Since resort to law has replaced the resort to force that characterized primitive ages, the atavistic instinct to do battle is better satisfied by a means of settling disputes that is very much in the hands of the parties.

When one reflects on the fact that the adversary system often means that victory will turn on considerations other than the justice or true merits of the cause, there is reason to believe that we have permitted it to assume an exaggerated place in our civil dispute resolution scheme. But the system remains and its presence will color every facet of this course. Full understanding of the materials in this book will require your constant attention to its existence, as well as critical analysis of its shortcomings.

What is the test of a good system of procedure? One answer is: Does it tend to lead to the just and efficient determination of legal controversies? In this regard, recognize that although this course is only an introduction to United States civil procedure, do not assume that your function is to digest uncritically the law you read. Instead, this course will play an integral part in your process of learning to examine, to question, and “to wash in cynical acid” each rule, each form, and each principle you learn. While doing so, keep in mind that the values informing a system of procedure are many, diverse, and complex.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.What are the values that ought to guide a system of civil procedure? The passages that follow offer different views on this issue.

(a) Solum, Procedural Justice, 78 S.Calif.L.Rev. 181, 321 (2004).

The Participation Principle requires that the arrangements for the resolution of civil disputes be structured to provide each interested party with a right to adequate participation. The Accuracy Principle requires that the arrangements for the resolution of civil disputes be structured to maximize the chances of achieving the legally correct outcome in each proceeding. Together, the two principles provide guidance where guidance is needed, both for the architects of procedural design and reform and for judges who apply general procedural rules to particular cases.

(b) Michelman, The Supreme Court and Litigation Access Fees: The Right to Protect One’s Rights—Part I, 1973 Duke L.J. 1153, 1172–73 (footnotes omitted).

Dignity values reflect concern for the humiliation or loss of self-respect which a person might suffer if denied an opportunity to litigate. Participation values reflect an appreciation of litigation as one of the modes in which persons exert influence, or have their wills “counted,” in societal decisions they care about. Deterrence values recognize the instrumentality of litigation as a mechanism for influencing or constraining individual behavior in ways thought socially desirable. Effectuation values see litigation as an important means through which persons are enabled to get, or are given assurances of having, whatever we are pleased to regard as rightfully theirs.

(c)Posner, Economic Analysis of Law § 22.1 (9th ed. 2014).

The objective of a procedure system, viewed economically, is to minimize the sum of two types of cost. The first is the cost of erroneous judicial decisions. Suppose the expected cost of a particular type of accident is $100 and the cost to the potential injurer of avoiding it is $90 (the cost of avoidance by the victim, we will assume, is greater than $100). If the potential injurer is subject to either a negligence or a strict liability standard, he will avoid the accident—assuming the standard is administered accurately. But suppose that in 15 percent of the cases in which an accident occurs, the injurer can expect to avoid liability because of erroneous factual determinations by the procedural system. The expected cost of the accident to him will fall to $85, and since this is less than the cost of avoidance to him ($90), the accident will not be prevented. The result will be a net social loss of $10—or will it?

We must not ignore the cost of operating the procedural system. Suppose that to reduce the rate of erroneous failures to impose liability from 15 percent to below 10 percent that would require an additional investment in procedure of $20 per accident. Then we should tolerate the 15 percent of probability of error, because the cost of error ($10) is less than the cost necessary to eliminate it ($20).

The author goes on to ask, “What if the purpose of the substantive rule in question is not to improve efficiency? In what sense could we still speak of the goal of procedure as being the minimization of the sum of error and direct costs?” Id.

Is it clear that all of the values identified can be incorporated in a single procedural system? Will accommodation inevitably lead to tradeoffs? See Morrison, The Necessity of Tradeoffs in a Properly Functioning Civil Procedure System, 90 Or.L.Rev. 993 (2012). If there must be tradeoffs, how should they be determined and by whom? By the legislature? The parties? The courts? See Sward, Values, Ideology and the Evolution of the Adversary System, 64 Ind.L.J. 301, 303 (1988/1989). And should these tradeoffs be done on a case-by-case basis or through a formal process of rulemaking? See Mulligan & Staszewski, The Supreme Court’s Regulation of Civil Procedure: Lessons from Administrative Law, 59 UCLA L.Rev. 1188 (2012). What are the consequences of giving one value precedence over another?

2. Judicial decisionmaking often is said to serve two distinct but interrelated social goals. The first goal is that of conflict resolution—“in the interests of preserving the peace, society offers through the courts a mechanism for the impartial judgment of personal grievances, as an alternative to retaliation or forcible self-help.” The second goal is that of behavior modification—“courts and civil process [serve] as a way of altering behavior by imposing costs on a person. Not the resolution of the immediate dispute but its effect on the future conduct of others is the heart of the matter.” Scott, Two Models of the Civil Process, 27 Stan.L.Rev. 937, 937–38 (1975).

3. Studies show that a losing party’s acceptance of an unfavorable judgment often turns on a perception that the court reached its decision through a fair process. A leading commentary links the concept of fair process (sometimes called procedural fairness) with four principles: “voice,” or the opportunity to present one’s own side of a story; “neutrality,” or the decisionmaker’s lack of bias and adherence to rules; “respect,” or the system’s treatment of the participants as important and valued, regardless of their social or economic status; and “trust,” or the view that the court system is serving a public function and is committed to its mission. Tyler, Procedural Justice and the Courts, 44 Ct.Rev. 26, 28–31 (2007–2008); see Thibaut & Walker, A Theory of Procedure, 66 Calif.L.Rev. 541 (1978). Should the court’s process differ depending on the substantive law underlying the dispute? See

West, The Limits of Process, in Getting to the Rule of Law: Nomos L, 32–51 (Fleming ed. 2011).

4. In Avista Mgmt., Inc. v. Wausau Underwriters Ins. Co., 2006 WL 1562246 (M.D.Fla. 2006), the parties could not agree on where to hold a deposition and sought the court’s intervention. In response, the judge ordered the parties to meet on the front steps of the courthouse and to “engage in one (1) game of ‘rock, paper, scissors.’ ” The winner would select the deposition’s location, although the loser could appeal the outcome to the judge. Was it appropriate to use a children’s game to resolve the parties’ disagreement? What if the court had ordered the parties to draw lots? See Brown, Casting Lots: The Illusion of Justice and Accountability in Property Allocation, 53 Buff.L.Rev. 65 (2005).

5. Beginning in 2020, courts throughout the United States made dramatic changes in response to the COVID-19 pandemic. Among other things, “the ‘day in court’ ideal took on new meaning as litigants found themselves outside the public space of a brick-and-mortar courthouse and instead required to participate remotely in electronic proceedings.” Hershkoff & Miller, Courts and Civil Justice in the Time of COVID: Emerging Trends and Questions to Ask, 23 N.Y.U.J.Legis. & Pub.Pol’y 321, 411 (2021). What impact do such changes have on the procedural values discussed above? Although the pandemic made it especially imperative to deploy new technologies, technological advances have affected civil procedure in myriad ways independent of COVID’s public health emergency. See Engstrom & Gelbach, Legal Tech, Civil Procedure and the Future of Adversarialism, 169 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1001 (2021); Koh, The “Gants Principles” for Online Dispute Resolution: Realizing the Chief Justice’s Vision for Courts in the Cloud, 62 B.C.L.Rev. 2768 (2021).

B. AN OUTLINE OF THE PROCEDURE IN A CIVIL ACTION

Lawsuits do not begin by themselves. Someone must first decide to sue someone else. If this decision is made intelligently, the person choosing to sue must have weighed several matters, among which at least three are basic. These three considerations are first, whether legal relief is available; second, what the probability of winning a lawsuit is; and third, whether what would be won is worth the burden of litigating.

A potential litigant obviously feels aggrieved or would not be thinking of a lawsuit, but before litigating must first consider whether the grievance is one for which the law furnishes relief. There are a great many hurts a person may feel that the law will not redress. A home owner is offended by the paint on a neighbor’s house; a manufacturer has worked for weeks to persuade a distributor to buy a brand of software and sees the sale go to a competitor; a property owner has been holding a plot of ground for speculation, expecting industry to move in, and the area is zoned for residential use; a visitor slips on a spot of grease in the county courthouse but the county is immune from suit. A potential litigant often must consult an attorney before deciding whether there is a case to be litigated.

7

Even if the grievance is one for which the courts will grant relief, a potential litigant secondly must consider the probability of winning a lawsuit. The answer turns on a number of factors: whether the person who has caused the injury can be found and brought into court; whether witnesses and documents will be available to support the claims being sued on; whether this proof will be believed; whether the potential adversary can justify its conduct or establish any defenses to the action; and whether an accurate assessment of the law can be made ahead of time.

Thirdly, and perhaps most importantly of all, a potential litigant must consider whether what is won will be worth the time, the effort, and the expense that litigating it will cost. Most significantly, this includes the payment of fees to an attorney who provides representation in the case. In the United States, each litigating party typically bears the full costs of these attorney’s fees—this is called the American Rule. These fees are calculated in several ways: by time (at an hourly rate); fixed (the attorney sets the fee prior to providing the services); task-based (the attorney charges a fee based on the nature of the tasks provided to the client); or on contingency (the attorney is paid a portion of the ultimate judgment awarding money damages or settlement). By contrast, the more widely accepted “English Rule” requires the losing party to pay the attorney’s fees of the prevailing party. Congress has enacted “fee-shifting” statutes that require the losing party to pay the attorney’s fees of the prevailing party in certain kinds of cases, such as antitrust and civil rights, and many states have enacted similar provisions. The purpose of these statutes is to create incentives for individuals to initiate lawsuits in a role described as that of “private attorneys general.” See Maxeiner, Cost and Fee Allocation in Civil Procedure, 58 Am.J.Comp.L. 195, 201 (2010). A prospective litigant must weigh the costs of a lawsuit against other possibilities, among them settlement, arbitration, self-help, and letting matters rest. How easily will someone who lacks economic resources, and cannot retain counsel, be able to access judicial remedies through civil litigation? See Resnik, Lawyers’ Ethics Beyond the Vanishing Trial: Unrepresented Claimants, De Facto Aggregations, Arbitration Mandates, and Privatized Processes, 85 Fordham L.Rev. 1899, 1916–18 (2017) (noting that more than twenty-five percent of civil plaintiffs in federal court lack counsel at the trial level and more than fifty percent of federal civil appeals are filed without counsel); Steinberg, A Theory of Civil Problem-Solving Courts, 93 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1579, 1596 (2018) (“According to the National Center for State Courts, seventy-six percent of cases in the civil courts now involve an unrepresented party.”).

Further, attention must be given to the form that the relief will take. Most frequently it will be restricted to a judgment for damages. The potential litigant thus needs to consider whether the injury is one for which a monetary payment will be satisfactory. Assuming it is, will defendant be rich enough to pay? How difficult will a judgment be to collect? How expensive? Will the recovery be enough to pay the lawyer’s fees and the other litigation expenses that undoubtedly will be incurred? Even in a context in which the court may grant specific relief—for example, an order directing the opposing party to do something or to stop doing something—will compliance by defendant be possible? Worthwhile? Sufficient? In the same vein, a potential litigant must consider whether there are risks not directly tied to the suit. Will filing a lawsuit antagonize people whose goodwill plaintiff needs? Will the action publicize an error of judgment on plaintiff’s part or open private affairs to public gaze?

8

Only after considerable thought about the utility and expense of litigation will the prospective plaintiff be ready for the steps that must be taken to bring a lawsuit. Let us now consider these steps in the light of a relatively uncluttered hypothetical case:

Aikin, while crossing the street in front of her private home, was struck and seriously injured by an automobile driven by Beasley. On inquiry, Aikin found that the automobile was owned by Cecil and that Beasley apparently had been in Cecil’s employ. Beasley was predictably without substantial assets and a judgment against him for Aikin’s injuries promised little material compensation. But Cecil was wealthy, and Aikin was advised that if she could establish that Beasley had indeed been working for Cecil and had been negligent, she then could recover from Cecil. Aikin decided to sue Cecil for $500,000.

1.SELECTING A PROPER COURT

Aikin initially must determine in which court to bring the action. She might have some choice between filing her lawsuit in a state or a federal court, but her choice is not open-ended. This is because the court selected must have jurisdiction over the subject matter (that is, the constitution and statutes under which the court operates must have conferred upon it power to decide this type of case) and also must have jurisdiction over the person of Cecil (that is, Cecil must be subject or amenable to suit in the state in which the court is located so that a judgment may be entered against him).

Aikin probably will bring suit in a state court, for the subject-matter jurisdiction of the federal courts is limited. If the court organization of Aikin’s state is typical, there will be courts of original jurisdiction in which cases are brought and tried, and one court of appellate jurisdiction that sits, with rare exceptions, only to review the decisions of lower courts. (In most states, there also will be a group of intermediate courts of appellate jurisdiction.) The courts of original jurisdiction probably consist of one set of courts of general jurisdiction and several sets of courts of inferior jurisdiction. “General” in this sense refers to a court’s power to decide any type of dispute that comes before it, as distinguished from jurisdiction that is limited to specific kinds of disputes.

9

Typically, a state’s courts of general jurisdiction are organized into districts comprising one or more counties, or demarcated along other geographic lines. These district courts hear cases of many kinds and are competent to grant every kind of relief, but usually are authorized to hear claims for which the relief requested exceeds a statutorily fixed dollar amount. The courts of inferior jurisdiction can include municipal courts, which have jurisdiction resembling that of the district courts except that the claims are of smaller financial significance; justice-of-the-peace courts, which hear very minor matters; and specialized tribunals such as traffic courts. Since Aikin’s injuries are quite serious and her claim is correspondingly large, she will, if she sues in a state court, bring the action in one of the district courts.

The federal government also operates a system of courts. The principal federal courts are the United States District Courts, courts of original jurisdiction of which there is at least one in every state; the United States Courts of Appeals, each of which reviews the decisions of federal district courts in the several states within its circuit (with the exception of the Courts of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and the Federal Circuit); and the Supreme Court of the United States, which has discretionary authority to review the decisions of federal courts and decisions of state courts that involve an issue of federal law. At all these levels, federal judges are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and they have lifetime tenure pursuant to Article III of the Constitution. Congress has also authorized other kinds of judicial personnel—including United States Magistrate Judges and United States Bankruptcy Judges—who do not enjoy the protections of Article III.

The subject-matter jurisdiction of the United States District Courts extends to many, but by no means all, cases involving federal law, and also to many cases, similar to Aikin’s, that do not involve federal law; the latter are cases in which there is diversity of citizenship (the parties are citizens of different states or one of them is a citizen of a foreign country) and the required amount in controversy (currently more than $75,000) is at stake. Diversity jurisdiction, in common with jurisdiction to hear cases arising under federal law, is not exclusive to the courts of the federal system. Rather, the state courts also are competent to hear these cases and have concurrent jurisdiction with the United States District Courts unless Congress has made jurisdiction exclusive to the federal courts. If Cecil is not a citizen of Aikin’s state, Aikin may bring an action for $500,000 in a federal court even though it asserts only state law claims. Indeed, in these circumstances, if Aikin sued Cecil in a state court in Aikin’s home state,

10

Cecil could “remove” the action from the state court in which it was commenced to the federal district court in that state.^a

It is not enough for the court selected by Aikin to have jurisdiction over the subject matter. That court, whether state or federal, also must be one in which Cecil can be required to appear so that it is appropriate for the legal system to enter a judgment against him. Traditionally, a court could enter a judgment only against a defendant who resided in the state or was physically in the state, even if temporarily. However, constitutional restrictions on a court’s jurisdiction over the person have diminished in recent decades. If Cecil is not present in Aikin’s state but he directed Beasley to drive there, Aikin probably will be able to bring the action in that state because of Cecil’s prior contact with the state and the benefits that those contacts have brought him, assuming that a statute authorizes the court to exercise personal jurisdiction in these circumstances.

Not every court that has subject-matter jurisdiction and personal jurisdiction can hear the case. It also is necessary that an action be brought in a court having proper venue, which refers to where within the state or district the original proceeding is to be located. Thus, although every court in Aikin’s state could assert personal jurisdiction over Cecil if he was within its boundaries, that state’s statutes typically will provide that the case should be brought in a court in a particular district, such as the one that includes the county in which either Aikin or Cecil lives or where the relevant acts occurred. Similarly, if Aikin decides to sue in federal court based on diversity of citizenship, she must bring suit in a district that has venue as defined by federal statute (currently, the district in which Cecil resides, or in a district where a substantial part of the events giving rise to the claim occurred, or in a district where Cecil is subject to personal jurisdiction, if there is no district in which the action otherwise may be brought).

A defect in a court’s subject-matter jurisdiction cannot be waived by the parties. If Aikin and Cecil are both citizens of the same state, a federal court must refuse to hear the action even though both are anxious that it do so. By contrast, the requirements of personal jurisdiction and venue essentially are protections for defendant, who may waive them if he wishes.

2.COMMENCING THE ACTION

Aikin must give Cecil notice of the commencement of the action by service of process. The process typically consists of a summons, which directs defendant to appear and defend under penalty of default; that is, unless defendant answers the summons, a judgment will be entered against that party. Service refers to the delivery of the process. Service of process generally is achieved by personal service, meaning that the summons is physically delivered to defendant or is left at defendant’s home, sometimes by the plaintiff’s attorney or someone in the attorney’s office, sometimes by a private process-server hired for that purpose, and sometimes by a public official such as a sheriff or a United States marshal. If Cecil lives in another state, but the circumstances are such that a court in Aikin’s state may assert personal jurisdiction over Cecil, the summons may be personally delivered to him out of state, or some form of substituted service, such as sending the papers by registered mail or delivering the summons to Cecil’s agent within Aikin’s state, may be employed. Even if Cecil cannot be located, service in yet another form, usually by publication in a newspaper for a certain length of time, may be allowed, although the validity of this kind of service in the type of case Aikin is bringing against Cecil is unlikely to be upheld. The Supreme Court repeatedly has emphasized that service must be of a kind reasonably calculated to bring the action to defendant’s notice.

11

3.PLEADING AND PARTIES

With the summons, Aikin usually will serve on Cecil the first of the pleadings, commonly called the complaint. This is a written statement that will contain Aikin’s claim against Cecil. What should be required of such a statement? Obviously, it may vary from a simple assertion that Cecil owes her $500,000, to a second-by-second narration of the accident, closely describing the scene and the conduct of each party, followed by a gruesome recital of Aikin’s medical treatment and her prognosis for recovery. No procedural system insists upon either of these extremes, but systems do vary greatly in the detail required in the pleadings. The degree of detail required largely reflects the purposes that the pleadings are expected to serve. Three objectives are particularly relevant, and to the extent that a procedural system regards one rather than another as crucial, we may expect to find differing amounts of detail required.

First, the system may desire the pleadings to furnish a basis for identifying and separating the legal and factual contentions involved so that the legal issues—and hopefully through them the entire case—may be disposed of at an early stage. Thus, suppose that Cecil’s liability for Beasley’s driving depends upon the degree of independence with which Beasley was working at the time of the accident. A dispute on this issue might exist on either or both of two elements. The parties might disagree as to what Beasley’s duties were, and they might disagree as to whether those duties put Beasley so much under the control of Cecil that the law will impose liability on Cecil for Beasley’s actions. The first disagreement would be a question of fact, and there may be no alternative to trying the suit and letting the finder of fact (usually the jury) decide the truth. But if there was agreement on that first element, a question of law may be presented by the second issue, which could be determined by the judge without a trial. The court can resolve such legal questions at the pleading stage only if Aikin’s complaint sets forth what Beasley’s job required him to do. That objective could not be accomplished if Aikin’s complaint states only that “Beasley was driving the car on Cecil’s business.”

12

Second, the pleadings may be intended to establish in advance what a party proposes to prove at trial so that the opponent will know the factual contentions and prepare to meet them. If this objective is regarded as very important it will not be enough for the complaint to state that Beasley was negligent, or that Aikin suffered serious bodily injuries. It must be more specific and say that Beasley was speeding, or was not keeping a proper look-out, or had inadequate brakes, or describe some other act of negligence and say that Aikin suffered a concussion, or a broken neck, or fractures of three ribs, or other injuries.

Third, the pleadings may be intended to give each party only a general notice of the opponent's contentions, in which event the system would rely upon subsequent stages of the lawsuit to identify the legal and factual contentions of the parties and to enable each to prepare to meet the opponent's case. If notice is the goal, then in a suit involving a car accident, it would be sufficient for the pleading to state the date and place of the incident; to describe the incident generally (for example, "defendant negligently drove a car into plaintiff"); and, to allege injury and a demand for relief.

It seems that each of the first two objectives is desirable. It is a waste of everybody's time to try lawsuits when the underlying legal claim is inadequate to support a judgment, and it is only fair that a person called upon to defend a judicial proceeding should know what defendant is alleged to have done. But to achieve the first objective fully may require pleading after pleading in order to expose and sharpen the issues; if detail is insisted upon, a long time may be consumed in producing it. Moreover, a single pleading oversight may eliminate a contention necessary to one party's case that easily could have been proven, but that will be held to have been waived. To achieve the second objective through the pleadings will mean that the parties must take rigid positions as to their factual contentions at the very beginning of the case when they may not know what they will learn by the time trial begins. It also assumes that plaintiff knows most if not all of the important facts pertinent to the claim at the time of filing the complaint, which is not always the case or even possible. Either the first or second objective, if fully pursued, requires that the parties adhere to the positions taken in the pleadings. They could not be permitted to introduce evidence in conflict with the pleadings or to change them. To the extent that variances between pleading and proof or amendments to the pleadings are permitted, the objectives will be lost. The court frequently will find itself forced either to depart from these objectives or to tolerate lawsuits turning on the skill of the lawyers rather than on the merits of the controversy.

13

The third objective, insofar as it allows the parties to use the later stages of the lawsuit to identify and flesh out the issues in the case, avoids the problems created by trying to decide the case based only on the pleadings. However, simple notice pleading potentially may be used to harass defendant when plaintiff has no real claim. More often, though, plaintiff will use notice pleading to subject defendant to pretrial discovery (discussed more fully below), and in the process, to reveal information so that plaintiff can determine whether a bona fide claim actually exists. Lawyers often refer to such use of the pleadings as a "fishing expedition" or as a "springboard into litigation." However, if defendant controls access to the information that plaintiff needs to establish the claim, discovery may be essential for a meritorious complaint to be drafted and to avoid dismissal. One way that courts have dealt with these problems is to sanction parties and lawyers who bring baseless claims.

4.THE RESPONSE

Following the service of Aikin's complaint, Cecil must respond. He may challenge the complaint by a motion to dismiss. This motion may challenge the court's jurisdiction over the subject matter or Cecil's person, the service of process, or venue. It also may be a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim or cause of action (the older term for this motion is a demurrer). For the purpose of this motion, the facts alleged in the complaint are accepted as true, and the court considers whether, on this assumption, plaintiff has shown that she is entitled to legal relief.

There are three general situations in which such a motion might be granted. First, the complaint may clearly show that the injury is one for which the law furnishes no redress (for example, when plaintiff simply alleges that "defendant has made faces at me"). Second, plaintiff may have failed to include an allegation necessary to a part of the case (for example, Aikin might have alleged the accident, her injuries, and Beasley's negligence, and have forgotten to allege that Beasley was Cecil's servant). Third, the complaint may be so general or confusing that the court finds that it does not give adequate notice of what plaintiff's claim is (for example, a complaint in which Aikin merely alleged, "Cecil injured me and owes me $500,000," although complaints far more specific have fallen on this ground). The extent to which motions to dismiss will be granted on the second and third grounds will vary with the degree of detail that the particular system requires of its pleadings. A court generally has power to allow plaintiff an opportunity to amend the pleading to cure certain kinds of defects.

14

If the motion to dismiss is denied, or if none is made, Cecil must file an answer. In this pleading, he must admit or deny Aikin's factual allegations in the complaint. Moreover, if Cecil wishes to rely on certain legal contentions called affirmative defenses, he must plead them in the answer. Thus, if he wishes to contend that Aikin was negligent in the manner in which she tried to cross the street and that this negligence was also a cause of the accident, he must in many states plead this in the answer; if the answer only denied the allegations in Aikin's complaint, Cecil may not advance at trial the contention that Aikin's negligence caused the accident.

There may be further pleadings, particularly a reply by Aikin. But the tendency today is to close the pleadings after the answer, and if Cecil has raised new matters in his answer, they automatically are taken as denied by Aikin. There is one major exception: if Cecil has a claim against Aikin, particularly one that arises out of the same occurrence being sued upon by Aikin, Cecil may plead this claim as a counterclaim as part of the answer. This is in essence a complaint by Cecil, and Aikin will have to respond to it just as Cecil had to respond to the original complaint.

The original action between Aikin and Cecil may expand in terms of the number of parties, and this frequently will occur at the pleading stage. For example, although Aikin decided not to sue Beasley, Cecil might implead Beasley, asking that Beasley be held liable to him for whatever amount he may be found liable to Aikin, since his liability depends upon Beasley having been at fault. Cecil will decide whether to do this in light of a number of practical concerns, including the effect Beasley's presence will have on the jury in Aikin's suit against Cecil.

5.OBTAINING INFORMATION PRIOR TO TRIAL

Pretrial discovery is the procedure currently designed to allow the parties to exchange information about their claims and defenses and to prepare for trial. At earlier periods, the pleadings served this purpose. Currently, the federal system requires the parties, without a court order or a request from the opponent, to exchange certain types of information. The parties also then may initiate requests for information from the opponent and, in some situations, from persons who are not parties to the litigation. One method is to take depositions of parties and witnesses. In this procedure, the person whose deposition is to be taken is questioned by lawyers for each side through direct and cross-examination; the deponent's statements are taken down and transcribed. The device is useful in finding information that is relevant to the case, including unearthing leads as to other witnesses or documents; it also is useful in laying a basis for impeaching a witness who attempts to change his or her story at trial. The two parties almost certainly will want depositions taken of each other, as well as of Beasley; the depositions of Aikin and Cecil will be particularly important because they are treated as admissions and can be used by their adversaries as evidence at trial. In some circumstances, even the deposition of a nonparty witness who will be unavailable at trial may be used in place of live testimony.

15

Another device especially adapted to probing the content of an opponent's case is the written interrogatory, which usually may be addressed only to a party to the suit. (The availability of interrogatories may be one reason Aikin might wish to join Beasley as a defendant with Cecil or Cecil might wish to implead Beasley.) These interrogatories are answered by the party, presumably with counsel's aid, and the answers will not be as spontaneous as they would be on a deposition; on the other hand, interrogatories will require Cecil to supply some information that he does not carry in his head but can obtain, and may be even more valuable than the deposition in finding out what he will try to prove. Thus, information regarding Beasley's employment that Cecil cannot be expected to remember may best be exposed in this way.

Other discovery devices include requests for production of documents, such as the service record of Cecil's automobile, and requests for admissions, which will remove uncontested issues from the case. A particularly useful device for Cecil will be a court order directing Aikin to submit to a physical examination by a physician of Cecil's choice to determine the real extent of Aikin's alleged injuries.

The availability of discovery enables the parties to prepare for trial better than the pleadings ever did. Moreover, if a legal system permits broad discovery, the role of the pleadings will change. In particular, it may be senseless to make parties take rigid positions with respect to the issues at the very beginning of the lawsuit before they have had the chance to utilize these very useful devices for obtaining information. In addition, the availability of discovery does much to make summary judgment, which is discussed below, a viable and fair procedure, since it enables a party to ascertain those issues on which the opposing party has no evidence, while giving the opponent a chance to develop such evidence. On the other hand, if the costs of discovery are excessive, a defendant may be motivated to settle a lawsuit that satisfies a weak pleading standard yet would lack sufficient proof to prevail at trial.

6.SUMMARY JUDGMENT

One of the basic difficulties with attempting to resolve cases at the pleading stage is that the allegations of the parties must be accepted as true for the purpose of ruling on a motion to dismiss. Thus, if plaintiff tells a highly unlikely but plausible story in the complaint, the court cannot dismiss the action even though it does not believe the allegations or think that plaintiff will be able to prove the tale. The pleading stage is not the time to resolve questions of fact.

16

However, in some cases it will be possible to provide additional material to show that an apparently decisive issue is spurious and that the case may therefore be decided without a trial. This is done by a motion for summary judgment. This motion can be supported by demonstrating that the crucial issue must be resolved in the movant's favor, because the opposing party will be unable to produce sufficient admissible evidence to create a genuine dispute regarding that issue. For example, suppose that it is Cecil's position that prior to the accident he had fired Beasley, but that Beasley had secretly acquired keys to Cecil's automobile and taken the car without permission shortly before the accident. On the face of the pleadings, we have only an allegation that Beasley was Cecil's employee and a denial of that allegation; thus, the pleadings seem to present a question of credibility that cannot be resolved at this stage. Cecil now moves for summary judgment, alleging that this issue is not a genuine one. He accompanies his motion with affidavits of his own and two other witnesses that he had fired Beasley; a deposition of the garage attendant indicating that he had been instructed not to allow Beasley to have the car, and that it was taken without Cecil's knowledge; and a deposition of Beasley to the effect that he had been fired, but wanted to use the car once more for his own purposes. It is now incumbent upon Aikin to show that the issue is genuine; Aikin cannot rely simply upon her own assertion that all this is not so; after all, she has no personal knowledge of the facts. Aikin must convince the court that she can present admissible evidence at trial that Beasley still was acting as Cecil's employee in driving the car at the time of the accident. If Aikin fails to do so, summary judgment will be entered against her.

It should be noted that in ruling on a summary judgment motion, the judge does not decide which side is telling the truth. If Aikin presents an affidavit of a witness who claims to have been present when Cecil allegedly fired Beasley, and says that Cecil told Beasley that this was only a subterfuge and that he wanted him to continue to work for him but to pretend to steal the car, summary judgment will not be appropriate even though the judge is firmly convinced that Aikin's affiant is lying.

7.SETTING THE CASE FOR TRIAL

After discovery is completed, and if the case has not been terminated by dismissal, summary judgment, or settlement, it must be set for trial. Most cases already will have been disposed of prior to trial. If Aikin's lawsuit has not yet been resolved, typically either party may file a note of issue, at which time the case will be given a number and placed on a trial calendar. These calendars have become extremely long in many courts, and the case may have to wait a year, three years, or more before it is called for trial, especially if a jury trial has been requested.

17

8.THE JURY AND ITS SELECTION

In most actions for damages, the parties have a right to have the facts tried by a jury. This right is assured in the federal courts by the Seventh Amendment to the United States Constitution, and is protected in the courts of most states by similar state constitutional provisions. If there is a right to a trial by jury, either party may assert it, but if neither wishes to do so, a judge will try the facts as well as the law. Largely for historical reasons growing out of a division of authority in the English court structure, there are many civil actions in which neither party has a right to a jury trial; these include most cases in which plaintiff wants an order directing or prohibiting specific action by defendant rather than a judgment for damages—a so-called equitable remedy.

If a jury has been demanded, the first order of business at trial will be to impanel the jurors. A large number of people, selected in an impartial manner from various lists, tax rolls, or street directories, will have been ordered to report to the courthouse for jury duty at a given term of court. The prospective jurors will be questioned—usually by the judge but sometimes by the lawyers—as to their possible biases. If one of the persons called has prior knowledge of the case or is a personal friend of one of the parties, he or she probably will be successfully challenged for cause and excused. But suppose Aikin is an architect and her lawyer finds that one of the jury panel has recently constructed a house and believes that he was greatly overcharged for its design and construction; this will likely not be enough to persuade the judge to excuse him. However, fearing the juror might be prejudiced against her client, Aikin's lawyer probably will exercise one of the small number of peremptory challenges allowed for which no reason need be given. Ultimately, a panel of between six and 12 hopefully unbiased jurors will be selected.

9.THE TRIAL

After the jurors have been sworn, plaintiff's lawyer will make an opening statement, describing for the jury what the case is about, what contentions will be made, and how plaintiff plans to prove them. Defendant's lawyer also may make an opening statement at this time, but may reserve the right to do so until later when it is time to present defendant's case. Following the opening statement, plaintiff's lawyer calls her witnesses one by one. Each witness is first questioned by the lawyer who has called that witness—this is the direct examination; then the lawyer for the other side has the opportunity to cross-examine the same witness; this may be followed by re-direct and re-cross examination, and even further stages. The judge maintains some control over the length and tenor of the examination, and in particular will see to it that the stages beyond cross-examination are not prolonged.

18

Just as the primary responsibility for introducing evidence is on the lawyers, so too is the responsibility for objecting to evidence that is thought to be inadmissible under the rules of evidence. Suppose that Aikin's lawyer asks: "What happened while you were lying on the ground after the accident?" To which Aikin replies: "The driver of the car came over and said that he had been going too fast and he was sorry." Aikin's answer is objectionable because it contains hearsay evidence; that is, it repeats what someone else has said for the purpose of proving the truth of what was said. It is up to Cecil's counsel to object, and then the judge must rule on the objection. This particular issue is not an easy one, for Aikin's answer may well come within one of the exceptions to the rule excluding hearsay evidence. This kind of issue will recur continually throughout the trial and the judge must be prepared to make instantaneous rulings if the trial is to proceed with dispatch. Evidentiary rulings form a major source of the errors raised on appeal, but at the same time appellate courts are very reluctant to disturb the trial judge's ruling on the point. If the judge rules that Aikin's answer is inadmissible, the judge will instruct the jury to disregard the testimony. Can a juror who has heard such an important confession totally put it to the side?

Documents, pictures, and other tangible items may be put into evidence, but unless their admissibility has been stipulated to in advance, they will be introduced through witnesses. For example, if Aikin's lawyer has had pictures taken of the accident scene and wishes to get them to the jury, she will call the photographer as a witness, have him testify that he took pictures of the scene, and then show them to the photographer who will identify them as the pictures he took. At this point they may be formally introduced into evidence.

When plaintiff’s lawyer has called all of her witnesses and their examinations are over, plaintiff will rest. At this point, defendant’s lawyer may ask for a directed verdict (in federal practice now called a judgment as a matter of law) for defendant on the ground that plaintiff has not established a prima facie case. The thrust of the motion is that plaintiff has not introduced enough evidence to permit the jury to find in plaintiff’s favor. If the motion is denied, defendant may rest and choose to rely on the jury’s agreeing with him, but in almost all cases he will proceed to present witnesses of his own and these witnesses will be exposed to the same process of direct and cross-examination. When defendant has rested, plaintiff may present additional evidence to meet any new matter raised by defendant’s witnesses. In turn, defendant, after plaintiff rests, may meet any new matter presented by plaintiff. This procedure will continue until both parties rest. Again, the trial judge will maintain considerable control to prevent the protraction of these latter stages.

When both parties have rested, either or both may move for a directed verdict, asking the trial judge to rule that under the evidence presented, viewed most favorably to the nonmoving party, there is no basis for a reasonable jury to find for that party with respect to that issue. If these motions are denied, the case must be submitted to the jury.

10.SUBMITTING THE CASE TO THE JURY

At this stage the judge and the lawyers will confer out of the jury’s hearing with regard to the content of the judge’s instructions or charge to the jury. Each lawyer may submit proposed instructions, which the trial judge will grant or deny, but the judge is under a duty to charge the jury on the basic aspects of the case in any event. If a party’s lawyer has neither requested a particular instruction nor objected to the judge’s charge, a later argument that the charge was erroneous generally will not be upheld on appeal.

Ordinarily, the lawyers will make their final arguments to the jury before the judge delivers the charge. The lawyers will review the evidence from their own points of view, and may suggest how the jury should weigh certain items and resolve specific issues, but it is improper for the lawyers to discuss a matter that has been excluded or has never been introduced. In other words, they are arguing, not testifying.

In the instructions the judge will summarize the facts and issues, tell the jury about the substantive law to be applied on each issue, give general information on determining the credibility of witnesses, and state who has the burden of persuasion on each issue of fact. The burden of persuasion in a civil case ordinarily requires that one party prove its contention on a given issue by a preponderance of the evidence. On most issues, Aikin will carry this burden, but on an affirmative defense such as contributory negligence, the burden probably will be on Cecil. The burden means that if a juror is unable to resolve an issue, then a finding on that issue should be made against the party who has the burden. In the federal courts and in some states, the judge may comment on the evidence, as it is clear that the judge’s opinions are not binding on the jurors. However, judicial comment is rare, and in many states it is not permitted at all.

Following the charge, the jury retires to reach its decision, called a verdict. The verdict will be of a type chosen by the judge. There are three types, of which by far the most common is the general verdict. This verdict permits the jurors to determine the facts and apply the law on which they have been charged to those facts; it is simple in form in that only the conclusion as to who prevails, and the amount of damages, if that party is a claimant, is stated. A second type is the general verdict with interrogatories, which combines the form of the general verdict with several key questions that are designed to test the jury’s understanding of the issues. Suppose that the accident occurred five miles away from Beasley’s appointed route. Aikin’s evidence is that Beasley detoured to have the vehicle’s brakes fixed; Cecil’s is that Beasley was going to visit his friend. The judge might charge the jury that in the former event, but not in the latter, Beasley was acting within the scope of his employment and Cecil would be liable for his negligence, and she might direct the jury, in addition to rendering a verdict for Aikin or for Cecil, to answer the question, “Why did Beasley depart from his route?” If the general verdict was for Aikin, but the jury’s answer was that Beasley was driving to his friend’s home, the judge would order judgment for Cecil, for if the answer is inconsistent with the verdict, the answer controls. The third type of verdict is the special verdict, in which all of the factual issues in the case are submitted to the jury as questions without instructions as to their legal effect; the judge applies the law to the jury’s answers and determines which party prevails.

Traditionally, only a unanimous jury verdict has been effective. However, in many states, and by consent of the parties in the federal courts, a nonunanimous verdict by the jurors may stand in a civil action. If the minimum number of jurors required for a verdict cannot reach agreement, the jury is said to be hung, and a new trial before a different jury is necessary.

11.POST-TRIAL MOTIONS

After the jury has returned its verdict, judgment will be entered thereon, but the losing party will have an opportunity to make certain post-trial motions. There may be a motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict (commonly called a motion for a judgment n.o.v., from the Latin non obstante veredicto, but in federal practice now called a renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law). This motion raises the same question as a motion for a directed verdict. The losing party also may move for a new trial; the grounds for this motion are many, and may include assertions that the judge erred in admitting (or excluding) certain evidence, that the charge was defective, that attorneys, parties, or jurors have been guilty of misconduct, that the damages awarded are excessive, or that the jury’s verdict is against the clear weight of the evidence. Should these motions fail, it is sometimes possible to reopen a judgment, even several months after the trial, on the grounds of clerical mistake, newly discovered evidence, or fraud, but the occasions on which such relief is granted are very rare.

12.THE JUDGMENT AND ITS ENFORCEMENT

The judgment is the final determination of the lawsuit, absent an appeal. Judgment may be rendered by default when defendant does not appear; or following the granting of a demurrer, a motion to dismiss, or a motion for summary judgment; or based on a settlement agreement of the parties; or upon the jury’s verdict, or the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the trial judge in a non-jury case. The judgment may be in the form of an award of money to plaintiff, a declaration of rights between the parties, specific recovery of property, or an order requiring or prohibiting some future activity. When defendant has prevailed, the judgment generally will not be “for” anything or order anything; it simply will provide that plaintiff takes nothing by her complaint.

21

In most cases a judgment for plaintiff will not order defendant to do anything; typically it will simply state that plaintiff shall recover a sum of money from defendant. This does not necessarily mean that defendant will pay. It is up to plaintiff to collect the money. Execution is the common method of forcing the losing party to satisfy a money judgment, if the loser does not do so voluntarily. A writ of execution is issued by the court commanding an officer—usually the sheriff—to seize property of the losing party and, if necessary, to sell it publicly and use the proceeds to satisfy plaintiff’s judgment.

When plaintiff’s recovery takes the form of an injunction requiring defendant to do something or to stop doing something, the judgment (in this context typically called a decree) is said to operate against defendant’s person (in personam). Its sanction is direct, and if defendant fails to obey, he may be held in contempt of court and punished by fine or imprisonment.

Costs provided by statute and certain out-of-pocket disbursements are awarded to the prevailing party and included in the judgment. Usually these costs are nominal in relation to the total expense of litigation and include only such items as the clerk’s fee and witnesses’ mileage. As previously mentioned, in the United States, attorney’s fees are not recoverable as costs in ordinary litigation.

13.APPEAL

Every judicial system provides for review of a trial court’s decisions by an appellate court. Generally a party has the right to appeal any judgment to at least one higher court. When the system contains two levels of appellate courts, appeal usually lies initially to one of the intermediate courts; review at the highest level is only at the discretion of that court except in certain classes of cases. Under current practice in the federal courts, district court decisions are reviewed by the appropriate court of appeals, but review in the Supreme Court generally is discretionary and sought by a petition for a writ of certiorari (in a few cases, a direct appeal lies from the district court to the Supreme Court). The discretion of a higher-level appellate court generally is exercised so that only cases with legal issues of broad importance are taken.

22

The record on appeal will contain the pleadings, at least a portion of the transcript of the trial (the court reporter’s verbatim record of the trial), and the orders and rulings relevant to the appeal. The parties present their contentions to the appellate court by written briefs. The appellate court will often hear oral argument as well, although many courts have increased their frequency of deciding appeals without oral argument—especially in certain categories of cases. The appellate court may review any ruling of law by the trial judge, although frequently it will limit the scope of its review by holding that particular matters were within the trial judge’s discretion or that the error, if any, was not prejudicial, that is, it did not substantially affect the outcome of the case. There are constitutional limits to the review of a jury’s verdict, but even when these limits do not apply—for example, when the judge has tried the case without a jury—it is unusual for an appellate court to re-examine a question of fact, because a cold record does not convey the nuances of what the trier observed, notably the demeanor of the witnesses.

The appellate court has the power to affirm, reverse, or modify the judgment of the trial court. If it reverses, it may order that judgment be entered or it may remand the case to the trial court for a new trial or other proceedings not inconsistent with its decision. The decision of an appellate court usually is accompanied by a written opinion, signed by one of the judges hearing the appeal; there is always more than one judge deciding an appeal. Concurring and dissenting opinions also may be filed. The opinions of a court are designed to set forth the reasons for a decision and to furnish guidance to lower courts, lawyers, and the public.

Keep in mind an important distinction between the reviewability of a particular ruling of a trial judge and its appealability. For example, a trial judge’s ruling excluding certain evidence at trial as hearsay is reviewable; that is, when the judgment is appealed, that ruling may be assigned as error and the appellate court will consider whether it was correct. But trial would become excessively protracted if an appeal could be taken from every ruling at the time it is made. Thus, appeals lie only from judgments and from certain orders made in the course of litigation when immediate review is deemed so important that a delay in the action during appeal can be tolerated. Judicial systems differ in the extent to which interlocutory orders can be appealed. In the federal system, very little other than a final judgment can be taken to the courts of appeals; however, in some state systems, many kinds of interlocutory orders can be appealed before a final judgment is entered.

A good example of the contrast between the two approaches can be seen by looking at the consequences of an order denying a motion to dismiss. Suppose that Cecil moves to dismiss Aikin’s complaint on the ground that even on Aikin’s view of the facts, Cecil is not responsible for the conduct of Beasley, and this motion is denied. In the federal courts such an order would not be appealable since it does not terminate the lawsuit. Indeed, the disposition of the motion means that the action will continue. In some states, however, this question could be taken immediately to a higher court for a ruling, while the other stages of the litigation wait.

The question of which system is better is not easy to answer. One may argue in favor of the federal practice that everything should be done at one level before going to the next, that too much time is taken in waiting for appellate courts to decide these questions serially, and that no appeal may ever be necessary, since Cecil may prevail anyway. But on the other hand, if the appellate court holds at this early stage that Aikin has no claim against Cecil, the time necessary for discovery and trial will be saved.

One point worth noting is that the resolution of the question of the appealability of interlocutory orders has an important bearing on the procedural developments within a given system. In the case of motions to dismiss, for example, if denials are not appealable, much of the law on this subject will be made in the trial courts. A trial judge who is in doubt may tend to deny such motions rather than to grant them, and the decision generally will not be disturbed. Although the ruling theoretically is reviewable after final judgment, by that time the significance of the ruling on the pleadings may have been displaced by more substantive questions, as well as by the development of a more robust evidentiary record through discovery and, perhaps, trial. When grants of motions to dismiss are immediately appealable, but denials are not, the appellate precedent will involve a skewed set of cases—those where the complaint was so weak that the trial judge believed dismissal was warranted.

Alternatively, if the denial is appealable, a tactical consideration is added and such motions will be resorted to more frequently, inasmuch as they will afford defendant an additional opportunity to delay trial and thus to wear down the opponent. With respect to other procedural rulings—as in the discovery area—the absence of an interlocutory appeal will strengthen the hand of the trial judge, who will in fact if not in theory exercise a wider range of discretion because fewer rulings will come before the appellate courts and when they do they will be enmeshed in a final judgment, making it easier to conclude that any error was not prejudicial.

14.THE CONCLUSIVENESS OF JUDGMENTS

Generally, a judgment becomes final after the appeal and whatever further proceedings may take place, or, if no appeal is taken, when the time for appeal expires. With very rare exceptions, the judgment cannot be challenged in another proceeding. It is res judicata, a thing decided, and now the matter is at rest. The concept of res judicata includes claim preclusion and issue preclusion, the latter traditionally known as collateral estoppel. Defining the scope and effect of this finality principle is one of the most complex tasks in the entire law of procedure.

C. A NOTE ON MOTION PRACTICE

Throughout the previous section, we frequently have used the term “motion,” and for good reason. A motion is the procedural device by which a litigant asks a court for an order. For example, a request for an order dismissing a complaint for failure to state a claim, a request for an order granting summary judgment, and a request for an order granting a new trial all are formally made to a court through a motion.

The usual practice is that a motion must be made in writing. Two exceptions to this rule are when the court is recording a hearing verbatim or when a trial is taking place. A motion generally must state with particularity the reasons or grounds supporting the request and the relief sought. The written motion also must appear in a proper form, which typically is determined by local court rules.

The litigant must serve the motion on the opposing party. In addition, a notice of hearing regarding the motion, a brief or memorandum of law in support of the motion, a proposed order, and, if necessary, affidavits, generally accompany a motion, but not all courts require the movant to submit a proposed order and only certain motions require affidavits. Briefs usually have a maximum page limit.

All motions in federal court require the signature of the litigant’s attorney or the litigant. The signature attests that the attorney or litigant has read the motion papers and that the motion has sufficient grounds and is made in good faith. Sanctions may be imposed if, for example, the papers are submitted for impermissible purposes or without a reasonable investigation into the supporting facts and law.

A party served with a motion may respond and usually must do so within a time period specified by the rules. A party also may move for an extension of time, either to make a cross-motion, to extend the time to respond to the motion, or both. In addition, making a motion may defer the next stage of litigation. Finally, making a particular motion may preserve other legal rights.

Motion practice involves the parties’ strategic choices given the interrelationship among motions, their intended effects, their secondary effects, and their effects on the opposing party. A motion such as summary judgment is usually designed to win the lawsuit. A successful motion to exclude certain material from discovery may convince an adversary that information cannot be obtained that is needed to establish essential contentions and induce the party to end the lawsuit early without an unfavorable judgment. A motion to bring a third party into the lawsuit may help convince an adversary that the lawsuit will be more time consuming and costly than expected. A lawyer deciding to make a motion must consider carefully whether benefits will accrue to the movant and whether obstacles will be imposed on the adversary as a result of the motion.

Making a motion may have negative aspects. One of the drawbacks may be the time and expense of the motion, including drafting and serving multiple copies of papers, spending hours preparing the brief in support of the motion, and taking resources from other more fruitful pursuits. Repeated, unsuccessful motions will result in expense and delay that may reduce client satisfaction.

In addition, poor motion practice may leave the judge with the impression that the lawyer is sloppy, shoddy, and disorganized. Arguing motions at a hearing that the attorneys could have settled without a hearing may convince the judge that the movant is contentious by nature. In short, an unwise making of a motion may do more harm in the long run than not making the motion at all, even if the motion is granted.

Motion practice is a central part of a litigator’s arsenal. When a particular motion can be made, how it must be made, and what its effect will be are questions that can be answered by studying the applicable procedural rules. Whether a motion should be made and how it can affect the course of the lawsuit are matters of judgment and experience.

D. A NOTE ON REMEDIES

The remedies that may be obtained in a modern civil action should principally be viewed as a part of the substantive law: contract law, tort law, commercial law, labor law, and so forth. Yet because the goal of a lawsuit is the remedy and the means of securing it are procedural, there necessarily is a close relationship between them. For example, the range of available remedies in a case may be limited by the manner in which plaintiff has pleaded, and certain procedural aspects of the case, such as whether it is tried to a judge or a jury, may be determined by the remedy that is being sought; again, whether a person may be joined as a party may depend on the relief that is being sought, and conversely certain remedies may be available only if all interested persons can be joined.

Without question, the most important relationship between procedure and remedies grows out of the existence in English law of two great branches of jurisprudence administered in different courts: common law and equity; the latter was envisioned as complementary to the former. There are two special facts about equity that are important for our purpose. First, already alluded to, it had no jury. Second, the injunction was a creature of equity and remained in its sole custody so long as the two branches remained distinct.

From this heritage, two consequences of immense significance for the law of procedure result. One, whether a party has a right to a trial by jury in the federal courts often has been determined by inquiring whether the matter in question was a subject of a legal or equitable cognizance in 1791—the date of the adoption of the Seventh Amendment to the United States Constitution. To some extent this question depends on the remedy sought, since the availability of injunctive relief was one form of equity’s jurisdiction. Two, just as equity was regarded as a special legal system to be resorted to only when the common law was inadequate, so too the injunction and most forms of specific relief are regarded as exceptional, to be ordered only when the ordinary remedy of money damages is inadequate.

The most important types of relief that a court may award in a civil action fall into three categories: declarative, specific, and damages. Declaratory relief encompasses a court’s defining the rights and duties of the parties in a particular legal context. Suppose a company believes that an agreement it has entered into is not a valid contract and that it is under no obligation to perform it. However, the company is reluctant to act on this belief in the face of another’s insistence that it perform because if the contract is enforceable, the damages for the nonperformance will be great. In these circumstances, the company may seek a declaratory judgment asking the court to determine whether it is under a duty to perform. This type of relief is not as common as those discussed below and its availability often is limited by statute. In numerous situations, however, it is invaluable.

Specific relief generally consists of an order directing conduct. Defendant may be commanded to return a jewel taken from plaintiff, to stop operating a pig farm in a residential neighborhood, to deliver a car that was contracted for sale, or to refrain from opening a barbershop next door to a person to whom defendant sold a former barbershop. An order for such relief is often called an injunction. Specific relief is not possible in all cases. For example, no kind of injunction will compensate or cure Aikin in our hypothetical case; Beasley cannot retroactively be ordered not to run into her. On the other hand, a person who has contracted to sell a house or a piece of land ordinarily will be ordered to perform the agreement, for the law regards each bit of real property as unique. But beyond the real property context, specific relief will be given only if damages would be inadequate. Thus, if you order a special garment (such as a tuxedo or an evening gown) from a tailor who fails to perform the promise to deliver it, it is unlikely that any remedy except damages will be forthcoming. The reasons for this are not purely historical. There is a burden on the court in ordering and supervising the performance of a decree of specific performance that is avoided if a simple judgment for money damages is entered. Moreover, specific performance might impose a hardship or at least an indignity on defendant not commensurate with the advantage to be gained by receiving this tailor's garment rather than one from another tailor. But it may well be asked whether our courts today are not being too reluctant to grant the form of relief that will most adequately redress plaintiff's grievance.

A damages remedy calls for a judgment that defendant pay plaintiff a certain sum of money. Keep in mind that when we speak of the court ordering that compensation be paid, we are speaking of one form of relief, but the amount of damages can be computed in accordance with many measures. In your action against the tailor, for example, if you had struck a good bargain, you might claim the difference between the price you agreed to pay and the value the special garment would have had if the tailor had performed the promise; or you might claim only the money you had advanced as a down payment; or you might claim the amount you paid for opera tickets you were unable to use without having the special garment to wear at the event. The difference in amount that could be collected under these theories might be very substantial. In some circumstances, the law authorizes awards of punitive damages, which are designed to punish defendants or to deter more forcefully certain kinds of behavior.

There is a final point to be considered in evaluating the adequacy of any judicial remedy: How much of it will be consumed by the cost of litigation? As we have noted, the costs awarded to a successful plaintiff will not, in most cases, reimburse the fees incurred for legal representation or other substantial costs of a suit, such as the expense of investigation or the fees of expert witnesses. It is not possible to give any meaningful figure for the cost of an average trial, but it can be assumed that as the stakes rise the fees will be correspondingly higher.

In most personal injury and in many other types of damage actions, plaintiff's cost of recovery must be computed differently because the attorney will be litigating the case under a contingent-fee agreement; that is, the attorney will receive a percentage—one-third is common—of plaintiff's judgment. Thus, in a real sense, an adequate legal remedy is not one that simply compensates plaintiff for a loss but rather one that covers both the loss and the cost of recovering it. This distinction has not been ignored by many triers of fact. Indeed, it has been suggested that if damages for pain and suffering ever are abolished, defendants should be required explicitly to pay the legal fees of a plaintiff who prevails.

E. A NOTE ON PROCEDURAL RULES IN THE FEDERAL AND STATE COURTS

Federal and state rules of procedure derive from constitutional authority, statutes, and judicial decisions. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure owe their genesis to the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2072, enacted in 1934, which vests power in the Supreme Court to promulgate rules of procedure for the District Courts and to combine law and equity into one civil action. The Federal Rules became effective on September 16, 1938. See Burbank, The Rules Enabling Act of 1934, 130 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1015 (1982). Since then, the rules have undergone amendment, but certain core features persist.

An important hallmark of the Federal Rules is their applicability to all causes of action no matter how complex or simple—a feature referred to as “transsubstantivity.” See Carrington, Making Rules to Dispose of Manifestly Unfounded Assertions: An Exorcism of the Bogy of Non-Trans-Substantive Rules of Civil Procedure, 137 U.Pa.L.Rev. 2067 (1989). Some commentators question whether it is practical or even desirable to use the same procedural rules in lawsuits as different as a large antitrust action is from a simple contract dispute. See Cover, For James Wm. Moore: Some Reflections on a Reading of the Rules, 84 Yale L.J. 718, 732, 739–40 (1975). On the other hand, transsubstantivity reflects a principle of equality that is critical to procedural justice.

The Federal Rules generally do not bind state judicial systems. States have their own processes for adopting procedural rules, with one of two models typically predominating within a state. In one model, the state constitution grants exclusive rulemaking power to the state judiciary; in the other, state courts exercise inherent rulemaking authority but share this authority with the legislature. For a collection of state constitutional provisions as they bear on state rulemaking, see Main, Reconsidering Procedural Conformity Statutes, 35 W.St.U.L.Rev. 75, 84–85 (2007).

Currently no state's rules of procedure completely track those of the federal, although some come close. However, the divergence between state and federal procedural rules appears to be growing, largely because state systems that earlier had modeled their procedures on those of the federal system are declining to change their rules when the Federal Rules are amended. See Subrin & Main, Braking the Rules: Why State Courts Should Not Replicate Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 67 Case W.Res.L.Rev. 501 (2016).

F. ILLUSTRATIVE CASES

The cases that follow have been selected to illustrate many of the basic concepts, doctrines, and devices about which you have just read in the order discussed in the preceding text. Three factors have dominated the choice of the cases. First, each focuses on a specific issue that is typical of a range of problems involving a particular principle and at the same time throws some light on the policies that underlie the principle itself. Second, none of the cases is a “sitting duck”; in each instance strong reasons can be advanced for and against the court's result. Third, each case arises in a context that you can understand and presents an issue about which you should be able to form an opinion, however hesitant it may be. Another purpose of these cases is to help you develop a familiarity with procedural language and a feeling for procedural problems. You must, of course, consider the cases from the perspective of the courts that decided them, seeking to understand their rulings and the reasons that support them. However, also consider the other options that the court had, and think through the consequences of those possibilities. For the full pedagogical objectives of these cases to be achieved, regard each case as a practical lawyer’s problem—or rather a problem presenting difficulties and opportunities to opposing counsel. Inquire why the parties acted as they did and what else they might have done. Finally, consider the position in which the decision leaves the parties and what, if anything, they should do.

1.THE AUTHORITY OF THE COURT TO PROCEED WITH THE ACTION

Plaintiff, having decided to sue, must determine the court in which to bring the action. As discussed above, a court must be chosen that has both subject-matter jurisdiction and personal jurisdiction. In the following case, a lawsuit filed in federal court, consider which of these two types of jurisdiction the Supreme Court is addressing. In reading the case, notice that the word “jurisdiction” is used without a modifier. But, from the context and information given above, you should be able to identify the kind of jurisdiction involved.

CAPRON V. VAN NOORDEN
Supreme Court of the United States, 1804.
6 U.S. \(2 Cranch\) 126, 2 L.Ed. 229.

Error to the [United States] Circuit Court of North Carolina. The proceedings stated Van Noorden to be late of Pitt county, but did not allege Capron, the plaintiff, to be an alien, nor a citizen of any state, nor the place of his residence.

Upon the general issue, in an action of trespass on the case, a verdict was found for the defendant, Van Noorden, upon which judgment was rendered.

The writ of Error was sued out by Capron, the plaintiff below, who assigned for error, among other things, first, “That the circuit court aforesaid is a court of limited jurisdiction, and that by the record aforesaid it doth not appear, as it ought to have done, that either the said George Capron, or the said Hadrianus Van Noorden, was an alien at the time of the commencement of said suit, or at any other time, or that one of the said parties was at that or any other time, a citizen of the state of North Carolina where the suit was brought, and the other a citizen of another state; or that they the said George and Hadrianus were for any cause whatever, persons within the jurisdiction of the said court, and capable of suing and being sued there.”

And secondly, “that by the record aforesaid it manifestly appeareth that the said Circuit Court had not any jurisdiction of the cause aforesaid, nor ought to have held plea thereof, or given judgment therein, but ought to have dismissed the same, whereas the said Court hath proceeded to final judgment therein.”

Harper, for the plaintiff in error, stated the only question to be whether the plaintiff had a right to assign for error, the want of jurisdiction in that court to which he had chosen to resort.

It is true, as a general rule, that a man cannot reverse a judgment for error in process or delay, unless he can shew that the error was to his disadvantage; but it is also a rule, that he may reverse a judgment for an error of the Court, even though it be for his advantage. As if a verdict be found for the debt, damages, and costs; and the judgment be only for the debt and damages, the defendant may assign for error that the judgment was not also for costs, although the error is for his advantage.

Here it was the duty of the Court to see that they had jurisdiction, for the consent of parties could not give it.

It is therefore an error of the Court, and the plaintiff has a right to take advantage of it. * * *

The defendant in error did not appear, but the citation having been duly served, the judgment was reversed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.The Supreme Court regarded the defect in this case as extremely serious. Does the fact that it was plaintiff who sought review in the Supreme Court make this particularly clear? Did the defect in Capron concern subject-matter jurisdiction or personal jurisdiction? Why is such significance attached to this error?
- 2.Read Article III, § 2 of the United States Constitution, which is set out in the Supplement. What specific language in that Section is pertinent to the Supreme Court’s opinion in Capron?
- 3.In what court was the Capron suit commenced? Under the First Judiciary Act of 1789, Congress established two levels of courts below the Supreme Court: the district courts and the circuit courts. The circuit courts exercised both original and appellate jurisdiction, and had original jurisdiction over diversity cases when the amount in controversy exceeded $500.
- 4.The Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the lower court. What was the effect of this reversal? Does it mean that Capron won the lawsuit? If not, why had he sought review in the appellate court?

Unlike the federal courts, state courts of general jurisdiction have subject-matter jurisdiction over a very broad spectrum of lawsuits. Indeed, questions of the competence of those courts to decide a particular kind of case rarely arise. However, before any court may proceed, it also must have personal jurisdiction—that is, the power to require defendant to appear in the action. In the next case, the court must decide whether it has that power, and whether it will exercise it.

TICKLE V. BARTON

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, 1956.
142 W.Va. 188, 95 S.E.2d 427.

HAYMOND, JUDGE.

The plaintiff, Richard Tickle, an infant, who sues by his next friend, instituted this action of trespass on the case in the Circuit Court of McDowell County in March, 1955, to recover damages from the defendants, Raymond Barton, a resident of Austinville, Virginia, and Lawrence Coleman, for personal injuries inflicted upon him by a motor vehicle, owned by the defendant Raymond Barton and operated by his agent the defendant Lawrence Coleman, on private property instead of a public highway, in that county which the plaintiff alleges were caused by the negligence of the defendants.

* * * [A first attempt to serve Barton had been made under a statute relating to actions by or against nonresident drivers involved in accidents on a public highway, and the validity of this service was still undecided at the time the instant decision was rendered.]

On December 5, 1955, one of the attorneys for the plaintiff caused an alias process to be issued against the defendants * * * and delivered it to a deputy sheriff for service upon the defendant Barton in McDowell County; and in the evening of December 6, 1955, that process was served by the deputy upon the defendant Barton in person at the War Junior High School in the town of War in that county where he appeared to attend a banquet which was held there at that time.

By his amended plea in abatement * * *, the defendant Barton challenged the validity of the service of the alias process upon him on the ground that he had been induced to come to that place in McDowell County by trickery, artifice and deceit practiced upon him by the attorney for the plaintiff.

The circuit court overruled the demurrer of the plaintiff to the amended plea in abatement and * * * certified its ruling upon the demurrer to this Court on the joint application of the plaintiff and the defendant Barton.

* * * [T]he amended plea in abatement alleges in substance that after procuring alias process for the purpose of causing it to be served upon the defendant Barton in McDowell County, and inducing him to come to the Junior High School in the town of War in that county, an attorney representing the plaintiff in this action, in the evening of December 5, 1955, called by telephone the defendant Barton at his home in Austinville, Virginia, and wrongfully and deceitfully represented that, in behalf of the sponsors of a banquet honoring a championship high school football team to be held at the Junior High School in the town of War, in McDowell County * * *, he extended an invitation to the defendant Barton, whose son had been a member of an earlier football team of that school, to attend the banquet; that during that telephone conversation between them the attorney, though requested to do so by the defendant Barton, did not disclose his identity except to say that he called him in behalf of the sponsors to extend the defendant Barton a special invitation to attend the banquet; that the defendant Barton before being so invited did not know that the banquet would be held and did not intend to attend it; that he did not know or suspect the identity of the attorney, or realize that the telephone call was a trick or device to entice, induce and inveigle him to come into McDowell County to be served with process in this action; that the attorney was not connected with any of the sponsors of the banquet and was not authorized by them to invite the defendant Barton to attend it; that the attorney called the defendant Barton and invited him to the banquet solely for the purpose of tricking, deceiving and inveigling him to come to the town of War in order to obtain personal service * * * upon him * * *; that the defendant Barton, believing that the invitation was extended in good faith, by a person authorized to extend it, and not suspecting the real purpose of the telephone call, accepted the invitation and informed the attorney that he would be present at the banquet and on December 6, 1955, left Austinville, Virginia, and went to the town of War with the intention of attending it; that, when he entered the high school where the banquet was held * * * he was served by the deputy sheriff with the alias process * * *; that the service of the alias process upon the defendant Barton, having been procured by trickery, deceit and subterfuge which was not realized or suspected by him, is, for that reason, null and void and of no force or effect and does not confer upon the Circuit Court of McDowell County jurisdiction of the person of the defendant Barton in this action.

The amended plea in abatement also alleges, on information and belief, that after the defendant Barton had left his home * * * the attorney for the plaintiff * * * made a telephone call to the residence of the defendant Barton, or caused some other person to make such call, and inquired of the wife of the defendant Barton if he intended to attend the banquet and was informed by her that he had left his home to attend it and was then on his way to the town of War for that purpose.

The amended plea in abatement further avers that after the defendant Barton had been served with the alias process his attorney inquired of the attorney for the plaintiff if he had made either of the two telephone calls or had procured some person to make the second telephone call and that the attorney for the plaintiff denied that he had made, or procured any person to make, either of the foregoing telephone calls, and denied that he had any knowledge whatsoever of either of them.

The question certified to this Court for decision is whether the allegations of the amended plea in abatement, which insofar as they are material and are well pleaded must be considered as true upon demurrer, are sufficient to render invalid the personal service of process upon the defendant Barton in McDowell County because his presence in that county at the time of such service of process was induced or procured by trickery, artifice, or deceit practiced upon him by an attorney representing the plaintiff in this action.

The precise question presented by the certificate of the circuit court has not been determined in any prior decision of this Court. It has, however, been discussed in authoritative texts and treatises and considered and determined by appellate courts in other jurisdictions.

* * * In 42 Am.Jur., Process, Section 35, the general principle is stated thus: "Personal service of process, if procured by fraud, trickery, or artifice is not sufficient to give a court jurisdiction over the person thus served, and service will be set aside upon proper application. Relief is accorded in such cases not because, by reason of the fraud, the court did not get jurisdiction of the person of the defendant by the service, but on the ground that the court will not exercise its jurisdiction in favor of one who has obtained service of his summons by unlawful means. Thus, if a person resident outside the jurisdiction of the court and the reach of its process is inveigled, enticed, or induced, by any false representation, deceitful contrivance, or wrongful device for which the plaintiff is responsible, to come within the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of obtaining service of process on him in an action brought against him in such court, process served upon him through such improper means is invalid, and upon proof of such fact the court will, on motion, set it aside." * * *

The foregoing principle applies to the party when such service is procured by his agent or by someone acting for and in his behalf. * * *

In Economy Electric Company v. Automatic Electric Power and Light Plant, 185 N.C. 534, 118 S.E. 3, the court, discussing service of process by fraudulent means, used this language: "Where service of process is procured by fraud, that fact may be shown, and, if shown seasonably, the court will refuse to exercise its jurisdiction and turn the plaintiff out of court. The law will not lend its sanction or support to an act, otherwise lawful, which is accomplished by unlawful means. * * * Such a fraud is one affecting the court itself and the integrity of its process. * * * The objection, strictly, is not that the court is without jurisdiction, but that it ought not, by reason of the alleged fraud, to take or to hold jurisdiction of the action. * * *

* * *

This Court approves and adopts the view supported by the above cited text, treatise and case authorities, which appears to be generally recognized as the law, and accordingly holds that when a person who resides outside the jurisdiction of a court and, for that reason, is beyond the reach of its process, is inveigled, enticed, or induced by fraud, trickery, artifice or wrongful device for which a party is responsible, by virtue of the action of his attorney or of any other person for and in his behalf, to come within the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of enabling such party to obtain service of process upon such nonresident person in an action brought against him in such court, service of process which results from such fraud, trickery, artifice or wrongful device, is invalid and does not justify the exercise of jurisdiction by such court over the person so served with process; and upon proof that service of process has been so obtained, it will be vacated and set aside.

Under the material allegations of the amended plea in abatement which, as already indicated, must be considered as true upon demurrer, the defendant Barton was induced or enticed to come into McDowell County by the unauthorized invitation extended to him by the attorney for the plaintiff whose purpose at the time was to obtain personal service upon the defendant Barton * * *; the defendant Barton knew that the present action against him was pending in the circuit court by reason of the service of the original process upon him * * * but he did not suspect or realize that he would be served with process while present in McDowell County to attend the banquet; he was induced to come into that county by the invitation to the banquet; and he would not have come into that jurisdiction if the attorney for the plaintiff had disclosed his identity and his real purpose in extending the invitation, all of which he concealed from the defendant Barton.

* * *

The amended plea in abatement is sufficient on demurrer and the action of the circuit court in overruling the demurrer was correct.

It should perhaps be emphasized that, as the factual allegations of the amended plea in abatement have not been denied at this stage of this action by any pleading filed by the plaintiff, the question of the truth or the falsity of those allegations is not before this Court * * *.

Ruling affirmed.

GIVEN, JUDGE (dissenting).

My disagreement with the majority is not as to the rule of law laid down. I think the rule a salutary one, and masterfully stated. I do not believe, however, that the facts properly pleaded, and the inferences which may be rationally drawn therefrom, bring the facts of this case within the influence of the rule.

Stripped of all explanatory language, and of many allegations of conclusions of fact, * * * the plea in abatement charges no more than that the attorney, by telephone, inquired at defendant’s home whether defendant intended to attend a certain social function to be held in McDowell County, to which defendant was then invited by the attorney; that the attorney, though requested to give his name, did not do so; that the attorney later, or someone for him, again by telephone, inquired whether defendant had decided to attend the social function, and was advised that defendant had made arrangements to attend; and that the attorney caused process to be served on defendant while attending the social function. * * * The principal, if not only, fact of wrongdoing, if wrongdoing, alleged against the attorney was his failure to inform defendant of the identity of the telephone caller. * * * It seems to me that the facts properly alleged can not be held to establish fraud or wrongdoing. At most, they would simply show that the attorney took advantage of an opportunity, the holding of the social function in McDowell County and the interest of defendant’s son in the holding of the function, to try to obtain proper service of process, which was no more than a duty owed his client. In considering the questions arising, it should be kept in mind that defendant had full knowledge of the institution of the action against him in McDowell County, of the fact that he had questioned the validity of the service of other process issued in that action, and of the fact that the alleged cause of action arose in McDowell County, where ordinarily it would have been triable.

* * *

An examination of the cases cited by the majority discloses that, though they fully support the rule laid down, not one of them, in my opinion, requires, or even permits, the application of the rule in a case wherein the facts are comparable, in effect, with the facts alleged in the plea involved in the instant case. The majority opinion points out no such case, and I find none. * * *

* * *

Being of the views indicated, I respectfully dissent. I am authorized to say that Judge RILEY joins in this dissent.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Did the appellate court in this case decide that West Virginia courts did not have personal jurisdiction over defendant (assuming defendant’s story as true), or that those courts should not exercise jurisdiction in these circumstances even though they had it?
2. When should a court be able to demand that a person appear before it and defend an action? In what circumstances should this demand be permitted against a person who is not a resident of the state in which the court is located? Why should a nonresident be subject to suit if he is served with process within the state? Insofar as these reasons are concerned, should it make any difference why he is present in the state?
3. In thinking about the cases you read, try to consider how the court might approach the problem if certain facts were different. For example, should service in West Virginia in the following situations be treated the same as under the facts alleged in the principal case?
 - (a) Tickle had asked Barton to appear as a witness in a suit against a third party involved in the accident.
 - (b) Tickle had asked Barton to come to West Virginia to discuss settling the case.
 - (c) Tickle had telephoned Barton and falsely told him that his son lay critically injured in a West Virginia hospital.
 - (d) Tickle (like the Sheriff of Nottingham) had scheduled a football banquet in West Virginia that he knew Barton (like Robin Hood) would be unable to resist attending, although he did not personally invite him.
4. When the case is reconsidered by the West Virginia Circuit Court on remand, Barton’s lawyer must prove his allegations if Barton is to avoid trial in West Virginia. What problems do you foresee in his being able to prove them, and how should he proceed to do so?

2. DEFINING AND DETERMINING THE CASE BEFORE TRIAL

At this point, it will be helpful to reread the part of the Outline of a Civil Action that deals with pleading, especially the portion that discusses the “three general situations” in which a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim might be granted. See pp. 10–13, supra. Is the court in the following case saying that plaintiff has not properly pleaded the case or that plaintiff has no case at all?

CASE V. STATE FARM MUTUAL AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE CO.

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, 1961.
294 F.2d 676.

CAMERON, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Appellant Case filed this action against the three insurance companies named as appellees for damages growing out of the termination of his representation of the three Companies as local agent. He charged in his complaint that he was appointed agent by a written contract attached as an exhibit to his complaint, which he charged, and the parties agree, constituted him an independent contractor for all purposes and provided that he was not required to “devote all of his working time to any one of the Companies;” that he represented the three Companies “through the years 1954, 1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958, and up until March 28, 1959,” on which date the appellees “began to and did meddle and interfere with the plaintiff’s work as agent of (the three Companies) in disregard of the agreement between the defendants and the plaintiff.”¹

Properly construed in connection with the remaining allegations of the complaint,² appellant stated nothing in his pleading except an action based upon what he conceived to be the malicious and wrongful cancellation of the written contract between him and appellees, and on that alone. So construed, every word in the complaint related to the alleged wrongful termination of the written contract between the parties. That writing gave either party the right to terminate it with or without cause, and the charges in the complaint relating to meddling and interference make sense only when construed in the light of the allegations that the appellees expressed the purpose not to continue the contractual relationship with appellant unless he would agree to abjure the seeking and holding of the public office of county supervisor. Their efforts to induce him to follow the course which alone would permit the continuation of that contractual relationship related manifestly to the termination which finally took place. The contract gave the appellees the right to cancellation “with or without cause,” and in terminating it the appellees acted entirely within their rights.

Appellant argues the case as if it were one in tort for interference with his civil rights. The allegations of the pleadings do not support such an argument. * * *

It is clear also that the complaint does not set forth an independent claim for damages based upon meddling and interference by appellees with appellant’s performance of the contract. Appellant invokes the oft repeated statement of the courts that a complaint should not be dismissed if it charges facts upon which a court could possibly grant relief. * * * What the courts have said does not mean that it is the duty of the trial court or the appellate court to create a claim which appellant has not spelled out in his pleading.

The court below was faced with a complaint and a motion to dismiss. Its duty was to judge the complaint by the language used in it. The only damages claimed by the appellant were those based entirely upon his claim that the written contract was wrongfully terminated, and the language concerning the meddling and interference is reasonably construed as referring to appellees’ indication to appellant that he would have to give up his quest of public office if he desired to retain his contractual relationship with appellees. We are called upon here merely to test whether the court below erred in interpreting the meaning of language which was, viewed as a whole, clear and unambiguous. We do not think that it did.

If appellant had desired to pursue a charge that appellees had wrongfully interfered with the running of his business in violation of the terms of the written contract, it would have been quite simple for him to file an amended complaint. Doubtless the court below would have permitted this even after the order of dismissal had been granted. But aside from that, appellant had an absolute right to amend his complaint once, no responsive pleading having been filed. * * *

It is apparent that the complaint charged that appellees did nothing more than to exercise the right of termination given them by the explicit terms of the contract exhibited with appellant’s complaint. * * * This being true, and since appellant claims no damages whatever except such as would flow from the wrongful termination of the contract, we think the court below correctly granted the motion to dismiss. Its judgment is Affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.Can you identify the different claims that Case alleged in his complaint?
- 2.Which of the objectives of pleading discussed in the Outline of a Civil Action, see pp. 10–13, supra, were most significantly involved in this case?
- 3.Suppose a valid legal theory did exist that would have entitled Case to some relief, but that Case neglected to invoke it in his pleading. Would the court have been justified in dismissing the complaint on the principle that “it is [not] the duty of the trial court or the appellate court to create a claim which appellant has not spelled out in his pleading”? Would dismissal be appropriate if the complaint “charges facts upon which a court could possibly grant relief”? See p. 38 supra. Wouldn’t dismissal in that circumstance simply punish Case for his lawyer’s sloppy pleading?
- 4.What was the effect of the dismissal in Case? Should plaintiff have been permitted to amend the complaint and start again? Could plaintiff interpose a new and slightly altered complaint that would survive another motion to dismiss?
- 5.Suppose that after the motion to dismiss had been granted Case discovered a letter agreement dated after the contract and signed by all of the parties stipulating that the insurance agency agreement could be terminated only for “good cause.” Should he be able to amend his complaint and sue again in federal court? In state court?

Disputes often involve more than two people. Procedural rules allow parties to join multiple parties and multiple claims in one lawsuit. Joinder may promote efficiency and sometimes also may be essential for fairness. The following case explores whether all those who are interested in a controversy must always be made parties to a single lawsuit.

TEMPLE V. SYNTHES CORP.
Supreme Court of the United States, 1990.
498 U.S. 5, 111 S.Ct. 315, 112 L.Ed.2d 263.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

PER CURIAM.

Petitioner Temple, a Mississippi resident, underwent surgery in October 1986 in which a “plate and screw device” was implanted in his lower spine. The device was manufactured by respondent Synthes, Ltd. (U.S.A.) (Synthes), a Pennsylvania corporation. Dr. S. Henry LaRocca performed the surgery at St. Charles General Hospital in New Orleans, Louisiana. Following surgery, the device’s screws broke off inside Temple’s back.

Temple filed suit against Synthes in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana. The suit, which rested on diversity jurisdiction, alleged defective design and manufacture of the device. At the same time, Temple filed a state administrative proceeding against Dr. LaRocca and the hospital for malpractice and negligence. At the conclusion of the administrative proceeding, Temple filed suit against the doctor and the hospital in Louisiana state court.

Synthes did not attempt to bring the doctor and the hospital into the federal action by means of a third-party complaint, as provided in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 14(a). Instead, Synthes filed a motion to dismiss Temple’s federal suit for failure to join necessary parties pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19. Following a hearing, the District Court ordered Temple to join the doctor and the hospital as defendants within twenty days or risk dismissal of the lawsuit. According to the court, the most significant reason for requiring joinder was the interest of judicial economy. The court relied on this Court’s decision in Provident Tradesmens Bank & Trust Co. v. Patterson, 390 U.S. 102, 88 S.Ct. 733, 19 L.Ed.2d 936 (1968), wherein we recognized that one focus of Rule 19 is “the interest of the courts and the public in complete, consistent, and efficient settlement of controversies.” When Temple failed to join the doctor and the hospital, the court dismissed the suit with prejudice.

Temple appealed, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed. The court deemed it “obviously prejudicial to the defendants to have the separate litigations being carried on,” because Synthes’ defense might be that the plate was not defective but that the doctor and the hospital were negligent, while the doctor and hospital, on the other hand, might claim that they were not negligent but that the plate was defective. The Court of Appeals found that the claims overlapped and that the District Court therefore had not abused its discretion in ordering joinder under Rule 19. * * *

* * * Temple contends that it was error to label joint tortfeasors as indispensable parties under Rule 19(b) and to dismiss the lawsuit with prejudice for failure to join those parties.^b We agree. Synthes does not deny that it, the doctor, and the hospital are potential joint tortfeasors. It has long been the rule that it is not necessary for all joint tortfeasors to be named as defendants in a single lawsuit. * * * The Advisory Committee Notes to Rule 19(a) explicitly state that “a tortfeasor with the usual ‘joint-and-several’ liability is merely a permissive party to an action against another with like liability.” * * * There is nothing in Louisiana tort law to the contrary. * * *

* * *

* * * [N]o inquiry under Rule 19(b) is necessary, because the threshold requirements of Rule 19(a) have not been satisfied. As potential joint tortfeasors with Synthes, Dr. LaRocca and the hospital were merely permissive parties. The Court of Appeals erred by failing to hold that the District Court abused its discretion in ordering them joined as defendants and in dismissing the action when Temple failed to comply with the court’s order. For these reasons, we grant the petition for certiorari, reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why do you think Temple did not name Dr. LaRocca and the hospital as defendants in his federal suit? Why would Temple seek to duplicate his time and effort by litigating a suit in federal court at the same time that he is litigating one in state court with respect to precisely the same injury?
2. Although the Supreme Court failed to specify the citizenship of Dr. LaRocca and the hospital, they were in fact citizens of Louisiana, and so all plaintiffs were citizens of states different from those of the three defendants. See Temple v. Synthes Corp., 130 F.R.D. 68, 69 n.1 (E.D.La. 1989). Does this information change your answers to the questions in Note 1, above?
3. What do you make of the Fifth Circuit’s concern with the potential for inconsistent judgments? Does the Supreme Court find that this concern is not warranted? Or does it find that there are other more important considerations? If so, what are they?
4. When this case returns to the District Court, could the court order Synthes to file a third-party complaint against the doctor and the hospital under Federal Rule 14(a)? Should a court ever have the power to order that parties be added to a lawsuit? Why?

5. Suppose that both Temple and Synthes do not want the doctor and the hospital to be added as parties and the court does not order that they be added. Could the doctor and the hospital join the federal suit of their own accord? See Federal Rule 24. Should Temple and/or Synthes be able to stop them from intervening?

The purposes of discovery are many. The most important are obtaining evidence for one's own case and identifying weaknesses in the opposition's. The party seeking discovery usually is asking about something of which he is ignorant or uncertain, but sometimes he seeks information about a matter within his own knowledge. In reading the next case, consider why plaintiff is so determined to obtain the evidence and why defendant is equally determined that he shall not have it.

DiMICHEL v. SOUTH BUFFALO RY. CO.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1992.
80 N.Y.2d 184, 590 N.Y.S.2d 1, 604 N.E.2d 63.

WACHTLER, CHIEF JUDGE.

* * * [W]e consider whether surveillance films prepared by a defendant in a personal injury action are discoverable by the plaintiff before trial. * * * The Appellate Division held * * * that the defendants would be obligated to disclose only those tapes which they planned to use at trial. Under the facts present here, we find this balance to be an appropriate one. Accordingly, * * * we affirm. * * *

Plaintiff Anthony DiMichel commenced this action against South Buffalo Railway Company (South Buffalo) in Supreme Court, Erie County, by service of summons and complaint dated January 16, 1986. Plaintiff alleged that on June 6, 1984, while employed by South Buffalo, he sustained injuries in a fall. DiMichel charged South Buffalo with violations of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the Safety Appliance Act and the Boiler Inspection Act and asked for $500,000 in damages.

In the course of pretrial discovery, plaintiff asked for disclosure of all videotapes or surveillance films that defendant may have taken of plaintiff. Without conceding that it in fact possessed surveillance materials, South Buffalo contended that any such material was not discoverable. Plaintiff then moved to compel disclosure. * * * [T]he motion to compel disclosure was granted and defendant was ordered "to turn over to plaintiff for inspection and copying any and all videotapes and/or surveillance films of the plaintiff," but stayed this order pending appeal to the Appellate Division. The Appellate Division modified, * * * holding that the defendant was obligated to turn over those surveillance materials it intended to use at trial, and that the defendant would be precluded from using any surveillance material it did not supply to plaintiff within 60 days of its order. * * *

* * * [W]e now turn to the unique problems posed by surveillance films. Personal injury defendants secure surveillance materials in order to verify the extent of a plaintiff's purported injuries and introduce them because they are powerful and immediate images that cast doubt upon the plaintiff's claims. And indeed, if accurate and authentic, a surveillance film that undercuts a plaintiff's claims of injury may be devastatingly probative. At the same time, however, film and videotape are extraordinarily manipulable media. Artful splicing and deceptive lighting are but two ways that an image can be skewed and perception altered. As one court has noted, "[t]he camera may be an instrument of deception. It can be misused. Distances may be minimized or exaggerated. Lighting, focal lengths, and camera angles all make a difference. Action may be slowed down or speeded up. The editing and splicing of films may change the chronology of events. An emergency situation may be made to appear commonplace. That which has occurred once, can be described as an example of an event which recurs frequently. * * * Thus, that which purports to be a means to reach the truth may be distorted, misleading and false" (Snead v. American Export-Isbrandtsen Lines, 59 F.R.D. 148, 150 [(E.D.Pa.1973)]).

Thus, while an accurate surveillance film may indeed prove to be a bombshell, the possibility of inaccuracy, given the nature of the medium, is very real. In resolving the question now before us, then, it is important to note that New York has long favored open and far-reaching pre-trial discovery. To a large extent, New York's open disclosure policy was intended to mark an end to the presentation of totally unexpected evidence and to substitute honesty and forthrightness for gamesmanship. * * *

* * *

This is clearly an issue that has fragmented the four departments of the Appellate Division. * * * [T]he First Department would treat surveillance films as discoverable in their entirety * * * [as] party statements. The Second Department followed the lead of the Fourth Department in [this case] by treating surveillance films as material prepared for litigation and by holding that substantial need and undue hardship inhered in the nature of the films themselves. Finally, the Third Department, while also treating these films as material prepared for litigation, held that such films were discoverable only upon a showing of substantial need and undue hardship.

Having considered the different approaches, we agree with the Second, Third and Fourth Departments that surveillance films should be treated as material prepared in anticipation of litigation, and as such, are subject to a qualified privilege that can be overcome only by a factual showing of substantial need and undue hardship.

That the plaintiffs * * * have a substantial need to view surveillance films before trial is manifest. Because films are so easily altered, there is a very real danger that deceptive tapes, inadequately authenticated, could contaminate the trial process. The question that remains, therefore, is whether plaintiffs confronted with surveillance films for the first time at trial would have an adequate opportunity to ascertain the films' accuracy and authenticity. * * * Authentication of surveillance films can be a slow and painstaking process, and because of the potentially devastating effects of such evidence, it would be improper to curtail a plaintiff's efforts to do so. Thus, a plaintiff, confronted with a surveillance film at trial, would certainly be entitled to a continuance to examine the video evidence. Indeed, it would appear to be well within the discretion of a Trial Judge, under certain circumstances, to give plaintiff an extended continuance in order to retain an expert who could ascertain the authenticity of proffered video evidence. Thus, if defendants were allowed to withhold surveillance evidence until trial, personal injury trials could be routinely disrupted and delayed.

Further, a plaintiff confronted with altered video evidence for the first time at trial would likely be prejudiced by the apparent weight and authority of such evidence. Even if after careful examination plaintiff was able to demonstrate that the evidence had indeed been distorted, it would be difficult to undo its initial impact and to erase the impression left in the minds of the jury members.

Defendants dispute plaintiffs' claims of substantial need, arguing that the real reason they seek to obtain the tapes prior to trial is to learn what evidence the defendants intend to produce at trial so that they may tailor their trial testimony accordingly. This, defendants argue, would greatly impair the truth-finding function of cross-examination. This argument, however, is flawed for at least two reasons. First, it runs counter to New York's open pre-trial disclosure policy, as discussed earlier. Clearly, to permit defendants to withhold this evidence until trial, even for the ostensible purpose of promoting vigorous cross-examination, would be to return to an earlier time, when subterfuge and surprise were common trial strategies. Second, it is persuasive only if we assume that surveillance tapes are always accurate and plaintiffs always dishonest. As noted above, however, surveillance films are extraordinarily susceptible to manipulation, and, once altered, are peculiarly dangerous. Thus, we cannot fashion a rule that is premised upon their authenticity, as defendants urge. However, the danger identified by defendants is a real one. We believe that it can be largely eliminated by providing that surveillance films should be turned over only after a plaintiff has been deposed.

We further find that plaintiffs have established that they cannot without undue hardship obtain the substantial equivalent of surveillance materials by other means. Although plaintiffs are aware of their own physical ailments and the nature of their disabilities, this is no substitute for viewing the surveillance materials taken by the defendants. It is only by viewing the surveillance film that plaintiffs can determine when it was made and whether the activities depicted were typical of that time or were the product of an emergency situation. Visual evidence of this kind is unique because it memorializes a particular set of conditions that can likely never be replicated. Only by observing the conditions as they appear on film can the plaintiffs respond to possible distortions or prepare to explain seeming inconsistencies to the jury. * * *

* * * Having concluded that the plaintiff was entitled to view those tapes that the defendant intended to use at trial, if indeed any such tapes exist, our analysis * * * is at an end. Accordingly, the order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed * * *.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.The common law of England “ recognized no rule requiring prior notice of intended evidence to be given to the opponent or furnishing legal process for obtaining such information * * *.” The ability of the parties to exchange information about claims and defenses was somewhat greater in Chancery, where a bill of discovery could be served, and “to a limited extent * * * the result * * * would usually be the revelation of some portion of information not before known to the applicant.” However, the bill could not be used to reveal an adversary's own evidence:

[E]quitable discovery involved no more than the negation of the party's privilege at common-law trials not to testify against his own cause, and was not intended to give relief against the common-law principle which refused to exact before trial a disclosure of the tenor of the evidence intended to be given for his cause.

6 Wigmore, Evidence §§ 1845, 1846 (3d ed. 1940). How might the absence of discovery affect other procedural rules within a legal system?

2.The court in DiMichel held that materials prepared in anticipation of litigation normally are exempt from discovery, unless a party can show a substantial need and an undue hardship. Do you agree that surveillance videotapes present such a situation? In general, why are materials prepared in anticipation of litigation exempt from discovery at all?

3.Is the holding in DiMichel limited to videotaped evidence or does it apply to other types of impeachment evidence as well? Suppose plaintiff is deposed and testifies that prior to the accident being sued on she had never suffered a disabling injury. Plaintiff then attempts to have defendant answer an interrogatory as to what information defendant has regarding plaintiff's prior medical history. What result?

4.Is the court in DiMichel correct in not allowing videotapes to be disclosed until after plaintiff has been deposed? If the court is truly following a policy of open discovery, why does it matter when the videotapes are disclosed?

5.Less than a year after the Court of Appeals decided the DiMichel case, the New York Legislature enacted Civil Practice Law and Rules

§ 3101(i), which provides, in relevant part:

In addition to any other matter which may be subject to disclosure, there shall be full disclosure of any films, photographs, video tapes or audio tapes, including transcripts or memoranda thereof, involving a [party; an officer, director, member, agent, or employee of a party; or a person about to depart the state or for other reasons will not be available; or a person retained as an expert witness]. There shall be disclosure of all portions of such material, including out-takes, rather than only those portions a party intends to use. * * *

The Court of Appeals subsequently interpreted an aspect of the new law, and held that it had overruled that portion of DiMichel that allowed defendant to withhold surveillance tapes until after a plaintiff has been deposed. See Tran v. New Rochelle Hospital Medical Center, 99 N.Y.2d 383, 786 N.E.2d 444, 756 N.Y.S.2d 509 (2003). Why do you think the legislature rejected the court’s imposition of a timing requirement on the production of videotapes?

When defendant files an answer denying the allegations of the complaint, the denials are only that party’s assertions and do not demonstrate whose story is correct. The motion for summary judgment enables a party to show whether there is admissible evidence to support the allegations made and to call for a showing by the opposing party. The judge’s role is not to try to decide a factual dispute when each party has presented competent evidence on an issue and there is a conflict. But if it becomes clear that one party cannot possibly prove his allegations, there is no “genuine issue” and a futile trial may be avoided by granting the motion.

ALDERMAN v. BALTIMORE & OHIO R. Co.

United States District Court, Southern District of West Virginia, 1953.
113 F.Supp. 881.

MOORE, CHIEF JUDGE.

Plaintiff * * * brings this action * * * to recover for personal injuries sustained by her as a result of the derailment of one of defendant’s trains near Adrian, West Virginia, on February 14, 1952.

Plaintiff was not a fare-paying passenger. She was traveling on a trip pass, which afforded her free transportation * * *. The following conditions were printed on the pass: “In consideration of the issuance of this free pass,

47

I hereby assume all risk of personal injury and loss of or of damage to property from whatever causes arising, and release the company from liability therefore, and I hereby declare that I am not prohibited by law from receiving free transportation and that this pass will be lawfully used.”

Plaintiff in her original complaint charged defendant with negligence in the maintenance of its tracks and the operation of its train. After a pre-trial conference, at which the legal effect of the release from liability contained in the pass was discussed, plaintiff filed an amended complaint charging defendant with wilful or wanton conduct.

On the basis of the amended pleadings and supporting affidavits filed by defendant, defendant moved for summary judgment under Rule 56 * * *.

It is undisputed that the derailment was caused by a break in one of the rails as the train was passing over the track. It is also shown by defendant’s affidavits, and not denied, that the break in the rail was due to a transverse fissure inside the cap of the rail, which broke vertically under the weight of the train; that such a fissure is not visible upon inspection; that such defects occur in both new and old rails; and that a visual inspection was in fact made of this particular rail the day preceding the accident and the defect was not discovered.

Since plaintiff was an intrastate passenger, and since the accident occurred in West Virginia, the law of West Virginia governs both the effect to be given to the release and the degree of care which defendant owed plaintiff. * * *

However, counsel have been unable to direct the Court’s attention to, and the Court has not found, any West Virginia decision which has determined the effect which a release from liability contained in a pass has upon the carrier’s duty to the holder of such a pass. * * *

Since the Federal statute and the West Virginia statute authorizing the issuance of free passes are similar, 49 U.S.C.A. § 1(7), and W.Va.Code, Ch. 24, Art. 3, § 4, it is pertinent to examine the United States Supreme Court decisions construing the Federal statute. The Supreme Court has held that a carrier may contract against liability for negligent injury to one who accepts a free pass * * *; but that for reasons of public policy it cannot relieve itself of liability for wilful or wanton acts. * * *

I am therefore of opinion that the sole duty imposed upon defendant under the facts of this case was to refrain from wilfully or wantonly injuring plaintiff.

In Kelly v. Checker White Cab, Inc., 131 W.Va. 816 at page 822; 50 S.E.2d 888 at page 892, the West Virginia court, quoting from 29 Cyc. 510 said: “ ‘ In order that one may be held guilty of wilful or wanton conduct, it must be shown that he was conscious of his conduct, and conscious, from his knowledge of existing conditions, that injury would likely or probably result from his conduct, and that with reckless indifference to consequences he consciously and intentionally did some wrongful act or omitted some known duty which produced the injurious result.” ’ ’ * * *

48

The substance of plaintiff’s contention that defendant wilfully injured her is that defendant used old and obsolescent rails in its tracks, knowing that the use of these rails made derailments reasonably probable. It is charged that defendant used old rails because the cost of derailments was less than the cost of replacing the old rails, and that for this reason defendant was willing to take the risk of derailments.

I am of opinion that the complaint fails to state sufficient facts to substantiate a charge of wilfulness, as that term is defined by the West Virginia court. It is clear that plaintiff has stated a charge of negligence; but that is not the test in this case. To establish wilfulness it would be necessary to charge that defendant knew of this particular defect in the rail; that the defect would probably result in a break in the rail if the train were run over it, causing a derailment of the train; and that defendant, with this knowledge of existing conditions, and the likelihood or probability of an injury resulting from its conduct, intentionally drove its train over the defective rail with an indifference to the consequences. The undenied affidavits of defendant show clearly that plaintiff cannot establish these facts.

At the hearing of this motion, counsel for plaintiff moved for a continuance of the hearing to enable him to substantiate a newspaper report to the effect that defendant was using old and obsolescent rails in its tracks because the cost of derailments was cheaper than the cost of replacing the rails. The motion was denied since this contention, even if it were true, merely has a bearing on an issue of negligence, and not upon the question of wilful conduct. Plaintiff does not contend that she can establish that defendant knew of the particular defect in the rail that caused the derailment.

For the reasons stated above, defendant’s motion for summary judgment will be sustained. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.If very specific allegations of all of the facts giving rise to plaintiff’s cause of action were required to be set forth in the complaint, would it have been possible to handle the Alderman case by a motion to dismiss or a demurrer rather than waiting for the summary judgment phase? To the extent that this would have been possible, does the case present a strong argument for more specific pleading of facts? Consider whether the court should have ruled as it did if the motion for summary judgment had been made immediately upon the service of the complaint and before plaintiff had an opportunity to utilize the discovery process. What provision does Federal Rule 56 make for this contingency? Analytically, the motion for summary judgment can be thought of as a demurrer-plus. However, do you agree that for summary judgment to be fair and effective, it must be preceded by discovery so that each party will have an opportunity to disclose the gaps in the opponent’s case and to cure any defects in the party’s own?

2.A motion for summary judgment may be useful even though the moving party believes it will be unsuccessful. What advantage did defendant in Alderman gain by moving for summary judgment, rather than moving to dismiss? Reread the third paragraph of the case. See p. 47, supra. Should plaintiff be able to amend a complaint in this situation? Was her amendment made merely to prolong the litigation in the hope of forcing a settlement?

3.In KENNEDY v. SILAS MASON CO., 334 U.S. 249, 256–57, 68 S.Ct. 1031, 1034, 92 L.Ed. 1347, 1350–51 (1948), Justice Jackson, speaking for the Court, said: “[S]ummary procedures, however salutary where issues are clear-cut and simple, present a treacherous record for deciding issues of far-flung import, on which the Court should draw inferences with caution from complicated courses of legislation, contracting and practice.” He emphasized it would be “good judicial administration to withhold decision of the ultimate questions” absent a record presenting “a more solid basis of findings based on litigation or on a comprehensive statement of agreed facts.” Why is the grant of summary judgment more troubling in lawsuits that involve complex factual questions or proof by circumstantial evidence?

3.JUDGE AND JURY

You probably will be surprised (and perhaps dismayed) by the comparatively small part of a Civil Procedure course devoted to the actual process of trial. It is true that the trial, if one occurs, is the most important and most interesting stage of a lawsuit. But most of the “law” about trials is the subject matter of a course in Evidence. The most important aspect of trial with which this course is concerned is the division of functions between judge and jury and the various ways in which the judge acts to insure that the jury performs its proper function. In this section, we look at four of those ways: instructing the jury as to the law it shall apply, the form that the verdict takes, judicial control over the matters the jury may consider, and taking from the jury its power to decide a case when the judge finds that the evidence presented at trial can reasonably support only one result.

a.Instructing the Jury

Broadly stated, it is a function of the judge to decide questions of law and a function of the jury to decide questions of fact. But in most cases, the jury’s final decision will have the effect that one of the parties is entitled to judgment and to reach this decision the jury must apply the law to the facts. Therefore, the jury must be told what the law is. The vehicle for this is the judge’s charge to the jury, which comes at the end of the trial, immediately before the jury retires to consider its verdict. An important issue concerning these instructions is how far the adversary system should extend to this stage of the lawsuit. Counsel for both parties may request that particular instructions be given to the jury, and when there is a dispute between them as to the law, they ordinarily will submit conflicting requests. The judge must resolve such conflicts, and it is the court’s duty in any event to instruct the jury whether or not the parties make specific requests. The judge, even though an expert on the law, may err. To what extent is it the responsibility of counsel to attempt to correct the trial judge? The next case involves this question, and introduces the further question of allocating the burden of proof (or burden of persuasion). Why is there no rule that says one party or the other has this burden?

ALEXANDER V. KRAMER BROS. FREIGHT LINES, INC.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1959.
273 F.2d 373.

SWAN, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

The present action is a sequel to a collision between two tractor-trailer trucks on the Pennsylvania Turnpike in or near Somerset, Pennsylvania. It occurred * * * about six o’clock in the morning, when there was spotty fog on the Turnpike. The corporate plaintiff owned one of the trucks. It was badly damaged and its operator, the plaintiff Alexander, sustained serious injuries. The other truck was owned by the defendant corporation. Its answer to the complaint denied any negligence on its part and set up the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs. * * *

Because of the character of the questions raised, a very brief statement concerning the testimony will suffice. The only eye witnesses to the accident were drivers of the two trucks. The drivers’ stories were contradictory and raised issues as to the exact location of the accident and the manner in which it occurred. Both trucks were proceeding westerly. Alexander testified that the collision occurred where there was an entrance to the Turnpike from the right, that defendant’s truck cut in ahead of him, and that the fog was such that he could not see the entering truck in time to avoid hitting it. Holman, defendant’s driver, denied that he entered from the right and claimed that plaintiff’s truck had been following for some time before it ran into the rear end of his truck. Thus the issues of negligence and contributory negligence raised questions of credibility for the jury.

The first question for consideration is whether the judgment should be reversed because of the court’s erroneous charge as to the burden of proof of contributory negligence, despite defendant’s failure to request a charge on that subject or to object or take exception to the charge given, as required by [Federal] Rule 51 * * *. Appellant contends that he is excused from complying with the Rule by what occurred in colloquy with the court near the close of the plaintiffs’ case. In the colloquy, the court stated that “the burden of proof of contributory negligence is on the defendant.” Counsel for plaintiffs expressed agreement with the statement, and counsel for defendant said, “I take an exception,” to which the court replied, “Yes, I give you that exception.” The plaintiff then rested, and defendant proceeded to put in its case.

51

* * * Under the [applicable law] the plaintiffs in an action where death has not resulted * * * carry the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence. The cases now relied upon by appellant to prove the charge wrong were never brought to the trial court’s attention either in the colloquy or at the time when counsel submitted numerous requests to charge on other matters. Had they been, it seems probable that Judge Inch would have changed the view he expressed in colloquy. The obvious purpose of the requirement in Rule 51 that objection must be made to matters in the charge in order to assign them as error, is to permit the trial judge to evaluate the objection and correct his charge if further thought persuades him of its error. This purpose is not fulfilled by taking an exception to a statement made by the judge several days prior to the time for charging the jury when nothing was before the judge requiring a ruling in respect to the statement made in colloquy. Certainly an exception under such circumstances does not meet the literal requirement of Rule 51 and, in our opinion, it is an insufficient excuse for failure to object or except to the charge.

The cases relied upon by the appellant deal either with situations where an exception was taken at the time of the charge and the question is whether the exception was sufficiently explicit, or to cases involving evidentiary rulings where exception was taken at the time of the ruling but no further exception was taken at the time of the charge. * * * Nor do we think the instant case of the exceptional character in which an appellate court will sometimes correct an error in the charge in the absence of objection or exception. See Troupe v. Chicago, D. & G. Bay Transit Co., 2 Cir., 234 F.2d 253, 260 [1956].

* * *

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.The opinion in this case speaks of the “burden of proof of contributory negligence.” In this book, we use the term “burden of persuasion” when we are referring to the kind of burden involved in Alexander. There is another kind of burden—the burden of initially putting in evidence on an issue, without which the issue is not in the case at all. We call this kind of burden the “burden of production.” The two burdens are distinct, but the term “burden of proof” often is used to mean either of them. For this reason we avoid it.

52

Ordinarily, the burden of production and the burden of persuasion on an issue are placed on the same party. But not always. For example, when a defense is one that is seldom raised, it might be a waste of time to require plaintiff in every case to introduce evidence refuting it; the burden of production would be placed on defendant. But once there is enough evidence on the issue to go to the jury, the court might rule that plaintiff should have the burden of persuasion—that is, establishing that the defense is not valid—as plaintiff does on most aspects of her case.

2.What factors are relevant in determining whether to place the burden of persuasion on the issue of contributory negligence on one party rather than the other? Are these same factors involved when deciding who shall be required to plead the issue of contributory negligence? Why might the two burdens be placed differently?

3.In Troupe, cited at the end of the principal case, Judge Frank, in a concurring opinion, said, at 234 F.2d at 260–61:

On the negligence issue, the judge, at defendant’s request, charged, “It is enough if the steps and paint are commonly used and accepted in the industry at the time.” This was as obvious an error, on a material matter, as one can imagine. For the Supreme Court, this court and others have often held that usual practices, by others in the same industry or trade, similar to a defendant’s practices, do not constitute a defense in a negligence action. * * *

My colleagues indicate that, were it not for our reversal on the unseaworthiness issue, they would probably have disregarded this error. I cannot agree. My colleagues refer to Rule 51 and the fact that, before the jury retired, plaintiffs’ counsel did not state distinctly that he objected and the grounds of the objection. My colleagues concede that, in an exceptional case, we may review errors not “saved” by a proper objection. They suggest this is not an exceptional case, relying on a statement in United States v. Atkinson, 297 U.S. 157, 160, 56 S. Ct. 391, 392, 80 L. Ed. 555. There the Supreme Court, set forth, in the disjunctive, two grounds for reviewing such errors:

(1)“the errors are obvious or

(2)they otherwise seriously affect the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of judicial proceedings.”

My colleagues stress the second ground. But the first ground alone suffices, as the cases make clear. And here, as observed above, the error was magnificently obvious. A litigant surely has the right to assume that a federal trial judge knows the elementary substantive legal rules, long established by the precedents, and that therefore the judge will act accordingly, without prompting by the litigant’s lawyer.

Was the trial judge’s error in Alexander “obvious”? What factors are relevant in answering this question?

b.The Form of the Verdict

In most cases, the jury is asked to return a “general verdict.” In substance, the jury simply says, “We find for plaintiff and fix damages at x dollars” or “We find for defendant.” But there are two variations on the general verdict. One is the special verdict, in which the jury is asked to answer questions as to the facts; the judge then applies the law to the facts as found by the jury. The other is the general verdict with interrogatories: The jury is told to return a verdict in the same form as a general verdict, but in addition it is told to answer certain questions about the facts of the case. If those answers are not consistent with the general verdict, the answers control. There are a number of reasons for using the special verdict or the general verdict with interrogatories. For example, in a complicated case, the special verdict obviates the necessity of instructing the jury about the law and permits it to concentrate on determining the facts. But you should bear in mind that both of these verdict forms also are devices for controlling the jury—for preventing the jury from ignoring the law and simply deciding the case for the party the jurors want to win.

DINIERO v. UNITED STATES LINES Co.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1961.
288 F.2d 595, cert. denied, 368 U.S. 831, 82 S.Ct. 54, 7 L.Ed.2d 34.

MEDINA, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

* * * Julio Diniero, a Junior Third Assistant Engineer aboard the S.S. Pioneer Land, owned by United States Lines Company, claimed to have suffered such repeated strains in his back in the performance of his duties as to cause a ruptured disc with resultant pain and suffering, culminating some years later in a fusion operation and the removal of the disc. According to Diniero’s testimony, there was a blow-down valve located below a floor plate * * *. There was a slot in the floor plate and normally the valve could be opened or closed as circumstances required by using a reach rod. For a variety of reasons * * * which include the absence of a reach rod and defects in the valve, Diniero said the only way he could operate the valve was by removing the deck plate, crouching down and moving the wheel of the valve by the use of a wrench. He claimed the injuries to his back were the effect of repeatedly operating the valve under these difficult conditions. The shipowner * * * claimed there was nothing wrong with the valve, nor any necessity to remove the floor plate or to use a wrench. The eight day trial was devoted to * * * the controverted issue of liability, and there was also considerable medical proof on the general subject of whether Diniero’s trouble was due to a long continued condition caused by a degenerative disc disease and having no relation whatever to the operation of the blow-down valve * * *.

At the close of the evidence the trial judge submitted the case to the jury in a wholly unexceptionable charge. In an endeavor to assist the jury in its deliberations, however, * * * he submitted eight questions to be signed and returned as the verdict of the jury. The last two were in the form of a general verdict for plaintiff or defendant, questions 2 to 6 [related] * * * to unseaworthiness, negligence, contributory negligence and proximate cause. The trouble was caused by question number 1, as follows:

“Did the plaintiff injure himself aboard the Pioneer Land because in operating the blow-down valve he had to remove the floor plates, then crouch and exert physical effort with a wrench and not his hand to stop it from leaking?

“Answer yes or no.”

After some hours of deliberation and the receipt of a number of communications from the jury, the trial judge withdrew all the questions, told the jury to disregard them and bring in a general verdict in the usual form; and, after further deliberations the jury brought in a verdict in favor of the seaman for $46,150. * * *

The position of the shipowner is that * * * [Federal] Rule 49(b) authorizes the submission of written interrogatories but does not authorize the withdrawal of such interrogatories, after they have once been submitted and the jury has commenced its deliberations thereon. The shipowner further argues that question number 1 related to “one or more issues of fact the decision of which is necessary to a verdict,” and that * * * it was a clear abuse of discretion to withdraw a proper and material interrogatory, relating to an issue that must necessarily be decided in plaintiff’s favor, if plaintiff was to recover any damages whatever. To permit such withdrawal, the shipowner claims, would defeat the very purpose of * * * Rule 49(b), and smooth the way for a reluctant jury, unable to agree on the facts basic to recovery, to do “popular justice” through the medium of “an old-fashioned verdict.”

* * *

The jury commenced their deliberations at 2:45 p.m. At 5:40 p.m. the trial judge received a note from the jury reading: “Your Honor, could we ask for your interpretation of the word ‘had’ in the second line, first question? Did the plaintiff injure himself?”

Appellant’s counsel assures us that the question and the explanation given by the trial judge is just as simple as * * * whether he was injured in the manner described by him in his testimony. What the trial judge said, however, is as follows:

“What I was trying to find out by the first question was whether or not plaintiff injured himself on board this ship, assuming that he had to remove the plates, assuming that he had to crouch down, and assuming he exerted this pressure with the wrench instead of his hand?

“So in answer to your specific question as to the interpretation of the word ‘had’ it means that I assumed that he had to remove the plates, and he had to do this, and he had to do that. I didn’t mean to take away from you the question as to whether he did in fact have to do that. In other words, the purpose of the question is to find out whether the plaintiff injured himself on board the ship in the manner that he described. The defendant claims that he did not. So the first question that I wanted answered was did he injure himself aboard the ship by doing what he said he did?

“If you find that he didn’t remove the plates or he didn’t bend down, or he didn’t crouch, or he didn’t have to, or he didn’t do it, those questions will be answered as you go on further down by your answers to the other questions.

“But in my first question I assumed as a fact, accepted the plaintiff’s testimony, that he had to bend down, that he had to crouch, that he had to remove the plates.

“What I wanted to find out was, assuming all of that, did he injure himself on board the Pioneer Land.

“Now I hope that is clear. If it isn’t you can write me another note.”

The jury retired again at 5:50 p.m. and returned with another note at 6:40 p.m. * * * as follows: “Your Honor, we cannot agree on question one. It appears there is no chance for agreement.” Thereupon the trial judge withdrew all the questions from the consideration of the jury and asked them to see if they could not agree on a general verdict.

* * * [T]he jury still could not soon reach agreement. At 9:22 p.m. the jury informed the trial judge that “it finds it impossible to arrive at a unanimous agreement in this case.” The trial judge thereupon read a quotation from Allen v. United States, 1896, 164 U.S. 492, 501, 17 S.Ct. 154, 41 L.Ed. 528, and returned the jury for further deliberations at 9:30 p.m. * * * At 10:30 p.m. the verdict was announced and the jury polled.

There was an inherent ambiguity in question one, and it is plain enough that the explanation failed to remove the ambiguity. Under these circumstances we think it was not an abuse of discretion to withdraw the questions and give the jury an opportunity to agree upon a general verdict.

* * * It was a matter of judgment whether to attempt some further elucidation of the question, or to declare a mistrial, or to withdraw all the questions and authorize a general verdict. We cannot say the decision made here under the circumstances of this case was wrong, particularly as the jury continued its deliberations from about 6:45 p.m. until 10:30 p.m., after the withdrawal of the questions.

Other cases present the problem in its simplest form. After the submission of material and proper interrogatories, there is a delay of a few hours and the trial judge of his own motion, or on the application of plaintiff’s counsel, calls in the jury, withdraws the questions, tells the jury to bring in a general verdict over the objection of defendant’s counsel, and shortly thereafter the jury returns a verdict for the plaintiff. This has been held to be an abuse of discretion and ground for reversal. * * * The reason is that the action of the trial judge would probably be prejudicial to defendant. * * * This is a good general rule, and we agree with it. But it has no application to the case before us now, as the interrogatory causing all the difficulty here was unclear and ambiguous. The withdrawal of all the questions was for the purpose of eliminating the confusion caused by the formulation of an improper question. And it is to be noted that a confusing and improperly worded interrogatory cannot fairly be considered a “material” question, or one the answer to which “is necessary to a verdict.” Under the circumstances it was, we think, good judgment to withdraw all the questions. Certainly we cannot say to do so was an abuse of discretion.

Affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.Do you believe the interrogatory as first given to the jury was ambiguous? What are the possible meanings of the question? Could the jury answer the question “No” under any of these meanings and still find for plaintiff? If the jury had answered the interrogatory “No,” and a reviewing court found that there was no evidence at all to support a finding that Dinero was not required to remove the plate, crouch down, and turn the valve with a wrench, but that a genuine issue existed on the question whether his condition was caused by this work, would the reviewing court be required to reverse a verdict for defendant that was based on the answer to the first interrogatory?
- 2.Could the judge simply have rewritten the interrogatory in clearer language and resubmitted it? What reasons mitigate against allowing that practice?
- 3.Could the jury have properly reached a decision for plaintiff without resolving the issue that the judge said in his explanation he intended the interrogatory to present? If it could not, was it proper to withdraw the interrogatory altogether and say to the jury: “What I am going to do, in an effort to see whether you can agree, I am going to ask you to forget all of the questions I gave you and see whether you can’t agree on a general verdict. * * * I think that might relieve the situation some. I hope you can come to some agreement.” (Judge’s Instruction, quoted from the Petition for a Writ of Certiorari, p. 11.)

- 4.Do you think the judge’s explanation of the interrogatory was clear? Read it again very carefully before you decide. Then reflect upon the fact that it was delivered orally to the jurors, even though the interrogatories themselves were in writing. When the jury is asked to return a general verdict, the charge, frequently including very complex instructions on the law, is given orally, and although the jurors may ask to have parts of it repeated, they sometimes are not even given a copy. From the experience in this case do you think written instructions would be a better idea?
- 5.The use of special verdicts and general verdicts with interrogatories is sometimes criticized as atomizing the jury’s deliberations and making a unanimous result more difficult to reach. Assume that in an ordinary automobile accident case, three members of the jury believe that defendant was going too fast but the other three believe that he was not; moreover, the latter group believes that defendant was not looking where he was going, but the first group believes that defendant was. Could the jury return a unanimous verdict for plaintiff? For defendant? Would the problem be aggravated by the use of a special verdict or a general verdict with interrogatories?
- 6. ALLEN v. UNITED STATES, 164 U.S. 492, 17 S.Ct. 154, 41 L.Ed. 528 (1896), which the trial court in Dinero quoted to the jury, see p. 55, supra, involved a variation on what has come to be called the “dynamite charge,” an instruction that is sometimes given in the principal charge but more frequently is given only to a jury that has been unable to reach a unanimous verdict for either party after a substantial period of time. In Allen, this charge was given some time after the main charge. Its content was, * * * in substance, that in a large proportion of cases absolute certainty could not be expected; that, although the verdict must be the verdict of each individual juror, and not a mere acquiescence in the conclusion of his fellows, yet they should examine the question submitted with candor, and with a proper regard and deference to the opinions of each other; that it was their duty to decide the case if they could conscientiously do so; that they should listen, with a disposition to be convinced, to each other’s arguments; that, if much the larger number were for conviction, a dissenting juror should consider whether his doubt was a reasonable one which made no impression upon the minds of so many men, equally honest, equally intelligent with himself. If, upon the other hand, the majority were for acquittal, the minority ought to ask themselves whether they might not reasonably doubt the correctness of a judgment which was not concurred in by the majority.

Id. at 501, 17 S.Ct. at 157, 41 L.Ed. at 530–31. The Court found no error in the instruction:

While, undoubtedly, the verdict of the jury should represent the opinion of each individual juror, it by no means follows that opinions may not be changed by conference in the jury room. The very object of the jury system is to secure unanimity by a comparison of views, and by arguments among the jurors themselves. It certainly cannot be the law that each juror should not listen with deference to the arguments, and with a distrust of his own judgment, if he finds a large majority of the jury taking a different view of the case from what he does himself. It cannot be that each juror should go to the jury room with a blind determination that the verdict shall represent his opinion of the case at that moment, or that he should close his ears to the arguments of men who are equally honest and intelligent as himself.

Id. at 501, 17 S.Ct. at 157, 41 L.Ed. at 530. Does this opinion adequately answer the objections that may be made to such a charge?

c.The Jury’s Deliberation

After the judge completes the charge, the jury retires to deliberate in private. Extensive precautions are taken to insure that the jury is undisturbed and unheard during this period. The jury will have been instructed to decide the case in accordance with the law as explained by the judge and only on the basis of the evidence that has been brought forward in the trial. It is improper for the jury to ignore what the judge has said about the law or to speculate about what evidence that was not introduced might have proved. It also is improper for the jurors to decide the case on the basis of their own personal knowledge of matters not in evidence. Indeed, if a juror has specific knowledge of the facts, it should be disclosed at the beginning of the trial, and that person probably will be struck from the panel. But a more difficult question is presented by a juror’s more general experience and knowledge. A strength of the jury system is thought to be that it brings together a cross-section of community standards and experienced judgments. At the same time, the parties cannot meet the special knowledge of jurors of which they are unaware. How should the line between general experience and special knowledge be drawn?

TEXAS EMPLOYERS’ INS. ASS’N V. PRICE
Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, Eastland, 1960.
336 S.W.2d 304.

COLLINGS, JUSTICE.

Loyal Grant Price brought suit * * * to set aside an award of the Industrial Accident Board * * *. The defendant Texas Employers’ Insurance Association answered by general denial and specifically pleaded that plaintiff’s alleged injury did not result in total or permanent incapacity, but that any injury plaintiff may have received resulted only in partial and temporary incapacity, or resulted from other injuries and diseases or a combination thereof. * * *

The case was tried before a jury which found that plaintiff received an accidental injury while working for the Port Houston Iron Works, Inc.; * * * that such injury was the producing cause of total disability; that total disability began November 27, 1957; that such disability was permanent and was not partial * * *. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff for $13,415.96 in a lump sum with interest thereon at the legal rate. * * *

In appellant’s first four points it is contended that there was no evidence, and in the alternative that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings that any total incapacity sustained by appellee was permanent and the finding that appellee sustained total and permanent incapacity was so against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence as to be clearly wrong and unjust. * * *

In support of its contention in this respect, appellant further urges that appellee’s own doctor testified that his back had been improved by the operation and stated that he “would estimate his (appellee’s) partial permanent disability as approximately twenty percent as applied to general deficiency.” This testimony is not consistent with the finding of the jury and the testimony of appellee to the effect that he has sustained total and permanent incapacity. It is the province of the jury, however, to determine the weight to be given evidence and to reconcile conflicts or inconsistencies therein. * * * The matter under consideration was not one for experts and skilled witnesses alone. Appellee testified that he could not work without pain, that his back was getting worse, that he was having to wear a brace with which he had previously been fitted by Dr. Brelsford. Dr. Brelsford testified that appellee had sustained permanent incapacity although not total, but that he would not pass him to follow his trade. The fact that appellee’s testimony was in conflict with expert opinion testimony concerning the extent of his disability did not, under the circumstances, render it insufficient to support the verdict. * * *

Appellant further urges that the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground of jury misconduct. The evidence concerning some of the alleged jury misconduct was conflicting and would support a finding that such misconduct did not occur. The implied findings of the court in support of the order overruling appellant’s motion for a new trial, which findings have support in the evidence, are binding on us. * * *

The existence of one of the alleged acts of jury misconduct is shown conclusively and in our opinion constitutes reversible error. The question whether the incapacity of appellee was total and permanent or only permanent partial was close, as already indicated. It is our opinion that the evidence supports the finding of total permanent incapacity and that such finding is not against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence. But it is further noted that appellee’s own doctor testified, in effect, that his disability was approximately twenty percent partial. It is undisputed that one of the jurors related his personal experiences to persuade the jury that appellee was totally and permanently incapacitated. The witness stated to the jury as follows:

“I said it has been my experience that in employment that if a man has an injury and it is obvious, such as, a scar on his back if he is being examined by a doctor for employment that he would want a statement from that man concerning that injury, and if he mentioned a back injury I doubted very much if he would get employment. The reason that came out was we were discussing whether or not the injury was partial or total.”

The juror testified that he got this experience in union work; that he had read a letter from his company concerning back injuries showing that the company wanted to be more careful in hiring people with such injuries and that he told the jury about this experience. He testified that, in making the above statements to the jury, he was attempting to persuade a juror to come over to his side of the case; that he felt it was proper to give the jury the benefit of his personal knowledge and experience; and that was what he did. He further stated that he knew from experience that appellee could not get a job with Rohm and Haas, Shell Oil Company, Sinclair, or any other company that has a union contract or employee benefits and so advised the jury. He stated his opinion to the jury that appellee should receive total and permanent disability because he could not pass the physical examination he would be required to take; that it had been his experience that companies were very strict about whom they hire and that prospective employees were required to pass a most rigid physical examination. In this connection the juror testified that he also stated to the jury that there might be some jobs that appellee could handle but that he had a doubt whether appellee “could compete favorably on the labor market.” The above evidence is undisputed. It shows that a juror related his personal experiences to the jury concerning the practice of company employers in hiring and employing workmen, and that the purpose and effect of such statements was to show that appellee was totally incapacitated. It was misconduct for the juror to relate to the other jurors his own personal experience as original evidence of material facts to be considered in their deliberation. * * * Considered in connection with the entire record, we are of the opinion that the misconduct shown was material and that it reasonably appears that injury probably resulted to appellant. * * *

For the reasons stated the judgment of the trial court is reversed and the cause is remanded.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Why is it misconduct for a juror “to relate to the other jurors his own personal experience as original evidence of material facts to be considered in their deliberation”? In HEAD v. HARGRAVE, 105 U.S. (15 Otto) 45, 49–50, 26 L.Ed. 1028, 1030 (1881), a case involving the value of legal services, Justice Field said:

It was the province of the jury to weigh the testimony of the attorneys as to the value of the services, by reference to their nature, the time occupied in their performance, and other attending circumstances, and by applying to it their own experience and knowledge of the character of such services. To direct them to find the value of the services from the testimony of the experts alone, was to say to them that the issue should be determined by the opinions of the attorneys, and not by the exercise of their own judgment of the facts on which those opinions were given. * * * So far from laying aside their own general knowledge and ideas, the jury should have applied that knowledge and those ideas to the matters of fact in evidence in determining the weight to be given to the opinions expressed * * *. While they cannot act in any case upon particular facts material to its disposition resting in their private knowledge, but should be governed by the evidence adduced, they may, and to act intelligently they must, judge of the weight and force of that evidence by their own general knowledge of the subject of inquiry. If, for example, the question were as to the damages sustained by a plaintiff from a fracture of his leg by the carelessness of a defendant, the jury would ill perform their duty and probably come to a wrong conclusion, if, controlled by the testimony of the surgeons, not merely as to the injury inflicted, but as to the damages sustained, they should ignore their own knowledge and experience of the value of a sound limb. Other persons besides professional men have knowledge of the value of professional services; and, while great weight should always be given to the opinions of those familiar with the subject, they are not to be blindly received * * *.

Can the principal case be reconciled with this language?

2.What is the rationale for barring jurors from impeaching their verdict? The Texas Supreme Court, which has authority to promulgate Rules of Evidence, has adopted Texas Rules of Evidence, Rule 606(b) (“Juror’s Competency as a Witness”), which provides:

(b)During an Inquiry into the Validity of a Verdict or Indictment.

(1)Prohibited Testimony or Other Evidence. During an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify about any statement made or incident that occurred during the jury’s deliberations; the effect of anything on that juror’s or another juror’s vote; or any juror’s mental processes concerning the verdict or indictment. The court may not receive a juror’s affidavit or evidence of a juror’s statement on these matters.

(2)Exceptions. A juror may testify:

- (A) about whether an outside influence was improperly brought to bear on any juror; or
- (B) to rebut a claim that the juror was not qualified to serve.

In what respect would this rule have altered the result in Price?

d.Taking the Case from the Jury

The most direct and drastic example of jury control occurs in those cases in which it is held that there is no evidence on which a reasonable jury could find for a particular party (usually plaintiff, but sometimes defendant). If the judge makes this determination at the close of the evidence, she will direct the jury to return a verdict for the other party. Even after the jury has returned a verdict for one party, the judge in most systems may order that judgment be entered for the other party “notwithstanding the verdict” if the judge decides that the case should not have been submitted to the jury. The judge also has the power to set aside the verdict and order a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against the great weight of the evidence or because of mistakes or erroneous rulings during trial.

An appellate court also may determine, even in the face of a jury verdict, that no reasonable jury could have reached the result announced. Clearly when these devices are used, the jury is more than “controlled”; it is eliminated from the process. If such devices were not available, the jury could decide a case any way it wanted without respect to the evidence or the law. But if the devices are not very severely restricted, the right to a jury trial can be negated.

LAVENDER V. KURN
Supreme Court of the United States, 1946.
327 U.S. 645, 66 S.Ct. 740, 90 L.Ed. 916.

On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri.

JUSTICE MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

Petitioner, the administrator of the estate of L.E. Haney, brought this suit under the [Federal Employers’ Liability] Act against the respondent trustees of the St. Louis-San Francisco Railway Company (Frisco) and the respondent Illinois Central Railroad Company. It was charged that Haney, while employed as a switch-tender by the respondents in the switchyard of the Grand Central Station in Memphis, Tennessee, was killed as a result of respondents’ negligence. Following a trial * * *, the jury returned a verdict in favor of petitioner and awarded damages in the amount of $30,000. * * * On appeal, however, the Supreme Court of Missouri reversed the judgment, holding that there was no substantial evidence of negligence to support the submission of the case to the jury. * * *

[Haney was employed by Illinois Central, which owned the yards; Frisco’s trains used the yards, and part of Haney’s wages were paid by Frisco.]

The Illinois Central tracks run north and south directly past and into the Grand Central Station. About 2700 feet south of the station the Frisco tracks cross at right angles to the Illinois Central tracks. A westbound Frisco train wishing to use the station must stop some 250 feet or more west of this crossing and back into the station over a switchline curving east and north. The events in issue center about the switch several feet north of the main Frisco tracks at the point where the switch line branches off. This switch controls the tracks at this point.

It was very dark on the evening of December 21, 1939. At about 7:30 p.m. a westbound interstate Frisco passenger train stopped on the Frisco main line, its rear some 20 or 30 feet west of the switch. Haney, in the performance of his duties, threw or opened the switch to permit the train to back into the station. The respondents claimed that Haney was then required to cross to the south side of the track before the train passed the switch; and the conductor of the train testified that he saw Haney so cross. But there was also evidence that Haney’s duties required him to wait at the switch north of the track until the train had cleared, close the switch, return to his shanty near the crossing and change the signals from red to green to permit trains on the Illinois Central tracks to use the crossing. The Frisco train cleared the switch, backing at the rate of 8 or 10 miles per hour. But the switch remained open and the signals still were red. Upon investigation Haney was found north of the track near the switch lying face down on the ground, unconscious. An ambulance was called, but he was dead upon arrival at the hospital.

Haney had been struck in the back of the head, causing a fractured skull from which he died. There were no known eye-witnesses to the fatal blow. Although it is not clear there is evidence that his body was extended north and south, the head to the south. Apparently he had fallen forward to the south; his face was bruised on the left side from hitting the ground and there were marks indicating that his toes had dragged a few inches southward as he fell. His head was about 5½ feet north of the Frisco tracks. Estimates ranged from 2 feet to 14 feet as to how far west of the switch he lay.

The injury to Haney’s head was evidenced by a gash about two inches long from which blood flowed. The back of Haney’s white cap had a corresponding black mark about an inch and a half long and an inch wide, running at an angle downward to the right of the center of the back of the head. A spot of blood was later found at a point 3 or 4 feet north of the tracks. The conclusion following an autopsy was that Haney’s skull was fractured by “some fast moving small round object.” One of the examining doctors testified that such an object might have been attached to a train backing at the rate of 8 or 10 miles per hour. But he also admitted that the fracture might have resulted from a blow from a pipe or club or some similar round object in the hands of an individual.

Petitioner’s theory is that Haney was struck by the curled end or tip of a mail hook hanging down loosely on the outside of the mail car of the backing train. This curled end was 73 inches above the top of the rail, which was 7 inches high. The overhang of the mail car in relation to the rails was about 2 to 2½ feet. The evidence indicated that when the mail car swayed or moved around a curve the mail hook might pivot, its curled end swinging out as much as 12 to 14 inches. The curled end could thus be swung out to a point 3 to 3½ feet from the rail and about 73 inches above the top of the rail. Both east and west of the switch, however, was an uneven mound of cinders and dirt rising at its highest points 18 to 24 inches above the top of the rails. Witnesses differed as to how close the mound approached the rails, the estimates varying from 3 to 15 feet. But taking the figures most favorable to the petitioner, the mound extended to a point 6 to 12 inches north of the overhanging side of the mail car. If the mail hook end swung out 12 to 14 inches it would be 49 to 55 inches above the highest parts of the mound. Haney was 67½ inches tall. If he had been standing on the mound about a foot from the side of the mail car he could have been hit by the end of the mail hook, the exact point of contact depending upon the height of the mound at the particular point. His wound was about 4 inches below the top of his head, or 63½ inches above the point where he stood on the mound—well within the possible range of the mail hook end.

65

Respondents' theory is that Haney was murdered. They point to the estimates that the mound was 10 to 15 feet north of the rail, making it impossible for the mail hook end to reach a point of contact with Haney's head. Photographs were placed in the record to support the claim that the ground was level north of the rail for at least 10 feet. * * * It also appears that many hoboes and tramps frequented the area at night in order to get rides on freight trains. Haney carried a pistol to protect himself. This pistol was found loose under his body by those who came to his rescue. It was testified, however that the pistol had apparently slipped out of his pocket or scabbard as he fell. Haney's clothes were not disarranged and there was no evidence of a struggle or fight. No rods, pipes or weapons of any kind, except Haney's own pistol, were found near the scene. Moreover, his gold watch and diamond ring were still on him after he was struck. Six days later his unsoiled billfold was found on a high board fence about a block from the place where Haney was struck and near the point where he had been placed in an ambulance. It contained his social security card and other effects, but no money. His wife testified that he "never carried much money, not very much more than $10." Such were the facts in relation to respondents' theory of murder.

Finally, one of the Frisco foremen testified that he arrived at the scene shortly after Haney was found injured. He later examined the fireman's side of the train very carefully and found nothing sticking out or in disorder. In explaining why he examined this side of the train so carefully he stated that while he was at the scene of the accident "someone said they thought that train No. 106 backing in to Grand Central Station is what struck this man" and that Haney "was supposed to have been struck by something protruding on the side of the train." The foreman testified that these statements were made by an unknown Illinois Central switchman standing near the fallen body of Haney. The foreman admitted that the switchman "didn't see the accident." This testimony was admitted by the trial court over the strenuous objections of respondents' counsel that it was mere hearsay falling outside the res gestae rule.

The jury was instructed that Frisco's trustees were liable if it was found that they negligently permitted a rod or other object to extend out from the side of the train as it backed past Haney and that Haney was killed as the direct result of such negligence, if any. The jury was further told that Illinois Central was liable if it was found that the company negligently maintained an unsafe and dangerous place for Haney to work, in that the ground was high and uneven and the light insufficient and inadequate, and that Haney was injured and killed as a direct result of the said place being unsafe and dangerous. This latter instruction as to Illinois Central did not require the jury to find that Haney was killed by something protruding from the train.

66

The Supreme Court, in upsetting the jury's verdict against both the Frisco trustees and the Illinois Central, admitted that "It could be inferred from the facts that Haney could have been struck by the mail hook knob if he were standing on the south side of the mound and the mail hook extended out as far as 12 or 14 inches." * * * But it held that "all reasonable minds would agree that it would be mere speculation and conjecture to say that Haney was struck by the mail hook" and that "plaintiff failed to make a submissible case on that question." It also ruled that there "was no substantial evidence that the uneven ground and insufficient light were causes or contributing causes of the death of Haney." Finally, the Supreme Court held that the testimony of the foreman as to the statement made to him by the unknown switchman was inadmissible under the res gestae rule since the switchman spoke from what he had heard rather than from his own knowledge.

* * *

The evidence we have already detailed demonstrates that there was evidence from which it might be inferred that the end of the mail hook struck Haney in the back of the head, an inference that the Supreme Court admitted could be drawn. That inference is not rendered unreasonable by the fact that Haney apparently fell forward toward the main Frisco track so that his head was 5½ feet north of the rail. He may well have been struck and then wandered in a daze to the point where he fell forward. The testimony as to blood marks some distance away from his head lends credence to that possibility, indicating that he did not fall immediately upon being hit. When that is added to the evidence most favorable to the petitioner as to the height and swing-out of the hook, the height and location of the mound and the nature of Haney's duties, the inference that Haney was killed by the hook cannot be said to be unsupported by probative facts or to be so unreasonable as to warrant taking the case from the jury.

It is true that there is evidence tending to show that it was physically and mathematically impossible for the hook to strike Haney. And there are facts from which it might reasonably be inferred that Haney was murdered. But such evidence has become irrelevant upon appeal, there being a reasonable basis in the record for inferring that the hook struck Haney. The jury having made that inference, the respondents were not free to relitigate the factual dispute in a reviewing court. Under these circumstances it would be an undue invasion of the jury’s historic function for an appellate court to weigh the conflicting evidence, judge the credibility of witnesses and arrive at a conclusion opposite from the one reached by the jury. * * *

It is no answer to say that the jury’s verdict involved speculation and conjecture. Whenever facts are in dispute or the evidence is such that fair-minded men may draw different inferences, a measure of speculation and conjecture is required on the part of those whose duty it is to settle the dispute by choosing what seems to them to be the most reasonable inference. Only when there is a complete absence of probative facts to support the conclusion reached does a reversible error appear. But where, as here, there is an evidentiary basis for the jury’s verdict, the jury is free to discard or disbelieve whatever facts are inconsistent with its conclusion. And the appellate court’s function is exhausted when that evidentiary basis becomes apparent. * * *

We are unable, therefore, to sanction a reversal of the jury’s verdict against Frisco’s trustees. Nor can we approve any disturbance in the verdict as to Illinois Central. The evidence was uncontradicted that it was very dark at the place where Haney was working and the surrounding ground was high and uneven. The evidence also showed that this area was entirely within the domination and control of Illinois Central * * *. It was not unreasonable to conclude that these conditions constituted an unsafe and dangerous working place * * *.

In view of the foregoing disposition of the case, it is unnecessary to decide whether the allegedly hearsay testimony was admissible under the res gestae rule. Rulings on the admissibility of evidence must normally be left to the sound discretion of the trial judge in actions under the Federal Employers’ Liability Act. But inasmuch as there is adequate support in the record for the jury’s verdict apart from the hearsay testimony, we need not determine whether that discretion was abused in this instance.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Missouri is reversed and the case is remanded for whatever further proceedings may be necessary not inconsistent with this opinion.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE and JUSTICE FRANKFURTER concur in the result.

JUSTICE REED dissents.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Why does a trial judge or an appellate court have the power to take a case away from the jury or to set aside its verdict? Does the existence of this power necessarily mean that a jury cannot properly refer to its members’ own knowledge? See Texas Employers’ Ins. Ass’n v. Price, p. 59, supra. Why?

2.In PENNSYLVANIA R. CO. v. CHAMBERLAIN, 288 U.S. 333, 339, 53 S.Ct. 391, 393, 77 L.Ed. 819, 822–23 (1933), the Supreme Court, in approving a directed verdict for defendant, said:

* * * At most there was an inference to that effect drawn from observed facts which gave equal support to the opposite inference * * *.

We, therefore, have a case belonging to that class of cases where proven facts give equal support to each of two inconsistent inferences; in which event, neither of them being established, judgment, as a matter of law, must go against the party upon whom rests the necessity of sustaining one of these inferences as against the other, before he is entitled to recover.

Is this language consistent with the opinion of the Court in the principal case? Is there a difference between cases in which the evidence simply fails to point one way or the other, and cases in which the evidence on one side is overwhelming, in terms of taking a case away from the jury? Would Lavender have been decided the same way had stronger evidence of murder been presented?

3.When Lavender is remanded to the Missouri Supreme Court, what should that court do? In this connection, do you agree with the United States Supreme Court that it was unnecessary to determine whether evidence of the statement of the unknown switchman was improperly admitted?

4.APPEAL

The grounds for appeal are chiefly mistakes of law—for example, an erroneous ruling that the court had jurisdiction, an improper admission of evidence, or an incorrect instruction to the jury. Even if an error of law has been committed, the appellate court must be convinced that the error was prejudicial, and that the case probably would not have come out the same if the error had not occurred. In the event of an erroneous ruling on jurisdiction, the prejudice is obvious. But appellate courts are reluctant to reverse merely because an error has been committed during the trial.

An appellate court rarely will reverse a decision on the ground that a question of fact was decided improperly. If there has been a jury, the constitutional right to jury trial itself is involved in such a ruling by an appellate court. See the Seventh Amendment to the United States Constitution in the Supplement. When there has been no jury, no constitutional problem is involved, but should there nevertheless be concern that a broad scope of review of the trial judge’s findings of fact will encourage needless appeals and denigrate the function of the trial judge?

SOBELOFF, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

This action was brought under the Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1346, to recover damages for the death of Carol Greitens. The plaintiff, administrator of her estate, alleges that death was due to the negligence of the doctor on duty at the dispensary of the United States Naval Amphibious Base, Little Creek, Virginia, in diagnosing and treating her illness. The District Court, concluding that the evidence was insufficient to establish that the doctor was negligent, or that his concededly erroneous diagnosis and treatment was the proximate cause of her death, dismissed the complaint. * * *

69

The decedent, 25 years of age, had been a diabetic since the age of 13, although the condition was under control. * * * Mrs. Greitens' husband brought her to the dispensary at about 4 a.m. on August 25, 1963, suffering from intense abdominal pain and continual vomiting which had begun suddenly an hour before. The corpsman on duty in the examining room procured her medical records, obtained a brief history, took her blood pressure, pulse, temperature, and respiration and summoned the doctor on duty, then asleep in his room at the dispensary. The doctor arrived 15 or 20 minutes later and after questioning the patient concerning her symptoms, felt her abdomen and listened to her bowel sounds with the aid of a stethoscope. Recording his diagnosis on the chart as gastroenteritis, he told Mrs. Greitens that she had a "bug" in her stomach, prescribed some drugs for the relief of pain, and released her with instructions to return in eight hours. The examination took approximately ten minutes.

The patient returned to her home, and after another episode of vomiting, took the prescribed medicine and lay down. At about noon, she arose and drank a glass of water, vomited immediately thereafter and fell to the floor unconscious. She was rushed to the dispensary, but efforts to revive her were unsuccessful. She was pronounced dead at 12:48 p.m. and an autopsy revealed that she had a high obstruction, diagnosed formally as an abnormal congenital peritoneal hiatus with internal herniation into this malformation of some of the loops of the small intestine. Death was due to a massive hemorrhagic infarction of the intestine resulting from its strangulation.

I

The plaintiff contends that the doctor at the dispensary did not meet the requisite standard of care and skill demanded of him by the law of Virginia. Compliance with this standard, the plaintiff maintains, would have required a more extended examination and immediate hospitalization. More specifically, plaintiff's expert witnesses, two general practitioners in the Norfolk-Virginia Beach area, testified that, according to prevailing practice in the community, the doctor should have inquired whether the patient had had diarrhea and should have made a rectal examination to determine whether the patient was suffering from an obstruction rather than from gastroenteritis. While the latter condition does not ordinarily require immediate radical treatment, a high obstruction is almost invariably lethal unless promptly operated upon. Plaintiff's experts further testified that on observing the symptoms manifested by Mrs. Greitens, the procedure of general practitioners in the community would have been to order immediate hospitalization. * * *

70

The standard of care which Virginia law exacts from a physician, in this case a general practitioner, is * * * [such that] if he uses ordinary care in reaching his diagnosis, and thereafter acts upon it, he incurs no liability, even if the diagnosis proves to be a mistake in judgment.

It is undisputed that the symptoms of high obstruction and of gastroenteritis are quite similar. The District Court placed great emphasis on this fact as an indication that the doctor's erroneous diagnosis was not negligent, but was merely an error of judgment. It would seem, however, that where the symptoms are consistent with either of two possible conditions, one lethal if not attended to promptly, due care demands that a doctor do more than make a cursory examination and then release the patient. * * * The fact that an intestinal obstruction is a rare occurrence, and that some form of gastroenteritis is the more likely of the two conditions, does not excuse the failure to make inquiries and perform recognized additional tests that might have served to distinguish the one condition from the other. The dispensary doctor himself, as well as the experts for both sides, agreed that an inquiry as to diarrhea and a rectal examination were the "proper procedure" and "the accepted standard" in order to be able to rule out gastroenteritis and to make a definite diagnosis of high intestinal obstruction. If he had made the inquiry which he admits was the accepted standard, he would at least have been alerted to the fact that the case was one calling for close observation with a view to immediate surgical intervention if the graver diagnosis were confirmed. In these circumstances, failure to make this investigation constitutes a lack of due care on the part of the physician. * * * Only if a patient is adequately examined, is there no liability for an erroneous diagnosis.

Our conclusion that the physician was negligent in his diagnosis and treatment of the patient is not inconsistent with * * * [Federal Rule] 52(a), which declares that the trial judge's findings of fact are not to be disturbed unless clearly erroneous.⁵ This Rule comes into play primarily where the trial judge as fact finder has had to reconcile conflicting testimony. Where the veracity of witnesses is in issue, the decision is for the judge who has had the opportunity to see and evaluate the witnesses' demeanor. * * * But we are dealing here with the testimony of expert witnesses who are not in controversy as to the basic facts; thus, the opportunity of the trial court to observe the witnesses is of limited significance. It has often been held that where the trial court’s conclusions are based on undisputed facts, they are not entitled to the finality customarily accorded basic factual findings under Rule 52(a). * * *

The question before us is not one of fact in the usual sense, but rather whether the undisputed facts manifest negligence. Although the absence of a factual dispute does not always mean that the conclusion is a question of law, it becomes so here since the ultimate conclusion to be drawn from the basic facts, i.e., the existence or absence of negligence, is actually a question of law. For this reason, the general rule has been that when a judge sitting without a jury makes a determination of negligence his conclusion, as distinguished from the evidentiary findings leading to it, is freely reviewable on appeal. * * * The determination of negligence involves not only the formulation of the legal standard, but more particularly in this case, its application to the evidentiary facts as established; and since these are uncontested, there is no basis for applying the “clearly erroneous” rule. * * *

The government’s expert opined that the dispensary physician exercised “average judgment,” but analysis of his entire testimony points unavoidably to the opposite conclusion. Revealing are his statements that it was wrong not to inquire about diarrhea, conceding that “that is one question that one usually asks,” and that given a patient with abdominal pain of one hour’s duration, it is too soon “to expect anybody to come up with a proper diagnosis.” Furthermore, his opinion was predicated upon a factual assumption not permissible in this case. His assumption was that the dispensary physician had made only a “working” or “tentative” diagnosis * * *. However, the uncontradicted evidence indicates that this was not a “tentative” diagnosis.

The examining doctor himself testified that he had already considered and ruled out at the beginning of his examination the possibility of an obstruction without making the additional differentiating diagnostic tests. He said that his only reason for asking the patient to return eight hours later was because her diabetic condition could become complicated by a case of gastroenteritis. * * * By releasing the patient, the dispensary physician made his diagnosis final, allowing no further opportunity for revision * * *.

On careful scrutiny, therefore, the government’s expert is seen to have demonstrated that the examiner did not conform to the required standard of care. Coupled with the explicit testimony of the plaintiff’s experts, the government’s testimony leads us inevitably to the conclusion that the doctor was negligent as a matter of law. We think that the District Court gave undue weight to the purely conclusory opinion of the government witness. The District Court is not bound by his statement that “average judgment” had been exercised, nor are we bound by it. Only the standard of care is to be established by the testimony of experts. If under the undisputed facts the defendant failed to meet that standard it is not for the expert but for the court to decide whether there was negligence.

* * *

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for the determination of damages.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Would the Court of Appeals have reached the same result if the judgment appealed from had been based on the verdict of a jury rather than the findings of a judge? What is the difference between the standard enunciated in Lavender v. Kurn and that in Federal Rule 52(a)?

2.Is the question whether conduct is negligent one of law or of fact? Legal scholars have long debated the issue. In any event, the issue ordinarily is left to the jury. Why? Are the reasons for giving the issue to the jury any less persuasive when the finder of fact is a judge sitting without a jury? Is there a difference if the standard of care to be applied by the judge sitting without a jury must be derived from the testimony of experts? Why?

3.Should the standard of review be the same for findings of fact based on demeanor evidence as for documentary evidence? In ANDERSON v. CITY OF BESSEMER CITY, 470 U.S. 564, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985), the Supreme Court, in interpreting Federal Rule 52(a), said: “Where there are two permissible views of the evidence, the factfinder’s choice between them cannot be clearly erroneous.” The Court added:

This is so even when the district court’s findings do not rest on credibility determinations, but are based instead on physical or documentary evidence or inferences from others facts. To be sure, various Courts of Appeals have on occasion asserted the theory that an appellate court may exercise de novo review over findings not based on credibility determinations. * * *

The rationale for deference to the original finder of fact is not limited to the superiority of the trial judge’s position to make determinations of credibility. The trial judge’s major role is the determination of fact, and with experience in fulfilling that role comes expertise. Duplication of the trial judge’s efforts in the court of appeals would very likely contribute only negligibly to the accuracy of fact determination at a huge cost in diversion of judicial resources. * * * As the Court has stated in a different context, the trial on the merits should be “the ‘main event’ * * * rather than a ‘tryout on the road.’ ”

Id. at 574–75, 105 S.Ct. at 1511–12, 84 L.Ed.2d at 528–29. Does Anderson undermine the basis of the Fourth Circuit’s holding in Hicks?

5.CONCLUSIVENESS OF JUDGMENTS

Lawsuits are designed to settle disputes. An idealist might argue that nothing should be considered settled until it is settled correctly. A pragmatist could counter that nothing is settled at all unless it is settled finally. Cosmic questions may be debated endlessly, but controversies between individuals that are expected to result in enforceable judgments for damages or orders that must be obeyed under penalty of contempt must come to an end if the judicial process is to work at all. Res judicata requires that occasionally the legal system will let a judgment stand even if it becomes convinced that it was wrongly decided. A doctrine that only correct decisions have res judicata effect would furnish no finality at all.

The following case decided more than three hundred years ago raises the same doubts that the res judicata doctrine raises today: Is the decision fair to plaintiff? Would an opposite decision be fair to defendant?

FETTER v. BEAL, 1 Ld. Raym. 339, 91 Eng. Rep. 1122 (King’s Bench 1697). Plaintiff had brought an action for battery against defendant and recovered £11. Subsequently “part of his skull by reason of the said battery came out of his head,” and plaintiff brought another action. Plaintiff’s counsel argued that “this action differed from the nature of the former * * * because the recovery in the former action was only for the bruise and battery, but here there is a maihem by the loss of the skull.”

The Court continued:

And per totam Curiam, the jury in the former action considered the nature of the wound, and gave damages for all the damages that it had done to the plaintiff; and therefore a recovery in the said action is good here. And it is the plaintiff’s fault, for if he had not been so hasty, he might have been satisfied for this loss of the skull also. Judgment for the defendant * * *.

Id. at 339–40, 91 Eng. Rep. at 1123.

A particularly difficult question of res judicata is presented when it is alleged that the first decision—now advanced as conclusive—was rendered by a court that lacked jurisdiction over the subject matter. This group of Illustrative Cases began with a decision that demonstrated the grave concern of the Supreme Court to keep the federal courts from deciding cases outside their constitutional and statutory jurisdiction. Was res judicata involved in Capron v. Van Noorden, p. 29, supra, or was the circuit court’s decision reversed in the ordinary course of appellate review? What if plaintiff in that case had not sought a writ of error but had permitted the decision to become final and then instituted another action?

DES MOINES NAVIGATION & RAILROAD CO. v. IOWA HOMESTEAD CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1887.
123 U.S. 552, 8 S.Ct. 217, 31 L.Ed. 202.

Error to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa.

CHIEF JUSTICE WAITE delivered the opinion of the court.

This suit was brought by the Iowa Homestead Company against the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company to recover the same taxes for the years 1864 to 1871, both inclusive, which formed part of the subject matter of the litigation between the same parties in Homestead Co. v. Railroad, 17 Wall. 153 * * *. The Railroad Company set up the decree in its favor in that suit as a bar to the present action, and to this the Homestead Company replied “that the decree or judgment referred to is null and void, for the reason that the courts of the United States had no jurisdiction of said suit, and no legal power or authority to render said decree or judgment.”

* * *

* * * It must be conceded that the Homestead Company and the Navigation and Railroad Company were both Iowa corporations, and, therefore, in law, citizens of the same State; but the defendants * * * who caused the removal to be made [from the Iowa state court to the United States Circuit Court], were citizens of the State of New York. After the removal was effected, all the above named defendants, as well as * * * the Navigation and Railroad Company, appeared, filed answers, and defended the action. The Homestead Company took issue on all the answers, and actually contested the matters in dispute with the Navigation and Railroad Company, as well as the other defendants, in the Circuit Court, and in this court on appeal, without taking any objection to the jurisdiction.

The precise question we have now to determine is whether the adjudication by this court, under such circumstances, of the matters then and now at issue between the Homestead Company and the Navigation and Railroad Company was absolutely void for want of jurisdiction. The point is not whether it was error in the Circuit Court to take jurisdiction of the suit, or of so much of it as related to the Navigation and Railroad Company, originally, but as to the binding effect of the decree of this court so long as it remains in force, and is not judicially annulled, vacated, or set aside.

* * *

It was settled by this court at a very early day, that, although the judgments and decrees of the Circuit Courts might be erroneous, if the records failed to show the facts on which the jurisdiction of the court rested, such as that the plaintiffs were citizens of different States from the defendants, yet that they were not nullities, and would bind the parties until reversed or otherwise set aside. * * * In * * * McCormick v. Sullivan, 10 Wheat. 192 [(1825)] * * * this court held on appeal that “the courts of the United States are courts of limited, but not of inferior, jurisdiction. If the jurisdiction be not alleged in the proceedings, their judgments and decrees may be reversed for that cause on a writ of error or appeal; but until reversed they are conclusive between the parties and their privies.” “But they are not nullities.” There has never been any departure from this rule.

It is said, however, that these decisions apply only to cases where the record simply fails to show jurisdiction. Here it is claimed that the record shows there could be no jurisdiction, because it appears affirmatively that the Navigation and Railroad Company, one of the defendants, was a citizen of the same State with the plaintiff. But the record shows, with equal distinctness, that all the parties were actually before the court, and made no objection to its jurisdiction. The act of 1867, under which the removal was had, provided that when a suit was pending in a state court “in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another State, * * * such citizen of another State, * * * if he will make and file an affidavit stating that he has reason to and does believe that, from prejudice or local influence, he will not be able to obtain justice in such state court, may * * * file a petition in such state court for the removal of the suit” into the Circuit Court of the United States, and, when all things have been done that the act requires, “it shall be * * * the duty of the state court to * * * proceed no further with the suit,” and, after the record is entered in the Circuit Court, “the suit shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process.”^d

In the suit now under consideration there was a separate and distinct controversy between the plaintiff, a citizen of Iowa, and each of the citizens of New York, who were defendants. Each controversy related to the several tracts of land claimed by each defendant individually, and not as joint owner with the other defendants. Three of the citizens of New York caused to be made and filed the necessary affidavit and petition for removal, and thereupon, by common consent apparently, the suit as an entirety was transferred to the Circuit Court for final adjudication as to all the parties. * * * Whether in such a case the suit could be removed was a question for the Circuit Court to decide when it was called on to take jurisdiction. If it kept the case when it ought to have been remanded, or if it proceeded to adjudicate upon matters in dispute between two citizens of Iowa, when it ought to have confined itself to those between the citizens of Iowa and the citizens of New York, its final decree in the suit could have been reversed, on appeal, as erroneous, but the decree would not have been a nullity. To determine whether the suit was removable in whole or in part or not, was certainly within the power of the Circuit Court. The decision of that question was the exercise and the rightful exercise of jurisdiction, no matter whether in favor of or against taking the cause. Whether its decision was right, in this or any other respect, was to be finally determined by this court on appeal. As the Circuit Court entertained the suit, and this court, on appeal, impliedly recognized its right to do so, and proceeded to dispose of the case finally on its merits, certainly our decree cannot, in the light of prior adjudications on the same general question, be deemed a nullity. It was, at the time of the trial in the present case in the court below, a valid and subsisting prior adjudication of the matters in controversy, binding on these parties, and a bar to this action. In refusing so to decide, the court failed to give full faith and credit to the decree of this court * * * and this was error.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Was it critical to the Court’s opinion in Des Moines that the first case had been heard and determined by the Supreme Court itself? Would the case have been decided differently if no review had been sought in the first action at all?
2. Was the fact that the question of jurisdiction was a doubtful one at the time the first Homestead Company case arose relevant to the Supreme Court’s decision in the second case?
3. Suppose that the issue of jurisdiction is raised in a case and erroneously decided. Is this a factor arguing for or against the application of res judicata in a second action?
4. Since it is clear in the principal case that in the suit before the Court there was no diversity of citizenship and the writ of error was to the Supreme Court of Iowa, what was the basis for appellate jurisdiction in the United States Supreme Court?
5. When a court has rendered a judgment in a contested action, the general view is that the judgment precludes the parties from litigating the question of the court’s subject-matter jurisdiction in subsequent litigation except if:
 - (a) The subject matter of the action was so plainly beyond the court’s jurisdiction that its entertaining the action was a manifest abuse of authority; or

- (b) Allowing the judgment to stand would substantially infringe upon the authority of another tribunal or agency of government; or
 - (c) The judgment was rendered by a court lacking capability to make an adequately informed determination of a question concerning its own jurisdiction and as a matter of procedural fairness the party seeking to avoid the judgment should have opportunity belatedly to attack the court’s subject matter jurisdiction.

Restatement (Second), Judgments § 12 (1982). What factors should a court regard as important in deciding such questions as whether there has been “a manifest abuse of authority,” or a judgment “substantially” infringes a tribunal’s authority, or a court lacks “capability to make an adequately informed determination”?

^aIf Cecil is not a citizen of Aikin’s state but Beasley is, then one of the considerations Aikin will have in deciding to join Beasley as a defendant is the effect on the availability of subject-matter jurisdiction in the federal courts. If Aikin wants to be in the federal court, she should not join Beasley; if Aikin wants the lawsuit to begin and stay in a state court, she should join him. In the latter case, there will not be complete diversity of citizenship between plaintiff on the one side and defendants on the other.

¹The meddling and interference upon which appellant lays so much stress before us is stated in the complaint in these words:
“That on or about March 1, 1959, that he, the Plaintiff, publicly announced his candidacy for the office of Supervisor of District Five (5) of Adams County, Mississippi, and Plaintiff shows further that on or about March 28, 1959, the Defendants * * * [began] to and did meddle and interfere with the Plaintiff’s work as agent of the State Farm Insurance Companies in disregard of the agreement between the Defendants and the Plaintiff. The Plaintiff was informed orally and by letter by representatives of his principals that his agency would have to be handled in a particular manner and he was directed as to when, how and why his work should be done in a certain manner and was orally informed as well as by letter that he would have to submit his decision as to whether he would be a candidate for the office of supervisor or have his contract or appointment with State Farm Insurance Companies terminated as of May 1, 1959, all of which was done wrongfully in malicious and wanton disregard of the Plaintiff’s rights according to his appointment as agent of the Defendants, State Farm Insurance Companies, with the intention of coercing the Plaintiff into withdrawing from the political race and devoting his full time as an employee in the master and servant relationship to the performance of his service for said Defendants.
“Plaintiff charges and avers that the malicious intentional and wrongful direction as to his activities as agent of the Defendants was such a breach and repudiation of his contract or agreement with him as set out in Exhibit I as to entitle him, the Plaintiff to damages for the loss due to the breach or repudiation of the said agreement listed as Exhibit I.”

² E.g., immediately following the language quoted in Footnote 1, supra, the complaint charges the following:
“Plaintiff further shows unto the Court that at the time of the said repudiation or breach of contract by the Defendants, that the Plaintiff’s income from the Defendants for the previous year was nine thousand seventy-three ($9,073.00) dollars and that the Plaintiff’s life expectancy at his present age of 45 was 25.21 years according to the C.S.O. Mortality table, and that but for the wrongful breach, repudiation and termination of the Plaintiff’s contract of agency with the Defendants, the Plaintiff would have been entitled to continued remuneration from the Defendants for the sum of two hundred twenty-six thousand, seven hundred twenty-five ($226,725.00) dollars and that but for the malicious, wanton meddling and interfering and wrongful breach, repudiation and cancellation of the Plaintiff’s contract the Plaintiff is entitled to punitive damages in the sum of two hundred thousand ($200,000) dollars.”
The judgment demanded against the three defendants, appellees, was the sum of the two figures mentioned above.

^bIn 2007, the term “indispensable party” was deleted from Rule 19(b) and the term “required party” was substituted.
^cThis provision has been renumbered as Rule 52(a)(6).
^d The Judiciary Act of 1789 had been interpreted by the Supreme Court to require complete diversity of citizenship (all the plaintiffs being of a citizenship different from that of any defendant) for removal. It was widely argued that the 1867 statute referred to in the Des Moines case, because of a difference in language, did not have the same requirement. The Supreme Court held that the 1867 statute did require complete diversity, see Case of the Sewing Machine Cos., 85 U.S. (18 Wall.) 553, 21 L.Ed. 914 (1874), but this decision came a year after the Court’s decision in the Homestead Company’s first suit, in which the issue had not been raised.

CHAPTER 2

JURISDICTION OVER THE PARTIES OR THEIR PROPERTY

■ ■ ■

This chapter explores the doctrine of personal jurisdiction: the power of a court to enter a judgment against a person or a thing. A court can assert personal jurisdiction only if the exercise of power is authorized by statute and is consistent with the Due Process Clause of the federal Constitution. The earliest recognized basis for a court’s assertion of such power was the presence of defendant within the territorial boundaries of the state in which the tribunal sat. This rationale did not permit the state to exercise power over a defendant who caused injury within its borders but was not physically present within the territory when plaintiff sought to serve process on the party. As the national economy grew and technology fostered the movement of goods and people across state boundaries, new justifications developed for when a court could exercise power over a defendant who was out-of-state at the time of service but earlier had caused harm in the forum state. The law in this area continues to develop and today faces significant conceptual pressures from the “borderless” worlds of the global and virtual economy. The resulting doctrine is both significant and complex—what one federal judge, borrowing from Winston Churchill, called “a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma.” Donatelli v. National Hockey League, 893 F.2d 459, 462 (1st Cir. 1990).

A. THE TRADITIONAL BASES FOR JURISDICTION

PENNOYER V. NEFF

Supreme Court of the United States, 1877.
95 U.S. \(5 Otto\) 714, 24 L.Ed. 565.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Oregon.
JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action to recover the possession of a tract of land, of the alleged value of $15,000, situated in the State of Oregon. The plaintiff asserts title to the premises by a patent of the United States issued to him in [March] 1866, under the Act of Congress of claims to have acquired the premises under a sheriff's deed, made upon a sale of the property on execution issued upon a judgment recovered against the plaintiff in one of the circuit courts of the State. The case turns upon the validity of this judgment.

September 27th, 1850, 9 Stat. at L., 496, usually known as the Donation Law of Oregon. The defendant

It appears from the record that the judgment was rendered in February, 1866, in favor of J.H. Mitchell, for less than $300, including costs, in an action brought by him upon a demand for services as an attorney; that, at the time the action was commenced and the judgment rendered, the defendant therein, the plaintiff here, was a non-resident of the State; that he was not personally served with process, and did not appear therein; and that the judgment was entered upon his default in not answering the complaint, upon a constructive service of summons by publication.

The Code of Oregon provides for such service when an action is brought against a non-resident and absent defendant, who has property within the State. It also provides, where the action is for the recovery of money or damages, for the attachment of the property of the non-resident. And it also declares that no natural person is subject to the jurisdiction of a court of the State, "unless he appear in the court, or be found within the State, or be a resident thereof, or have property therein; and in the last case, only to the extent of such property at the time the jurisdiction attached." Construing this latter provision to mean that, in an action for money or damages where a defendant does not appear in the court, and is not found within the State, and is not a resident thereof, but has property therein, the jurisdiction of the court extends only over such property, the declaration expresses a principle of general, if not universal, law. The authority of every tribunal is necessarily restricted by the territorial limits of the State in which it is established. Any attempt to exercise authority beyond those limits would be deemed in every other forum, as has been said by this court, an illegitimate assumption of power, and be resisted as mere abuse. * * * In the case against the plaintiff, the property here in controversy sold under the judgment rendered was not attached, nor in any way brought under the jurisdiction of the court. Its first connection with the case was caused by a levy of the execution. It was not, therefore, disposed of pursuant to any adjudication, but only in enforcement of a personal judgment, having no relation to the property, rendered against a non-resident without service of process upon him in the action, or his appearance therein. The court below did not consider that an attachment of the property was essential to its jurisdiction or to the validity of the sale, but held that the judgment was invalid from defects in the affidavit upon which the order of publication was obtained, and in the affidavit by which the publication was proved.

There is some difference of opinion among the members of this court as to the rulings upon these alleged defects. The majority are of opinion that, inasmuch as the statute requires, for an order of publication, that certain facts shall appear by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court or judge, defects in such affidavit can only be taken advantage of on appeal, or by some other direct proceeding, and cannot be urged to impeach the judgment collaterally. The majority of the court are also of opinion that the provision of the statute requiring proof of the publication in a newspaper to be made by the "affidavit of the printer, or his foreman, or his principal clerk," is satisfied when the affidavit is made by the editor of the paper. The term "printer," in their judgment, is there used not to indicate the person who sets up the type—he does not usually have a foreman or clerks—it is rather used as synonymous with publisher. * * *

If, therefore, we were confined to the rulings of the court below upon the defects in the affidavits mentioned, we should be unable to uphold its decision. But it was also contended in that court, and is insisted upon here, that the judgment in the State Court against the plaintiff was void for want of personal service of process on him, or of his appearance in the action in which it was rendered, and that the premises in controversy could not be subjected to the payment of the demand of a resident creditor except by a proceeding in rem; that is, by a direct proceeding against the property for that purpose. If these positions are sound, the ruling of the Circuit Court as to the invalidity of that judgment must be sustained, notwithstanding our dissent from the reasons upon which it was made. And that they are sound would seem to follow from two well established principles of public law respecting the jurisdiction of an independent State over persons and property. The several States of the Union are not, it is true, in every respect independent, many of the rights and powers which originally belonged to them being now vested in the government created by the Constitution. But, except as restrained and limited by that instrument, they possess and exercise the authority of independent States, and the principles of public law to which we have referred are applicable to them. One of these principles is, that every State possesses exclusive jurisdiction and sovereignty over persons and property within its territory. As a consequence, every State has the power to determine for itself the civil status and capacities of its inhabitants; to prescribe the subjects upon which they may contract, the forms and solemnities with which their contracts shall be executed, the rights and obligations arising from them, and the mode in which their validity shall be determined and their obligations enforced; and also to regulate the manner and conditions upon which property situated within such territory, both personal and real, may be acquired, enjoyed and transferred. The other principle of public law referred to follows from the one mentioned; that is, that no State can exercise direct jurisdiction and authority over persons or property without its territory. * * * The several States are of equal dignity and authority, and the independence of one implies the exclusion of power from all others. And so it is laid down by jurists, as an elementary principle, that the laws of one State have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as is allowed by comity; and that no tribunal established by it can extend its process beyond that territory so as to subject either persons or property to its decisions. * * *

But as contracts made in one State may be enforceable only in another State, and property may be held by non-residents, the exercise of the jurisdiction which every State is admitted to possess over persons and property within its own territory will often affect persons and property without it. To any influence exerted in this way by a State affecting persons resident or property situated elsewhere, no objection can be justly taken; whilst any direct exertion of authority upon them, in an attempt to give ex-territorial operation to its laws, or to enforce an ex-territorial jurisdiction by its tribunals, would be deemed an encroachment upon the independence of the State in which the persons are domiciled or the property is situated, and be resisted as usurpation.

Thus the State, through its tribunals, may compel persons domiciled within its limits to execute, in pursuance of their contracts respecting property elsewhere situated, instruments in such form and with such solemnities as to transfer the title, so far as such formalities can be complied with; and the exercise of this jurisdiction in no manner interferes with the supreme control over the property by the State within which it is situated. * * *

So the State, through its tribunals, may subject property situated within its limits owned by non-residents to the payment of the demand of its own citizens against them; and the exercise of this jurisdiction in no respect infringes upon the sovereignty of the State where the owners are domiciled. Every State owes protection to its own citizens; and, when non-residents deal with them, it is a legitimate and just exercise of authority to hold and appropriate any property owned by such non-residents to satisfy the claims of its citizens. It is in virtue of the State's jurisdiction over the property of the non-resident situated within its limits that its tribunals can inquire into that non-resident's obligations to its own citizens, and the inquiry can then be carried only to the extent necessary to control the disposition of the property. If the non-resident has no property in the State, there is nothing upon which the tribunals can adjudicate.

* * * If, without personal service, judgments in personam, obtained ex parte against non-residents and absent parties, upon mere publication of process, which, in the great majority of cases, would never be seen by the parties interested, could be upheld and enforced, they would be the constant instruments of fraud and oppression. Judgments for all sorts of claims upon contracts and for torts, real or pretended, would be thus obtained, under which property would be seized, when the evidence of the transactions upon which they were founded, if they ever had any existence, had perished.

Substituted service by publication, or in any other authorized form, may be sufficient to inform parties of the object of proceedings taken where property is once brought under the control of the court by seizure or some equivalent act. The law assumes that property is always in the possession of its owner, in person or by agent; and it proceeds upon the theory that its seizure will inform him, not only that it is taken into the custody of the court, but that he must look to any proceedings authorized by law upon such seizure for its condemnation and sale. * * * In other words, such service may answer in all actions which are substantially proceedings in rem. But where the entire object of the action is to determine the personal rights and obligations of the defendants, that is, where the suit is merely in personam, constructive service in this form upon a non-resident is ineffectual for any purpose. Process from the tribunals of one State cannot run into another State, and summon parties there domiciled to leave its territory and respond to proceedings against them. Publication of process or notice within the State where the tribunal sits cannot create any greater obligation upon the non-resident to appear. Process sent to him out of the State, and process published within it, are equally unavailing in proceedings to establish his personal liability.

The want of authority of the tribunals of a State to adjudicate upon the obligations of non-residents, where they have no property within its limits, is not denied by the court below; but the position is assumed that, where they have property within the State, it is immaterial whether the property is in the first instance brought under the control of the court by attachment or some other equivalent act, and afterwards applied by its judgment to the satisfaction of demands against its owner; or such demands be first established in a personal action, and the property of the non-resident be afterwards seized and sold on execution. But the answer to this position has already been given in the statement, that the jurisdiction of the court to inquire into and determine his obligations at all is only incidental to its jurisdiction over the property. Its jurisdiction in that respect cannot be made to depend upon facts to be ascertained after it has tried the cause and rendered the judgment. If the judgment be previously void, it will not become valid by the subsequent discovery of property of the defendant, or by his subsequent acquisition of it. The judgment, if void when rendered, will always remain void; it cannot occupy the doubtful position of being valid if property be found, and void if there be none. Even if the position assumed were confined to cases where the non-resident defendant possessed property in the State at the commencement of the action, it would still make the validity of the proceedings and judgment depend upon the question whether, before the levy of the execution, the defendant had or had not disposed of the property. If, before the levy, the property should be sold, then, according to this position, the judgment would not be binding. This doctrine would introduce a new element of uncertainty in judicial proceedings. The contrary is the law; the validity of every judgment depends upon the jurisdiction of the court before it is rendered, not upon what may occur subsequently. * * *

The force and effect of judgments rendered against non-residents without personal service of process upon them, or their voluntary appearance, have been the subject of frequent consideration in the courts of the United States and of the several States, as attempts have been made to enforce such judgments in States other than those in which they were rendered, under the provision of the Constitution requiring that “Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other State;” and the Act of Congress providing for the mode of authenticating such Acts, records and proceedings, and declaring that, when thus authenticated, “They shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the State from which they are or shall be taken.” In the earlier cases, it was supposed that the Act gave to all judgments the same effect in other States which they had by law in the State where rendered. But this view was afterwards qualified so as to make the Act applicable only when the court rendering the judgment had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, and not to preclude an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment was rendered, or the right of the State itself to exercise authority over the person or the subject-matter. * * *

Since the adoption of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, the validity of * * * judgments may be directly questioned, and their enforcement in the State resisted, on the ground that proceedings in a court of justice to determine the personal rights and obligations of parties over whom that court has no jurisdiction do not constitute due process of law. Whatever difficulty may be experienced in giving to those terms a definition which will embrace every permissible exertion of power affecting private rights, and exclude such as is forbidden, there can be no doubt of their meaning when applied to judicial proceedings. They then mean a course of legal proceedings according to those rules and principles which have been established in our systems of jurisprudence for the protection and enforcement of private rights. To give such proceedings any validity, there must be a tribunal competent by its constitution—that is, by the law of its creation—to pass upon the subject-matter of the suit; and, if that involves merely a determination of the personal liability of the defendant, he must be brought within its jurisdiction by service of process within the State, or his voluntary appearance.

Except in cases affecting the personal status of the plaintiff, and cases in which that mode of service may be considered to have been assented to in advance as hereinafter mentioned, the substituted service of process by publication allowed by the law of Oregon and by similar laws in other States, where actions are brought against non-residents, is effectual only where, in connection with process against the person for commencing the action, property in the State is brought under the control of the court, and subjected to its disposition by process adapted to that purpose, or where the judgment is sought as a means of reaching such property or affecting some interest therein; in other words, where the action is in the nature of a proceeding in rem. * * *

It is true that, in a strict sense, a proceeding in rem is one taken directly against property, and has for its object the disposition of the property, without reference to the title of individual claimants; but, in a larger and more general sense, the terms are applied to actions between parties, where the direct object is to reach and dispose of property owned by them, or of some interest therein. Such are cases commenced by attachment against the property of debtors, or instituted to partition real estate, foreclose a mortgage, or enforce a lien. So far as they affect property in the State, they are substantially proceedings in rem in the broader sense which we have mentioned.

* * *

It follows from the views expressed that the personal judgment recovered in the State Court of Oregon against the plaintiff herein, then a non-resident of the State, was without any validity, and did not authorize a sale of the property in controversy.

To prevent any misapplication of the views expressed in this opinion, it is proper to observe that we do not mean to assert, by anything we have said, that a State may not authorize proceedings to determine the status of one of its citizens towards a non-resident, which would be binding within the State, though made without service of process or personal notice to the non-resident. The jurisdiction which every State possesses to determine the civil status and capacities of all its inhabitants involves authority to prescribe the conditions on which proceedings affecting them may be commenced and carried on within its territory. The State, for example, has absolute right to prescribe the conditions upon which the marriage relation between its own citizens shall be created, and the causes for which it may be dissolved. One of the parties guilty of acts for which, by the law of the State, a dissolution may be granted, may have removed to a State where no dissolution is permitted. The complaining party would, therefore, fail if a divorce were sought in the State of the defendant; and if application could not be made to the tribunals of the complainant’s domicile in such case, and proceedings be there instituted without personal service of process or personal notice to the offending party, the injured citizen would be without redress. * * *

Neither do we mean to assert that a State may not require a non-resident entering into a partnership or association within its limits, or making contracts enforceable there, to appoint an agent or representative in the State to receive service of process and notice in legal proceedings instituted with respect to such partnership, association or contracts, or to designate a place where such service may be made and notice given, and provide, upon their failure, to make such appointment or to designate such place that service may be made upon a public officer designated for that purpose, or in some other prescribed way, and that judgments rendered upon such service may not be binding upon the non-residents both within and without the State. * * * Nor do we doubt that a State, on creating corporations or other institutions for pecuniary or charitable purposes, may provide a mode in which their conduct may be investigated, their obligations enforced, or their charters revoked, which shall require other than personal service upon their officers or members. * * *

In the present case, there is no feature of this kind and, consequently, no consideration of what would be the effect of such legislation in enforcing the contract of a non-resident can arise. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

[The dissenting opinion of JUSTICE HUNT is omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Justice Field's opinion in Pennoyer makes no mention of the unsavory characters and scandalous facts implicated in the dispute:

[The] story begins with a young man, Marcus Neff, heading across the country by covered wagon train, presumably to seek his fortune. Neff left Iowa in early 1848 * * * [and] was one of the earliest settlers to claim land under the Oregon Donation Act. * * *

Early in 1862 Neff made the unfortunate decision to consult a local Portland attorney, J.H. Mitchell. * * * Neff may have consulted Mitchell in an attempt to expedite the paperwork concerning his land patent. * * * "J.H. Mitchell" was actually the Oregon alias of one John Hipple. Hipple had been a teacher in Pennsylvania who, after being forced to marry the 15-year-old student whom he seduced, left teaching and took up law. * * * [I]n 1860 Hipple headed west taking with him four thousand dollars of client money and his then current paramour, a local school teacher. They made their way to California where Hipple abandoned the teacher * * * and moved on to Portland, Oregon. There, using the name John H. Mitchell, he quickly established himself as a successful lawyer, specializing in land litigation and railroad right-of-way cases. He also remarried without bothering to divorce his first wife. * * *

87

On November 3, 1865, Mitchell filed suit against Neff in Oregon state court [seeking payment for the legal services that had been rendered]. * * *

A default judgment * * * was entered against Neff on February 19, 1866. Although Mitchell had an immediate right to execute on the judgment, he waited until early June 1866 to seek a writ of execution, possibly waiting for the arrival of Neff's land patent. * * *

On August 7, 1866, the property was sold at a sheriff's auction * * *. Notably, the buyer was not Sylvester Pennoyer, as the Supreme Court opinion and commentators have implied. The property was purchased by none other than J. H. Mitchell, who three days later assigned the property to Sylvester Pennoyer. * * *

Following the litigation, Neff disappeared into obscurity; not so Pennoyer and Mitchell. Pennoyer went on to be Governor of Oregon * * *. Mitchell * * * was elected to the United States Senate in 1872, [but] lost his senate seat in 1879 * * *. * * * Shortly before the 1885 election, Judge Deady, the lower court judge in Pennoyer v. Neff, came into possession of a set of love letters which Mitchell had written to Mitchell's second wife's younger sister during the five years that he carried on an affair with her. Deady turned the love letters over to a newspaper, the Oregonian * * *. [However, in spite of] the scandal, Mitchell was [re]elected four days later * * *. In July of 1905, while still serving in the United States Senate, Mitchell was convicted [of land fraud] and sentenced to six months in jail, a $1,000 fine, and complete disbarment from public office.

Perdue, Sin, Scandal and Substantive Due Process: Personal Jurisdiction and Pennoyer Reconsidered, 62 Wash.L.Rev. 479, 481–90 (1987). Do the facts recounted by Professor Perdue affect whether the Oregon court properly exercised jurisdiction over Neff in Mitchell's initial lawsuit?

2. Traditional analysis distinguishes three types of jurisdiction. In a proceeding in personam, the court exercises its power to render a judgment for or against a person by virtue of that party's presence within the state's territory or citizenship there. In a proceeding in rem, the court exercises its power to determine the status of property located within its territory, and the determination of the court is binding with respect to all possible interest holders in that property. In a proceeding quasi in rem, the court renders a judgment for or against a person, but recovery is limited to the value of property that is within the jurisdiction and thus subject to the court's authority. The dispute that gives rise to an action quasi in rem may be related to the property or unrelated to it, and the property may be used to satisfy any judgment assessed in the action. Each of these types of power, to be effective, required service of process over the person or property subject to the state's jurisdiction ("attachment" is the term used for service upon property). Which of these bases of jurisdiction were at issue in Pennoyer?

88

3. The concepts of jurisdiction found in the Pennoyer opinion were derived from nineteenth-century international law. In the traditional international model, a citizen of Country A might have been injured by a citizen of Country B in Country A. The citizen of Country A seeking relief had three options: proceed against the citizen of Country B in personam in Country A (with the likelihood that the paper called a judgment would be worthless because the courts of Country B would not enforce it against citizens of Country B); proceed against the citizen of Country B quasi in rem in Country A (with the advantage that the property of the citizen of Country B in Country A would be available to satisfy at least part (possibly all) of the judgment); or proceed against the citizen of Country B in the courts of Country B (in the hope of winning a judgment enforceable in Country B). Given these choices, it is understandable that the citizen of Country A probably would prefer the courts of Country A to the courts of Country B, the latter being farther away and possibly more disposed to find in favor of its own citizens, and would sue quasi in rem in Country A, so at least partial payment would be assured.

How much weight ought United States jurisdictional doctrine give to the international model? Are there significant differences between the 50 states that make up the United States and sovereign nations within an international order? Do the states have the same kind of interest in adjudicating claims brought by their citizens as, say, France might have relative to England or to Germany? Are there similar concerns that a state might favor its citizens over the citizens of another state? Does the Full Faith and Credit Clause of the federal Constitution require states to recognize and enforce valid judgments by other states?

4. According to the territorial principle identified in Pennoyer, does defendant's length of time in the forum state affect the court's power to assert in personam jurisdiction? Does the reason for the person’s presence in the forum affect your answer to this question? In GRACE v. MACARTHUR, 170 F.Supp. 442 (E.D.Ark. 1959), defendant was served aboard a commercial flight from Tennessee to Texas when the plane was in air space over Arkansas. The federal court in Arkansas refused to quash the summons, holding that defendant was within the territorial limits of the state and so was amenable to suit if properly served.

5.Does Pennoyer’s territorial theory allow a court to exercise jurisdiction over a domiciliary who is not present in the state at the time of service? Should it matter whether the complaint alleges that defendant caused harm within the forum state? In MILLIKEN v. MEYER, 311 U.S. 457, 462–64, 61 S.Ct. 339, 342–43, 85 L.Ed. 278, 283–84 (1940), Milliken sued Meyer, a Wyoming domiciliary, in Wyoming state court. Personal service was effected in Colorado under a Wyoming statute that permitted out-of-state service upon a state resident who was absent from the state under specified circumstances. Meyer did not appear in the Wyoming action and an in personam judgment was entered against him. Four years later, Meyer asked a Colorado court to restrain Milliken’s enforcement of the Wyoming judgment. The United States

Supreme Court held that the Wyoming judgment was valid and entitled to Full Faith and Credit. According to the Court:

* * * Domicile in the state is alone sufficient to bring an absent defendant within the reach of the state’s jurisdiction for purposes of a personal judgment by means of appropriate substituted service. * * * [T]he authority of a state over one of its citizens is not terminated by the mere fact of his absence from the state. The state which accords him privileges and affords protection to him and his property by virtue of his domicile may also exact reciprocal duties. * * * [A domiciliary is amenable] to suit within the state even during sojourns without the state, where the state has provided and employed a reasonable method for apprising such an absent party of the proceedings against him.

The Court previously had held that a United States citizen living abroad is subject to in personam jurisdiction when served in a manner consistent with due process. In BLACKMER v. UNITED STATES, 284 U.S. 421, 52 S.Ct. 252, 76 L.Ed. 375 (1932), a United States citizen was served with a subpoena in France, requiring him to appear as a witness in the criminal trial arising from the Teapot Dome Scandal during President Harding’s administration. The Supreme Court held that personal service effected through the consul’s office satisfied due process.

6.Suppose a plaintiff brings suit in a forum with which the party has no connection other than invoking its jurisdiction. Should that forum be able to entertain a suit against plaintiff if defendant asserts the claim as a part of the same proceeding? Consider the Court’s analysis in ADAM v. SAENGER, 303 U.S. 59, 67–68, 58 S.Ct. 454, 458, 82 L.Ed. 649, 654–55 (1938):

There is nothing in the Fourteenth Amendment to prevent a state from adopting a procedure by which a judgment in personam may be rendered in a cross-action against a plaintiff in its courts, upon service of process or of appropriate pleading upon his attorney of record. The plaintiff having, by his voluntary act in demanding justice from the defendant, submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court, there is nothing arbitrary or unreasonable in treating him as being there for all purposes for which justice to the defendant requires his presence. It is the price which the state may exact as the condition of opening its courts to the plaintiff.

Does your analysis change if defendant—or some other third party—files a separate, unrelated action against the original plaintiff in the forum state? Would the court in the forum state have jurisdiction to hear the claim against the original plaintiff? Would such jurisdiction be based on plaintiff’s presence in the state or on some other notion? Should a state be permitted to condition the use of its courts on consent to the jurisdiction of those courts in actions unrelated to the initial lawsuit?

7.Justice Field in Pennoyer characterized territoriality as a “general, if not universal, law” that limits a state’s exercise of jurisdiction. Despite that statement, the rules governing adjudicatory jurisdiction differ in legal systems around the world. Although defendant’s presence was the cornerstone of British and United States practice, domicile was key in the Netherlands and Switzerland, plaintiff’s nationality was important in France, and domicile and the situs of property were significant factors in Germany. See Juenger, Judicial Jurisdiction in the United States and in the European Communities: A Comparison, 82 Mich.L.Rev. 1195 (1984). Indeed, commentators have emphasized that “[i]n this area of law, differences among civil-law countries are as great as differences between given civil-law and common-law countries.” de Vries & Lowenfeld, Jurisdiction in Personal Actions—A Comparison of Civil Law Views, 44 Iowa L.Rev. 306, 344 (1959). The increasing incidence of transnational litigation has spurred efforts to define a global law of personal jurisdiction, which so far has proven elusive. See Chase, Hershkoff, Silberman, Sorabji, Stürner, Taniguchi & Varano, Civil Litigation in Comparative Context 642–74 (Chase & Hershkoff, eds., 2d ed. 2017).

B. TOWARD A NEW THEORY OF JURISDICTION

The twentieth century witnessed important technological advances that indirectly but significantly affected the doctrine of personal jurisdiction. In particular, the growing popularity of the automobile led to increased interstate travel and with it, increased interactions between parties from different states that gave rise to litigation. Under Pennoyer’s territorial theory, could a court in State A exercise jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant in a case involving an automobile accident in State A once the car and driver had exited the state and before personal service could be effected?

In KANE v. NEW JERSEY, 242 U.S. 160, 37 S.Ct. 30, 61 L.Ed. 222 (1916), the Supreme Court held that New Jersey could require an out-of-state motorist to file a formal instrument appointing a New Jersey agent to receive process as a condition of using the state’s highways. Significantly, the statute limited the consent to matters arising from the party’s motoring activity within the forum state. What practical limitations do you see with the Kane approach? Would a nonresident-motorist statute that purported to assert jurisdiction over any cause of action arising out of the presence of defendant’s vehicle within the state, or over people other than the driver of the vehicle, be constitutional within Pennoyer's territorial theory?

HESS V. PAWLOSKI

Supreme Court of the United States, 1927.
274 U.S. 352, 47 S.Ct. 632, 71 L.Ed. 1091.

In Error to the Superior Court of Worcester County, Massachusetts.

JUSTICE BUTLER delivered the opinion of the Court.

This action was brought by defendant in error to recover damages for personal injuries. The declaration alleged that plaintiff in error negligently and wantonly drove a motor vehicle on a public highway in Massachusetts, and that by reason thereof the vehicle struck and injured defendant in error. Plaintiff in error is a resident of Pennsylvania. No personal service was made on him, and no property belonging to him was attached. The service of process was made in compliance with Chapter 90, General Laws of Massachusetts, as amended by Stat.1923, c. 431, § 2, the material parts of which follow:

The acceptance by a nonresident of the rights and privileges conferred by section three or four, as evidenced by his operating a motor vehicle thereunder, or the operation by a nonresident of a motor vehicle on a public way in the commonwealth other than under said sections, shall be deemed equivalent to an appointment by such nonresident of the registrar or his successor in office, to be his true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all lawful processes in any action or proceeding against him, growing out of any accident or collision in which said nonresident may be involved while operating a motor vehicle on such a way, and said acceptance or operation shall be a signification of his agreement that any such process against him which is so served shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served on him personally. Service of such process shall be made by leaving a copy of the process with a fee of two dollars in the hands of the registrar, or in his office, and such service shall be sufficient service upon the said nonresident: Provided, that notice of such service and a copy of the process are forthwith sent by registered mail by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the defendant's return receipt and the plaintiff's affidavit of compliance herewith are appended to the writ and entered with the declaration. * * *

Plaintiff in error appeared specially for the purpose of contesting jurisdiction, and filed an answer in abatement and moved to dismiss on the ground that the service of process, if sustained, would deprive him of his property without due process of law, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court overruled the answer in abatement and denied the motion. The Supreme Judicial Court held the statute to be a valid exercise of the police power, and affirmed the order. * * * At the trial the contention was renewed and again denied. Plaintiff in error excepted. The jury returned a verdict for defendant in error. The exceptions were overruled by the Supreme Judicial Court. * * * Thereupon the superior court entered judgment. The writ of error was allowed by the Chief Justice of that court.

The question is whether the Massachusetts enactment contravenes the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The process of a court of one state cannot run into another and summon a party there domiciled to respond to proceedings against him. Notice sent outside the state to a nonresident is unavailing to give jurisdiction in an action against him personally for money recovery. Pennoyer v. Neff * * *. There must be actual service within the state of notice upon him or upon some one authorized to accept service for him. * * * A personal judgment rendered against a nonresident, who has neither been served with process nor appeared in the suit, is without validity. McDonald v. Mabree, 243 U.S. 90, 37 S.Ct. 343, 61 L.Ed. 608, L.R.A.1917F, 458. The mere transaction of business in a state by nonresident natural persons does not imply consent to be bound by the process of its courts. Flexner v. Farson, 248 U.S. 289, 39 S.Ct. 97, 63 L.Ed. 250. The power of a state to exclude foreign corporations, although not absolute, but qualified, is the ground on which such an implication is supported as to them. * * * But a state may not withhold from nonresident individuals the right of doing business therein. The privileges and immunities clause of the Constitution (section 2, art. 4), safeguards to the citizens of one state the right "to pass through, or to reside in any other state for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise." And it prohibits state legislation discriminating against citizens of other states. * * *

Motor vehicles are dangerous machines, and, even when skillfully and carefully operated, their use is attended by serious dangers to persons and property. In the public interest the state may make and enforce regulations reasonably calculated to promote care on the part of all, residents and nonresidents alike, who use its highways. The measure in question operates to require a nonresident to answer for his conduct in the state where arise causes of action alleged against him, as well as to provide for a claimant a convenient method by which he may sue to enforce his rights. Under the statute the implied consent is limited to proceedings growing out of accidents or collisions on a highway in which the nonresident may be involved. It is required that he shall actually receive and receipt for notice of the service and a copy of the process. And it contemplates such continuances as may be found necessary to give reasonable time and opportunity for defense. It makes no hostile discrimination against nonresidents, but tends to put them on the same footing as residents. Literal and precise equality in respect of this matter is not attainable; it is not required. * * * The state's power to regulate the use of its highways extends to their use by nonresidents as well as by residents. * * * And, in advance of the operation of a motor vehicle on its highway by a nonresident, the state may require him to appoint one of its officials as his agent on whom process may be served in proceedings growing out of such use. Kane v. New Jersey * * *. That case recognizes power of the state to exclude a nonresident until the formal appointment is made. And, having the power so to exclude, the state may declare that the use of the highway by the nonresident is the equivalent of the appointment of the registrar as agent on whom process may be served. * * * The difference between the formal and implied appointment is not substantial, so far as concerns the application of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.How did the statute authorizing service in Hess differ from that in Kane? How did it differ from the mode of service in Tickle, p. 31, supra?
- 2.Could the rationale of implied consent to jurisdiction created by driving within a state be employed to support jurisdiction over a nonresident in a matter unrelated to the driver’s conduct within the state?
- 3.The Hess opinion noted that the defendant had “appeared specially for the purpose of contesting jurisdiction.” A “special appearance” allows a party to appear in the case in order to challenge the court’s jurisdiction without thereby consenting to jurisdiction. See p. 234, infra.

The territorial theory of jurisdiction did not easily apply to corporations. A corporation, after all, is a fiction. It exists on paper and acts through its employees, directors, and shareholders. Well into the nineteenth century it was accepted that a corporation could “have no legal existence out of the boundaries of the sovereignty by which it is created.” Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U.S. (13 Pet.) 519, 588, 10 L.Ed. 274, 308 (1839) (Taney, J.). By analogy to a person, courts treated a corporation as a domiciliary of the state of its incorporation and held that a corporation was subject to the jurisdiction of that state when properly served. However, exercising jurisdiction over a “foreign” corporation—a corporation chartered by a state other than the forum state—raised difficult questions, even when the corporation’s activity caused injury in the forum state.

Within the territorial principle, two theories predominated as justifications for a state court’s exercise of in personam jurisdiction over a corporation that was not chartered by the forum state: consent and presence. The “consent” theory presupposed that a corporation could transact business in a state in which it was not incorporated only with that state’s consent. Thus, as a condition of doing business, a state could require a foreign corporation to consent to service of process through the appointment of an in-state agent to receive process. Courts applied this principle when the corporation actually designated an agent to receive process, even if its consent was given under compulsion. However, some courts also applied this principle when the corporation did not designate an agent to receive process and, thus, could be said only to have granted implied consent to such a designation through its in-state activity.

The “presence” theory built on the notion that a corporation, by engaging in activity within a state, established a presence through those activities for jurisdictional purposes: “A foreign corporation is amenable to process * * * if it is doing business within the State in such manner and to such extent as to warrant the inference that it is present there.” Philadelphia & Reading Ry. Co. v. McKibbin, 243 U.S. 264, 265, 37 S.Ct. 280, 280, 61 L.Ed. 710, 711–12 (1917) (Brandeis, J.). This doctrine measured the propriety of a state’s assertion of jurisdiction over a foreign corporation in terms of the corporation’s actual activities in the forum state. However, a court lost its power over a nonresident corporation once it ceased doing business in the state. How much activity was needed to establish presence was not easily defined; the term “presence” was conclusory and all too often was used by the courts without any meaningful analysis.

Under the theories of implied consent and presence, the court asked whether the corporation was “doing business” within the forum state. As the number of cases making this factual inquiry multiplied, “doing business” gradually came to be a test in and of itself. The cases became cluttered with refined and often senseless distinctions that sought to measure the quantity of defendant’s activities within the state, but paid little or no attention to the burden imposed on the corporation by asserting jurisdiction over it or to the overall desirability of litigating in the particular forum.

With doctrine in so bad a state of disrepair, the time had long since passed for the Supreme Court to acknowledge the truth of Holmes’ dictum that “[t]he Constitution is not to be satisfied with a fiction.” International Shoe Co. v. Washington afforded the Court an opportunity to begin to set its house in order in this field.

Kurland, The Supreme Court, the Due Process Clause and the In Personam Jurisdiction of State Courts—From Pennoyer to Denckla: A Review, 25 U.Chi.L.Rev. 569, 586 (1958).

INTERNATIONAL SHOE CO. v. WASHINGTON

Supreme Court of the United States, 1945.
326 U.S. 310, 66 S.Ct. 154, 90 L.Ed. 95.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of the State of Washington.

CHIEF JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The questions for decision are (1) whether, within the limitations of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, appellant, a Delaware corporation, has by its activities in the State of Washington rendered itself amenable to proceedings in the courts of that state to recover unpaid contributions to the state unemployment compensation fund exacted by state statutes * * * and (2) whether the state can exact those contributions consistently with the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The [Washington] statutes in question set up a comprehensive scheme of unemployment compensation, the costs of which are defrayed by contributions required to be made by employers to a state unemployment compensation fund. The contributions are a specified percentage of the wages payable annually by each employer for his employees' services in the state. The assessment and collection of the contributions and the fund are administered by respondents. Section 14(c) of the Act, Wash. Rev. Stat. 1941 Supp., § 9998–114c, authorizes respondent Commissioner to issue an order and notice of assessment of delinquent contributions upon prescribed personal service of the notice upon the employer if found within the state, or, if not so found, by mailing the notice to the employer by registered mail at his last known address. That section also authorizes the Commissioner to collect the assessment by distraint if it is not paid within ten days after service of the notice. * * *

In this case notice of assessment for the years in question was personally served upon a sales solicitor employed by appellant in the State of Washington, and a copy of the notice was mailed by registered mail to appellant at its address in St. Louis, Missouri. Appellant appeared specially before the office of unemployment and moved to set aside the order and notice of assessment on the ground that the service upon appellant's salesman was not proper service upon appellant; that appellant was not a corporation of the State of Washington and was not doing business within the state; that it had no agent within the state upon whom service could be made; and that appellant is not an employer and does not furnish employment within the meaning of the statute.

The motion was heard on evidence and a stipulation of facts by the appeal tribunal which denied the motion and ruled that respondent Commissioner was entitled to recover the unpaid contributions. That action was affirmed by the Commissioner; both the Superior Court and the Supreme Court affirmed. * * * Appellant in each of these courts assailed the statute as applied, as a violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and as imposing a constitutionally prohibited burden on interstate commerce.

96

* * * Appellant is a Delaware corporation, having its principal place of business in St. Louis, Missouri, and is engaged in the manufacture and sale of shoes and other footwear. It maintains places of business in several states, other than Washington, at which its manufacturing is carried on and from which its merchandise is distributed interstate through several sales units or branches located outside the State of Washington.

Appellant has no office in Washington and makes no contracts either for sale or purchase of merchandise there. It maintains no stock of merchandise in that state and makes there no deliveries of goods in intrastate commerce. During the years from 1937 to 1940, now in question, appellant employed eleven to thirteen salesmen under direct supervision and control of sales managers located in St. Louis. These salesmen resided in Washington; their principal activities were confined to that state; and they were compensated by commissions based upon the amount of their sales. The commissions for each year totaled more than $31,000. Appellant supplies its salesmen with a line of samples, each consisting of one shoe of a pair, which they display to prospective purchasers. On occasion they rent permanent sample rooms, for exhibiting samples, in business buildings, or rent rooms in hotels or business buildings temporarily for that purpose. The cost of such rentals is reimbursed by appellant.

The authority of the salesmen is limited to exhibiting their samples and soliciting orders from prospective buyers, at prices and on terms fixed by appellant. The salesmen transmit the orders to appellant's office in St. Louis for acceptance or rejection, and when accepted the merchandise for filling the orders is shipped f.o.b. from points outside Washington to the purchasers within the state. All the merchandise shipped into Washington is invoiced at the place of shipment from which collections are made. No salesman has authority to enter into contracts or to make collections.

The Supreme Court of Washington was of opinion that the regular and systematic solicitation of orders in the state by appellant's salesmen, resulting in a continuous flow of appellant's product into the state, was sufficient to constitute doing business in the state so as to make appellant amenable to suit in its courts. But it was also of opinion that there were sufficient additional activities shown to bring the case within the rule frequently stated, that solicitation within a state by the agents of a foreign corporation plus some additional activities there are sufficient to render the corporation amenable to suit brought in the courts of the state to enforce an obligation arising out of its activities there. * * * The court found such additional activities in the salesmen's display of samples sometimes in permanent display rooms, and the salesmen's residence within the state, continued over a period of years, all resulting in a substantial volume of merchandise regularly shipped by appellant to purchasers within the state. * * *

97

Appellant * * * insists that its activities within the state were not sufficient to manifest its "presence" there and that in its absence the state courts were without jurisdiction, that consequently it was a denial of due process for the state to subject appellant to suit. It refers to those cases in which it was said that the mere solicitation of orders for the purchase of goods within a state, to be accepted without the state and filled by shipment of the purchased goods interstate, does not render the corporation seller amenable to suit within the state. * * * And appellant further argues that since it was not present within the state, it is a denial of due process to subject it to taxation or other money exaction. It thus denies the power of the state to lay the tax or to subject appellant to a suit for its collection.

Historically the jurisdiction of courts to render judgment in personam is grounded on their de facto power over the defendant's person. Hence his presence within the territorial jurisdiction of a court was prerequisite to its rendition of a judgment personally binding him. Pennoyer v. Neff * * *. But now that the capias ad respondendum has given way to personal service of summons or other form of notice, due process requires only that in order to subject a defendant to a judgment in personam, if he be not present within the territory of the forum, he have certain minimum contacts with it such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." Milliken v. Meyer * * * [p. 88, Note 5, supra]. * * *

Since the corporate personality is a fiction, although a fiction intended to be acted upon as though it were a fact * * *, it is clear that unlike an individual its "presence" without, as well as within, the state of its origin can be manifested only by activities carried on in its behalf by those who are authorized to act for it. To say that the corporation is so far "present" there as to satisfy due process requirements, for purposes of taxation or the maintenance of suits against it in the courts of the state, is to beg the question to be decided. For the terms "present" or "presence" are used merely to symbolize those activities of the corporation's agent within the state which courts will deem to be sufficient to satisfy the demands of due process. * * * Those demands may be met by such contacts of the corporation with the state of the forum as make it reasonable, in the context of our federal system of government, to require the corporation to defend the particular suit which is brought there. An "estimate of the inconveniences" which would result to the corporation from a trial away from its "home" or principal place of business is relevant in this connection. * * *

"Presence" in the state in this sense has never been doubted when the activities of the corporation there have not only been continuous and systematic, but also give rise to the liabilities sued on, even though no consent to be sued or authorization to an agent to accept service of process has been given. * * * Conversely it has been generally recognized that the casual presence of the corporate agent or even his conduct of single or isolated items of activities in a state in the corporation's behalf are not enough to subject it to suit on causes of action unconnected with the activities there. * * * To require the corporation in such circumstances to defend the suit away from its home or other jurisdiction where it carries on more substantial activities has been thought to lay too great and unreasonable a burden on the corporation to comport with due process.

While it has been held in cases on which appellant relies that continuous activity of some sorts within a state is not enough to support the demand that the corporation be amenable to suits unrelated to that activity * * * there have been instances in which the continuous corporate operations within a state were thought so substantial and of such a nature as to justify suit against it on causes of action arising from dealings entirely distinct from those activities. * * *

Finally, although the commission of some single or occasional acts of the corporate agent in a state sufficient to impose an obligation or liability on the corporation has not been thought to confer upon the state authority to enforce it, Rosenberg Bros. & Co. v. Curtis Brown Co., 260 U.S. 516, 43 S.Ct. 170, 67 L.Ed. 372, other such acts, because of their nature and quality and the circumstances of their commission, may be deemed sufficient to render the corporation liable to suit. Cf. Kane v. New Jersey * * *; Hess v. Pawloski * * * [p. 91, supra]. True, some of the decisions holding the corporation amenable to suit have been supported by resort to the legal fiction that it has given its consent to service and suit, consent being implied from its presence in the state through the acts of its authorized agents. * * * But more realistically it may be said that those authorized acts were of such a nature as to justify the fiction. * * *

It is evident that the criteria by which we mark the boundary line between those activities which justify the subjection of a corporation to suit, and those which do not, cannot be simply mechanical or quantitative. The test is not merely, as has sometimes been suggested, whether the activity, which the corporation has seen fit to procure through its agents in another state, is a little more or a little less. * * * Whether due process is satisfied must depend rather upon the quality and nature of the activity in relation to the fair and orderly administration of the laws which it was the purpose of the due process clause to insure. That clause does not contemplate that a state may make binding a judgment in personam against an individual or corporate defendant with which the state has no contacts, ties, or relations. * * *

But to the extent that a corporation exercises the privilege of conducting activities within a state, it enjoys the benefits and protection of the laws of that state. The exercise of that privilege may give rise to obligations; and, so far as those obligations arise out of or are connected with the activities within the state, a procedure which requires the corporation to respond to a suit brought to enforce them can, in most instances, hardly be said to be undue. * * *

Applying these standards, the activities carried on in behalf of appellant in the State of Washington were neither irregular nor casual. They were systematic and continuous throughout the years in question. They resulted in a large volume of interstate business, in the course of which appellant received the benefits and protection of the laws of the state, including the right to resort to the courts for the enforcement of its rights. The obligation which is here sued upon arose out of those very activities. It is evident that these operations establish sufficient contacts or ties with the state of the forum to make it reasonable and just according to our traditional conception of fair play and substantial justice to permit the state to enforce the obligations which appellant has incurred there. Hence we cannot say that the maintenance of the present suit in the State of Washington involves an unreasonable or undue procedure.

We are likewise unable to conclude that the service of the process within the state upon an agent whose activities establish appellant’s “presence” there was not sufficient notice of the suit, or that the suit was so unrelated to those activities as to make the agent an inappropriate vehicle for communicating the notice. It is enough that appellant has established such contacts with the state that the particular form of substituted service adopted there gives reasonable assurance that the notice will be actual. * * *

Appellant having rendered itself amenable to suit upon obligations arising out of the activities of its salesmen in Washington, the state may maintain the present suit in personam to collect the tax laid upon the exercise of the privilege of employing appellant’s salesmen within the state. For Washington has made one of those activities, which taken together establish appellant’s “presence” there for purposes of suit, the taxable event by which the state brings appellant within the reach of its taxing power. The state thus has constitutional power to lay the tax and to subject appellant to a suit to recover it. * * *

Affirmed.

JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

JUSTICE BLACK delivered the following opinion.

* * *

I believe that the Federal Constitution leaves to each State, without any “ifs” or “buts,” a power to tax and to open the doors of its courts for its citizens to sue corporations whose agents do business in those States. Believing that the Constitution gave the States that power, I think it a judicial deprivation to condition its exercise upon this Court’s notion of “fair play,” however appealing that term may be. Nor can I stretch the meaning of due process so far as to authorize this Court to deprive a State of the right to afford judicial protection to its citizens on the ground that it would be more “convenient” for the corporation to be sued somewhere else.

There is a strong emotional appeal in the words “fair play,” “justice,” and “reasonableness.” But they were not chosen by those who wrote the original Constitution or the Fourteenth Amendment as a measuring rod for this Court to use in invalidating State or Federal laws passed by elected legislative representatives. No one, not even those who most feared a democratic government, ever formally proposed that courts should be given power to invalidate legislation under any such elastic standards. Express prohibitions against certain types of legislation are found in the Constitution, and under the long settled practice, courts invalidate laws found to conflict with them. This requires interpretation, and interpretation, it is true, may result in extension of the Constitution’s purpose. But that is no reason for reading the due process clause so as to restrict a State’s power to tax and sue those whose activities affect persons and businesses within the State, provided proper service can be had. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Historically, the writ of capias ad respondendum—referred to in International Shoe—directed the sheriff or other official to secure defendant’s appearance in a civil suit by physically taking him into custody. Service of process on defendant, which does not require taking defendant into custody, is “the contemporary counterpart to that writ.” Murphy Bros. v. Michetti Pipe Stringing, Inc., 526 U.S. 344, 350, 119 S.Ct. 1322, 1326–27, 143 L.Ed.2d 448, 456–57 (1999). In its brief to the Supreme Court, International Shoe argued, “It would be manifestly impolitic to uphold service upon a salesman in a case not involving a sale. It would require of mere soliciting salesmen, notoriously happy-go-lucky fellows, good mixers, a higher degree of judgment and responsibility than that for which they are selected.” Quoted in Cameron & Johnson, Death of a Salesman? Forum Shopping and Outcome Determination Under International Shoe, 28 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 769, 795 (1995). Within the Pennoyer model, why was it important to serve the corporation’s salesmen in the forum state?

2. The opinion in International Shoe used contacts with the forum in two different ways. First, a defendant could have sufficient contacts with the forum to warrant asserting jurisdiction over it for all matters. This form of power now is termed “general jurisdiction,” and we will study it in more detail later in this chapter. Second, a defendant could have sufficient contacts with the forum to warrant asserting jurisdiction over it for matters arising out of or related to its activity in the forum without having sufficient contact with the forum to warrant general jurisdiction. In such a case, the jurisdiction is termed “specific jurisdiction.” See von Mehren & Trautman, Jurisdiction to Adjudicate: A Suggested Analysis, 79 Harv.L.Rev. 1121 (1966). Determining when a company has engaged in sufficient business within the state, or which of its activities count as a basis for the state’s exercise of jurisdiction, often raises uncertain questions. See Brilmayer, Related Contacts and Personal Jurisdiction, 101 Harv.L.Rev. 1444 (1988).

3. International Shoe made clear that assessing a defendant’s in-state contacts is not a mechanical act—adding up so many sales or employees in the forum state—but rather depends on the “nature and quality and the circumstances of their commission.” Based on that standard, how would you advise a business client whether it is amenable to suit in the following situations:

(a) The client is not incorporated in the forum state, derives 60 percent of its revenue from the sale of widgets in the forum state, the widgets cause harm in the forum state, and the suit seeks to redress that harm.

- (b)The client is not incorporated in the forum state, derives 60 percent of its revenue from the sale of widgets in the forum state, the widgets cause no harm in the forum state, and the client is sued by a former employee who lives in the forum state for breach of a contract that is unrelated to the widget.
- (c)The client is not incorporated in the forum state, derives one percent of its revenues from the sale of widgets in the forum state, the widgets cause harm to a tourist who temporarily is in the forum state, and the client is sued by the tourist to redress the injury.
- (d)Same facts as (b), but the client sold the widgets knowing that they were toxic and flammable.

C. THE GROWTH OF STATE LONG-ARM LAWS

Read the selected state jurisdiction statutes in the Supplement.

The Supreme Court’s decision in Hess v. Pawloski, p. 91, supra, encouraged states to enact statutes asserting jurisdiction based on the nonresident’s engagement in a variety of activities or enterprises that, like driving a car, were considered hazardous. International Shoe—with its focus on defendant’s contacts with the forum state—enabled states to expand their jurisdictional reach even further in conformance with the Supreme Court’s latest view of constitutional boundaries. This spate of legislative activity came largely in the form of “long-arm” or “single-act” statutes, which based jurisdiction over nonresidents upon defendant’s general activity in the state, or the commission of one of a series of enumerated acts within the state, or, in some cases, the commission of a certain act outside the state causing consequences within it. The theory supporting the assertion of jurisdiction depended on International Shoe’s emphasis on the quantum and quality of defendant’s in-state activity. In its 1957 Term, the Supreme Court handed down a pair of decisions that further elaborated on when a state’s exercise of personal jurisdiction would comport with the Due Process Clause.

102

McGEE v. INTERNATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE CO., 355 U.S. 220, 222–24, 78 S.Ct. 199, 200–01, 2 L.Ed.2d 223, 225–26 (1957). Plaintiff, McGee, was the beneficiary of a life insurance policy issued by the Empire Mutual Insurance Co., an Arizona corporation, to Lowell Franklin, a resident of California. In 1948, defendant, International Life Insurance Co., assumed Empire Mutual’s insurance obligations. Franklin and International Life transacted business by mail until Franklin’s death in 1950. Neither Empire Mutual nor International Life ever had any office or agent in California, and, as far as the record disclosed, International Life had never solicited or done any insurance business in California other than the policy with Franklin.

When International Life refused to pay McGee upon Franklin’s death, she sued in a California state court basing jurisdiction on the California Unauthorized Insurer’s Process Act. The Act subjects out-of-state corporations to suits in California arising out of insurance contracts with in-state residents. After recovering a judgment in California, McGee sought to enforce the judgment in Texas. The Texas court refused to enforce the judgment, holding it to be void under the Fourteenth Amendment on the ground that the California courts could not assume jurisdiction over International Life without service of process within its boundaries. The Supreme Court held that the exercise of jurisdiction by California was proper.

The Court noted that, with the increased “nationalization of commerce,” the tremendous growth “in the amount of business conducted by mail across state lines,” and the frequency with which “commercial transactions touch two or more States,” there had developed “a trend * * * clearly discernible toward expanding the permissible scope of state jurisdiction over foreign corporations and other nonresidents.”

* * * [W]e think it apparent that the Due Process Clause did not preclude the California court from entering a judgment binding on respondent. It is sufficient * * * that the suit was based on a contract which had substantial connection with that State. * * *

103

The contract was delivered in California, the premiums were mailed from there and the insured was a resident of that State when he died. * * * California has a manifest interest in providing effective means of redress for its residents when their insurers refuse to pay claims. These residents would be at a severe disadvantage if they were forced to follow the insurance company to a distant State in order to hold it legally accountable. When claims were small or moderate individual claimants frequently could not afford the cost of bringing an action in a foreign forum—thus in effect making the company judgment proof. Often the crucial witnesses—as here on the company’s defense of suicide—will be found in the insured’s locality. Of course there may be inconvenience to the insurer if it is held amenable to suit in California * * * but certainly nothing which amounts to a denial of due process. * * * There is no contention that respondent did not have adequate notice of the suit or sufficient time to prepare its defenses and appear.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.Did the Court in McGee modify the International Shoe test? Is the exercise of jurisdiction over the insurance company in McGee consistent with International Shoe? In what way did the insurance company have “minimum contacts” with California?

2.The Court said in McGee that improvements in transportation and communication make it less burdensome for out-of-state litigants to defend suits. Is it as reasonable to say that these advances make it easier for plaintiffs to sue out of state where the defendant is located? In assessing whether jurisdiction is to be exercised, should weight be given to the interests of the forum state in ensuring the enforcement of its state’s laws? Was it relevant that California had enacted a long-arm statute specific to out-of-state insurance companies that issued insurance policies to state residents?

In HANSON v. DENCKLA

, 357 U.S. 235, 78 S.Ct. 1228, 2 L.Ed.2d 1283 (1958), service of process was effected on a Delaware trustee pursuant to a Florida statute that permitted service by publication for claims arising from the construction of a will. Dora Donner, a resident of Pennsylvania, had established a trust in Delaware, naming the Delaware bank as trustee. During her lifetime, the income from the trust would go to her and, upon her death, the remainder would pass to the persons she appointed as beneficiaries under her will. Donner retained the power to change the appointed beneficiaries at any time.

Later, Donner moved to Florida, and, several years before her death, she executed her last will and testament, leaving most of her estate to two of her daughters, Katherine and Dorothy. On the same day, she executed her power to change the appointed beneficiaries under the Delaware trust—this time, she designated two of her grandchildren (the children of a third daughter, Elizabeth) as beneficiaries of a significant portion of the trust’s assets, with the remainder going to her estate.

After Donner’s death, Katherine and Dorothy, the two daughters named in the will, brought an action in Florida against the trustee claiming that the appointment of their sister’s children as beneficiaries of the trust had been ineffective. If that were true, the assets of the trust would pass under the will to the two daughters, as legatees.

The Florida court found that it had jurisdiction over the trustee, concluded that the trust was invalid and that the exercise of the power of appointment was ineffective to pass title, and held that the trust property therefore passed under the will (and so to Katherine and Dorothy). Before the Florida judgment was rendered, Elizabeth, as executrix of the estate, commenced an action in Delaware to determine who was entitled to share the trust assets, which were situated in Delaware. With minor exceptions, the parties were the same as in the Florida action. When the Florida judgment was rendered, the legatees under the will—Katherine and Dorothy—unsuccessfully argued that the Florida judgment was entitled to Full Faith and Credit and thus barred the Delaware action. The Delaware court ultimately held that the trust and the exercise of the power of appointment were valid under Delaware law.

Accepting both cases for review, a divided Supreme Court found that because the Delaware trustee’s contacts with Florida had been less than minimal, the Florida court could not assert personal jurisdiction over it. Moreover, because Florida law considered the trustee an indispensable party without whom the lawsuit could not continue, Delaware was justified in refusing to give Full Faith and Credit to the Florida decree. Writing for a majority of five, Chief Justice Warren explained that:

 [T]he requirements for personal jurisdiction over nonresidents have evolved from the rigid rule of Pennoy v. Neff  to the flexible standard of International Shoe Co. v. State of Washington . But it is a mistake to assume that this trend heralds the eventual demise of all restrictions on the personal jurisdiction of state courts.  Those restrictions are more than a guarantee of immunity from inconvenient or distant litigation. They are a consequence of territorial limitations on the power of the respective States. However minimal the burden of defending in a foreign tribunal, a defendant may not be called upon to do so unless he has had the “minimal contacts” with that State ***.

We fail to find such contacts in the circumstances of this case. The defendant trust company has no office in Florida, and transacts no business there. None of the trust assets has ever been held or administered in Florida, and the record discloses no solicitation of business in that State either in person or by mail. ***

The cause of action in this case is not one that arises out of an act done or transaction consummated in the forum State.  From Florida Mrs. Donner carried on several bits of trust administration that may be compared to the mailing of premiums in McGee [p. 102, supra]. But the record discloses no instance in which the trustee performed any acts in Florida that bear the same relationship to the agreement as the solicitation in McGee. Consequently, this suit cannot be said to be one to enforce an obligation that arose from a privilege the defendant exercised in Florida. ***

 The unilateral activity of those who claim some relationship with a nonresident defendant cannot satisfy the requirement of contact with the forum State. The application of that rule will vary with the quality and nature of the defendant’s activity, but it is essential in each case that there be some act by which the defendant purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State, thus invoking the benefits and protections of its laws. ***

Justice Black dissented:

In light of the * * * circumstances it seems quite clear to me that there is nothing in the Due Process Clause which denies Florida the right to determine whether [the] appointment was valid as against its statute of wills. * * * Not only was the appointment made in Florida by a domiciliary of Florida, but the primary beneficiaries also lived in that State. In my view it could hardly be denied that Florida had sufficient interest so that a court with jurisdiction might properly apply Florida law, if it chose, to determine whether the appointment was effectual. * * * True, the question whether the law of a State can be applied to a transaction is different from the question whether the courts of that State have jurisdiction to enter a judgment, but the two are often closely related and to a substantial degree depend upon similar considerations. It seems to me that where a transaction has as much relationship to a State as * * * [this] appointment had to Florida its courts ought to have power to adjudicate controversies arising out of that transaction, unless litigation there would impose such a heavy and disproportionate burden on a nonresident defendant that it would offend what this Court has referred to as “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.” * * * Florida, the home of the principal contenders * * *, was a reasonably convenient forum for all. Certainly there is nothing fundamentally unfair in subjecting the corporate trustee to the jurisdiction of the Florida courts. It chose to maintain business relations with [the settlor] in that State for eight years, regularly communicating with her with respect to the business of the trust including the very appointment in question.

106

Florida’s interest in the validity of [the] appointment is made more emphatic by the fact that her will is being administered in that State. It has traditionally been the rule that the State where a person is domiciled at the time of his death is the proper place to determine the validity of his will, to construe its provisions and to marshal and distribute his personal property. Here Florida was seriously concerned with winding up [this] estate and with finally determining what property was to be distributed under her will. * * *

Id. at 258–59, 78 S.Ct. at 1242–43, 2 L.Ed.2d at 1300–01.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Donner’s estate plan appeared to have divided her property in three shares. Under the last appointment of trust beneficiaries, the children of Donner’s third daughter, Elizabeth, received about $400,000. Donner’s other two daughters, the residual legatees under the will, received over $1,000,000 from the estate, to be divided equally. The Florida decision would have invalidated the last appointment of trust beneficiaries, defeated Donner’s estate plan, and added $400,000 to the amount received by Elizabeth’s sisters at the expense of Elizabeth’s family.

2.Could the Hanson decision be justified on the ground that Delaware, as the state where the trust was validly established (at least under Delaware law), had a stronger interest in the disposition of the trust’s funds than Florida did? Delaware’s interest certainly is sufficient to support jurisdiction in Delaware, but was it sufficient to preclude jurisdiction in Florida? Compare California’s interests in McGee, in which jurisdiction was upheld, with Florida’s interests in Hanson, in which jurisdiction was denied. When is a state’s “interest” sufficient to support jurisdiction? Is a legislative desire to provide a forum enough?

3. In their opinions in Hanson, the Chief Justice and Justice Black agreed that whether a court may apply its own law to a dispute is subject to a different standard than whether the court can exercise jurisdiction over defendant and adjudicate the controversy at all.

In ALLSTATE INS. CO. v. HAGUE, 449 U.S. 302, 312–13, 101 S.Ct. 633, 640, 66 L.Ed.2d 521, 531 (1981), the plurality opinion held that “for a State’s substantive law to be selected in a constitutionally permissible manner, that State must have a significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts, creating state interests, such that choice of its law is neither arbitrary nor fundamentally unfair.” Under this test, the plurality upheld Minnesota’s decision to apply its own law in an action by a former Wisconsin resident who moved to Minnesota just prior to filing suit to collect proceeds under an automobile insurance policy made in Wisconsin covering vehicles owned by a Wisconsin resident who had been killed in an accident in Wisconsin. After Hague it seems clear that the Due Process Clause allows states extraordinary latitude in developing choice-of-law rules. Why should the due process restrictions on state adjudicative jurisdiction be so much greater than the power to exercise local law?

107

The long-arm statutes at issue in McGee and Hanson dealt only with specialized kinds of litigation. The first truly comprehensive long-arm statute was enacted in Illinois and it was used as a model by a number of states. According to the Illinois Supreme Court, the statute was an attempt to assert jurisdiction to the fullest permissible constitutional limits. Under the Illinois statute, an individual or a corporation, whether a citizen or noncitizen of Illinois, is amenable to the jurisdiction of the state’s courts if the person transacts any business within the state; commits a tort within the state; owns, uses, or possesses any real estate within the state; or contracts to insure any person, property, or risk located within the state. Several years after its enactment, the Illinois statute was amended to include jurisdiction over claims involving alimony, support, and property division against former residents. Other states soon followed the Illinois approach in expanding the jurisdictional reach of their courts. Contemporary long-arm statutes run the gamut from very broad ones that permit states to assert jurisdiction up to the limits allowed by the Constitution, to narrow ones that carve out small parts of their constitutionally permitted authority. See McFarland, Dictum Run Wild: How Long-Arm Statutes Extended to the Limits of Due Process, 84 B.U.L.Rev. 491 (2004).

GRAY V. AMERICAN RADIATOR & STANDARD SANITARY CORP.

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1961.
22 Ill.2d 432, 176 N.E.2d 761.

KLINGBIEL, JUSTICE. Phyllis Gray appeals from a judgment of the circuit court of Cook County dismissing her action for damages. The issues are concerned with the construction and validity of our statute providing for substituted service of process on nonresidents. Since a constitutional question is involved, the appeal is direct to this court.

The suit was brought against the Titan Valve Manufacturing Company and others, on the ground that a certain water heater had exploded and injured the plaintiff. The complaint charges, inter alia, that the Titan company, a foreign corporation, had negligently constructed the safety valve; and that the injuries were suffered as a proximate result thereof. Summons issued and was duly served on Titan's registered agent in Cleveland, Ohio. The corporation appeared specially, filing a motion to quash on the ground that it had not committed a tortious act in Illinois. Its affidavit stated that it does no business here; that it has no agent physically present in Illinois; and that it sells the completed valves to defendant, American Radiator & Standard Sanitary Corporation, outside Illinois. * * * American Radiator * * * (also made a defendant) filed an answer in which it set up a cross claim against Titan, alleging that Titan made certain warranties to American Radiator, and that if the latter is held liable to the plaintiff it should be indemnified and held harmless by Titan. The court granted Titan's motion, dismissing both the complaint and the cross claim.

108

Section 16 of the Civil Practice Act provides that summons may be personally served upon any party outside the State; and that as to nonresidents who have submitted to the jurisdiction of our courts, such service has the force and effect of personal service within Illinois. (Ill.Rev.Stat.1959, chap. 110, par. 16.) Under section 17(1)(b) a nonresident who, either in person or through an agent, commits a tortious act within this State submits to jurisdiction. * * * The questions in this case are (1) whether a tortious act was committed here, within the meaning of the statute, despite the fact that the Titan corporation had no agent in Illinois; and (2) whether the statute, if so construed, violates due process of law.

The first aspect to which we must direct our attention is one of statutory construction. Under section 17(1)(b) jurisdiction is predicated on the committing of a tortious act in this State. It is not disputed, for the purpose of this appeal, that a tortious act was committed. The issue depends on whether it was committed in Illinois, so as to warrant the assertion of personal jurisdiction by service of summons in Ohio.

The wrong in the case at bar did not originate in the conduct of a servant physically present here, but arose instead from acts performed at the place of manufacture. Only the consequences occurred in Illinois. It is well established, however, that in law the place of a wrong is where the last event takes place which is necessary to render the actor liable. Restatement, Conflict of Laws, sec. 377. A second indication that the place of injury is the determining factor is found in rules governing the time within which an action must be brought. In applying statutes of limitation our court has computed the period from the time when the injury is done. * * * We think it is clear that the alleged negligence in manufacturing the valve cannot be separated from the resulting injury; and that for present purposes, like those of liability and limitations, the tort was committed in Illinois.

109

Titan seeks to avoid this result by arguing that instead of using the word "tort," the legislature employed the term "tortious act"; and that the latter refers only to the act or conduct, separate and apart from any consequences thereof. We cannot accept the argument. To be tortious an act must cause injury. The concept of injury is an inseparable part of the phrase. In determining legislative intention courts will read words in their ordinary and popularly understood sense. * * * We think the intent should be determined less from technicalities of definition than from considerations of general purpose and effect. To adopt the criteria urged by defendant would tend to promote litigation over extraneous issues concerning the elements of a tort and the territorial incidence of each, whereas the test should be concerned more with those substantial elements of convenience and justice presumably contemplated by the legislature. As we observed in Nelson v. Miller, 11 Ill.2d 378, 143 N.E.2d 673, the statute contemplates the exertion of jurisdiction over nonresident defendants to the extent permitted by the due-process clause.

The Titan company contends that if the statute is applied so as to confer jurisdiction in this case it violates the requirement of due process of law. The precise constitutional question thus presented has not heretofore been considered by this court. * * *

Under modern doctrine the power of a State court to enter a binding judgment against one not served with process within the State depends upon two questions: first, whether he has certain minimum contacts with the State * * * and second, whether there has been a reasonable method of notification. See International Shoe Co. v. State of Washington * * *. In the case at bar there is no contention that section 16 provides for inadequate notice or that its provisions were not followed. Defendant's argument on constitutionality is confined to the proposition that applying section 17(1)(b), where the injury is defendant's only contact with the State, would exceed the limits of due process.

A proper determination of the question presented requires analysis of those cases which have dealt with the quantum of contact sufficient to warrant jurisdiction. Since the decision in Pennoyer v. Neff * * * the power of a State to exert jurisdiction over nonresidents has been greatly expanded, particularly with respect to foreign corporations. * * * [In International Shoe Co. v. Washington] the court pointed out that the activities of the corporation in Washington were not only continuous and systematic but also gave rise to the liability sued on. It was observed that such operations, which resulted in a large volume of business, established “sufficient contacts or ties with the state of the forum to make it reasonable and just according to our traditional conception of fair play and substantial justice to permit the state to enforce the obligations which appellant has incurred there.” * * *

110

Where the business done by a foreign corporation in the State of the forum is of a sufficiently substantial nature, it has been held permissible for the State to entertain a suit against it even though the cause of action arose from activities entirely distinct from its conduct within the State. * * * But where such business or other activity is not substantial, the particular act or transaction having no connection with the State of the forum, the requirement of “contact” is not satisfied. * * *

In the case at bar the defendant’s only contact with this State is found in the fact that a product manufactured in Ohio was incorporated in Pennsylvania, into a hot water heater which in the course of commerce was sold to an Illinois consumer. The record fails to disclose whether defendant has done any other business in Illinois, either directly or indirectly; and it is argued, in reliance on the International Shoe test, that since a course of business here has not been shown there are no “minimum contacts” sufficient to support jurisdiction. We do not think, however, that doing a given volume of business is the only way in which a nonresident can form the required connection with this State. Since the International Shoe case was decided the requirements for jurisdiction have been further relaxed, so that at the present time it is sufficient if the act or transaction itself has a substantial connection with the * * * forum.

In McGee * * * [p. 102, supra] suit was brought in California against a foreign insurance company on a policy issued to a resident of California. The defendant was not served with process in that State but was notified by registered mail at its place of business in Texas, pursuant to a statute permitting such service in suits on insurance contracts. The contract in question was delivered in California, the premiums were mailed from there and the insured was a resident of that State when he died, but defendant had no office or agent in California nor did it solicit any business there apart from the policy sued on. After referring briefly to the International Shoe case the court held that “it is sufficient for purposes of due process that the suit was based on a contract which had substantial connection” with California. (Emphasis supplied.)^a

* * *

In Nelson v. Miller * * * the commission of a single tort within this State was held sufficient to sustain jurisdiction under the present statute. The defendant in that case, a resident of Wisconsin, was engaged in the business of selling appliances. It was alleged that in the process of delivering a stove in Illinois, an employee of the defendant negligently caused injury to the plaintiff. In holding that the defendant was not denied due process by being required to defend in Illinois, this court observed * * *: “The defendant sent his employee into Illinois in the advancement of his own interests. While he was here, the employee and the defendant enjoyed the benefit and protection of the laws of Illinois, including the right to resort to our courts. In the course of his stay here the employee performed acts that gave rise to an injury. The law of Illinois will govern the substantive rights and duties stemming from the incident. Witnesses, other than the defendant’s employee, are likely to be found here, and not in Wisconsin. In such circumstances, it is not unreasonable to require the defendant to make his defense here.”

111

Whether the type of activity conducted within the State is adequate to satisfy the requirement depends upon the facts in the particular case. * * * The question cannot be answered by applying a mechanical formula or rule of thumb but by ascertaining what is fair and reasonable in the circumstances. In the application of this flexible test the relevant inquiry is whether defendant engaged in some act or conduct by which he may be said to have invoked the benefits and protections of the law of the forum. * * * The relevant decisions since Pennoyer v. Neff show a development of the concept of personal jurisdiction from one which requires service of process within the State to one which is satisfied either if the act or transaction sued on occurs there or if defendant has engaged in a sufficiently substantial course of activity in the State, provided always that reasonable notice and opportunity to be heard are afforded. * * * [T]he trend in defining due process of law is away from the emphasis on territorial limitations and toward emphasis on providing adequate notice and opportunity to be heard: from the court with immediate power over the defendant, toward the court in which both parties can most conveniently settle their dispute.

In the McGee case the court commented on the trend toward expanding State jurisdiction over nonresidents, observing that: “In part this is attributable to the fundamental transformation of our national economy over the years. Today many commercial transactions touch two or more States and may involve parties separated by the full continent. With this increasing nationalization of commerce has come a great increase in the amount of business conducted by mail across state lines. At the same time modern transportation and communication have made it much less burdensome for a party sued to defend himself in a State where he engages in economic activity.”

It is true that courts cannot “assume that this trend heralds the eventual demise of all restrictions on the personal jurisdiction of state courts.” Hanson * * * [p. 103, supra]. An orderly and fair administration of the law throughout the nation requires protection against being compelled to answer claims brought in distant States with which the defendant has little or no association and in which he would be faced with an undue burden or disadvantage in making his defense. * * * [P]rocedural rules must be designed and appraised in the light of what is fair and just to both sides in the dispute. Interpretations of basic rights which consider only those of a claimant are not consonant with the fundamental requisites of due process.

In the case at bar defendant does not claim that the present use of its product in Illinois is an isolated instance. While the record does not disclose the volume of Titan’s business or the territory in which appliances incorporating its valves are marketed, it is a reasonable inference that its commercial transactions, like those of other manufacturers, result in substantial use and consumption in this State. To the extent that its business may be directly affected by transactions occurring here it enjoys benefits from the laws of this State, and it has undoubtedly benefited, to a degree, from the protection which our law has given to the marketing of hot water heaters containing its valves. Where the alleged liability arises, as in this case, from the manufacture of products presumably sold in contemplation of use here, it should not matter that the purchase was made from an independent middleman or that someone other than the defendant shipped the product into this State.

With the increasing specialization of commercial activity and the growing interdependence of business enterprises it is seldom that a manufacturer deals directly with consumers in other States. The fact that the benefit he derives from its laws is an indirect one, however, does not make it any the less essential to the conduct of his business; and it is not unreasonable, where a cause of action arises from alleged defects in his product, to say that the use of such products in the ordinary course of commerce is sufficient contact with this State to justify a requirement that he defend here.

As a general proposition, if a corporation elects to sell its products for ultimate use in another State, it is not unjust to hold it answerable there for any damage caused by defects in those products. Advanced means of distribution and other commercial activity have made possible these modern methods of doing business, and have largely effaced the economic significance of State lines. By the same token, today’s facilities for transportation and communication have removed much of the difficulty and inconvenience formerly encountered in defending lawsuits brought in other States.

* * *

The principles of due process relevant to the issue in this case support jurisdiction in the court where both parties can most conveniently settle their dispute. The facts show that the plaintiff, an Illinois resident, was injured in Illinois. The law of Illinois will govern the substantive questions, and witnesses on the issues of injury, damages and other elements relating to the occurrence are most likely to be found here. Under such circumstances the courts of the place of injury usually provide the most convenient forum for trial.

* * * In Travelers Health Association v.

Commonwealth of Virginia, 339 U.S. 643, 70 S.Ct. 927, 94 L.Ed. 1154 [(1950)], a Nebraska insurance corporation was held subject to the jurisdiction of a Virginia regulatory commission although it had no paid agents within the State and its only contact there was a mail-order business operated from its Omaha office. The court observed, by way of dictum, that “suits on alleged losses can be more conveniently tried in Virginia where witnesses would most likely live and where claims for losses would presumably be investigated. Such factors have been given great weight in applying the doctrine of forum non conveniens. * * * And prior decisions of this Court have referred to the unwisdom, unfairness and injustice of permitting policyholders to seek redress only in some distant state where the insurer is incorporated. The Due Process Clause does not forbid a state to protect its citizens from such injustice.” 339 U.S. at page 649, 70 S.Ct. at page 930, 94 L.Ed. at 1161–1162. * * *

* * * We conclude accordingly that defendant’s association with this State is sufficient to support the exercise of jurisdiction.

* * *

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.As Gray illustrates, the application of a long-arm statute often entails difficult questions of statutory construction. Are you persuaded by Gray’s interpretation of the Illinois long-arm statute? How could the statute have been drafted differently to remove any ambiguity about whether it covered the scenario in that case?
- 2.Is the Gray court’s due process analysis consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court’s case law? In what way did Titan establish minimum contacts with Illinois? Is its relationship with Illinois stronger or weaker than International Life’s relationship with California in McGee? Can it be argued that Titan “purposefully avail[ed] itself of the privilege of conducting activities within [Illinois], thus invoking the benefits and protections of its laws,” as the Court required in Hanson v. Denckla, p. 103, supra?

D. SPECIFIC JURISDICTION IN STATE COURT

In 1977, after a 20-year hiatus following its decisions in McGee and Hanson, the Supreme Court returned to questions of personal jurisdiction and in a single decade decided 11 major personal jurisdiction cases. In this period, the Hanson majority’s emphasis on acts “by which the defendant purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities in the forum State,” p. 105, supra, came to dominate the Court’s analysis.

The critical question in each ensuing decision focuses on the nature of the acts that will be treated as manifesting defendant’s purposeful availment of the forum state’s laws and benefits sufficient to support the constitutionality of the state’s exercise of specific jurisdiction. “Specific jurisdiction,” as discussed p. 100, Note 2, supra, is the term that describes the court’s power when the alleged claims arise out of or relate to defendant’s contacts with the forum. It is contrasted with “general jurisdiction,” which can subject a defendant to jurisdiction in all matters. As will be seen in Section E, infra, general jurisdiction requires more pervasive contacts with the forum than specific jurisdiction.

WORLD-WIDE VOLKSWAGEN CORP. v. WOODSON

Supreme Court of the United States, 1980.
444 U.S. 286, 100 S.Ct. 559, 62 L.Ed.2d 490.

Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma.

JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

The issue before us is whether, consistently with the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, an Oklahoma court may exercise in personam jurisdiction over a nonresident automobile retailer and its wholesale distributor in a products liability action, when the defendants’ only connection with Oklahoma is the fact that an automobile sold in New York to New York residents became involved in an accident in Oklahoma.

I

Respondents Harry and Kay Robinson purchased a new Audi automobile from petitioner Seaway Volkswagen, Inc. (Seaway) in Massena, N.Y., in 1976. The following year the Robinson family, who resided in New York, left that State for a new home in Arizona. As they passed through the State of Oklahoma, another car struck their Audi in the rear, causing a fire which severely burned Kay Robinson and her two children.

The Robinsons subsequently brought a products liability action in the District Court for Creek County, Okla., claiming that their injuries resulted from defective design and placement of the Audi’s gas tank and fuel system. They joined as defendants the automobile’s manufacturer, Audi NSU Auto Union Aktiengesellschaft (Audi); its importer, Volkswagen of America, Inc. (Volkswagen); its regional distributor, petitioner World-Wide Volkswagen Corporation (World-Wide); and its retail dealer, petitioner Seaway. Seaway and World-Wide entered special appearances, claiming that Oklahoma’s exercise of jurisdiction over them would offend the limitations on the State’s jurisdiction imposed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The facts presented to the District Court showed that World-Wide is incorporated and has its business office in New York. It distributes vehicles, parts, and accessories, under contract with Volkswagen, to retail dealers in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. Seaway, one of these retail dealers, is incorporated and has its place of business in New York. Insofar as the record reveals, Seaway and World-Wide are fully independent corporations whose relations with each other and with Volkswagen and Audi are contractual only. Respondents adduced no evidence that either World-Wide or Seaway does any business in Oklahoma, ships or sells any products to or in that State, has an agent to receive process there, or purchases advertisements in any media calculated to reach Oklahoma. In fact, * * * there was no showing that any automobile sold by World-Wide or Seaway has ever entered Oklahoma with the single exception of the vehicle involved in the present case.

Despite the apparent paucity of contacts between petitioners and Oklahoma, the District Court rejected their constitutional claim and reaffirmed that ruling in denying petitioners’ motion for reconsideration. Petitioners then sought a writ of prohibition in the Supreme Court of Oklahoma to restrain the District Judge, respondent Charles S. Woodson, from exercising in personam jurisdiction over them. They renewed their contention that, because they had no “minimal contacts” * * * with the State of Oklahoma, the actions of the District Judge were in violation of their rights under the Due Process Clause.

The Supreme Court of Oklahoma denied the writ, * * * holding that personal jurisdiction over petitioners was authorized by Oklahoma’s “long-arm” statute, Okla.Stat., Tit. 12, § 1701.03(a)(4) (1971).⁷ Although the court noted that the proper approach was to test jurisdiction against both statutory and constitutional standards, its analysis did not distinguish these questions, probably because § 1701.03(a)(4) has been interpreted as conferring jurisdiction to the limits permitted by the United States Constitution. The court’s rationale was contained in the following paragraph * * *:

“In the case before us, the product being sold and distributed by the petitioners is by its very design and purpose so mobile that petitioners can foresee its possible use in Oklahoma. This is especially true of the distributor, who has the exclusive right to distribute such automobile in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. The evidence presented below demonstrated that goods sold and distributed by the petitioners were used in the State of Oklahoma, and under the facts we believe it reasonable to infer, given the retail value of the automobile, that the petitioners derive substantial income from automobiles which from time to time are used in the State of Oklahoma. This being the case, we hold that under the facts presented, the trial court was justified in concluding that the petitioners derive substantial revenue from goods used or consumed in this State.”

116

We granted certiorari * * * to consider an important constitutional question with respect to state-court jurisdiction and to resolve a conflict between the Supreme Court of Oklahoma and the highest courts of at least four other States. We reverse.

II

* * *

As has long been settled, and as we reaffirm today, a state court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant only so long as there exist “minimum contacts” between the defendant and the forum State. International Shoe Co. v. Washington * * * [p. 95, supra]. The concept of minimum contacts, in turn, can be seen to perform two related, but distinguishable, functions. It protects the defendant against the burdens of litigating in a distant or inconvenient forum. And it acts to ensure that the States, through their courts, do not reach out beyond the limits imposed on them by their status as coequal sovereigns in a federal system.

The protection against inconvenient litigation is typically described in terms of “reasonableness” or “fairness.” We have said that the defendant’s contacts with the forum State must be such that maintenance of the suit “does not offend ‘traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.’ ” * * * The relationship between the defendant and the forum must be such that it is “reasonable * * * to require the corporation to defend the particular suit which is brought there.” * * * Implicit in this emphasis on reasonableness is the understanding that the burden on the defendant, while always a primary concern, will in an appropriate case be considered in light of other relevant factors, including the forum State’s interest in adjudicating the dispute * * *; the plaintiff’s interest in obtaining convenient and effective relief, * * * at least when that interest is not adequately protected by the plaintiff’s power to choose the forum * * *; the interstate judicial system’s interest in obtaining the most efficient resolution of controversies; and the shared interest of the several States in furthering fundamental substantive social policies * * *.

The limits imposed on state jurisdiction by the Due Process Clause, in its role as a guarantor against inconvenient litigation, have been substantially relaxed over the years. As we noted in McGee * * * [p. 102, supra] this trend is largely attributable to a fundamental transformation in the American economy:

117

“Today many commercial transactions touch two or more States and may involve parties separated by the full continent. With this increasing nationalization of commerce has come a great increase in the amount of business conducted by mail across state lines. At the same time modern transportation and communication have made it much less burdensome for a party sued to defend himself in a State where he engages in economic activity.”

The historical developments noted in McGee, of course, have only accelerated in the generation since that case was decided.

Nevertheless, we have never accepted the proposition that state lines are irrelevant for jurisdictional purposes, nor could we, and remain faithful to the principles of interstate federalism embodied in the Constitution. * * * [T]he Framers * * * intended that the States retain many essential attributes of sovereignty, including, in particular, the sovereign power to try causes in their courts. The sovereignty of each State, in turn, implied a limitation on the sovereignty of all of its sister States—a limitation express or implicit in both the original scheme of the Constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment.

Hence, even while abandoning the shibboleth that “[t]he authority of every tribunal is necessarily restricted by the territorial limits of the State in which it is established,” Pennoyer v. Neff, * * * we emphasized that the reasonableness of asserting jurisdiction over the defendant must be assessed “in the context of our federal system of government,” International Shoe * * * and stressed that the Due Process Clause ensures not only fairness, but also the “orderly administration of the laws,” * * *.

Thus, the Due Process Clause “does not contemplate that a state may make binding a judgment in personam against an individual or corporate defendant with which the state has no contacts, ties, or relations.” International Shoe * * *. Even if the defendant would suffer minimal or no inconvenience from being forced to litigate before the tribunals of another State; even if the forum State has a strong interest in applying its law to the controversy; even if the forum State is the most convenient location for litigation, the Due Process Clause, acting as an instrument of interstate federalism, may sometimes act to divest the State of its power to render a valid judgment. Hanson * * * [p. 103, supra].

III

Applying these principles to the case at hand, we find in the record before us a total absence of those affiliating circumstances that are a necessary predicate to any exercise of state-court jurisdiction. Petitioners carry on no activity whatsoever in Oklahoma. They close no sales and perform no services there. They avail themselves of none of the privileges and benefits of Oklahoma law. They solicit no business there either through salespersons or through advertising reasonably calculated to reach the State. Nor does the record show that they regularly sell cars at wholesale or retail to Oklahoma customers or residents or that they indirectly, through others, serve or seek to serve the Oklahoma market. In short, respondents seek to base jurisdiction on one, isolated occurrence and whatever inferences can be drawn therefrom: the fortuitous circumstance that a single Audi automobile, sold in New York to New York residents, happened to suffer an accident while passing through Oklahoma.

118

It is argued, however, that because an automobile is mobile by its very design and purpose it was “foreseeable” that the Robinsons’ Audi would cause injury in Oklahoma. Yet “foreseeability” alone has never been a sufficient benchmark for personal jurisdiction under the Due Process Clause. In Hanson v. Denckla * * * it was no doubt foreseeable that the settlor of a Delaware trust would subsequently move to Florida and seek to exercise a power of appointment there; yet we held that Florida courts could not constitutionally exercise jurisdiction over a Delaware trustee that had no other contacts with the forum State. * * *

If foreseeability were the criterion, a local California tire retailer could be forced to defend in Pennsylvania when a blowout occurs there, * * * a Wisconsin seller of a defective automobile jack could be haled before a distant court for damage caused in New Jersey, * * * or a Florida soft-drink concessionaire could be summoned to Alaska to account for injuries happening there * * *. Every seller of chattels would in effect appoint the chattel his agent for service of process. His amenability to suit would travel with the chattel. * * *

This is not to say, of course, that foreseeability is wholly irrelevant. But the foreseeability that is critical to due process analysis is not the mere likelihood that a product will find its way into the forum State. Rather, it is that the defendant’s conduct and connection with the forum State are such that he should reasonably anticipate being haled into court there. * * * The Due Process Clause, by ensuring the “orderly administration of the laws,” * * * gives a degree of predictability to the legal system that allows potential defendants to structure their primary conduct with some minimum assurance as to where that conduct will and will not render them liable to suit.

When a corporation “purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State,” * * * it has clear notice that it is subject to suit there, and can act to alleviate the risk of burdensome litigation by procuring insurance, passing the expected costs on to customers, or, if the risks are too great, severing its connection with the State. Hence if the sale of a product of a manufacturer or distributor such as Audi or Volkswagen is not simply an isolated occurrence, but arises from the efforts of the manufacturer or distributor to serve, directly or indirectly, the market for its product in other States, it is not unreasonable to subject it to suit in one of those States if its allegedly defective merchandise has there been the source of injury to its owner or to others. The forum State does not exceed its powers under the Due Process Clause if it asserts personal jurisdiction over a corporation that delivers its products into the stream of commerce with the expectation that they will be purchased by consumers in the forum State. Cf. Gray v. American Radiator * * * [p. 107, supra].

But there is no such or similar basis for Oklahoma jurisdiction over World-Wide or Seaway in this case. Seaway’s sales are made in Massena, N.Y. World-Wide’s market, although substantially larger, is limited to dealers in New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. There is no evidence of record that any automobiles distributed by World-Wide are sold to retail customers outside this tristate area. It is foreseeable that the purchasers of automobiles sold by World-Wide and Seaway may take them to Oklahoma. But the mere “unilateral activity of those who claim some relationship with a nonresident defendant cannot satisfy the requirement of contact with the forum State.” Hanson * * *.

In a variant on the previous argument, it is contended that jurisdiction can be supported by the fact that petitioners earn substantial revenue from goods used in Oklahoma. * * * While this inference seems less than compelling on the facts of the instant case, we need not question the court’s factual findings in order to reject its reasoning.

This argument seems to make the point that the purchase of automobiles in New York, from which the petitioners earn substantial revenue, would not occur but for the fact that the automobiles are capable of use in distant States like Oklahoma. Respondents observe that the very purpose of an automobile is to travel, and that travel of automobiles sold by petitioners is facilitated by an extensive chain of Volkswagen service centers throughout the country, including some in Oklahoma. However, financial benefits accruing to the defendant from a collateral relation to the forum State will not support jurisdiction if they do not stem from a constitutionally cognizable contact with that State. * * * In our view, whatever marginal revenues petitioners may receive by virtue of the fact that their products are capable of use in Oklahoma is far too attenuated a contact to justify that State’s exercise of in personam jurisdiction over them.

Because we find that petitioners have no “contacts, ties, or relations” with the State of Oklahoma, International Shoe * * *, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma is Reversed.

[The dissenting opinions of JUSTICE MARSHALL and JUSTICE BLACKMUN are omitted.]

JUSTICE BRENNAN, dissenting.

The Court’s opinions focus tightly on the existence of contacts between the forum and the defendant. In so doing, they accord too little weight to the strength of the forum State’s interest in the case and fail to explore whether there would be any actual inconvenience to the defendant. The essential inquiry in locating the constitutional limits on state-court jurisdiction over absent defendants is whether the particular exercise of jurisdiction offends “ ‘traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.’ ” * * * The clear focus in International Shoe was on fairness and reasonableness. * * * The Court specifically declined to establish a mechanical test based on the quantum of contacts between a State and the defendant * * *. The existence of contacts, so long as there were some, was merely one way of giving content to the determination of fairness and reasonableness.

Surely International Shoe contemplated that the significance of the contacts necessary to support jurisdiction would diminish if some other consideration helped establish that jurisdiction would be fair and reasonable. The interests of the State and other parties in proceeding with the case in a particular forum are such considerations. McGee * * * for instance, accorded great importance to a State’s “manifest interest in providing effective means of redress” for its citizens. * * *

Another consideration is the actual burden a defendant must bear in defending the suit in the forum. * * * Because lesser burdens reduce the unfairness to the defendant, jurisdiction may be justified despite less significant contacts. The burden, of course, must be of constitutional dimension. Due process limits on jurisdiction do not protect a defendant from all inconvenience of travel * * *. Instead, the constitutionally significant “burden” to be analyzed relates to the mobility of the defendant’s defense. For instance, if having to travel to a foreign forum would hamper the defense because witnesses or evidence or the defendant himself were immobile, or if there were a disproportionately large number of witnesses or amount of evidence that would have to be transported at the defendant’s expense, or if being away from home for the duration of the trial would work some special hardship on the defendant, then the Constitution would require special consideration for the defendant’s interests.

That considerations other than contacts between the forum and the defendant are relevant necessarily means that the Constitution does not require that trial be held in the State which has the “best contacts” with the defendant. * * * The defendant has no constitutional entitlement to the best forum or, for that matter, to any particular forum. Under even the most restrictive view of International Shoe, several States could have jurisdiction over a particular cause of action. We need only determine whether the forum States in these cases satisfy the constitutional minimum.

II

* * * I would find that the forum State has an interest in permitting the litigation to go forward, the litigation is connected to the forum, the defendant is linked to the forum, and the burden of defending is not unreasonable. Accordingly, I would hold that it is neither unfair nor unreasonable to require these defendants to defend in the forum State.

* * *

* * * [T]he interest of the forum State and its connection to the litigation is strong. The automobile accident underlying the litigation occurred in Oklahoma. The plaintiffs were hospitalized in Oklahoma when they brought suit. Essential witnesses and evidence were in Oklahoma. * * * The State has a legitimate interest in enforcing its laws designed to keep its highway system safe, and the trial can proceed at least as efficiently in Oklahoma as anywhere else.

The petitioners are not unconnected with the forum. Although both sell automobiles within limited sales territories, each sold the automobile which in fact was driven to Oklahoma where it was involved in an accident. It may be true, as the Court suggests, that each sincerely intended to limit its commercial impact to the limited territory, and that each intended to accept the benefits and protection of the laws only of those States within the territory. But obviously these were unrealistic hopes that cannot be treated as an automatic constitutional shield.

An automobile simply is not a stationary item or one designed to be used in one place. An automobile is intended to be moved around. Someone in the business of selling large numbers of automobiles can hardly plead ignorance of their mobility or pretend that the automobiles stay put after they are sold. It is not merely that a dealer in automobiles foresees that they will move. * * * The dealer actually intends that the purchasers will use the automobiles to travel to distant States where the dealer does not directly “do business.” The sale of an automobile does purposefully inject the vehicle into the stream of interstate commerce so that it can travel to distant States. * * *

The Court accepts that a State may exercise jurisdiction over a distributor which “serves” that State “indirectly” by “deliver[ing] its products into the stream of commerce with the expectation that they will be purchased by consumers in the forum State.” * * * It is difficult to see why the Constitution should distinguish between a case involving goods which reach a distant State through a chain of distribution and a case involving goods which reach the same State because a consumer, using them as the dealer knew the customer would, took them there. In each case the seller purposefully injects the goods into the stream of commerce and those goods predictably are used in the forum State.

* * *

III

It may be that affirmance of the judgments in these cases would approach the outer limits of International Shoe’s jurisdictional principle. But that principle, with its almost exclusive focus on the rights of defendants, may be outdated. * * *

International Shoe inherited its defendant focus from Pennoyer v. Neff * * * and represented the last major step this Court has taken in the long process of liberalizing the doctrine of personal jurisdiction. Though its flexible approach represented a major advance, the structure of our society has changed in many significant ways since International Shoe was decided in 1945. * * * As the Court acknowledges, * * * both the nationalization of commerce and the ease of transportation and communication have accelerated in the generation since 1957 [when the Court decided McGee]. The model of society on which the International Shoe Court based its opinion is no longer accurate. Business people, no matter how local their businesses, cannot assume that goods remain in the business’ locality. Customers and goods can be anywhere else in the country usually in a matter of hours and always in a matter of a very few days.

In answering the question whether or not it is fair and reasonable to allow a particular forum to hold a trial binding on a particular defendant, the interests of the forum State and other parties loom large in today’s world and surely are entitled to as much weight as are the interests of the defendant. The “orderly administration of the laws” provides a firm basis for according some protection to the interests of plaintiffs and States as well as of defendants. Certainly, I cannot see how a defendant’s right to due process is violated if the defendant suffers no inconvenience. * * *

The conclusion I draw is that constitutional concepts of fairness no longer require the extreme concern for defendants that was once necessary. Rather, * * * minimum contacts must exist “among the parties, the contested transaction, and the forum State.”¹⁵ The contacts between any two of these should not be determinative. * * *

123

In effect the Court is allowing defendants to assert the sovereign rights of their home States. The expressed fear is that otherwise all limits on personal jurisdiction would disappear. But the argument’s premise is wrong. I would not abolish limits on jurisdiction or strip state boundaries of all significance * * *; I would still require the plaintiff to demonstrate sufficient contacts among the parties, the forum, and the litigation to make the forum a reasonable State in which to hold the trial.

I would also, however, strip the defendant of an unjustified veto power over certain very appropriate fora—a power the defendant justifiably enjoyed long ago when communication and travel over long distances were slow and unpredictable and when notions of state sovereignty were impractical and exaggerated. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.At the time the suit was filed, Kay Robinson and her two children, Sam and Eva, were hospitalized with severe burns:
Since Kay Robinson had been trapped in the burning car the longest, her burns were the most horrible of all. She had burns on forty-eight percent of her body—thirty-five percent of which were third degree. Kay was in the intensive care unit for seventy-seven days and was hospitalized in Tulsa for another several months. She underwent thirty-four operations, all but two of which were under general anesthetic, for skin grafts and other reconstructive surgery. Most of her fingers were amputated, and she had severe scarring over the entire part of her body. Eva and Kay also suffered severe psychological trauma both from the ordeal and from their permanent disfigurement.
- Adams, World-Wide Volkswagen v. Woodson—The Rest of the Story, 72 Neb.L.Rev. 1122, 1126 (1993). The author continues: “Unfortunately for the Robinsons, [the driver], the person most responsible for their injuries, had no insurance and was judgment proof. Since they could not recover from [him], the Robinsons were forced to bring a difficult products liability suit that continued for fifteen years.” Id. at 1156.
- 2.In the course of its World-Wide Volkswagen opinion, the Court invoked notions of sovereignty and of convenience. Is there a tension between these two concepts? Is the Court promulgating a two-part test with a “sovereignty branch” and a “convenience branch”? Is this a new test or a refinement of the “minimum contacts” test announced in International Shoe?
- 3.How might the Court have decided World-Wide Volkswagen if the Robinsons had been Oklahoma residents and purchased the ill-fated car while in New York on vacation? Would the Court have given more weight to plaintiffs’ foreseeability argument? What if the driver of the other car had sued World-Wide and Seaway for injuries resulting from the exploding gas tank?

124

- What if that driver had never driven or even been outside the state of Oklahoma?
- 4.Review the text of Oklahoma’s long-arm statute, p. 115, n.7, supra. As a matter of statutory interpretation (as distinct from the constitutional issues addressed by the U.S. Supreme Court), does the text of that statute permit jurisdiction over World-Wide and Seaway? Would it permit jurisdiction over Audi and Volkswagen? What other information would be needed to analyze these questions?

The constraints on personal jurisdiction in state court can also be relevant when an action is brought in federal court. See p. 231, infra. In many federal cases the federal court’s jurisdictional reach is limited to that of the state in which it sits. See Federal Rule 4(k)(1)(A). In KEETON v. HUSTLER MAGAZINE, INC., 465 U.S. 770, 104 S.Ct. 1473, 79 L.Ed.2d 790 (1984), Keeton, a resident of New York, brought a libel suit in New Hampshire federal court against Hustler Magazine, an Ohio corporation. Keeton chose to sue in New Hampshire because it was the only state where the statute of limitations did not time-bar the action. Defendant’s contacts with New Hampshire consisted “of the sale of some 10 to 15,000 copies of Hustler magazine in that state each month.” Id. at 772, 104 S.Ct. at 1477, 79 L.Ed.2d at 796. Keeton herself had only one connection to New Hampshire: A magazine that she helped to produce was circulated there.

The district court dismissed Keeton’s suit for lack of jurisdiction, and the First Circuit affirmed, holding that Keeton’s lack of contacts with New Hampshire rendered the state’s interest in redressing the libel, in a suit seeking nationwide damages, too attenuated to support jurisdiction. The Supreme Court unanimously reversed, saying:

[R]egular monthly sales of thousands of magazines cannot by any stretch of the imagination be characterized as random, isolated, or fortuitous. It is, therefore, unquestionable that New Hampshire jurisdiction over a complaint based on those contacts would ordinarily satisfy the requirement of the Due Process Clause that a State’s assertion of personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant be predicated on “minimum contacts” between the defendant and the State. * * * And, as the Court of Appeals acknowledged, New Hampshire has adopted a “long-arm” statute authorizing service of process on nonresident corporations whenever permitted by the Due Process Clause. * * * Thus, all the requisites for personal jurisdiction over Hustler Magazine, Inc., in New Hampshire are present.

Id. at 774–75, 104 S.Ct. at 1478, 79 L.Ed.2d at 797–98. The Court also found that “it is ‘fair’ to compel [defendant] to defend a multistate lawsuit in New Hampshire seeking nationwide damages * * * even though only a small portion of those copies were distributed in New Hampshire.” Id. at 775, 104 S.Ct. at 1478–79, 79 L.Ed.2d at 798. It explained:

125

[I]t is beyond dispute that New Hampshire has a significant interest in redressing injuries that actually occur within the State. * * * This interest extends to libel actions brought by nonresidents. False statements of fact harm both the subject of the falsehood and the readers of the statement. New Hampshire may rightly employ its libel laws to discourage the deception of its citizens. * * * New Hampshire also has a substantial interest in cooperating with other States * * * to provide a forum for efficiently litigating all issues and damage claims arising out of a libel in a unitary proceeding. This rule reduces the potential serious drain of libel cases on judicial resources. It also serves to protect defendants from harassment resulting from multiple suits.

Id. at 776–77, 104 S.Ct. at 1479–80, 79 L.Ed.2d at 798–99.

Although the Court upheld jurisdiction in New Hampshire even though plaintiff was a nonresident, the Court recognized that a plaintiff’s residence in the forum state could further strengthen the case for jurisdiction. In particular, a plaintiff’s residence in the forum, “because of the defendant’s relationship with the plaintiff, [may] enhance the defendant’s contacts with the forum.” Id. at 780, 104 S.Ct. at 1481, 79 L.Ed.2d at 801. The Court made clear, however, that “plaintiff’s residence in the forum State is not a separate requirement, and lack of residence will not defeat jurisdiction established on the basis of defendant’s contacts.” Id.

What of the argument that it was unfair to allow suit to be brought in the only state where it was not time-barred? The Court did not treat that factor as relevant to the jurisdictional inquiry:

* * * [A]ny potential unfairness in applying New Hampshire’s statute of limitations to all aspects of this nationwide suit has nothing to do with the jurisdiction of the Court to adjudicate the claims. “The issue is personal jurisdiction, not choice of law.” Hanson v. Denckla * * *. The question of the applicability of New Hampshire’s statute of limitations to claims for out of state damages presents itself in the course of litigation only after jurisdiction over respondent is established, and we do not think that such choice of law concerns should complicate or distort the jurisdictional inquiry.

Id. at 778, 104 S.Ct. at 1480, 79 L.Ed.2d at 800.

126

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Before 1984, some cases had suggested that the First Amendment imposed a significant limitation upon the exercise of jurisdiction over defendants whose rights of expression might thereby be compromised. See, e.g., New York Times Co. v. Connor, 365 F.2d 567 (5th Cir. 1966). However, the Supreme Court rejected this argument in CALDER v. JONES

, 465 U.S. 783, 104 S.Ct. 1482, 79 L.Ed.2d 804 (1984). Jones, a professional entertainer who lived and worked in California, brought suit in California state court, claiming that she had been libeled by an article published in the National Enquirer, a national magazine having its largest circulation in California. Defendants were the writer and editor of the article, both residents of Florida, as well as the magazine. The writer and the editor moved to quash service of process for lack of personal jurisdiction, and the California state court granted the motion on the ground that First Amendment concerns weighed against an assertion of jurisdiction otherwise proper under the Due Process Clause.

Ultimately, the Supreme Court disagreed, saying: “We also reject the suggestion that First Amendment concerns enter into the jurisdictional analysis. The infusion of such concerns would needlessly complicate an already imprecise inquiry.” See also Keeton (“[W]e reject categorically the suggestion that invisible radiations from the First Amendment may defeat jurisdiction otherwise proper under the Due Process Clause,” 465 U.S. at 781 n.12, 104 S.Ct. at 1481 n.12, 79 L.Ed.2d at 801 n.12).

Applying the minimum contacts test to the writer and editor in Calder, the Court found that jurisdiction was proper in California given that they were “primary participants in an alleged wrongdoing intentionally directed at a California resident.” 465 U.S. at 790, 104 S.Ct. at 1487, 79 L.Ed.2d at 813.

The allegedly libelous story concerned the California activities of a California resident. It impugned the professionalism of an entertainer whose television career was centered in California. The article was drawn from California sources, and the brunt of the harm, in terms both of respondent’s emotional distress and the injury to her professional reputation, was suffered in California. In sum, California, is the focal point both of the story and of the harm suffered. Jurisdiction over petitioners is therefore proper in California based on the “effects” of their Florida conduct in California.

Id. at 788–89, 104 S.Ct. at 1486–87, 79 L.Ed.2d at 812.

2. KULKO v. SUPERIOR COURT, 436 U.S. 84, 98 S.Ct. 1690, 56 L.Ed.2d 132 (1978), was a suit for modification of a child support agreement. The mother lived in California and her ex-husband lived in New York. Initially, the couple’s two children lived with the father in New York; later, the father permitted the daughter to live with the mother in California and purchased her a plane ticket to travel to that state. Soon afterwards, the son, without asking his father, joined his mother and sister in California using a ticket that his mother mailed to him. The California Supreme Court based jurisdiction on the ground that by consenting to his children’s living in California, the father caused an effect in the state.

127

The Supreme Court reversed, six-to-three. The Court found that reliance on an effects test in the domestic context was “misplaced,” emphasizing that use of the effects test should be limited to disputes involving commercial activity or to wrongful activity done outside the state but generating in-state negative effects: “To make jurisdiction in a case such as this turn on whether appellant bought his daughter her ticket or instead unsuccessfully sought to prevent her departure would impose an unreasonable burden on family relations, and one wholly unjustified by the ‘quality and nature’ of appellant’s activities in or relating to the State of California.” Id. at 98, 98 S.Ct. at 1700, 56 L.Ed.2d at 145.

BURGER KING CORP. v. RUDZEWICZ
Supreme Court of the United States, 1985.
471 U.S. 462, 105 S.Ct. 2174, 85 L.Ed.2d 528.

Appeal from the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit.

JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Burger King is a Florida corporation with principal offices in Miami. Franchisees are licensed to use its trademarks and service marks in leased standardized restaurant facilities for a period of 20 years. The governing contracts provide that the franchise relationship is established in Miami and governed by Florida law, and call for payment of all required monthly fees and forwarding of all relevant notices to the Miami headquarters. The Miami headquarters sets policy and works directly with the franchisees in attempting to resolve major problems. Day to day monitoring of franchisees, however, is conducted through district offices that in turn report to the Miami headquarters. John Rudzewicz is a Michigan resident who, along with another Michigan resident (Brian MacShara), entered into a 20-year franchise contract with Burger King to operate a restaurant in Michigan. Subsequently, when the restaurant’s patronage declined, the franchisees fell behind in their monthly payments. Burger King then brought a diversity action in federal district court in Florida, alleging that the franchisees had breached their franchise obligations and requesting damages and injunctive relief. The franchisees claimed that, because they were Michigan residents and because Burger King’s claim did not “arise” within Florida, the federal court lacked personal jurisdiction over them. But the court held that the franchisees were subject to personal jurisdiction pursuant to Florida’s long-arm statute, which extends jurisdiction to any person, whether or not a citizen or resident of the State, who breaches a contract in the State by failing to perform acts that the contract requires to be performed there. Thereafter, the court entered judgment against the franchisees on the merits. The court of appeals reversed, holding that

128

“[j]urisdiction under these circumstances would offend the fundamental fairness which is the touchstone of due process.” The Supreme Court reversed and remanded.]

* * *

* * * [W]here the defendant “deliberately” has engaged in significant activities within a State, [Keeton, p. 124, supra], * * * or has created “continuing obligations” between himself and residents of the forum, * * * he manifestly has availed himself of the privilege of conducting business there, and because his activities are shielded by “the benefits and protections” of the forum’s laws it is presumptively not unreasonable to require him to submit to the burdens of litigation in that forum as well. * * *

Once it has been decided that a defendant purposefully established minimum contacts within the forum State, these contacts may be considered in light of other factors to determine whether the assertion of personal jurisdiction would comport with “fair play and substantial justice.” * * * [International Shoe, p. 95, supra]. Thus courts in “appropriate case[s]” may evaluate “the burden on the defendant,” “the forum State’s interest in adjudicating the dispute,” “the plaintiff’s interest in obtaining convenient and effective relief,”

“the interstate judicial system’s interest in obtaining the most efficient resolution of controversies,” and the “shared interest of the several States in furthering fundamental substantive social policies.” * * * [World-Wide Volkswagen, p. 114, supra]. These considerations sometimes serve to establish the reasonableness of jurisdiction upon a lesser showing of minimum contacts than would otherwise be required. * * * On the other hand, where a defendant who purposefully has directed his activities at forum residents seeks to defeat jurisdiction, he must present a compelling case that the presence of some other considerations would render jurisdiction unreasonable. Most such considerations usually may be accommodated through means short of finding jurisdiction unconstitutional. For example, the potential clash of the forum’s law with the “fundamental substantive social policies” of another State may be accommodated through application of the forum’s choice of law rules. Similarly, a defendant claiming substantial inconvenience may seek a change of venue. Nevertheless, minimum requirements inherent in the concept of “fair play and substantial justice” may defeat the reasonableness of jurisdiction even if the defendant has purposefully engaged in forum activities. * * * As we previously have noted, jurisdictional rules may not be employed in such a way as to make litigation “so gravely difficult and inconvenient” that a party unfairly is at a “severe disadvantage” in comparison to his opponent. * * * [McGee, p. 102, supra].

* * *

129

Applying these principles to the case at hand, we believe there is substantial record evidence supporting the District Court’s conclusion that the assertion of personal jurisdiction over Rudzewicz in Florida for the alleged breach of his franchise agreement did not offend due process. At the outset, we note a continued division among lower courts respecting whether and to what extent a contract can constitute a “contact” for purposes of due process analysis. If the question is whether an individual’s contract with an out of state party alone can automatically establish sufficient minimum contacts in the other party’s home forum, we believe the answer clearly is that it cannot. * * * [W]e have emphasized the need for a “highly realistic” approach that recognizes that a “contract” is “ordinarily but an intermediate step serving to tie up prior business negotiations with future consequences which themselves are the real object of the business transaction.” * * * It is these factors—prior negotiations and contemplated future consequences, along with the terms of the contract and the parties’ actual course of dealing—that must be evaluated in determining whether the defendant purposefully established minimum contacts within the forum.

In this case, no physical ties to Florida can be attributed to Rudzewicz other than MacShara’s brief training course in Miami. Rudzewicz did not maintain offices in Florida and, for all that appears from the record, has never even visited there. Yet this franchise dispute grew directly out of “a contract which had a substantial connection with that State.” McGee * * * (emphasis added).^b Eschewing the option of operating an independent local enterprise, Rudzewicz deliberately “reach[ed] out beyond” Michigan and negotiated with a Florida corporation for the purchase of a long term franchise and the manifold benefits that would derive from affiliation with a nationwide organization. * * * Upon approval, he entered into a carefully structured 20-year relationship that envisioned continuing and wide reaching contacts with Burger King in Florida. In light of Rudzewicz’s voluntary acceptance of the long term and exacting regulation of his business from Burger King’s Miami headquarters, the “quality and nature” of his relationship to the company in Florida can in no sense be viewed as “random,” “fortuitous,” or “attenuated.” * * * Rudzewicz’s refusal to make the contractually required payments in Miami, and his continued use of Burger King’s trademarks and confidential business information after his termination, caused foreseeable injuries to the corporation in Florida. For these reasons it was, at the very least, presumptively reasonable for Rudzewicz to be called to account there for such injuries.

* * * [S]ubstantial record evidence [exists] indicating that Rudzewicz most certainly knew that he was affiliating himself with an enterprise based primarily in Florida. The contract documents themselves emphasize that Burger King’s operations are conducted and supervised from the Miami headquarters, that all relevant notices and payments must be sent there, and that the agreements were made in and enforced from Miami. * * * Moreover, the parties’ actual course of dealing repeatedly confirmed that decisionmaking authority was vested in the Miami headquarters and that the district office served largely as an intermediate link between the headquarters and the franchisees. When problems arose over building design, site development fees, rent computation, and the defaulted payments, Rudzewicz and MacShara learned that the Michigan office was powerless to resolve their disputes and could only channel their communications to Miami. Throughout these disputes, the Miami headquarters and the Michigan franchisees carried on a continuous course of direct communications by mail and by telephone, and it was the Miami headquarters that made the key negotiating decisions out of which the instant litigation arose.

130

* * * [T]he Court of Appeals gave insufficient weight to provisions in the various franchise documents providing that all disputes would be governed by Florida law. The franchise agreement, for example, stated:

This Agreement shall become valid when executed and accepted by BKC at Miami, Florida, it shall be deemed made and entered into in the State of Florida and shall be governed and construed under and in accordance with the laws of the State of Florida. The choice of law designation does not require that all suits concerning this Agreement be filed in Florida.

* * * The Court of Appeals reasoned that choice of law provisions are irrelevant to the question of personal jurisdiction, relying on Hanson v. Denckla [p. 103, supra] for the proposition that “the center of gravity for choice of law purposes does not necessarily confer the sovereign prerogative to assert jurisdiction.” * * * This reasoning misperceives the import of the quoted proposition. * * * [C]hoice of law analysis—which focuses on all elements of a transaction, and not simply on the defendant’s conduct—is distinct from minimum contacts jurisdictional analysis—which focuses at the threshold solely on the defendant’s purposeful connection to the forum. Nothing in our cases, however, suggests that a choice of law provision should be ignored in considering whether a defendant has “purposefully invoked the benefits and protections of a State’s laws” for jurisdictional purposes. Although such a provision standing alone would be insufficient to confer jurisdiction, we believe that, when combined with the 20-year interdependent relationship Rudzewicz established with Burger King’s Miami headquarters, it reinforced his deliberate affiliation with the forum State and the reasonable foreseeability of possible litigation there. * * * Rudzewicz “purposefully availed himself of the benefits and protections of Florida’s laws” by entering into contracts expressly providing that those laws would govern franchise disputes. * * *

131

* * *

Nor has Rudzewicz pointed to other factors that can be said persuasively to outweigh the considerations discussed above and to establish the unconstitutionality of Florida’s assertion of jurisdiction. We cannot conclude that Florida had no “legitimate interest in holding [Rudzewicz] answerable on a claim related to” the contacts he had established in that State. * * * Moreover, although Rudzewicz has argued at some length that Michigan’s Franchise Investment Law * * * governs many aspects of this franchise relationship, he has not demonstrated how Michigan’s acknowledged interest might possibly render jurisdiction in Florida unconstitutional. Finally, the Court of Appeals’ assertion that the Florida litigation “severely impaired [Rudzewicz’s] ability to call Michigan witnesses who might be essential to his defense and counterclaim” * * * is wholly without support in the record. And even to the extent that it is inconvenient for a party who has minimum contacts with a forum to litigate there, such considerations most frequently can be accommodated through a change of venue. * * * Although the Court has suggested that inconvenience may at some point become so substantial as to achieve constitutional magnitude, McGee * * *, this is not such a case.

The Court of Appeals also concluded, however, that the parties’ dealings involved “a characteristic disparity of bargaining power” and “elements of surprise,” and that Rudzewicz “lacked fair notice” of the potential for litigation in Florida because the contractual provisions suggesting to the contrary were merely “boilerplate declarations in a lengthy printed contract.” * * * Rudzewicz presented many of these arguments to the District Court, contending that Burger King was guilty of misrepresentation, fraud, and duress; that it gave insufficient notice in its dealings with him; and that the contract was one of adhesion. * * * After a 3-day bench trial, the District Court found that Burger King had made no misrepresentations, that Rudzewicz and MacShara “were and are experienced and sophisticated businessmen,” and that “at no time” did they “ac[t] under economic duress or disadvantage imposed by” Burger King. * * * Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 52(a) requires that “[f]indings of fact shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous,” and neither Rudzewicz nor the Court of Appeals have pointed to record evidence that would support a “definite and firm conviction” that the District Court’s findings are mistaken. * * *

* * *

Notwithstanding these considerations, the Court of Appeals apparently believed that it was necessary to reject jurisdiction in this case as a prophylactic measure, reasoning that an affirmance of the District Court’s judgment would result in the exercise of jurisdiction over “out of state consumers to collect payments due on modest personal purchases” and would “sow the seeds of default judgments against franchisees owing smaller debts.” * * * We share the Court of Appeals’ broader concerns and therefore reject any talismanic jurisdictional formulas; “the facts of each case must [always] be weighed” in determining whether personal jurisdiction would comport with “fair play and substantial justice.” * * * [Kulko, p. 126, supra]. We also have emphasized that jurisdiction may not be grounded on a contract whose terms have been obtained through “fraud, undue influence, or overweening bargaining power” and whose application would render litigation “so gravely difficult and inconvenient that [a party] will for all practical purposes be deprived of his day in court.” * * * [The Bremen, p. 198, infra]. Just as the Due Process Clause allows flexibility in ensuring that commercial actors are not effectively “judgment proof” for the consequences of obligations they voluntarily assume in other States, * * * [McGee, p. 102, supra], so too does it prevent rules that would unfairly enable them to obtain default judgments against unwitting customers. * * *

132

For the reasons set forth above, however, these dangers are not present in the instant case. Because Rudzewicz established a substantial and continuing relationship with Burger King’s Miami headquarters, received fair notice from the contract documents and the course of dealing that he might be subject to suit in Florida, and has failed to demonstrate how jurisdiction in that forum would otherwise be fundamentally unfair, we conclude that the District Court’s exercise of jurisdiction * * * did not offend due process. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is accordingly reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JUSTICE POWELL took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE WHITE joins, dissenting.

In my opinion there is a significant element of unfairness in requiring a franchisee to defend a case of this kind in the forum chosen by the franchisor. It is undisputed that respondent maintained no place of business in Florida, that he had no employees in that State, and that he was not licensed to do business there. Respondent did not prepare his french fries, shakes, and hamburgers in Michigan, and then deliver them into the stream of commerce “with the expectation that they [would] be purchased by consumers in” Florida. * * * To the contrary, respondent did business only in Michigan, his business, property, and payroll taxes were payable in that State, and he sold all of his products there.

Throughout the business relationship, respondent’s principal contacts with petitioner were with its Michigan office. Notwithstanding its disclaimer, * * * the Court seems ultimately to rely on nothing more than standard boilerplate language contained in various documents * * * to establish that respondent “ ‘purposefully availed himself of the benefits and protections of Florida’s laws.’ ” * * * Such superficial analysis creates a potential for unfairness not only in negotiations between franchisors and their franchisees but, more significantly, in the resolution of the disputes that inevitably arise from time to time in such relationships.

Judge Vance’s opinion for the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit adequately explains why I would affirm the judgment of that court. I particularly find the following more persuasive than what this Court has written today:

Nothing in the course of negotiations gave Rudzewicz reason to anticipate a Burger King suit outside of Michigan. * * * There is no evidence that Rudzewicz ever negotiated with anyone in Miami or even sent mail there during negotiations. He maintained no staff in the state of Florida, and as far as the record reveals, he has never even visited the state.

The contracts contemplated the startup of a local Michigan restaurant whose profits would derive solely from food sales made to customers in Drayton Plains. The sale, which involved the use of an intangible trademark in Michigan and occupancy of a Burger King facility there, required no performance in the state of Florida. * * *

Given that the office in Rudzewicz’ home state conducted all of the negotiations and wholly supervised the contract, we believe that he had reason to assume that the state of the supervisory office would be the same state in which Burger King would file suit. Rudzewicz lacked fair notice that the distant corporate headquarters which insulated itself from direct dealings with him would later seek to assert jurisdiction over him in the courts of its own home state. * * *

Just as Rudzewicz lacked notice of the possibility of suit in Florida, he was financially unprepared to meet its added costs. * * * Neither the revenues of a local business nor the geographical range of its market prepares the average franchise owner for the cost of distant litigation. * * *

The particular distribution of bargaining power in the franchise relationship further impairs the franchisee’s financial preparedness. In a franchise contract, “the franchisor normally occupies [the] dominant role”. * * *

We discern a characteristic disparity of bargaining power in the facts of this case. There is no indication that Rudzewicz had any latitude to negotiate a reduced rent or franchise fee in exchange for the added risk of suit in Florida. * * * Burger King resisted price concessions, only to sue Rudzewicz far from home. In doing so, it severely impaired his ability to call Michigan witnesses who might be essential to his defense and counterclaim.

In sum, we hold that the circumstances of the Drayton Plains franchise and the negotiations which led to it left Rudzewicz bereft of reasonable notice and financially unprepared for the prospect of franchise litigation in Florida. Jurisdiction under these circumstances would offend the fundamental fairness which is the touchstone of due process. * * *

Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.What guidance does Burger King provide for assessing personal jurisdiction in breach-of-contract cases? The First Circuit has described Burger King as mandating a “contract-plus” analysis: “[A] court is to look at all of the communications and transactions between the parties, before, during and after the consummation of the contract, to determine the degree and type of contacts the defendant has with the forum, apart from the contract alone.” Ganis Corp. of Cal. v. Jackson, 822 F.2d 194, 197–98 (1st Cir. 1987). What purpose does the “plus” factor serve? Is it constitutionally compelled? Does it raise considerations that affect the reasonableness of jurisdiction, whether minimum contacts are present, or both? Does Burger King affect the result in McGee?

2.How important to the decision in Burger King was the fact that the franchise agreement included a choice-of-law term? Under this provision, the parties agreed to be bound by Florida law. Is that type of provision appropriately considered a “contact” with the chosen forum? Is it a “plus” factor? What if the forum has no interest in the contract other than the parties’ agreement to be bound by the law of that state? What if instead of a choice-of-law provision, the parties included a forum-selection clause agreeing to litigate all disputes in Florida? Would the court give more weight to a forum-selection clause? We consider this type of agreement later in this chapter, p. 197, infra.

ASAHI METAL INDUSTRY CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT

Supreme Court of the United States, 1987.
480 U.S. 102, 107 S.Ct. 1026, 94 L.Ed.2d 92.

Certiorari to the Supreme Court of California.

JUSTICE O’CONNOR announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the unanimous opinion of the Court with respect to Part I, the opinion of the Court with respect to Part II-B, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICE BRENNAN, JUSTICE WHITE, JUSTICE MARSHALL, JUSTICE BLACKMUN, JUSTICE POWELL, and JUSTICE STEVENS join, and an opinion with respect to Parts II-A and III, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICE POWELL, and JUSTICE SCALIA join.

This case presents the question whether the mere awareness on the part of a foreign defendant that the component it manufactured, sold, and delivered outside the United States would reach the forum state in the stream of commerce constitutes “minimum contacts” between the defendant and the forum state such that the exercise of jurisdiction “does not offend ‘traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.’ ” * * *

I

On September 23, 1978, on Interstate Highway 80 in Solano County, California, Gary Zurcher lost control of his Honda motorcycle and collided with a tractor. Zurcher was severely injured, and his passenger and wife, Ruth Ann Moreno, was killed. In September 1979, Zurcher filed a product liability action in the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Solano. Zurcher alleged that the 1978 accident was caused by a sudden loss of air and an explosion in the rear tire of the motorcycle, and alleged that the motorcycle tire, tube, and sealant were defective. Zurcher’s complaint named, inter alia, Cheng Shin Rubber Industrial Co., Ltd. (Cheng Shin), the Taiwanese manufacturer of the tube. Cheng Shin in turn filed a cross-complaint seeking indemnification from its codefendants and from petitioner, Asahi Metal Industry Co., Ltd. (Asahi), the manufacturer of the tube’s valve assembly. Zurcher’s claims against Cheng Shin and the other defendants were eventually settled and dismissed, leaving only Cheng Shin’s indemnity action against Asahi.

California’s long-arm statute authorizes the exercise of jurisdiction “on any basis not inconsistent with the Constitution of this state or of the United States.” * * * Asahi moved to quash Cheng Shin’s service of summons arguing the State could not exert jurisdiction over it consistent with the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In relation to the motion, the following information was submitted by Asahi and Cheng Shin. Asahi is a Japanese corporation. It manufactures tire valve assemblies in Japan and sells the assemblies to Cheng Shin, and to several other tire manufacturers, for use as components in finished tire tubes. Asahi’s sales to Cheng Shin took place in Taiwan. The shipments from Asahi to Cheng Shin were sent from Japan to Taiwan. Cheng Shin bought and incorporated into its tire tubes 150,000 Asahi valve assemblies in 1978; 500,000 in 1979; 500,000 in 1980; 100,000 in 1981; and 100,000 in 1982. Sales to Cheng Shin accounted for 1.24 percent of Asahi’s income in 1981 and 0.44 percent in 1982. Cheng Shin alleged that approximately 20 percent of its sales in the United States are in California. Cheng Shin purchases valve assemblies from other suppliers as well, and sells finished tubes throughout the world.

In 1983 an attorney for Cheng Shin conducted an informal examination of the valve stems of the tire tubes sold in one cyclery in Solano County. The attorney declared that of the approximately 115 tire tubes in the store, 97 were purportedly manufactured in Japan or Taiwan, and of those 97, 21 valve stems were marked with the circled letter “A”, apparently Asahi’s trademark. Of the 21 Asahi valve stems, 12 were incorporated into Cheng Shin tire tubes. The store contained 41 other Cheng Shin tubes that incorporated the valve assemblies of other manufacturers. * * * An affidavit of a manager of Cheng Shin whose duties included the purchasing of component parts stated: “ ‘In discussions with Asahi regarding the purchase of valve stem assemblies the fact that my Company sells tubes throughout the world and specifically the United States has been discussed. I am informed and believe that Asahi was fully aware that valve stem assemblies sold to my Company and to others would end up throughout the United States and in California.’ ” * * * An affidavit of the president of Asahi, on the other hand, declared that Asahi “ ‘has never contemplated that its limited sales of tire valves to Cheng Shin in Taiwan would subject it to lawsuits in California.’ ” * * * The record does not include any contract between Cheng Shin and Asahi. * * *

Primarily on the basis of the above information, the Superior Court denied the motion to quash summons, stating that “Asahi obviously does business on an international scale. It is not unreasonable that they defend claims of defect in their product on an international scale.” Order Denying Motion to Quash Summons * * *.

The Court of Appeal of the State of California issued a peremptory writ of mandate commanding the Superior Court to quash service of summons. The court concluded that “it would be unreasonable to require Asahi to respond in California solely on the basis of ultimately realized foreseeability that the product into which its component was embodied would be sold all over the world including California.” * * *

The Supreme Court of the State of California reversed and discharged the writ issued by the Court of Appeal. * * * The court observed that “Asahi has no offices, property or agents in California. It solicits no business in California and has made no direct sales [in California].” * * * Moreover, “Asahi did not design or control the system of distribution that carried its valve assemblies into California.” * * * Nevertheless, the court found the exercise of jurisdiction over Asahi to be consistent with the Due Process Clause. It concluded that Asahi knew that some of the valve assemblies sold to Cheng Shin would be incorporated into tire tubes sold in California, and that Asahi benefited indirectly from the sale in California of products incorporating its components. The court considered Asahi’s intentional act of placing its components into the stream of commerce—that is, by delivering the components to Cheng Shin in Taiwan—coupled with Asahi’s awareness that some of the components would eventually find their way into California, sufficient to form the basis for state court jurisdiction under the Due Process Clause. We granted certiorari * * * and now reverse.

II

A

* * *

Applying the principle that minimum contacts must be based on an act of the defendant, the Court in World-Wide Volkswagen * * * [, p. 114, supra,] rejected the assertion that a consumer's unilateral act of bringing the defendant's product into the forum State was a sufficient constitutional basis for personal jurisdiction over the defendant. It had been argued in World-Wide Volkswagen that because an automobile retailer and its wholesale distributor sold a product mobile by design and purpose, they could foresee being haled into court in the distant States into which their customers might drive. The Court rejected this concept of foreseeability as an insufficient basis for jurisdiction under the Due Process Clause. * * * The Court disclaimed, however, the idea that "foreseeability is wholly irrelevant" to personal jurisdiction, concluding that "[t]he forum State does not exceed its powers under the Due Process Clause if it asserts personal jurisdiction over a corporation that delivers its products into the stream of commerce with the expectation that they will be purchased by consumers in the forum State." * * *

In World-Wide Volkswagen itself, the state court sought to base jurisdiction not on any act of the defendant, but on the foreseeable unilateral actions of the consumer. Since World-Wide Volkswagen, lower courts have been confronted with cases in which the defendant acted by placing a product in the stream of commerce, and the stream eventually swept defendant's product into the forum State, but the defendant did nothing else to purposefully avail itself of the market in the forum state. Some courts have understood the Due Process Clause, as interpreted in World-Wide Volkswagen, to allow an exercise of personal jurisdiction to be based on no more than the defendant's act of placing the product in the stream of commerce. Other courts have understood the Due Process Clause and the above-quoted language in World-Wide Volkswagen to require the action of the defendant to be more purposefully directed at the forum State than the mere act of placing a product in the stream of commerce.

The reasoning of the Supreme Court of California in the present case illustrates the former interpretation of World-Wide Volkswagen. The Supreme Court of California held that, because the stream of commerce eventually brought some valves Asahi sold Cheng Shin into California, Asahi's awareness that its valves would be sold in California was sufficient to permit California to exercise jurisdiction over Asahi consistent with the requirements of the Due Process Clause. The Supreme Court of California's position was consistent with those courts that have held that mere foreseeability or awareness was a constitutionally sufficient basis for personal jurisdiction if the defendant's product made its way into the forum State while still in the stream of commerce. * * *

Other courts, however, have understood the Due Process Clause to require something more than that the defendant was aware of its product's entry into the forum State through the stream of commerce in order for the state to exert jurisdiction over the defendant. In the present case, for example, the State Court of Appeal did not read the Due Process Clause, as interpreted by World-Wide Volkswagen, to allow "mere foreseeability that the product will enter the forum state [to] be enough by itself to establish jurisdiction over the distributor and retailer." * * *

We now find this latter position to be consonant with the requirements of due process. The "substantial connection" * * * between the defendant and the forum State necessary for a finding of minimum contacts must come about by an action of the defendant purposefully directed toward the forum State. * * * The placement of a product into the stream of commerce, without more, is not an act of the defendant purposefully directed toward the forum State. Additional conduct of the defendant may indicate an intent or purpose to serve the market in the forum State, for example, designing the product for the market in the forum State, advertising in the forum State, establishing channels for providing regular advice to customers in the forum State, or marketing the product through a distributor who has agreed to serve as the sales agent in the forum State. But a defendant's awareness that the stream of commerce may or will sweep the product into the forum State does not convert the mere act of placing the product into the stream into an act purposefully directed toward the forum State.

Assuming, arguendo, that respondents have established Asahi's awareness that some of the valves sold to Cheng Shin would be incorporated into tire tubes sold in California, respondents have not demonstrated any action by Asahi to purposefully avail itself of the California market. Asahi does not do business in California. It has no office, agents, employees, or property in California. It does not advertise or otherwise solicit business in California. It did not create, control, or employ the distribution system that brought its valves to California. * * * There is no evidence that Asahi designed its product in anticipation of sales in California. * * * On the basis of these facts, the exertion of personal jurisdiction over Asahi by the Superior Court of California exceeds the limits of due process.

B

* * *

We have previously explained that the determination of the reasonableness of the exercise of jurisdiction in each case will depend on an evaluation of several factors. A court must consider the burden on the defendant, the interests of the forum state, and the plaintiff's interest in obtaining relief. It must also weigh in its determination "the interstate judicial system's interest in obtaining the most efficient resolution of controversies; and the shared interest of the several States in furthering fundamental substantive social policies." * * *

A consideration of these factors in the present case clearly reveals the unreasonableness of the assertion of jurisdiction over Asahi, even apart from the question of the placement of goods in the stream of commerce.

Certainly the burden on the defendant in this case is severe. Asahi has been commanded by the Supreme Court of California not only to traverse the distance between Asahi's headquarters in Japan and the Superior Court of California in and for the County of Solano, but also to submit its dispute with Cheng Shin to a foreign nation's judicial system. The unique burdens placed upon one who must defend oneself in a foreign legal system should have significant weight in assessing the reasonableness of stretching the long arm of personal jurisdiction over national borders.

When minimum contacts have been established, often the interests of the plaintiff and the forum in the exercise of jurisdiction will justify even the serious burdens placed on the alien defendant. In the present case, however, the interests of the plaintiff and the forum in California's assertion of jurisdiction over Asahi are slight. All that remains is a claim for indemnification asserted by Cheng Shin, a Taiwanese corporation, against Asahi. The transaction on which the indemnification claim is based took place in Taiwan; Asahi's components were shipped from Japan to Taiwan. Cheng Shin has not demonstrated that it is more convenient for it to litigate its indemnification claim against Asahi in California rather than in Taiwan or Japan.

Because the plaintiff is not a California resident, California's legitimate interests in the dispute have considerably diminished. The Supreme Court of California argued that the State had an interest in "protecting its consumers by ensuring that foreign manufacturers comply with the state's safety standards." * * * The State Supreme Court's definition of California's interest, however, was overly broad. The dispute between Cheng Shin and Asahi is primarily about indemnification rather than safety standards. Moreover, it is not at all clear at this point that California law should govern the question whether a Japanese corporation should indemnify a Taiwanese corporation on the basis of a sale made in Taiwan and a shipment of goods from Japan to Taiwan. * * * The possibility of being haled into a California court as a result of an accident involving Asahi's components undoubtedly creates an additional deterrent to the manufacture of unsafe components; however, similar pressures will be placed on Asahi by the purchasers of its components as long as those who use Asahi components in their final products, and sell those products in California, are subject to the application of California tort law.

World-Wide Volkswagen also admonished courts to take into consideration the interests of the "several States," in addition to the forum state, in the efficient judicial resolution of the dispute and the advancement of substantive policies. In the present case, this advice calls for a court to consider the procedural and substantive policies of other nations whose interests are affected by the assertion of jurisdiction by the California court. The procedural and substantive interests of other nations in a state court's assertion of jurisdiction over an alien defendant will differ from case to case. In every case, however, those interests, as well as the Federal interest in its foreign relations policies, will be best served by a careful inquiry into the reasonableness of the assertion of jurisdiction in the particular case, and an unwillingness to find the serious burdens on an alien defendant outweighed by minimal interests on the part of the plaintiff or the forum State. "Great care and reserve should be exercised when extending our notions of personal jurisdiction into the international field." * * *

Considering the international context, the heavy burden on the alien defendant, and the slight interests of the plaintiff and the forum State, the exercise of personal jurisdiction by a California court over Asahi in this instance would be unreasonable and unfair.

III

Because the facts of this case do not establish minimum contacts such that the exercise of personal jurisdiction is consistent with fair play and substantial justice, the judgment of Supreme Court of California is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom JUSTICE WHITE, JUSTICE MARSHALL, and JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

I do not agree with the interpretation in Part II-A of the stream-of-commerce theory, nor with the conclusion that Asahi did not "purposely avail itself of the California market." * * * I do agree, however, with the Court's conclusion in Part II-B that the exercise of personal jurisdiction over Asahi in this case would not comport with "fair play and substantial justice" * * *. This is one of those rare cases in which "minimum requirements inherent in the concept of 'fair play and substantial justice' . . . defeat the reasonableness of jurisdiction even [though] the defendant has purposefully engaged in forum activities.” * * * I therefore join Parts I and II-B of the Court’s opinion, and write separately to explain my disagreement with Part II-A.

Part II-A states that “a defendant’s awareness that the stream of commerce may or will sweep the product into the forum State does not convert the mere act of placing the product into the stream into an act purposefully directed toward the forum State.” * * * Under this view, a plaintiff would be required to show “[a]dditional conduct” directed toward the forum before finding the exercise of jurisdiction over the defendant to be consistent with the Due Process Clause. * * * I see no need for such a showing, however. The stream of commerce refers not to unpredictable currents or eddies, but to the regular and anticipated flow of products from manufacture to distribution to retail sale. As long as a participant in this process is aware that the final product is being marketed in the forum State, the possibility of a lawsuit there cannot come as a surprise. Nor will the litigation present a burden for which there is no corresponding benefit. A defendant who has placed goods in the stream of commerce benefits economically from the retail sale of the final product in the forum State, and indirectly benefits from the State’s laws that regulate and facilitate commercial activity. These benefits accrue regardless of whether that participant directly conducts business in the forum State, or engages in additional conduct directed toward that State. Accordingly, most courts and commentators have found that jurisdiction premised on the placement of a product into the stream of commerce is consistent with the Due Process Clause, and have not required a showing of additional conduct.

* * *

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE WHITE and JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of California should be reversed for the reasons stated in Part II-B of the Court’s opinion. While I join Parts I and II-B, I do not join Part II-A for two reasons. First, it is not necessary to the Court’s decision. An examination of minimum contacts is not always necessary to determine whether a state court’s assertion of personal jurisdiction is constitutional. See Burger King * * * [p. 127, supra]. Part II-B establishes, after considering the factors set forth in World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, * * * that California’s exercise of jurisdiction over Asahi in this case would be “unreasonable and unfair.” * * * This finding alone requires reversal; this case fits within the rule that “minimum requirements inherent in the concept of ‘fair play and substantial justice’ may defeat the reasonableness of jurisdiction even if the defendant has purposefully engaged in forum activities.” Burger King * * *. Accordingly, I see no reason in this case for the plurality to articulate “purposeful direction” or any other test as the nexus between an act of a defendant and the forum State that is necessary to establish minimum contacts.

Second, even assuming that the test ought to be formulated here, Part II-A misapplies it to the facts of this case. The plurality seems to assume that an unwavering line can be drawn between “mere awareness” that a component will find its way into the forum State and “purposeful availment” of the forum’s market. * * * Over the course of its dealings with Cheng Shin, Asahi has arguably engaged in a higher quantum of conduct than “[t]he placement of a product into the stream of commerce, without more. . . .” * * * Whether or not this conduct rises to the level of purposeful availment requires a constitutional determination that is affected by the volume, the value, and the hazardous character of the components. In most circumstances I would be inclined to conclude that a regular course of dealing that results in deliveries of over 100,000 units annually over a period of several years would constitute “purposeful availment” even though the item delivered to the forum State was a standard product marketed throughout the world.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Given the division among the Justices, on what particular issues do a majority of Justices agree? On what particular issues does Justice O’Connor’s plurality opinion differ from the opinions filed by Justice Brennan and by Justice Stevens? Notice that Justice Scalia did not join Part II-B of the opinion of the Court. Why is that significant?

In the wake of Asahi, lower courts disagreed over which of the Asahi opinions to follow. The Sixth Circuit, for example, embraced Justice O’Connor’s approach. See Bridgeport Music, Inc. v. Still N The Water Pub, 327 F.3d 472 (6th Cir. 2003) (“[W]e make clear today our preference for Justice O’Connor’s stream of commerce ‘plus’ approach, for the reasons set forth in that opinion, and conduct the remainder of our analysis accordingly.”). The Fifth Circuit, by contrast, reasoned as follows:

This court has consistently held that mere foreseeability or awareness is a constitutionally sufficient basis for personal jurisdiction if the defendant’s product made its way into the forum state while still in the stream of commerce. We adopted this position in an effort faithfully to interpret World Wide Volkswagen * * *, which holds that a state does not offend due process by exercising jurisdiction over an entity that delivers its products into the stream of commerce with the expectation that they will be purchased by consumers in the forum State. Where a defendant knowingly benefits from the availability of a particular state’s market for its products, it is only fitting that the defendant be amenable to suit in that state. We have, therefore, declined to follow the suggestion of the plurality in Asahi * * * that some additional action on the part of the defendant, beyond foreseeability, is necessary to convert the mere act of placing the product into the stream into an act purposefully directed toward the forum State.

Luv N’ care, Ltd. v. Insta-Mix, Inc., 438 F.3d 465, 470 (5th Cir. 2006) (footnotes, brackets, and internal quotation marks omitted).

2. The Supreme Court did not disturb the California court’s finding that “Asahi knew that some of the valve assemblies sold to Cheng Shin would be incorporated into tire tubes sold in California.” Asahi Metal Industry Co., Ltd. v. Superior Court, 39 Cal.3d 35, 48, 702 P.2d 543, 549, 216 Cal.Rptr. 385, 392 (1985). Under Part II-A of Justice O’Connor’s opinion, this knowledge alone could not serve as a basis for jurisdiction unless Asahi had taken some further action “purposefully directed toward the forum state.” What additional action might satisfy that standard? Does Justice O’Connor’s approach allow the nonresident manufacturer of a component part to avoid the safety standards of states in which the final product is sold? How would a supporter of Justice O’Connor’s approach respond to this concern?

3.Should the approach taken by Justice O’Connor apply only to foreign defendants? Does it affect your view that some bases of jurisdiction in the United States are regarded as “exorbitant” by other countries? See Clermont & Palmer, Exorbitant Jurisdiction, 58 Me.L.Rev. 474 (2006). Doesn’t a United States plaintiff face a “substantial hardship” if required to litigate against a foreign defendant in a foreign court? Did the plurality give any weight to that concern?

4.Does the reasoning in Justice O’Connor’s plurality opinion support the exercise of jurisdiction in Gray, p. 107, supra? In Calder, p. 126, supra?

After the Asahi Court’s lack of a majority opinion regarding the proper approach to personal jurisdiction in cases where contacts occur via the “stream of commerce,” more than two decades passed before the Supreme Court revisited the issue.

J. MCINTYRE MACHINERY, LTD. v. NICASTRO

Supreme Court of the United States, 2011.
564 U.S. 873, 131 S.Ct. 2780, 180 L.Ed.2d 765.

Certiorari to the Supreme Court of New Jersey.

JUSTICE KENNEDY announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion, in which the CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICE SCALIA, and JUSTICE THOMAS joined.

* * * The rules and standards for determining when a State does or does not have jurisdiction over an absent party have been unclear because of decades-old questions left open in Asahi * * * [p. 134, supra].

144

* * * [T]he Supreme Court of New Jersey, relying in part on Asahi, held that New Jersey’s courts can exercise jurisdiction over a foreign manufacturer of a product so long as the manufacturer “knows or reasonably should know that its products are distributed through a nationwide distribution system that might lead to those products being sold in any of the fifty states.” Nicastro v. McIntyre Machinery America, Ltd., 201 N.J. 48, 76, 77, 987 A.2d 575, 591, 592 (2010). Applying that test, the court * * * concluded that a British manufacturer of scrap metal machines was subject to jurisdiction in New Jersey, even though at no time had it advertised in, sent goods to, or in any relevant sense targeted the State.

That decision cannot be sustained. * * * As a general rule, the exercise of judicial power is not lawful unless the defendant “purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State, thus invoking the benefits and protections of its laws.” Hanson v. Denckla * * * [p. 103, supra]. There may be exceptions, say, for instance, in cases involving an intentional tort. But the general rule is applicable in this products-liability case, and the so-called “stream-of-commerce” doctrine cannot displace it.

I

This case arises from a products-liability suit filed in New Jersey state court. Robert Nicastro seriously injured his hand while using a metal-shearing machine manufactured by J. McIntyre Machinery, Ltd. (J. McIntyre). The accident occurred in New Jersey, but the machine was manufactured in England, where J. McIntyre is incorporated and operates.

The question here is whether the New Jersey courts have jurisdiction over J. McIntyre, notwithstanding the fact that the company at no time either marketed goods in the State or shipped them there. * * *

At oral argument in this Court, Nicastro’s counsel stressed three primary facts in defense of New Jersey’s assertion of jurisdiction over J. McIntyre. * * *

First, an independent company agreed to sell J. McIntyre’s machines in the United States. J. McIntyre itself did not sell its machines to buyers in this country beyond the U.S. distributor, and there is no allegation that the distributor was under J. McIntyre’s control.

Second, J. McIntyre officials attended annual conventions for the scrap recycling industry to advertise J. McIntyre’s machines alongside the distributor. The conventions took place in various States, but never in New Jersey.

Third, no more than four machines (the record suggests only one, * * *), including the machine that caused the injuries that are the basis for this suit, ended up in New Jersey.

In addition to these facts emphasized by respondent, the New Jersey Supreme Court noted that J. McIntyre held both United States and European patents on its recycling technology. * * * It also noted that the U.S. distributor “structured [its] advertising and sales efforts in accordance with” J. McIntyre’s “direction and guidance whenever possible,” and that “at least some of the machines were sold on consignment to” the distributor. * * *

* * * Jurisdiction was proper, in that court’s view, because the injury occurred in New Jersey; because petitioner knew or reasonably should have known “that its products are distributed through a nationwide distribution system that might lead to those products being sold in any of the fifty states”; and because petitioner failed to “take some reasonable step to prevent the distribution of its products in this State.” * * *

Both the New Jersey Supreme Court’s holding and its account of what it called “[t]he stream-of-commerce doctrine of jurisdiction,” * * * were incorrect, however. This Court’s Asahi decision may be responsible in part for that court’s error regarding the stream of commerce, and this case presents an opportunity to provide greater clarity.

II

* * *

The imprecision arising from Asahi, for the most part, results from its statement of the relation between jurisdiction and the “stream of commerce.” * * * This Court has stated that a defendant’s placing goods into the stream of commerce “with the expectation that they will be purchased by consumers within the forum State” may indicate purposeful availment. World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. * * * [p. 114, supra] (finding that expectation lacking). But that statement does not amend the general rule of personal jurisdiction. It merely observes that a defendant may in an appropriate case be subject to jurisdiction without entering the forum—itsself an unexceptional proposition—as where manufacturers or distributors “seek to serve” a given State’s market. * * * The principal inquiry in cases of this sort is whether the defendant’s activities manifest an intention to submit to the power of a sovereign. In other words, the defendant must “purposefully avai[l] itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State, thus invoking the benefits and protections of its laws.” Hanson * * *; Insurance Corp. * * * [p. 194, infra] (“[A]ctions of the defendant may amount to a legal submission to the jurisdiction of the court”). Sometimes a defendant does so by sending its goods rather than its agents. The defendant’s transmission of goods permits the exercise of jurisdiction only where the defendant can be said to have targeted the forum; as a general rule, it is not enough that the defendant might have predicted that its goods will reach the forum State.

In Asahi, an opinion by Justice Brennan for four Justices outlined a different approach. It discarded the central concept of sovereign authority in favor of considerations of fairness and foreseeability. As that concurrence contended, “jurisdiction premised on the placement of a product into the stream of commerce [without more] is consistent with the Due Process Clause,” for “[a]s long as a participant in this process is aware that the final product is being marketed in the forum State, the possibility of a lawsuit there cannot come as a surprise.” * * * It was the premise of the concurring opinion that the defendant’s ability to anticipate suit renders the assertion of jurisdiction fair. In this way, the opinion made foreseeability the touchstone of jurisdiction.

The standard set forth in Justice Brennan’s concurrence was rejected in an opinion written by Justice O’Connor; but the relevant part of that opinion, too, commanded the assent of only four Justices, not a majority of the Court. That opinion stated: “The ‘substantial connection’ between the defendant and the forum State necessary for a finding of minimum contacts must come about by an action of the defendant purposefully directed toward the forum State. The placement of a product into the stream of commerce, without more, is not an act of the defendant purposefully directed toward the forum State.” * * *

Since Asahi was decided, the courts have sought to reconcile the competing opinions. But Justice Brennan’s concurrence, advocating a rule based on general notions of fairness and foreseeability, is inconsistent with the premises of lawful judicial power. This Court’s precedents make clear that it is the defendant’s actions, not his expectations, that empower a State’s courts to subject him to judgment.

* * * [W]ere general fairness considerations the touchstone of jurisdiction, a lack of purposeful availment might be excused where carefully crafted judicial procedures could otherwise protect the defendant’s interests, or where the plaintiff would suffer substantial hardship if forced to litigate in a foreign forum. That such considerations have not been deemed controlling is instructive. * * *

Two principles are implicit in the foregoing. First, personal jurisdiction requires a forum-by-forum, or sovereign-by-sovereign, analysis. The question is whether a defendant has followed a course of conduct directed at the society or economy existing within the jurisdiction of a given sovereign, so that the sovereign has the power to subject the defendant to judgment concerning that conduct. Personal jurisdiction, of course, restricts “judicial power not as a matter of sovereignty, but as a matter of judicial liberty,” for due process protects the individual’s right to be subject only to lawful power. Insurance Corp. * * *. But whether a judicial judgment is lawful depends on whether the sovereign has authority to render it.

The second principle is a corollary of the first. Because the United States is a distinct sovereign, a defendant may in principle be subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States but not of any particular State. This is consistent with the premises and unique genius of our Constitution. * * * For jurisdiction, a litigant may have the requisite relationship with the United States Government but not with the government of any individual State. That would be an exceptional case, however. If the defendant is a domestic domiciliary, the courts of its home State are available and can exercise general jurisdiction. And if another State were to assert jurisdiction in an inappropriate case, it would upset the federal balance, which posits that each State has a sovereignty that is not subject to unlawful intrusion by other States. Furthermore, foreign corporations will often target or concentrate on particular States, subjecting them to specific jurisdiction in those forums.

It must be remembered, however, that although this case and Asahi both involve foreign manufacturers, the undesirable consequences of Justice Brennan’s approach are no less significant for domestic producers. The owner of a small Florida farm might sell crops to a large nearby distributor, for example, who might then distribute them to grocers across the country. If foreseeability were the controlling criterion, the farmer could be sued in Alaska or any number of other States’ courts without ever leaving town. And the issue of foreseeability may itself be contested so that significant expenses are incurred just on the preliminary issue of jurisdiction. Jurisdictional rules should avoid these costs whenever possible.

The conclusion that the authority to subject a defendant to judgment depends on purposeful availment, consistent with Justice O’Connor’s opinion in Asahi, does not by itself resolve many difficult questions of jurisdiction that will arise in particular cases. The defendant’s conduct and the economic realities of the market the defendant seeks to serve will differ across cases, and judicial exposition will, in common-law fashion, clarify the contours of that principle.

III

In this case, petitioner directed marketing and sales efforts at the United States. It may be that, assuming it were otherwise empowered to legislate on the subject, the Congress could authorize the exercise of jurisdiction in appropriate courts. That circumstance is not presented in this case, however, and it is neither necessary nor appropriate to address here any constitutional concerns that might be attendant to that exercise of power. * * * Nor is it necessary to determine what substantive law might apply were Congress to authorize jurisdiction in a federal court in New Jersey. * * * A sovereign’s legislative authority to regulate conduct may present considerations different from those presented by its authority to subject a defendant to judgment in its courts. Here the question concerns the authority of a New Jersey state court to exercise jurisdiction, so it is petitioner’s purposeful contacts with New Jersey, not with the United States, that alone are relevant.

Respondent has not established that J. McIntyre engaged in conduct purposefully directed at New Jersey. Recall that respondent’s claim of jurisdiction centers on three facts * * *. Indeed, after discovery the trial court found that the “defendant does not have a single contact with New Jersey short of the machine in question ending up in this state.” * * * These facts may reveal an intent to serve the U.S. market, but they do not show that J. McIntyre purposefully availed itself of the New Jersey market.

It is notable that the New Jersey Supreme Court appears to agree, for it could “not find that J. McIntyre had a presence or minimum contacts in this State—in any jurisprudential sense—that would justify a New Jersey court to exercise jurisdiction in this case.” * * * The court nonetheless held that petitioner could be sued in New Jersey based on a “stream-of-commerce theory of jurisdiction.” * * * As discussed, however, the stream-of-commerce metaphor cannot supersede either the mandate of the Due Process Clause or the limits on judicial authority that Clause ensures. The New Jersey Supreme Court also cited “significant policy reasons” to justify its holding, including the State’s “strong interest in protecting its citizens from defective products.” * * * That interest is doubtless strong, but the Constitution commands restraint before discarding liberty in the name of expediency.

* * *

Due process protects petitioner’s right to be subject only to lawful authority. At no time did petitioner engage in any activities in New Jersey that reveal an intent to invoke or benefit from the protection of its laws. New Jersey is without power to adjudge the rights and liabilities of J. McIntyre, and its exercise of jurisdiction would violate due process. The contrary judgment of the New Jersey Supreme Court is

Reversed.

JUSTICE BREYER, with whom JUSTICE ALITO joins, concurring in the judgment.

The Supreme Court of New Jersey adopted a broad understanding of the scope of personal jurisdiction based on its view that “[t]he increasingly fast-paced globalization of the world economy has removed national borders as barriers to trade.” Nicastro v. McIntyre Machinery America, Ltd., 201 N.J. 48, 52 * * * (2010). I do not doubt that there have been many recent changes in commerce and communication, many of which are not anticipated by our precedents. But this case does not present any of those issues. So I think it unwise to announce a rule of broad applicability without full consideration of the modern-day consequences.

In my view, the outcome of this case is determined by our precedents. Based on the facts found by the New Jersey courts, respondent Robert Nicastro failed to meet his burden to demonstrate that it was constitutionally proper to exercise jurisdiction over petitioner * * *. On that basis, I agree with the plurality that the contrary judgment of the Supreme Court of New Jersey should be reversed.

In asserting jurisdiction over the British Manufacturer, the Supreme Court of New Jersey relied most heavily on three primary facts as providing constitutionally sufficient “contacts” with New Jersey, thereby making it fundamentally fair to hale the British Manufacturer before its courts: (1) The American Distributor on one occasion sold and shipped one machine to a New Jersey customer, namely, Mr. Nicastro’s employer, Mr. Curcio; (2) the British Manufacturer permitted, indeed wanted, its independent American Distributor to sell its machines to anyone in America willing to buy them; and (3) representatives of the British Manufacturer attended trade shows in “such cities as Chicago, Las Vegas, New Orleans, Orlando, San Diego, and San Francisco.” * * * In my view, these facts do not provide contacts between the British firm and the State of New Jersey constitutionally sufficient to support New Jersey’s assertion of jurisdiction in this case.

None of our precedents finds that a single isolated sale, even if accompanied by the kind of sales effort indicated here, is sufficient. Rather, this Court’s previous holdings suggest the contrary. The Court has held that a single sale to a customer who takes an accident-causing product to a different State (where the accident takes place) is not a sufficient basis for asserting jurisdiction. See World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. * * *. And the Court, in separate opinions [in Asahi], has strongly suggested that a single sale of a product in a State does not constitute an adequate basis for asserting jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant, even if that defendant places his goods in the stream of commerce, fully aware (and hoping) that such a sale will take place. * * *

Here, the relevant facts found by the New Jersey Supreme Court show no “regular . . . flow” or “regular course” of sales in New Jersey; and there is no “something more,” such as special state-related design, advertising, advice, marketing, or anything else. Mr. Nicastro, who here bears the burden of proving jurisdiction, has shown no specific effort by the British Manufacturer to sell in New Jersey. He has introduced no list of potential New Jersey customers who might, for example, have regularly attended trade shows. And he has not otherwise shown that the British Manufacturer “purposefully avail[ed] itself of the privilege of conducting activities” within New Jersey, or that it delivered its goods in the stream of commerce “with the expectation that they will be purchased” by New Jersey users. World-Wide Volkswagen * * * (internal quotation marks omitted).

150

There may well have been other facts that Mr. Nicastro could have demonstrated in support of jurisdiction. And the dissent considers some of these facts. See [p. 152, infra] (opinion of GINSBURG, J.) (describing the size and scope of New Jersey’s scrap-metal business). But the plaintiff bears the burden of establishing jurisdiction, and here I would take the facts precisely as the New Jersey Supreme Court stated them. * * *

Accordingly, on the record present here, resolving this case requires no more than adhering to our precedents.

II

I would not go further. Because the incident at issue in this case does not implicate modern concerns, and because the factual record leaves many open questions, this is an unsuitable vehicle for making broad pronouncements that refashion basic jurisdictional rules.

A

The plurality seems to state strict rules that limit jurisdiction where a defendant does not “inten[d] to submit to the power of a sovereign” and cannot “be said to have targeted the forum.” * * * But what do those standards mean when a company targets the world by selling products from its Web site? And does it matter if, instead of shipping the products directly, a company consigns the products through an intermediary (say, Amazon.com) who then receives and fulfills the orders? And what if the company markets its products through popup advertisements that it knows will be viewed in a forum? Those issues have serious commercial consequences but are totally absent in this case.

B

But though I do not agree with the plurality’s seemingly strict no-jurisdiction rule, I am not persuaded by the absolute approach adopted by the New Jersey Supreme Court and urged by respondent and his amici. Under that view, a producer is subject to jurisdiction for a products-liability action so long as it “knows or reasonably should know that its products are distributed through a nationwide distribution system that might lead to those products being sold in any of the fifty states.” * * * (emphasis added). In the context of this case, I cannot agree.

For one thing, to adopt this view would abandon the heretofore accepted inquiry of whether, focusing upon the relationship between “the defendant, the forum, and the litigation,” it is fair, in light of the defendant’s contacts with that forum, to subject the defendant to suit there.

151

Shaffer v. Heitner * * * [p. 210, infra] (emphasis added).⁵ It would ordinarily rest jurisdiction instead upon no more than the occurrence of a product-based accident in the forum state. But this Court has rejected the notion that a defendant’s amenability to suit “travell[s] with the chattel.” World-Wide Volkswagen * * *.

For another, I cannot reconcile so automatic a rule with the constitutional demand for “minimum contacts” and “purposefu[l] avail[ment],” each of which rest upon a particular notion of defendant-focused fairness. * * * A rule like the New Jersey Supreme Court’s would permit every State to assert jurisdiction in a products-liability suit against any domestic manufacturer who sells its products (made anywhere in the United States) to a national distributor, no matter how large or small the manufacturer, no matter how distant the forum, and no matter how few the number of items that end up in the particular forum at issue. What might appear fair in the case of a large manufacturer which specifically seeks, or expects, an equal-sized distributor to sell its product in a distant State might seem unfair in the case of a small manufacturer (say, an Appalachian potter) who sells his product (cups and saucers) exclusively to a large distributor, who resells a single item (a coffee mug) to a buyer from a distant State (Hawaii). I know too little about the range of these or in-between possibilities to abandon in favor of the more absolute rule what has previously been this Court’s less absolute approach.

Further, the fact that the defendant is a foreign, rather than a domestic, manufacturer makes the basic fairness of an absolute rule yet more uncertain. I am again less certain than is the New Jersey Supreme Court that the nature of international commerce has changed so significantly as to require a new approach to personal jurisdiction.

It may be that a larger firm can readily “alleviate the risk of burdensome litigation by procuring insurance, passing the expected costs on to customers, or, if the risks are too great, severing its connection with the State.” World-Wide Volkswagen * * *. But manufacturers come in many shapes and sizes. It may be fundamentally unfair to require a small Egyptian shirt maker, a Brazilian manufacturing cooperative, or a Kenyan coffee farmer, selling its products through international distributors, to respond to products-liability tort suits in virtually every State in the United States, even those in respect to which the foreign firm has no connection at all but the sale of a single (allegedly defective) good. And a rule like the New Jersey Supreme Court suggests would require every product manufacturer, large or small, selling to American distributors to understand not only the tort law of every state, but also the wide variance in the way courts within different states apply that law. * * *

152

C

At a minimum, I would not work such a change to the law in the way either the plurality or the New Jersey Supreme Court suggests without a better understanding of the relevant contemporary commercial circumstances. * * *

* * * Accordingly, though I agree with the plurality as to the outcome of this case, I concur only in the judgment of that opinion and not its reasoning.

JUSTICE GINSBURG, with whom JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR and JUSTICE KAGAN join, dissenting.

A foreign industrialist seeks to develop a market in the United States for machines it manufactures. It hopes to derive substantial revenue from sales it makes to United States purchasers. Where in the United States buyers reside does not matter to this manufacturer. Its goal is simply to sell as much as it can, wherever it can. It excludes no region or State from the market it wishes to reach. But, all things considered, it prefers to avoid products liability litigation in the United States. To that end, it engages a U.S. distributor to ship its machines stateside. Has it succeeded in escaping personal jurisdiction in a State where one of its products is sold and causes injury or even death to a local user?

Under this Court’s pathmarking precedent in International Shoe * * * [p. 95, supra] and subsequent decisions, one would expect the answer to be unequivocally, “No.” But instead, six Justices of this Court, in divergent opinions, tell us that the manufacturer has avoided the jurisdiction of our state courts, except perhaps in States where its products are sold in sizeable quantities. Inconceivable as it may have seemed yesterday, the splintered majority today “turn[s] the clock back to the days before modern long-arm statutes when a manufacturer, to avoid being haled into court where a user is injured, need only Pilate-like wash its hands of a product by having independent distributors market it.” Weintraub, A Map Out of the Personal Jurisdiction Labyrinth, 28 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 531, 555 (1995).

I

* * *

The machine that injured Nicastro, a “McIntyre Model 640 Shear,” sold in the United States for $24,900 in 1995 * * * and features a “massive cutting capacity” * * *.

Nicastro operated the 640 Shear in the course of his employment at Curcio Scrap Metal (CSM) in Saddle Brook, New Jersey. * * * “New Jersey has long been a hotbed of scrap-metal businesses.” * * * In 2008, New Jersey recycling facilities processed 2,013,730 tons of scrap iron, steel, aluminum, and other metals—more than any other State—outpacing Kentucky, its nearest competitor, by nearly 30 percent. * * *

153

* * * McIntyre UK exhibited its products at * * * trade shows [in the United States], the company acknowledged, hoping to reach “anyone interested in the machine from anywhere in the United States.” * * * [The convention where Nicastro’s employer first learned about the shear machine was sponsored by an organization with nearly 100 New Jersey members.]

Although McIntyre UK’s U.S. sales figures are not in the record, it appears that for several years in the 1990’s, earnings from sales of McIntyre UK products in the United States “ha[d] been good” in comparison to “the rest of the world.” * * * In response to interrogatories, McIntyre UK stated that its commissioning engineer had installed the company’s equipment in several States—Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Virginia, and Washington. * * *

From at least 1995 until 2001, McIntyre UK retained an Ohio-based company, McIntyre Machinery America, Ltd. (McIntyre America), “as its exclusive distributor for the entire United States.” * * * ² Though similarly named, the two companies were separate and independent entities with “no commonality of ownership or management.” * * *

In a November 23, 1999 letter to McIntyre America, McIntyre UK’s president spoke plainly about the manufacturer’s objective in authorizing the exclusive distributorship: “All we wish to do is sell our products in the [United] States—and get paid!” * * * Notably, McIntyre America was concerned about U.S. litigation involving McIntyre UK products, in which the distributor had been named as a defendant. McIntyre UK counseled McIntyre America to respond personally to the litigation, but reassured its distributor that “the product was built and designed by McIntyre Machinery in the UK and the buck stops here—if there’s something wrong with the machine.” * * * Answering jurisdictional interrogatories, McIntyre UK stated that it had been named as a defendant in lawsuits in Illinois, Kentucky, Massachusetts, and West Virginia. * * * And in correspondence with McIntyre America, McIntyre UK noted that the manufacturer had products liability insurance coverage. * * * McIntyre UK’s regular attendance and exhibitions at [scrap metal] conventions was surely a purposeful step to reach customers for its products “anywhere in the United States.” At least as purposeful was McIntyre UK’s engagement of McIntyre America as the conduit for sales of McIntyre UK’s machines to buyers “throughout the United States.” Given McIntyre UK’s endeavors to reach and profit from the United States market as a whole, Nicastro’s suit,

I would hold, has been brought in a forum entirely appropriate for the adjudication of his claim. He alleges that McIntyre UK’s shear machine was defectively designed or manufactured and, as a result, caused injury to him at his workplace. The machine arrived in Nicastro’s New Jersey workplace not randomly or fortuitously, but as a result of the U.S. connections and distribution system that McIntyre UK deliberately arranged.³ On what sensible view of the allocation of adjudicatory authority could the place of Nicastro’s injury within the United States be deemed off limits for his products liability claim against a foreign manufacturer who targeted the United States (including all the States that constitute the Nation) as the territory it sought to develop?

II

* * * [First], the question * * * is one of specific jurisdiction, which turns on an “affiliatio[n] between the forum and the underlying controversy.” Goodyear Dunlop * * * [p. 162, infra].

Second, no issue of the fair and reasonable allocation of adjudicatory authority among States of the United States is present in this case. New Jersey’s exercise of personal jurisdiction over a foreign manufacturer whose dangerous product caused a workplace injury in New Jersey does not tread on the domain, or diminish the sovereignty, of any sister State. Indeed, among States of the United States, the State in which the injury occurred would seem most suitable for litigation of a products liability tort claim. * * *

Third, the constitutional limits on a state court’s adjudicatory authority derive from considerations of due process, not state sovereignty. * * *

Finally, in International Shoe itself, and decisions thereafter, the Court has made plain that legal fictions, notably “presence” and “implied consent,” should be discarded, for they conceal the actual bases on which jurisdiction rests. * * *

Whatever the state of academic debate over the role of consent in modern jurisdictional doctrines, * * * the plurality’s notion that consent is the animating concept draws no support from controlling decisions of this Court. Quite the contrary, the Court has explained, a forum can exercise jurisdiction when its contacts with the controversy are sufficient;

invocation of a fictitious consent, the Court has repeatedly said, is unnecessary and unhelpful. * * * ⁵

III

This case is illustrative of marketing arrangements for sales in the United States common in today’s commercial world.⁶ * * * A foreign-country manufacturer engages a U.S. company to promote and distribute the manufacturer’s products, not in any particular State, but anywhere and everywhere in the United States the distributor can attract purchasers. The product proves defective and injures a user in the State where the user lives or works. Often, as here, the manufacturer will have liability insurance covering personal injuries caused by its products. * * *

When industrial accidents happen, a long-arm statute in the State where the injury occurs generally permits assertion of jurisdiction, upon giving proper notice, over the foreign manufacturer. * * *

The modern approach to jurisdiction over corporations and other legal entities, ushered in by International Shoe, gave prime place to reason and fairness. Is it not fair and reasonable, given the mode of trading of which this case is an example, to require the international seller to defend at the place its products cause injury?⁹ Do not litigational convenience * * * and choice-of-law considerations¹¹ point in that direction? On what measure of reason and fairness can it be considered undue to require McIntyre UK to defend in New Jersey as an incident of its efforts to develop a market for its industrial machines anywhere and everywhere in the United States?¹² Is not the burden on McIntyre UK to defend in New Jersey fair, i.e., a reasonable cost of transacting business internationally, in comparison to the burden on Nicastro to go to Nottingham, England to gain recompense for an injury he sustained using McIntyre’s product at his workplace in Saddle Brook, New Jersey?

McIntyre UK dealt with the United States as a single market. Like most foreign manufacturers, it was concerned not with the prospect of suit in State X as opposed to State Y, but rather with its subjection to suit anywhere in the United States. * * * As a McIntyre UK officer wrote in an e-mail to McIntyre America: “American law—who needs it?!” * * * If McIntyre UK is answerable in the United States at all, is it not “perfectly appropriate to permit the exercise of that jurisdiction . . . at the place of injury”? * * *

In sum, McIntyre UK, by engaging McIntyre America to promote and sell its machines in the United States, “purposefully availed itself” of the United States market nationwide, not a market in a single State or a discrete collection of States. McIntyre UK thereby availed itself of the market of all States in which its products were sold by its exclusive distributor. “Th[e] ‘purposeful availment’ requirement,” this Court has explained, simply “ensures that a defendant will not be haled into a jurisdiction solely as a result of ‘random,’ ‘fortuitous,’ or ‘attenuated’ contacts.” * * * Adjudicatory authority is appropriately exercised where “actions by the defendant himself” give rise to the affiliation with the forum. How could McIntyre UK not have intended, by its actions targeting a national market, to sell products in the fourth largest destination for imports among all States of the United States and the largest scrap metal market? * * *

IV

A

While this Court has not considered in any prior case the now-prevalent pattern presented here—a foreign-country manufacturer enlisting a U.S. distributor to develop a market in the United States for the manufacturer’s products—none of the Court’s decisions tug against the judgment made by the New Jersey Supreme Court. * * *

World-Wide Volkswagen concerned a New York car dealership that sold solely in the New York market, and a New York distributor who supplied retailers in three States only: New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey. * * * Jurisdiction, the Court held, could not be based on the customer’s unilateral act of driving the vehicle to Oklahoma. * * *

Notably, the foreign manufacturer of the Audi in World-Wide Volkswagen did not object to the jurisdiction of the Oklahoma courts and the U.S. importer abandoned its initially stated objection. * * * And most relevant here, the Court’s opinion indicates that an objection to jurisdiction by the manufacturer or national distributor would have been unavailing. To reiterate, the Court said in World-Wide Volkswagen that, when a manufacturer or distributor aims to sell its product to customers in several States, it is reasonable “to subject it to suit in [any] one of those States if its allegedly defective [product] has there been the source of injury.” * * *

* * *

[Asahi] * * * was not a close call. * * * All agreed on the bottom line: The Japanese valve-assembly manufacturer was not reasonably brought into the California courts to litigate a dispute with another foreign party over a transaction that took place outside the United States.

* * *

* * * Asahi, unlike McIntyre UK, did not itself seek out customers in the United States, it engaged no distributor to promote its wares here, it appeared at no tradeshows in the United States, and, of course, it had no Web site advertising its products to the world. Moreover, Asahi was a component-part manufacturer with “little control over the final destination of its products once they were delivered into the stream of commerce.” * * * It was important to the Court in Asahi that “those who use Asahi components in their final products, and sell those products in California, [would be] subject to the application of California tort law.” * * * To hold that Asahi controls this case would, to put it bluntly, be dead wrong.¹⁵

B

The Court’s judgment also puts United States plaintiffs at a disadvantage in comparison to similarly situated complainants elsewhere in the world. Of particular note, within the European Union, in which the United Kingdom is a participant, the jurisdiction New Jersey would have exercised is not at all exceptional. The European Regulation on Jurisdiction and the Recognition and Enforcement of Judgments provides for the exercise of specific jurisdiction “in matters relating to tort . . . in the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred.” Council Reg. 44/2001, Art. 5, 2001 O.J. (L.12) 4. * * * The European Court of Justice has interpreted this prescription to authorize jurisdiction either where the harmful act occurred or at the place of injury. * * *

V

* * * [Academic commentary anticipated that] courts would differently appraise two situations: (1) cases involving a substantially local plaintiff, like Nicastro, injured by the activity of a defendant engaged in interstate or international trade; and (2) cases in which the defendant is a natural or legal person whose economic activities and legal involvements are largely home-based, i.e., entities without designs to gain substantial revenue from sales in distant markets.¹⁸ * * * [C]ourts presented with [the] * * * first scenario * * * have repeatedly confirmed that jurisdiction is appropriately exercised by courts of the place where the product was sold and caused injury. [Appendix of cases omitted.]

* * *

For the reasons stated, I would hold McIntyre UK answerable in New Jersey for the harm Nicastro suffered at his workplace in that State using McIntyre UK’s shearing machine. While I dissent from the Court’s judgment, I take heart that the plurality opinion does not speak for the Court, for that opinion would take a giant step away from the “notions of fair play and substantial justice” underlying International Shoe. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. McIntyre marks the Court’s return to questions left open by Asahi and not addressed since 1987. Which opinion speaks for the Court? Under MARKS v. UNITED STATES, “[w]hen a fragmented Court decides a case and no single rationale explaining the result enjoys the assent of five Justices, ‘the holding of the Court may be viewed as the position taken by those Members who concurred in the judgment on the narrowest grounds.’ ” 430 U.S. 188, 193, 97 S.Ct. 990, 993, 51 L.Ed.2d 260, 266 (1977) (quoting Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 169 n.15, 96 S.Ct. 2909, 2923 n.15, 49 L.Ed.2d 859, 872 n.15 (1976)). Applying this test, which opinion states the Court’s holding?

Given the lack of a majority opinion, would lower courts be justified in giving McIntyre limited weight? For a comparison of the three opinions, see Steinman, The Lay of the Land: Examining the Three Opinions in J. McIntyre Machinery, Ltd. v. Nicastro, 63 S.C.L.Rev. 481 (2012).

2. In his plurality opinion, Justice Kennedy insisted that determining whether jurisdiction may be exercised requires a “sovereign-by-sovereign” analysis. Is this approach at odds with International Shoe’s requirement that the exercise of jurisdiction comport with “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice”? How does plaintiff show that defendant has submitted to the will of the sovereign to support the court’s exercise of jurisdiction? Does Justice Kennedy endorse the “stream of commerce plus” analysis? If so, why didn’t Justice Kennedy treat the activities of McIntyre UK’s Ohio distributor as a plus-factor to support jurisdiction in New Jersey? Would this showing have satisfied Justice O’Connor’s plurality approach in Asahi?

3. What are the major points of disagreement between Justice Ginsburg’s dissenting opinion and that of the plurality? Do you agree with Justice Ginsburg’s dissent that the plurality’s view of jurisdiction is no different than “the long-discredited fiction of implied consent”? According to the dissent, is a manufacturer that markets its product nationwide amenable to suit in the state where the product is sold and causes injury? Is this approach consistent with the notion of purposeful availment?

159

4. On what basis do Justices Breyer and Alito concur? What kind of additional factual information might have persuaded them to uphold jurisdiction in New Jersey?

5. Which of the opinions in McIntyre would support the exercise of specific jurisdiction by a court in Idaho in a suit by a plaintiff injured in that state:

- (a) When defendant is a German component part manufacturer who markets its product throughout the United States.
- (b) When defendant is a California component part manufacturer who markets its product nationwide through an independent distributor.
- (c) When defendant is an Illinois component part manufacturer who markets its product to an end-product manufacturer whose principal place of business is in Washington State.
- (d) When defendant is a component part manufacturer who markets its product to an end-product manufacturer whose principal place of business is in Illinois.
- (e) When defendant is a foreign end-product manufacturer who markets its product throughout the United States.

See Noyes, The Persistent Problem of Purposeful Availment, 45 Conn.L.Rev. 41 (2012).

6. After McIntyre, what advice would you give to a foreign company that sells component parts in the United States market about its amenability to suit in a state court in which the end-product causes injury? Does your advice depend on the company’s mode of distribution? What if the foreign company directly sells an end-product within the United States market? Would one direct sale support the exercise of jurisdiction?

7. Justice Kennedy suggests that Congress could enact a long-arm statute for the federal courts authorizing the exercise of jurisdiction based on contacts with the United States as a whole. Is this suggestion consistent with the plurality’s theory of jurisdiction as an incident of sovereignty and not a matter of fairness or reasonableness? The topic of nationwide service of process is considered later in this chapter, p. 233, infra.

8. In WALDEN v. FIORE, 571 U.S. 277, 134 S.Ct. 1115, 188 L.Ed.2d 12 (2014), a pair of professional gamblers filed suit in a federal court in Nevada, where they lived, alleging that an airport security officer had violated their Fourth Amendment rights by seizing their cash winnings and then filing a false probable cause affidavit in support of the funds’ forfeiture and delaying return of the cash. The seizure took place at the Atlanta, Georgia airport while plaintiffs were en route to Nevada. The Nevada district court dismissed for lack of personal jurisdiction and the Ninth Circuit reversed, finding that the officer had falsified the affidavit with the knowledge that it would have effects in Nevada where plaintiffs lived. The Supreme Court unanimously reversed, finding that the appeals court improperly focused on plaintiffs’ contacts with the forum and not on the officer’s contacts. Justice Thomas wrote:

 For a State to exercise jurisdiction consistent with due process, the defendant’s suit-related conduct must create a substantial connection with the forum state. Two related aspects of the necessary relationship are relevant in this case.

First, the relationship must arise out of contacts that the “defendant himself”^d creates with the forum State. ***

Second, our “minimum contacts” analysis looks to the defendant’s contacts with the forum State itself, not the defendant’s contacts with persons who reside there.  And although physical presence in the forum is not a prerequisite to jurisdiction,  physical entry into the State—either by the defendant in person or through an agent, goods, mail, or some other means—is certainly a relevant contact. ***

But the plaintiff cannot be the only link between the defendant and the forum. Rather, it is the defendant’s conduct that must form the necessary connection with the forum State that is the basis for its jurisdiction over him.  Due process requires that a defendant be haled into court in a forum State based on his own affiliation with the State, not based on the “random, fortuitous, or attenuated” contacts he makes by interacting with other persons affiliated with the State. ***

These same principles apply when intentional torts are involved.  A forum State’s exercise of jurisdiction over an out-of-state intentional tortfeasor must be based on intentional conduct by the defendant that creates the necessary contacts with the forum.

Calder v. Jones  [p. 126, supra] illustrates the application of these principles. ***

The crux of Calder was that the reputation-based “effects” of the alleged libel connected the defendants to California, not just to the plaintiff. The strength of that connection was largely a function of the nature of the libel tort. However scandalous a newspaper article might be, it can lead to a loss of reputation only if communicated to (and read and understood by) third persons.  Accordingly, the reputational injury caused by the defendants’ story would not have occurred but for the fact that the defendants wrote an article for publication in California that was read by a large number of California citizens. Indeed, because publication to third persons is a necessary element of libel,  the defendants’ intentional tort actually occurred in California. ***

161

 Calder made clear that mere injury to a forum resident is not a sufficient connection to the forum. Regardless of where a plaintiff lives or works, an injury is jurisdictionally relevant only insofar as it shows that the defendant has formed a contact with the forum State. The proper question is not where the plaintiff experienced a particular injury or effect but whether the defendant’s conduct connects him to the forum in a meaningful way.

Respondents’ claimed injury does not evince a connection between petitioner and Nevada. Even if we consider the continuation of the seizure in Georgia to be a distinct injury, it is not the sort of effect that is tethered to Nevada in any meaningful way. Respondents (and only respondents) lacked access to their funds in Nevada not because anything independently occurred there, but because Nevada is where respondents chose to be at a time when they desired to use the funds seized by petitioner. ***

Id. at 290, 134 S.Ct. at 1125, 188 L.Ed.2d at 23.

The Court further noted:

Respondents warn that if we decide petitioner lacks minimum contacts in this case, it will bring about unfairness in cases where intentional torts are committed via the Internet or other electronic means (e.g., fraudulent access of financial accounts or “phishing” schemes). As an initial matter, we reiterate that the “minimum contacts” inquiry principally protects the liberty of the nonresident defendant, not the interests of the plaintiff.  In any event, this case does not present the very different questions whether and how a defendant’s virtual “presence” and conduct translate into “contacts” with a particular State. ***

Id. at 290 n.9, 134 S.Ct. at 1125 n.9, 188 L.Ed.2d at 24 n.9.

E. GENERAL JURISDICTION IN STATE COURT

Pennoyer’s principle of territoriality justified a court’s exercise of personal jurisdiction over a defendant who was physically present in the forum at the time of service or was a domiciliary of the state. In those circumstances, the court’s power was all-purpose and over any claim. International Shoe further recognized that all-purpose jurisdiction could be exercised in some cases over a corporate defendant incorporated by a state other than the forum when its “continuous corporate operations within a state were thought so substantial and of such nature as to justify suit against it on causes of action arising from dealings entirely distinct from those activities.” International Shoe, p. 95, supra. This species of jurisdiction came to be known as “general” jurisdiction, defined as the “power to adjudicate any kind of controversy when jurisdiction is based on relationships, direct or indirect, between the forum and the person or persons whose legal rights are to be affected.” von Mehren & Trautman, Jurisdiction to Adjudicate: A Suggested Analysis, 79 Harv.L.Rev. 1121, 1136 (1966).

162

In HELICOPTEROS NACIONALES DE COLOMBIA, S.A. v. HALL, 466 U.S. 408, 104 S.Ct. 1868, 80 L.Ed.2d 404 (1984), the Supreme Court observed:

It has been said that when a State exercises personal jurisdiction over a defendant in a suit arising out of or related to the defendant’s contacts with the forum, the State is exercising ‘specific jurisdiction’ over the defendant. * * * When a State exercises personal jurisdiction over a defendant in a suit not arising out of or related to the defendant’s contacts with the forum, the State has been said to be exercising ‘general jurisdiction’ over the defendant.

Id. at 414 nn.8–9, 104 S.Ct. at 1872 nn.8–9, 80 L.Ed.2d at 411 nn.8–9.

GOODYEAR DUNLOP TIRES OPERATIONS, S.A. v. BROWN

Supreme Court of the United States, 2011.
564 U.S. 915, 131 S.Ct. 2846, 189 L.Ed.2d 796.

Certiorari to the Court of Appeals of North Carolina.

JUSTICE GINSBURG delivered the opinion for a unanimous Court.

This case concerns the jurisdiction of state courts over corporations organized and operating abroad. We address, in particular, this question: Are foreign subsidiaries of a United States parent corporation amenable to suit in state court on claims unrelated to any activity of the subsidiaries in the forum State?

* * *

* * * Because the episode-in-suit, the bus accident, occurred in France, and the tire alleged to have caused the accident was manufactured and sold abroad, North Carolina courts lacked specific jurisdiction to adjudicate the controversy. * * * Were the foreign subsidiaries nonetheless amenable to general jurisdiction in North Carolina courts? Confusing or blending general and specific jurisdictional inquiries, the North Carolina courts answered yes. Some of the tires made abroad by Goodyear’s foreign subsidiaries, the North Carolina Court of Appeals stressed, had reached North Carolina through “the stream of commerce”; that connection, the Court of Appeals believed, gave North Carolina courts the handle needed for the exercise of general jurisdiction over the foreign corporations. * * *

163

A connection so limited between the forum and the foreign corporation, we hold, is an inadequate basis for the exercise of general jurisdiction. Such a connection does not establish the “continuous and systematic” affiliation necessary to empower North Carolina courts to entertain claims unrelated to the foreign corporation’s contacts with the State.

I

On April 18, 2004, a bus destined for Charles de Gaulle Airport overturned on a road outside Paris, France. Passengers on the bus were young soccer players from North Carolina beginning their journey home. Two 13-year-olds, Julian Brown and Matthew Helms, sustained fatal injuries. The boys’ parents, respondents in this Court, filed a suit for wrongful-death damages in the Superior Court of Onslow County, North Carolina, in their capacity as administrators of the boys’ estates. Attributing the accident to a tire that failed when its plies separated, the parents alleged negligence in the “design, construction, testing, and inspection” of the tire. * * *

Goodyear Luxembourg Tires, SA (Goodyear Luxembourg), Goodyear Lastikleri T.A.S. (Goodyear Turkey), and Goodyear Dunlop Tires France, SA (Goodyear France), petitioners here, were named as defendants. Incorporated in Luxembourg, Turkey, and France, respectively, petitioners are indirect subsidiaries of Goodyear USA, an Ohio corporation also named as a defendant in the suit. Petitioners manufacture tires primarily for sale in European and Asian markets. Their tires differ in size and construction from tires ordinarily sold in the United States. They are designed to carry significantly heavier loads, and to serve under road conditions and speed limits in the manufacturers’ primary markets.¹

In contrast to the parent company, Goodyear USA, which does not contest the North Carolina courts’ personal jurisdiction over it, petitioners are not registered to do business in North Carolina. They have no place of business, employees, or bank accounts in North Carolina. They do not design, manufacture, or advertise their products in North Carolina. And they do not solicit business in North Carolina or themselves sell or ship tires to North Carolina customers. Even so, a small percentage of petitioners’ tires (tens of thousands out of tens of millions manufactured between 2004 and 2007) were distributed within North Carolina by other Goodyear USA affiliates. These tires were typically custom ordered to equip specialized vehicles such as cement mixers, waste haulers, and boat and horse trailers. Petitioners state, and respondents do not here deny, that the type of tire involved in the accident, a Goodyear Regional RHS tire manufactured by Goodyear Turkey, was never distributed in North Carolina.

164

Petitioners moved to dismiss the claims against them for want of personal jurisdiction. The trial court denied the motion, and the North Carolina Court of Appeals affirmed. Acknowledging that the claims neither “related to, nor . . . ar[o]se from, [petitioners’] contacts with North Carolina,” the Court of Appeals confined its analysis to “general rather than specific jurisdiction,” which the court recognized required a “higher threshold” showing: A defendant must have “continuous and systematic contacts” with the forum. * * * That threshold was crossed, the court determined, when petitioners placed their tires “in the stream of interstate commerce without any limitation on the extent to which those tires could be sold in North Carolina.” * * *

Nothing in the record, the court observed, indicated that petitioners “took any affirmative action to cause tires which they had manufactured to be shipped into North Carolina.” * * * The court found, however, that tires made by petitioners reached North Carolina as a consequence of a “highly-organized distribution process” involving other Goodyear USA subsidiaries. * * * Petitioners, the court noted, made “no attempt to keep these tires from reaching the North Carolina market.” * * * Indeed, the very tire involved in the accident, the court observed, conformed to tire standards established by the U.S. Department of Transportation and bore markings required for sale in the United States. * * * ² As further support, the court invoked North Carolina’s “interest in providing a forum in which its citizens are able to seek redress for [their] injuries,” and noted the hardship North Carolina plaintiffs would experience “[were they] required to litigate their claims in France,” a country to which they have no ties. * * *

II

A

* * *

* * * For an individual, the paradigm forum for the exercise of general jurisdiction is the individual’s domicile; for a corporation, it is an equivalent place, one in which the corporation is fairly regarded as at home. * * * [Academic commentary has identified] domicile, place of incorporation, and principal place of business as “paradig[m]” bases for the exercise of general jurisdiction[.] * * *

165

* * *

In only two decisions postdating International Shoe * * * has this Court considered whether an out-of-state corporate defendant’s in-state contacts were sufficiently “continuous and systematic” to justify the exercise of general jurisdiction over claims unrelated to those contacts: Perkins v. Benguet Consol. Mining Co., 342 U.S. 437, 72 S.Ct. 413, 96 L.Ed. 485 (1952) (general jurisdiction appropriately exercised over Philippine corporation sued in Ohio, where the company’s affairs were overseen during World War II); and Helicopteros [p. 162, supra] (helicopter owned by Colombian corporation crashed in Peru; survivors of U.S. citizens who died in the crash, the Court held, could not maintain wrongful-death actions against the Colombian corporation in Texas, for the corporation’s helicopter purchases and purchase-linked activity in Texas were insufficient to subject it to Texas court’s general jurisdiction).

B

To justify the exercise of general jurisdiction over petitioners, the North Carolina courts relied on the petitioners’ placement of their tires in the “stream of commerce.”³ * * * Typically, in such cases, a nonresident defendant, acting outside the forum, places in the stream of commerce a product that ultimately causes harm inside the forum.

* * *

The North Carolina court’s stream-of-commerce analysis elided the essential difference between case-specific and all-purpose (general) jurisdiction. Flow of a manufacturer’s products into the forum, we have explained, may bolster an affiliation germane to specific jurisdiction. * * * But ties serving to bolster the exercise of specific jurisdiction do not warrant a determination that, based on those ties, the forum has general jurisdiction over a defendant. * * *

* * * Our 1952 decision in Perkins v. Benguet Consol. Mining Co. remains “[t]he textbook case of general jurisdiction appropriately exercised over a foreign corporation that has not consented to suit in the forum.” * * *

Sued in Ohio, the defendant in Perkins was a Philippine mining corporation that had ceased activities in the Philippines during World War II. To the extent that the company was conducting any business during and immediately after the Japanese occupation of the Philippines, it was doing so in Ohio: the corporation’s president maintained his office there, kept the company files in that office, and supervised from the Ohio office “the necessarily limited wartime activities of the company.” * * * Although the claim-in-suit did not arise in Ohio, this Court ruled that it would not violate due process for Ohio to adjudicate the controversy. * * *

166

We next addressed the exercise of general jurisdiction over an out-of-state corporation over three decades later, in Helicopteros. In that case, survivors of United States citizens who died in a helicopter crash in Peru instituted wrongful-death actions in a Texas state court against the owner and operator of the helicopter, a Colombian corporation. The Colombian corporation had no place of business in Texas and was not licensed to do business there. “Basically, [the company’s] contacts with Texas consisted of sending its chief executive officer to Houston for a contract-negotiation session; accepting into its New York bank account checks drawn on a Houston bank; purchasing helicopters, equipment, and training services from [a Texas enterprise] for substantial sums; and sending personnel to [Texas] for training.” * * * These links to Texas, we determined, did not “constitute the kind of continuous and systematic general business contacts . . . found to exist in Perkins,” and were insufficient to support the exercise of jurisdiction over a claim that neither “ar[ose] out of . . . no[r] related to” the defendant’s activities in Texas. * * *

Helicopteros concluded that “mere purchases [made in the forum State], even if occurring at regular intervals, are not enough to warrant a State’s assertion of [general] jurisdiction over a nonresident corporation in a cause of action not related to those purchase transactions.” * * * We see no reason to differentiate from the ties to Texas held insufficient in Helicopteros, the sales of petitioners’ tires sporadically made in North Carolina through intermediaries. Under the sprawling view of general jurisdiction urged by respondents and embraced by the North Carolina Court of Appeals, any substantial manufacturer or seller of goods would be amenable to suit, on any claim for relief, wherever its products are distributed. But cf. World-Wide Volkswagen * * * (every seller of chattels does not, by virtue of the sale, “appoint the chattel his agent for service of process”).

Measured against Helicopteros and Perkins, North Carolina is not a forum in which it would be permissible to subject petitioners to general jurisdiction. Unlike the defendant in Perkins, whose sole wartime business activity was conducted in Ohio, petitioners are in no sense at home in North Carolina. Their attenuated connections to the State * * * fall far short of * * * “the continuous and systematic general business contacts” necessary to empower North Carolina to entertain suit against them on claims unrelated to anything that connects them to the State. * * *⁵

167

C

Respondents belatedly assert a “single enterprise” theory, asking us to consolidate petitioners’ ties to North Carolina with those of Goodyear USA and other Goodyear entities. * * * In effect, respondents would have us pierce Goodyear corporate veils, at least for jurisdictional purposes. * * * Neither below nor in their brief in opposition to the petition for certiorari did respondents urge disregard of petitioners’ discrete status as subsidiaries and treatment of all Goodyear entities as a “unitary business,” so that jurisdiction over the parent would draw in the subsidiaries as well. * * * Respondents have therefore forfeited this contention, and we do not address it. * * *

Reversed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Under Goodyear, when can general jurisdiction be exercised by a forum other than the company’s state of incorporation or principal place of business? In DAIMLER AG v. BAUMAN, 571 U.S. 117, 134 S.Ct. 746, 187 L.Ed.2d 624 (2014), Argentinian victims of human rights abuses sued Daimler, a German corporation, in California federal court alleging that defendant’s wholly-owned Argentinian subsidiary had collaborated with Argentine security forces to kidnap, detain, torture, and kill plaintiffs or their relatives in Argentina. Personal jurisdiction was based on the California contacts of defendant’s U.S. subsidiary (MBUSA), which was incorporated in Delaware and had its principal place of business in New Jersey. MBUSA was Daimler’s exclusive importer in the United States, distributing Daimler vehicles to dealerships throughout the country. MBUSA had multiple facilities in California and was the largest supplier of luxury vehicles to the California market. MBUSA’s sales in California amounted to 2.4 percent of Daimler’s sales worldwide. See id. at 123, 134 S.Ct. at 752, 187 L.Ed.2d at 631.

Although the Ninth Circuit upheld general jurisdiction based on Daimler’s agency relation with the United States subsidiary, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that Daimler was not amenable to suit “for claims involving only foreign plaintiffs and conduct occurring entirely abroad.” Justice Ginsburg, writing for the majority, first rejected the Ninth Circuit’s rationale for attributing MBUSA’s contacts to Daimler: “The Ninth Circuit’s agency theory * * * appears to subject foreign corporations to general jurisdiction whenever they have an in-state subsidiary or affiliate, an outcome that would sweep beyond even the ‘sprawling view of general jurisdiction’ we rejected in Goodyear.” Id. at 136, 134 S.Ct. at 759–60, 187 L.Ed.2d at 639. Justice Ginsburg then explained that general jurisdiction would not be proper in California even if MBUSA’s contacts were attributable to Daimler:

168

Goodyear made clear that only a limited set of affiliations with a forum will render a defendant amenable to all-purpose jurisdiction there. * * * With respect to a corporation, the place of incorporation and principal place of business are “paradig[m] . . . bases for general jurisdiction.” * * * Those affiliations have the virtue of being unique—that is, each ordinarily indicates only one place—as well as easily ascertainable. * * * These bases afford plaintiffs recourse to at least one clear and certain forum in which a corporate defendant may be sued on any and all claims.

Goodyear did not hold that a corporation may be subject to general jurisdiction only in a forum where it is incorporated or has its principal place of business; it simply typed those places paradigm all-purpose forums. Plaintiffs would have us look beyond the exemplar bases Goodyear identified, and approve the exercise of general jurisdiction in every State in which a corporation “engages in a substantial, continuous, and systematic course of business.” * * * That formulation, we hold, is unacceptably grasping.

* * * [T]he inquiry under Goodyear is not whether a foreign corporation’s in-forum contacts can be said to be in some sense “continuous and systematic,” it is whether that corporation’s “affiliations with the State are so ‘continuous and systematic’ as to render [it] essentially at home in the forum State.” * * *

Here, neither Daimler nor [the subsidiary] is incorporated in California, nor does either entity have its principal place of business there. If Daimler’s California activities sufficed to allow adjudication of this Argentina-rooted case in California, the same global reach would presumably be available in every other State in which [the subsidiary’s] sales are sizable. Such exorbitant exercises of all-purpose jurisdiction would scarcely permit out-of-state defendants “to structure their primary conduct with some minimum assurance as to where that conduct will and will not render them liable to suit.” Burger King * * * [p. 127, supra].

Id. at 137–39, 134 S.Ct. at 760–62, 187 L.Ed.2d at 639–41.

In so holding, the Court relied upon the views of the Solicitor General that subjecting foreign corporations to suit under what was thought to be an expansive concept of general jurisdiction could create “international friction.” Id. at 142, 134 S.Ct. at 763, 187 L.Ed.2d 642. The Court noted that it did “not foreclose the possibility that in an exceptional case” general jurisdiction could be exercised based on contacts “so substantial and of such a nature as to render the corporation at home” in the forum. Id. at 139 n.19, 134 S.Ct. at 761 n.19, 187 L.Ed.2d at 641 n.19. Justice Ginsburg clarified, however, that general jurisdiction cannot be based “solely on the magnitude of the defendant’s in-state contacts”:

General jurisdiction instead calls for an appraisal of a corporation’s activities in their entirety, nationwide and worldwide. A corporation that operates in many places can scarcely be deemed at home in all of them. * * * Nothing in International Shoe and its progeny suggests that a particular quantum of local activity should give a State authority over a far larger quantum of activity having no connection to any in-state activity.

Id. at 139 n.20, 134 S.Ct. at 762 n.20, 187 L.Ed.2d at 641 n.20.

Justice Sotomayor concurred in the judgment. She would have rejected jurisdiction based on the reasonableness factors that were dispositive in Asahi, p. 134, supra, arguing that California’s “exercise of jurisdiction would be unreasonable given that the case involves foreign plaintiffs suing a foreign defendant based on foreign conduct, and given that a more appropriate forum is available.” Id. at 144–46, 134 S.Ct. at 764–65, 187 L.Ed.2d at 643–45. She disagreed, however, with the majority’s conclusion that defendant’s contacts with California were insufficient to make it at home in the forum state:

The Court acknowledges that Mercedes-Benz USA, LLC (MBUSA), Daimler’s wholly owned subsidiary, has considerable contacts with California. It has multiple facilities in the State, including a regional headquarters. Each year, it distributes in California tens of thousands of cars, the sale of which generated billions of dollars in the year this suit was brought. And it provides service and sales support to customers throughout the State. Daimler has conceded that California courts may exercise general jurisdiction over MBUSA on the basis of these contacts, and the Court assumes that MBUSA’s contacts may be attributed to Daimler for the purpose of deciding whether Daimler is also subject to general jurisdiction.

Are these contacts sufficient to permit the exercise of general jurisdiction over Daimler? The Court holds that they are not, for a reason wholly foreign to our due process jurisprudence. The problem, the Court says, is not that Daimler’s contacts with California are too few, but that its contacts with other forums are too many. In other words, the Court does not dispute that the presence of multiple offices, the direct distribution of thousands of products accounting for billions of dollars in sales, and continuous interaction with customers throughout a State would be enough to support the exercise of general jurisdiction over some businesses. Daimler is just not one of those businesses, the Court concludes, because its California contacts must be viewed in the context of its extensive “nationwide and worldwide” operations. * * * In recent years, Americans have grown accustomed to the concept of multinational corporations that are supposedly “too big to fail”; today the Court deems Daimler “too big for general jurisdiction.”

* * *

[T]he majority announces the new rule that in order for a foreign defendant to be subject to general jurisdiction, it must not only possess continuous and systematic contacts with a forum State, but those contacts must also surpass some unspecified level when viewed in comparison to the company’s “nationwide and worldwide” activities.

* * *

[T]he majority’s approach unduly curtails the States’ sovereign authority to adjudicate disputes against corporate defendants who have engaged in continuous and substantial business operations within their boundaries. * * * Suppose a company divides its management functions equally among three offices in different States, with one office nominally deemed the company’s corporate headquarters. If the State where the headquarters is located can exercise general jurisdiction, why should the other two States be constitutionally forbidden to do the same? Indeed, under the majority’s approach, the result would be unchanged even if the company has substantial operations within the latter two States (and even if the company has no sales or other business operations in the first State). * * *

Id. at 142–57, 134 S.Ct. at 763–72, 187 L.Ed.2d at 643–52.

2. In BNSF RAILWAY CO. v. TYRRELL, 581 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 1549, 198 L.Ed.2d 36 (2017), railroad employees sued BNSF in Montana state court under the Federal Employers’ Liability Act for injuries that occurred outside of Montana.

BNSF is incorporated in Delaware and has its principal place of business in Texas. * * * It operates railroad lines in 28 States. * * * BNSF has 2,061 miles of railroad track in Montana (about 6% of its total track mileage of 32,500), employs some 2,100 workers there (less than 5% of its total work force of 43,000), generates less than 10% of its total revenue in the State, and maintains only one of its 24 automotive facilities in Montana (4%).

Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1554, 198 L.Ed.2d at 42. The Supreme Court held that these contacts with Montana were not sufficient to support general jurisdiction:

BNSF * * * is not incorporated in Montana and does not maintain its principal place of business there. Nor is BNSF so heavily engaged in activity in Montana “as to render [it] essentially at home” in that State. * * * BNSF has over 2,000 miles of railroad track and more than 2,000 employees in Montana. But, as we observed in Daimler, “the general jurisdiction inquiry does not focus solely on the magnitude of the defendant’s in-state contacts.” * * * Rather, the inquiry “calls for an appraisal of a corporation’s activities in their entirety”; “[a] corporation that operates in many places can scarcely be deemed at home in all of them.” * * * In short, the business BNSF does in Montana is sufficient to subject the railroad to specific personal jurisdiction in that State on claims related to the business it does in Montana. But in-state business, we clarified in Daimler and Goodyear, does not suffice to permit the assertion of general jurisdiction over claims like [plaintiffs’] that are unrelated to any activity occurring in Montana.

Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1559, 198 L.Ed.2d at 47–48.

Justice Sotomayor dissented from the Court’s application of the “at home” test for general jurisdiction, and criticized using a “comparative analysis” to determine jurisdiction:

The majority’s approach grants a jurisdictional windfall to large multistate or multinational corporations that operate across many jurisdictions. Under its reasoning, it is virtually inconceivable that such corporations will ever be subject to general jurisdiction in any location other than their principal places of business or of incorporation. Foreign businesses with principal places of business outside the United States may never be subject to general jurisdiction in this country even though they have continuous and systematic contacts within the United States. * * * What was once a holistic, nuanced contacts analysis backed by considerations of fairness and reasonableness has now effectively been replaced by the rote identification of a corporation’s principal place of business or place of incorporation. The result? It is individual plaintiffs, harmed by the actions of a farflung foreign corporation, who will bear the brunt of the majority’s approach and be forced to sue in distant jurisdictions with which they have no contacts or connection.

Moreover, the comparative contacts analysis invented in Daimler resurfaces here and proves all but dispositive. The majority makes much of the fact that BNSF’s contacts in Montana are only a percentage of its contacts with other jurisdictions. * * *. But International Shoe, which the majority agrees is the springboard for our modern personal jurisdiction jurisprudence, * * * applied no comparative contacts test. * * * [T]he relative percentage of contacts is irrelevant. The focus should be on the quality and quantity of the defendant’s contacts in the forum State.

The majority does even Daimler itself a disservice, paying only lipservice to the question the Court purported to reserve there—the possibility of an “exceptional case” in which general jurisdiction would be proper in a forum State that is neither a corporate defendant’s place of incorporation nor its principal place of business. * * * Its opinion here could be understood to limit that exception to the exact facts of Perkins * * * [p. 165, supra]. That reading is so narrow as to read the exception out of existence entirely * * *.

Id. at 1560–61, 198 L.Ed.2d at 49–50.

3.A state may exercise general jurisdiction over a domiciliary, for that is the place where a natural person “at home.” In ABKCO INDUSTRIES, INC. v. LENNON, 85 Misc.2d 465, 469, 377 N.Y.S.2d 362, 366 (N.Y.Co. 1975), affirmed in part, 52 A.D.2d 435, 384 N.Y.S.2d 871 (1st Dept. 1976), a New York trial court held that general jurisdiction could be exercised over Richard Starkey, better known as Ringo Starr of the Beatles, because Starkey did business in New York “pervasively, unmistakably, undeniably, continuously, and substantially.” Does this result survive Goodyear and Daimler?

4.Is the “at home” test a bright-line rule or can it ever be unreasonable to exercise general jurisdiction in defendant’s state of incorporation or principal place of business? In Daimler, p. 167, Note 1, supra, Justice Ginsburg’s majority opinion wrote that Asahi’s “multipronged reasonableness check” applied only “when specific jurisdiction is at issue.” 571 U.S. at 139 n.20, 134 S.Ct. at 762 n.20, 187 L.Ed.2d at 641 n.20. For general jurisdiction, however, “[w]hen a corporation is genuinely at home in the forum State, * * * any second-step inquiry would be superfluous.” Id. Before Daimler, some lower courts had subjected the exercise of general jurisdiction to the five-factor reasonableness test endorsed in Asahi and World-Wide Volkswagen. See Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Robertson-Ceco Corp., 84 F.3d 560 (2d Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1006, 117 S.Ct. 508, 136 L.Ed.2d 398 (1996).

5. A rationale for general jurisdiction is that it assures the availability of a forum “where a defendant may be sued on any cause of action.” Twitchell, The Myth of General Jurisdiction, 101 Harv.L.Rev. 610, 632 (1988). Does general jurisdiction fulfill this purpose if defendant is not “at home” anywhere in the United States?

F. DISTINGUISHING SPECIFIC AND GENERAL JURISDICTION

Although the distinction between specific and general jurisdiction was alluded to even in the International Shoe decision itself, see p. 100, Note 2, supra, the Supreme Court initially decided few cases in which the outcome hinged on the line between the two. In Helicopteros, p. 162, supra, the parties conceded that the case had to be evaluated under a general jurisdiction standard. Justice Brennan dissented, however, arguing against accepting that concession and emphasizing that specific jurisdiction should be available when defendant’s forum contacts “relate to” the cause of action:

173

Limiting the specific jurisdiction of a forum to cases in which the cause of action formally arose out of the defendant’s contacts with the State would subject constitutional standards under the Due Process Clause to the vagaries of the substantive law or pleading requirements of each State. * * *

Our interpretation of the Due Process Clause has never been so dependent upon the applicable substantive law or the State’s formal pleading requirements. * * * [T]he principal focus when determining whether a forum may constitutionally assert jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant has been on fairness and reasonableness to the defendant. To this extent, a court’s specific jurisdiction should be applicable whenever the cause of action arises out of or relates to the contacts between the defendant and the forum.

Id. at 427, 104 S.Ct. at 1879, 80 L.Ed.2d at 419.

In the wake of decisions like Goodyear, Daimler, and BNSF, see Section E, supra, which set a high threshold for when a defendant would be “essentially at home” in the forum state such that general jurisdiction would be available, the Supreme Court has addressed more directly the distinction between specific and general jurisdiction. In Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. v. Superior Court of California, San Francisco County, 582 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 1773, 198 L.Ed.2d 395 (2017), consumers from California and 33 other states filed eight actions in California state court against a pharmaceutical company alleging that Plavix, a drug that defendant manufactured and distributed, had damaged their health. Of the 678 plaintiffs, 88 resided in California; defendant was incorporated in Delaware and headquartered in New York. The California Supreme Court held it was constitutional to exercise specific jurisdiction over the company. Although the nonresident plaintiffs had not purchased the drugs in the state or alleged an injury in the forum, due process could be met under a sliding-scale approach, which permitted a more attenuated connection between defendant’s forum contacts and the claim when defendant otherwise had extensive contacts with the state. That connection was shown in this case because the nonresidents’ claims were similar to the residents’ claims and defendant had engaged in other in-state activity.

The Supreme Court, in an eight-to-one decision, reversed, rejecting the California court’s sliding-scale approach and emphasizing that for the exercise of specific jurisdiction, “there must be an ‘affiliation between the forum and the underlying controversy, principally, [an] activity or an occurrence that takes place in the forum state,’ ” quoting Goodyear, p. 162, supra. As the Court explained:

The present case illustrates the danger of the California approach. The State Supreme Court found that specific jurisdiction was present without identifying any adequate link between the State and the nonresidents’ claims. * * * [T]he nonresidents were not prescribed Plavix in California, did not purchase Plavix in California, did not ingest Plavix in California, and were not injured by Plavix in California. The mere fact that other plaintiffs were prescribed, obtained, and ingested Plavix in California—and allegedly sustained the same injuries as did the nonresidents—does not allow the State to assert specific jurisdiction over the nonresidents’ claims. * * * Nor is it sufficient—or even relevant—that [defendant] conducted research in California on matters unrelated to Plavix. What is needed—and what is missing here—is a connection between the forum and the specific claims at issue.

174

582 U.S. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1781, 198 L.Ed.2d at 404–05. The majority insisted that the nonresident plaintiffs were not left without a forum; suit could be brought where defendant is incorporated and headquartered, and residents of a particular state “could probably sue together in their home States.” The Court left open whether a different jurisdictional standard would apply in federal court. Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1783–84, 198 L.Ed.2d at 407.

Justice Sotomayor dissented, arguing that the requirements of specific jurisdiction were easily met. Defendant had purposefully availed itself of the benefits of California’s pharmaceutical market through substantial employment, maintenance of production facilities, contracts with in-state distributors, and more than a $1 billion of sales of Plavix in the state during the relevant period. Moreover, the nonresidents’ claims related to defendant’s in-state conduct, because they had a “ ‘connect[ion] with’ that conduct,” citing International Shoe, p. 95, supra. Finally, in the dissent’s view, the exercise of jurisdiction was reasonable:

[According to the majority, a] corporation that engages in a nationwide course of conduct cannot be held accountable in a state court by a group of injured people unless all of those people were injured in the forum State.

I fear the consequences of the Court’s decision today will be substantial. The majority’s rule will make it difficult to aggregate the claims of plaintiffs across the country whose claims may be worth little alone. It will make it impossible to bring a nationwide mass action in state court against defendants who are “at home” in different States. And it will result in piecemeal litigation and the bifurcation of claims. None of this is necessary. A core concern in this Court’s personal jurisdiction cases is fairness. And there is nothing unfair about subjecting a massive corporation to suit in a State for a nationwide course of conduct that injures both forum residents and nonresidents alike.

Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1784, 198 L.Ed.2d at 407–08.

FORD MOTOR CO. v. MONTANA EIGHTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT COURT; FORD MOTOR CO. v. BANDEMER

Supreme Court of the United States, 2021.
592 U.S. ___, 141 S.Ct. 1017, 209 L.Ed.2d 225.^f

JUSTICE KAGAN delivered the opinion of the Court, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICE BREYER, JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR, and JUSTICE KAVANAUGH joined.

In each of these two cases, a state court held that it had jurisdiction over Ford Motor Company in a products-liability suit stemming from a car accident. The accident happened in the State where suit was brought. The victim was one of the State’s residents. And Ford did substantial business in the State—among other things, advertising, selling, and servicing the model of vehicle the suit claims is defective. Still, Ford contends that jurisdiction is improper because the particular car involved in the crash was not first sold in the forum State, nor was it designed or manufactured there. We reject that argument. When a company like Ford serves a market for a product in a State and that product causes injury in the State to one of its residents, the State’s courts may entertain the resulting suit.

I

Ford is a global auto company. It is incorporated in Delaware and headquartered in Michigan. But its business is everywhere. Ford markets, sells, and services its products across the United States and overseas. In this country alone, the company annually distributes over 2.5 million new cars, trucks, and SUVs to over 3,200 licensed dealerships. * * * Ford also encourages a resale market for its products: Almost all its dealerships buy and sell used Fords, as well as selling new ones. To enhance its brand and increase its sales, Ford engages in wide-ranging promotional activities, including television, print, online, and direct-mail advertisements. No matter where you live, you’ve seen them: “Have you driven a Ford lately?” or “Built Ford Tough.” Ford also ensures that consumers can keep their vehicles running long past the date of sale. The company provides original parts to auto supply stores and repair shops across the country. (Goes another slogan: “Keep your Ford a Ford.”) And Ford’s own network of dealers offers an array of maintenance and repair services, thus fostering an ongoing relationship between Ford and its customers.

Accidents involving two of Ford’s vehicles—a 1996 Explorer and a 1994 Crown Victoria—are at the heart of the suits before us. One case comes from Montana. Markkaya Gullett was driving her Explorer near her home in the State when the tread separated from a rear tire. The vehicle spun out, rolled into a ditch, and came to rest upside down. Gullett died at the scene of the crash. The representative of her estate sued Ford in Montana state court, bringing claims for a design defect, failure to warn, and negligence. The second case comes from Minnesota. Adam Bandemer was a passenger in his friend’s Crown Victoria, traveling on a rural road in the State to a favorite ice-fishing spot. When his friend rear-ended a snowplow, this car too landed in a ditch. Bandemer’s air bag failed to deploy, and he suffered serious brain damage. He sued Ford in Minnesota state court, asserting products-liability, negligence, and breach-of-warranty claims.

Ford moved to dismiss the two suits for lack of personal jurisdiction, on basically identical grounds. According to Ford, the state court (whether in Montana or Minnesota) had jurisdiction only if the company’s conduct in the State had given rise to the plaintiff’s claims. And that causal link existed, Ford continued, only if the company had designed, manufactured, or—most likely—sold in the State the particular vehicle involved in the accident. * * * In neither suit could the plaintiff make that showing. Ford had designed the Explorer and Crown Victoria in Michigan, and it had manufactured the cars in (respectively) Kentucky and Canada. Still more, the company had originally sold the cars at issue outside the forum States—the Explorer in Washington, the Crown Victoria in North Dakota. Only later resales and relocations by consumers had brought the vehicles to Montana and Minnesota. That meant, in Ford’s view, that the courts of those States could not decide the suits.

Both the Montana and the Minnesota Supreme Courts (affirming lower court decisions) rejected Ford’s argument. The Montana court began by detailing the varied ways Ford “purposefully” seeks to “serve the market in Montana.” 395 Mont. 478, 488, 443 P.3d 407, 414 (2019). The company advertises in the State; “has thirty-six dealerships” there; “sells automobiles, specifically Ford Explorers[,] and parts” to Montana residents; and provides them with “certified repair, replacement, and recall services.” * * * Next, the court assessed the relationship between those activities and the Gullett suit. Ford’s conduct, said the court, encourages “Montana residents to drive Ford vehicles.” * * * When that driving causes in-state injury, the ensuing claims have enough of a tie to Ford’s Montana activities to support jurisdiction. Whether Ford “designed, manufactured, or sold [the] vehicle” in the State, the court concluded, is “immaterial.” * * * Minnesota’s Supreme Court agreed. It highlighted how Ford’s “marketing and advertisements” influenced state residents to “purchase and drive more Ford vehicles.” 931 N.W.2d 744, 754 (2019). Indeed, Ford had sold in Minnesota “more than 2,000 1994 Crown Victoria[s]”—the “very type of car” involved in Bandemer’s suit. * * * That the “particular vehicle” injuring him was “designed, manufactured, [and first] sold” elsewhere made no difference. * * * (emphasis in original). In the court’s view, Ford’s Minnesota activities still had the needed connection to Bandemer’s allegations that a defective Crown Victoria caused in-state injury. * * *

We granted certiorari to consider if Ford is subject to jurisdiction in these cases. * * * We hold that it is.

II

A

The Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause limits a state court’s power to exercise jurisdiction over a defendant. The canonical decision in this area remains International Shoe Co. v. Washington, [p. 95, supra]. There, the Court held that a tribunal’s authority depends on the defendant’s having such “contacts” with the forum State that “the maintenance of the suit” is “reasonable, in the context of our federal system of government,” and “does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.” * * * (internal quotation marks omitted). In giving content to that formulation, the Court has long focused on the nature and extent of “the defendant’s relationship to the forum State.” Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. v. Superior Court of Cal., San Francisco Cty., [p. 173, supra]. That focus led to our recognizing two kinds of personal jurisdiction: general (sometimes called all-purpose) jurisdiction and specific (sometimes called case-linked) jurisdiction. See Goodyear Dunlop Tires Operations, S. A. v. Brown, [p. 162, supra].

A state court may exercise general jurisdiction only when a defendant is “essentially at home” in the State. * * * General jurisdiction, as its name implies, extends to “any and all claims” brought against a defendant. * * * Those claims need not relate to the forum State or the defendant’s activity there; they may concern events and conduct anywhere in the world. But that breadth imposes a correlative limit: Only a select “set of affiliations with a forum” will expose a defendant to such sweeping jurisdiction. Daimler AG v. Bauman, [p. 167, supra]. In what we have called the “paradigm” case, an individual is subject to general jurisdiction in her place of domicile. * * * And the “equivalent” forums for a corporation are its place of incorporation and principal place of business. * * *; see id. * * * (leaving open “the possibility that in an exceptional case” a corporation might also be “at home” elsewhere). So general jurisdiction over Ford (as all parties agree) attaches in Delaware and Michigan—not in Montana and Minnesota. * * *

Specific jurisdiction is different: It covers defendants less intimately connected with a State, but only as to a narrower class of claims. The contacts needed for this kind of jurisdiction often go by the name “purposeful availment.” Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, [p. 127, supra].

The defendant, we have said, must take “some act by which [it] purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State.” Hanson v. Denckla, [p. 103, supra]. The contacts must be the defendant’s own choice and not “random, isolated, or fortuitous.” Keeton v. Hustler Magazine, Inc., [p. 124, supra]. They must show that the defendant deliberately “reached out beyond” its home—by, for example, “exploit[ing] a market” in the forum State or entering a contractual relationship centered there. Walden v. Fiore, [p. 159, supra] (internal quotation marks and alterations omitted). Yet even then—because the defendant is not “at home”—the forum State may exercise jurisdiction in only certain cases. The plaintiff’s claims, we have often stated, “must arise out of or relate to the defendant’s contacts” with the forum. Bristol-Myers * * * (quoting Daimler * * *; alterations omitted); see, e.g., Burger King * * *; Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia, S. A. v. Hall, [p. 162, supra]; International Shoe * * *. Or put just a bit differently, “there must be ‘an affiliation between the forum and the underlying controversy, principally, [an] activity or an occurrence that takes place in the forum State and is therefore subject to the State’s regulation.’ ” Bristol-Myers * * * (quoting Goodyear * * *).

These rules derive from and reflect two sets of values—treating defendants fairly and protecting “interstate federalism.” World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, [p. 114, supra] * * *. Our decision in International Shoe founded specific jurisdiction on an idea of reciprocity between a defendant and a State: When (but only when) a company “exercises the privilege of conducting activities within a state”—thus “enjoy[ing] the benefits and protection of [its] laws”—the State may hold the company to account for related misconduct. * * *; see Burger King * * *. Later decisions have added that our doctrine similarly provides defendants with “fair warning”—knowledge that “a particular activity may subject [it] to the jurisdiction of a foreign sovereign.” Id. * * * (internal quotation marks omitted); World-Wide Volkswagen * * * (likewise referring to “clear notice”). A defendant can thus “structure [its] primary conduct” to lessen or avoid exposure to a given State’s courts. Id. * * * And this Court has considered alongside defendants’ interests those of the States in relation to each other. One State’s “sovereign power to try” a suit, we have recognized, may prevent “sister States” from exercising their like authority. Id. * * * The law of specific jurisdiction thus seeks to ensure that States with “little legitimate interest” in a suit do not encroach on States more affected by the controversy. Bristol-Myers * * *.²

B

Ford contends that our jurisdictional rules prevent Montana’s and Minnesota’s courts from deciding these two suits. In making that argument, Ford does not contest that it does substantial business in Montana and Minnesota—that it actively seeks to serve the market for automobiles and related products in those States. * * * Or to put that concession in more doctrinal terms, Ford agrees that it has “purposefully avail[ed] itself of the privilege of conducting activities” in both places. * * * Ford’s claim is instead that those activities do not sufficiently connect to the suits, even though the resident-plaintiffs allege that Ford cars malfunctioned in the forum States. In Ford’s view, the needed link must be causal in nature: Jurisdiction attaches “only if the defendant’s forum conduct gave rise to the plaintiff’s claims.” * * * And that rule reduces, Ford thinks, to locating specific jurisdiction in the State where Ford sold the car in question, or else the States where Ford designed and manufactured the vehicle. * * *. On that view, the place of accident and injury is immaterial. So (Ford says) Montana’s and Minnesota’s courts have no power over these cases.

But Ford’s causation-only approach finds no support in this Court’s requirement of a “connection” between a plaintiff’s suit and a defendant’s activities. Bristol-Myers * * *. That rule indeed serves to narrow the class of claims over which a state court may exercise specific jurisdiction. But not quite so far as Ford wants. None of our precedents has suggested that only a strict causal relationship between the defendant’s in-state activity and the litigation will do. As just noted, our most common formulation of the rule demands that the suit “arise out of or relate to the defendant’s contacts with the forum.” Id. * * * (quoting Daimler * * *; emphasis added; alterations omitted) * * *. The first half of that standard asks about causation; but the back half, after the “or,” contemplates that some relationships will support jurisdiction without a causal showing. That does not mean anything goes. In the sphere of specific jurisdiction, the phrase “relate to” incorporates real limits, as it must to adequately protect defendants foreign to a forum. But again, we have never framed the specific jurisdiction inquiry as always requiring proof of causation—i.e., proof that the plaintiff’s claim came about because of the defendant’s in-state conduct. * * * So the case is not over even if, as Ford argues, a causal test would put jurisdiction in only the States of first sale, manufacture, and design. A different State’s courts may yet have jurisdiction, because of another

180

“activity [or] occurrence” involving the defendant that takes place in the State. Bristol-Myers, * * * (quoting Goodyear * * *).³

And indeed, this Court has stated that specific jurisdiction attaches in cases identical to the ones here—when a company like Ford serves a market for a product in the forum State and the product malfunctions there. In World-Wide Volkswagen, the Court held that an Oklahoma court could not assert jurisdiction over a New York car dealer just because a car it sold later caught fire in Oklahoma. * * * But in so doing, we contrasted the dealer’s position to that of two other defendants—Audi, the car’s manufacturer, and Volkswagen, the car’s nationwide importer (neither of which contested jurisdiction):

“[I]f the sale of a product of a manufacturer or distributor such as Audi or Volkswagen is not simply an isolated occurrence, but arises from the efforts of the manufacturer or distributor to serve, directly or indirectly, the market for its product in [several or all] other States, it is not unreasonable to subject it to suit in one of those States if its allegedly defective merchandise has there been the source of injury to its owner or to others.” * * *

Or said another way, if Audi and Volkswagen’s business deliberately extended into Oklahoma (among other States), then Oklahoma’s courts could hold the companies accountable for a car’s catching fire there—even though the vehicle had been designed and made overseas and sold in New York. For, the Court explained, a company thus “purposefully avail[ing] itself ” of the Oklahoma auto market “has clear notice” of its exposure in that State to suits arising from local accidents involving its cars. * * * And the company could do something about that exposure: It could “act to alleviate the risk of burdensome litigation by procuring insurance, passing the expected costs on to customers, or, if the risks are [still] too great, severing its connection with the State.” * * *

Our conclusion in World-Wide Volkswagen—though, as Ford notes, technically “dicta,” Brief for Petitioner 34—has appeared and reappeared in many cases since. So, for example, the Court in Keeton invoked that part of World-Wide Volkswagen to show that when a corporation has “continuously and deliberately exploited [a State’s] market, it must reasonably anticipate being haled into [that State’s] court[s]” to defend actions “based on” products causing injury there. * * *; see Burger King * * * (similarly citing World-Wide Volkswagen). On two other occasions, we reaffirmed that rule by reciting the above block-quoted language verbatim. See Goodyear * * *; Asahi Metal Industry Co. v. Superior Court of Cal., Solano Cty., [p. 134, supra] (opinion of O’Connor, J.). And in Daimler, we used the Audi/Volkswagen scenario as a paradigm case of specific jurisdiction (though now naming Daimler, the maker of Mercedes Benzes). Said the Court, to “illustrat[e]” specific jurisdiction’s “province[]”: A California court would exercise specific jurisdiction “if a California plaintiff, injured in a California accident involving a Daimler-manufactured vehicle, sued Daimler [in that court] alleging that the vehicle was defectively designed.” * * * As in World-Wide Volkswagen, the Court did not limit jurisdiction to where the car was designed, manufactured, or first sold. Substitute Ford for Daimler, Montana and Minnesota for California, and the Court’s “illustrat[ive]” case becomes . . . the two cases before us.

181

To see why Ford is subject to jurisdiction in these cases (as Audi, Volkswagen, and Daimler were in their analogues), consider first the business that the company regularly conducts in Montana and Minnesota. * * * Small wonder that Ford has here conceded “purposeful availment” of the two States’ markets. * * * By every means imaginable—among them, billboards, TV and radio spots, print ads, and direct mail—Ford urges Montanans and Minnesotans to buy its vehicles, including (at all relevant times) Explorers and Crown Victorias. Ford cars—again including those two models—are available for sale, whether new or used, throughout the States, at 36 dealerships in Montana and 84 in Minnesota. And apart from sales, Ford works hard to foster ongoing connections to its cars’ owners. The company’s dealers in Montana and Minnesota (as elsewhere) regularly maintain and repair Ford cars, including those whose warranties have long since expired. And the company distributes replacement parts both to its own dealers and to independent auto shops in the two States. Those activities, too, make Ford money. And by making it easier to own a Ford, they encourage Montanans and Minnesotans to become lifelong Ford drivers.

Now turn to how all this Montana- and Minnesota-based conduct relates to the claims in these cases, brought by state residents in Montana’s and Minnesota’s courts. Each plaintiff’s suit, of course, arises from a car accident in one of those States. In each complaint, the resident-plaintiff alleges that a defective Ford vehicle—an Explorer in one, a Crown Victoria in the other—caused the crash and resulting harm. And as just described, Ford had advertised, sold, and serviced those two car models in both States for many years. (Contrast a case, which we do not address, in which Ford marketed the models in only a different State or region.) In other words, Ford had systematically served a market in Montana and Minnesota for the very vehicles that the plaintiffs allege malfunctioned and injured them in those States. So there is a strong “relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation”—the “essential foundation” of specific jurisdiction. Helicopteros, * * * (internal quotation marks omitted). That is why this Court has used this exact fact pattern (a resident-plaintiff sues a global car company, extensively serving the state market in a vehicle, for an in-state accident) as an illustration—even a paradigm example—of how specific jurisdiction works. See Daimler * * *,⁴

182

The only complication here, pressed by Ford, is that the company sold the specific cars involved in these crashes outside the forum States, with consumers later selling them to the States’ residents. Because that is so, Ford argues, the plaintiffs’ claims “would be precisely the same if Ford had never done anything in Montana and Minnesota.” * * * Of course, that argument merely restates Ford’s demand for an exclusively causal test of connection—which we have already shown is inconsistent with our caselaw. * * * And indeed, a similar assertion could have been made in World-Wide Volkswagen—yet the Court made clear that systematic contacts in Oklahoma rendered Audi accountable there for an in-state accident, even though it involved a car sold in New York. * * * So too here, and for the same reasons, * * * even supposing (as Ford does) that without the company’s Montana or Minnesota contacts the plaintiffs’ claims would be just the same.

But in any event, that assumption is far from clear. For the owners of these cars might never have bought them, and so these suits might never have arisen, except for Ford’s contacts with their home States. Those contacts might turn any resident of Montana or Minnesota into a Ford owner—even when he buys his car from out of state. He may make that purchase because he saw ads for the car in local media. And he may take into account a raft of Ford’s in-state activities designed to make driving a Ford convenient there: that Ford dealers stand ready to service the car; that other auto shops have ample supplies of Ford parts; and that Ford fosters an active resale market for its old models. The plaintiffs here did not in fact establish, or even allege, such causal links. * * * But cf. * * * (ALITO, J., concurring in judgment) (nonetheless finding some kind of causation). Nor should jurisdiction in cases like these ride on the exact reasons for an individual plaintiff’s purchase, or on his ability to present persuasive evidence about them.⁵ But the possibilities listed above—created by the reach of Ford’s Montana and Minnesota contacts—underscore the aptness of finding jurisdiction here, even though the cars at issue were first sold out of state.

183

For related reasons, allowing jurisdiction in these cases treats Ford fairly, as this Court’s precedents explain. In conducting so much business in Montana and Minnesota, Ford “enjoys the benefits and protection of [their] laws”—the enforcement of contracts, the defense of property, the resulting formation of effective markets. * * * All that assistance to Ford’s in-state business creates reciprocal obligations—most relevant here, that the car models Ford so extensively markets in Montana and Minnesota be safe for their citizens to use there. Thus our repeated conclusion: A state court’s enforcement of that commitment, enmeshed as it is with Ford’s government-protected in-state business, can “hardly be said to be undue.” * * * And as World-Wide Volkswagen described, it cannot be thought surprising either. An automaker regularly marketing a vehicle in a State, the Court said, has “clear notice” that it will be subject to jurisdiction in the State’s courts when the product malfunctions there (regardless where it was first sold). * * * Precisely because that exercise of jurisdiction is so reasonable, it is also predictable—and thus allows Ford to “structure [its] primary conduct” to lessen or even avoid the costs of state-court litigation. * * *

Finally, principles of “interstate federalism” support jurisdiction over these suits in Montana and Minnesota. * * * Those States have significant interests at stake—“providing [their] residents with a convenient forum for redressing injuries inflicted by out-of-state actors,” as well as enforcing their own safety regulations. * * * Consider, next to those, the interests of the States of first sale (Washington and North Dakota)—which Ford’s proposed rule would make the most likely forums. For each of those States, the suit involves all out-of-state parties, an out-of-state accident, and out-of-state injuries; the suit’s only connection with the State is that a former owner once (many years earlier) bought the car there. In other words, there is a less significant “relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation.” * * * So by channeling these suits to Washington and North Dakota, Ford’s regime would undermine, rather than promote, what the company calls the Due Process Clause’s “jurisdiction-allocating function.” Brief for Petitioner 24.

C

Ford mainly relies for its rule on two of our recent decisions—Bristol-Myers and Walden. But those precedents stand for nothing like the principle Ford derives from them. If anything, they reinforce all we have said about why Montana’s and Minnesota’s courts can decide these cases.

184

Ford says of Bristol-Myers that it “squarely foreclose[s]” jurisdiction. * * * In that case, non-resident plaintiffs brought claims in California state court against Bristol-Myers Squibb, the manufacturer of a nationally marketed prescription drug called Plavix. The plaintiffs had not bought Plavix in California; neither had they used or suffered any harm from the drug there. Still, the California Supreme Court thought it could exercise jurisdiction because Bristol-Myers Squibb sold Plavix in California and was defending there against identical claims brought by the State’s residents. This Court disagreed, holding that the exercise of jurisdiction violated the Fourteenth Amendment. In Ford’s view, the same must be true here. Each of these plaintiffs, like the plaintiffs in Bristol-Myers, alleged injury from a particular item (a car, a pill) that the defendant had sold outside the forum State. Ford reads Bristol-Myers to preclude jurisdiction when that is true, even if the defendant regularly sold “the same kind of product” in the State. * * *

But that reading misses the point of our decision. We found jurisdiction improper in Bristol-Myers because the forum State, and the defendant’s activities there, lacked any connection to the plaintiffs’ claims. * * * The plaintiffs, the Court explained, were not residents of California. They had not been prescribed Plavix in California. They had not ingested Plavix in California. And they had not sustained their injuries in California. * * * In short, the plaintiffs were engaged in forum-shopping—suing in California because it was thought plaintiff-friendly, even though their cases had no tie to the State. * * * That is not at all true of the cases before us. Yes, Ford sold the specific products in other States, as Bristol-Myers Squibb had. But here, the plaintiffs are residents of the forum States. They used the allegedly defective products in the forum States. And they suffered injuries when those products malfunctioned in the forum States. In sum, each of the plaintiffs brought suit in the most natural State—based on an “affiliation between the forum and the underlying controversy, principally, [an] activity or an occurrence that t[ook] place” there. * * * So Bristol-Myers does not bar jurisdiction.

Ford falls back on Walden as its last resort. In that case, a Georgia police officer working at an Atlanta airport searched, and seized money from, two Nevada residents before they embarked on a flight to Las Vegas. The victims of the search sued the officer in Nevada, arguing that their alleged injury (their inability to use the seized money) occurred in the State in which they lived. This Court held the exercise of jurisdiction in Nevada improper even though “the plaintiff[s] experienced [the] effect[s]” of the officer’s conduct there. * * * According to Ford, our ruling shows that a plaintiff’s residence and place of injury can never support jurisdiction. * * *

And without those facts, Ford concludes, the basis for jurisdiction crumbles here as well.

But Walden has precious little to do with the cases before us. In Walden, only the plaintiffs had any contacts with the State of Nevada; the defendant-officer had never taken any act to “form[] a contact” of his own. * * * The officer had “never traveled to, conducted activities within, contacted anyone in, or sent anything or anyone to Nevada.” * * * So to use the language of our doctrinal test: He had not “purposefully avail[ed himself] of the privilege of conducting activities” in the forum State. * * * Because that was true, the Court had no occasion to address the necessary connection between a defendant’s in-state activity and the plaintiff’s claims. But here, Ford has a veritable truckload of contacts with Montana and Minnesota, as it admits. * * * The only issue is whether those contacts are related enough to the plaintiffs’ suits. As to that issue, so what if (as Walden held) the place of a plaintiff’s injury and residence cannot create a defendant’s contact with the forum State? Those places still may be relevant in assessing the link between the defendant’s forum contacts and the plaintiff’s suit—including its assertions of who was injured where. And indeed, that relevance is a key part of Bristol-Myers’ reasoning. * * * (finding a lack of “connection” in part because the “plaintiffs are not California residents and do not claim to have suffered harm in that State”). One of Ford’s own favorite cases thus refutes its appeal to the other.

* * *

Here, resident-plaintiffs allege that they suffered in-state injury because of defective products that Ford extensively promoted, sold, and serviced in Montana and Minnesota. For all the reasons we have given, the connection between the plaintiffs’ claims and Ford’s activities in those States—or otherwise said, the “relationship among the defendant, the forum[s], and the litigation”—is close enough to support specific jurisdiction. * * * The judgments of the Montana and Minnesota Supreme Courts are therefore affirmed.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE BARRETT took no part in the consideration or decision of these cases.

JUSTICE ALITO, concurring in the judgment.

These cases can and should be decided without any alteration or refinement of our case law on specific personal jurisdiction. To be sure, for the reasons outlined in Justice GORSUCH’s thoughtful opinion, there are grounds for questioning the standard that the Court adopted in International Shoe Co. v. Washington * * *. And there are also reasons to wonder whether the case law we have developed since that time is well suited for the way in which business is now conducted. But there is nothing distinctively 21st century about the question in the cases now before us, and the answer to that question is settled by our case law.

Since International Shoe, the rule has been that a state court can exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant if the defendant has “minimum contacts” with the forum—which means that the contacts must be “such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend ‘traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.’ ” * * *

That standard is easily met here. Ford has long had a heavy presence in Minnesota and Montana. It spends billions on national advertising. It has many franchises in both States. Ford dealers in Minnesota and Montana sell and service Ford vehicles, and Ford ships replacement parts to both States. In entertaining these suits, Minnesota and Montana courts have not reached out and grabbed suits in which they “have little legitimate interest.” * * * Their residents, while riding in vehicles purchased within their borders, were killed or injured in accidents on their roads. Can anyone seriously argue that requiring Ford to litigate these cases in Minnesota and Montana would be fundamentally unfair?

Well, Ford makes that argument. It would send the plaintiffs packing to the jurisdictions where the vehicles in question were assembled (Kentucky and Canada), designed (Michigan), or first sold (Washington and North Dakota) or where Ford is incorporated (Delaware) or has its principal place of business (Michigan).

As might have been predicted, the Court unanimously rejects this understanding of “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.” And in doing so, we merely follow what we said in World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, * * * which was essentially this: If a car manufacturer makes substantial efforts to sell vehicles in States A and B (and other States), and a defect in a vehicle first sold in State A causes injuries in an accident in State B, the manufacturer can be sued in State B. That rule decides these cases.

Ford, however, asks us to adopt an unprecedented rule under which a defendant’s contacts with the forum State must be proven to have been a but-for cause of the tort plaintiff’s injury. The Court properly rejects that argument, and I agree with the main thrust of the Court’s opinion. My only quibble is with the new gloss that the Court puts on our case law. Several of our opinions have said that a plaintiff’s claims “ ‘must arise out of or relate to the defendant’s contacts’ ” with the forum. * * * The Court parses this phrase “as though we were dealing with language of a statute,” Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 341, 99 S.Ct. 2326, 60 L.Ed.2d 931 (1979), and because this phrase is cast in the disjunctive, the Court recognizes a new category of cases in which personal jurisdiction is permitted: those in which the claims do not “arise out of ” (i.e., are not caused by) the defendant’s contacts but nevertheless sufficiently “relate to” those contacts in some undefined way * * *.

187

This innovation is unnecessary and, in my view, unwise. To say that the Constitution does not require the kind of proof of causation that Ford would demand—what the majority describes as a “strict causal relationship,” * * *—is not to say that no causal link of any kind is needed. And here, there is a sufficient link. It is reasonable to infer that the vehicles in question here would never have been on the roads in Minnesota and Montana if they were some totally unknown brand that had never been advertised in those States, was not sold in those States, would not be familiar to mechanics in those States, and could not have been easily repaired with parts available in those States. * * * The whole point of those activities was to put more Fords (including those in question here) on Minnesota and Montana roads. The common-sense relationship between Ford’s activities and these suits, in other words, is causal in a broad sense of the concept, and personal jurisdiction can rest on this type of link without strict proof of the type Ford would require. When “arise out of ” is understood in this way, it is apparent that “arise out of ” and “relate to” overlap and are not really two discrete grounds for jurisdiction. The phrase “arise out of or relate to” is simply a way of restating the basic “minimum contacts” standard adopted in International Shoe.

Recognizing “relate to” as an independent basis for specific jurisdiction risks needless complications. The “ordinary meaning” of the phrase “relate to” “is a broad one.” * * * Applying that phrase “according to its terms [is] a project doomed to failure, since, as many a curbstone philosopher has observed, everything is related to everything else.” * * * To rein in this phrase, limits must be found, and the Court assures us that “relate to,” as it now uses the concept, “incorporates real limits.” * * * But without any indication what those limits might be, I doubt that the lower courts will find that observation terribly helpful. Instead, what limits the potentially boundless reach of “relate to” is just the sort of rough causal connection I have described.

I would leave the law exactly where it stood before we took these cases, and for that reason, I concur in the judgment.

JUSTICE GORSUCH, with whom JUSTICE THOMAS joins, concurring in the judgment.

Since International Shoe Co. v. Washington * * *, this Court’s cases have sought to divide the world of personal jurisdiction in two. A tribunal with “general jurisdiction” may entertain any claim against the defendant. But to trigger this power, a court usually must ensure the defendant is “ ‘at home’ ” in the forum State. * * * Meanwhile, “specific jurisdiction” affords a narrower authority. It applies only when the defendant “ ‘purposefully avails’ ” itself of the opportunity to do business in the forum State and the suit “ ‘arise[s] out of or relate[s] to’ ” the defendant’s contacts with the forum State. * * *

188

While our cases have long admonished lower courts to keep these concepts distinct, some of the old guardrails have begun to look a little battered. Take general jurisdiction. If it made sense to speak of a corporation having one or two “homes” in 1945, it seems almost quaint in 2021 when corporations with global reach often have massive operations spread across multiple States. To cope with these changing economic realities, this Court has begun cautiously expanding the old rule in “ ‘exceptional case[s].’ ” * * *

Today’s case tests the old boundaries from another direction. Until now, many lower courts have proceeded on the premise that specific jurisdiction requires two things. First, the defendant must “purposefully avail” itself of the chance to do business in a State. Second, the plaintiff’s suit must “arise out of or relate to” the defendant’s in-state activities. Typically, courts have read this second phrase as a unit requiring at least a but-for causal link between the defendant’s local activities and the plaintiff’s injuries. * * * As every first year law student learns, a but-for causation test isn’t the most demanding. At a high level of abstraction, one might say any event in the world would not have happened “but for” events far and long removed.

Now, though, the Court pivots away from this understanding. Focusing on the phrase “arise out of or relate to” that so often appears in our cases, the majority asks us to parse those words “as though we were dealing with language of a statute.” * * * In particular, the majority zeros in on the disjunctive conjunction “or,” and proceeds to build its entire opinion around that linguistic feature. * * * The majority admits that “arise out of ” may connote causation. But, it argues, “relate to” is an independent clause that does not.

Where this leaves us is far from clear. For a case to “relate to” the defendant’s forum contacts, the majority says, it is enough if an “affiliation” or “relationship” or “connection” exists between them. * * * But what does this assortment of nouns mean? Loosed from any causation standard, we are left to guess. The majority promises that its new test “does not mean anything goes,” but that hardly tells us what does. * * * In some cases, the new test may prove more forgiving than the old causation rule. But it’s hard not to wonder whether it may also sometimes turn out to be more demanding. Unclear too is whether, in cases like that, the majority would treat causation and “affiliation” as alternative routes to specific jurisdiction, or whether it would deny jurisdiction outright.

For a glimpse at the complications invited by today’s decision, consider its treatment of North Dakota and Washington. Those are the States where Ford first sold the allegedly defective cars at issue in the cases before us.

189

The majority seems to suggest that, if the plaintiffs had sought to bring their suits in those States, they would have failed. The majority stresses that the “only connection” between the plaintiffs’ claims and North Dakota and Washington is the fact that former owners once bought the allegedly defective cars there. * * * But the majority never tells us why that “connection” isn’t enough. Surely, North Dakota and Washington would contend they have a strong interest in ensuring they don’t become marketplaces for unreasonably dangerous products. Nor is it clear why the majority casts doubt on the availability of specific jurisdiction in these States without bothering to consider whether the old causation test might allow it. After all, no one doubts Ford purposefully availed itself of those markets. The plaintiffs’ injuries, at least arguably, “arose from” (or were caused by) the sale of defective cars in those places. Even if the majority’s new affiliation test isn’t satisfied, don’t we still need to ask those causation questions, or are they now to be abandoned?

Consider, too, a hypothetical the majority offers in a footnote. The majority imagines a retiree in Maine who starts a one-man business, carving and selling wooden duck decoys. In time, the man sells a defective decoy over the Internet to a purchaser in another State who is injured. * * * We aren’t told how. (Was the decoy coated in lead paint?) But put that aside. The majority says this hypothetical supplies a useful study in contrast with our cases. On the majority’s telling, Ford’s “continuous” contacts with Montana and Minnesota are enough to establish an “affiliation” with those States; by comparison, the decoy seller’s contacts may be too “isolated” and “sporadic” to entitle an injured buyer to sue in his home State. But if this comparison highlights anything, it is only the litigation sure to follow. For between the poles of “continuous” and “isolated” contacts lie a virtually infinite number of “affiliations” waiting to be explored. And when it comes to that vast terrain, the majority supplies no meaningful guidance about what kind or how much of an “affiliation” will suffice. Nor, once more, does the majority tell us whether its new affiliation test supplants or merely supplements the old causation inquiry.

Not only does the majority’s new test risk adding new layers of confusion to our personal jurisdiction jurisprudence. The whole project seems unnecessary. Immediately after disavowing any need for a causal link between the defendant’s forum activities and the plaintiffs’ injuries, the majority proceeds to admit that such a link may be present here. * * * The majority stresses that the Montana and Minnesota plaintiffs before us “might” have purchased their cars because of Ford’s activities in their home States. They “may” have relied on Ford’s local advertising. And they “may” have depended on Ford’s promise to furnish in-state servicers and dealers. If the majority is right about these things, that would be more than enough to establish a but-for causal link between Ford’s in-state activities and the plaintiffs’ decisions to purchase their allegedly defective vehicles. Nor should that result come as a surprise: One might expect such causal links to be easy to prove in suits against corporate behemoths like Ford. All the new euphemisms—“affiliation,” “relationship,” “connection”—thus seem pretty pointless.¹

190

*

With the old International Shoe dichotomy looking increasingly uncertain, it’s hard not to ask how we got here and where we might be headed.

Before International Shoe, it seems due process was usually understood to guarantee that only a court of competent jurisdiction could deprive a defendant of his life, liberty, or property. In turn, a court’s competency normally depended on the defendant’s presence in, or consent to, the sovereign’s jurisdiction. But once a plaintiff was able to “tag” the defendant with process in the jurisdiction, that State’s courts were generally thought competent to render judgment on any claim against the defendant, whether it involved events inside or outside the State. Pennoyer v. Neff, [p. 79, supra]; Burnham v. Superior Court of Cal., County of Marin, [p. 223, infra].²

International Shoe’s emergence may be attributable to many influences, but at least part of the story seems to involve the rise of corporations and interstate trade. * * * A corporation doing business in its State of incorporation is one thing; the old physical presence rules for individuals seem easily adaptable to them. But what happens when a corporation, created and able to operate thanks to the laws of one State, seeks the privilege of sending agents or products into another State?

Early on, many state courts held conduct like that renders an out-of-state corporation present in the second jurisdiction. And a present company could be sued for any claim, so long as the plaintiff served an employee doing corporate business within the second State. * * * Other States sought to obviate any potential question about corporate jurisdiction by requiring an out-of-state corporation to incorporate under their laws too, or at least designate an agent for service of process. Either way, the idea was to secure the out-of-state company's presence or consent to suit. * * *

191

Unsurprisingly, corporations soon looked for ways around rules like these. No one, after all, has ever liked greeting the process server. For centuries, individuals facing imminent suit sought to avoid it by fleeing the court's territorial jurisdiction. But this tactic proved "too crude for the American business genius," and it held some obvious disadvantages. See Jackson, What Price "Due Process," 5 N. Y. L. Rev. 435, 436 (1927). Corporations wanted to retain the privilege of sending their personnel and products to other jurisdictions where they lacked a charter to do business. At the same time, when confronted with lawsuits in the second forum, they sought to hide behind their foreign charters and deny their presence. Really, their strategy was to do business without being seen to do business. Id., at 438 ("No longer is the foreign corporation confronted with the problem 'to be or not to be'—it can both be and not be!").

Initially and routinely, state courts rejected ploys like these. * * * But, in a series of decisions at the turn of the last century, this Court eventually provided a more receptive audience. On the one hand, the Court held that an out-of-state corporation often has a right to do business in another State unencumbered by that State's registration rules, thanks to the so-called dormant Commerce Clause. * * * On the other hand, the Court began invoking the Due Process Clause to restrict the circumstances in which an out-of-state corporation could be deemed present. So, for example, the Court ruled that even an Oklahoma corporation purchasing a large portion of its merchandise in New York was not "doing business" there. Rosenberg Bros. & Co. v. Curtis Brown Co., 260 U.S. 516, 517–518, 43 S.Ct. 170, 67 L.Ed. 372 (1923). Perhaps advocates of this arrangement thought it promoted national economic growth. * * * But critics questioned its fidelity to the Constitution and traditional jurisdictional principles, noting that it often left injured parties with no practical forum for their claims too. * * *

In many ways, International Shoe sought to start over. The Court "cast . . . aside" the old concepts of territorial jurisdiction that its own earlier decisions had seemingly twisted in favor of out-of-state corporations. * * * At the same time, the Court also cast doubt on the idea, once pursued by many state courts, that a company "consents" to suit when it is forced to incorporate or designate an agent for receipt of process in a jurisdiction other than its home State. * * * In place of nearly everything that had come before, the Court sought to build a new test focused on " 'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.' " * * *

It was a heady promise. But it is unclear how far it has really taken us. Even today, this Court usually considers corporations "at home" and thus subject to general jurisdiction in only one or two States. All in a world where global conglomerates boast of their many "headquarters." The Court has issued these restrictive rulings, too, even though individual defendants remain subject to the old "tag" rule, allowing them to be sued on any claim anywhere they can be found. Burnham * * *.⁴ Nearly 80 years removed from International Shoe, it seems corporations continue to receive special jurisdictional protections in the name of the Constitution. Less clear is why.

192

Maybe, too, International Shoe just doesn't work quite as well as it once did. For a period, its specific jurisdiction test might have seemed a reasonable new substitute for assessing corporate "presence," a way to identify those out-of-state corporations that were simply pretending to be absent from jurisdictions where they were really transacting business. When a company "purposefully availed" itself of the benefits of another State's market in the 1940s, it often involved sending in agents, advertising in local media, or developing a network of on-the-ground dealers, much as Ford did in these cases. * * * But, today, even an individual retiree carving wooden decoys in Maine can "purposefully avail" himself of the chance to do business across the continent after drawing online orders to his e-Bay "store" thanks to Internet advertising with global reach. * * * A test once aimed at keeping corporations honest about their out-of-state operations now seemingly risks hauling individuals to jurisdictions where they have never set foot.

Perhaps this is the real reason why the majority introduces us to the hypothetical decoy salesman. Yes, he arguably availed himself of a new market. Yes, the plaintiff's injuries arguably arose from (or were caused by) the product he sold there. Yes, International Shoe's old causation test would seemingly allow for personal jurisdiction. But maybe the majority resists that conclusion because the old test no longer seems as reliable a proxy for determining corporate presence as it once did. Maybe that's the intuition lying behind the majority's introduction of its new "affiliation" rule and its comparison of the Maine retiree's "sporadic" and "isolated" sales in the plaintiff's State and Ford's deep "relationships" and "connections" with Montana and Minnesota. * * *

If that is the logic at play here, I cannot help but wonder if we are destined to return where we began. Perhaps all of this Court's efforts since International Shoe, including those of today's majority, might be understood as seeking to recreate in new terms a jurisprudence about corporate jurisdiction that was developing before this Court's muscular interventions in the early 20th century. Perhaps it was, is, and in the end always will be about trying to assess fairly a corporate defendant's presence or consent. International Shoe may have sought to move past those questions. But maybe all we have done since is struggle for new words to express the old ideas. Perhaps, too, none of this should come as a surprise. New technologies and new schemes to evade the process server will always be with us. But if our concern is with “ ‘traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice,’ ” * * * not just our personal and idiosyncratic impressions of those things, perhaps we will always wind up asking variations of the same questions.⁵

193

None of this is to cast doubt on the outcome of these cases. The parties have not pointed to anything in the Constitution’s original meaning or its history that might allow Ford to evade answering the plaintiffs’ claims in Montana or Minnesota courts. No one seriously questions that the company, seeking to do business, entered those jurisdictions through the front door. And I cannot see why, when faced with the process server, it should be allowed to escape out the back. * * * The real struggle here isn’t with settling on the right outcome in these cases, but with making sense of our personal jurisdiction jurisprudence and International Shoe’s increasingly doubtful dichotomy. On those scores, I readily admit that I finish these cases with even more questions than I had at the start. Hopefully, future litigants and lower courts will help us face these tangles and sort out a responsible way to address the challenges posed by our changing economy in light of the Constitution’s text and the lessons of history.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1. According to Justice Kagan’s majority opinion, what is the test for deciding whether specific jurisdiction satisfies due process? In what ways do the concurring opinions disagree with the majority about the test?
- 2. Both Bristol-Myers and Ford involved large companies doing substantial business in the forum state. Why was specific jurisdiction proper in Ford but not proper in Bristol-Myers?
- 3. Justice Kagan’s majority opinion discusses “two sets of values—treating defendants fairly and protecting ‘interstate federalism.’ ” How do these values factor into the requirements for specific jurisdiction? Do they play

194

- a different role under Ford’s test for specific jurisdiction than they did in earlier decisions such as World-Wide Volkswagen, p. 114, supra, Burger King, p. 127, supra, and Asahi, p. 134, supra?
- 4. According to Justice Gorsuch, the majority “seems to suggest” that personal jurisdiction would not have been proper in the states where the vehicles at issue in Ford were initially sold (North Dakota and Washington). In what way does the majority suggest that? Do you agree with his statement?
- 5. Consider the hypothetical “retiree in Maine who starts a one-man business, carving and selling wooden duck decoys” (discussed in Justice Gorsuch’s concurring opinion and footnote 4 of the majority opinion). If that individual sells a decoy to a Montana customer and it causes injury there, how would a court analyze whether the decoy-maker would be subject to personal jurisdiction in Montana? What additional information would be relevant?
- 6. In footnote 3 of the majority opinion, Justice Kagan alludes to Justice Gorsuch’s “apparent (if oblique) view that a state court should have jurisdiction over a nationwide corporation like Ford on any claim, no matter how unrelated to the State or Ford’s activities there.” In what way does Justice Gorsuch’s opinion reflect that view? Would Justice Gorsuch conclude that the California court could exercise jurisdiction in Daimler, p. 167, supra, or in Bristol-Myers? If not, why not?

G. CONSENT AS ANOTHER BASIS OF JURISDICTION

1. CONSENT BY APPEARANCE IN COURT

INSURANCE CORP. OF IRELAND, LTD. v. COMPAGNIE DES BAUXITES DE GUINEE, 456 U.S. 694, 102 S.Ct. 2099, 72 L.Ed.2d 492 (1982). Plaintiff, Compagnie des Bauxites de Guinee (CBG), a bauxite producer incorporated in Delaware but doing business only in the Republic of Guinea, purchased business-interruption insurance from a domestic insurer in Pennsylvania and from a group of foreign insurance companies through a London brokerage house. When a mechanical failure forced a halt in production, CBG filed a multi-million dollar claim, which the insurers refused to pay. CBG then sued in federal court in Pennsylvania, but most of the foreign insurance companies contested personal jurisdiction. CBG attempted to use discovery to establish the essential jurisdictional facts. After the companies failed to comply with the court’s orders for production of the requested information despite repeated warnings, the district court, pursuant to Federal Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(i), imposed a sanction consisting of a presumptive finding that the insurers were subject to its jurisdiction because of their business contacts in Pennsylvania. The Supreme Court upheld the sanction in an opinion written by Justice White:

195

- Because the requirement of personal jurisdiction represents first of all an individual right, it can, like other such rights, be waived. * * *
- * * * By submitting to the jurisdiction of the court for the limited purpose of challenging jurisdiction, the defendant agrees to abide by that court’s determination on the issue of jurisdiction[,] * * * [and] the manner in which the court determines whether it has personal jurisdiction may include a variety of legal rules and presumptions, as well as straightforward factfinding. * * *

* * * CBG was seeking through discovery to respond to [the insurers’] contention that the District Court did not have personal jurisdiction. Having put the issue in question, [the insurers] did not have the option of blocking the reasonable attempt of CBG to meet its burden of proof. [They] surely did not have this option once the court had overruled [their] objections. Because of [the insurers’] failure to comply with the discovery orders, CBG was unable to establish the full extent of the contacts between [the insurers] and Pennsylvania, the critical issue in proving personal jurisdiction. [Their] failure to supply the requested information as to [their] contacts with Pennsylvania supports “the presumption that the refusal to produce evidence . . . was but an admission of the want of merit in the asserted defense.” * * * The sanction took as established the facts—contacts with Pennsylvania—that CBG was seeking to establish through discovery. * * *

Id. at 703, 706–09, 102 S.Ct. at 2105–08, 72 L.Ed.2d at 502, 504–05. In a footnote, Justice White added:

It is true that we have stated that the requirement of personal jurisdiction, as applied to state courts, reflects an element of federalism and the character of state sovereignty vis-à-vis other States. * * * The restriction on state sovereign power * * * must be seen as ultimately a function of the individual liberty interest preserved by the Due Process Clause. That clause is the only source of the personal jurisdiction requirement and the Clause itself makes no mention of federalism concerns. Furthermore, if the federalism concept operated as an independent restriction on the sovereign power of the court, it would not be possible to waive the personal jurisdiction requirement: Individual actions cannot change the powers of sovereignty, although the individual can subject himself to powers from which he may otherwise be protected.

Id. at 702 n.10, 102 S.Ct. at 2104 n.10, 72 L.Ed.2d 502 n.10.

NOTE AND QUESTION

A defendant may waive objections to a court’s exercise of personal jurisdiction, may forfeit an opportunity to raise objections to jurisdiction, or may be estopped from raising the issue. For example, Federal Rule 12(h)(1) provides that a defendant who fails to raise an objection to personal jurisdiction in the answer or in an initial motion under Rule 12 is precluded from raising the issue. See p. 663, Background Note on Federal Rule 12, infra. In these settings, is defendant’s consent the basis for the court’s power?

2.CONSENT BY REGISTRATION IN STATE

Most states have statutes that require a foreign corporation to register as a condition of doing business in the state. By analogy to the motorist statute at issue in Kane, p. 90, supra, can it be argued that registration manifests consent to the general jurisdiction of the forum state? In PENNSYLVANIA FIRE INSURANCE CO. OF PHILADELPHIA v. GOLD ISSUE MINING & MILLING CO., 243 U.S. 93, 94–96, 37 S.Ct. 344, 345, 61 L.Ed. 610, 616 (1917), the Supreme Court held that due process permitted personal jurisdiction over an out-of-state insurance company based on its consent that service of process on an in-state official would be deemed personal service on the company. In FLEXNER v. FARSON, 248 U.S. 289, 293, 39 S.Ct. 97, 98, 63 L.Ed. 250, 253 (1919), however, it rejected such consent with respect to individual defendants, noting that the forum state “had no power to exclude the defendants” and therefore cannot attach consent-to-service as a condition of doing business in the state.

In RATLIFF v. COOPER LABORATORIES, INC., 444 F.2d 745 (4th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 948, 92 S.Ct. 271, 30 L.Ed.2d 265 (1971), the court of appeals held that an out-of-state drug manufacturer that regularly sent salesmen into South Carolina was not amenable to suit in that state even though it had filed an application and been given authority to do business in the state, and had appointed an in-state agent for service of process. Plaintiffs were residents of Florida and Indiana that had purchased and consumed in their home states drugs manufactured by defendant; they had sued in South Carolina to take advantage of that state’s relatively long statute of limitations. The Fourth Circuit explained: “Applying for the privilege of doing business is one thing, but the actual exercise of that privilege is quite another. * * * The principles of due process require a firmer foundation than mere compliance with state domestication statutes.” 444 F.2d at 748.

Would Daimler or Goodyear support the exercise of general jurisdiction based on registration to do business in the forum state? See Benish, Pennoyer’s Ghost: Consent, Registration Statutes, and General Jurisdiction after Daimler AG v. Bauman, 90 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1609 (2015). The Supreme Court has not addressed this issue, but lower courts have questioned whether that practice remains constitutionally permissible after the Court’s recent decisions on general jurisdiction. See, e.g., Fidrych v. Marriott International, Inc., 952 F.3d 124, 135–37 (4th Cir. 2020) (recognizing earlier Supreme Court decisions supporting the view that “a foreign corporation obtaining a business license or appointing an agent for service of process in a state has consented to general jurisdiction in the state if state law so provides” but finding it “difficult to reconcile [that] approach with the modern view of general jurisdiction expressed in the Supreme Court’s recent cases”). Some courts have avoided the constitutional question by construing the relevant statutes as not making registration the equivalent of consent to general jurisdiction. See, e.g., Aybar v. Aybar, 177 N.E.2d 1257, 37 N.Y.3d 274 (2021); Magna Powertrain de Mexico S.A. de C.V. v. Momentive Performance Materials USA LLC, 192 F.Supp.3d 824 (E.D.Mich. 2016). Other courts, however, have recognized consent-by-registration as an independent ground for general jurisdiction that survives the Supreme Court’s recent case law. See, e.g., Cooper Tire & Rubber Co. v. McCall, 863 S.E.2d 81 (Ga. 2021) (reaffirming its prior case law holding “that Georgia courts may exercise general personal jurisdiction over any out-of-state corporation that is ‘authorized to do or transact business in this state at the time a claim arises,’ ” despite its “tension with a recent line of United States Supreme Court cases addressing when state courts may exercise general personal jurisdiction over out-of-state corporations”); Bors v. Johnson & Johnson, 208 F.Supp.3d 648 (E.D.Pa. 2016) (“The ruling in Daimler does not eliminate consent to general personal jurisdiction over a corporation registered to do business in Pennsylvania.”).

On April 25, 2022, the Supreme Court agreed to hear a case that presents the question whether due process allows a state to require a corporation to consent to personal jurisdiction in order to do business in that state. Mallory v. Norfolk Southern Railway Co., ___ U.S. ___, ___ S.Ct. ___, ___ L.Ed.2d ___, 2022 WL 1205835 (2022) (granting certiorari). The case will be argued during the Term that begins in October 2022.

3.CONSENT BY CONTRACT

A party may consent to the jurisdiction of a forum by assenting to a contractual choice-of-forum term. Contractual consent can apply to a dispute that already exists or to one that may arise later between the parties. Moreover, a party may agree to a forum term that waives objections to jurisdiction in a forum, or purports to oust any but the designated forum of jurisdiction to hear the dispute. Traditionally, agreements to oust courts of jurisdiction were void as against public policy and were not judicially enforceable.

198

M/S BREMEN v. ZAPATA OFF-SHORE CO., 407 U.S. 1, 92 S.Ct. 1907, 32 L.Ed.2d 513 (1972). Plaintiff Zapata, a Houston-based American corporation, contracted with Unterweser, a German corporation, to tow Zapata’s drilling rig from Louisiana to Italy. The contract contained a provision that all disputes were to be litigated before the “London Court of Justice.” In the course of the towing, the rig was damaged in a storm off Florida and was towed to Tampa. Zapata commenced suit against Unterweser in a federal court in Florida. Unterweser, citing the forum-selection clause in the contract, moved to dismiss or, alternatively, to stay the action pending the submission of the dispute to the High Court of Justice in London. On a parallel track, Unterweser sued Zapata for breach of contract in the English court.

The district court refused to dismiss or stay the American action, and the court of appeals affirmed. The Supreme Court reversed: We hold * * * that far too little weight and effect were given to the forum clause in resolving this controversy. * * * The expansion of American business and industry will hardly be encouraged if, notwithstanding solemn contracts, we insist on a parochial concept that all disputes must be resolved under our laws and in our courts. * * * We cannot have trade and commerce in world markets and international waters exclusively on our terms, governed by our laws, and resolved in our courts. Id. at 8–9, 92 S.Ct. at 1912–13, 32 L.Ed.2d at 519–20.

199

CARNIVAL CRUISE LINES, INC. v. SHUTE, 499 U.S. 585, 111 S.Ct. 1522, 113 L.Ed.2d 622 (1991). Plaintiffs, Eulala and Russel Shute, purchased passage for a seven-day cruise on defendant’s ship, the Tropicale, through a Washington State travel agent. Plaintiffs paid the fare to the agent, who forwarded the payment to defendant’s headquarters in Florida. Defendant then prepared the tickets and sent them to plaintiffs in Washington. The ticket included a provision stating that:

8.It is agreed by and between the passenger and the Carrier that all disputes and matters whatsoever arising under, in connection with or incident to this Contract shall be litigated, if at all, in and before a Court located in the State of Florida, U.S.A., to the exclusion of the Courts of any other state or country.

Plaintiffs boarded the Tropicale in Los Angeles, California and sailed for Puerto Vallarta, Mexico; off the coast of Mexico, Eulala Shute slipped on a deck mat and was injured. Plaintiffs filed suit in federal court in Washington, claiming that the negligence of defendant and its employees had caused the injuries. The district court held that defendant’s contacts with Washington were constitutionally insufficient to exercise personal jurisdiction; the Ninth Circuit declined to enforce the forum-selection clause, but concluded that defendant did have sufficient contacts with Washington and reversed the lower court.

The Supreme Court did not consider defendant’s “minimum contacts” argument; instead, it addressed the enforceability of the forum-selection clause. Rejecting the argument that The Bremen was limited to contracts between two business corporations, the Court stated:

* * * Including a reasonable forum clause in a form contract of this kind well may be permissible for several reasons: First, a cruise line has a special interest in limiting the fora in which it potentially could be subject to suit. Because a cruise ship typically carries passengers from many locales, it is not unlikely that a mishap on a cruise could subject the cruise line to litigation in several different fora. * * * Additionally, a clause establishing ex ante the forum for dispute resolution has the salutary effect of dispelling any confusion about where suits arising from the contract must be brought and defended, sparing litigants the time and expense of pretrial motions to determine the correct forum and conserving judicial resources that otherwise would be devoted to deciding those motions. * * * Finally, it stands to reason that passengers who purchase tickets containing a forum clause like that at issue in this case benefit in the form of reduced fares reflecting the savings that the cruise line enjoys by limiting the fora in which it may be sued. * * *

Id. at 593–94, 111 S.Ct. at 1527, 113 L.Ed.2d at 632.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

The Bremen held that forum-selection clauses “are prima facie valid and should be enforced” by federal courts sitting in admiralty “unless enforcement is shown by the resisting party to be ‘unreasonable’ under the circumstances.” 407 U.S. at 10, 92 S.Ct. at 1913, 32 L.Ed.2d at 520. Applying this test, Carnival Cruise emphasized that “forum-selection clauses contained in form passage contracts are subject to judicial scrutiny for fundamental fairness.” 499 U.S. at 595, 111 S.Ct. at 1528, 113 L.Ed.2d at 633. What factors are relevant in determining whether a forum-selection clause is “unreasonable” or meets “fundamental fairness”? Are you convinced that Carnival Cruise engaged in the appropriate level of scrutiny? How does the reasonableness standard of contract doctrine differ from an inquiry under the Due Process Clause? See Davis & Hershkoff, Contracting for Procedure, 53 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 507 (2011).

200

H. INTERNET AND OTHER TECHNOLOGICAL CONTACTS

A territorial approach to jurisdiction does not neatly fit activity conducted through the Internet. What does it mean to target a forum when a website is available to all online users? Do the operators of those websites have contacts wherever the Internet is available, i.e., everywhere? The Supreme Court has not yet resolved these questions. As Justice Thomas observed in Walden v. Fiore, p. 159, Note 8, supra, the Court has left “questions about virtual contacts for another day.” Some of the Justices alluded to these concerns in the Ford case as well. See p. 185, supra (Alito, J., concurring) (noting that there are “reasons to wonder whether the case law we have developed since [International Shoe] is well suited for the way in which business is now conducted”).

Without explicit guidance from the Supreme Court, lower courts have tried to adapt existing jurisdictional doctrine to Internet activity. Early cases tended to involve information posted on websites that lacked the capacity for interactive exchange with the user. INSET SYSTEMS, INC. v. INSTRUCTION SET, INC., 937 F.Supp. 161 (D.Conn. 1996), a trademark infringement action, held that advertising over the Internet counted as “solicitation of business” under the state long-arm statute, and that it was constitutional to exercise jurisdiction based on defendant’s use of the Internet and its provision of a toll-free number to conduct business in the state. The court emphasized that defendant had “purposefully directed its advertising activity” to the forum state, and so “could reasonably anticipate the possibility” of being haled into court. Id. at 165. However, in BENSUSAN RESTAURANT CORP. v. KING, 937 F.Supp. 295 (S.D.N.Y. 1996), the district court declined to find that maintaining a website accessible in the forum state and providing a phone number satisfied the forum’s long-arm statute, which authorized jurisdiction over a nondomiciliary who reasonably expects a tortious act to have consequences in the state and derives substantial revenue from in-state activity.

ZIPPO MANUFACTURING CO. v. ZIPPO DOT COM, INC., 952 F.Supp. 1119, 1124 (W.D.Pa. 1997), another trademark infringement case, moved beyond mere placement of advertising on the Internet and explored whether the “conducting of electronic commerce”—use of a domain name and entering into contracts with 3,000 individuals and seven access providers to supply Internet news services—satisfied the state long-arm statute and showed defendant’s purposeful availment. Zippo became an influential decision because it offered a taxonomy of digital contacts that could guide other courts:

[T]he likelihood that personal jurisdiction can be constitutionally exercised is directly proportionate to the nature and quality of commercial activity that an entity conducts over the Internet.

201

This sliding scale is consistent with well developed personal jurisdiction principles. At one end of the spectrum are situations where a defendant clearly does business over the Internet. If the defendant enters into contracts with residents of a foreign jurisdiction that involve the knowing and repeated transmission of computer files over the Internet, personal jurisdiction is proper. * * * At the opposite end are situations where a defendant has simply posted information on an Internet Web site which is accessible to users in foreign jurisdictions. A passive Web site that does little more than make information available to those who are interested in it is not grounds for the exercise [of] personal jurisdiction. * * * The middle ground is occupied by interactive Web sites where a user can exchange information with the host computer. In these cases, the exercise of jurisdiction is determined by examining the level of interactivity and commercial nature of the exchange of information that occurs on the Web site. * * *

In the wake of Zippo, interactivity became a central, although not dispositive, factor in digital contact cases. See 4A Wright, Miller & Steinman, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1073 (4th ed.). However, as digital technology evolved, interactivity came to play a less prominent role in the jurisdictional analysis. In HY CITE CORP. v. BADBUSINESSBUREAU.COM, L.L.C., 297 F.Supp.2d 1154, 1160 (W.D.Wis. 2004), the district court treated interactivity as a relevant factor in its purposeful-availment analysis, but declined to follow Zippo, questioning whether a special test for jurisdiction was even needed for disputes involving digital activity. The case was a defamation action against the operator of an Internet website that posted negative comments from customers. The court dismissed almost out of hand the argument that general jurisdiction could be based on defendant’s maintenance of a website that permitted users to purchase ad space, when no in-state company had purchased space. Likewise, although in-state solicitation could weigh as a contact for purposeful availment, the court did not find defendant’s potential contacts with in-state users who had not yet used the site for commercial activity sufficient to support the exercise of specific jurisdiction. Nor could specific jurisdiction be based on the effects of defendant’s action: merely placing the name of a trademark on a website was not sufficient evidence of targeting a forum; defendant had not created the consumer complaints that it collected—consumers did—and there was no showing that the “brunt” of the injury was suffered in the forum.

In JOHNSON v. THEHUFFINGTONPOST.COM, INC., 21 F.4th 314 (5th Cir. 2021), the court rejected personal jurisdiction in a libel case against an online publisher, finding that interactivity and the ability to access the publisher’s website in the forum state (Texas) were not sufficient. The majority reasoned:

202

At bottom, the only reason to hale HuffPost into Texas is that Texans visited the site, clicking ads and buying things there. But * * * those visits reflect only HuffPost’s universal accessibility, not its purposeful availment of Texas. Accessibility alone cannot sustain our jurisdiction. If it could, lack of personal jurisdiction would be no defense at all.

Id. at 326; see also id. at 320 (“Grannies with cooking blogs do not, and should not, expect lawsuits from Maui to Maine.”). The majority analogized defendant’s website to “a physical store in New York, where HuffPost is ‘at home,’ ” with users coming to defendant to visit its store—rather than defendant reaching out to users in Texas and elsewhere. Id. at 322. It also found that jurisdiction could not be based on either defendant’s sales of merchandise to Texans or defendant’s posting of ads from Texas-based advertisers, because those contacts with Texas did not “relate to” plaintiff’s libel claim; they therefore could not support specific jurisdiction. Id. at 323 (“Exercising jurisdiction over HuffPost would collapse the distinction between specific and general jurisdiction.”). Nor did those activities show that defendant was targeting Texas. Id. at 321 (“What matters is whether HuffPost aimed the alleged libel at Texas. * * * To target every user everywhere * * * is to target no place at all.”).

The dissenting judge, however, argued that denying jurisdiction “ignores the Supreme Court’s recent decision in Ford Motor [p. 175, supra]” and “all but nullifies the Supreme Court’s decision in Keeton [p. 124, supra].” Id. at 327 (Haynes, J., dissenting). She wrote: “As in Keeton, HuffPost continuously and deliberately exploits the Texas market, so it should not be surprised if it is haled into court there for allegations of libel. * * * As in Keeton, it doesn’t matter that the article did not expressly address Texas. As in Keeton, jurisdiction exists.” Id. at 329–30 (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted). This theory of jurisdiction, according to the dissent, is “very similar to that of Ford Motor, albeit a different form of ‘exploitation of a market.’” Id. at 328.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Does the distinction among active, interactive, and passive websites still make sense given technological developments? Should the jurisdictional analysis for a product liability action against an online retailer be the same as for a libel action arising out of a social media post?

2. Technology allows a party to block individuals or entire regions from accessing a website. How should using—or deciding not to use—such technology affect the purposeful-availment argument? In TRIPLE UP LIMITED v. YOUKU TUDOU INC., 235 F.Supp.3d 15, 24–26 (D.D.C. 2017), affirmed 2018 WL 4440459 (D.C.Cir. 2018), plaintiff alleged that a foreign online streaming company purposefully availed itself of the benefits of the forum because it allowed access to videos although it had the ability to block videos from being viewed in certain countries and frequently did so. The court recognized that the possibility for “geoblocking” countered the common refrain that universal accessibility is an unavoidable side-effect of modern technology. However, it held that a failure to block cannot constitute purposeful availment. See Wandell, Geolocation and Jurisdiction: From Purposeful Availment to Avoidance and Targeting on the Internet, 16 J.Tech.L. & Pol’y 275, 297–304 (2011).

203

3. In BE2 LLC v. IVANOV, 642 F.3d 555 (7th Cir. 2011), an online dating service brought a trademark infringement action in Illinois against a New Jersey businessman, alleging that defendant deliberately misled customers by using a domain name “confusingly similar” to “be2.” Evidence that 20 Illinois residents had accessed defendant’s website was held insufficient to show that defendant had targeted the Illinois market or availed himself of the privilege of doing business in the state. To the contrary, the court explained, “the 20 Chicagoans who created free profiles on be2.net may have done so unilaterally by stumbling across the website and clicking a button that automatically published their dating preferences online.” Id. at 559. Where would you advise plaintiff to file the lawsuit and what evidence would be best to show defendant’s purposeful availment of the benefits of the forum?

4. In MAVRIX PHOTO, INC. v. BRAND TECHNOLOGIES, INC., 647 F.3d 1218, 1230 (9th Cir. 2011), a Florida “celebrity photo” company brought a copyright infringement action in California against an Ohio company for allegedly posting plaintiff’s photographs on a website that had a substantial viewer base in California. Defendant did not market its website in California’s local media, but rather sold website space to third-party advertisers whose ads were directed to California. On this basis, the court found the requisite purposeful availment, emphasizing that defendant had caused harm knowing it would be suffered in California. The court found it “immaterial” for purposeful availment whether defendant or the third-party advertisers targeted the California residents. Is this approach consistent with Justice Kennedy’s plurality opinion in McIntyre, p. 143, supra? Does it properly apply Keeton, p. 124, supra, in the context of a new technology? For a criticism of the Ninth Circuit approach, see Recent Cases, 125 Harv.L.Rev. 634 (2011).

In TWIN FLAMES UNIVERSE.COM, INC. v. COLE, 528 F.Supp.3d 708 (E.D.Mich. 2021), plaintiffs brought defamation and other claims against critics of their Michigan company (TFU), which had been described as a cult by some participants and their parents. Defendants had allegedly made negative, false social media posts about the company on YouTube, Facebook, and Reddit, as well as making false statements to a reporter. The court rejected jurisdiction over a defendant who resided in Arizona, applying the Supreme Court’s decision in Calder, p. 126, supra. It noted that this defendant had “provided comments while at her Arizona home to a Vancouver-based journalist” whose publication did not target customers in Michigan. And her social media posts “were not directed at Michigan or its residents”:

204

The majority of the posts were made in a public subreddit dedicated to followers and those interested in TFU, an organization with “business across the Internet.” * * * Michigan is not identified anywhere on the subreddit’s comment board. Defendant[’s] posts concerned TFU’s business practices and did not reference TFU’s place of business or incorporation. While Defendant * * * identifies the Plaintiffs by their first initials in one of the posts, she discusses only their business practices and does not mention Michigan or even allude to Plaintiffs’ headquarters or residence. * * * Michigan “was not the focal point” of Defendant[’s] posts and comments. * * * There is no evidence that Defendant * * * posted her comments on social media “hoping to reach [Michigan] specifically as opposed to” her social media followers generally.

Id. at 716–17.

5.In ADVANCED TACTICAL ORDNANCE SYSTEMS, LLC v. REAL ACTION PAINTBALL, INC., 751 F.3d 796 (7th Cir. 2014), the Seventh Circuit reversed the district court’s finding of specific jurisdiction based on the foreseeability that misleading emails would harm an in-state plaintiff. In its analysis, the appeals court did not cite Zippo, and instead asked whether the nonresident defendant “purposefully exploited” the forum market “beyond simply operating an interactive website accessible in the forum state and sending emails to people who may happen to live there.” Id. at 802 (internal quotation omitted). As to the significance of the emails, the Seventh Circuit wrote:

As a practical matter, email does not exist in any location at all; it bounces from one server to another, it starts wherever the account-holder is sitting when she clicks the “send” button, and it winds up wherever the recipient happens to be at that instant. The connection between the place where an email is opened and a lawsuit is entirely fortuitous. We note as well that it is exceedingly common in today’s world for a company to allow consumers to sign up for an email list. We are not prepared to hold that this alone demonstrates that a defendant made a substantial connection to each state (or country) associated with those persons’ “snail mail” addresses. * * * It may be different if there were evidence that a defendant in some way targeted residents of a specific state, perhaps through geographically-restricted online ads. But in such a case the focus would not be on the users who signed up, but instead on the deliberate actions by the defendant to target or direct itself toward the forum state.

Id. at 803 (citations omitted).

6.In MacDERMID, INC. v. DEITER, 702 F.3d 725 (2d Cir. 2012), the court considered whether jurisdiction could be exercised over a defendant who, while domiciled and working in Canada, was alleged to have accessed a computer server located in Connecticut to misappropriate confidential information belonging to defendant’s employer. The district court dismissed the complaint, finding that under the applicable long-arm statute jurisdiction could not be exercised because defendant had not used a computer in Connecticut. The Second Circuit reversed.

205

The undisputed facts showed that plaintiff stored its confidential and proprietary data on computer servers in Waterbury, Connecticut, and that its employees could access the information only by accessing these in-state servers. The court wrote:

The record reflects that employees of [plaintiff] and its subsidiaries are, as a condition of employment, made aware of the housing of the companies’ email system and their confidential and proprietary information in Waterbury. The record further reflects that [defendant] agreed in writing to safeguard and to properly use [defendant’s] confidential information and that she was not authorized to transfer such information to a personal email account.

Id. at 727. Further, it was uncontroverted that defendant used the Connecticut servers. Accepting that assertion, the appellate court found that the fact that defendant “physically interacted only with computers in Canada” did not defeat jurisdiction under the long-arm statute. The court relied on the following statutory provision:

[A] court may exercise personal jurisdiction over any nonresident individual * * * who in person or through an agent: (1) Transacts any business within the state; (2) commits a tortious act within the state * * *; (3) commits a tortious act outside the state causing injury to person or property within the state * * * if such person or agent (A) regularly does or solicits business, or engages in any other persistent course of conduct, or derives substantial revenue from goods used or consumed or services rendered, in the state, or (B) expects or should reasonably expect the act to have consequences in the state and derives substantial revenue from interstate or international commerce; * * * or (5) uses a computer * * * or a computer network * * * located within the state.

Id. at 728 (quoting Conn.Gen.Stat. § 52–59b(a)). The statute defined “computer” to include “any connected or directly related device, equipment or facility that enables the computer to store, retrieve or communicate computer programs, computer data or the results of computer operations to or from a person, another computer or another device * * *.” In addition, “computer network” was defined to include “a set of related, remotely connected devices and any communications facilities including more than one computer with the capability to transmit data among them through the communications facilities.” Conn.Gen.Stat. § 53–451(a).

Applying the statute, the Second Circuit held that it was not material that defendant was outside of Connecticut when she accessed her employer’s servers.

The statute reaches persons outside the state who remotely access computers within the state * * *. This conclusion is reinforced by the fact that § 52–59b(a)(5) was enacted as part of a statutory scheme intended to prohibit unauthorized persons from using computers or networks with intent to, among other things, cause a computer to malfunction, alter or erase data, or copy computer data or programs. * * * Extending the statute to reach a nonresident who committed any of the above activities while present in Connecticut would not have been necessary because that person would already have been subject to jurisdiction under § 52–59b(a)(2). Further, it cannot be said that [defendant’s] conduct is covered by § 52–59b(a)(3) because she is not alleged to have regularly conducted business in Connecticut, or to have derived revenue from her conduct. * * *.

Id. at 729.

Finding statutory jurisdiction to be present, the court held the exercise of power satisfied due process: [Defendant] purposefully availed herself of the privilege of conducting activities within Connecticut because she was aware “of the centralization and housing of the companies’ e-mail system and the storage of confidential, proprietary information and trade secrets” in Waterbury, Connecticut, and she used that email system and its Connecticut servers in retrieving and emailing confidential files. Most Internet users, perhaps, have no idea of the location of the servers through which they send their emails. Here, however, [plaintiff] has alleged that [defendant] knew that the email servers she used and the confidential files she misappropriated were both located in Connecticut. She used those servers to send an email which itself constituted the alleged tort. And in addition to purposefully availing herself of the privilege of conducting computer activities in Connecticut, she directed her allegedly tortious conduct towards [plaintiff], a Connecticut corporation.

Id. at 730. The court further found that the exercise of jurisdiction would be reasonable:

First, although [defendant] would have to travel to Connecticut to defend this suit, this burden alone does not render the exercise of personal jurisdiction unreasonable. * * * Second, both Connecticut and [plaintiff] have significant interests in resolving the matter in Connecticut. Not only is the company based in Connecticut, which is where the majority of corporate witnesses are located, but also Connecticut has an interest in the proper interpretation of its laws. * * * Further, efficiency and social policies against computer-based theft are generally best served by adjudication in the state from which computer files have been misappropriated. Accordingly, we conclude that jurisdiction is reasonable in this case.

Id. at 731.

Do you agree that the long-arm statute supported the exercise of jurisdiction? Would the result have been the same if defendant had not signed an agreement acknowledging the location of plaintiff’s servers? Should the location of a server be a sufficient basis for jurisdiction if defendant does not know its location and the claim does not involve an intentional tort?

7.Consider how activity conducted on the Internet or through social media might affect the analysis in some of the canonical cases of personal jurisdiction doctrine:

- (a)In International Shoe, p. 95, supra, defendant posted ads on the social media pages of state residents to buy its shoes, rather than using in-state sales agents who displayed shoes at in-state show rooms.
- (b)In McGee, p. 102, supra, defendant’s predecessor-in-interest did not mail the contract, but rather emailed it to the insured, who executed the contract using an electronic signature. Subsequently, premiums were paid online using a credit card.
- (c)In World-Wide Volkswagen, p. 114, supra, Audi cars were sold only through an Internet site, and were delivered to U.S.-based consumers through an independent distributor that was incorporated in Delaware and headquartered in New York. An Audi sold to a California resident was driven to Oklahoma, where it caused injury.
- (d)In Carnival Cruise, p. 198, supra, the forum-selection clause appeared on defendant’s website, but was not imprinted on the physical ticket. Would it matter if the consumer was required to click “accept the terms” before printing the ticket?
- (e)In Keeton, p. 124, supra, instead of distributing print magazines, defendant operated an online magazine company selling subscriptions for digital versions only.

I. JURISDICTION BASED ON POWER OVER PROPERTY

PENNINGTON v. FOURTH NATIONAL BANK, 243 U.S. 269, 271, 37 S.Ct. 282, 282–83, 61 L.Ed. 713, 714–15 (1917). Petitioner challenged the garnishment of his bank account to pay alimony. Although petitioner did not reside in the forum state, the Court held that attachment of his in-state bank account did not violate due process. In his opinion for the Court, Justice Brandeis explained:

The 14th Amendment did not, in guarantying due process of law, abridge the jurisdiction which a state possessed over property within its borders, regardless of the residence or presence of the owner. That jurisdiction extends alike to tangible and to intangible property. Indebtedness due from a resident to a nonresident—of which bank deposits are an example—is property within the state. * * * It is, indeed, the species of property which courts of the several states have most frequently applied in satisfaction of the obligations of absent debtors. * * * Substituted service on a nonresident by publication furnishes no legal basis for a judgment in personam. * * * But garnishment or foreign attachment is a proceeding quasi in rem. * * * The thing belonging to the absent defendant is seized and applied to the satisfaction of his obligation. The Federal Constitution presents no obstacle to the full exercise of this power.

208

NOTE AND QUESTION

What is the situs of corporate stock for purposes of attachment—the corporation’s place of incorporation, the domicile of the shareholder, or the state in which the stock certificates actually are located? See Note, Attachment of Corporate Stock: The Conflicting Approaches of Delaware and the Uniform Stock Transfer Act, 73 Harv.L.Rev. 1579 (1960).

HARRIS v. BALK, 198 U.S. 215, 25 S.Ct. 625, 49 L.Ed. 1023 (1905). Harris, a citizen of North Carolina, owed Balk, also of North Carolina, $180. Epstein, a Maryland citizen, claimed that Balk owed him $344. On August 6, 1896, while Harris was visiting Baltimore, Epstein instituted a garnishee proceeding in a Maryland court, attaching the debt due Balk from Harris. Harris was personally served with the writ of attachment and summons, and notice of the suit was posted at the courthouse door, as required by Maryland law. Harris consented to the entry of judgment against him and paid the $180 to Epstein. On August 11, 1896, Balk commenced an action against Harris in a North Carolina court to recover the $180. Harris asserted that he no longer owed Balk the $180, having paid that sum to Epstein in partial satisfaction of Balk’s debt to Epstein, since the Maryland judgment and his payment thereof was valid in Maryland, and was therefore entitled to Full Faith and Credit in the courts of North Carolina. The trial court ruled in favor of Balk, and the North Carolina Supreme Court affirmed on the ground that the Maryland court had no jurisdiction over Harris to attach the debt because Harris was only temporarily in the state, and the situs of the debt was in North Carolina. The Supreme Court reversed:

* * * We do not see how the question of jurisdiction vel non can properly be made to depend upon the so-called original situs of the debt, or upon the character of the stay of the garnishee, whether temporary or permanent, in the state where the attachment is issued. Power over the person of the garnishee confers jurisdiction on the courts of the state where the writ issues. * * * If, while temporarily there, his creditor might sue him there and recover the debt, then he is liable to process of garnishment, no matter where the situs of the debt was originally. We do not see the materiality of the expression “situs of the debt,” when used in connection with attachment proceedings. If by situs is meant the place of the creation of the debt, that fact is immaterial. If it be meant that the obligation to pay the debt can only be enforced at the situs thus fixed, we think it plainly untrue. The obligation of the debtor to pay his debt clings to and accompanies him wherever he goes. He is as much bound to pay his debt in a foreign state when therein sued upon his obligation by his creditor, as he was in the state where the debt was contracted. * * * It would be no defense to such suit for the debtor to plead that he was only in the foreign state casually or temporarily. * * * It is nothing but the obligation to pay which is garnished or attached. This obligation can be enforced by the courts of the foreign state after personal service of process therein, just as well as by the courts of the domicil of the debtor. * * *

209

Id. at 222–23, 25 S.Ct. at 626–27, 49 L.Ed. at 1026. The Court indicated in dictum that the result might have been different had Balk not been given notice of the attachment and an opportunity to defend in the Maryland action.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Professor Lowenfeld provides the following interesting information concerning Harris, Balk, and Epstein. Epstein was an importer of goods who regularly did business with Balk, a retailer. The $344 debt was for money owed on shipments of goods by Epstein to Balk. Harris was a dry goods merchant from the same town as Balk, and had borrowed money from Balk on several occasions, including a $10 loan just before the fateful trip to Baltimore. Harris carried with him on that trip a message from Balk to Epstein saying that Balk would be coming to Baltimore soon. Lowenfeld, In Search of the Intangible: A Comment on Shaffer v. Heitner, 53 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 102, 104–06 (1978).

2. If the events leading up to Harris v. Balk were to occur today, would due process allow Epstein to file an in personam action against Balk in Maryland? Could Epstein have served Harris as Balk’s agent? See Simowitz, Siting Intangibles, 48 N.Y.U.J.Int’l L. & Pol. 259 (2015).

210

SHAFFER v. HEITNER

Supreme Court of the United States, 1977.
433 U.S. 186, 97 S.Ct. 2569, 53 L.Ed.2d 683.

On Appeal from the Supreme Court of Delaware.
JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

I

Appellee Heitner, a nonresident of Delaware, is the owner of one share of stock in the Greyhound Corp., a business incorporated under the laws of Delaware with its principal place of business in Phoenix, Ariz. On May 22, 1974, he filed a shareholder’s derivative suit in the Court of Chancery for New Castle County, Del., in which he named as defendants Greyhound, its wholly owned subsidiary Greyhound Lines, Inc.,¹ and 28 present or former officers or directors of one or both of the corporations. In essence, Heitner alleged that the individual defendants had violated their duties to Greyhound by causing it and its subsidiary to engage in actions that resulted in the corporations being held liable for substantial damages in a private antitrust suit and a large fine in a criminal contempt action. The activities which led to these penalties took place in Oregon.

Simultaneously with his complaint, Heitner filed a motion for an order of sequestration of the Delaware property of the individual defendants pursuant to Del.Code Ann., Tit. 10, § 366 (1975). This motion was accompanied by a supporting affidavit of counsel which stated that the individual defendants were nonresidents of Delaware. The affidavit identified the property to be sequestered as [shares of Greyhound Corporation stock and stock options] * * *. The requested sequestration order was signed the day the motion was filed. Pursuant to that order, the sequestrator “seized” approximately 82,000 shares of Greyhound common stock belonging to 19 of the defendants, and options belonging to another 2 defendants. These seizures were accomplished by placing “stop transfer” orders or their equivalents on the books of the Greyhound Corp. So far as the record shows, none of the certificates representing the seized property was physically present in Delaware. The stock was considered to be in Delaware, and so subject to seizure, by virtue of Del.Code Ann., Tit. 8, § 169 (1975), which makes Delaware the situs of ownership of all stock in Delaware corporations.

All 28 defendants were notified of the initiation of the suit by certified mail directed to their last known addresses and by publication in a New Castle County newspaper. The 21 defendants whose property was seized (hereafter referred to as appellants) responded by entering a special appearance for the purpose of moving to quash service of process and to vacate the sequestration order. They contended that the ex parte sequestration procedure did not accord them due process of law and that the property seized was not capable of attachment in Delaware. In addition, appellants asserted that under the rule of International Shoe Co. v. Washington, * * * [p. 95, supra], they did not have sufficient contacts with Delaware to sustain the jurisdiction of that State’s courts.

The Court of Chancery rejected these arguments * * *.

On appeal, the Delaware Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the Court of Chancery. * * * Most of the Supreme Court’s opinion was devoted to rejecting appellants’ contention that the sequestration procedure is inconsistent with the due process analysis developed in the Sniadach line of cases [p. 279–283, Notes 1–4, infra]. The court based its rejection of that argument in part on its agreement with the Court of Chancery that the purpose of the sequestration procedure is to compel the appearance of the defendant, a purpose not involved in the Sniadach cases. The court also relied on what it considered the ancient origins of the sequestration procedure and approval of that procedure in the opinions of this Court, * * * Delaware’s interest in asserting jurisdiction to adjudicate claims of mismanagement of a Delaware corporation, and the safeguards for defendants that it found in the Delaware statute. * * *

* * *

Appellants’ claim that the Delaware courts did not have jurisdiction to adjudicate this action received much more cursory treatment. * * *¹² We reverse.

II

The Delaware courts rejected appellants’ jurisdictional challenge by noting that this suit was brought as a quasi in rem proceeding. Since quasi in rem jurisdiction is traditionally based on attachment or seizure of property present in the jurisdiction, not on contacts between the defendant and the State, the courts considered appellants’ claimed lack of contacts with Delaware to be unimportant. This categorical analysis assumes the continued soundness of the conceptual structure founded on the century-old case of Pennoyer v. Neff * * * [p. 79, supra].

[The Court’s description of Pennoyer is omitted.] * * *

From our perspective, the importance of Pennoyer is not its result, but the fact that its principles and corollaries derived from them became the basic elements of the constitutional doctrine governing state-court jurisdiction. * * * As we have noted, under Pennoyer state authority to adjudicate was based on the jurisdiction’s power over either persons or property. This fundamental concept is embodied in the very vocabulary which we use to describe judgments. If a court’s jurisdiction is based on its authority over the defendant’s person, the action and judgment are denominated “in personam” and can impose a personal obligation on the defendant in favor of the plaintiff. If jurisdiction is based on the court’s power over property within its territory, the action is called “in rem” or “quasi in rem.” The effect of a judgment in such a case is limited to the property that supports jurisdiction and does not impose a personal liability on the property owner, since he is not before the court. * * * In Pennoyer’s terms, the owner is affected only “indirectly” by an in rem judgment adverse to his interest in the property subject to the court’s disposition.

[The Court’s historical analysis of the expansion of in personam jurisdiction is omitted.] * * *

No equally dramatic change has occurred in the law governing jurisdiction in rem. There have, however, been intimations that the collapse of the in personam wing of Pennoyer has not left that decision unweakened as a foundation for in rem jurisdiction. Well-reasoned lower court opinions have questioned the proposition that the presence of property in a State gives that State jurisdiction to adjudicate rights to the property regardless of the relationship of the underlying dispute and the property owner to the forum. * * * The overwhelming majority of commentators have also rejected Pennoyer’s premise that a proceeding “against” property is not a proceeding against the owners of that property. Accordingly, they urge that the “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice” that govern a State’s power to adjudicate in personam should also govern its power to adjudicate personal rights to property located in the State. * * *

Although this Court has not addressed this argument directly, we have held that property cannot be subjected to a court’s judgment unless reasonable and appropriate efforts have been made to give the property owners actual notice of the action. * * * Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306 (1950). This conclusion recognizes, contrary to Pennoyer, that an adverse judgment in rem directly affects the property owner by divesting him of his rights in the property before the court. * * * Moreover, in Mullane we held that Fourteenth Amendment rights cannot depend on the classification of an action as in rem or in personam * * *.

It is clear, therefore, that the law of state-court jurisdiction no longer stands securely on the foundation established in Pennoyer. We think that the time is ripe to consider whether the standard of fairness and substantial justice set forth in International Shoe should be held to govern actions in rem as well as in personam.

III

The case for applying to jurisdiction in rem the same test of “fair play and substantial justice” as governs assertions of jurisdiction in personam is simple and straightforward. It is premised on recognition that “[t]he phrase, ‘judicial jurisdiction over a thing’, is a customary elliptical way of referring to jurisdiction over the interests of persons in a thing.” Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws § 56, Introductory Note * * *. This recognition leads to the conclusion that in order to justify an exercise of jurisdiction in rem, the basis for jurisdiction must be sufficient to justify exercising “jurisdiction over the interests of persons in a thing.” The standard for determining whether an exercise of jurisdiction over the interests of persons is consistent with the Due Process Clause is the minimum-contacts standard elucidated in International Shoe.

This argument, of course, does not ignore the fact that the presence of property in a State may bear on the existence of jurisdiction by providing contacts among the forum State, the defendant, and the litigation. For example, when claims to the property itself are the source of the underlying controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant, it would be unusual for the State where the property is located not to have jurisdiction. In such cases, the defendant’s claim to property located in the State would normally indicate that he expected to benefit from the State’s protection of his interest. The State’s strong interests in assuring the marketability of property within its borders and in providing a procedure for peaceful resolution of disputes about the possession of that property would also support jurisdiction, as would the likelihood that important records and witnesses will be found in the State. The presence of property may also favor jurisdiction in cases, such as suits for injury suffered on the land of an absentee owner, where the defendant’s ownership of the property is conceded but the cause of action is otherwise related to rights and duties growing out of that ownership.

It appears, therefore, that jurisdiction over many types of actions which now are or might be brought in rem would not be affected by a holding that any assertion of state-court jurisdiction must satisfy the International Shoe standard. For the type of quasi in rem action typified by Harris v. Balk and the present case, however, accepting the proposed analysis would result in significant change. These are cases where the property which now serves as the basis for state-court jurisdiction is completely unrelated to the plaintiff’s cause of action. Thus, although the presence of the defendant’s property in a State might suggest the existence of other ties among the defendant, the State, and the litigation, the presence of the property alone would not support the State’s jurisdiction. If those other ties did not exist, cases over which the State is now thought to have jurisdiction could not be brought in that forum.

Since acceptance of the International Shoe test would most affect this class of cases, we examine the arguments against adopting that standard as they relate to this category of litigation. Before doing so, however, we note that this type of case also presents the clearest illustration of the argument in favor of assessing assertions of jurisdiction by a single standard. For in cases such as Harris and this one, the only role played by the property is to provide the basis for bringing the defendant into court. Indeed, the express purpose of the Delaware sequestration procedure is to compel the defendant to enter a personal appearance. In such cases, if a direct assertion of personal jurisdiction over the defendant would violate the Constitution, it would seem that an indirect assertion of that jurisdiction should be equally impermissible.

The primary rationale for treating the presence of property as a sufficient basis for jurisdiction to adjudicate claims over which the State would not have jurisdiction if International Shoe applied is that a wrongdoer “should not be able to avoid payment of his obligations by the expedient of removing his assets to a place where he is not subject to an in personam suit.” Restatement [(Second) of Conflicts] § 66, Comment a.

 This justification, however, does not explain why jurisdiction should be recognized without regard to whether the property is present in the State because of an effort to avoid the owner’s obligations. Nor does it support jurisdiction to adjudicate the underlying claim. At most, it suggests that a State in which property is located should have jurisdiction to attach that property, by use of proper procedures, as security for a judgment being sought in a forum where the litigation can be maintained consistently with International Shoe.  Moreover, we know of nothing to justify the assumption that a debtor can avoid paying his obligations by removing his property to a State in which his creditor cannot obtain personal jurisdiction over him. The Full Faith and Credit Clause, after all, makes the valid in personam judgment of one State enforceable in all other States.

It might also be suggested that allowing in rem jurisdiction avoids the uncertainty inherent in the International Shoe standard and assures a plaintiff of a forum.³⁷  We believe, however, that the fairness standard of International Shoe can be easily applied in the vast majority of cases. Moreover, when the existence of jurisdiction in a particular forum under International Shoe is unclear, the cost of simplifying the litigation by avoiding the jurisdictional question may be the sacrifice of “fair play and substantial justice.” That cost is too high.

We are left, then, to consider the significance of the long history of jurisdiction based solely on the presence of property in a State. Although the theory that territorial power is both essential to and sufficient for jurisdiction has been undermined, we have never held that the presence of property in a State does not automatically confer jurisdiction over the owner’s interest in that property. This history must be considered as supporting the proposition that jurisdiction based solely on the presence of property satisfies the demands of due process , but it is not decisive.  The fiction that an assertion of jurisdiction over property is anything but an assertion of jurisdiction over the owner of the property supports an ancient form without substantial modern justification. Its continued acceptance would serve only to allow state-court jurisdiction that is fundamentally unfair to the defendant.

We therefore conclude that all assertions of state-court jurisdiction must be evaluated according to the standards set forth in International Shoe and its progeny.

IV

The Delaware courts based their assertion of jurisdiction in this case solely on the statutory presence of appellants’ property in Delaware. Yet that property is not the subject matter of this litigation, nor is the underlying cause of action related to the property. Appellants’ holdings in Greyhound do not, therefore, provide contacts with Delaware sufficient to support the jurisdiction of that State’s courts over appellants. If it exists, that jurisdiction must have some other foundation.⁴⁰

Appellee Heitner did not allege and does not now claim that appellants have ever set foot in Delaware. Nor does he identify any act related to his cause of action as having taken place in Delaware. Nevertheless, he contends that appellants’ positions as directors and officers of a corporation chartered in Delaware provide sufficient “contacts, ties, or relations”  with that State to give its courts jurisdiction over appellants in this stockholder’s derivative action. This argument is based primarily on what Heitner asserts to be the strong interest of Delaware in supervising the management of a Delaware corporation. That interest is said to derive from the role of Delaware law in establishing the corporation and defining the obligations owed to it by its officers and directors. In order to protect this interest, appellee concludes, Delaware’s courts must have jurisdiction over corporate fiduciaries such as appellants.

This argument is undercut by the failure of the Delaware Legislature to assert the state interest appellee finds so compelling. Delaware law bases jurisdiction, not on appellants’ status as corporate fiduciaries, but rather on the presence of their property in the State. Although the sequestration procedure used here may be most frequently used in derivative suits against officers and directors,  the authorizing statute evinces no specific concern with such actions. Sequestration can be used in any suit against a nonresident  and reaches corporate fiduciaries only if they happen to own interests in a Delaware corporation, or other property in the State. But as Heitner’s failure to secure jurisdiction over seven of the defendants named in his complaint demonstrates, there is no necessary relationship between holding a position as a corporate fiduciary and owning stock or other interests in the corporation. If Delaware perceived its interest in securing jurisdiction over corporate fiduciaries to be as great as Heitner suggests, we would expect it to have enacted a statute more clearly designed to protect that interest.

Moreover, even if Heitner’s assessment of the importance of Delaware’s interest is accepted, his argument fails to demonstrate that Delaware is a fair forum for this litigation. The interest appellee has identified may support the application of Delaware law to resolve any controversy over appellants’ actions in their capacities as officers and directors. But we have rejected the argument that if a State’s law can properly be applied to a dispute, its courts necessarily have jurisdiction over the parties to that dispute. ***

Appellee suggests that by accepting positions as officers or directors of a Delaware corporation, appellants performed the acts [sufficient to justify the assertion of jurisdiction by Delaware courts under] Hanson v. Denckla [p. 103, supra]. He notes that Delaware law provides substantial benefits to corporate officers and directors, and that these benefits were at least in part the incentive for appellants to assume their positions. It is, he says, “only fair and just” to require appellants, in return for these benefits, to respond in the State of Delaware when they are accused of misusing their power. * * *

But like Heitner’s first argument, this line of reasoning establishes only that it is appropriate for Delaware law to govern the obligations of appellants to Greyhound and its stockholders. It does not demonstrate that appellants have “purposefully avail[ed themselves] of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State,” Hanson v. Denckla * * *, in a way that would justify bringing them before a Delaware tribunal.

217

Appellants have simply had nothing to do with the State of Delaware. Moreover, appellants had no reason to expect to be haled before a Delaware court. Delaware, unlike some States, has not enacted a statute that treats acceptance of a directorship as consent to jurisdiction in the State. And “[i]t strains reason * * * to suggest that anyone buying securities in a corporation formed in Delaware ‘impliedly consents’ to subject himself to Delaware’s * * * jurisdiction on any cause of action.” Folk & Moyer, [Sequestration in Delaware: A Constitutional Analysis, 73 Colum.L.Rev. 749, 785 (1973)] * * *. Appellants, who were not required to acquire interests in Greyhound in order to hold their positions, did not by acquiring those interests surrender their right to be brought to judgment only in States with which they had had “minimum contacts.”

* * * Delaware’s assertion of jurisdiction over appellants in this case is inconsistent with that constitutional limitation on state power. The judgment of the Delaware Supreme Court must, therefore, be reversed.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

JUSTICE POWELL, concurring.

* * *

I would explicitly reserve judgment * * * on whether the ownership of some forms of property whose situs is indisputably and permanently located within a State may, without more, provide the contacts necessary to subject a defendant to jurisdiction within the State to the extent of the value of the property. In the case of real property, in particular, preservation of the common law concept of quasi in rem jurisdiction arguably would avoid the uncertainty of the general International Shoe standard without significant cost to “ ‘traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.’ ” * * *

Subject to the foregoing reservation, I join the opinion of the Court.

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in the judgment.

* * *

One who purchases shares of stock on the open market can hardly be expected to know that he has thereby become subject to suit in a forum remote from his residence and unrelated to the transaction. As a practical matter, the Delaware sequestration statute creates an unacceptable risk of judgment without notice. Unlike the 49 other States, Delaware treats the place of incorporation as the situs of the stock, even though both the owner and the custodian of the shares are elsewhere. Moreover, Delaware denies the defendant the opportunity to defend the merits of the suit unless he subjects himself to the unlimited jurisdiction of the court. Thus, it coerces a defendant either to submit to personal jurisdiction in a forum which could not otherwise obtain such jurisdiction or to lose the securities which have been attached. If its procedure were upheld, Delaware would, in effect, impose a duty of inquiry on every purchaser of securities in the national market. For unless the purchaser ascertains both the State of incorporation of the company whose shares he is buying, and also the idiosyncrasies of its law, he may be assuming an unknown risk of litigation. I therefore agree with the Court that on the record before us no adequate basis for jurisdiction exists and that the Delaware statute is unconstitutional on its face.

218

How the Court’s opinion may be applied in other contexts is not entirely clear to me. I agree with Mr. Justice POWELL that it should not be read to invalidate in rem jurisdiction where real estate is involved. I would also not read it as invalidating other long-accepted methods of acquiring jurisdiction over persons with adequate notice of both the particular controversy and the fact that their local activities might subject them to suit. My uncertainty as to the reach of the opinion, and my fear that it purports to decide a great deal more than is necessary to dispose of this case, persuade me merely to concur in the judgment.

JUSTICE BRENNAN, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I join Parts I–III of the Court’s opinion. I fully agree that the minimum-contacts analysis * * * represents a far more sensible construct for the exercise of state-court jurisdiction than the patchwork of legal and factual fictions that has been generated from the decision in Pennoyer v. Neff * * *. It is precisely because the inquiry into minimum contacts is now of such overriding importance, however, that I must respectfully dissent from Part IV of the Court’s opinion.

I

The primary teaching of Parts I–III of today’s decision is that a State, in seeking to assert jurisdiction over a person located outside its borders, may only do so on the basis of minimum contacts among the parties, the contested transaction, and the forum state. The Delaware Supreme Court could not have made plainer, however, that its sequestration statute * * * does not operate on this basis, but instead is strictly an embodiment of quasi in rem jurisdiction, a jurisdictional predicate no longer constitutionally viable * * *. This state-court ruling obviously comports with the understanding of the parties, for the issue of the existence of minimum contacts was never pleaded by appellee, made the subject of discovery, or ruled upon by the Delaware courts. These facts notwithstanding, the Court in Part IV reaches the minimum-contacts question and finds such contacts lacking as applied to appellants. Succinctly stated, once having properly and persuasively decided that the quasi in rem statute that Delaware admits to having enacted is invalid, the Court then proceeds to find that a minimum-contacts law that Delaware expressly denies having enacted also could not be constitutionally applied in this case.

In my view, a purer example of an advisory opinion is not to be found. True, appellants do not deny having received actual notice of the action in question. * * * But notice is but one ingredient of a proper assertion of state-court jurisdiction. The other is a statute authorizing the exercise of the State’s judicial power along constitutionally permissible grounds—which henceforth means minimum contacts. As of today, [Del. Code Ann., Tit. 8,] § 366 is not such a law.¹ Recognizing that today’s decision fundamentally alters the relevant jurisdictional ground rules, I certainly would not want to rule out the possibility that Delaware’s courts might decide that the legislature’s overriding purpose of securing the personal appearance in state courts of defendants would best be served by reinterpreting its statute to permit state jurisdiction on the basis of constitutionally permissible contacts rather than stock ownership. Were the state courts to take this step, it would then become necessary to address the question of whether minimum contacts exist here. But in the present posture of this case, the Court’s decision of this important issue is purely an abstract ruling.

My concern with the inappropriateness of the Court’s action is highlighted by two other considerations. First, an inquiry into minimum contacts inevitably is highly dependent on creating a proper factual foundation detailing the contacts between the forum state and the controversy in question. Because neither the plaintiff-appellee nor the state courts viewed such an inquiry as germane in this instance, the Court today is unable to draw upon a proper factual record in reaching its conclusion; moreover, its disposition denies appellee the normal opportunity to seek discovery on the contacts issue. Second, it must be remembered that the Court’s ruling is a constitutional one and necessarily will affect the reach of the jurisdictional laws of all 50 States. Ordinarily this would counsel restraint in constitutional pronouncements. * * * Certainly it should have cautioned the Court against reaching out to decide a question that, as here, has yet to emerge from the state courts ripened for review on the federal issue.

II

Nonetheless, because the Court rules on the minimum-contacts question, I feel impelled to express my view. While evidence derived through discovery might satisfy me that minimum contacts are lacking in a given case, I am convinced that as a general rule a state forum has jurisdiction to adjudicate a shareholder derivative action centering on the conduct and policies of the directors and officers of a corporation chartered by that State. Unlike the Court, I therefore would not foreclose Delaware from asserting jurisdiction over appellants were it persuaded to do so on the basis of minimum contacts.

It is well settled that a derivative lawsuit as presented here does not inure primarily to the benefit of the named plaintiff. Rather, the primary beneficiaries are the corporation and its owners, the shareholders. * * *

Viewed in this light, the chartering State has an unusually powerful interest in insuring the availability of a convenient forum for litigating claims involving a possible multiplicity of defendant fiduciaries and for vindicating the State’s substantive policies regarding the management of its domestic corporations. I believe that our cases fairly establish that the State’s valid substantive interests are important considerations in assessing whether it constitutionally may claim jurisdiction over a given cause of action.

In this instance, Delaware can point to at least three interrelated public policies that are furthered by its assertion of jurisdiction. First, the State has a substantial interest in providing restitution for its local corporations that allegedly have been victimized by fiduciary misconduct, even if the managerial decisions occurred outside the State. The importance of this general state interest in assuring restitution for its own residents previously found expression in cases that went outside the then-prevailing due process framework to authorize state-court jurisdiction over nonresident motorists who injure others within the State. * * * More recently, it has led States to seek and to acquire jurisdiction over nonresident tortfeasors whose purely out-of-state activities produce domestic consequences. * * * Second, state courts have legitimately read their jurisdiction expansively when a cause of action centers in an area in which the forum State possesses a manifest regulatory interest. * * * Only this Term we reiterated that the conduct of corporate fiduciaries is just such a matter in which the policies and interests of a domestic forum are paramount. * * * Finally, a State like Delaware has a recognized interest in affording a convenient forum for supervising and overseeing the affairs of an entity that is purely the creation of that State’s law. * * *

To be sure, the Court is not blind to these considerations. It notes that the State’s interests “may support the application of Delaware law to resolve any controversy over appellants’ actions in their capacities as officers and directors.” * * * But this, the Court argues, pertains to choice of law, not jurisdiction. I recognize that the jurisdictional and choice-of-law inquiries are not identical. * * * But I would not compartmentalize thinking in this area quite so rigidly as it seems to me the Court does today, for both inquiries “are often closely related and to a substantial degree depend upon similar considerations.” [Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S.] at 258, 78 S.Ct. at 1242 (Black, J., dissenting). * * * At the minimum, the decision that it is fair to bind a defendant by a State’s laws and rules should prove to be highly relevant to the fairness of permitting that same State to accept jurisdiction for adjudicating the controversy.

Furthermore, I believe that practical considerations argue in favor of seeking to bridge the distance between the choice-of-law and jurisdictional inquiries. Even when a court would apply the law of a different forum, as a general rule it will feel less knowledgeable and comfortable in interpretation, and less interested in fostering the policies of that foreign jurisdiction, than would the courts established by the State that provides the applicable law. * * * Obviously, such choice-of-law problems cannot entirely be avoided in a diverse legal system such as our own. Nonetheless, when a suitor seeks to lodge a suit in a State with a substantial interest in seeing its own law applied to the transaction in question, we could wisely act to minimize conflicts, confusion, and uncertainty by adopting a liberal view of jurisdiction, unless considerations of fairness or efficiency strongly point in the opposite direction.

This case is not one where, in my judgment, this preference for jurisdiction is adequately answered. Certainly nothing said by the Court persuades me that it would be unfair to subject appellants to suit in Delaware. The fact that the record does not reveal whether they “set foot” or committed “acts related to [the] cause of action” in Delaware * * * is not decisive, for jurisdiction can be based strictly on out-of-state acts having foreseeable effects in the forum State. * * * I have little difficulty in applying this principle to nonresident fiduciaries whose alleged breaches of trust are said to have substantial damaging effect on the financial posture of a resident corporation. Further, I cannot understand how the existence of minimum contacts in a constitutional sense is at all affected by Delaware’s failure statutorily to express an interest in controlling corporate fiduciaries. * * * To me this simply demonstrates that Delaware did not elect to assert jurisdiction to the extent the Constitution would allow. Nor would I view as controlling or even especially meaningful Delaware’s failure to exact from appellants their consent to be sued. * * * Once we have rejected the jurisdictional framework created in Pennoyer v. Neff, I see no reason to rest jurisdiction on a fictional outgrowth of that system such as the existence of a consent statute, expressed or implied.

* * * Crucial to me is the fact that appellants voluntarily associated themselves with the State of Delaware, “invoking the benefits and protections of its laws,” * * * by entering into a long-term and fragile relationship with one of its domestic corporations. They thereby elected to assume powers and to undertake responsibilities wholly derived from that State’s rules and regulations, and to become eligible for those benefits that Delaware law makes available to its corporations’ officials. E.g., Del.Code Ann., Tit. 8, § 143 (1975) (interest-free loans); § 145 (1975 ed. and Supp.1976) (indemnification). While it is possible that countervailing issues of judicial efficiency and the like might clearly favor a different forum, they do not appear on the meager record before us; and, of course, we are concerned solely with “minimum” contacts, not the “best” contacts. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Within 13 days after the decision in Shaffer, the Delaware legislature amended its laws to provide that every nonresident who is elected or appointed a director of a Delaware corporation after September 1, 1977, shall “be deemed” to have consented to the appointment of the corporation’s registered agent in Delaware, or, if there is no registered agent, of the Secretary of State of Delaware, as his agent for service of process in any Delaware action based on violations of the director’s duties as director after September 1, 1977. 10 Del. Code Ann. tit. 10, § 3114. The constitutionality of the section was upheld by the Supreme Court of Delaware in Armstrong v. Pomerance, 423 A.2d 174 (Del.1980), a suit against nonresidents whose sole contact with Delaware was their status as directors of a Delaware corporation. See also Stearn v. Malloy, 89 F.R.D. 421 (E.D.Wis. 1981) (reaching the same conclusion under a similar Wisconsin statute). In 2004, the Delaware consent-to-service statute was extended to high officers of Delaware corporations (such as the president, treasurer, or CEO). Do you agree that statutes subjecting nonresident officers and directors to jurisdiction in the state of the company’s incorporation comport with due process? Would it be constitutional to deem the purchase of a share of Delaware stock as consent to be sued in Delaware in suits pertaining to the corporation? See Hershkoff & Kahan, Forum-Selection Provisions in Corporate “Contracts,” 93 Wash.L.Rev. 101 (2018).

2. How does Shaffer affect a court’s power to enter a judgment when the cause of action relates to real property located in the forum state?

3. In RUSH v. SAVCHUK, 444 U.S. 320, 100 S.Ct. 571, 62 L.Ed.2d 516 (1980), the Supreme Court settled the question of whether an insurance obligation can be attached to effect quasi in rem jurisdiction. In finding such an attachment unconstitutional, the Court separated the forum contacts of the defendant-tortfeasor from those of the insurer. Having done so, the Court held that sufficient contacts between defendant and the forum did not exist and that the Due Process Clause forbade the assertion of jurisdiction.

4. Why would a plaintiff ever rely on quasi in rem jurisdiction if its validity is subject to the same constitutional standard as that of in personam jurisdiction?

J. TRANSIENT PRESENCE IN THE FORUM

BURNHAM V. SUPERIOR COURT
Supreme Court of the United States, 1990.
495 U.S. 604, 110 S.Ct. 2105, 109 L.Ed.2d 631.

Certiorari to the Court of Appeal of California, First Appellate District.

JUSTICE SCALIA announced the judgment of the Court and delivered an opinion in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE and JUSTICE KENNEDY join, and in which JUSTICE WHITE joins with respect to Parts I, II-A, II-B, and II-C.

The question presented is whether the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment denies California courts jurisdiction over a nonresident, who was personally served with process while temporarily in that State, in a suit unrelated to his activities in the State.

I

Petitioner Dennis Burnham married Francie Burnham in 1976 in West Virginia. In 1977 the couple moved to New Jersey, where their two children were born. In July 1987 the Burnhams decided to separate. They agreed that Mrs. Burnham, who intended to move to California, would take custody of the children. Shortly before Mrs. Burnham departed for California that same month, she and petitioner agreed that she would file for divorce on grounds of “irreconcilable differences.”

In October 1987, petitioner filed for divorce in New Jersey state court on grounds of “desertion.” Petitioner did not, however, obtain an issuance of summons against his wife and did not attempt to serve her with process. Mrs. Burnham, after unsuccessfully demanding that petitioner adhere to their prior agreement to submit to an “irreconcilable differences” divorce, brought suit for divorce in California state court in early January 1988.

In late January, petitioner visited southern California on business, after which he went north to visit his children in the San Francisco Bay area, where his wife resided. He took the older child to San Francisco for the weekend. Upon returning the child to Mrs. Burnham’s home on January 24, 1988, petitioner was served with a California court summons and a copy of Mrs. Burnham’s divorce petition. He then returned to New Jersey.

Later that year, petitioner made a special appearance in the California Superior Court, moving to quash the service of process on the ground that the court lacked personal jurisdiction over him because his only contacts with California were a few short visits to the State for the purposes of conducting business and visiting his children. The Superior Court denied the motion, and the California Court of Appeal denied mandamus relief, rejecting petitioner’s contention that the Due Process Clause prohibited

224

California courts from asserting jurisdiction over him because he lacked “minimum contacts” with the State. The court held it to be “a valid jurisdictional predicate for in personam jurisdiction” that the “defendant [was] present in the forum state and personally served with process.” * * *

II

A

* * *

To determine whether the assertion of personal jurisdiction is consistent with due process, we have long relied on the principles traditionally followed by American courts in marking out the territorial limits of each State’s authority. * * * In what has become the classic expression of the criterion, we said in International Shoe Co. v. Washington [p. 95, supra], * * * that a state court’s assertion of personal jurisdiction satisfies the Due Process Clause if it does not violate “ ‘traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.’ ” * * * Since International Shoe, we have only been called upon to decide whether these “traditional notions” permit States to exercise jurisdiction over absent defendants in a manner that deviates from the rules of jurisdiction applied in the 19th century. We have held such deviations permissible, but only with respect to suits arising out of the absent defendant’s contacts with the State. * * * The question we must decide today is whether due process requires a similar connection between the litigation and the defendant’s contacts with the State in cases where the defendant is physically present in the State at the time process is served upon him.

B

Among the most firmly established principles of personal jurisdiction in American tradition is that the courts of a State have jurisdiction over nonresidents who are physically present in the State. * * * Justice STORY believed the principle, which he traced to Roman origins, to be firmly grounded in English tradition * * *.

Recent scholarship has suggested that English tradition was not as clear as Story thought * * *. Accurate or not, however, judging by the evidence of contemporaneous or near-contemporaneous decisions, one must conclude that Story’s understanding was shared by American courts at the crucial time for present purposes: 1868, when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. * * *

Decisions in the courts of many States in the 19th and early 20th centuries held that personal service upon a physically present defendant sufficed to confer jurisdiction, without regard to whether the defendant was only briefly in the State or whether the cause of action was related to his activities there. * * * Although research has not revealed a case deciding the issue in every State's courts, that appears to be because the issue was so well settled that it went unlitigated. * * *

This American jurisdictional practice is, moreover, not merely old; it is continuing. It remains the practice of, not only a substantial number of the States, but as far as we are aware all the States and the Federal Government—if one disregards (as one must for this purpose) the few opinions since 1978 that have erroneously said, on grounds similar to those that petitioner presses here, that this Court's due process decisions render the practice unconstitutional. * * * We do not know of a single state or federal statute, or a single judicial decision resting upon state law, that has abandoned in-state service as a basis of jurisdiction. Many recent cases reaffirm it. * * *

C

Despite this formidable body of precedent, petitioner contends, in reliance on our decisions applying the International Shoe standard, that in the absence of “continuous and systematic” contacts with the forum, * * * a nonresident defendant can be subjected to judgment only as to matters that arise out of or relate to his contacts with the forum. This argument rests on a thorough misunderstanding of our cases.

The view of most courts in the 19th century was that a court simply could not exercise in personam jurisdiction over a nonresident who had not been personally served with process in the forum. * * *

* * * In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, changes in the technology of transportation and communication, and the tremendous growth of interstate business activity, led to an “inevitable relaxation of the strict limits on state jurisdiction” over nonresident individuals and corporations. * * * States required, for example, that nonresident corporations appoint an in-state agent upon whom process could be served as a condition of transacting business within their borders, * * * and provided in-state “substituted service” for nonresident motorists who caused injury in the State and left before personal service could be accomplished * * *. We initially upheld these laws under the Due Process Clause on grounds that they complied with Pennoyer's rigid requirement of either “consent,” * * * or “presence” * * *. As many observed, however, the consent and presence were purely fictional. * * * Our opinion in International Shoe cast those fictions aside and made explicit the underlying basis of these decisions: Due process does not necessarily require the States to adhere to the unbending territorial limits on jurisdiction set forth in Pennoyer. * * *

Nothing in International Shoe or the cases that have followed it, however, offers support for the very different proposition petitioner seeks to establish today: that a defendant's presence in the forum is not only unnecessary to validate novel, nontraditional assertions of jurisdiction, but is itself no longer sufficient to establish jurisdiction. That proposition is unfaithful to both elementary logic and the foundations of our due process jurisprudence. The distinction between what is needed to support novel procedures and what is needed to sustain traditional ones is fundamental * * *. The short of the matter is that jurisdiction based on physical presence alone constitutes due process because it is one of the continuing traditions of our legal system that define the due process standard of “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.” That standard was developed by analogy to “physical presence,” and it would be perverse to say it could now be turned against that touchstone of jurisdiction.

D

Petitioner's strongest argument, though we ultimately reject it, relies upon our decision in Shaffer v. Heitner * * * [p. 210, supra].

It goes too far to say, as petitioner contends, that Shaffer compels the conclusion that a State lacks jurisdiction over an individual unless the litigation arises out of his activities in the State. Shaffer, like International Shoe, involved jurisdiction over an absent defendant, and it stands for nothing more than the proposition that when the “minimum contact” that is a substitute for physical presence consists of property ownership it must, like other minimum contacts, be related to the litigation. Petitioner wrenches out of its context our statement in Shaffer that “all assertions of state-court jurisdiction must be evaluated according to the standards set forth in International Shoe and its progeny” * * *. When read together with the two sentences that preceded it, the meaning of this statement becomes clear * * *. Shaffer was saying * * * not that all bases for the assertion of in personam jurisdiction (including, presumably, in-state service) must be treated alike and subjected to the “minimum contacts” analysis of International Shoe; but rather that quasi in rem jurisdiction, that fictional “ancient form,” and in personam jurisdiction, are really one and the same and must be treated alike—leading to the conclusion that quasi in rem jurisdiction, i.e., that form of in personam jurisdiction based upon a “property ownership” contact and by definition unaccompanied by personal, in-state service, must satisfy the litigation-relatedness requirement of International Shoe. The logic of Shaffer's holding—which places all suits against absent nonresidents on the same constitutional footing, regardless of whether a separate Latin label is attached to one particular basis of contact—does not compel the conclusion that physically present defendants must be treated identically to absent ones. * * *

It is fair to say, however, that while our holding today does not contradict Shaffer, our basic approach to the due process question is different. We have conducted no independent inquiry into the desirability or fairness of the prevailing in-state service rule, leaving that judgment to the legislatures that are free to amend it; for our purposes, its validation is its pedigree, as the phrase “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice” makes clear. Shaffer did conduct such an independent inquiry, asserting that “ ‘traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice’ can be as readily offended by the perpetuation of ancient forms that are no longer justified as by the adoption of new procedures that are inconsistent with the basic values of our constitutional heritage.” * * * Perhaps that assertion can be sustained when the “perpetuation of ancient forms” is engaged in by only a very small minority of the States. Where, however, as in the present case, a jurisdictional principle is both firmly approved by tradition and still favored, it is impossible to imagine what standard we could appeal to for the judgment that it is “no longer justified.” * * * For new procedures, hitherto unknown, the Due Process Clause requires analysis to determine whether “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice” have been offended. * * * But a doctrine of personal jurisdiction that dates back to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment and is still generally observed unquestionably meets that standard.

III

A few words in response to Justice BRENNAN’s opinion concurring in the judgment: It insists that we apply “contemporary notions of due process” to determine the constitutionality of California’s assertion of jurisdiction. * * * The “contemporary notions of due process” applicable to personal jurisdiction are the enduring “traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice” established as the test by International Shoe. By its very language, that test is satisfied if a state court adheres to jurisdictional rules that are generally applied and have always been applied in the United States.

But the concurrence’s proposed standard of “contemporary notions of due process” requires more: It measures state-court jurisdiction not only against traditional doctrines in this country, including current state-court practice, but also against each Justice’s subjective assessment of what is fair and just. Authority for that seductive standard is not to be found in any of our personal jurisdiction cases. * * *

* * *

* * * The only reason for charging Mr. Burnham with the reasonable expectation of being subject to suit is that the States of the Union assert adjudicatory jurisdiction over the person, and have always asserted adjudicatory jurisdiction over the person, by serving him with process during his temporary physical presence in their territory. That continuing tradition, which anyone entering California should have known about, renders it “fair” for Mr. Burnham, who voluntarily entered California, to be sued there for divorce—at least “fair” in the limited sense that he has no one but himself to blame. Justice BRENNAN’s long journey is a circular one, leaving him, at the end of the day, in complete reliance upon the very factor he sought to avoid: The existence of a continuing tradition is not enough, fairness also must be considered; fairness exists here because there is a continuing tradition.

* * * Justice BRENNAN’s approach does not establish a rule of law at all, but only a “totality of the circumstances” test, guaranteeing what traditional territorial rules of jurisdiction were designed precisely to avoid: uncertainty and litigation over the preliminary issue of the forum’s competence. It may be that those evils, necessarily accompanying a freestanding “reasonableness” inquiry, must be accepted at the margins, when we evaluate nontraditional forms of jurisdiction newly adopted by the States * * *. But that is no reason for injecting them into the core of our American practice, exposing to such a “reasonableness” inquiry the ground of jurisdiction that has hitherto been considered the very baseline of reasonableness, physical presence.

The difference between us and Justice BRENNAN has nothing to do with whether “further progress [is] to be made” in the “evolution of our legal system.” * * * It has to do with whether changes are to be adopted as progressive by the American people or decreed as progressive by the Justices of this Court. Nothing we say today prevents individual States from limiting or entirely abandoning the in-state-service basis of jurisdiction. And nothing prevents an overwhelming majority of them from doing so, with the consequence that the “traditional notions of fairness” that this Court applies may change. But the States have overwhelmingly declined to adopt such limitation or abandonment, evidently not considering it to be progress. The question is whether, armed with no authority other than individual Justices’ perceptions of fairness that conflict with both past and current practice, this Court can compel the States to make such a change on the ground that “due process” requires it. We hold that it cannot.

* * *

Affirmed.

JUSTICE WHITE, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

I join Parts I, II-A, II-B, and II-C of Justice SCALIA’s opinion and concur in the judgment of affirmance. The rule allowing jurisdiction to be obtained over a nonresident by personal service in the forum State, without more, has been and is so widely accepted throughout this country that I could not possibly strike it down, either on its face or as applied in this case, on the ground that it denies due process of law guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. * * *

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL, JUSTICE BLACKMUN, and JUSTICE O’CONNOR join, concurring in the judgment.

I agree with Justice SCALIA that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment generally permits a state court to exercise jurisdiction over a defendant if he is served with process while voluntarily present in the forum State. I do not perceive the need, however, to decide that a jurisdictional rule that “ ‘has been immemorially the actual law of the land,’ ” * * * automatically comports with due process simply by virtue of its “pedigree.” * * * Unlike Justice SCALIA, I would undertake an “independent inquiry into the * * * fairness of the prevailing in-state service rule.” * * * I therefore concur only in the judgment.

I

I believe that the approach adopted by Justice SCALIA’s opinion today—reliance solely on historical pedigree—is foreclosed by our decisions in International Shoe * * * and Shaffer * * *. * * * The critical insight of Shaffer is that all rules of jurisdiction, even ancient ones, must satisfy contemporary notions of due process. * * * I agree * * * and continue to believe that “the minimum-contacts analysis developed in International Shoe . . . represents a far more sensible construct for the exercise of state-court jurisdiction than the patchwork of legal and factual fictions that has been generated from the decision in Pennoyer v. Neff.” * * *

While our holding in Shaffer may have been limited to quasi in rem jurisdiction, our mode of analysis was not. Indeed, that we were willing in Shaffer to examine anew the appropriateness of the quasi in rem rule—until that time dutifully accepted by American courts for at least a century—demonstrates that we did not believe that the “pedigree” of a jurisdictional practice was dispositive in deciding whether it was consistent with due process. * * * If we could discard an “ancient form without substantial modern justification” in Shaffer, * * * we can do so again. Lower courts, commentators, and the American Law Institute all have interpreted International Shoe and Shaffer to mean that every assertion of state-court jurisdiction, even one pursuant to a “traditional” rule such as transient jurisdiction, must comport with contemporary notions of due process. Notwithstanding the nimble gymnastics of Justice SCALIA’s opinion today, it is not faithful to our decision in Shaffer.

II

Tradition, though alone not dispositive, is of course relevant to the question whether the rule of transient jurisdiction is consistent with due process. * * * Tradition is salient not in the sense that practices of the past are automatically reasonable today; indeed, under such a standard, the legitimacy of transient jurisdiction would be called into question because the rule’s historical “pedigree” is a matter of intense debate. * * * For much of the 19th century, American courts did not uniformly recognize the concept of transient jurisdiction, and it appears that the transient rule did not receive wide currency until well after our decision in Pennoyer v. Neff * * *.

230

Rather, I find the historical background relevant because, however murky the jurisprudential origins of transient jurisdiction, the fact that American courts have announced the rule for perhaps a century * * * provides a defendant voluntarily present in a particular State today “clear notice that [he] is subject to suit” in the forum. * * * [Thus, t]he transient rule is consistent with reasonable expectations and is entitled to a strong presumption that it comports with due process. * * *

By visiting the forum State, a transient defendant actually “avail[s]” himself * * * of significant benefits provided by the State. His health and safety are guaranteed by the State’s police, fire, and emergency medical services; he is free to travel on the State’s roads and waterways; he likely enjoys the fruits of the State’s economy as well. Moreover, the Privileges and Immunities Clause of Article IV prevents a state government from discriminating against a transient defendant by denying him the protections of its law or the right of access to its courts. * * * Without transient jurisdiction, an asymmetry would arise: A transient would have the full benefit of the power of the forum State’s courts as a plaintiff while retaining immunity from their authority as a defendant. * * *

The potential burdens on a transient defendant are slight. * * * That the defendant has already journeyed at least once before to the forum—as evidenced by the fact that he was served with process there—is an indication that suit in the forum likely would not be prohibitively inconvenient. Finally, any burdens that do arise can be ameliorated by a variety of procedural devices. For these reasons, as a rule the exercise of personal jurisdiction over a defendant based on his voluntary presence in the forum will satisfy the requirements of due process. * * *

In this case, it is undisputed that petitioner was served with process while voluntarily and knowingly in the State of California. I therefore concur in the judgment.

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in the judgment.

As I explained in my separate writing, I did not join the Court’s opinion in Shaffer * * * because I was concerned by its unnecessarily broad reach. * * * The same concern prevents me from joining either Justice SCALIA’s or Justice BRENNAN’s opinion in this case. For me, it is sufficient to note that the historical evidence and consensus identified by Justice SCALIA, the considerations of fairness identified by Justice BRENNAN, and the common sense displayed by Justice WHITE, all combine to demonstrate that this is, indeed, a very easy case.* Accordingly, I agree that the judgment should be affirmed.

231

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.The Justices agreed on the result in Burnham, but could not agree on its theoretical underpinnings. Which approach do you find to be more persuasive?
- 2.In which situations would all of the Justices agree that in-forum service of process is a constitutionally sufficient basis for personal jurisdiction?

Are there any situations in which jurisdiction based on in-forum service of process would be constitutionally suspect? Would it be constitutional to exercise general jurisdiction over a foreign defendant who is served while present in the forum for a two-hour lay-over at the airport? See Hay, Transient Jurisdiction, Especially Over International Defendants: Critical Comments on Burnham v. Superior Court of California, 1990 U.Ill.L.Rev. 593. Or over a foreign defendant served while in-flight over the forum state? See p. 88, Note 4.

3. Is in-state service upon a corporation by delivering process to a corporate officer who happens to be present in the state at the time of service an effective way to establish jurisdiction? How does the notion that general jurisdiction requires a corporation to be “at home” in the forum state, see Section E, supra, affect your analysis? Consider the concern expressed by Justice Gorsuch in his Ford concurring opinion, pp. 191–192, supra, that “even though individual defendants remain subject to the old ‘tag’ rule, allowing them to be sued on any claim anywhere they can be found * * * it seems corporations continue to receive special jurisdictional protections in the name of the Constitution. Less clear is why.”

K. JURISDICTIONAL REACH OF THE FEDERAL DISTRICT COURTS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

NOTE ON FEDERAL RULE 4

A federal court, like any court in the United States, can exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant only if that power is authorized by statute and its exercise comports with due process. Some of the decisions covered earlier in this chapter—including Keeton, p. 124, supra, Burger King, p. 127, supra,

232

Daimler, p. 167, supra, and Walden, p. 159, supra—involved cases filed initially in a federal district court.

Conventionally, discussions about personal jurisdiction in the federal courts focus on Federal Rule 4. Much of Rule 4 is concerned with the methods of serving process on defendants in federal court. See Chapter 3, Section B, infra. Rule 4(k), however, designates when service of process “establishes personal jurisdiction over a defendant” in a federal court action. As Rule 4(k) confirms, service of process is a precondition for obtaining personal jurisdiction.

Rule 4(k)(1) has three distinct provisions:

- (a) Rule 4(k)(1)(A) allows personal jurisdiction over a defendant “who is subject to the jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction in the state where the district court is located.”
- (b) Rule 4(k)(1)(B) allows personal jurisdiction over a party joined under Rules 14 or 19 who is served with process “within a judicial district of the United States and not more than 100 miles from where the summons was issued.”
- (c) Rule 4(k)(1)(C) allows personal jurisdiction when authorized by a federal statute.

By contrast to Rule 4(k)(1), Rule 4(k)(2) is a limited federal long-arm provision that establishes personal jurisdiction “for a claim that arises under federal law” if the “defendant is not subject to jurisdiction in any state’s courts of general jurisdiction” and “exercising jurisdiction is consistent with the United States Constitution and laws.” The requirement that the claim must “arise[] under federal law” means that Rule 4(k)(2) does not apply to claims that are based exclusively on state law. See Chapter 4, Section C, infra (discussing the federal question category of federal subject-matter jurisdiction).

As the Federal Circuit has explained:

Rule 4(k)(2) closed a loophole that existed prior to the 1993 amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Before the adoption of Rule 4(k)(2), a non-resident defendant who did not have “minimum contacts” with any individual state sufficient to support [any court’s] exercise of jurisdiction, but did have sufficient contacts with the United States as a whole, could escape jurisdiction in all fifty states. Rule 4(k)(2) was adopted to ensure that federal claims will have a U.S. forum if sufficient national contacts exist. * * *

Touchcom, Inc. v. Bereskin & Parr, 574 F.3d 1403, 1414 (Fed.Cir. 2009) (footnotes omitted).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What is the constitutional test for determining whether a defendant is subject to personal jurisdiction in a federal court under Rule 4(k)(1)(A)? Does the state’s long-arm statute play a role? Note that Rule 4(k)(1)(A)’s reference to “a court of general jurisdiction in the state” does not refer only to state courts with “general jurisdiction” over a defendant as that term is used in Section E, supra. Rather, it refers to state courts whose authority is not limited by subject matter. See p. 300, Note 1, infra.

233

2. Rule 4(k)(1)(B), the so-called “bulge” provision, was promulgated in order “to allow complicated controversies to be ended by a single lawsuit if all the necessary third parties could be found within 100 miles of the courthouse.” Coleman v. American Export Isbrandsten Lines, Inc., 405 F.2d 250, 252 (2d Cir. 1968). When service is effected under Rule 4(k)(1)(B), is due process satisfied if defendant has minimum contacts with the state in which bulge service is effected?

3.Rule 4(k)(1)(C) applies when Congress has specifically authorized personal jurisdiction for a particular kind of case. These are sometimes referred to as “nationwide service of process” provisions, such as those in the Commodity Exchange Act, 7 U.S.C. §§ 13a–1, 13a–2(4), 18(b); the Clayton Act § 12, 15 U.S.C. § 22; the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, § 27, 15 U.S.C. § 78aa; the False Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. § 3732(a); the Federal Debt Collection Procedures Act, 28 U.S.C. § 3004(b)(1); and Federal Trade Commission subpoenas, 15 U.S.C. § 49. Because such statutes provide independent federal authority for personal jurisdiction, their application in federal court is not subject to the limits imposed on state courts under the Fourteenth Amendment’s Due Process Clause. Instead, they are governed by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. See, e.g., Republic of Panama v. BCCI Holdings (Luxembourg) S.A., 119 F.3d 935, 942 (11th Cir. 1997) (“It is well established that when, as here, a federal statute provides the basis for jurisdiction, the constitutional limits of due process derive from the Fifth, rather than the Fourteenth, Amendment.”). The Fifth Amendment test does not hinge on defendant’s contacts with any particular state; rather it considers defendant’s “contacts with the nation as a whole.” Laurel Gardens, LLC v. McKenna, 948 F.3d 105, 122 (3d Cir. 2020).

Recall that in McIntyre, p. 143, supra, Justice Kennedy’s plurality opinion raised the possibility of Congress authorizing jurisdiction over a foreign defendant on the basis of nationwide contacts. Is the argument in favor of nationwide service of process as strong when the federal court sits in diversity and hears a state law claim?

4. Service under Federal Rule 4(k)(2) generally is said to call for a two-step inquiry. At step one, the court determines whether defendant is subject to personal jurisdiction in any one of the 50 states; at step two, the court assesses whether defendant’s contacts with the nation satisfy due process. As to the first step, an influential Seventh Circuit decision held that this requirement of Rule 4(k)(2) is satisfied if defendant acknowledges that he cannot be sued in the forum state but declines to identify a state in which jurisdiction is present. See ISI Intern. Inc. v. Borden Ladner Gervais LLP, 256 F.3d 548, 552 (7th Cir. 2001). The First Circuit instead requires plaintiff to certify that defendant is not subject to jurisdiction in any state, and then the burden shifts to defendant to rebut the certification. See United States v. Swiss American Bank, Ltd., 191 F.3d 30 (1st Cir.1999). As to the constitutional inquiry, jurisdiction under Rule 4(k)(2) is subject to the Fifth Amendment’s constraints rather than the Fourteenth Amendment’s (see Note 3, supra); thus, defendant’s nationwide contacts may be aggregated to determine whether “there are sufficient minimum contacts with the nation as a whole.” Abelesz v. OTP Bank, 692 F.3d 638, 660 (7th Cir. 2012).

234

5. How does Federal Rule 4(n) differ from the other service rules so far discussed? Under what circumstances may the federal court piggy-back on a state law authorizing jurisdiction based on the seizure of assets? In Office Depot, Inc. v. Zuccarini, 596 F.3d 696 (9th Cir. 2010), the appeals court affirmed that quasi in rem jurisdiction can be obtained under Rule 4(n) by attaching any form of property; the court held that domain names are personal property subject to attachment wherever the domain registry is located.

L. CHALLENGING A COURT’S EXERCISE OF JURISDICTION OVER THE PERSON OR PROPERTY

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(b), (g), and (h) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

1.RAISING THE JURISDICTIONAL ISSUE DIRECTLY

The term “special appearance” refers to the procedure at common law by which a defendant presented a challenge to the court’s exercise of personal jurisdiction without submitting to the court’s jurisdiction for any other purpose. The rules varied from state to state on the technical requirements for making a special appearance. A defendant generally had to designate the appearance “special” and limit argument to raising the jurisdictional defense. If the party did anything else, such as argue the merits in any way, defendant would be deemed to have made a “general appearance,” constituting a voluntary submission to the court’s jurisdiction and a waiver of any defects in the court’s jurisdiction. In YORK v. STATE OF TEXAS, 137 U.S. 15, 21, 11 S.Ct. 9, 10, 34 L.Ed. 604, 605 (1890), a divided Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment did not bar “legislation simply forbidding the defendant to come into court, and challenge the validity of service upon him in a personal action, without surrendering himself to the jurisdiction of the court.”

Although substantial variation still may be encountered among different systems of state procedure, the general rules regarding objections to personal jurisdiction are illustrated by the federal scheme. The federal system does not use the term “special appearance”; but as discussed in Chapter 8, infra, a defendant who fails to argue a lack of personal jurisdiction early in the litigation may waive the defense and, effectively, consent to the court’s jurisdiction.

235

2.COLLATERAL ATTACK ON PERSONAL JURISDICTION

If a defendant contests a court’s exercise of personal jurisdiction and loses, may jurisdiction again be challenged in a later action to enforce the judgment? Consider BALDWIN v. IOWA STATE TRAVELING MEN’S ASS’N, 283 U.S. 522, 51 S.Ct. 517, 75 L.Ed. 1244 (1931), in which respondent attempted to attack a judgment rendered against it in a Missouri federal court. The company had made a special appearance in the prior suit and had moved to set aside service and dismiss the case for a lack of personal jurisdiction. In rejecting respondent’s attempt to attack the first judgment collaterally, the Supreme Court stated:

Public policy dictates that there be an end of litigation; that those who have contested an issue shall be bound by the result of the contest; and that matters once tried shall be considered forever settled as between parties. We see no reason why this doctrine should not apply in every case where one voluntarily appears, presents his case and is fully heard, and why he should not, in the absence of fraud, be thereafter concluded by the judgment of the tribunal to which he has submitted his cause.

Id. at 525–26, 51 S.Ct. at 518, 75 L.Ed. at 1247.

The Baldwin opinion repeats the established rule that a defendant who makes no appearance whatsoever remains free to challenge collaterally a default judgment for want of personal jurisdiction. Recall that in Pennoyer, p. 79, supra, and McGee, p. 102, supra, defendant challenged personal jurisdiction at the enforcement stage. The principle that a court has power to determine its own personal jurisdiction is limited to defendants who submit the question for resolution in that court. Would it be unthinkable to require a defendant to raise the jurisdictional objection in the initial forum or lose the opportunity to contest personal jurisdiction?

3.THE LIMITED-APPEARANCE PROBLEM

A “limited appearance” allows a defendant in an action commenced on a quasi in rem basis to appear for the limited purpose of defending the party’s interest in the attached property without submitting to the full in personam jurisdiction of the court. See, e.g., Dry Clime Lamp Corp. v. Edwards, 389 F.2d 590 (5th Cir. 1968); Harvard Trust Co. v. Bray, 138 Vt. 199, 413 A.2d 1213 (1980). Without provision for a limited appearance, a defendant must choose between appearing, and thereby risking the possibility of an in personam judgment in excess of the value of the attached property, or not appearing, and thereby, as a practical matter, suffering the forfeiture of the attached property. See Developments in the Law—State-Court Jurisdiction, 73 Harv.L.Rev. 911, 954 (1960). Does the limited appearance have a constitutional basis after Shaffer, p. 210, supra?

Note that the federal rules do not expressly allow for a limited appearance in cases where jurisdiction is based on the attachment of property under Rule 4(n). See p. 234, Note 5, supra.

^aAlteration in original.

² This subsection provides:

“A court may exercise personal jurisdiction over a person, who acts directly or by an agent, as to a cause of action or claim for relief arising from the person’s * * * causing tortious injury in this state by an act or omission outside this state if he regularly does or solicits business or engages in any other persistent course of conduct, or derives substantial revenue from goods used or consumed or services rendered, in this state * * *.” * * *

⁵¹⁵ In some cases, the inquiry will resemble the inquiry commonly undertaken in determining which State’s law to apply. That it is fair to apply a State’s law to a nonresident defendant is clearly relevant in determining whether it is fair to subject the defendant to jurisdiction in that State. * * *

^bAlteration in original.

^cAlteration in original.

²McIntyre America filed for bankruptcy in 2001, is no longer operating, and has not participated in this lawsuit. * * * After “the demise of . . . McIntyre America,” McIntyre UK authorized a Texas-based company to serve as exclusive United States distributor of McIntyre UK shears. * * *

³ McIntyre UK resisted Nicastro’s efforts to determine whether other McIntyre machines had been sold to New Jersey customers. * * * McIntyre did allow that McIntyre America “may have resold products it purchased from [McIntyre UK] to a buyer in New Jersey,” * * * but said it kept no record of the ultimate destination of machines it shipped to its distributor * * *. A private investigator engaged by Nicastro found at least one McIntyre UK machine, of unspecified type, in use in New Jersey. * * * But McIntyre UK objected that the investigator’s report was “unsworn and based upon hearsay.” * * * Moreover, McIntyre UK maintained, no evidence showed that the machine the investigator found in New Jersey had been “sold into [that State].” * * *

⁵* * * The plurality’s notion that jurisdiction over foreign corporations depends upon the defendant’s “submission,” * * * seems scarcely different from the long-discredited fiction of implied consent. It bears emphasis that a majority of this Court’s members do not share the plurality’s view.

⁶Last year, the United States imported nearly $2 trillion in foreign goods. * * * Capital goods, such as the metal shear machine that injured Nicastro, accounted for almost $450 billion in imports for 2010. * * * New Jersey is the fourth-largest destination for manufactured commodities imported into the United States, after California, Texas, and New York. * * *

⁹ The plurality objects to a jurisdictional approach “divorced from traditional practice.” * * * But “the fundamental transformation of our national economy,” this Court has recognized, warrants enlargement of “the permissible scope of state jurisdiction over foreign corporations and other nonresidents.” McGee * * * [p. 102, supra].

¹¹ Historically, “tort cases were governed by the place where the last act giving rise to a claim occurred—that is, the place of injury.” * * * Even as many jurisdictions have modified the traditional rule of lex loci delicti, the location of injury continues to hold sway in choice-of-law analysis in tort cases. * * *

¹² The plurality suggests that the Due Process Clause might permit a federal district court in New Jersey, sitting in diversity and applying New Jersey law, to adjudicate McIntyre UK’s liability to Nicastro. * * * In other words, McIntyre UK might be compelled to bear the burden of traveling to New Jersey and defending itself there under New Jersey’s products liability law, but would be entitled to federal adjudication of Nicastro’s state-law claim. I see no basis in the Due Process Clause for such a curious limitation.

¹⁵ The plurality notes the low volume of sales in New Jersey * * *. A $24,900 shearing machine, however, is unlikely to sell in bulk worldwide, much less in any given State. By dollar value, the price of a single machine represents a significant sale. Had a manufacturer sold in New Jersey $24,900 worth of flannel shirts, see Nelson v. Park Industries, Inc., 717 F.2d 1120 (C.A.7 1983), cigarette lighters, see Oswalt v. Scripto, Inc., 616 F.2d 191 (C.A.5 1980), or wire-rope splices, see Hedrick v. Daiko Shoji Co., 715 F.2d 1355 (C.A.9 1983), the Court would presumably find the defendant amenable to suit in that State.

¹⁸ Assigning weight to the local or international stage on which the parties operate would, to a considerable extent, answer the concerns expressed by Justice Breyer. * * *

^d

Alteration in original.

¹ Respondents portray Goodyear USA’s structure as a reprehensible effort to “outsource” all manufacturing, and correspondingly, tort litigation, to foreign jurisdictions. * * * Yet Turkey, where the tire alleged to have caused the accident-in-suit was made, is hardly a strange location for a facility that primarily supplies markets in Europe and Asia.

² Such markings do not necessarily show that any of the tires were destined for sale in the United States. To facilitate trade, the Solicitor General explained, the United States encourages other countries to “treat compliance with [Department of Transportation] standards, including through use of DOT markings, as evidence that the products are safely manufactured.” Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 32.

³ N.C. Gen.Stat. Ann. § 1–75.4(1)(d) provides for jurisdiction, “whether the claim arises within or without [the] State,” when the defendant “[i]s engaged in substantial activity within this State, whether such activity is wholly interstate, intrastate, or otherwise.” The North Carolina Supreme Court had interpreted the provision as “intended to make available to the North Carolina courts the full jurisdictional powers permissible under federal due process.” Dillon v. Numismatic Funding Corp., 291 N.C. 674, 676, 231 S.E.2d 629, 630 (1977).

⁵ * * [T]he North Carolina Court of Appeals invoked the State’s “well-recognized interest in providing a forum in which its citizens are able to seek redress for injuries that they have sustained.” * * * But “[g]eneral jurisdiction to adjudicate has in [United States] practice never been based on the plaintiff’s relationship to the forum. There is nothing in [our] law comparable to . . . article 14 of the Civil Code of France (1804) under which the French nationality of the plaintiff is a sufficient ground for jurisdiction.” * * * When a defendant’s act outside the forum causes injury in the forum, by contrast, a plaintiff’s residence in the forum may strengthen the case for the exercise of specific jurisdiction. * * *

¹ All alterations that appear in the Ford opinions are in the original, except for the lettered footnote, omissions that are indicated with asterisks, and bracketed cross-references to pages in this casebook.

² One of the concurrences here expresses a worry that our International Shoe-based body of law is not “well suited for the way in which business is now conducted,” and tentatively suggests a 21st-century rethinking. * * * (ALITO, J., concurring in judgment). Fair enough perhaps, * * * but the concurrence then acknowledges that these cases have no distinctively modern features, and it decides them on grounds that (as it agrees) are much the same as ours. * * * The other concurrence proposes instead a return to the mid-19th century—a replacement of our current doctrine with the Fourteenth Amendment’s original meaning respecting personal jurisdiction. * * * (GORSUCH, J., concurring in judgment). But that opinion never reveals just what the Due Process Clause as understood at its ratification required, and its ground for deciding these cases is correspondingly spare. * * * This opinion, by contrast, resolves these cases by proceeding as the Court has done for the last 75 years—applying the standards set out in International Shoe and its progeny, with attention to their underlying values of ensuring fairness and protecting interstate federalism.

³ In thus reiterating this Court’s longstanding approach, we reject Justice GORSUCH’s apparent (if oblique) view that a state court should have jurisdiction over a nationwide corporation like Ford on any claim, no matter how unrelated to the State or Ford’s activities there. * * * On that view, for example, a California court could hear a claim against Ford brought by an Ohio plaintiff based on an accident occurring in Ohio involving a car purchased in Ohio. Removing the need for any connection between the case and forum State would transfigure our specific jurisdiction standard as applied to corporations. “Case-linked” jurisdiction * * * would then become not case-linked at all.

⁴ None of this is to say that any person using any means to sell any good in a State is subject to jurisdiction there if the product malfunctions after arrival. We have long treated isolated or sporadic transactions differently from continuous ones. See, e.g., World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson [p. 114, supra]. And we do not here consider internet transactions, which may raise doctrinal questions of their own. See Walden v. Fiore [p. 159, supra] (“[T]his case does not present the very different questions whether and how a defendant’s virtual ‘presence’ and conduct translate into ‘contacts’ with a particular State”). So consider, for example, a hypothetical offered at oral argument. “[A] retired guy in a small town” in Maine “carves decoys” and uses “a site on the Internet” to sell them. * * * “Can he be sued in any state if some harm arises from the decoy?” * * * The differences between that case and the ones before us virtually list themselves. (Just consider all our descriptions of Ford’s activities outside its home bases.) So we agree with the plaintiffs’ counsel that resolving these cases does not also resolve the hypothetical. * * *

⁵ It should, for example, make no difference if a plaintiff had recently moved to the forum State with his car, and had not made his purchasing decision with that move in mind—so had not considered any of Ford’s activities in his new home State.

¹ The majority says personal jurisdiction should not turn on a plaintiff’s ability to “allege” or “establish” his or her reasons for doing business with the defendant. * * * But the implicit assumption here—that the plaintiff bears the burden of proving personal jurisdiction—is often mistaken. Perhaps because a lack of personal jurisdiction is a waivable affirmative defense, some States place the burden of proving the defense on the defendant. Even in places where the plaintiff bears the burden, I fail to see why it would be so terrible (or burdensome) to require an individual to plead and prove his or her reasons for purchase. Frequently, doing so may be simple—far simpler than showing how the defendant’s connections with the jurisdiction satisfy a new and amorphous “affiliation” test.

² Some disagree that due process requires even this much. Recent scholarship, for example, contends Pennoyer’s territorial account of sovereign power is mostly right, but the rules it embodies are not “fixed in constitutional amber”—that is, Congress might be able to change them. Sachs, Pennoyer Was Right, 95 Texas L. Rev. 1249, 1255 (2017). Others suggest that fights over personal jurisdiction would be more sensibly waged under the Full Faith and Credit Clause. Jackson, Full Faith and Credit—The Lawyer’s Clause of the Constitution, 45 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 3 (1945). Whether these theories are right or wrong, they at least seek to answer the right question—what the Constitution as originally understood requires, not what nine judges consider “fair” and “just.”

³ As discussed p. 223, infra, the Court’s fractured decision in Burnham upheld the traditional practice, recognized in Pennoyer, permitting personal jurisdiction over an individual defendant who is served with process while present in the forum state—regardless of whether the substance of the lawsuit has any connection to defendant’s presence there.

⁴ Since Burnham, some courts have sought to revive the tag rule for artificial entities while others argue that doing so would be inconsistent with International Shoe. * * *

⁵ The majority worries that the thoughts expressed here threaten to “transfigure our specific jurisdiction standard as applied to corporations” and “return [us] to the mid-19th century.” * * * But it has become a tired trope to criticize any reference to the Constitution’s original meaning as (somehow) both radical and antiquated. Seeking to understand the Constitution’s original meaning is part of our job. What’s the majority’s real worry anyway—that corporations might lose special protections? The Constitution has always allowed suits against individuals on any issue in any State where they set foot. * * * Yet the majority seems to recoil at even entertaining the possibility the Constitution might tolerate similar results for “nationwide corporation[s],” whose “business is everywhere.” * * *

¹ Greyhound Lines, Inc., is incorporated in California and has its principal place of business in Phoenix, Ariz.

²¹² Under Delaware law, defendants whose property has been sequestered must enter a general appearance, thus subjecting themselves to in personam liability, before they can defend on the merits. * * *

²³⁷ This case does not raise, and we therefore do not consider, the question whether the presence of a defendant’s property in a State is a sufficient basis for jurisdiction when no other forum is available to the plaintiff.

⁹⁴⁰ Appellants argue that our determination that the minimum contacts standard of International Shoe governs jurisdiction here makes unnecessary any consideration of the existence of such contacts. * * * They point out that they were never personally served with a summons, that Delaware has no long-arm statute which would authorize such service, and that the Delaware Supreme Court has authoritatively held that the existence of contacts is irrelevant to jurisdiction under Del.Code Ann., Tit. 10, § 366 (1975). As part of its sequestration order, however, the Court of Chancery directed its clerk to send each appellant a copy of the summons and complaint by certified mail. The record indicates that those mailings were made and contains return receipts from at least 19 of the appellants. None of the appellants has suggested that he did not actually receive the summons which was directed to him in compliance with a Delaware statute designed to provide jurisdiction over non-residents. In these circumstances, we will assume that the procedures followed would be sufficient to bring appellants before the Delaware courts, if minimum contacts existed.

¹ Indeed, the Court’s decision to proceed to the minimum-contacts issue treats Delaware’s sequestration statute as if it were the equivalent of Rhode Island’s long-arm law, which specifically authorizes its courts to assume jurisdiction to the limit permitted by the Constitution, R.I.Gen.Laws Ann. § 9–5–33 (1970), thereby necessitating judicial consideration of the frontiers of minimum contacts in every case arising under that statute.

* Perhaps the adage about hard cases making bad law should be revised to cover easy cases.

CHAPTER 3

PROVIDING NOTICE AND AN OPPORTUNITY TO BE HEARD

This chapter examines two additional constitutional requirements for a judgment to be valid. The first requirement is that the parties receive adequate notice of the commencement of the action and the issues involved in it. This chapter addresses adequate notice in terms of both constitutional due process and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The second requirement is that the parties have an adequate opportunity at an appropriate time to present their sides of the dispute. Both conditions are essential components of “due process of law,” a concept that traces back to the Magna Carta: “No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseized, or outlawed, or banished, or in anywise destroyed; nor will the king pass upon him, or commit him to prison, save by the lawful judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.” Magna Carta (1297), 25 Edw. 1, c 29; see Russel, Due Process of Law, 14 Yale L.J. 322, 325–26 (1905). Due process is a bedrock constitutional principle, set out in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution, but courts often disagree about how to put the concept into practice.

A. THE REQUIREMENT OF REASONABLE NOTICE

MULLANE V. CENTRAL HANOVER BANK & TRUST CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1950.
339 U.S. 306, 70 S.Ct. 652, 94 L.Ed. 865.

Appeal from the Court of Appeals of New York.

JUSTICE JACKSON delivered the opinion of the Court.

This controversy questions the constitutional sufficiency of notice to beneficiaries on judicial settlement of accounts by the trustee of a common trust fund established under the New York Banking Law * * *. The New York Court of Appeals considered and overruled objections that the statutory notice contravenes requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment * * *. The case is here on appeal * * *.

Common trust fund legislation is addressed to a problem appropriate for state action. Mounting overheads have made administration of small trusts undesirable to corporate trustees. In order that donors and testators of moderately sized trusts may not be denied the service of corporate fiduciaries, the District of Columbia and some thirty states other than New York have permitted pooling small trust estates into one fund for investment administration. The income, capital gains, losses and expenses of the collective trust are shared by the constituent trusts in proportion to their contribution. By this plan, diversification of risk and economy of management can be extended to those whose capital standing alone would not obtain such advantage.

238

Statutory authorization for the establishment of such common trust funds is provided in the New York Banking Law, § 100–c * * *. Under this Act a trust company may, with approval of the State Banking Board, establish a common fund and, within prescribed limits, invest therein the assets of an unlimited number of estates, trusts or other funds of which it is trustee. Each participating trust shares ratably in the common fund, but exclusive management and control is in the trust company as trustee, and neither a fiduciary nor any beneficiary of a participating trust is deemed to have ownership in any particular asset or investment of this common fund. The trust company must keep fund assets separate from its own, and in its fiduciary capacity may not deal with itself or any affiliate. Provisions are made for accountings twelve to fifteen months after the establishment of a fund and triennially thereafter. The decree in each such judicial settlement of accounts is made binding and conclusive as to any matter set forth in the account upon everyone having any interest in the common fund or in any participating estate, trust or fund.

In January, 1946, Central Hanover Bank and Trust Company established a common trust fund in accordance with these provisions, and in March, 1947, it petitioned the Surrogate’s Court for settlement of its first account as common trustee. During the accounting period a total of 113 trusts, approximately half inter vivos and half testamentary, participated in the common trust fund, the gross capital of which was nearly three million dollars. The record does not show the number or residence of the beneficiaries, but they were many and it is clear that some of them were not residents of the State of New York.

The only notice given beneficiaries of this specific application [for judicial settlement of the account] was by publication in a local newspaper [for four successive weeks] in strict compliance with the minimum requirements of N.Y. Banking Law § 100–c(12) * * *. Thus the only notice required, and the only one given, was by newspaper publication setting forth merely the name and address of the trust company, the name and the date of establishment of the common trust fund, and a list of all participating estates, trusts or funds.

At the time the first investment in the common fund was made on behalf of each participating estate, however, the trust company, to the requirements of § 100–c(9), had notified by mail each person of full age and sound mind whose name and address was then known to it and who was “entitled to share in the income therefrom * * * [or] * * * who would be entitled to share in the principal if the event upon which such estate, trust or fund will become distributable should have occurred at the time of sending such notice.” Included in the notice was a copy of those provisions of the Act relating to the sending of the notice itself and to the judicial settlement of common trust fund accounts.

pursuant

239

Upon the filing of the petition for the settlement of accounts, appellant was, by order of the court pursuant to § 100–c(12), appointed special guardian and attorney for all persons known or unknown not otherwise appearing who had or might thereafter have any interest in the income of the common trust fund; and appellee Vaughan was appointed to represent those similarly interested in the principal. There were no other appearances on behalf of anyone interested in either interest or principal.

Appellant appeared specially, objecting that notice and the statutory provisions for notice to beneficiaries were inadequate to afford due process under the Fourteenth Amendment, and therefore that the court was without jurisdiction to render a final and binding decree. Appellant’s objections were entertained and overruled [by] the Surrogate * * *. A final decree accepting the accounts has been entered, affirmed by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court * * * and by the Court of Appeals of the State of New York * * *.

The effect of this decree, as held below, is to settle “all questions respecting the management of the common fund.” We understand that every right which beneficiaries would otherwise have against the trust company, either as trustee of the common fund or as trustee of any individual trust, for improper management of the common trust fund during the period covered by the accounting is sealed and wholly terminated by the decree. * * *

We are met at the outset with a challenge to the power of the State—the right of its courts to adjudicate at all as against those beneficiaries who reside without the State of New York. It is contended that the proceeding is one in personam in that the decree affects neither title to nor possession of any res, but adjudges only personal rights of the beneficiaries to surcharge their trustee for negligence or breach of trust. Accordingly, it is said, under the strict doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff * * * [p. 79, supra] the Surrogate is without jurisdiction as to nonresidents upon whom personal service of process was not made.

Distinctions between actions in rem and those in personam are ancient and originally expressed in procedural terms what seems really to have been a distinction in the substantive law of property under a system quite unlike our own. * * * The legal recognition and rise in economic importance of incorporeal or intangible forms of property have upset the ancient simplicity of property law and the clarity of its distinctions, while new forms of proceedings have confused the old procedural classification. American courts have sometimes classed certain actions as in rem because personal service of process was not required, and at other times have held personal service of process not required because the action was in rem. * * *

240

Judicial proceedings to settle fiduciary accounts have been sometimes termed in rem, or more indefinitely quasi in rem, or more vaguely still, “in the nature of a proceeding in rem.” It is not readily apparent how the courts of New York did or would classify the present proceeding, which has some characteristics and is wanting in some features of proceedings both in rem and in personam. But in any event we think that the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution do not depend upon a classification for which the standards are so elusive and confused generally and which, being primarily for state courts to define, may and do vary from state to state. Without disparaging the usefulness of distinctions between actions in rem and those in personam in many branches of law, or on other issues, or the reasoning which underlies them, we do not rest the power of the State to resort to constructive service in this proceeding upon how its courts or this Court may regard this historic antithesis. It is sufficient to observe that, whatever the technical definition of its chosen procedure, the interest of each state in providing means to close trusts that exist by the grace of its laws and are administered under the supervision of its courts is so insistent and rooted in custom as to establish beyond doubt the right of its courts to determine the interests of all claimants, resident or nonresident, provided its procedure accords full opportunity to appear and be heard.

Quite different from the question of a state’s power to discharge trustees is that of the opportunity it must give beneficiaries to contest. Many controversies have raged about the cryptic and abstract words of the Due Process Clause but there can be no doubt that at a minimum they require that deprivation of life, liberty or property by adjudication be preceded by notice and opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case.

In two ways this proceeding does or may deprive beneficiaries of property. It may cut off their rights to have the trustee answer for negligent or illegal impairments of their interests. Also, their interests are presumably subject to diminution in the proceeding by allowance of fees and expenses to one who, in their names but without their knowledge, may conduct a fruitless or uncompensatory contest. Certainly the proceeding is one in which they may be deprived of property rights and hence notice and hearing must measure up to the standards of due process.

241

Personal service of written notice within the jurisdiction is the classic form of notice always adequate in any type of proceeding. But the vital interest of the State in bringing any issues as to its fiduciaries to a final settlement can be served only if interests or claims of individuals who are outside of the State can somehow be determined. A construction of the Due Process Clause which would place impossible or impractical obstacles in the way could not be justified.

Against this interest of the State we must balance the individual interest sought to be protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. This is defined by our holding that "The fundamental requisite of due process of law is the opportunity to be heard." Grannis v. Ordean, 234 U.S. 385, 394, 34 S.Ct. 779, 783, 58 L.Ed. 1363 [(1914)]. This right to be heard has little reality or worth unless one is informed that the matter is pending and can choose for himself whether to appear or default, acquiesce or contest.

The Court has not committed itself to any formula achieving a balance between these interests in a particular proceeding or determining when constructive notice may be utilized or what test it must meet. Personal service has not in all circumstances been regarded as indispensable to the process due to residents, and it has more often been held unnecessary as to nonresidents. * * *

An elementary and fundamental requirement of due process in any proceeding which is to be accorded finality is notice reasonably calculated, under all the circumstances, to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action and afford them an opportunity to present their objections. * * * The notice must be of such nature as reasonably to convey the required information * * * and it must afford a reasonable time for those interested to make their appearance * * *. But if with due regard for the practicalities and peculiarities of the case these conditions are reasonably met the constitutional requirements are satisfied. * * *

But when notice is a person's due, process which is a mere gesture is not due process. The means employed must be such as one desirous of actually informing the absentee might reasonably adopt to accomplish it. The reasonableness and hence the constitutional validity of any chosen method may be defended on the ground that it is in itself reasonably certain to inform those affected * * *, or, where conditions do not reasonably permit such notice, that the form chosen is not substantially less likely to bring home notice than other of the feasible and customary substitutes.

It would be idle to pretend that publication alone, as prescribed here, is a reliable means of acquainting interested parties of the fact that their rights are before the courts. It is not an accident that the greater number of cases reaching this Court on the question of adequacy of notice have been concerned with actions founded on process constructively served through local newspapers. Chance alone brings to the attention of even a local resident an advertisement in small type inserted in the back pages of a newspaper, and if he makes his home outside the area of the newspaper's normal circulation the odds that the information will never reach him are large indeed. The chance of actual notice is further reduced when as here the notice required does not even name those whose attention it is supposed to attract, and does not inform acquaintances who might call it to attention. In weighing its sufficiency on the basis of equivalence with actual notice we are unable to regard this as more than a feint.

Nor is publication here reinforced by steps likely to attract the parties' attention to the proceeding. It is true that publication traditionally has been acceptable as notification supplemental to other action which in itself may reasonably be expected to convey a warning. The ways of an owner with tangible property are such that he usually arranges means to learn of any direct attack upon his possessory or proprietary rights. Hence, libel of a ship, attachment of a chattel or entry upon real estate in the name of law may reasonably be expected to come promptly to the owner's attention. When the state within which the owner has located such property seizes it for some reason, publication or posting affords an additional measure of notification. A state may indulge the assumption that one who has left tangible property in the state either has abandoned it, in which case proceedings against it deprive him of nothing * * *, or that he has left some caretaker under a duty to let him know that it is being jeopardized. * * * As phrased long ago by Chief Justice Marshall in The Mary, 9 Cranch 126, 144, 3 L.Ed. 678 [(1815)]: 'It is the part of common prudence for all those who have any interest in [a thing], to guard that interest by persons who are in a situation to protect it.'

In the case before us there is, of course, no abandonment. On the other hand these beneficiaries do have a resident fiduciary as caretaker of their interest in this property. But it is their caretaker who in the accounting becomes their adversary. Their trustee is released from giving notice of jeopardy, and no one else is expected to do so. Not even the special guardian is required or apparently expected to communicate with his ward and client, and, of course, if such a duty were merely transferred from the trustee to the guardian, economy would not be served and more likely the cost would be increased.

This Court has not hesitated to approve of resort to publication as a customary substitute in another class of cases where it is not reasonably possible or practicable to give more adequate warning. Thus it has been recognized that, in the case of persons missing or unknown, employment of an indirect and even a probably futile means of notification is all that the situation permits and creates no constitutional bar to a final decree foreclosing their rights. * * *

Those beneficiaries represented by appellant whose interests or whereabouts could not with due diligence be ascertained come clearly within this category. As to them the statutory notice is sufficient. However great the odds that publication will never reach the eyes of such unknown parties, it is not in the typical case much more likely to fail than any of the choices open to legislators endeavoring to prescribe the best notice practicable.

Nor do we consider it unreasonable for the State to dispense with more certain notice to those beneficiaries whose interests are either conjectural or future or, although they could be discovered upon investigation, do not in due course of business come to knowledge of the common trustee. Whatever searches might be required in another situation under ordinary standards of diligence, in view of the character of the proceedings and the nature of the interests here involved we think them unnecessary. We recognize the practical difficulties and costs that would be attendant on frequent investigations into the status of great numbers of beneficiaries, many of whose interests in the common fund are so remote as to be ephemeral; and we have no doubt that such impracticable and extended searches are not required in the name of due process. The expense of keeping informed from day to day of substitutions among even current income beneficiaries and presumptive remaindermen, to say nothing of the far greater number of contingent beneficiaries, would impose a severe burden on the plan, and would likely dissipate its advantages. These are practical matters in which we should be reluctant to disturb the judgment of the state authorities.

Accordingly we overrule appellant’s constitutional objections to published notice insofar as they are urged on behalf of any beneficiaries whose interests or addresses are unknown to the trustee.

As to known present beneficiaries of known place of residence, however, notice by publication stands on a different footing. Exceptions in the name of necessity do not sweep away the rule that within the limits of practicability notice must be such as is reasonably calculated to reach interested parties. Where the names and post office addresses of those affected by a proceeding are at hand, the reasons disappear for resort to means less likely than the mails to apprise them of its pendency.

The trustee has on its books the names and addresses of the income beneficiaries represented by appellant, and we find no tenable ground for dispensing with a serious effort to inform them personally of the accounting, at least by ordinary mail to the record addresses. * * * Certainly sending them a copy of the statute months and perhaps years in advance does not answer this purpose. The trustee periodically remits their income to them, and we think that they might reasonably expect that with or apart from their remittances word might come to them personally that steps were being taken affecting their interests.

244

We need not weigh contentions that a requirement of personal service of citation on even the large number of known resident or nonresident beneficiaries would, by reasons of delay if not of expense, seriously interfere with the proper administration of the fund. Of course personal service even without the jurisdiction of the issuing authority serves the end of actual and personal notice, whatever power of compulsion it might lack. However, no such service is required under the circumstances. This type of trust presupposes a large number of small interests. The individual interest does not stand alone but is identical with that of a class. The rights of each in the integrity of the fund and the fidelity of the trustee are shared by many other beneficiaries. Therefore notice reasonably certain to reach most of those interested in objecting is likely to safeguard the interests of all, since any objections sustained would inure to the benefit of all. We think that under such circumstances reasonable risks that notice might not actually reach every beneficiary are justifiable. * * *

The statutory notice to known beneficiaries is inadequate, not because in fact it fails to reach everyone, but because under the circumstances it is not reasonably calculated to reach those who could easily be informed by other means at hand. However it may have been in former times, the mails today are recognized as an efficient and inexpensive means of communication. Moreover, the fact that the trust company has been able to give mailed notice to known beneficiaries at the time the common trust fund was established is persuasive that postal notification at the time of accounting would not seriously burden the plan.

In some situations the law requires greater precautions in its proceedings than the business world accepts for its own purposes. In few, if any, will it be satisfied with less. Certainly it is instructive, in determining the reasonableness of the impersonal broadcast notification here used, to ask whether it would satisfy a prudent man of business, counting his pennies but finding it in his interest to convey information to many persons whose names and addresses are in his files. We are not satisfied that it would. Publication may theoretically be available for all the world to see, but it is too much in our day to suppose that each or any individual beneficiary does or could examine all that is published to see if something may be tucked away in it that affects his property interests. We have before indicated in reference to notice by publication that, ‘Great caution should be used not to let fiction deny the fair play that can be secured only by a pretty close adhesion to fact.’ McDonald v. Mabee, 243 U.S. 90, 91, 37 S.Ct. 343, 61 L.Ed. 608, L.R.A.1917F, 458.

We hold the notice of judicial settlement of accounts required by the New York Banking Law § 100–c(12) is incompatible with the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment as a basis for adjudication depriving known persons whose whereabouts are also known of substantial property rights. * * *

245

Reversed.

JUSTICE DOUGLAS took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

[The dissenting opinion of JUSTICE BURTON is omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.In McDONALD v. MABEE, 243 U.S. 90, 37 S.Ct. 343, 61 L.Ed. 608 (1917), relied upon by the majority in Mullane, suit was brought against Mabee upon a promissory note. Mabee was a domiciliary of Texas, but had left the state to take up domicile elsewhere; his family continued to reside in Texas. After he had left the state, service was attempted through publication in a local newspaper once a week for four successive weeks. Mabee never appeared in the action, and a judgment was entered against him. The Supreme Court, reversing the Texas Supreme Court, held that the Texas judgment was void under the Fourteenth Amendment: “To dispense with personal service the substitute that is most likely to reach the defendant is the least that ought to be required if substantial justice is to be done.” Id. at 92, 37 S.Ct. at 344, 61 L.Ed. at 609–10. Does Mullane permit use of constructive service only if it is the form “most likely to reach the defendant”?

2. WUCHTER v. PIZZUTTI, 276 U.S. 13, 48 S.Ct. 259, 72 L.Ed. 446 (1928), concerned the constitutionality of a nonresident-motorist statute similar to the one involved in Hess v. Pawloski, p. 91, supra. The statute authorized in-state service on the Secretary of State and did not expressly require that notice of the action be given to the nonresident. A divided Court held that the statute violated due process, even though defendant had actual notice of the action and was served by the secretary:

Every statute of this kind * * * should require the plaintiff bringing the suit to show in the summons to be served the post office address or residence of the defendant being sued, and should impose either on the plaintiff himself or upon the official receiving service or some other, the duty of communication by mail or otherwise with the defendant.

Id. at 20, 48 S.Ct. at 261, 72 L.Ed. at 450. Would the result be the same under Mullane’s balancing test?

3. What role did the “ancient” distinctions of in personam, quasi in rem, and in rem jurisdiction play in Mullane? What is the rationale for allowing the use of constructive notice—attachment of the property plus publication—when the action is in rem?

4. Can the government ever resort to attachment of property followed by publication if it knows the party’s name and address or that information is available from public records? The Supreme Court has considered this question in a number of contexts, often involving property-related disputes. See Schroeder v. City of New York, 371 U.S. 208, 83 S.Ct. 279, 9 L.Ed.2d 255 (1962) (notice of condemnation in two county newspapers in small communities many miles from vacant property, together with posting on trees near the property, did not satisfy due process when plaintiff’s name and address were ascertainable from deed records and tax rolls); Walker v. City of Hutchinson, 352 U.S. 112, 77 S.Ct. 200, 1 L.Ed.2d 178 (1956) (notice of condemnation in local newspaper did not satisfy due process when plaintiff was a state resident and his name was known from official records).

In MENNONITE BOARD OF MISSIONS v. ADAMS, 462 U.S. 791, 103 S.Ct. 2706, 77 L.Ed.2d 180 (1983), a mortgagee challenged the state’s use of publication and posting to give notice of a pending tax sale. A divided Court found that the procedure violated due process:

Since a mortgagee clearly has a legally protected property interest, he is entitled to notice reasonably calculated to apprise him of a pending tax sale. * * * When the mortgagee is identified in a mortgage that is publicly recorded, constructive notice by publication must be supplemented by notice mailed to the mortgagee’s last known available address, or by personal service. But unless the mortgagee is not reasonably identifiable, constructive notice alone does not satisfy the mandate of Mullane.

Id. at 798, 103 S.Ct. at 2711, 77 L.Ed.2d at 187. The Court underscored, “Notice by mail or other means as certain to ensure actual notice is a minimum constitutional precondition to a proceeding which will adversely affect the liberty or property interests of any party, whether lettered or well versed in commercial practice, if its name and address are reasonably ascertainable.” Id. at 800, 103 S.Ct. at 2712, 77 L.Ed.2d at 188. Justice O’Connor, joined by Justice Powell and Justice Rehnquist, dissented. In the dissent’s view, the majority improperly had imposed a bright-line rule—at odds with Mullane’s balancing approach—requiring notice “by means certain to ensure actual notice as long as the party’s identity and location are ‘reasonably ascertainable.’ ” Id. at 800–01, 103 S.Ct. at 2712, 77 L.Ed.2d at 189.

Five years after Mennonite, a divided Court extended its holding in TULSA PROFESSIONAL COLLECTION SERVICES, INC. v. POPE, 485 U.S. 478, 108 S.Ct. 1340, 99 L.Ed.2d 565 (1988), but this time Justice O’Connor wrote for the majority. The case involved a provision in Oklahoma’s probate code—known as a nonclaim statute—that barred creditors’ claims against an estate if not filed within two months of publication of notice that probate proceedings had commenced. Claimant was an unsecured creditor for an unpaid hospital bill of the decedent. Relying on Mennonite, the Court held that because the claimant’s name and address were “ ‘reasonably ascertainable’ ” and the probate action would trigger a time bar that could “ ‘adversely affect’ a protected property interest,” due process required actual notice and that providing such notice would not “unduly hinder” the probate proceeding.

However, as in Mullane, the Court stated that it would be “reasonable to dispense with actual notice to those with mere ‘conjectural’ claims.” Id. at 490–91, 108 S.Ct. at 1347–48, 99 L.Ed.2d at 578–79.

5. In GREENE v. LINDSEY, 456 U.S. 444, 102 S.Ct. 1874, 72 L.Ed.2d 249 (1982), a divided Court invalidated the use of constructive notice—this time, the posting of eviction notices on the doors of apartments in public housing. The tenants claimed never to have seen the notices, and to have first learned of their eviction when served with writs of possession after default judgments had been entered against them. A divided Court held that in the circumstances of this case, the Due Process Clause required service by mail:

As the process servers were well aware, notices posted on apartment doors in the area where these tenants lived were “not infrequently” removed by children or other tenants before they could have their intended effect. Under these conditions, notice by posting on the apartment door cannot be considered a “reliable means of acquainting interested parties of the fact that their rights are before the courts.”

Id. at 453–54, 102 S.Ct. at 1879–80, 72 L.Ed.2d at 257–58. Justice O’Connor, joined by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist, dissented. The dissent questioned whether mail notice was so far superior to posting as to be constitutionally required, adding that “unattended mailboxes are subject to plunder by thieves.” Id. at 459–60, 102 S.Ct. at 1883, 72 L.Ed.2d at 261. Does the Mullane balancing test consider only the reliability of the notice provided, or does it also consider the private interest involved? Is the tenant’s interest that of continued occupancy of an apartment? Might it also include a dignity interest in not having the household’s financial troubles exposed to other tenants through the public posting of an eviction notice? See Weinberg, The Right to be Taken Seriously, 67 U.Miami L.Rev. 149 (2012).

6.The Court again considered the constitutionality of constructive notice in DUSENBERY v. UNITED STATES, 534 U.S. 161, 122 S.Ct. 694, 151 L.Ed.2d 597 (2002), but this time held that personal notice was not required even though the recipient’s name and address were known to the government. The case involved the notice given to a prisoner prior to the forfeiture of property under the Controlled Substances Act, 21 U.S.C. § 801—about $30,000 and a car registered in the name of the prisoner’s step-mother. Dusenbery, the petitioner, moved for return of the seized property, alleging he had not received notice prior to the forfeiture. According to the government, the FBI had published notice in a newspaper and mailed certified letters addressed to petitioner in care of the federal prison where he was incarcerated, to his residence at the time of arrest, and to an address where his step-mother lived. A divided Court held that the notice met Mullane’s reasonableness standard:

* * * The Government here carried its burden of showing the following procedures had been used to give notice. The FBI sent certified mail addressed to petitioner at the correctional facility where he was incarcerated. At that facility, prison mailroom staff traveled to the city post office every day to obtain all the mail for the institution, including inmate mail. * * * The staff signed for all certified mail before leaving the post office. Once the mail was transported back to the facility, certified mail was entered in a logbook maintained in the mailroom. * * * A member of the inmate’s Unit Team then signed for the certified mail to acknowledge its receipt before removing it from the mailroom, and either a Unit Team member or another staff member distributed the mail to the inmate during the institution’s “mail call.” * * *

248

Petitioner does not seriously contest the FBI’s use of the postal service to send its certified letter to him, a method our cases have recognized as adequate for known addressees when we have found notice by publication insufficient. * * * Instead, he argues that the notice was insufficient because due process generally requires “actual notice” to interested parties prior to forfeiture, which he takes to mean actual receipt of notice. * * * [Mennonite, upon which he relies,] is at best inconclusive dicta for the view petitioner espouses.

We note that none of our cases cited by either party has required actual notice in proceedings such as this. * * *

Petitioner argues that * * * the FBI could have made arrangements with the [Bureau of Prisons] to assure the delivery of the notice in question to him. * * * But it is hard to see why such a principle would not also apply, for example, to members of the Armed Forces both in this country and overseas. Undoubtedly the Government could make a special effort in any case (just as it did in the movie “Saving Private Ryan”) to assure that a particular piece of mail reaches a particular individual who is in one way or another in the custody of the Government. It could, for example, have allowed petitioner to make an escorted visit to the post office himself in order to sign for his letter. But the Due Process Clause does not require such heroic efforts by the Government * * *.

Id. at 168–70, 122 S.Ct. at 700–01, 151 L.Ed.2d at 605–07. A dissent, authored by Justice Ginsburg and joined by Justices Stevens, Souter, and Breyer, argued that the notice provided was “substantially less likely” to give notice than a “feasible alternative.” Id. at 173–75, 122 S.Ct. at 702–03, 151 L.Ed.2d at 608–09. Is it significant that no Justice found the lack of actual notice constitutionally deficient?

7.In JONES v. FLOWERS, 547 U.S. 220, 126 S.Ct. 1708, 164 L.Ed.2d 415 (2006), a divided Court held that when a mailed notice of a tax sale is returned unclaimed by the owner-taxpayer, due process requires the state to take “reasonable additional steps” to attempt to notify the property owner, “if it is practicable to do so.” Id. at 225, 126 S.Ct. at 1713, 164 L.Ed.2d at 425. Chief Justice Roberts explained:

249

We do not think that a person who actually desired to inform a real property owner of an impending tax sale of a house he owns would do nothing when a certified letter sent to the owner is returned unclaimed. If the Commissioner prepared a stack of letters to mail to delinquent taxpayers, handed them to the postman, and then watched as the departing postman accidentally dropped the letters down a storm drain, one would certainly expect the Commissioner’s office to prepare a new stack of letters and send them again. No one “desirous of actually informing” the owners would simply shrug his shoulders as the letters disappeared and say “I tried.” Failure to follow up would be unreasonable, despite the fact that the letters were reasonably calculated to reach their intended recipients when delivered to the postman.

Id. at 229, 126 S.Ct. at 1716, 164 L.Ed.2d at 427–28. In the circumstances of this case, the Court identified a number of “reasonable additional steps” that the government could have taken once it knew that the notice had been returned unclaimed:

The return of the certified letter marked “unclaimed” meant either that Jones still lived at 717 North Bryan Street, but was not home when the postman called and did not retrieve the letter at the post office, or that Jones no longer resided at that address. One reasonable step primarily addressed to the former possibility would be for the State to resend the notice by regular mail, so that a signature was not required. The Commissioner says that use of certified mail makes actual notice more likely, because requiring the recipient’s signature protects against misdelivery. But that is only true, of course, when someone is home to sign for the letter, or to inform the mail carrier that he has arrived at the wrong address. * * * [T]he use of certified mail might make actual notice less likely in some cases—the letter cannot be left like regular mail to be examined at the end of the day, and it can only be retrieved from the post office for a specified period of time. * * * Even occupants who ignored certified mail notice slips addressed to the owner (if any had been left) might scrawl the owner’s new address on the notice packet and leave it for the postman to retrieve, or notify Jones directly.

Other reasonable followup measures * * * would have been to post notice on the front door, or to address otherwise undeliverable mail to “occupant.”

Id. at 234–35, 126 S.Ct. at 1718–19, 164 L.Ed.2d at 431. Significantly, the Court found that the government would not have been required to locate the taxpayer’s new address by searching through the tax rolls or a current phone book, noting that “[a]n open-ended search for a new address—especially when the State obligates the taxpayer to keep his address updated with the tax collector * * *—imposes burdens on the State significantly greater than the several relatively easy options outlined above.” Id. at 236, 126 S.Ct. at 1719, 164 L.Ed.2d at 432.

Justice Thomas dissented, joined by Justices Scalia and Kennedy. The dissent argued that notice by certified mail sent to the taxpayer’s “record address” was constitutionally sufficient. Moreover, in the dissent’s view, the state went further than due process required by publishing additional notice in a local newspaper. Underscoring “the well-established presumption that individuals, especially those owning property, act in their own interest” to guard that interest, the dissent criticized the majority for assessing the government’s method of notice from an ex post, rather than an ex ante perspective:

First, whether a method of notice is reasonably calculated to notify the interested party is determined ex ante, i.e., from the viewpoint of the government agency at the time its notice is sent. * * * [In] Mullane, * * * this Court rested its analysis on the information the sender had “at hand” when its notice was sent. * * * Relatedly, we have refused to evaluate the reasonableness of a particular method of notice by comparing it to alternative methods that are identified after the fact. * * *

Second, implicit in our holding that due process does not require “actual notice,” * * * is that when the “government becomes aware . . . that its attempt at notice has failed,” * * * it is not required to take additional steps to ensure that notice has been received. * * * Under the majority’s logic, each time a doubt is raised with respect to whether notice has reached an interested party, the State will have to consider additional means better calculated to achieve notice. Because this rule turns on speculative, newly acquired information, it has no natural end point, and, in effect, requires the States to achieve something close to actual notice.

Id. at 243–44, 126 S.Ct. at 1723–24, 164 L.Ed.2d at 436–37.

In your view, did Flowers break new ground in requiring the government to send a follow-up notice when practicable, or did it simply apply existing precedent? Under the Mullane balancing test, how would you assess the private interest in avoiding the permanent loss of one’s home? Should it matter that the taxpayer did not actually live in the property?

8.In COVEY v. TOWN OF SOMERS, 351 U.S. 141, 146–47, 76 S.Ct. 724, 727, 100 L.Ed. 1021, 1026 (1956), the Court held that notice by mail of a foreclosure proceeding for delinquent property taxes on real property would not satisfy due process when it was mailed to someone known to have been adjudged insane and committed to a hospital, and who was without the protection of a guardian. Would notice by mail have been sufficient if the town authorities became aware of the taxpayer’s disability only after the initial mailing of the notice?

9.Another requirement of due process is that the recipient of notice must be given adequate time to respond to the threatened adverse action. In ROLLER v. HOLLY, 176 U.S. 398, 20 S.Ct. 410, 44 L.Ed. 520 (1900), defendant was required to defend an action in Texas five days after he received service of process in Virginia. The Supreme Court held that the procedure violated the Due Process Clause. Would seven days be sufficient? Twenty days? How much time is defendant given to respond to a complaint? See Federal Rule 12(a).

10.Due process concerns not only the form and timing of notice, but also the content of the information provided. In AGUCHAK v. MONTGOMERY WARD CO., 520 P.2d 1352 (Alaska 1974), a department store sold a snowmobile and freezer to the Aguchaks, which they took to a remote area where they lived. When the Aguchaks allegedly did not pay, the seller sent a summons to which the Aguchaks did not respond and a default judgment of $988.22 plus costs was entered against them. The summons did not inform the Aguchaks that they could appear by a written pleading, nor did it inform them that they had a right to request a change of venue. Travel to court would have required at least a one night stopover and cost of $186. On appeal, the Supreme Court of Alaska held that the summons in small claims cases had to include this information, and it set aside the default judgment.

11.A cognovit note is a written document that authorizes the entry of judgment against the party signing the note if an obligation is not paid when due. Effectively, the cognovit note waives the party’s right to receive notice before litigation is commenced, bars the assertion of any defenses against the maker of the note, and forecloses any appeal from the judgment that is entered. In D.H. OVERMYER CO. v. FRICK, 405 U.S. 174, 92 S.Ct. 775, 31 L.Ed.2d 124 (1972), the Supreme Court held that the enforcement of a cognovit note does not per se violate the Due Process Clause and that its validity must be assessed on a case-by-case basis with regard to such factors as lack of consideration and inequality of bargaining power between the parties.

B. THE MECHANICS OF GIVING NOTICE

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4 and the comparable state statutes set out in the Supplement.

1.INTRODUCTION

Notice of a suit is given by service of process upon the defendant. Service refers to the delivery of the notice; process refers to the document that is delivered. Each jurisdiction has a set of rules governing the correct methods of making service. Federal Rule 4 implements a uniform form of summons to be used by all federal courts. A summons will not issue until a complaint has been filed with the court, and under Federal Rule 3, the filing of the complaint “commences” the action. Under Rule 4(a), what information must a summons contain? Under Rule 4(b), how does plaintiff obtain a summons for service on defendant? Under Rule 4(c), when must a summons be served? Who is permitted to serve a summons?

252

2.SPECIFIC APPLICATIONS OF THE SERVICE PROVISIONS

Federal Rule 4, in several subdivisions, sets forth specific means of making personal service on different entities such as individuals, corporations, partnerships, and other associations subject to suit under a common name. Traditionally, service of process was made by personal delivery of the summons and complaint to the defendant. Other methods of service, however, have assumed greater importance since the advent of long-arm statutes. See p. 101, supra.

a.Federal Rule 4(d): “Waiving Service”

In 1982, the Supreme Court proposed, but Congress rejected, an amendment to the Rules that would have permitted service by registered or certified mail, with delivery restricted to the addressee and a return receipt required. It was asserted that the use of certified mail causes problems when, for example, the signature on the return receipt is illegible or the name signed differs somewhat from that of the defendant, or when it is difficult to determine whether mail has been “refused” or “unclaimed.” It also was argued that the result of relying on the mail for service of process would be the entry of many more unnecessary and unfair default judgments, which would have to be reopened when challenged. Another objection raised the concern that mail carriers might deliver process to the wrong person or fail to make the necessary inquiries to find the proper person. See 128 Cong. Rec. H9848, H9856 (daily ed. Dec. 15, 1982).

In 1983, Congress chose a system of service by mail modeled after the one used in California. See Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 415.30. The summons and complaint could be sent by ordinary first-class mail, together with a form for acknowledging receipt and accepting service. If the acknowledgment form was not returned, plaintiff had to effect service through some other means authorized by the Federal Rules. In order to encourage defendants to execute and return the form, the Rule directed the court to order a defendant who did not cooperate to pay the costs incurred by plaintiff in making personal service, unless defendant could show good cause for failing to return the acknowledgment form.

This system was not always successful because it relied on defendant’s cooperation in returning the acknowledgment form. After a decade of use, Rule 4 was revised again in 1993. The most significant change was that the “service by mail” provision was replaced by Rule 4(d), which strongly encourages waiver of formal service. Under this modification, an action commences when plaintiff sends a form, entitled “Notice of a Lawsuit and Request to Waive Service of Summons,” or a similar document, by mail or some other “reliable” means. Domestic defendants have at least 30 days from the date on which the request was sent to return the waiver; otherwise—unless defendant had good cause for refusing to waive service—it will be charged with the costs associated with providing formal service. How did the amendment change the incentives for waiving service?

253

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.What steps must be taken for waiver of service to be effective?
- 2.What forms of transmittal are permitted in addition to first-class mail? The Advisory Committee Notes to the 1993 amendment specifically approved the use of “electronic means.” Should transmittal by social media satisfy Rule 4(d)? See pp. 266–267, Note 4, infra, discussing service abroad under Rule 4(f)(3).
- 3.What is the time period if the waiver is sent to a defendant outside the United States? See Rule 4(d)(1)(F).
- 4.If a plaintiff is confronting a filing deadline in a state in which the statute of limitations continues to run until a defendant is served, would formal service be the wisest course of action? Why? Would you advise a client in this circumstance to waive service?

b.Federal Rule 4(e): Personal Delivery on Natural Persons

McKelway, Profiles—Place and Leave With, New Yorker, August 24, 1935, at 23–26:
* * * In a little frame house near the intersection of Rogers and Flatbush Avenues in Brooklyn there lived until a few years ago an old lady named Mrs. Katherina Schnible. She was seventy-two and a little lame. She owned the house and rented out the first two floors as apartments, but there were mortgages and she had not met the payments. She knew the bank that held the mortgages was about to foreclose * * *. Her son, who lived with her, went out to work at eight in the morning and did not return until six, so from eight till six every day, except Sunday, Mrs. Schnible stayed in her room on the third floor and refused to open the door, no matter who knocked. Came a day when she heard a heavy footfall on the first landing, heard somebody running frantically up the first flight of stairs, heard a man's voice shouting something. Then the footsteps came closer, up the second flight of stairs, and right outside her door she heard yelled the word "Fire!" Mrs. Schnible opened her door and hobbled hurriedly into the hall. "Hello, Mrs. Schnible," said a man standing there. "Here's a summons for you." He handed her the papers, and the proceedings were begun which eventually put Mrs. Schnible out of her house.

254

Harry Grossman, who was the man in the hall, is regarded by those who employ him as the champion process-server of the day. He is an instrument of justice and his profession is a corner-stone of civil law, but not many of the people he serves appreciate that. * * * Grossman has been cursed by hundreds of defendants, many of them distinguished citizens. Defendants have thrown him down flights of stairs and shoved him off porches. He has been pinched, slapped, punched, and kicked by scores of individuals, and he was beaten up one time by a family of seven.

* * *

"Place and leave with" is the legal phrase for what a process-server must do with a summons when he goes out to serve papers on a defendant, but the courts never have explained precisely what that means. Where the process-server must place the papers is still a nice legal question. A process-server once threw a summons-and-complaint at James Gordon Bennett and hit him in the chest with it, but the courts held that this was not a proper service. Another famous case in the lawbooks tells of a defendant named Martin, who in 1893 hid himself under his wife's petticoats and refused to receive the papers. The process-server saw him crouching there, so he put the papers on what seemed to be the defendant's shoulder, and went away. The Supreme Court rendered a decision which held that "where a person, to avoid service of summons, shelters himself in his wife's petticoats, the laying of the papers on his shoulder will be a sufficient service." * * *

Grossman has never bothered to look up legal precedents for his actions; he simply places the papers in the hands of the defendant and leaves them there. On innumerable occasions he has had to use ingenuity in order to get close enough to the defendant to do this, and only once has he been forced to depart from a literal interpretation of the legal phrase. That was in the case of an elderly lady, who, like Mrs. Schnible, was trying to hide from him. This lady, whose name was Mrs. Mahoney, refused to leave her apartment in the East Side tenement she owned, and Grossman's routine tricks * * * failed to budge her. He knew she was there, because he had wheedled his way into a flat across the court from her and had seen her sitting at her kitchen table in front of an open window, peeling potatoes. Grossman went home to his own apartment in Brooklyn and thought for a while, and then began to practice throwing the summons. He put rubber bands around the paper to make it compact, placed a salad bowl on the dining-room table, and practiced all that afternoon, throwing the subpoena into the bowl from the middle of the living-room. He went back next morning to the flat across the court from Mrs. Mahoney's kitchen. She came into the kitchen a little before noon, puttered around for a while, and then sat down at the table with a bowl of potatoes in front of her and began placidly to peel them. Grossman leaned out of his window and tossed the subpoena. The papers landed in the bowl just as the old lady reached into it. "There you are, Mrs. Mahoney!" Grossman shouted. "There's a foreclosure paper for you!" The courts never questioned his method of placing these papers, and Mrs. Mahoney lost her property.

255

Tens of thousands of papers have to be served in the course of a year in this city, and the majority of them are handled for the law firms by process-serving agencies, which rely for their profits on quantity and a quick turnover. * * * Cases involving expert dodgers or stubborn hug-the-hearths usually are turned over to private detective agencies, and the detective agencies usually hire Grossman to serve the papers. When the Electrical Research Product Institute sued the Fox Film Corporation for $15,000,000 in 1930, the lawyers for the plaintiff, naturally, surmised that it would be difficult to "place and leave with" William Fox, Winfield Sheehan, and other defendants, the papers summoning them to come to court. Grossman received the assignment through a detective agency. He got in to see Fox by having a telegram sent from Boston saying that Mr. Grossman had "closed the theatre deal" and would call on Fox at eleven o'clock the next morning. When Grossman reached Fox's office, the film executive's secretary told him Mr. Fox had received the wire but was not sure what deal it was that had been closed. "My God," said Grossman, "the theatre deal—that's what deal! If this is the way I am to be received, never mind—to hell with it!" He started out, and the secretary called him back. "Just wait one moment," she said. "I'll tell Mr. Fox." She opened a door marked "Private" and went into an inner office. Grossman followed her and handed Fox the subpoena. Fox started up from his desk indignantly, but Grossman's indignation expressed itself first. "You, a multi-millionaire!" Grossman shouted. "Is it decent, is it nice, for a multi-millionaire who can be sued for fifteen million dollars to hide from me? Why don't you take the papers like a man?" This so flabbergasted Fox that he sank back in his chair, and Grossman went through the corporation's offices unimpeded and served papers on Sheehan, two vice-presidents, the secretary, and the treasurer.

Harry established a reputation as an adroit private detective before he was old enough to serve subpoenas. * * * But after he had passed his eighteenth birthday and had begun to serve summonses and subpoenas, it was evident to his employer, and to everybody else who knew him, that he had found a vocation in which he might expect to excel. During his first year he served Maude Adams by posing as a youthful adorer. When she came out of the stage entrance at the Empire Theatre after a performance one evening, Grossman stepped in front of her holding in his left hand a bouquet of jonquils. “Are you Maude Adams?”^a he asked. “Oh, are those really for me?” she exclaimed, reaching for the flowers, “No, but this is,” said Grossman, jerking back the bouquet. With his right hand he served her with a summons. He still remembers that he had paid fifty cents for the jonquils and that he was able to sell them back to the florist for twenty.

His ability to become more indignant at the attitude of defendants than defendants are at his actions has saved Grossman from bodily injury on many occasions. One of his early triumphs involved Gutzon Borglum. The sculptor was at that time modeling life-size figures in a studio in the Gramercy Park section. Grossman entered by means of what he calls the rush act. A maid opened the door and Grossman rushed past her, saying perfunctorily “Is Mr. Borglum in?” Borglum was chipping stone on a nearly completed nude. “Here’s a summons for you, Mr. Borglum,” said Grossman. “Of all the effrontery,” began the sculptor. “You * * * you * * * you ought to be * * *.” Then Grossman began to shout. “How about you?” he asked. “Shouldn’t you maybe be ashamed of yourself? You and your naked women!” He went out spluttering with indignation, leaving Borglum speechless, clutching the summons in his hand.

NOTE AND QUESTION

Federal Rule 4(e) sets out the federal rule for service of process upon individuals. Rule 4(e)(2) provides methods of serving process that are authorized for any federal court action. One such method is the most direct form of service—“delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint to the individual personally.” Rule 4(e)(2)(A). Other methods authorized by Rule 4(e)(2) are discussed in the next two subsections.

Rule 4(e)(1) provides an alternative to these methods by broadly authorizing service in conformity with the law of the state in which the federal district court is sitting or the state where service is effected. Keep in mind that, although many state service statutes are modeled on the Federal Rules, state statutes may differ in important ways, including the issuance of the summons, who may effect service, and the information that must appear in the summons.

c.Federal Rule 4(e)(2)(B): Service on a Person Residing in Defendant’s Dwelling or Usual Place of Abode

As an alternative to personal delivery, Federal Rule 4(e)(2)(B) permits service of process to be made upon an individual by leaving a copy of the summons and complaint at the party’s “dwelling or usual place of abode with someone of suitable age and discretion who resides there.” The facts of a particular case often prove to be crucial.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

What is the “usual place of abode” for a litigant with multiple dwellings? NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT CO. v. TRIAD HOLDING CORP., 930 F.2d 253 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 968, 112 S.Ct. 440, 116 L.Ed.2d 459 (1991), concerned efforts to vacate a default judgment entered against a Saudi Arabian citizen who maintained 12 homes around the world and was described as “a frequent intercontinental traveler.” Id. at 257. Service was effected by delivering papers to defendant’s New York apartment, which was valued at $20–$25 million and contained 23,000 square feet, and leaving them with defendant’s housekeeper. The Second Circuit upheld service, holding that “a person can have two or more ‘dwelling houses or usual places of abode’ ” and that because defendant was “actually living” in the apartment on the day of service, “service there on that day was, if not the most likely method of ensuring that he received the summons and complaint, reasonably calculated to provide actual notice of the action.” Id. at 257–58. Should it matter if defendant had been at one of his other dwellings on the day of service?

d.Federal Rule 4(e)(2)(C): Delivery to an Agent Authorized by Appointment

A third method of effecting personal service on an individual under the Federal Rules is by delivering a copy of the summons and complaint to an agent of defendant who is “authorized by appointment or by law” to receive process. Rule 4(e)(2)(C). The cases dealing with agency by appointment indicate that an actual appointment for the specific purpose of receiving process normally is expected. Consistent with this judicial construction of “appointment,” the courts have held that a person’s actual acceptance of process or purported authority to do so is not enough to bind defendant; there must be evidence that defendant intended to confer such authority upon the agent.

NATIONAL EQUIPMENT RENTAL, LTD. v. SZUKHENT

Supreme Court of the United States, 1964.
375 U.S. 311, 84 S.Ct. 411, 11 L.Ed.2d 354.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * The petitioner is a corporation with its principal place of business in New York. It sued the respondents, residents of Michigan, in a New York federal court, claiming that the respondents had defaulted under a farm equipment lease. The only question now before us is whether the person upon whom the summons and complaint were served was “an agent authorized by appointment” to receive the same, so as to subject the respondents to the jurisdiction of the federal court in New York.

258

The respondents obtained certain farm equipment from the petitioner under a lease executed in 1961. The lease was on a printed form less than a page and a half in length, and consisted of 18 numbered paragraphs. The last numbered paragraph, appearing just above the respondents’ signatures and printed in the same type used in the remainder of the instrument, provided that “the Lessee hereby designates Florence Weinberg, 47–21 Forty-first Street, Long Island City, N.Y., as agent for the purpose of accepting service of any process within the State of New York.”³ The respondents were not acquainted with Florence Weinberg.

In 1962 the petitioner commenced the present action by filing in the federal court in New York a complaint which alleged that the respondents had failed to make any of the periodic payments specified by the lease. The Marshal delivered two copies of the summons and complaint to Florence Weinberg. That same day she mailed the summons and complaint to the respondents, together with a letter stating that the documents had been served upon her as the respondents’ agent for the purpose of accepting service of process in New York, in accordance with the agreement contained in the lease. * * * The petitioner itself also notified the respondents by certified mail of the service of process upon Florence Weinberg.

Upon motion of the respondents, the District Court quashed service of the summons and complaint, holding that, although Florence Weinberg had promptly notified the respondents of the service of process and mailed copies of the summons and complaint to them, the lease agreement itself had not explicitly required her to do so, and there was therefore a “failure of the agency arrangement to achieve intrinsic and continuing reality.” * * * The Court of Appeals affirmed * * * and we granted certiorari * * *. * * * [W]e have concluded that Florence Weinberg was “an agent authorized by appointment * * * to receive service of process,”⁴ and accordingly we reverse the judgment before us.

* * * [A]s the Court of Appeals recognized, this Court’s decision in Wuchter v. Pizzutti * * * [Note 2, p. 245, supra], is inapposite here. * * * Wuchter dealt with the limitations imposed by the Fourteenth Amendment upon a statutory scheme by which a State attempts to subject nonresident individuals to the jurisdiction of its courts. The question presented here, on the other hand, is whether a party to a private contract may appoint an agent to receive service of process within the meaning of Federal Rule * * * [4(e)(2)(C)], where the agent is not personally known to the party, and where the agent has not expressly undertaken to transmit notice to the party.

259

The purpose underlying the contractual provision here at issue seems clear. The clause was inserted by the petitioner and agreed to by the respondents in order to assure that any litigation under the lease should be conducted in the State of New York. * * * And it is settled, as the courts below recognized, that parties to a contract may agree in advance to submit to the jurisdiction of a given court, to permit notice to be served by the opposing party, or even to waive notice altogether. * * *

Under well-settled general principles of the law of agency Florence Weinberg’s prompt acceptance and transmittal to the respondents of the summons and complaint pursuant to the authorization was itself sufficient to validate the agency, even though there was no explicit previous promise on her part to do so. * * *

We deal here with a Federal Rule, applicable to federal courts in all 50 States. But even if we were to assume that this uniform federal standard should give way to contrary local policies, there is no relevant concept of state law which would invalidate the agency here at issue. In Michigan, where the respondents reside, the statute which validates service of process under the circumstances present in this case contains no provision requiring that the appointed agent expressly undertake to notify the principal of the service of process. Similarly, New York law, which it was agreed should be applicable to the lease provisions, does not require any such express promise by the agent in order to create a valid agency for receipt of process. * * *

It is argued, finally, that the agency sought to be created in this case was invalid because Florence Weinberg may have had a conflict of interest. This argument is based upon the fact that she was not personally known to the respondents at the time of her appointment and upon a suggestion in the record that she may be related to an officer of the petitioner corporation. But such a contention ignores the narrowly limited nature of the agency here involved. Florence Weinberg was appointed the respondents’ agent for the single purpose of receiving service of process. An agent with authority so limited can in no meaningful sense be deemed to have had an interest antagonistic to the respondents, since both the petitioner and the respondents had an equal interest in assuring that, in the event of litigation, the latter be given that adequate and timely notice which is a prerequisite to a valid judgment.⁹

260

A different case would be presented if Florence Weinberg had not given prompt notice to the respondents, for then the claim might well be made that her failure to do so had operated to invalidate the agency. We hold only that, prompt notice to the respondents having been given, Florence Weinberg was their “agent authorized by appointment” to receive process within the meaning of Federal Rule * * * 4(d)(1).^c

* * *

Judgment of Court of Appeals reversed and case remanded.

JUSTICE BLACK, dissenting.

* * *

The record on the motion to quash shows that the Szukhents had never had any dealings with Mrs. Weinberg, their supposed agent. They had never met, seen, or heard of her. She did not sign the lease, was not a party to it, received no compensation from the Szukhents, and undertook no obligation to them. In fact, she was handpicked by the New York company to accept service of process in any suits that might thereafter be filed by the company. Only after this suit was brought was it reluctantly revealed that Mrs. Weinberg was in truth the wife of one of the company’s officers.

* * *

I disagree with * * * [the Court’s] holding, believing that (1) whether Mrs. Weinberg was a valid agent upon whom service could validly be effected under Rule * * * 4(d)(1) should be determined under New York law and that we should accept the holdings of the federal district judge and the Court of Appeals sitting in New York that under that State’s law the purported appointment of Mrs. Weinberg was invalid and ineffective; (2) if however, Rule * * * 4(d)(1) is to be read as calling upon us to formulate a new federal definition of agency for purposes of service of process, I think our formulation should exclude Mrs. Weinberg from the category of an “agent authorized by appointment * * * to receive service of process”; and (3) upholding service of process in this case raises serious questions as to whether these Michigan farmers have been denied due process of law in violation of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments.

* * *

The end result of today’s holding is not difficult to foresee. Clauses like the one used against the Szukhents—clauses which companies have not inserted, I suspect, because they never dreamed a court would uphold them—will soon find their way into the “boilerplate” of everything from an equipment lease to a conditional sales contract. Today’s holding gives a green light to every large company in this country to contrive contracts which declare with force of law that when such a company wants to sue someone with whom it does business, that individual must go and try to defend himself in some place, no matter how distant, where big business enterprises are concentrated, like, for example, New York, Connecticut, or Illinois, or else suffer a default judgment. In this very case the Court holds that by this company’s carefully prepared contractual clause the Szukhents must, to avoid a judgment rendered without a fair and full hearing, travel hundreds of miles across the continent, probably crippling their defense and certainly depleting what savings they may have, to try to defend themselves in a court sitting in New York City. I simply cannot believe that Congress, when by its silence it let Rule * * * 4(d)(1) go into effect, meant for that rule to be used as a means to achieve such a far-reaching, burdensome, and unjust result. Heretofore judicial good common sense has, on one ground or another, disregarded contractual provisions like this one, not encouraged them. It is a long trip from San Francisco—or from Honolulu or Anchorage—to New York, Boston, or Wilmington. And the trip can be very expensive, often costing more than it would simply to pay what is demanded. The very threat of such a suit can be used to force payment of alleged claims, even though they be wholly without merit. This fact will not be news to companies exerting their economic power to wangle such contracts. * * *

* * *

The Court relies on the printed provision of the contract as a consent of the Szukhents to be sued in New York, making the Pennoyer rule inapplicable. In effect the Court treats the provision as a waiver of the Szukhents’ constitutional right not to be compelled to go to a New York court to defend themselves against the company’s claims. * * * This printed form provision buried in a multitude of words is too weak an imitation of a genuine agreement to be treated as a waiver of so important a constitutional safeguard as is the right to be sued at home. * * * The Court should not permit valuable constitutional rights to be destroyed by any such sharp contractual practices. The idea that there was a knowing consent of the Szukhents to be sued in the courts of New York is no more than a fiction—not even an amiable one at that.

* * *

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and JUSTICE GOLDBERG join, dissenting.

I would affirm. In my view, federal standards and not state law must define who is “an agent authorized by appointment” within the meaning of Rule * * * 4(d)(1). * * * In formulating these standards I would, first, construe Rule * * * 4(d)(1) to deny validity to the appointment of a purported agent whose interests conflict with those of his supposed principal * * *. Second, I would require that the appointment include an explicit condition that the agent after service transmit the process forthwith to the principal. Although our decision in Wuchter v. Pizzutti * * * dealt with the constitutionality of a state statute, the reasoning of that case is persuasive that, in fashioning a federal agency rule, we should engraft the same requirement upon Rule * * * 4(d)(1). Third, since the corporate plaintiff prepared the printed form contract, I would not hold the individual purchaser bound by the appointment without proof, in addition to his mere signature on the form, that the individual understandingly consented to be sued in a State not that of his residence. * * * It offends common sense to treat a printed form which closes an installment sale as embodying terms to all of which the individual knowingly assented. The sales pitch aims solely at getting the signature on the form and wastes no time explaining or even mentioning the print. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1. Why did the majority look to “general principles of the law of agency” and not to the Due Process Clause in assessing the propriety of the waiver provision? Did the majority see any role for the Constitution in a dispute involving a contractual waiver of service?
- 2. Since Szukhent, e-commerce has generated new forms of agreement with such interesting names as “shrinkwrap,” “clickwrap,” and “browsewrap.” Would a waiver of jurisdiction, notice, or service of process embedded in such an agreement and assented to through the click of a mouse or the tap of a phone be enforceable under the Court’s analysis in Szukhent? Would it matter if the consumer could accept the clause only after scrolling down through the entire document? Should it matter that the waiver terms are boilerplate and not subject to arms-length negotiation? Should there be a clear prompt directing the user to read the waiver provisions before signing?

e. Federal Rule 4(h): Serving a Corporation, Partnership, or Association

Rule 4(h) authorizes service upon corporations, partnerships, and unincorporated associations that are subject to suit under a common name. As with Rule 4(e)(1)’s provisions for serving process on an individual, Rule 4(h) allows service in accordance with the law of either the state where the district court is located or the state where service is made. See Rule 4(h)(1)(A). However, the most frequently invoked portion of the rule is subpart (B), permitting service by delivery of process to an officer, a managing agent, or a general agent. How do the requirements of this subpart differ from those of serving an individual?

In INSURANCE CO. OF NORTH AMERICA v. S/S “HELLENIC CHALLENGER”, 88 F.R.D. 545 (S.D.N.Y. 1980), a United States Marshal deposited the summons and complaint with a claims adjuster at the office of defendant. The complaint stated an admiralty and maritime claim for nondelivery, shortage, loss, and damage relating to pickled sheepskins shipped to New York aboard defendant’s vessel.

The adjuster who had accepted service of the summons and complaint was not expressly authorized by defendant to accept process; the only employees endowed with express authority to do so on behalf of defendant were all titled officers and the claims manager. At the time of service of the summons and complaint, the claims manager was absent due to illness and the adjuster, an assistant to the claims manager, accepted service.

Since the adjuster misplaced the summons and complaint, defendant remained unaware of the pendency of the lawsuit until its bank informed it that its account had been attached by plaintiff. Only then did defendant learn that plaintiff’s counsel had filed a default judgment and that a writ of execution had been issued. The court denied defendant’s motion to set aside the judgment on the basis of improper service of process:

Rule * * * 4(d)(3)^d has been liberally construed by the courts and, as interpreted, does not require rigid formalism. To be valid, service of process is not limited solely to officially designated officers, managing agents or agents appointed by law for the receipt of process. Rather, “[r]ules governing service of process (are) to be construed in a manner reasonably calculated to effectuate their primary purpose: to give the defendant adequate notice that an action is pending. * * * [T]he rule does not require that service be made solely on a restricted class of formally titled officials, but rather permits it to be made ‘upon a representative so integrated with the organization that he will know what to do with the papers. Generally, service is sufficient when made upon an individual who stands in such a position as to render it fair, reasonable and just to imply the authority on his part to receive services.’ ” * * *

Plaintiff’s method of service of the summons and complaint was indeed “reasonably calculated” to alert defendants to the initiation of the suit. * * * [T]he adjuster served with the summons and complaint, can be categorized as a representative of defendant “well-integrated” into the organization and quite familiar with the formalities associated with the receipt of service of summonses and complaints. He had accepted service of summonses and complaints on behalf of defendant on at least two previous occasions * * * in connection with his ordinary duties of receiving and investigating new claims against defendant. Furthermore, it may be inferred from the facts presented on this motion that [the adjuster] had easy access to * * * the claims manager officially authorized to accept service of process, since the two men are separated from each other only by [the claims manager’s] glass-walled office. * * * [The adjuster’s] familiarity with service of process negates any and all suspicion that the U.S. Marshal delivered the summons and complaint to a representative of defendant who had infrequent contact with summonses and complaints and whose unfamiliarity with service of process increased the risk of careless or improper handling. * * *

In the case at hand, the * * * adjuster’s loss of the summons and complaint is a mistake in the ordinary course of the internal operations of defendant’s business and thus does not merit remedial relief * * *.

Id. at 547–48.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Given the language of the rule—now set out in Federal Rule 4(h)(1)(B)—was it appropriate for the Court to disregard labels such as “general” and “managing” agent? Should the court have held that the claims adjuster could be regarded as defendant’s “managing agent”? In determining whether the person served is “so integrated with the organization that he will know what to do with the papers,” courts consider whether the person served is employed by defendant and whether actual notice was received, but actual notice will not inevitably cure a defect in service under this rule. See American Institute of Certified Public Accountants v. Affinity Card, Inc., 8 F.Supp.2d 372 (S.D.N.Y. 1998) (service on the vice president of one corporation sharing office with defendant corporation was insufficient to create personal jurisdiction despite the fact that both corporations were owned by the same individual who had received actual notice).

2. Could the court reasonably have reached the same result by finding that the claims adjuster was an agent authorized by appointment to receive process? In FASHION PAGE, LTD. v. ZURICH INS. CO., 50 N.Y.2d 265, 428 N.Y.S.2d 890, 406 N.E.2d 747 (1980), the process-server went to defendant’s office where he was greeted by a receptionist. The receptionist told him to proceed down a certain corridor and to “see the girl sitting down there.” Following instructions, the process-server went to the executive secretary of the vice president in charge of the New York office. She asked to see the papers and after perusing them said: “Okay, leave it with me. * * * I’ll take it.” When the process-server questioned her authority, she responded: “I can take it.”

There was doubt that the executive secretary possessed sufficient discretionary authority to be a “managing agent” for purposes of service. The New York Court of Appeals, however, refused to be drawn into that issue, finding instead that the executive secretary was an “agent authorized by appointment * * * to receive service.” The executive secretary testified that she had regularly accepted summonses for at least five years whenever the vice president was not in the office. During that period, she had accepted about half of the summonses brought to his office. The court explained:

265

Thus a corporation may assign the task of accepting process and may establish procedures for insuring that the papers are directed to those ultimately responsible for defending its interests. * * * The corporation however cannot escape the consequences of establishing alternative procedures which it may prefer. * * * Reliance may be based on the corporate employees to identify the proper person to accept service. * * *

Id. at 270–73, 428 N.Y.S.2d at 892–94, 406 N.E.2d at 749–51. See also M. Prusman, Ltd. v. Ariel Maritime Group, Inc., 719 F.Supp. 214, 220 (S.D.N.Y. 1989).

f. Federal Rule 4(f): Serving an Individual in a Foreign Country

Rule 4(f) authorizes alternative methods by which an individual (other than a minor, an incompetent, or a person whose waiver has been filed) may be served outside the United States. International service of process also must comply with constitutional standards of due process. The rule was amended in 1993 to afford United States attorneys a flexible framework that accommodates the widely divergent procedures for service of process employed by the various nations of the world. This accommodation is necessary both to avoid violating the sovereignty of other countries by committing acts within their borders that they may consider to be “official” and to maximize the likelihood that the judgment rendered in the action in this country will be recognized and enforced abroad. Most of the methods authorized by Rule 4(f)—discussed below—also apply to serving a corporation or other entity in a foreign country. See Rule 4(h)(2).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Rule 4(f)(1) provides that “any internationally agreed means of service that is reasonably calculated to give notice, such as those authorized by the Hague Convention on the Service Abroad of Judicial and Extrajudicial Documents” may be used to effect service on those outside the United States. The Hague Service Convention contains the most important internationally agreed means of service of process, and as of June 2021, 79 states were contracting parties. See Convention on the Service Abroad of Judicial and Extrajudicial Documents in Civil or Commercial Matters, The Hague, 1965, 20 U.S.T. 361, T.I.A.S. No. 6638, 658 U.N.T.S. 163, reproduced (with declarations by the contracting states) in 28 U.S.C.A. following Federal Rule 4. The heart of the Convention is a requirement that each Contracting State establish a Central Authority, which will receive and execute requests for service from judicial authorities in other Contracting States, and will see that a certification that service has been effected is returned to the court of origin. Service may be made either in accordance with the law of the nation in which service is to be made or (unless incompatible with that law) by a particular method requested by the applicant. For a discussion of modes of service in selected countries, see Chase, Hershkoff, Silberman, Sorabji, Stürmer, Taniguchi & Varano, Civil Litigation in Comparative Context 234–51 (Chase & Hershkoff, eds., 2d ed. 2017).

266

2. A question that had divided lower courts was whether the Hague Service Convention bars service by mail. In WATER SPLASH, INC. v. MENON, 581 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 1504, 197 L.Ed.2d 826 (2017), the Supreme Court clarified that mail service is permissible if two conditions are met: “first, the receiving state has not objected to service by mail; and second, service by mail is authorized under otherwise-applicable law.” Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1513, 197 L.Ed.2d at 836.

3. There are several circumstances when the Hague Service Convention does not govern service on foreign-based defendants.

First, and most significantly, the Convention does not govern in those countries that are not Contracting States.

Second, the Supreme Court held in VOLKSWAGENWERK AKTIENGESELLSCHAFT v. SCHLUNK, 486 U.S. 694, 108 S.Ct. 2104, 100 L.Ed.2d 722 (1988), that the Convention applies only if service actually is made abroad; service under the Convention is not required if service is effected in the United States. In this case, suit was brought against a German corporation, and service was made on a domestic subsidiary that was deemed to be the corporation’s involuntary agent for service of process.

Third, because the Convention is only invoked by “service” abroad, an agreement to waive service, if voluntary and private, may be regarded as not implicating the Convention, although some other nations might well take a contrary position. Foreign defendants, like domestic defendants, are given incentives by Rule 4(d) to waive service in the form of longer times to respond, but they are not to be charged with the costs for formal service should they refuse to return the waiver; otherwise the waiver could be deemed compulsory and thus might violate the Convention.

4. Rule 4(f)(3) authorizes forms of service “by other means not prohibited by international agreement, as the court orders.” Even before the 1993 amendment to the Federal Rule, a federal trial court had ordered service of process on defendants in Iran by telex, then an innovative form of information-exchange. See New England Merchants National Bank v. Iran Power Generation and Transmission Co., 495 F.Supp. 73 (S.D.N.Y. 1980). Since then, new forms of technology have broadened the kinds of service a court might order. In RIO PROPERTIES, INC. v. RIO INTERNATIONAL INTERLINK, 284 F.3d 1007 (9th Cir. 2002), the court authorized email service on a foreign Internet business, after plaintiff was unsuccessful in effecting service in the United States, in Costa Rica, and on the international courier designated as an address when defendant registered its website. The Court of Appeals emphasized that service of process under Rule 4(f)(3) is neither extraordinary nor a last resort, but rather “one means among several which enables services of process on an international defendant,” and its use is committed to the discretion of the district judge. Id. at 1015.

Given advances in technology, should service abroad be permitted through email or social media? Federal courts have continued to approve of such service under Rule 4(f)(3) in certain circumstances. See, e.g., Nagravision SA v. Gotech Int’l Tech. Ltd., 882 F.3d 494, 498 (5th Cir. 2018) (approving of “court-ordered email service under Rule 4(f)(3)”); Elsevier, Inc. v. Siew Yee Chew, 287 F. Supp. 3d 374, 379–80 (S.D.N.Y. 2018) (“Service through email is particularly appropriate here because, as the record reflects * * *, the defendants engage in online business and regularly communicate with customers through functional email addresses.”); Nowak v. XAPO, Inc., 2020 WL 5877576, *4 (N.D.Cal. 2020) (authorizing service on an Indonesian defendant by email and via social media to its Facebook and Twitter accounts); Fisher v. Petr Konchalovsky Foundation, 2016 WL 1047394, *6 (S.D.N.Y. 2016) (authorizing service by email for a defendant residing in Russia, finding that no international agreement barred this mode of service, Russia had not objected to this specific mode of service, and plaintiff had provided “sufficient evidence” that sending email to a designated address was “likely to reach the defendant”). In other cases, however, courts have declined to authorize service by email or social media, finding that the requestor had failed to show that electronic service either was needed or would be sufficiently reliable. E.g., Keck v. Alibaba.com, Inc., 330 F.R.D. 255, 259–60 (N.D.Cal. 2018) (finding that plaintiff “has not sufficiently shown why she should be allowed to serve the Additional Defendants by the messaging system on Alibaba.com and AliExpress.com”); McGillvary v. Holom, 2019 WL 2124509, at *2 (D.N.J. 2019) (rejecting request to serve defendant via her Facebook account); SEC v. China Intelligent Lighting & Electronics, Inc., 2014 WL 338817, *2 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) (rejecting service via email because plaintiff had not shown that the email addresses were likely to reach defendants, noting that a spreadsheet purporting to associate one defendant with a particular email address “does not include a date or any other information from which the Court could infer that [defendant] continues to use the relevant e-mail address today”). In I.M. Wilson, Inc. v. Otvetstvennostyou “Grichko”, 2018 WL 6446601, *3 n.1 (E.D.Pa. 2018), the court authorized alternative service under Rule 4(f)(3) on two Russian defendants and a Czech defendant by serving hard copies of the summons and complaint on their United States counsel but rejected proposed service on their United States counsel by email: “Lest such a ubiquitous means of communication fall prey to a ‘spam’ filter, or worse, service shall be with hard copy material.”

5.A special provision of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) provides methods for serving process on foreign states, political subdivisions of foreign states, and agencies or instrumentalities of foreign states. In

REPUBLIC OF SUDAN v. HARRISON, 587 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct. 1048, 203 L.Ed.2d 433 (2019), the Supreme Court interpreted the provision allowing service “by any form of mail requiring a signed receipt, to be addressed and dispatched by the clerk of the court to the head of the ministry of foreign affairs of the foreign state concerned.” 28 U.S.C. § 1608(a)(3). Victims of the bombing of the USS Cole, and their relatives, brought suit against the Republic of Sudan in federal district court under the FSIA. The clerk of the court, at plaintiffs’ request, addressed the service packet to Sudan’s minister of foreign affairs at the Sudan Embassy in the United States, and later certified that a signed receipt had been returned. Sudan failed to appear and the court entered a default judgment plus orders to effect payment of the judgment. In an eight-to-one decision, the Court found that this method of service did not comply with Section 1608(a)(3), concluding that the service packet “must be addressed and dispatched to the foreign minister at the minister’s office in the foreign state”—not to some office in the United States where the minister might rarely be found. Id. at ___, 139 S.Ct. at 1062, 203 L.Ed.2d at 447. Justice Thomas dissented on the ground that delivery of service to a country’s embassy was within the terms of the statute and a reasonable means of notifying the country’s foreign minister.

6.In many cases, a court will reject a challenge to service of process when there is a showing that defendant had actual notice of the action. See Armco, Inc. v. Penrod-Stauffer Bldg. Sys., Inc., 733 F.2d 1087, 1089 (4th Cir. 1984) (“every technical violation of the rule or failure of strict compliance may not invalidate the service of process”). Is a different case presented if plaintiff uses “other means” of service under Rule 4(f)(3) without seeking prior court authorization? In this circumstance, should service be quashed even if defendant has actual notice of the action? See De Gazelle Group, Inc. v. Tamaz Trading Establishment, 817 F.3d 747 (11th Cir. 2016).

3.RETURN OF SERVICE

The process-server, after delivering the papers, must file a “return,” which should disclose enough facts to demonstrate that defendant has been served and given notice of the requirement to appear in court. The prerequisite for the court assuming jurisdiction is the actual service of process and not the proof of that act; however, courts have held a proper return ordinarily is necessary to enable the trial court to conclude it has jurisdiction. The specific form of the proof of service varies from state to state, as well as according to the method of service used. An affidavit from the person who performed the acts constituting service is the usual proof.

Should the process-server’s return of service be considered conclusive or merely presumptive evidence that service has been effected? In MIEDREICH v. LAUENSTEIN, 232 U.S. 236, 34 S.Ct. 309, 58 L.Ed. 584 (1914), plaintiff sought to vacate a mortgage foreclosure judgment rendered in a prior suit arguing that the sheriff had made a false return of summons. Plaintiff, a state resident but not a resident of the county in which the action had been brought, was not served with process and lacked knowledge of the prior proceeding. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court upheld the prior judgment, treating the return as conclusive:

269

[A]lthough contrary to the fact, in the absence of any attack upon it, the court was justified in acting upon such return as upon a true return. If the return is false the law of the state * * * permitted a recovery against the sheriff upon his bond. We are of the opinion that this system of jurisprudence, with its provisions for safeguarding the rights of litigants, is due process of law.

Id. at 246, 34 S.Ct. at 312, 58 L.Ed. at 591. Would the result have been the same if plaintiff had not been a state resident? If the challenge was not collateral?

In most American jurisdictions today, the return is treated as strong evidence of the fact of service, but is not given conclusive effect. Keep in mind that prior to 1983, only United States marshals or deputy marshals could serve process in federal civil actions. At least some courts held that it would be “demeaning to the dignity of the court” to hold a hearing into the truth of an official’s document. Halpert v. Appeby, 23 F.R.D. 5, 6 (S.D.N.Y. 1958). Defendant’s own testimony alone generally will not be sufficient to impeach the return of a private process server, but it is not clear whether a “strong and convincing evidence” or some lesser standard applies.

NOTE ON “SEWER” SERVICE

In UNITED STATES v. BRAND JEWELERS, INC., 318 F.Supp. 1293 (S.D.N.Y. 1970), noted in 37 Brooklyn L.Rev. 426 (1970–1971), 84 Harv.L.Rev. 130 (1970–1971), 46 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 367 (1971), 20 J.Pub.L. 337 (1971), 24 Vand.L.Rev. 829 (1970–1971), 17 Wayne L.Rev. 1287 (1971), 1971 Wis.L.Rev. 665, it was held that the United States had standing to seek an injunction preventing defendant from systematically obtaining default judgments against economically disadvantaged people through use of so-called “sewer” service techniques, by which the process-server disposes the papers and makes a false affidavit of service. The actions were for the purchase price of consumer goods sold on “easy credit terms” by door-to-door salespersons. Id. at 1294. The court reasoned that continuously failing to make proper service of process or preparing false affidavits of service imposed “a burden on interstate commerce.” Id. at 1298. Moreover, defendants’ alleged conduct was held to be “state action”; the United States had standing to sue to end a widespread unconstitutional deprivation of property without due process of law. Id. at 1299.

In 1972, the case was settled, and a consent decree was issued. It vacated the default judgments obtained by Brand Jewelers from 1969 to 1971, established procedures to notify those who were not properly served that they could proceed to a trial on the merits, and placed upon Brand Jewelers’ attorney the duty of ensuring that future service of process would be fair and in good faith. What are the advantages and disadvantages of placing that duty on an attorney?

270

In 1970, New York adopted procedural reforms aimed at stopping the practice of fraudulent service. Prior to the amendments, delivery of a summons to a person other than the defendant was not permitted unless the process-server first exercised due diligence to locate the defendant. The burden of this requirement was viewed as the single most important cause of “sewer service.” The revision adopted by the legislature allowed service by leaving one copy of the summons with a person of suitable age and discretion at the place where the defendant actually works, dwells, or usually abides and by mailing a second copy to defendant’s last known address. N.Y.C.P.L.R. § 308(2). In 1973, the legislature took the additional step of requiring process-servers to make more detailed statements relating to how the process was served.

In 1986, following a two-year investigation, the Attorney General of the State of New York and other government officials reported that fraudulent service of process continued to plague the New York City courts. The findings suggested that 48,000 (of 140,000) default judgments entered annually were tainted by sewer service. See N.Y. Attorney General, N.Y. City Dep’t of Consumer Affairs, N.Y. City Dep’t of Investigation City, A Joint Investigative Report into the Practice of Sewer Service in New York City (1986). In response, the legislature again amended the state’s service rules and mandated that a copy of the summons be filed with the return of service. N.Y.C.P.L.R. §§ 306, 306–a.

In 2009, the Chief Administrative Judge of the New York State Unified Court System commenced a special proceeding against numerous debt collection attorneys, seeking to vacate tens of thousands of default judgments that were alleged to have been based on false affidavits of service. See Matter of Pfau v. Forster & Garbus (Sup.Ct. Erie Co. No. 8236/09) (2009). The Pfau action was settled by a consent order. A part of the relief established a procedure for the vacating of a default judgment that had been illegally obtained. See Matter of Pfau v. Forster & Garbus (Sup.Ct. Erie Co. No. 2166/11) (2011). New York City also enacted legislation requiring licensed process-servers to maintain records of the location and date of attempts at service using global position system devices. See N.Y. City Code § 2–233.

4.SERVICE OF PROCESS AND STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS

All states have statutes of limitations that fix specific time limits within which various categories of actions must be brought. They are supplemented by bodies of law that define when various causes of action are said to “accrue”—the point when the limitations clock begins to run on an action, and the circumstances in which the running of the clock is suspended or “tolled” because a plaintiff for some reason has been prevented from timely assertion of her rights. See Developments in the Law—Statutes of Limitations, 63 Harv.L.Rev. 1177 (1950). Although statutes of limitations generally are deemed “procedural,” their impact decidedly is “substantive”—a plaintiff loses the opportunity to invoke the assistance of the courts to obtain relief even for an otherwise valid claim. Almost the first duty of a lawyer for a potential plaintiff is to determine, by the most conservative estimates, the latest possible day for commencing an action.

271

When is a suit “commenced” for purposes of a statute of limitations? In federal court, if the underlying cause of action is based on federal law, Rule 3 governs when the action is commenced. Thus, the suit is commenced when a copy of the complaint is filed with the federal district court. West v. Conrail, 481 U.S. 35, 107 S.Ct. 1538, 95 L.Ed.2d 32 (1987). However, when the underlying cause of action is based on state law, state law usually governs when the action is commenced—even if the action is in federal court. See Walker v. Armco Steel Corp., 446 U.S. 740, 100 S.Ct. 1978, 64 L.Ed.2d 659 (1980), p. 480, infra. In some states, an action is not deemed “commenced” until process is served. In these states, a defect in service can be fatal to plaintiff’s claim, because the statute of limitations may run before plaintiff has a chance to correct the error.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1. Consider how the running of the statute of limitations interacts with the operation of Federal Rule 4(m). Rule 4(m) requires the federal court to dismiss an action without prejudice, or to order service to be made within a specified period, if defendant is not served within 90 days of filing of the complaint. If plaintiff makes a showing of good cause for the failure, the court must extend the time for service. The rule does not define “good cause.” What kind of showing ought to count as “good cause”? What if the statute of limitations expires during that period, the action is dismissed, and plaintiff seeks to refile the suit? Will the refiled action be defeated if challenged as untimely? When good cause is not shown, what factors ought to guide the court’s discretion in granting an extension?
- 2.What is the time limit for service of process in a foreign country under Rule 4(f)? By its terms, does Rule 4(m) apply to service abroad? Does this mean plaintiff has unlimited time to effect service abroad? The circuits are divided on this question.
- 3.Does the 90-day limit in Rule 4(m) apply to service on a corporation, partnership, or association located outside the United States?
- 4.The Federal Rules authorize two types of challenges to service of process. Rule 12(b)(4) allows defendant to move to dismiss the complaint for insufficiency of process. This motion attacks defects in the form of the summons. Rule 12(b)(5) allows defendant to move to dismiss the complaint for insufficiency of service of process. This motion attacks defects in the way in which process was delivered to defendant. Which motion would defendant use to challenge service that does not meet the time limits of Rule 4(m)?

272

C. IMMUNITY FROM PROCESS AND ETIQUETTE OF SERVICE

1.IMMUNITY FROM PROCESS

STATE EX REL. SIVNKSTY V. DUFFIELD
Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, 1952.
137 W.Va. 112, 71 S.E.2d 113.

[On June 30, 1951, while vacationing in Gilmer County, West Virginia, petitioner Sivnksty’s automobile struck and injured two children who were walking along the highway. He was arrested on charges of reckless driving, and, being unable to post bond, was incarcerated in the county jail until his trial on July 2. While he was in jail awaiting trial, Sivnksty was served with process in a tort action brought by one of the children in the Circuit Court of Gilmer County. Sivnksty was found guilty of the criminal charge and his appeals from that conviction failed.

Sivnksty made a special appearance in the civil action and filed a plea in abatement, alleging that the court was without jurisdiction because at the time of service he was a nonresident of the county and a prisoner in the county jail. The court sustained a demurrer to the plea in abatement, whereupon Sivnksty petitioned the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia for a writ of prohibition against the judge of the trial court. A stipulation was filed with the appellate court stating that Sivnksty had entered Gilmer County on June 30, 1951, with the intention of remaining there through the Fourth of July holiday and that he left the county immediately upon his release on appeal bond following his conviction on July 2, 1951.]

The sole question presented by this record is: In the circumstances of this case was the petitioner immune from civil process at the time he was served with process in the civil action? Petitioner asserts here that the mere fact that he intended, when he came into Gilmer County, to remain for a period of a few days could not render his continuing presence in Gilmer County, after he was arrested, one of a voluntary status, when he was, in fact, incarcerated in the county jail there against his will.

The original and prime purpose for which the privilege of immunity from civil process on nonresidents of a county or state charged with crime therein was the protection of the court itself from interference with its judicial processes. Thus, originally the rule was asserted as the privilege of the court to secure the administration of justice free from outside interference or influence. Later the rule was enlarged for the protection of suitors, witnesses, jurors, and court officials from process, both in civil and criminal cases. Whited v. Phillips, 98 W.Va. 204, 205, 206, 126 S.E. 916, 917, 40 A.L.R. 83. In the Whited case the Court said: “It is well said that, if there is ever a time when a man should be relieved of all other concerns, and when he should be permitted to use unhampered his every faculty, it is when he is on trial under charge of a crime. Judicial reasoning also recognizes the right of a man, ordinarily, to be tried by a jury in the vicinity in which he resides, so that he may have such advantage and safeguard there as his conduct and character shall merit.”

273

In addition the privilege of immunity from civil process of a nonresident of a county or state, charged with crime therein, has underlying it the public policy that a person charged with crime in a county of which he is a nonresident will not be deterred from appearing before the courts of that county or state by the threat of civil or other process; and thus a person so charged with crime because of the immunity extended will be encouraged to return to the county or state in which he is charged with crime to respond to the criminal process.

* * *

In the syllabus to Whited v. Phillips, supra, perhaps the leading case in this jurisdiction, bearing on the instant subject matter, this Court held: “A non-resident of West Virginia, who voluntarily and without compulsion of law, submits himself to the jurisdiction of a state court, in answer to an indictment therein against him, and who is not at the time a fugitive from justice, is privileged while attending court from service of process in a civil suit.” In this jurisdiction the immunity rule has been applied to a case in which a defendant in a civil action was served with process while he was in a county, of which he was not a resident, in obedience to a citation from a member of the Department of Public Safety to answer a criminal charge. Morris v. Calhoun, 119 W.Va. 603, pt. 3 syl., 195 S.E. 341. It has also been applied to a case in which a person charged with a criminal offense in a county of which he was a nonresident, was arrested therefore in that county and later released on bond on his own recognizance, and who, in pursuance of such recognizance, returned to the county to answer the charge on the day set for trial. Lang v. Shaw, 113 W.Va. 628, syl., 169 S.E. 444. But in the case of State ex rel. Godby v. Chambers, 130 W.Va. 115, pt. 2 syl., 42 S.E.2d 255, 256, * * * the Court refused the writ of prohibition on the ground that after petitioner’s conviction, sentence, and incarceration on a misdemeanor charge, the reason for the application of the immunity rule was not present, and that in that case there was no criminal process within the meaning of the immunity rule. * * *

In the instant case the petitioner went to Gilmer County of his own volition: he did not enter the county in response to a criminal process, because at the time of his entry therein he had committed no crime, and there was pending against him no criminal case. * * * In Crusco v. Strunk Steel Co., 365 Pa. 326, 74 A.2d 142, 20 A.L.R.2d 160, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court held that a defendant residing outside of a county in which a civil action had been commenced, and who was arrested on a warrant issued on an information of the plaintiff in the civil action and brought within the county, was not immune from civil process merely because of his status as a criminal defendant. * * * In 72 C.J.S., Process, § 82, the rule is well stated as follows: “A person confined in jail on a criminal charge or imprisoned on conviction for such charge is subject to service of civil process, irrespective of the question of residence, at least if he was voluntarily in the jurisdiction at the time of the arrest and confinement.” * * *

274

As the petitioner did not come and was not brought into Gilmer County under criminal process, the reason for the application of the immunity rule is not present, and he is not entitled to the writ of prohibition prayed for.

Writ denied.

LOVINS, JUDGE (dissenting).

* * * This court in the Whited case used the following language: “Judicial reasoning also recognizes the right of a man, ordinarily, to be tried by a jury in the vicinity in which he resides, so that he may have such advantage and safeguard there as his conduct and character shall merit. An additional argument for the extension of the rule is that a person should not ordinarily be drawn into a foreign jurisdiction ‘and there be exposed to entanglements in litigation far from home, which means he shall be attended with augmented expense.’ ” * * *

The specific question here considered is: May a defendant in a criminal charge, confined in jail on such charge and unable to furnish bail bond, be served with process commencing a civil action based on the same facts as those involved in the criminal prosecution?

An examination of the various authorities will disclose that the courts of last resort which have considered this question are not in accord and that the authorities are in confusion with respect to the same. * * *

In the instant case, Sivnksty came into Gilmer County voluntarily for the purpose of fishing. While there, he had an accident and thereafter was incarcerated in the jail. His presence in Gilmer County, originally voluntary, became involuntary. * * * I think whether Sivnksty came into Gilmer County voluntarily or otherwise has no pertinency to the question here presented.

Sivnksty will be forced to trial in a county far from his residence, among strangers. Even though he may have led an exemplary life and may have had a good reputation in the county of his residence, he would derive little or no benefit from those factors. In addition, he was harassed in his defense of the criminal charge by the institution of the civil suit against him while the criminal charge was still pending. This case is dissimilar from State ex rel. Godby v. Chambers, supra. In that case, the defendant had already been convicted.

275

Another element enters into this case. It is a matter of common knowledge that in this day and age there is much travel by motor vehicles. Under the rule laid down in the majority opinion, the luckless motorist, who has the misfortune to have an accident injuring persons or property in a county or state far from his residence, may be arrested and incarcerated in jail on a criminal charge, based on a real or fancied violation of an ordinance or statute having no connection with the accident, and while so incarcerated, the person suffering the injury would immediately commence an action in his own home county for the recovery of alleged damages. This could and may lead to widespread abuse of judicial process.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.The traditional rule is that a party or witness who is present in the forum for legal proceedings is immune from process in a different and unrelated lawsuit. The rationale was explained by Justice Stone in LAMB v. SCHMITT, 285 U.S. 222, 225–26, 52 S.Ct. 317, 318, 76 L.Ed. 720, 722–23 (1932):

The general rule that witnesses, suitors, and their attorneys, while in attendance in connection with the conduct of one suit, are immune from service of process in another, is founded, not upon the convenience of the individuals, but of the court itself. * * * As commonly stated and applied, it proceeds upon the ground that the due administration of justice requires that a court shall not permit interference with the progress of a cause pending before it, by the service of process in other suits, which would prevent, or the fear of which might tend to discourage, the voluntary attendance of those whose presence is necessary or convenient to the judicial administration in the pending litigation. * * * In Stewart v. Ramsay, the court said at page 130, of 242 U. S., 37 S.Ct. 44, 46 [(1916),] * * * “The privilege which is asserted here is the privilege of the court, rather than of the defendant. It is founded in the necessities of the judicial administration, which would be often embarrassed, and sometimes interrupted, if the suitor might be vexed with process while attending upon the court for the protection of his rights, or the witness while attending to testify.”

It follows that the privilege should not be enlarged beyond the reason upon which it is founded, and that it should be extended or withheld only as judicial necessities require. * * * Limitations of it on this basis have been not infrequently made because the attendance upon the trial of a cause, however vital to the personal interests of those concerned, was not for the purpose of facilitating the progress of the cause * * *; or because the service was made on one whose attendance was not voluntary, and hence had no tendency to interfere with judicial administration * * *.

276

Id. at 225–26, 52 S.Ct. at 318, 76 L.Ed. at 722–23. See also Keefe & Roscia, Immunity and Sentimentality, 47 Cornell L.Q. 471 (1947).

2.In certain situations, federal courts accord an immunity from service of process to representatives of foreign governments, as well as their families and members of their households. The scope of the immunity under a treaty called the United Nations Headquarters Agreement, reprinted at 22 U.S.C.A. § 287 note, was at issue in KADIC v. KARADZIC, 70 F.3d 232 (2d Cir. 1995), an action by Croat and Muslim human rights victims against the self-announced president of the break-away Bosnian-Serb republic. Plaintiffs served defendant while he was in New York, and he claimed an official immunity. Whether immunity attached turned on two questions under the Headquarters Agreement: where defendant was served and whether he was a designated representative of the United Nations at the time of service. Plaintiffs’ affidavits provided the following information about service:

[P]laintiffs obtained from [the district judge] an order for alternative means of service, directing service by delivering the complaint to a member of defendant’s State Department security detail, who was ordered to hand the complaint to the defendant. The security officer’s affidavit states that he received the complaint and handed it to Karadzic outside the Russian Embassy in Manhattan. * * * Appellants also allege that during his visits to New York City, Karadzic stayed at hotels outside the “headquarters district” of the United Nations and engaged in non-United Nations-related activities such as fund-raising.

Id. at 246–47. The court of appeals held that defendant was not a designated representative of any member of the United Nations and was not entitled to immunity when served outside the area of the Headquarters District.

2.ETIQUETTE OF SERVICE

WYMAN V. NEWHOUSE

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1937.
93 F.2d 313, cert. denied, 303 U.S. 664, 58 S.Ct. 831, 82 L.Ed. 1122 \(1938\).

MANTON, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This appeal is from a judgment entered dismissing the complaint on motion before trial. The action is on a judgment entered by default in a Florida state court, a jury having assessed the damages. The recovery there was for money loaned, money advanced for appellee, and for seduction under promise of marriage.

277

* * *

Appellant and appellee were both married, but before this suit appellant’s husband died. They had known each other for some years and had engaged in meretricious relations.

The affidavits submitted by the appellee * * * established that he was a resident of New York and never lived in Florida. On October 25, 1935, while appellee was in Salt Lake City, Utah, he received a telegram from the appellant, which read: “Account illness home planning leaving. Please come on way back. Must see you.” Upon appellee’s return to New York he received a letter from appellant stating that her mother was dying in Ireland; that she was leaving the United States for good to go to her mother; that she could not go without seeing the appellee once more; and that she wanted to discuss her affairs with him before she left. Shortly after the receipt of this letter, they spoke to each other on the telephone, whereupon the appellant repeated, in a hysterical and distressed voice, the substance of her letter. Appellee promised to go to Florida in a week or ten days and agreed to notify her when he would arrive. This he did, but before leaving New York by plane he received a letter couched in endearing terms and expressing love and affection for him, as well as her delight at his coming. Before leaving New York, appellee telegraphed appellant, suggesting arrangements for their accommodations together while in Miami, Fla. She telegraphed him at a hotel in Washington, D.C., where he was to stop en route, advising him that the arrangements requested had been made. Appellee arrived at 6 o’clock in the morning at the Miami Airport and saw the appellant standing with her sister some 75 feet distant. He was met by a deputy sheriff who, upon identifying appellee, served him with process in a suit for $500,000. A photographer was present who attempted to take his picture. Thereupon a stranger introduced himself and offered to take appellee to his home, stating that he knew a lawyer who was acquainted with the appellant’s attorney. The attorney whom appellee was advised to consult came to the stranger’s home and seemed to know about the case. The attorney invited appellee to his office, and upon his arrival he found one of the lawyers for the appellant there. Appellee did not retain the Florida attorney to represent him. He returned to New York by plane that evening and consulted his New York counsel, who advised him to ignore the summons served in Florida. He did so, and judgment was entered by default. * * *

These facts and reasonable deductions therefrom convincingly establish that the appellee was induced to enter the jurisdiction of the state of Florida by a fraud perpetrated upon him by the appellant in falsely representing her mother’s illness, her intention to leave the United States, and her love and affection for him, when her sole purpose and apparent thought was to induce him to come within the Florida jurisdiction so as to serve him in an action for damages. * * *

278

This judgment is attacked for fraud perpetrated upon the appellee which goes to the jurisdiction of the Florida court over his person. A judgment procured fraudulently, as here, lacks jurisdiction and is null and void. * * * A fraud affecting the jurisdiction is equivalent to a lack of jurisdiction. * * * The appellee was not required to proceed against the judgment in Florida. His equitable defense in answer to a suit on the judgment is sufficient. A judgment recovered in a sister state, through the fraud of the party procuring the appearance of another, is not binding on the latter when an attempt is made to enforce such judgment in another state. * * *

The appellee was not required to make out a defense on the merits to the suit in Florida. * * * An error made in entering judgment against a party over whom the court had no jurisdiction permits a consideration of the jurisdictional question collaterally. The complaint was properly dismissed.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

Reread Tickle v. Barton, p. 31, supra. Which case presents a stronger situation for quashing service: Wyman or Tickle? Why? Would the result have been the same in Wyman if Newhouse had been in Florida and the trickery had been used to “flush him out of hiding”? Do you think that the situations in which plaintiff will resort to fraud, force, or artifice are increasingly rare given long-arm statutes and the ability to serve process outside the state where the court is located? See Burnham v. Superior Court, p. 223, supra. Are these rules nevertheless justified because, even in the rare case, they will deter plaintiffs from engaging in trickery?

D. OPPORTUNITY TO BE HEARD

Recall that in Mullane, p. 237, supra, Justice Jackson stated: “Many controversies have raged about the cryptic and abstract words of the Due Process Clause but there can be no doubt that at a minimum they require that deprivation of life, liberty or property by adjudication be preceded by notice and opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case.” In simple terms, a defendant has an adequate opportunity to be heard when—in light of the interests at stake in the litigation—defendant is able to develop the facts and legal issues in the case and present that party’s position to the court. Depending on the interests involved, an informal hearing may suffice, or a full trial may be required, or something in-between may pass muster.

In a series of cases beginning in the 1960s, the Court considered whether the Due Process Clause requires a hearing before the deprivation of liberty or property takes place, or whether a hearing after the fact sometimes suffices. The cases fell into two groups. The first group involved challenges to a private creditor’s use of a provisional remedy at the commencement of a lawsuit. Provisional remedies today are largely statutory in nature but date back to the common law writs; traditionally they operated as an exception to the requirement of prior notice and hearing. In practice, a provisional remedy allowed plaintiff to request an order from the court at the commencement or during the pendency of the suit allowing the seizure or encumbrance of defendant-debtor’s assets for the benefit of the creditor.

279

The second group of cases concerned whether a person who applied for a government benefit (such as a welfare payment, civil service job, or pilot license) was entitled under the Due Process Clause to a hearing before being denied the benefit. Until the mid-twentieth century, benefits of this sort were not considered to be “property” and so the Due Process Clause did not apply. The extension of the Due Process Clause to new forms of property was a major constitutional development. See Reich, The New Property, 73 Yale L.J. 733 (1964).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.In SNIADACH v. FAMILY FINANCE CORP. OF BAY VIEW, 395 U.S. 337, 89 S.Ct. 1820, 23 L.Ed.2d 349 (1969), the Supreme Court struck down the Wisconsin wage garnishment procedure as violative of due process. The statute authorized a summons to issue at the request of the creditor’s lawyer; service on the garnishee froze the debtor’s wages during the period before trial, and the wage earner had no opportunity to be heard prior to the garnishment. The Court explained:

A prejudgment garnishment of the Wisconsin type is a taking which may impose tremendous hardship on wage earners with families to support. Until a recent act of Congress, * * * which forbids discharge of employees on the ground that their wages have been garnished, garnishment often meant the loss of a job. Over and beyond that was the great drain on family income.

Id. at 340, 89 S.Ct. at 1822, 23 L.Ed.2d at 353. Justice Harlan, in concurrence, stated:

* * * Apart from special situations, * * * due process is afforded only by the kinds of “notice” and “hearing” which are aimed at establishing the validity, or at least the probable validity of the underlying claim against the alleged debtor before he can be deprived of his property or its unrestricted use.

Id. at 343, 89 S.Ct. at 1823, 23 L.Ed.2d at 354–55. Sniadach left open at least two questions: first, whether its rationale would apply to the prejudgment seizure of property other than wages when the debtor’s showing of hardship was less severe; and second, what kinds of “extraordinary situations” could justify the seizure of property without a prior hearing.

280

2.In FUENTES v. SHEVIN, 407 U.S. 67, 92 S.Ct. 1983, 32 L.Ed.2d 556, rehearing denied, 409 U.S. 902, 93 S.Ct. 177, 34 L.Ed.2d 165 (1972), the Court held, four-to-three, that state statutes authorizing the replevin of consumer goods without a pre-seizure hearing were unconstitutional. The writ of replevin is the traditional provisional remedy sought by a person claiming a possessory right to the property subject to seizure. See The Supreme Court, 1971 Term—Right to Hearing before Taking of Property, 86 Harv.L.Rev. 85 (1972). The property at issue in Fuentes consisted of an oven and a stereo purchased on credit and paid for in installments. In order to obtain the writ, the creditor was required to file a complaint with the court, thereby “initiating a court action for repossession and reciting in conclusory fashion that he is ‘lawfully entitled to the possession’ of the property, and that he file a security bond * * *.” The applicant was not required to make a “convincing showing” that the goods were in fact wrongfully detained by the debtor. Rather, as Justice Stewart explained:

On the sole basis of the complaint and bond, a writ is issued “command[ing] the officer to whom it may be directed to replevy the goods and chattels in possession of defendant * * * and to summon the defendant to answer the complaint.” * * * If the goods are “in any dwelling house or other building or enclosure,” the officer is required to demand their delivery; but if they are not delivered, “he shall cause such house, building or enclosure to be broken open and shall make replevin according to the writ * * *.” Fla. Stat. § 78.10.

Thus, at the same moment that the defendant receives the complaint seeking repossession of property through court action, the property is seized from him. He is provided no prior notice and allowed no opportunity whatever to challenge the issuance of the writ. After the property has been seized, he will eventually have an opportunity for a hearing, as the defendant in the trial of the court action for repossession, which the plaintiff is required to pursue. And he is also not wholly without recourse in the meantime. For under the Florida statute, the officer who seizes the property must keep it for three days, and during that period the defendant may reclaim possession of the property by posting his own security bond in double its value. But if he does not post such a bond, the property is transferred to the party who sought the writ, pending a final judgment in the underlying action for repossession. * * *

407 U.S. at 73–75, 93 S.Ct. at 1991, 34 L.Ed.2d at 566–67. The Court found that the process was tainted by a lack of judicial supervision:

[The Florida statute] * * * abdicate[s] effective state control over state power. Private parties, serving their own private advantage, may unilaterally invoke state power to replevy goods from another. No state official participates in the decision to seek a writ; no state official reviews the basis for the claim to repossession; and no state official evaluates the need for immediate seizure. There is not even a requirement that the plaintiff provide any information to the court on these matters. The State acts largely in the dark.

Id. at 93, 93 S.Ct. at 2001, 34 L.Ed.2d at 577.

The Court acknowledged that the Due Process Clause excuses a hearing before seizing property when there are “extraordinary situations,” but underscored that these situations “must be truly unusual”:

Only in a few limited situations has this Court allowed outright seizure * * * without opportunity for a prior hearing. First, in each case, the seizure has been directly necessary to secure an important governmental or general public interest. Second, there has been a special need for very prompt action. Third, the State has kept strict control over its monopoly of legitimate force; the person initiating the seizure has been a government official responsible for determining, under the standards of a narrowly drawn statute, that it was necessary and justified in the particular instance. Thus, the Court has allowed summary seizure of property to collect the internal revenue of the United States, to meet the needs of a national war effort, to protect against the economic disaster of a bank failure, and to protect the public from misbranded drugs and contaminated food.

Id. at 90–91, 93 S.Ct. at 1999–2000, 34 L.Ed.2d at 576 .

The Court found no “important governmental or general public interest” justifying the seizure “when no more than private gain is directly at stake.” In these circumstances, a hearing was required before, not after, removing the household goods from the debtor’s home:

The constitutional right to be heard is a basic aspect of the duty of government to follow a fair process of decisionmaking when it acts to deprive a person of his possessions. The purpose of this requirement is not only to ensure abstract fair play to the individual. Its purpose, more particularly, is to protect his use and possession of property from arbitrary encroachment—to minimize substantively unfair or mistaken deprivations of property, a danger that is especially great when the State seizes goods simply upon the application of and for the benefit of a private party. * * *

The requirement of notice and an opportunity to be heard raises no impenetrable barrier to the taking of a person’s possessions. But the fair process of decisionmaking that it guarantees works, by itself, to protect against arbitrary deprivation of property. For when a person has an opportunity to speak up in his own defense, and when the State must listen to what he has to say, substantively unfair and simply mistaken deprivations of property interests can be prevented. * * *

If the right to notice and a hearing is to serve its full purpose, then, it is clear that it must be granted at a time when the deprivation can still be prevented. At a later hearing, an individual’s possessions can be returned to him if they were unfairly or mistakenly taken in the first place. Damages may even be awarded to him for the wrongful deprivation. But no later hearing and no damage award can undo the fact that the arbitrary taking that was subject to the right of procedural due process has already occurred. * * *

* * * To be sure, the requirements that a party seeking a writ must first post a bond, allege conclusorily that he is entitled to specific goods, and open himself to possible liability in damages if he is wrong, serve to deter wholly unfounded applications for a writ. But those requirements are hardly a substitute for a prior hearing, for they test no more than the strength of the applicant’s own belief in his rights. Since his private gain is at stake, the danger is all too great that his confidence in his cause will be misplaced. * * *

The minimal deterrent effect of a bond requirement is, in a practical sense, no substitute for an informed evaluation by a neutral official. * * * While the existence of these other, less effective, safeguards may be among the considerations that affect the form of hearing demanded by due process, they are far from enough by themselves to obviate the right to a prior hearing of some kind.

Id. at 80–84, 93 S.Ct. at 1994–96, 34 L.Ed.2d at 570–72 .

Finally, the Court found that the consumer had not waived a right to due process by signing the conditional sales contract:

The contract signed by Mrs. Fuentes provided that “in the event of default of any payment or payments, Seller at its option may take back the merchandise * * *.”

* * * [A] waiver of constitutional rights in any context must, at the very least, be clear. We need not concern ourselves with the involuntariness or unintelligence of a waiver when the contractual language relied upon does not, on its face, even amount to a waiver.

The conditional sales contracts here simply provided that upon a default the seller “may take back,” “may retake” or “may repossess” merchandise. The contracts included nothing about the waiver of a prior hearing. They did not indicate how or through what process—a final judgment, self-help, prejudgment replevin with a prior hearing, or prejudgment replevin without a prior hearing—the seller could take back the goods. Rather, the purported waiver provisions here are no more than a statement of the seller’s right to repossession upon occurrence of certain events. * * *

Id. at 94–96, 93 S.Ct. at 2001–02, 34 L.Ed.2d at 578–79. See Clark & Landers, Sniadach, Fuentes and Beyond: The Creditor Meets the Constitution, 59 Va.L.Rev. 355 (1973); Note, Procedural Due Process—The Prior Hearing Rule and the Demise of Ex Parte Remedies, 53 B.U.L.Rev. 41 (1973).

3.In MITCHELL v. W.T. GRANT CO., 416 U.S. 600, 94 S.Ct. 1895, 40 L.Ed.2d 406 (1974), the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a Louisiana sequestration statute that allowed seizure of property before a hearing upon two conditions: (1) the applicant claimed a possessory interest in the property; and (2) defendant could conceal, waste, remove, or otherwise dispose of the property during the pendency of the suit. Application for the writ was ex parte and afforded no prior notice to defendant. The suit involved an overdue balance for personal property bought under an installment sales contract. The Court upheld the procedure, finding that the risk of a wrongful taking was minimized by the vendor’s interest in preventing waste of the property, the court’s involvement in authorizing the writ, the suitability of resolving the dispute by documentary evidence, and the immediate availability of a post-seizure hearing. However, in NORTH GEORGIA FINISHING, INC. v. DI-CHEM, INC., 419 U.S. 601, 95 S.Ct. 719, 42 L.Ed.2d 751 (1975), the Court invalidated a Georgia garnishment statute, finding it was constitutionally deficient because it authorized the writ on the basis of conclusory allegations without providing defendant an “early” hearing “or other safeguard against mistaken repossession.” Id. at 606, 95 S.Ct. at 722, 40 L.Ed.2d at 757.

4. The Sniadach line of cases did not articulate an overall test for determining when a provisional remedy would meet constitutional standards and when it would not. Was the Court in practice applying a rule that notice and a prior hearing were required before seizure of a defendant’s property, absent a showing of extraordinary circumstances? Or, was the court engaged in a balancing test that looked to the reasonableness of the procedure? If so, what factors counted in the overall balance? The cases hinted at a number of factors critical to the Court’s analysis, but did not assign weights to any one of them:

- Who—whether a judge or a clerk is the decision-maker;
- What—whether the party seeking relief has a pre-existing interest in the property to be seized or encumbered;
- When—whether the seizure is effected before notice and hearing, or is followed by an immediate post-seizure hearing;
- Why—whether the seizure is to establish jurisdiction or for security purposes, and if for security purposes, whether exceptional circumstances such as destruction of an asset are presented;
- How—whether the applicant must show probable cause or meet a lesser burden of proof; whether factual allegations must be sworn to under penalty of perjury and based on personal knowledge; and whether the dispute can be resolved by uncontested documentary evidence.

- 5.Should the Sniadach line of cases apply when an attachment is used to establish jurisdiction (as in Shaffer, p. 210, supra)?
- 6. Parallel to the cases involving provisional remedies, the Supreme Court considered the applicability of the Due Process Clause to the administration of government benefit programs. In GOLDBERG v. KELLY, 397 U.S. 254, 90 S.Ct. 1011, 25 L.Ed.2d 287 (1970), the Court held that the recipient of government-funded public assistance is entitled to “the opportunity for an evidentiary hearing prior to termination” of those benefits. Id. at 255, 90 S.Ct. at 1014, 25 L.Ed.2d at 292. In reaching this decision, the Court emphasized the recipient’s “brutal need” for assistance of this sort, observing that “termination of aid pending resolution of a controversy over eligibility may deprive an eligible recipient of the very means by which to live while he waits.” Id. at 261, 264, 90 S.Ct. at 1017, 1018, 25 L.Ed.2d at 295, 297. The Court made clear that although a full-scale judicial trial was not required, the hearing had to be tailored “to the capacities and circumstances of those who are to be heard.” Id. at 268–69, 90 S.Ct. at 1021, 25 L.Ed.2d at 299.

Goldberg appeared to link the “kind of hearing” that due process requires with the importance of plaintiff’s interest in the benefit that was being withheld. See Friendly, “Some Kind of Hearing,” 123 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1267 (1975). On this basis, the Court in MATHEWS v. ELDRIDGE, 424 U.S. 319, 96 S.Ct. 893, 47 L.Ed.2d 18 (1976), held that the Due Process Clause does not require a hearing before the government terminates a recipient’s Social Security disability benefits. The Court explained that the loss of disability benefits did not present as strong a showing of hardship as the loss of public assistance. The Court made clear, however, that “the degree of potential deprivation” is only one of a number of factors that affect what process is due. Other factors to be considered are “the fairness and reliability” of existing procedures and “the probable value, if any of additional procedural safeguards.” Id. at 341–43, 96 S.Ct. at 906–07, 47 L.Ed.2d at 37–38. Determining what process is due also must take account of the “public interest,” including any “administrative burden and other societal costs” involved with constitutionalizing the procedures to be provided. Id. at 347, 96 S.Ct. at 909, 47 L.Ed.2d at 40. Rather than looking exclusively to the individual interest at stake, the Court thus put forward a balancing test that considers three factors:

- First, the private interest that will be affected by the official action; second, the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute procedural safeguards; and finally, the Government’s interest, including the function involved and the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedural requirement would entail.
- Id. at 335, 96 S.Ct. at 903, 47 L.Ed.2d at 33.
- 7.Would application of the Mathews test have changed the outcome in Fuentes, p. 280, Note 2, supra? Can you reconcile the Mathews-balancing test with the factor-analysis of Sniadach and its progeny? Consider the factors listed on p. 283, Note 4, supra. How would you organize those factors to align with the Mathews test?
- 8.In JONES v. GOVERNOR OF FLORIDA, 975 F.3d 1016 (11th Cir. 2020), the en banc Eleventh Circuit considered a challenge to Florida’s statute permitting reenfranchisement of individuals convicted of felonies. After Florida voters voted to amend the state constitution to allow those who had been convicted of felonies and completed their sentences to vote—overall, about 1.4 million people—the legislature enacted a statute that (a) limited reenfranchisement to those who had paid all fees and costs incurred in connection with the convictions; and (b) imposed a penalty on persons who registered to vote without having met the specified financial conditions. There were significant practical difficulties, however, for any individual who wished to locate their prior criminal judgments, to determine whether fees were imposed because of felony or other offenses, or to identify how much of their debt remained. The district court issued an injunction against what it called the “pay-to-vote system,” ordering as a remedy that an individual may request an opinion from the Division of Elections stating their total amount of outstanding fines and restitution and permitting any individual who did not receive an answer within 21 days to register to vote without the threat of penalty or prosecution.

285

In reversing the injunction, the Eleventh Circuit majority emphasized the distinction between legislative and adjudicative action; legislative action includes general laws that apply to “more than a few people” and are “prospective in nature”; adjudicative action applies to a “relatively small number of persons” who are “exceptionally affected, in each case upon individual grounds” by the action. Id. at 1048. Because the deprivation of the right to vote occurred “through legislative action, not adjudicative action,” the majority concluded that the Mathews balancing test did not come into play. Rather, “the affected persons are not entitled to any process beyond that provided by the legislative process.” Id. (citing Bi-Metallic Investment Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 239 U.S. 441, 445, 36 S.Ct. 141, 142, 60 L.Ed. 372, 375 (1915)). “The Due Process Clause does not require States to provide individual process to help citizens learn the facts necessary to comply with laws of general application.” Id. at 1049.

Consider, by contrast, this example from one of the Jones dissenting opinions:

[I]magine a state that requires, as a condition of renewing drivers’ licenses and vehicle registrations, that drivers pay all outstanding citations for parking/traffic infractions. A driver goes to his county agency and is told that he may have some unpaid citations. He asks for information about the citations and their respective amounts so that he can verify their accuracy and pay whatever is outstanding. But the clerk tells him that the state can’t give him the information because the debt for the citations has been sold to third-party collection agencies; those agencies charge certain fees (which vary by agency and year) on top of the citation amounts; and the county has no way of knowing what those fees are or what amounts have been paid or credited. The clerk tries to call other state agencies (and some of the collection agencies) to get answers, but to no avail, and tells the driver he will have to figure everything out on his own. So the driver has to leave without his license and car registration, and will need to risk driving in violation of the law—and face arrest—in order to get to work, take his children to school, and carry out the other tasks of daily life. Would this state of affairs be constitutionally permissible? Of course not.

286

Id. at 1094–95 (Jordan, J., dissenting).

CONNECTICUT v. DOEHR
Supreme Court of the United States, 1991.
501 U.S. 1, 111 S.Ct. 2105, 115 L.Ed.2d 1.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE WHITE delivered an opinion, Parts I, II, and III of which are the opinion of the Court.*

This case requires us to determine whether a state statute that authorizes prejudgment attachment of real estate without prior notice or hearing, without a showing of extraordinary circumstances, and without a requirement that the person seeking the attachment post a bond, satisfies the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. We hold that, as applied to this case, it does not.

I

On March 15, 1988, Petitioner John F. DiGiovanni submitted an application to the Connecticut Superior Court for an attachment in the amount of $75,000 on respondent Brian K. Doehr’s home in * * * Connecticut. DiGiovanni took this step in conjunction with a civil action for assault and battery that he was seeking to institute against Doehr in the same court. The suit did not involve Doehr’s real estate nor did DiGiovanni have any pre-existing interest either in Doehr’s home or any of his other property.

Connecticut law authorizes prejudgment attachment of real estate without affording prior notice or the opportunity for a prior hearing to the individual whose property is subject to the attachment. The State’s prejudgment remedy statute provides, in relevant part:

“The court or a judge of the court may allow the prejudgment remedy to be issued by an attorney without hearing * * * upon verification by oath of the plaintiff or of some competent affiant, that there is probable cause to sustain the validity of the plaintiff’s claims and (1) that the prejudgment remedy requested is for an attachment of real property . . .” Conn.Gen.Stat. § 52–278e (1991). * * *

The statute does not require the plaintiff to post a bond to insure the payment of damages that the defendant may suffer should the attachment prove wrongfully issued or the claim prove unsuccessful.

As required, DiGiovanni submitted an affidavit in support of his application. In five one-sentence paragraphs, DiGiovanni stated that the facts set forth in his previously submitted complaint were true; that “I was willfully, wantonly and maliciously assaulted by the defendant, Brian K. Doehr”; that “[s]aid assault and battery broke my left wrist and further caused an ecchymosis to my right eye, as well as other injuries”; and that “I have further expended sums of money for medical care and treatment.”* * * The affidavit concluded with the statement, “In my opinion, the foregoing facts are sufficient to show that there is probable cause that judgment will be rendered for the plaintiff.” * * *

On the strength of these submissions the Superior Court judge * * * found “probable cause to sustain the validity of the plaintiff’s claim” and ordered the attachment on Doehr’s home “to the value of $75,000.” The sheriff attached the property four days later * * *. Only after this did Doehr receive notice of the attachment. He also had yet to be served with the complaint, which is ordinarily necessary for an action to commence in Connecticut. * * * As the statute further required, the attachment notice informed Doehr that he had the right to a hearing: (1) to claim that no probable cause existed to sustain the claim; (2) to request that the attachment be vacated, modified, or that a bond be substituted; or (3) to claim that some portion of the property was exempt from execution. * * *

Rather than pursue these options, Doehr filed suit against DiGiovanni in Federal District Court, claiming that [the statute] was unconstitutional under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. * * * The District Court upheld the statute and granted summary judgment in favor of DiGiovanni. * * * On appeal, a divided panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed. * * * Judge Pratt, who wrote the opinion for the court, concluded that the Connecticut statute violated due process in permitting ex parte attachment absent a showing of extraordinary circumstances. “The rule to be derived from Sniadach * * * and its progeny * * * is not that postattachment hearings are generally acceptable provided that the plaintiff files a factual affidavit and that a judicial officer supervises the process, but that a prior hearing may be postponed where exceptional circumstances justify such a delay, and where sufficient additional safeguards are present.” * * *

A further reason to invalidate the statute, the court ruled, was the highly factual nature of the issues in this case. In Mitchell, there were “uncomplicated matters that len[t] themselves to documentary proof” and “[t]he nature of the issues at stake minimize[d] the risk that the writ

[would] be wrongfully issued by a judge.”⁵ * * * Judge Pratt observed that in contrast the present case involved the fact-specific event of a fist fight and the issue of assault. He doubted that the judge could reliably determine probable cause when presented with only the plaintiff’s version of the altercation. * * * Judge Pratt went on to conclude that in his view, the statute was also constitutionally infirm for its failure to require the plaintiff to post a bond for the protection of the defendant in the event the attachment was ultimately found to have been improvident.

* * *

II

With this case we return to the question of what process must be afforded by a state statute enabling an individual to enlist the aid of the State to deprive another of his or her property by means of the prejudgment attachment or similar procedure. Our cases reflect the numerous variations this type of remedy can entail. * * * In Mathews, we drew upon our prejudgment remedy decisions to determine what process is due when the government itself seeks to effect a deprivation on its own initiative. * * * That analysis resulted in * * * [a] threefold inquiry * * *.

Here the inquiry is similar but the focus is different. Prejudgment remedy statutes ordinarily apply to disputes between private parties rather than between an individual and the government. * * * For this type of case, therefore, the relevant inquiry requires, as in Mathews, first, consideration of the private interest that will be affected by the prejudgment measure; second, an examination of the risk of erroneous deprivation through the procedures under attack and the probable value of additional or alternative safeguards; and third, in contrast to Mathews, principal attention to the interest of the party seeking the prejudgment remedy, with, nonetheless, due regard for any ancillary interest the government may have in providing the procedure or forgoing the added burden of providing greater protections.

We now consider the Mathews factors in determining the adequacy of the procedures before us, first with regard to the safeguards of notice and a prior hearing, and then in relation to the protection of a bond.

We agree with the Court of Appeals that the property interests that attachment affects are significant. For a property owner like Doebr, attachment ordinarily clouds title; impairs the ability to sell or otherwise alienate the property; taints any credit rating; reduces the chance of obtaining a home equity loan or additional mortgage; and can even place an existing mortgage in technical default where there is an insecurity clause. * * *

* * * [Connecticut] correctly points out that these effects do not amount to a complete, physical, or permanent deprivation of real property; their impact is less than the perhaps temporary total deprivation of household goods or wages. * * * But the Court has never held that only such extreme deprivations trigger due process concern. * * * To the contrary, our cases show that even the temporary or partial impairments to property rights that attachments, liens, and similar encumbrances entail are sufficient to merit due process protection. * * *

We also agree with the Court of Appeals that the risk of erroneous deprivation that the State permits here is substantial. By definition, attachment statutes premise a deprivation of property on one ultimate factual contingency—the award of damages to the plaintiff which the defendant may not be able to satisfy. * * * For attachments before judgment, Connecticut mandates that this determination be made by means of a procedural inquiry that asks whether “there is probable cause to sustain the validity of the plaintiff’s claim.” * * * What probable cause means in this context, however, remains obscure. The State initially took the position * * * that the statute requires a plaintiff to show the objective likelihood of the suit’s success. * * * Doebr, citing ambiguous state cases, reads the provision as requiring no more than that a plaintiff demonstrate a subjective good faith belief that the suit will succeed. * * * At oral argument, the State shifted its position to argue that the statute requires something akin to the plaintiff stating a claim with sufficient facts to survive a motion to dismiss.

We need not resolve this confusion since the statute presents too great a risk of erroneous deprivation under any of these interpretations. If the statute demands inquiry into the sufficiency of the complaint, or, still less, the plaintiff’s good-faith belief that the complaint is sufficient, requirement of a complaint and a factual affidavit would permit a court to make these minimal determinations. But neither inquiry adequately reduces the risk of erroneous deprivation. Permitting a court to authorize attachment merely because the plaintiff believes the defendant is liable, or because the plaintiff can make out a facially valid complaint, would permit the deprivation of the defendant’s property when the claim would fail to convince a jury, when it rested on factual allegations that were sufficient to state a cause of action but which the defendant would dispute, or in the case of a mere good-faith standard, even when the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The potential for unwarranted attachment in these situations is self-evident and too great to satisfy the requirements of due process absent any countervailing consideration.

Even if the provision requires the plaintiff to demonstrate, and the judge to find, probable cause to believe that judgment will be rendered in favor of the plaintiff, the risk of error was substantial in this case. As the record shows, and as the State concedes, only a skeletal affidavit need be and was filed. The State urges that the reviewing judge normally reviews the complaint as well, but concedes that the complaint may also be conclusory. It is self-evident that the judge could make no realistic assessment concerning the likelihood of an action’s success based upon these one-sided, self-serving, and conclusory submissions. And as the Court of Appeals said, in a case like this involving an alleged assault, even a detailed affidavit would give only the plaintiff’s version of the confrontation. Unlike determining the existence of a debt or delinquent payments, the issue does not concern “ordinarily uncomplicated matters that lend themselves to documentary proof.” Mitchell * * *. * * *

What safeguards the State does afford do not adequately reduce this risk. Connecticut points out that the statute also provides an “expeditiou[s]” postattachment adversary hearing * * *; notice for such a hearing * * *; judicial review of an adverse decision * * *; and a double damages action if the original suit is commenced without probable cause * * *. Similar considerations were present in Mitchell * * *. But in Mitchell, the plaintiff had a vendor’s lien to protect, the risk of error was minimal because the likelihood of recovery involved uncomplicated matters that lent themselves to documentary proof, * * * and plaintiff was required to put up a bond. None of these factors diminishing the need for a predeprivation hearing is present in this case. It is true that a later hearing might negate the presence of probable cause, but this would not cure the temporary deprivation that an earlier hearing might have prevented. * * *

Finally, we conclude that the interests in favor of an ex parte attachment, particularly the interests of the plaintiff, are too minimal to supply such a consideration here. Plaintiff had no existing interest in Doebr’s real estate when he sought the attachment. His only interest in attaching the property was to ensure the availability of assets to satisfy his judgment if he prevailed on the merits of his action. Yet there was no allegation that Doebr was about to transfer or encumber his real estate or take any other action during the pendency of the action that would render his real estate unavailable to satisfy a judgment. Our cases have recognized such a properly supported claim would be an exigent circumstance permitting postponing any notice or hearing until after the attachment is effected. * * * Absent such allegations, however, the plaintiff’s interest in attaching the property does not justify the burdening of Doebr’s ownership rights without a hearing to determine the likelihood of recovery.

No interest the government may have affects the analysis. The State’s substantive interest in protecting any rights of the plaintiff cannot be any more weighty than those rights themselves. Here the plaintiff’s interest is de minimis. Moreover, the State cannot seriously plead additional financial or administrative burdens involving predeprivation hearings when it already claims to provide an immediate post-deprivation hearing. * * *

Historical and contemporary practices support our analysis. * * *

* * * A survey of state attachment provisions reveals that nearly every state requires either a preattachment hearing, a showing of some exigent circumstance, or both, before permitting an attachment to take place. * * *

* * *

IV

A

Although a majority of the Court does not reach the issue, Justices Marshall, Stevens, O'Connor, and I deem it appropriate to consider whether due process also requires the plaintiff to post a bond or other security in addition to requiring a hearing or showing of some exigency.

As noted, the impairments to property rights that attachments affect merit due process protection. Several consequences can be severe, such as the default of a homeowner's mortgage. In the present context, it need only be added that we have repeatedly recognized the utility of a bond in protecting property rights affected by the mistaken award of prejudgment remedies. * * *

Without a bond, at the time of attachment, the danger that these property rights may be wrongfully deprived remains unacceptably high even with such safeguards as a hearing or exigency requirement. The need for a bond is especially apparent where extraordinary circumstances justify an attachment with no more than the plaintiff's ex parte assertion of a claim. * * * Until a postattachment hearing * * *, a defendant has no protection against damages sustained where no extraordinary circumstance in fact existed or the plaintiff's likelihood of recovery was nil. Such protection is what a bond can supply. * * *

But the need for a bond does not end here. A defendant's property rights remain at undue risk even when there has been an adversarial hearing to determine the plaintiff's likelihood of recovery. At best, a court's initial assessment of each party's case cannot produce more than an educated prediction as to who will win. This is especially true when, as here, the nature of the claim makes any accurate prediction elusive. * * * In consequence, even a full hearing under a proper probable-cause standard would not prevent many defendants from having title to their homes impaired during the pendency of suits that never result in the contingency that ultimately justifies such impairment, namely, an award to the plaintiff. Attachment measures currently on the books reflect this concern. All but a handful of States require a plaintiff's bond despite also affording a hearing either before, or (for the vast majority, only under extraordinary circumstances) soon after, an attachment takes place. * * *

The State stresses its double damages remedy for suits that are commenced without probable cause. * * * This remedy, however, fails to make up for the lack of a bond. As an initial matter, the meaning of "probable cause" in this provision is no more clear here than it was in the attachment provision itself. Should the term mean the plaintiff's good faith or the facial adequacy of the complaint, the remedy is clearly insufficient. A defendant who was deprived where there was little or no likelihood that the plaintiff would obtain a judgment could nonetheless recover only by proving some type of fraud or malice or by showing that the plaintiff had failed to state a claim. * * *

Nor is there any appreciable interest against a bond requirement. * * * [Under the statute, a] plaintiff [is not required] to show exigent circumstances nor any pre-existing interest in the property facing attachment. A party must show more than the mere existence of a claim before subjecting an opponent to prejudgment proceedings that carry a significant risk of erroneous deprivation. * * *

B

Our foregoing discussion compels the four of us to consider whether a bond excuses the need for a hearing or other safeguards altogether. If a bond is needed to augment the protections afforded by preattachment and postattachment hearings, it arguably follows that a bond renders these safeguards unnecessary. That conclusion is unconvincing, however, for it ignores certain harms that bonds could not undo but that hearings would prevent. The law concerning attachments has rarely, if ever, required defendants to suffer an encumbered title until the case is concluded without any prior opportunity to show that the attachment was unwarranted. Our cases have repeatedly emphasized the importance of providing a prompt postdeprivation hearing at the very least. * * *

The necessity for at least a prompt postattachment hearing is self-evident because the right to be compensated at the end of the case, if the plaintiff loses, for all provable injuries caused by the attachment is inadequate to redress the harm inflicted, harm that could have been avoided had an early hearing been held. An individual with an immediate need or opportunity to sell a property can neither do so, nor otherwise satisfy that need or recreate the opportunity. The same applies to a parent in need of a home equity loan for a child's education, an entrepreneur seeking to start a business on the strength of an otherwise strong credit rating, or simply a homeowner who might face the disruption of having a mortgage placed in technical default. * * * [It should be clear that r]eliance on a bond does not sufficiently account for the harms that flow from an erroneous attachment to excuse a State from reducing that risk by means of a timely hearing.

If a bond cannot serve to dispense with a hearing immediately after attachment, neither is it sufficient basis for not providing a preattachment hearing in the absence of exigent circumstances even if in any event a hearing would be provided a few days later. The reasons are the same: a wrongful attachment can inflict injury that will not fully be redressed by recovery on the bond after a prompt postattachment hearing determines that the attachment was invalid.

* * *

V

Because Connecticut’s prejudgment remedy provision * * * violates the requirements of due process * * *, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed, and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

[An appendix of prejudgment attachment statutes is deleted.]

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST with whom JUSTICE BLACKMUN joins, concurring.

I agree with the Court that the Connecticut attachment statute, “as applied in this case,” * * * fails to satisfy the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. I therefore join Parts I, II and III of its opinion. Unfortunately, the remainder of the Court’s opinion does not confine itself to the facts of this case, but enters upon a lengthy disquisition as to what combination of safeguards are required to satisfy Due Process in hypothetical cases not before the Court. I therefore do not join Part IV.

* * * The Court’s opinion is, in my view, ultimately correct when it bases its holding of unconstitutionality of the Connecticut statute as applied here on [the basis of our prior decisions] * * *. But I do not believe that the result follows so inexorably as the Court’s opinion suggests. All of the cited cases dealt with personalty—bank deposits or chattels—and each involved the physical seizure of the property itself, so that the defendant was deprived of its use. These cases, which represented something of a revolution in the jurisprudence of due process, placed substantial limits on the methods by which creditors could obtain a lien on the assets of a debtor prior to judgment. * * * [I]n all of them the debtor was deprived of the use and possession of the property. In the present case, on the other hand, Connecticut’s prejudgment attachment on real property statute, which secures an incipient lien for the plaintiff, does not deprive the defendant of the use or possession of the property.

294

The Court’s opinion therefore breaks new ground * * *. * * * I agree with the Court, however, that upon analysis the deprivation here is a significant one, even though the owner remains in undisturbed possession. * * *

* * *

It is both unwise and unnecessary, I believe, for the Court to proceed, as it does in Part IV, from its decision of the case before it to discuss abstract and hypothetical situations not before it. * * * The two elements of due process with which the Court concerns itself in Part IV—the requirement of a bond, and of “exigent circumstances”—prove to be upon analysis so vague that the discussion is not only unnecessary, but not particularly useful. * * * We should await concrete cases which present questions involving bonds and exigent circumstances before we attempt to decide when and if the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires them as prerequisites for a lawful attachment.

[The concurring opinion of JUSTICE SCALIA is omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. SHAUMYAN v. O’NEILL, 987 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1993), involved the same attachment statute at issue in Doehr, but applied in a contract dispute between a homeowner and a contractor hired to do repairs. The homeowner questioned the quality of the repair work and refused to pay the remainder of the bill. The contractor moved ex parte in state court and obtained a prejudgment attachment against the owner’s home. While the state court action was pending, the homeowner sued in federal court to enjoin enforcement of the statute as violative of due process. Both the district court and the court of appeals rejected the constitutional challenge. Although the homeowner had a strong private interest, the likelihood of an erroneous deprivation was not high because the evidence largely involved written documentation; moreover, the contractor “had a substantial pre-existing interest” in the property once his labor and materials had been incorporated into plaintiff’s home. Id. at 127. See Alquist, Balancing the Checklist: Connecticut’s Legislative Response to Connecticut v. Doehr, 26 Conn.L.Rev. 721 (1994).

2. In Doehr, due process applied even though defendant continued to possess and reside in his home after the attachment. In the wake of Doehr, commentators questioned the constitutionality of lis pendens statutes, which permit a plaintiff who claims an interest in real property to file a “notice of pendency” that alerts potential buyers of the claim; the property owner is not given an opportunity to contest imposition of the notice. See Levy, Lis Pendens and Procedural Due Process: A Closer Look After Connecticut v. Doehr, 51 Md.L.Rev. 1054 (1992). In DIAZ v. PATERSON, 547 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 2008), a federal appeals court upheld the constitutionality of New York’s lis pendens statute, applying the Mathews factors as construed in Doehr. Should the property owner be given an opportunity to challenge the notice after it has been imposed?

3. In BENNIS v. MICHIGAN, 516 U.S. 442, 116 S.Ct. 994, 134 L.Ed.2d 68 (1996), the state of Michigan forfeited a family’s automobile as a public nuisance, following the husband’s use of the car for sex acts with a prostitute and his conviction for gross indecency. The government provided the wife with notice and an opportunity to contest the forfeiture, but refused to make an offset for the wife’s joint interest in the property, and she challenged the forfeiture on due process grounds. The Court rejected her challenge, explaining that “a long and unbroken line of cases holds that an owner’s interest in property may be forfeited by reason of the use to which the property is put even though the owner did not know that it was to be put to such use.” Id. at 446, 116 S.Ct. at 998, 134 L.Ed.2d at 74.

4. In NELSON v. COLORADO, 581 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 1249, 197 L.Ed.2d 611 (2017), the Court held that the Colorado Exoneration Act failed to satisfy due process under the Mathews balancing test. The Court described the statute as follows:

The Exoneration Act provides a civil claim for relief “to compensate an innocent person who was wrongly convicted.” * * * Recovery under the Act is available only to a defendant who has served all or part of a term of incarceration pursuant to a felony conviction, and whose conviction has been overturned for reasons other than insufficiency of evidence or legal error unrelated to actual innocence. * * * To succeed on an Exoneration Act claim, a petitioner must show, by clear and convincing evidence, her actual innocence of the offense of conviction. * * * A successful petitioner may recoup, in addition to compensation for time served, “any fine, penalty, court costs, or restitution . . . paid . . . as a result of his or her wrongful conviction.” * * *

Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1254, 197 L.Ed.2d at 617.

Looking to the private interest, the Court found that the claimants had “an obvious interest in regaining the money they paid to Colorado,” and that the state could not lay claim to the funds once innocence had been restored. Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1255–56, 197 L.Ed.2d at 618. Further, the Court found an unacceptable risk of erroneous deprivation; the claimants should be presumed innocent, and not “saddled with any proof burden,” especially a burden as high as clear and convincing evidence. Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1251, 1256, 197 L.Ed.2d at 614, 619. Finally, the Court found no countervailing interest in the state’s retaining the funds—indeed, it found that the state had “no interest in withholding” the funds once the conviction had been invalidated. Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1257–58, 197 L.Ed.2d at 620. Justice Thomas, dissenting, questioned whether due process even applied. To state a procedural due process claim, the dissent argued, plaintiff must first identify a protected property interest, and there had been no showing that plaintiffs actually were entitled to the funds they sought to recover.

5. Can a party’s opportunity to be heard be meaningful without adequate legal representation? The Supreme Court repeatedly has held that the Due Process Clause does not mandate the appointment of counsel for civil litigants who are too poor to retain a lawyer; whether to appoint counsel instead depends on a balance of factors. In LASSITER v. DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES, 452 U.S. 18, 101 S.Ct. 2153, 68 L.Ed.2d 640 (1981), the Court underscored that there is a “presumption that an indigent litigant has a right to appointed counsel only when, if he loses, he may be deprived of his physical liberty.” Id. at 26–27, 101 S.Ct. 2159, 68 L.Ed.2d at 649. Under that standard, the Court held that due process was not violated when a trial court failed to appoint counsel prior to terminating a mother’s parental rights when the petition contained no allegations that would have exposed her to criminal liability. Later, in TURNER v. ROGERS, 564 U.S. 431, 131 S.Ct. 2507, 180 L.Ed.2d 452 (2011), the Court considered whether due process required the appointment of counsel for a father who was held in civil contempt and jailed for repeated failure to make court-ordered child support payments, or whether it was sufficient for the Court to determine the contemnor’s financial capacity to make the payment. Justice Breyer, writing for a divided Court, held that counsel was not necessarily required:

Due Process Clause does not automatically require the provision of counsel at civil contempt proceedings to an indigent individual who is subject to a child support order, even if that individual faces incarceration (for up to a year). In particular, that Clause does not require the provision of counsel where the opposing parent or other custodian (to whom support funds are owed) is not represented by counsel and the State provides alternative procedural safeguards [such as or equivalent to] * * * adequate notice of the importance of ability to pay, fair opportunity to present, and to dispute, relevant information, and court findings * * *.

Id. at 448, 131 S.Ct. at 2520, 180 L.Ed.2d at 466. In this case, however, the Court found that the state had failed to provide even those alternative safeguards; therefore, the contemnor’s incarceration violated due process. Id. at 449, 131 S.Ct. at 2520, 180 L.Ed.2d at 466–67.

^aMaude Adams (1872–1953) is said to have been the highest paid actor of the period and was widely famous for her performance in Peter Pan. See Seville, Peter Pan’s Rights: “To Die Will Be an Awfully Big Adventure,” 51 J. Copyright Soc’y U.S.A. 1 (2003).

²The paragraph in its entirety read as follows: “This agreement shall be deemed to have been made in Nassau County, New York, regardless of the order in which the signatures of the parties shall be affixed hereto, and shall be interpreted, and the rights and liabilities of the parties here determined, in accordance with the laws of the State of New York; and the Lessee hereby designates Florence Weinberg, 47–21 Forty-first Street, Long Island City, N.Y., as agent for the purpose of accepting service of any process within the State of New York.”

^bAlteration in original.

³There is no allegation that Weinberg had any pecuniary interest in the subject matter of the litigation. Nor is the issue here the applicability of a statute which permits service on a foreign corporation by service on persons who are generally authorized to act as agents of the corporation, when the agent upon whom service is made has a personal interest in suppressing notice of service * * *.

^cRule 4(d)(1) currently is Rule 4(e)(2)(C).

^dRule 4(d)(3) now comprises part of Rule 4(h).

^eThe Chief Justice, Justice Blackmun, Justice Kennedy, and Justice Souter join Parts I, II, and III of this opinion, and Justice Scalia joins Parts I and III.

^fAlteration in original.

CHAPTER 4

JURISDICTION OVER THE SUBJECT MATTER OF THE ACTION—THE COURT’S COMPETENCY

■ ■ ■

This chapter considers subject-matter jurisdiction: the power of a court to hear a case given the nature of the dispute, as distinct from its power to enter a judgment against a particular defendant. Every court system has its own rules governing subject-matter jurisdiction. The United States comprises multiple court systems—including the federal and those of the states. The federal courts are governed by Article III of the federal Constitution, federal statutes, and federal judicial decisions. The courts of the different states are governed by their respective state constitutions, statutes, and judicial decisions, and—to a limited extent—by federal law. State and federal courts have overlapping jurisdiction over certain kinds of cases, and this concurrent jurisdiction gives plaintiff a significant litigation advantage in choosing where to file suit. However, in some cases, defendant may veto plaintiff’s decision to file suit in a state court by transferring (“removing”) the action to federal court. These opportunities to “forum shop” help to promote litigant autonomy, but in some circumstances may conflict with important public concerns.

A. SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION IN STATE COURTS

LACKS V. LACKS

New York Court of Appeals, 1976.
41 N.Y.2d 71, 390 N.Y.S.2d 875, 359 N.E.2d 384.

BREITEL, CHIEF JUDGE. * * * The parties were married in New York in 1938. After an apparently turbulent marriage, marked since 1953 by a series of bitter litigations, the husband, on August 10, 1965, began this action for a separation on the ground of cruelty. After nonjury trial, Supreme Court, on June 28, 1967, dismissed the complaint, but, on March 26, 1968, the Appellate Division reversed, and ordered a new trial. At the second trial, plaintiff husband, in reliance upon the then recent liberalizing changes in the divorce law, added a prayer for a judgment of absolute divorce, on the same allegations and proof as the earlier cause for separation. The husband was granted a judgment of divorce on March 16, 1970, and, after modifications not now relevant, the judgment was affirmed by the Appellate Division on October 26, 1972. Leave to appeal to the Court of Appeals was denied by both the Appellate Division and this court. The final judgment was thus beyond further review.

298

Then, nearly two years later, defendant, through her most recently retained lawyer, moved to vacate the judgment, contending that the court had been without subject matter jurisdiction to entertain the divorce action. She argued that the husband had not been a resident of New York for a full year preceding the commencement of the original action, and that the court had thus erroneously granted a divorce judgment in violation of the provisions of section 230. This defect, she urged, deprived the court of subject matter jurisdiction, and all the proceedings and the judgment were a nullity.

* * *

A statement that a court lacks “jurisdiction” to decide a case may, in reality, mean that elements of a cause of action are absent * * *. Similarly, questions of mootness and standing of parties may be characterized as raising questions of subject matter jurisdiction * * *. But these are not the kinds of judicial infirmities to which CPLR 5015 * * * is addressed. That provision is designed to preserve objections so fundamental to the power of adjudication of a court that they survive even a final judgment or order * * *.^a

In Thrasher v. United States Liab. Ins. Co., 19 N.Y.2d 159, 166, * * * this court, in discussing subject matter jurisdiction, drew a clear distinction between a court’s competence to entertain an action and its power to render a judgment on the merits * * *. Absence of competence to entertain an action deprives the court of “subject matter jurisdiction”; absence of power to reach the merits does not.

The implications of this distinction are serious. It is blackletter law that a judgment rendered without subject matter jurisdiction is void, and that the defect may be raised at any time and may not be waived * * *. Thus stated, the rule is grossly oversimple. * * * Nevertheless, the breadth with which the rule is often stated indicates the importance traditionally attached to so-called subject matter jurisdiction * * *. Beyond the confusion engendered by a misapplication of the * * * concept of subject matter jurisdiction, there is more created by the locution that in this State the courts’ power in matrimonial actions is exclusively statutory. Yet in counterpoint, it has often been said: “the Supreme Court [i.e., the New York general trial court] is a court of original, unlimited and unqualified jurisdiction” and “competent to entertain all causes of action unless its jurisdiction has been specifically proscribed” * * *.

299

Against the State Constitution’s broad grant of jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, defendant offers the language of section 230 of the Domestic Relations Law. It provides merely that “[a]n action * * * for divorce or separation may be maintained only when” the residence requirements are met. Not even the catchall word “jurisdiction” appears in the statute, much less an explicit limitation on the court’s competence to entertain the action. In no way do these limitations on the cause of action circumscribe the power of the court in the sense of competence to adjudicate causes in the matrimonial categories. That a court has no “right” to adjudicate erroneously is no circumscription of its power to decide, rightly or wrongly.

* * *

The court has never before considered the unlikely question, until this case, whether the judicial error on an essential element of the cause of action was so fundamental as to permit vacatur of a final judgment, collaterally or after final judgment beyond ordinary appellate review. Had that ever been the problem unlikely until this case, perhaps the need for a less elastic and encompassing term than the word “jurisdiction” would have been apparent.

* * *

Hence, any error of law or fact which might have been committed in the divorce action did not deprive the court of jurisdiction to adjudicate the case, CPLR 5015 * * * is inapplicable, and Special Term erroneously vacated the final judgment.

In sum, the overly stated principle that lack of subject matter jurisdiction makes a final judgment absolutely void is not applicable to cases which, upon analysis, do not involve jurisdiction, but merely substantive elements of a cause for relief. To do so would be to undermine significantly the doctrine of res judicata, and to eliminate the certainty and finality in the law and in litigation which the doctrine is designed to protect.

In concluding the jurisdiction-competence issue it is not assumed that the courts in the action made any error of law or fact in determining the durational or initial residence requirements to maintain an action for a separation or a divorce. Nor is it assumed that the same courts did not consider and determine the issues of residence, whether or not raised by the wife. On the contrary, there was considerable evidence of residence by the husband, and the court obviously determined that the husband had some residence even if not of the duration to satisfy the matrimonial statutes. The point is that the litigation having gone to final judgment, the right to review by appeal having been exhausted, that is and should be the end of the matter.

On the foregoing analysis it has been unnecessary to dissect the elements of subject matter jurisdiction, because it turns out that the contentions of the wife are not addressed to bases for subject matter jurisdiction. Rather, despite her characterization of subject matter jurisdiction in order to invoke CPLR 5015 * * * to undo a final judgment of four years’ standing, the defects to which she points relate only to substantive elements in a cause of action adjudicable by the Supreme Court, a court competent to decide all the substantive issues.

Accordingly, the order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, without costs.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.State courts are considered to be courts of “general” jurisdiction, which in this context means they have authority to hear cases on any subject matter unless they are ousted of such power by state or federal law. This does not mean that every court in a state has power to hear all kinds of disputes. States, like most Anglo-American legal systems, usually distribute judicial power among a variety of courts. In many instances, this is accomplished by segregating certain types of controversies from the mainstream of litigation and giving special courts subject-matter jurisdiction over them, as usually is done with domestic relations and probate matters and formerly was true of “actions at law” and “suits in equity.” As described by one commentator:

* * * In practically all states * * * there are separate courts for large and small cases with an arbitrary line of division between them. There are usually separate courts of first instance and of review. Separate courts of probate, criminal courts, courts of equity, and courts for causes arising in certain localities are common. Jurisdiction of the same kind is often apportioned among several different courts, each exercising only a designated and restricted part of it, as where certain appeals must be taken to one reviewing court and other appeals to another. Sometimes different courts with concurrent jurisdiction in certain classes of cases and exclusive jurisdiction in others are established. It is not uncommon to find a large number of municipal courts in the various cities of the same state, no two of which exercise the same jurisdiction. And as a final complication, the legislature is constantly shifting and changing the jurisdiction of the various courts, practically every change involving litigation to construe the meaning and ascertain the effect of the legislative act.

Sunderland, Problems Connected with the Operation of a State Court System, 1950 Wis.L.Rev. 585, 585–86. A common method of limiting judicial power is by providing that a court can adjudicate controversies involving more than a certain minimum or less than a stated maximum amount of money, or its equivalent (referred to as an amount-in-controversy requirement).

2. Astate court of general jurisdiction is permitted and indeed may be under a duty to hear a cause of action arising under the laws of another state. This requirement flows from the Full Faith and Credit Clause, Article IV, § 1 of the United States Constitution. In HUGHES v. FETTER, 341 U.S. 609, 71 S.Ct. 980, 95 L.Ed. 1212 (1951), the Supreme Court held that under the “national policy” of the Full Faith and Credit Clause, Wisconsin could not “close the doors of its courts” to a cause of action created under Illinois law, while keeping the doors open to analogous claims under Wisconsin law for deaths “caused locally.” As the Court explained: “[A state] * * * cannot escape [its] constitutional obligation to enforce the rights and duties validly created under the laws of other states by the simple device of removing jurisdiction from courts otherwise competent.” Id. at 611–13, 71 S.Ct. at 981–83, 95 L.Ed. at 1215–17.

3. It is settled that a court can apply its own procedural law even when it hears a dispute involving a claim under another system’s substantive law. Can a state apply its own statute of limitations to a claim arising under the laws of another state? If so, does this mean that a court can dismiss a claim as untimely under its statute of limitations even though the claim would be timely under the law of the state creating the cause of action? The Supreme Court answered this question in the affirmative in WELLS v. SIMONDS ABRASIVE CO., 345 U.S. 514, 73 S.Ct. 856, 97 L.Ed. 1211 (1953), explaining that “applying the statute of limitations of the forum to a foreign substantive right did not deny full faith and credit.” Id. at 516, 73 S.Ct. at 857, 97 L.Ed. at 1215. Conversely, a state may apply its own longer statute of limitations to a cause of action created by another state’s law even though the claim would have been time-barred under the law of the state where the cause of action arose. See Sun Oil Co. v. Wortman, 486 U.S. 717, 108 S.Ct. 2117, 100 L.Ed.2d 743 (1988).

4. When Congress enacts a federal statute, the presumption is that both the federal and the state courts have competence to enforce the law—referred to as the presumption of concurrent jurisdiction. Congress may confer jurisdiction exclusively on the federal courts, but the presumption of concurrency can be rebutted only “by an explicit statutory directive, by unmistakable implication from legislative history, or by a clear incompatibility between state-court jurisdiction and federal interests.” Tafflin v. Levitt, 493 U.S. 455, 459–60, 110 S.Ct. 792, 795, 107 L.Ed.2d 887, 894 (1990) (internal quotation omitted). In ATLANTIC RICHFIELD CO. v. CHRISTIAN, 590 U.S. ___, 140 S.Ct. 1335, 206 L.Ed.2d 516 (2020), the Supreme Court noted the “deeply rooted presumption in favor of concurrent state court jurisdiction” in rejecting the argument that the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act ousted Montana state courts of jurisdiction over claims by property owners against the owner of a smelter that was subject to an Environmental Protection Agency clean-up plan.

5. If a state court has subject-matter jurisdiction to hear a claim that arises under federal law, is it required to exercise that power? In HOWLETT v. ROSE, 496 U.S. 356, 110 S.Ct. 2430, 110 L.Ed.2d 332 (1990), a unanimous Supreme Court held that the Florida courts could not invoke sovereign immunity as a ground for declining to hear a federal civil rights claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 when that defense would not bar the state court from hearing an analogous state-law claim. The Court explained that the state’s defense in this context “raise[d] the concern that the state court may be evading federal law and discriminating against federal causes of action”:

A state policy that permits actions against state agencies for the failure of their officials to adequately police a parking lot and for the negligence of such officers in arresting a person on a roadside, but yet declines jurisdiction over federal actions for constitutional violations by the same persons can be based only on the rationale that such persons should not be liable for § 1983 violations in the courts of the State. That reason, whether presented in terms of direct disagreement with substantive federal law or simple refusal to take cognizance of the federal cause of action, flatly violates the Supremacy Clause.

Id. at 380–81, 110 S.Ct. at 2445, 110 L.Ed.2d at 356. In HAYWOOD v. DROWN, 556 U.S. 729, 129 S.Ct. 2108, 173 L.Ed.2d 920 (2009), the Court held, five-to-four, that it was impermissible for a New York court to invoke a jurisdictional rule as grounds for declining to hear a federal claim: “[H]aving made the decision to create courts of general jurisdiction that regularly sit to entertain analogous suits, New York is not at liberty to shut the courthouse door to federal claims that it considers at odds with its local policy.” Id. at 740, 129 S.Ct. at 2117, 173 L.Ed.2d at 931. Does this rationale suggest that a state court may decline to enforce a federal statute if there is no analogous state-law claim?

6. In Lacks, the husband won a judgment of divorce even though he apparently failed to meet the residence requirement of the New York divorce law. Despite this defect, the Court of Appeals refused to allow the wife to vacate the judgment for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Can you explain the distinction that the court drew between “the jurisdiction-competence issue” and the “substantive elements in a cause of action”? How did this distinction affect the parties’ procedural opportunities in Lacks?

7. It is not always easy to discern when a statutory condition is a jurisdictional requirement and not an element of the claim. In Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 126 S.Ct. 1235, 163 L.Ed.2d 1097 (2006), plaintiff sued under a federal statute that bars employers with 15 or more employees from discriminating on the basis of race or gender. After a jury awarded damages to plaintiff for sexual harassment, defendant sought to establish that it was not subject to the statute because of the size of its workforce. The district court dismissed the claim for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, and the court of appeals affirmed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the numerosity requirement was not jurisdictional, but rather “a substantive ingredient” of the claim. As a result, defendant was too late in raising the defect. Id. at 503, 126 S.Ct. at 1238, 163 L.Ed.2d at 1103. In so holding, the Court applied a “bright line” rule. The statute did not clearly state that the numerosity requirement is jurisdictional; to the contrary, the requirement appeared in a part of the statute separate from the provision pertaining to jurisdiction. Id. at 516, 126 S.Ct. at 1245, 163 L.Ed.2d at 1110. In a later decision, SEBELIUS v. AUBURN REGIONAL MEDICAL CENTER, 568 U.S. 145, 133 S.Ct. 817, 184 L.Ed.2d 627 (2013), the Court again addressed, in the context of a federal statute, how to distinguish jurisdictional from claim-processing rules:

We inquire whether Congress has “clearly state[d]” that the rule is jurisdictional; absent such a clear statement, we have cautioned, “courts should treat the restriction as nonjurisdictional in character.” * * * This is not to say that Congress must incant magic words in order to speak clearly. We consider “context, including this Court’s interpretations of similar provisions in many years past,” as probative of whether Congress intended a particular provision to rank as jurisdictional. * * *

Id. at 153–54, 133 S.Ct. at 824, 184 L.Ed.2d at 637 (citations omitted).

Would you characterize a statute of limitations as jurisdictional or as a condition of the merits? Ordinarily, a party is permitted to waive an objection to the statute of limitations. However, in JOHN R. SAND & GRAVEL CO. v. UNITED STATES, 552 U.S. 130, 128 S.Ct. 750, 169 L.Ed.2d 591 (2008), the Court held that the six-year limitations period for filing claims against the United States in the Court of Federal Claims is “more absolute” than a timeliness provision that merely bars the defense of stale claims and so may not be waived. Id. at 134, 128 S.Ct. at 753, 169 L.Ed.2d at 596. In reaching this result, the Court relied on earlier precedent that treated the limitations period in the statute plaintiff was seeking to enforce as jurisdictional, and observed that the condition appeared in a portion of the statute stating that “ ‘[e]very claim of which’ the Court of Federal Claims ‘has jurisdiction shall be barred’ ” unless filed within the designated period. Id. at 135, 128 S.Ct. at 755, 169 L.Ed.2d at 597. The opinion underscores the importance of statutory text to resolving the question of whether a statutory condition is an aspect of the merits or a jurisdictional requirement. Indeed, the Supreme Court has found that other time periods are not jurisdictional. See, e.g., Boechler, P.C. v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 596 U.S. ___, 142 S.Ct. 1493, 212 L.Ed.2d 524 (2022) (26 U.S.C. § 6330(d)(1)’s 30-day deadline to file a petition for review in Tax Court); Hamer v. Neighborhood Housing Services of Chicago, 583 U.S. ___, 138 S.Ct. 13, 199 L.Ed.2d 249 (2017) (Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 4(a)(5)(C)’s limit on extensions of time to file a notice of appeal); Henderson ex rel. Henderson v. Shinseki, 562 U.S. 428, 131 S.Ct. 1197, 179 L.Ed.2d 159 (2011) (38 U.S.C. § 7266(a)’s 120-day deadline for appealing a denial of federal benefits by the Board of Veterans’ Appeals).

B. THE SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS—DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP

Read Article III, § 2 of the United States Constitution and 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332, 1359, and 1369 in the Supplement.

By contrast to state courts, federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction. They may exercise subject-matter jurisdiction only over the kinds of “cases” and “controversies” identified in Article III, § 2 of the United States Constitution, and only if Congress has enacted a statute conferring jurisdiction over such a case or controversy.^b Article III, § 2 of the United States Constitution extends the judicial power of the United States to controversies “between Citizens of different States * * * and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and Foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.” Since the First Judiciary Act in 1789, Congress has vested jurisdiction over so-called “diversity” cases in the federal courts. The current statute conferring diversity jurisdiction is set out in 28 U.S.C. § 1332. It may surprise you to learn that this grant of jurisdiction allows the federal courts to hear cases in which the claims arise solely under state law, so long as the parties to the dispute meet the constitutional and statutory conditions of citizenship and assert claims above a specified dollar amount. The conferral of diversity jurisdiction raises important issues about federalism and the appropriate relation between unelected federal judges and the states.

It is not clear why the Framers authorized the grant of diversity jurisdiction, and scholars do not find clear answers to that question in the debates of the Constitutional Convention. See Wood, The Changing Face of Diversity Jurisdiction, 82 Temp.L.Rev. 593 (2009). Chief Justice Marshall offered an early and influential explanation in BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. DEVEAUX, 9 U.S. (5 Cranch) 61, 87, 3 L.Ed. 38, 45 (1809):

However true the fact may be, that the tribunals of the states will administer justice as impartially as those of the nation, * * * it is not less true that the constitution itself either entertains apprehensions on this subject, or views with such indulgence the possible fears and apprehensions of suitors, that it has established national tribunals for the decision of controversies * * * between citizens of different states.

The availability of a federal forum—with differently constituted juries and judges with guaranteed life-time tenure—is said to have fostered a secure financial environment for investors and creditors during a formative period in the nation’s development. See Friendly, The Historic Basis of the Diversity Jurisdiction, 41 Harv.L.Rev. 483 (1928); Jones, Finishing a Friendly Argument: The Jury and the Historical Origins of Diversity Jurisdiction, 82 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 997 (2007). According to William Howard Taft (who served as President and then as Chief Justice of the United States): “[N]o single element in our governmental system has done so much to secure capital for the legitimate development of enterprises * * * as the existence of federal courts * * * with a jurisdiction to hear diverse citizenship cases.” See Taft, Possible and Needed Reform in Administration of Justice in Federal Courts, 8 A.B.A.J. 601, 604 (1922).

The Rule of Complete Diversity

One of the most important limitations on federal diversity jurisdiction is the rule of “complete diversity” announced by Chief Justice Marshall in STRAWBRIDGE v. CURTISS, 7 U.S. (3 Cranch) 267, 2 L.Ed. 435 (1806). The Court affirmed the dismissal of a suit for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, and explained:

The words of the act of congress are, “where an alien is a party; or the suit is between a citizen of a state where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state.”

The court understands these expressions to mean that each distinct interest should be represented by persons, all of whom are entitled to sue, or may be sued, in the federal courts. That is, that where the interest is joint, each of the persons concerned in that interest must be competent to sue, or liable to be sued, in those courts.

But the court does not mean to give an opinion in the case where several parties represent several distinct interests, and some of those parties are, and others are not, competent to sue, or liable to be sued, in the courts of the United States.

Id. at 267–68, 2 L.Ed. at 435.

Courts have interpreted the Strawbridge rule to bar diversity jurisdiction under Section 1332(a) if any plaintiff is a citizen of the same state as any defendant, no matter how many parties are involved in the litigation. See, e.g., Lincoln Property Co. v. Roche, 546 U.S. 81, 82, 126 S.Ct. 606, 613, 163 L.Ed.2d 415, 424 (2005) (noting that since Strawbridge, “this Court has read the statutory formulation ‘between . . . citizens of different States,’ * * * to require complete diversity between all plaintiffs and all defendants”). Is the rule a construction of the Constitution? Could Congress abrogate the complete-diversity condition? Should it?

Diversity jurisdiction includes not only actions between citizens of different states within the United States (Section 1332(a)(1)), but also actions between citizens of the United States and foreign citizens and subjects (Section 1332(a)(2))^c and actions between citizens of different U.S. states in which foreign litigants are “additional parties” (Section 1332(a)(3)). As with diversity jurisdiction involving United States citizens, a justification for foreign-party jurisdiction is protection of a discrete class of litigants from prejudice in state courts. See Johnson, Why Alienage Jurisdiction? Historical Foundations and Modern Justifications for Federal Jurisdiction Over Disputes Involving Noncitizens, 21 Yale J. Int’l L. 1, 2 (1996). For an empirical study of foreign litigant success rates in United States courts, see Clermont & Eisenberg, Xenophilia or Xenophobia in U.S. Courts? Before and After 9/11, 4 J. Empirical Legal Stud. 441 (2007). Another justification for foreign-party jurisdiction is to prevent state court rulings from interfering with foreign policy. See JPMorgan Chase Bank v. Traffic Stream (BVI) Infrastructure Limited, 536 U.S. 88, 94, 122 S.Ct. 2054, 2058, 153 L.Ed.2d 95, 101 (2002).

The Terms of the Debate

Granting the historic importance of diversity jurisdiction, does its current utility justify the expenditure of federal resources to hear disputes that pertain exclusively to state law? Whether to retain or enlarge the grant of diversity jurisdiction is a question that continues to engage scholars and policymakers. Here are some statistics from recent decades:

U.S. District Courts. Civil Cases Filed, by Jurisdiction ^d
Fiscal Year	Total	Federal Question	Diversity
1990	217,013	104,307	57,435
2000	259,517	139,624	48,626
2010	282,895	138,655	101,202
2020	470,581	138,455	284,603

Proposals to curtail or abolish diversity jurisdiction have been made in Congress since the 1920s. See Shapiro, Federal Diversity Jurisdiction: A Survey and a Proposal, 91 Harv.L.Rev. 317 (1977). The Report of the Federal Courts Study Committee 38–43 (April 2, 1990), recommended limiting diversity jurisdiction in four ways: (1) prohibiting plaintiffs from invoking diversity jurisdiction in the federal courts of their home states; (2) treating corporations as citizens of every state in which they are licensed to do business; (3) excluding non-economic damages, such as punitive damages, from calculation of the amount-in-controversy; and (4) raising the amount-in-controversy threshold and indexing it to inflation. Looking at the current version of 28 U.S.C. § 1332, which of these proposals have been adopted?

Proposals also have been made to expand the scope of diversity jurisdiction by authorizing jurisdiction even when the Strawbridge rule of complete diversity is not met—a condition called minimal diversity. The interpleader statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1335, is the oldest of these legislative changes. Under the statute, the court may exercise diversity jurisdiction over an interpleader action provided a $500 amount-in-controversy requirement is met and at least one claimant is a citizen of a state different from that of the other claimants. In addition, Congress has authorized a federal forum based on minimal diversity for actions “where at least 75 natural persons have died” from “a single accident” and “at a discrete location.” See Multiparty, Multiforum Trial Jurisdiction Act of 2002, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1369, 1441(e). Finally, the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(d) and 1453, authorizes a federal forum for any class action in which the aggregate amount-in-controversy exceeds $5 million, when the class contains at least 100 members, and in which any plaintiff “is a citizen of a State different from any defendant,” subject to some exceptions. These aggregation devices are studied in Chapters 9 and 10, infra.

Arguments in favor of diversity jurisdiction underscore the persistence of bias against out-of-state litigants and the threat it poses to the administration of justice. Although empirical evidence of parochial bias is sparse, there is concern that curtailing diversity jurisdiction would dampen investor willingness to enter markets in different parts of the country. What matters from this perspective is not whether out-of-state investors in fact receive fair treatment in state courts, but rather whether they think they will. See Flango, Litigant Choice Between State and Federal Courts, 46 S.C.L.Rev. 961, 965 (1995).

Retention of diversity jurisdiction also is urged as a way to encourage competition between the state and federal court systems and so to motivate judicial reform across the country. Federal courts historically were considered institutionally superior to state courts because of the independence that comes from the judicial life tenure and salary guarantees of Article III, § 1 of the United States Constitution. See Neuborne, The Myth of Parity, 90 Harv.L.Rev. 1105 (1977). However, many states now provide similar assurances of judicial independence and have undertaken significant modernization reforms, leading commentators to challenge suggestions of state judicial inferiority. Indeed, on some issues, litigators may prefer a state to a federal forum. See Rubenstein, The Myth of Superiority, 16 Const. Comment. 599 (1999). Nevertheless, proponents of diversity jurisdiction contend that out-of-state litigants, who have limited opportunity to work for the improvement of state courts, should be able to avoid exposure to them if they wish.

308

Third, and relatedly, diversity jurisdiction is said to encourage substantive legal improvement within the federal system. The metaphor typically used to express this rationale is that of the “cross-pollination” of ideas so that each court system becomes alert to issues across jurisdictional boundaries. See Redish, Reassessing the Allocation of Judicial Business Between State and Federal Courts: Federal Jurisdiction and “The Martian Chronicles,” 78 Va.L.Rev. 1769, 1785 (1992).

Critics of diversity jurisdiction focus on the implications of channeling state law disputes to federal judges. Justice Frankfurter expressed concern that diversity jurisdiction contributes to docket congestion in the federal courts. See Frankfurter, Distribution of Judicial Power Between United States and State Courts, 13 Cornell L.Q. 499 (1928). Moreover, under the rule of Erie Railroad Co., p. 445, infra, federal courts are required to apply state law to substantive issues in diversity cases, arguably making federal disposition of such cases unnecessary, wasteful, and inappropriate since the state courts are authoritative on matters of state substantive law. Indeed, disposition of state disputes in federal courts may risk nationalizing local concerns and federalizing state law. Far from encouraging legal reform, critics warn, the diversion of diversity-of-citizenship cases to federal courts may retard the development of state law by treating it as static or encouraging influential professional groups to exit the state judicial systems. Finally, it is suggested that the persistence of diversity jurisdiction supports gamesmanship that has little to do with the constitutional justification for authorizing a federal forum.

Assessing whether the federal court may exercise diversity jurisdiction requires a determination of (1) the citizenship of the parties and (2) the amount-in-controversy in the dispute. Both requirements of 28 U.S.C. § 1332 must be met. Which of these requirements is constitutionally mandated?

309

1.DETERMINING CITIZENSHIP

MAS V. PERRY

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, 1974.
489 F.2d 1396, cert. denied, 419 U.S. 842, 95 S.Ct. 74, 42 L.Ed.2d 70.

AINSWORTH, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

* * *

Appellees Jean Paul Mas, a citizen of France, and Judy Mas were married at her home in Jackson, Mississippi. Prior to their marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Mas were graduate assistants, pursuing coursework as well as performing teaching duties, for approximately nine months and one year, respectively, at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. Shortly after their marriage, they returned to Baton Rouge to resume their duties as graduate assistants at LSU. They remained in Baton Rouge for approximately two more years, after which they moved to Park Ridge, Illinois. At the time of the trial in this case, it was their intention to return to Baton Rouge while Mr. Mas finished his studies for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. Mr. and Mrs. Mas were undecided as to where they would reside after that.

Upon their return to Baton Rouge after their marriage, appellees rented an apartment from appellant Oliver H. Perry, a citizen of Louisiana. This appeal arises from a final judgment entered on a jury verdict awarding $5,000 to Mr. Mas and $15,000 to Mrs. Mas for damages incurred by them as a result of the discovery that their bedroom and bathroom contained “two-way” mirrors and that they had been watched through them by the appellant during three of the first four months of their marriage.

At the close of the appellees’ case at trial, appellant made an oral motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. The motion was denied by the district court. Before this Court, appellant challenges the final judgment below solely on jurisdictional grounds, contending that appellees failed to prove diversity of citizenship among the parties and that the requisite jurisdictional amount is lacking with respect to Mr. Mas. Finding no merit to these contentions, we affirm. Under section 1332(a)(2), the federal judicial power extends to the claim of Mr. Mas, a citizen of France, against the appellant, a citizen of Louisiana. Since we conclude that Mrs. Mas is a citizen of Mississippi for diversity purposes, the district court also properly had jurisdiction under section 1332(a)(1) of her claim.

It has long been the general rule that complete diversity of parties is required in order that diversity jurisdiction obtain; that is, no party on one side may be a citizen of the same State as any party on the other side. Strawbridge v. Curtiss * * *. This determination of one's State citizenship for diversity purposes is controlled by federal law, not by the law of any

310

State. * * * As is the case in other areas of federal jurisdiction, the diverse citizenship among adverse parties must be present at the time the complaint is filed. * * * Jurisdiction is unaffected by subsequent changes in the citizenship of the parties. * * * The burden of pleading the diverse citizenship is upon the party invoking federal jurisdiction * * * and if the diversity jurisdiction is properly challenged, that party also bears the burden of proof.

To be a citizen of a State within the meaning of section 1332, a natural person must be both a citizen of the United States * * * and a domiciliary of that State. * * * For diversity purposes, citizenship means domicile; mere residence in the State is not sufficient. * * *

A person's domicile is the place of "his true, fixed, and permanent home and principal establishment, and to which he has the intention of returning whenever he is absent therefrom" * * * A change of domicile may be effected only by a combination of two elements: (a) taking up residence in a different domicile with (b) the intention to remain there. * * *

It is clear that at the time of her marriage, Mrs. Mas was a domiciliary of the State of Mississippi. While it is generally the case that the domicile of the wife—and, consequently, her State citizenship for purposes of diversity jurisdiction—is deemed to be that of her husband, * * * we find no precedent for extending this concept to the situation here, in which the husband is a citizen of a foreign state but resides in the United States. Indeed, such a fiction would work absurd results on the facts before us. If Mr. Mas were considered a domiciliary of France—as he would be since he had lived in Louisiana as a student-teaching assistant prior to filing this suit * * *—then Mrs. Mas would also be deemed a domiciliary, and thus, fictionally at least, a citizen of France. She would not be a citizen of any State and could not sue in a federal court on that basis; nor could she invoke the alienage jurisdiction to bring her claim in federal court, since she is not an alien. * * * On the other hand, if Mrs. Mas's domicile were Louisiana, she would become a Louisiana citizen for diversity purposes and could not bring suit with her husband against appellant, also a Louisiana citizen, on the basis of diversity jurisdiction. These are curious results under a rule arising from the theoretical identity of person and interest of the married couple. * * *

An American woman is not deemed to have lost her United States citizenship solely by reason of her marriage to an alien. 8 U.S.C. § 1489. Similarly, we conclude that for diversity purposes a woman does not have her domicile or State citizenship changed solely by reason of her marriage to an alien.

Mrs. Mas's Mississippi domicile was disturbed neither by her year in Louisiana prior to her marriage nor as a result of the time she and her husband spent at LSU after their marriage, since for both periods she was a graduate assistant at LSU. * * * Though she testified that after her marriage she had no intention of returning to her parents' home in Mississippi, Mrs. Mas did not effect a change of domicile since she and Mr. Mas were in Louisiana only as students and lacked the requisite intention to remain there. Until she acquires a new domicile, she remains a domiciliary, and thus a citizen of Mississippi. * * *

311

[The court's discussion of the jurisdictional amount is omitted.]

Thus the power of the federal district court to entertain the claims of appellees in this case stands on two separate legs of diversity jurisdiction: a claim by an alien against a State citizen; and an action between citizens of different States. We also note, however, the propriety of having the federal district court entertain a spouse's action against a defendant, where the district court already has jurisdiction over a claim, arising from the same transaction, by the other spouse against the same defendant. * * * In the case before us, such a result is particularly desirable. The claims of Mr. and Mrs. Mas arise from the same operative facts, and there was almost complete interdependence between their claims with respect to the proof required and the issues raised at trial. Thus, since the district court had jurisdiction of Mr. Mas's action, sound judicial administration militates strongly in favor of federal jurisdiction of Mrs. Mas's claim.

Affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

(1)Determining State Citizenship of Natural Persons

The party invoking diversity jurisdiction has the burden of proving its existence. For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a natural person is a citizen of a U.S. state only if the person is a citizen of the United States. The rule stems from DRED SCOTT v. SANDFORD, 60 U.S. (19 How.) 393, 15 L.Ed. 691 (1856), which held that persons descended from African slaves, even if born free, were not United States citizens and could not invoke diversity jurisdiction. The Fourteenth Amendment abrogated portions of Dred Scott by establishing the principle of birthright citizenship, but did not eliminate the rule that "[a] person cannot be a 'citizen' of a state unless she is also a citizen of the United States." Coury v. Prot, 85 F.3d 244, 249 (5th Cir. 1996). Of course, diversity jurisdiction may reach foreign citizens if the requirements of Section 1332(a)(2) or (a)(3) are met. See Servicios Azucareros de Venezuela, C.A. v. John Deere Thibodaux, Inc., 702 F.3d 794 (5th Cir. 2012).

To determine a United States citizen’s state of citizenship, the test looks to the party’s domicile, which is different from residence. At the time of the Mas decision, federal courts applied the common law rule of “derivative domicile” to married women, meaning that a wife was deemed to have acquired her husband’s domicile. Why did the Mas court resist applying this rule in determining whether the wife met the conditions of diversity jurisdiction? Would its application have effectively stripped the wife of her United States citizenship? See Abrams & Barber, Domicile Dismantled, 92 Ind.L.J. 387 (2017). Modern cases have rejected this rule even when both spouses are United States citizens and the issue is state citizenship. See Holley v. Techtronic Indus. N. Am., Inc., 2016 WL 7474811 (N.D.Cal. 2016) (“[T]he common law rule has been rejected by modern cases; a spouse may establish a domicile separate from the other spouse.”); 13E Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3614 (3d ed.) (“It is difficult to find any justification for the retention of * * * what essentially is a sex-biased rule that certainly will disappear eventually.”).

Determining a natural person’s domicile may involve a fact-intensive inquiry. CONNECTU LLC v. ZUCKERBERG, 482 F.Supp.2d 3 (D.Mass. 2007), reversed by 522 F.3d 82 (1st Cir. 2008), involved the citizenship of Mark Zuckerberg, the founder of Facebook. The evidence showed that Zuckerberg was born in New York, graduated from a high school in New Hampshire, attended college in Massachusetts, and lived in California the summer after his sophomore year. After taking a leave of absence from college, defendant returned to California, where his company was incorporated. He continued to use his parents’ New York address as a permanent residence. On these facts, how would you decide where defendant resided and whether he intended to change his domicile?

If the goal of diversity jurisdiction is to protect out-of-staters from bias in suits against in-staters, does it make sense to disregard residence in defining citizenship for diversity purposes? Should a party who is a United States citizen but domiciled abroad be eligible to invoke diversity jurisdiction?

(2)Determining Citizenship of Corporations and Associations

Different rules for determining citizenship apply when the party is a corporation or an association. Like a natural person, a corporation is treated as an entity for purposes of determining citizenship; unlike a natural person, a corporation may have multiple states of citizenship. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1). A corporation is a citizen “of every State and foreign state” in which it is incorporated, as well as the state or foreign state in which it has its principal place of business. For many years, it was unclear how to determine the location of a corporation’s principal place of business. Three tests predominated: the “nerve-center” test, which located citizenship in the state in which corporate decisionmaking and overall control take place (normally the corporation’s headquarters); the “corporate activities” or “operating assets” test, which located citizenship in the state in which the corporation has its production or service activities; and the “total activity” test, which located citizenship in light of all of the facts and circumstances.

In HERTZ CORP. v. FRIEND, 559 U.S. 77, 130 S.Ct. 1181, 175 L.Ed.2d 1029 (2010), the Supreme Court resolved that the phrase “principal place of business” in 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1) refers only to the corporation’s nerve center. In reaching this result, the Court relied on three grounds: the terms of the statute; the legislative history; and the simplicity of a clear rule that could discourage gamesmanship. Under Hertz, how should a court determine the citizenship of a dissolved corporation? Would it be best to have a bright-line rule that looks only to the company’s state of incorporation? Or for the dissolved corporation also to be treated as a citizen of the state of its former principal place of business? Or for the dissolved corporation not to have any principal place of business? The circuits currently are divided on this question. Which approach best serves the purposes of diversity jurisdiction?

Special rules govern the citizenship of banks chartered under federal law—so-called “national banks.” The statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1348, provides that national banks are “deemed citizens of the States in which they are respectively located.” How does this definition differ from the general rule for determining corporate citizenship? In WACHOVIA BANK, N.A. v. SCHMIDT, 546 U.S. 303, 126 S.Ct. 941, 163 L.Ed.2d 797 (2006), the Supreme Court interpreted the term “located” to mean that a national bank is a citizen of the state in which its main office is found, as set out in the articles of incorporation. The Court left open whether for diversity jurisdiction a national bank also is a citizen of the state in which it has its principal place of business. See Lund, Federally Chartered Corporations and Federal Jurisdiction, 36 Fla.St.U.L.Rev. 317 (2009).

Keep in mind that there are many different kinds of corporations. They include non-profit corporations, professional corporations, and cooperative corporations, to name a few. To complicate matters, some business groups that are not incorporated nevertheless function like a corporation (such as limited partnerships). Generally, courts have applied a “bright line rule,” Hoagland v. SANDBERG, PHOENIX & VON GONTARD, P.C., 385 F.3d 737 (7th Cir. 2004), and held that for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, “a corporation is a corporation is a corporation.” Cote v. Wadel, 796 F.2d 961, 963 (7th Cir. 1986). This means if a business organization is incorporated under state law, it is treated as a corporate entity; otherwise, it is treated as an unincorporated association.

The category of unincorporated association includes many different kinds of groups, such as partnerships, charitable organizations, and trade unions. Under the general diversity rules, an unincorporated association is not treated as an entity but rather takes on the citizenship of each and every one of the association’s members. See Carden v. Arkoma Assocs., 494 U.S. 185, 110 S.Ct. 1015, 108 L.Ed.2d 157 (1990) (limited partnership); United Steelworkers of America v. R.H. Bouligny, Inc., 382 U.S. 145, 86 S.Ct. 272, 15 L.Ed.2d 217 (1965) (trade union). How are unincorporated associations treated for diversity purposes under the Class Action Fairness Act? See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(10).

In AMERICOLD REALTY TRUST v. CONAGRA FOODS, INC., 577 U.S. 378, 136 S.Ct. 1012, 194 L.Ed.2d 71 (2016), the Supreme Court held that the citizenship of a real estate investment trust is based on the citizenship of its members, which includes its shareholders, rejecting the view that only the citizenship of the trustee was jurisdictionally significant. The Court emphasized that it intended to maintain a “doctrinal wall” between corporate and unincorporated entities. Id. at 384, 136 S.Ct. at 1017, 194 L.Ed.2d at 77.

(3)Determining Citizenship of Representatives, Guardians, and Insurance Companies

Some persons can appear in court only through a legal representative. Examples include a decedent’s estate, an infant, and a person who lacks mental competence. In 1988, Congress amended 28 U.S.C. § 1332 to block parties from manufacturing diversity jurisdiction through the appointment of a representative. See Mullenix, Creative Manipulation of Federal Jurisdiction: Is There Diversity After Death?, 70 Cornell L.Rev. 1011 (1985) (discussing the uncertainty surrounding this issue prior to the 1988 amendment). How does the current statute determine citizenship when a representative is appointed? How can a representative show that an incompetent person wishes to change domicile? See Upchurch, Can Granny Have a New Home? Resolving the Dilemma of Dementia and Domicile in Federal Diversity Jurisdiction Cases, 79 U.Colo.L.Rev. 545 (2008).

Another special situation is presented by the “direct-action case,” in which the victim of an accident sues the tortfeasor’s insurance carrier without naming the insured party whose wrongdoing gave rise to the claim. How does the citizenship rule for insurers in direct-action cases differ from the rule that applies to guardians and other representatives? See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1).

(4)Determining Jurisdiction in Cases Involving Foreign Parties

Diversity jurisdiction also is available in actions involving citizens of foreign countries and parties who are United States citizens. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(2) and (3). Section 1332(a)(2) requires complete diversity between citizens of U.S. states and citizens of foreign countries. See Ruhrgas AG v. Marathon Oil Co., 526 U.S. 574, 580 n.2, 119 S.Ct. 1563, 1568 n.2, 143 L.Ed.2d 760, 768 n.2 (1999). Section 1332(a)(3) permits foreign citizens on opposing sides of the case, as long as there are citizens of U.S. states on opposing sides and complete diversity exists between those U.S. citizens. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(3) (authorizing jurisdiction in actions that are between “citizens of different States and in which citizens or subjects of a foreign state are additional parties”); see also Iraola & CIA S.A. v. Kimberly-Clark Corp., 232 F.3d 854, 860 (11th Cir. 2000) (“It is a standard rule that federal courts do not have diversity jurisdiction over cases where there are foreign entities on both sides of the action, without the presence of citizens of a state on both sides.”).

Test your reading of the statute by explaining whether jurisdiction is present under any of Section 1332(a)’s subsections:

- (a)Two plaintiffs [a company that is incorporated and has its principal place of business in Indiana] and [a company that is incorporated in Mexico] sue two defendants [a company that is incorporated in Delaware and has its principal place of business in Illinois] and [a natural person who is a citizen of Mexico].
- (b)Two plaintiffs [a company that is incorporated and has its principal place of business in Indiana] and [a natural person who is a citizen of Canada] sue two defendants [a company that is incorporated and has its principal place of business in Michigan] and [a natural person who is a citizen of Canada].

- (c)Two plaintiffs [a natural person who is a citizen of New York] and [a natural person who is a citizen of France] sue one defendant [a natural person who is a citizen of France].

The statute’s treatment of foreign citizens who are “permanent residents” of the United States has evolved over time. In 1988 Congress amended 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a) to add this language: “For the purpose of this section, section 1335, and section 1441, an alien admitted to the United States for permanent residence shall be deemed a citizen of the State in which such alien is domiciled.” See Judicial Improvements and Access to Justice Act, Pub. L. No. 100–702, 102 Stat. 4642 (1988). Then, in 2011, Congress deleted this language and instead added at the end of § 1332(a)(2): “except that the district courts shall not have original jurisdiction under this subsection of an action between citizens of a State and citizens or subjects of a foreign state who are lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States and are domiciled in the same State.” See Section 105 of the Federal Courts Jurisdiction and Venue Clarification Act of 2011, Pub. L. 112–63, 125 Stat. 758 (2011). The legislative history states:

The purpose of th[e 1988] change was to preclude Federal alienage jurisdiction . . . in suits between a citizen of a state and an alien permanently residing in the same state Section 101 of the [Clarification Act will] thus achieve the goal of modestly restricting jurisdiction, which Congress sought to accomplish when it first enacted the resident alien proviso, and would avoid the threat of the expansion of jurisdiction now posed by the proviso.

H.R.Rep. No. 112–10, at 7 (2011), quoted in H.K. Huilin International Trade Co., Ltd. v. Kevin Multiline Plymer Inc., 907 F.Supp.2d 284, 288 (E.D.N.Y. 2012) (alteration and emphasis added by the court); see also Tagger v. Strauss Grp. Ltd., 951 F.3d 124, 126–27 (2d Cir. 2020) (finding no jurisdiction over a suit brought by an Israeli citizen who was a permanent resident of the United States domiciled in New York against an Israeli corporation, because the 2011 amendment eliminated the provision that had deemed foreign-citizen permanent residents to be citizens of the U.S. state where they are domiciled).

Would there be a constitutional problem in extending diversity jurisdiction to a suit by a foreign-citizen permanent resident of the United States who is domiciled in State A against another foreign-citizen permanent resident of the United States who is domiciled in State B? Or by a permanent resident who is domiciled in a U.S. state against a foreign citizen who is domiciled abroad?

A separate question concerns whether diversity jurisdiction may include a “stateless” person—meaning an individual who is not a citizen of any country. In BLAIR HOLDINGS CORP. v. RUBINSTEIN, 133 F.Supp. 496 (S.D.N.Y. 1955), defendant, Serge Rubinstein, held a “Nansen” passport issued after World War I by the League of Nations to stateless persons; he also had registered as a stateless person with the United States Department of Justice. In addition, the complaint described defendant as “not [being] a citizen of the United States.” Id. at 498. The district court held that there was no jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(2) because plaintiff failed to show he was a citizen of a foreign state. Does withholding a federal forum from a stateless person serve the purposes of foreign-party jurisdiction? Some critics argue that being stateless makes a litigant more vulnerable to bias in state court, heightening the need for a federal forum. See Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction § 5.3 (8th ed.).

316

The term “stateless” can also refer to a person who is neither a citizen of a foreign state nor a citizen of a U.S. state. Consider citizens of the United States who are domiciled abroad. As United States citizens, such persons are not citizens or subjects of a foreign state. Yet they also are not citizens of any particular U.S. State, because they are not domiciled in any U.S. State. See Newman-Green, Inc. v. Alfonzo-Larrain, 490 U.S. 826, 828, 109 S.Ct. 2218, 2221, 104 L.Ed.2d 893, 899 (1989) (“In order to be a citizen of a State within the meaning of the diversity statute, a natural person must both be a citizen of the United States and be domiciled within the State.”). As one court has explained, federal courts “lack jurisdiction over these so-called ‘stateless’ citizens if the only basis for subject matter jurisdiction is the diversity statute.” Page v. Democratic Nat’l Comm., 2 F.4th 630, 636 (7th Cir. 2021); see also Cresswell v. Sullivan & Cromwell, 922 F.2d 60, 68 (2d Cir. 1990).

Finally, consider how the jurisdiction rules so far studied ought to apply to a “dual national”—a person who is a citizen of the United States and of a foreign country. The consensus view is that only the United States citizenship of a dual citizen should be considered, and so foreign-party jurisdiction may not be invoked. The Seventh Circuit has explained:

[T]he major purpose of alienage jurisdiction is to promote international relations by assuring other countries that litigation involving their nationals will be treated at the national level, and alienage jurisdiction is also intended to allow foreign subjects to avoid real or perceived bias in the state courts—a justification that should not be available to the dual citizen who is an American.

Buchel-Ruegsegger v. Buchel, 576 F.3d 451, 454 (7th Cir. 2009) (quotations omitted). In SADAT v. MERTES, 615 F.2d 1176 (7th Cir. 1980), the court of appeals considered a suit brought by a plaintiff who was both a citizen of Egypt and a naturalized citizen of the United States. He was involved in a car accident while living in Pennsylvania. He returned to Egypt and later filed suit against the United States parties involved in the accident. The court of appeals held that plaintiff could not invoke Section 1332(a)(1) because he was domiciled in Egypt and so was not a citizen of any state; moreover, he could not invoke Section 1332(a)(2) jurisdiction because, although an Egyptian citizen, his United States citizenship was dominant given his voluntary naturalization and intent to return to the United States.

317

(5)The Problem of Collusive Joinder and the Real Party in Interest

Sometimes a party may wish to litigate a state-law claim in federal court, but the requirement of complete diversity is not met. In KRAMER v. CARIBBEAN MILLS, INC., 394 U.S. 823, 89 S.Ct. 1487, 23 L.Ed.2d 9 (1969), a Panamanian corporation assigned its interest under a contract with a Haitian corporation to Kramer, a Texas attorney, for $1. By a separate agreement, Kramer reassigned 95 percent of any net recovery on the assigned cause of action to the Panamanian company. Kramer then commenced suit against the Haitian company invoking federal jurisdiction. The district court denied defendant’s motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction. The court of appeals reversed, holding that the assignment was “improperly or collusively made” within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1359. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that:

If federal jurisdiction could be created by assignments of this kind, which are easy to arrange and involve few disadvantages for the assignor, then a vast quantity of ordinary contract and tort litigation could be channeled into the federal courts at the will of one of the parties. Such “manufacture of Federal jurisdiction” was the very thing which Congress intended to prevent when it enacted § 1359 and its predecessors.

Id. at 828–29, 89 S.Ct. at 1490, 23 L.Ed.2d at 14. See Collins, Jurisdictional Exceptionalism, 93 Va.L.Rev. 1829 (2007) (recounting the history of the Court’s approach to jurisdiction by assignment). Should the motive for making the assignment be relevant to the jurisdictional inquiry, or should it be dispositive that the party making the assignment retains a significant financial interest in the transaction?

On the other hand, sometimes a party may wish to litigate a state-law claim in state court and not in federal court. In this situation, plaintiff may try to block defendant’s right to remove the action to federal court. We study removal jurisdiction later in this chapter, but the basic rule is that the federal court can exercise removal jurisdiction if it could have exercised original jurisdiction on the day the suit was filed in state court (however, when diversity jurisdiction is the basis for removal, generally an in-state defendant may not remove). In ROSE v. GIAMATTI, 721 F.Supp. 906 (S.D.Ohio 1989), Pete Rose, the manager of the Cincinnati Reds baseball team, filed a state court action to enjoin the Commissioner of Baseball from investigating whether Rose had wagered on ball games in violation of the Rules of Major League Baseball. Rose also named Major League Baseball and the Cincinnati Reds as defendants. The Commissioner removed the action to federal district court in Ohio. Rose, a citizen of Ohio, sought to remand the suit to Ohio state court, arguing that because he was a citizen of the same state as two of the defendants, complete diversity was lacking and removal was not proper. The district court rejected this argument:

318

[I]t is * * * a long-established doctrine that a federal court in its determination of whether there is diversity of citizenship between the parties, must disregard nominal or formal parties to the action, and determine jurisdiction based solely upon the citizenship of the real parties to the controversy. * * * A real party in interest defendant is one who, by the substantive law, has the duty sought to be enforced or enjoined. * * * [A] formal or nominal party is one who, in a genuine legal sense, has no interest in the result of the suit, * * * or no actual interest or control over the subject matter of the litigation. * * *

Id. at 914. The court went on to explain:

[T]he controversy in this case is between plaintiff Rose and defendant Giamatti; that they are the real parties in interest in this case; that the Cincinnati Reds and Major League Baseball, are, at best, nominal parties in this controversy; and that, consequently, the citizenship of the Cincinnati Reds and Major League Baseball may be disregarded for diversity of citizenship purposes. The Court determines that diversity of citizenship exists between Rose, * * * and Commissioner Giamatti, * * * and that the Court has diversity subject matter jurisdiction over this action.

Id. at 923–24. Do you agree that the Cincinnati Reds and Major League Baseball were “nominal” parties? Why was Rose so anxious to keep the case in state court? Is Rose the prototypical case in which diversity jurisdiction serves to protect an out-of-state defendant against local prejudice? See Case Note, “Root, Root, Root for the Home Team”: Pete Rose, Nominal Parties and Diversity Jurisdiction, 66 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 148 (1991).

2.THE AMOUNT-IN-CONTROVERSY REQUIREMENT

A.F.A. TOURS, INC. v. WHITCHURCH
United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1991.
937 F.2d 82.

KEARSE, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Plaintiff A.F.A. Tours, Inc., doing business as Alumni Flights Abroad (“AFA”), appeals from a final judgment of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York * * * dismissing for lack of subject matter jurisdiction this diversity action against defendant Desmond Whitchurch for misappropriation of trade secrets. The district court summarily dismissed the complaint on the ground that it would not be possible for AFA to prove damages amounting to more than $50,000. * * *

* * * AFA operates a travel and tour business, specializing in deluxe tours for United States residents to overseas destinations including Australia, New Zealand, and New Guinea. It expended large sums of money and invested significant time and labor to develop, inter alia, a client and customer list, marketing information, and tour information. It regarded this information as confidential trade secrets.

319

From 1972 through 1989, Whitchurch was employed by AFA as its exclusive tour escort in the above areas. In that position, Whitchurch was privy to certain of the above confidential information. The complaint alleged that in or about October 1989, Whitchurch resigned from AFA, misappropriated the confidential information known to him, and organized his own tour business. Since that time, he has offered or intends to offer tours that compete with those offered by AFA; in connection with his own tours, he has solicited or intends to solicit participants from AFA’s customer list.

AFA commenced the present diversity action in the district court for misappropriation of its trade secrets, seeking an injunction against any use by Whitchurch of confidential AFA information, and damages “in an amount which is not presently ascertainable, but which is believed to exceed the sum of $50,000.00.”^e It also sought punitive damages of “no less than $250,000.00.”

* * *

At the oral argument of Whitchurch’s motion, Whitchurch’s attorney began by characterizing the motion as “turn[ing] on a very narrow issue” of whether the AFA information constituted trade secrets * * *, and stating that the case was important to Whitchurch because “he may one day in the future wish to organize a tour, and write letters to individuals again” * * *. The court, however, asked whether it even had to reach the question of trade secrets, raising sua sponte the question of whether the value of AFA’s claims exceeded $50,000, a jurisdictional prerequisite for a diversity action. In response to the court’s jurisdictional question, Whitchurch’s attorney stated that Whitchurch, in soliciting for his planned tour, had written to 100–200 former AFA tour participants but had received favorable responses from only two. * * *

AFA’s attorney argued that Whitchurch’s lack of success on his first effort was hardly dispositive of the issue of the amount of damages AFA might suffer, in light of Whitchurch’s desire to conduct other tours in the future. * * * AFA’s attorney, noting that over the years Whitchurch had escorted some 1,500 AFA clients on tours and had indicated that he would conduct a number of tours, argued that AFA’s damages would be substantial. He stated that a single 10-customer tour to the area in question would easily generate more than $50,000 * * *. * * *

At the close of this hearing, the court granted summary judgment in favor of Whitchurch * * *. * * * On appeal, AFA contends that the dismissal for lack of jurisdiction was improper because the court (1) failed to give AFA an appropriate opportunity to show that it satisfied the jurisdictional amount, and (2) failed to apply the proper standard to AFA's requests for (a) damages and (b) injunctive relief. * * *

320

The district courts have jurisdiction over civil diversity suits "where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $50,000, exclusive of interest and costs." 28 U.S.C. § 1332 (1988). The test for determining whether a plaintiff meets the jurisdictional amount, established by the Supreme Court in St. Paul Mercury Indemnity Co. v. Red Cab Co., 303 U.S. 283, 58 S.Ct. 586, 82 L.Ed. 845 (1938), is as follows:

The rule governing dismissal for want of jurisdiction in cases brought in the federal court is that, unless the law gives a different rule, the sum claimed by the plaintiff controls if the claim is apparently made in good faith. It must appear to a legal certainty that the claim is really for less than the jurisdictional amount to justify a dismissal.

303 U.S. at 288–89, 58 S.Ct. at 590 (emphasis added).

The amount of damages recoverable in an action for misappropriation of trade secrets may be measured either by the plaintiff's losses, * * * or by the profits unjustly received by the defendant * * *. In addition, if punitive damages are permitted under the controlling law, the demand for such damages may be included in determining whether the jurisdictional amount is satisfied. * * * New York law apparently allows the recovery of punitive damages in a trade secrets case if the defendant's conduct has been sufficiently "gross and wanton." * * *

Further, in appropriate circumstances, the owner of trade secrets may obtain an injunction against their use or disclosure by another in breach of his confidential relationship with the owner. * * * Where the plaintiff seeks injunctive relief, the value of his claim is generally assessed with reference to the right he seeks to protect and measured by the extent of the impairment to be prevented by the injunction. * * * In calculating that impairment, the court may look not only at past losses but also at potential harm. * * *

Before making a determination that the plaintiff's claim does not meet the jurisdictional minimum, the court must afford the plaintiff an "appropriate and reasonable opportunity to show good faith in believing that a recovery in excess of [the jurisdictional amount] is reasonably possible." * * * Under these substantive and procedural principles, although the record indicates that AFA has not yet suffered actual damages even approaching $50,000, we have difficulty with the district court's decision.

321

First, though AFA did not make an evidentiary showing in support of its contention that the value of its claims exceeded $50,000, it was not afforded a proper opportunity to do so. The issue of the jurisdictional amount was first raised by the district court sua sponte at the argument on the summary judgment motion, and the court rendered its decision at the end of that argument. To the extent that the court thought AFA could not meet the jurisdictional minimum, it should not have dismissed without giving AFA an opportunity to present substantiation directed toward that issue.

Second, despite AFA's lack of an opportunity to present evidence addressed directly to the jurisdictional question, there was evidence in the record to suggest that the matter could not be conclusively resolved against it, for the oral arguments made by AFA's attorney to show that its claims were worth more than $50,000 had some support from documents already before the court. For example, he said Whitchurch had the names of some 1,500 AFA customers; this was consistent with (a) Whitchurch's own statement that in the 17 years he was employed by AFA he had led approximately seven tours each year (thus totaling some 119 tours) and (b) his attorney's statement that there were usually 10–15 people per tour. * * * As to AFA's attorney's estimate that a single tour of this type "[i]s about seven to ten thousand dollars per customer," the evidence in the record as to the destination and deluxe nature of the tours, including evidence that some participants traveled first class and reserved preferred hotel accommodations, supports an inference that a 28-day tour could well cost $10,000 per person.

What this means in terms of loss of earnings to a tour operator, however, is not revealed by the present record. AFA's suggestion that the tour operator himself would earn $10,000 per tourist * * * does not have the same record support and seems questionable. The district court was also undoubtedly correct in its assumption that many of the persons who traveled to the South Pacific with Whitchurch during the 17 years he was with AFA are not likely to travel to that area again. But it could not be said to a legal certainty that no one would return to that area. There was ample support in the record for the proposition that AFA has the prospects for repeat customers. For example, AFA had submitted from one of its brochures two pages excerpting comments from participants in a recent AFA tour * * *; nearly one-third of those quoted indicated that they either had been on other AFA tours or would hope to go on future AFA tours. * * * If a tour operator could earn 17% of the price of a tour, and if Whitchurch were eventually successful in soliciting even 30 of the approximately 1,500 AFA participants he has escorted (i.e., 2%, which may reflect the ratio of his success on his first attempt), the profit he could siphon from AFA would total $51,000. Thus, on the present record, the court could not conclude to a legal certainty that the value of AFA's claims did not exceed the jurisdictional minimum.

322

Further, AFA requested injunctive relief not just against Whitchurch's solicitation of its customers but also against any use of the information. Presumably such an injunction would include a prohibition against Whitchurch's sale or disclosure of the names and addresses of AFA's customers to other tour operators who might be better equipped than Whitchurch to exploit the information and attract more than 2% of the persons whose names Whitchurch could provide them. In addition, AFA's request for punitive damages in the amount of $250,000 might provide a basis for satisfaction of the jurisdictional amount. Whether or not AFA will be able to prove that Whitchurch's conduct was "gross and wanton" and warrants the recovery of such damages under New York law is an open question. But the present record does not foreclose that possibility.

In all the circumstances, we conclude that the record as it existed in the district court did not permit the court to find with legal certainty that the value of AFA’s claims did not exceed $50,000.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Does the Constitution impose an amount-in-controversy requirement on the jurisdictional grant? Congress has enacted such a condition since 1789, when the amount was set at a sum that “exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars.” First Judiciary Act of 1789, § 11, 1 Stat. 73. Why do you think the amount-in-controversy requirement persists and, indeed, has increased over time? For a historical perspective, see Purcell, Jr., Litigation and Inequality: Federal Diversity Jurisdiction in Industrial America, 1870–1958, 97 (1992). What is the current amount-in-controversy requirement? See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a).

2The party invoking diversity jurisdiction has the burden of showing that the amount-in-controversy requirement is met at the time the suit commences. Under what circumstances could a court find to a legal certainty that a party’s claim does not meet the amount-in-controversy requirement?

3.Is diversity jurisdiction lost if plaintiff’s recovery turns out to be less than the amount-in-controversy requirement? See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(b). Should events that take place after the filing of the complaint ever be relevant to the jurisdictional inquiry? Might some post-filing events suggest that an allegation about injuries or damages was made in bad faith? See Hall v. Earthlink Network, Inc., 396 F.3d 500 (2d Cir. 2005).

4.The Federal Rules authorize the joinder of multiple parties and multiple claims in a single lawsuit. See Chapter 9, infra. Many joinder variations are possible. For example, a single plaintiff may wish to file multiple claims against a single defendant, or multiple plaintiffs may wish to file multiple claims against a single defendant, and so forth. Courts have developed a number of rules, referred to as rules of aggregation, for determining when the amount-in-controversy requirement is met in the complex situations that typically arise. See Gensler, Diversity Class Actions, Common Relief, and the Rule of Individual Valuation, 82 Or.L.Rev. 295 (2003).

323

Generally, when a single plaintiff sues a single defendant, plaintiff can aggregate the value of all of its claims against defendant to meet the amount-in-controversy requirement. The claims need not share common questions of law or fact; aggregation is permitted “even when those claims share nothing in common besides the identity of the parties.” Everett v. Verizon Wireless, Inc., 460 F.3d 818, 822 (6th Cir. 2006). By contrast, when multiple plaintiffs sue a single defendant, they can aggregate their claims for purposes of meeting the amount-in-controversy requirement only if their claims are common and indivisible. Whether claims are common and indivisible turns on whether the parties seek “to enforce a single title or right.” Troy Bank v. G.A. Whitehead & Co., 222 U.S. 39, 40, 32 S.Ct. 9, 9, 56 L.Ed. 81, 82 (1911). As the Fifth Circuit explained in an influential decision:

To aggregate claims of several plaintiffs the plaintiffs must have a “common and undivided interest,” though it may be separable as between themselves. But where their interests are distinct, and their only relationship is that “they form a class of parties whose rights or liabilities arose out of the same transaction, or have a relation to a common fund or mass or property sought to be administered, such distinct demands or liabilities cannot be aggregated * * *.” Clay v. Field, 138 U.S. 464, 11 S.Ct. 419, 34 L.Ed. 1044 (1891).

Eagle Star Ins. Co. v. Maltes, 313 F.2d 778, 780 (5th Cir. 1963); see also Durant v. Servicemaster Co. Trugreen, Inc., 147 F.Supp.2d 744, 749 (E.D.Mich. 2001) (“An identifying trait of a common and undivided interest is that if one plaintiff were to fail to collect his share, the remaining plaintiffs would collect a larger share.”).

On the other hand, if the claims of multiple plaintiffs are joint and severable, plaintiffs may not aggregate them to meet the jurisdictional amount. Typically, then, tort claims by multiple plaintiffs may not be aggregated to meet the amount-in-controversy requirement—even if they arise from the same transaction. See, e.g., Travelers Property Casualty v. Good, 689 F.3d 714, 720 (7th Cir. 2012) (“[W]here the plaintiffs’ claims are cognizable, calculable, and correctable individually—say, personal injuries arising from mass torts—they are clearly separate and distinct and may not be aggregated to meet the amount in controversy.” (citations and internal quotation marks omitted)).

5. Consider whether the amount-in-controversy requirement for diversity jurisdiction is met in the following cases and whether you need additional information to answer the question:

324

- (a)One plaintiff sues one defendant, claiming $40,000 in property damage and $45,000 for personal injury resulting from the same accident.
- (b)One plaintiff sues one defendant on two unrelated claims, one for $40,000 and the other for $45,000.
- (c)Two plaintiffs sue one defendant, each seeking $40,000 in damages.
- (d)Two plaintiffs sue one defendant, jointly seeking $80,000 in damages.
- (e)One plaintiff sues two defendants, seeking $40,000 from each defendant.
- (f)Two plaintiffs sue one defendant on the same issue. One plaintiff seeks $45,000 in damages; the other seeks $35,000.

6.The question of how to value non-damages relief such as a declaratory judgment or injunction has divided the courts of appeals. The majority rule is that the jurisdictional amount is tested by the value to plaintiff of the relief sought, but some courts have held that the larger of either the worth of the relief to plaintiff or its cost to defendant should control. See Pinahs , Diversity Jurisdiction and Injunctive Relief: Using a “Moving-Party Approach” to Value the Amount in Controversy, 95 Minn.L.Rev. 1930 (2011).

NOTE ON JUDICIALLY CREATED EXCEPTIONS TO DIVERSITY JURISDICTION

Even if the requirements of diversity jurisdiction are met, a federal court generally will decline to hear cases involving domestic relations and probate. These judicially created exceptions to diversity jurisdiction developed at a time when the diversity statute granted jurisdiction for “suits of a civil nature in law or in equity,” and it was thought that cases involving domestic relations and probate, being matters that would have been heard in the ecclesiastical courts, did not fit this description. The 1948 Judicial Code substituted the term “civil action” for the phrase used in the older statutes, but the exceptions have persisted. The conventional account of the exclusion has been subject to question from a variety of perspectives. Compare Resnik, “Naturally” Without Gender: Women, Jurisdiction, and the Federal Courts, 66 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1682 (1991), with Pfander & Damrau, A Non-Contentious Account of Article III’s Domestic Relations Exception, 92 Notre Dame L.Rev. 117 (2016).

The Supreme Court addressed the source and scope of the domestic relations exception in ANKENBRANDT v. RICHARDS, 504 U.S. 689, 112 S.Ct. 2206, 119 L.Ed.2d 468 (1992), in which a mother alleged that her daughters had been physically and sexually abused by their father and his female companion. The Court found that the Constitution “does not mandate the exclusion of domestic relations cases from federal-court jurisdiction,” but that federal courts nevertheless should decline to hear divorce, alimony, and child custody cases under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 as a matter of policy and longstanding judicial practice. In so holding, the Court underscored the fact that state judicial systems “are more eminently suited to work of this type than are federal courts.” Id. at 697, 704, 112 S.Ct. at 2212, 2215, 119 L.Ed.2d at 478, 482. Nevertheless, the Court held that the exception did not warrant abstention in a suit involving an intra-familial tort. See Hasday, Federalism and the Family Reconstructed, 45 UCLA L.Rev. 1297 (1998).

325

The Supreme Court addressed and clarified the limited nature of the probate exception in MARSHALL v. MARSHALL, 547 U.S. 293, 126 S.Ct. 1735, 164 L.Ed.2d 480 (2006), a bankruptcy proceeding concerning the estate of J. Howard Marshall II. Marshall died in 1994, leaving his entire estate to a son and nothing to his widow, who was not the son’s mother and was significantly younger than decedent. Two years later, while the estate was subject to proceedings in a Texas probate court, the widow filed for bankruptcy in the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Central District of California. In that latter case, the son filed a claim, asserting that the widow had defamed him. The widow counterclaimed, alleging that the son had tortiously interfered with a substantial gift of money she expected from her husband. The bankruptcy court, finding it had authority to enter a final judgment on these claims, dismissed the son’s claim and found for the widow, awarding her nearly $500 million. The son filed a post-trial motion, alleging that the widow’s claim could be heard only in the Texas probate court. After review in the district court, the Ninth Circuit held that under the “probate exception” to federal court jurisdiction, federal courts cannot take subject-matter jurisdiction over claims that involve the validity of a decedent’s estate planning instrument, and that this exception also includes tort claims that do not directly involve any probate issues.

The Supreme Court granted certiorari and reversed. Justice Ginsburg, writing for a unanimous Court, held that the widow’s claim, seeking damages for a “widely recognized tort,” id. at 312, 126 S.Ct. at 1748, 164 L.Ed.2d at 498, did not interfere with the state probate proceeding and was within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the federal bankruptcy court. She explained: “[N]o ‘sound policy considerations’ militate in favor of extending the probate exception to cover the case at hand. Trial courts, both federal and state, often address conduct of the kind * * * [the widow] alleges. State probate courts possess no ‘special proficiency . . . in handling [such] issues.’ ” Id. at 312, 126 S.Ct. at 1748–49, 164 L.Ed.2d at 498 (citations omitted). Justice Stevens separately concurred, urging the elimination of the probate exception as historically unjustified. See Graves, Marshall v. Marshall: The Past, Present, and Future of the Probate Exception to Federal Jurisdiction, 59 Ala.L.Rev. 1643 (2008).

326

C. THE SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS—FEDERAL QUESTIONS

Read Article III, § 2 of the United States Constitution and 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331, 1334, 1337, 1338, 1343, 1345, and 1346 in the Supplement.

Article III, § 2 extends the judicial power of the United States “to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made under their Authority.” This kind of jurisdiction is referred to as “federal question” or “arising under” jurisdiction, and the general statutory authority for such jurisdiction in federal district courts is currently set out in 28 U.S.C. § 1331. Congress did not enact federal question jurisdiction until the Midnight Judges Act of 1801, which Congress repealed the next year when the Federalists lost power. See LaCroix, Federalists, Federalism, and Federal Jurisdiction, 30 L. & Hist.Rev. 205 (2012). The current statute traces to the jurisdictional grant enacted in 1875, which was conditioned on an amount-in-controversy requirement. See Act of Mar. 3, 1875, § 1, 18 Stat. 470. Other than Congress’s elimination of this amount-in-controversy condition in 1980, the statute has remained essentially unchanged.

The grant of jurisdiction in 28 U.S.C. § 1331 often is justified on three grounds: to promote the uniformity of federal law; to encourage judicial expertise in interpreting federal law; and to protect against possible state-court hostility to claims arising under federal law. See Preis, Reassessing the Purposes of Federal Question Jurisdiction, 42 Wake Forest L.Rev. 247, 248–60 (2007). A revisionist view casts the federal courts as a “franchising arrangement” characterized by “procedural homogeneity, cultural conformity, and technical competence.” Seinfeld, The Federal Courts as a Franchise: Rethinking the Justifications for Federal Question Jurisdiction, 97 Calif.L.Rev. 95, 100 (2009). Why do you suppose Congress waited until the late nineteenth century to confer jurisdiction on the federal courts to hear cases arising under federal law?

MISHKIN, THE FEDERAL “QUESTION” IN THE DISTRICT COURTS, 53 Colum.L.Rev. 157, 157–59 (1953):

* * * With the exception of an extremely shortlived statute enacted just after the end of the eighteenth century, it was not until 1875 that the federal courts were given initial cognizance of all types of federal question cases. * * *

327

Whatever may have been the circumstances and needs during the first century of our country’s history, there seems to be little doubt that today, with the expanding scope of federal legislation, the exercise of power over cases of this sort constitutes one of the major purposes of a full independent system of national trial courts. The alternative would be to rely entirely upon United States Supreme Court review of state court decisions. But, at least in our present judicial system, Supreme Court pronouncements as to any particular segment of national law are comparatively few. Consequently, sympathetic handling of the available Supreme Court rulings assumes a role of substantial importance in achieving widespread, uniform effectuation of federal law. Presumably judges selected and paid by the central government, with tenure during good behavior—and that determined by the Congress—and probably even somewhat insulated by a separate building, are more likely to give full scope to any given Supreme Court decision, and particularly ones unpopular locally, than are their state counterparts. By the same token, should a district judge fail, or err, a more sympathetic treatment of Supreme Court precedents can be expected from federal circuit judges than from state appellate courts.

Thus, the exercise of federal question jurisdiction by lower federal tribunals presumably permits the Supreme Court to confine itself (insofar as any such distinction can be drawn) to the solving of new problems rather than the policing of old solutions, without the loss that might otherwise be entailed in the effectuation of national rights. Further, the fact that the lower federal bench is chosen by officials of the national government under the same procedure as the members of the high Court suggests a greater similarity in the interpretation of national law, even on first impression, among the several parts of the national system than between the Supreme Court and any state system, or among the various state tribunals themselves. Insofar as this is true, it also promotes a more uniform, correct application of federal law in that significant group of cases where, either because of the novelty of the question, disproportionate expense or for other reasons, recourse to the Supreme Court has previously either not been attempted or been precluded. Finally, it might even be argued that the very existence of an alternative forum stimulates state courts to give a more attentive treatment to claims of federal right.

These factors suggest that it is desirable that Congress be competent to bring to an initial national forum all cases in which the vindication of federal policy may be at stake. However, it does not follow from this that at any given time all such cases should in fact be brought before the federal courts. There are other considerations which must enter into any decision as to the actual use of the national judiciary. For example, there are limits on the volume of litigation which they can handle without an expansion which might not be warranted by the advantages to be gained; the hardships which the geographic location of these courts may impose on the litigants and a willingness to trust that a party’s self-interest will lead him to bring or remove an appropriate case to the federal courts might well justify the current rule that federal question jurisdiction is, for the most part, shared by the local courts; in some circumstances, such as where the validity of state action may be at issue, it may avoid friction and wasted effort, without sacrificing national authority, to allow the initial adjudication to be made by the state’s tribunals subject to ultimate review by the United States Supreme Court. Other factors could easily be added. * * *

328

In OSBORN v. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738, 6 L.Ed. 204 (1824), the Bank of the United States sued in federal court to enjoin the state auditor of Ohio from collecting a tax from it. The court granted a temporary injunction restraining the state auditor from collecting the tax. Nevertheless, the state auditor arranged to have the moneys forcibly removed from the Bank, and the court then ordered the state officials to return the money. The officials appealed on the ground that the federal court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over the case.

The congressional act chartering the Bank authorized it “to sue and be sued * * * in any Circuit Court of the United States.” Chief Justice Marshall held that this authorization was a grant by Congress to the federal courts of jurisdiction in all cases to which the Bank was a party. He then considered whether Congress had the constitutional power to confer jurisdiction over these cases pursuant to the “arising under” language of Article III, § 2. That power clearly existed in the actual case, since the constitutionality of Ohio’s tax on the Bank was at issue. The Chief Justice, however, defended the constitutionality of the jurisdictional grant in broader terms, on the ground that every case and issue involving the Bank “grows out of, and is tested by” federal law:

When [the] Bank sues, the first question which presents itself, and which lies at the foundation of the cause, is, has this legal entity a right to sue? Has it a right to come, not into this Court particularly, but into any Court? This depends on a law of the United States. The next question is, has this being a right to make this particular contract? If this question be decided in the negative, the cause is determined against the plaintiff; and this question, too, depends entirely on a law of the United States. These are important questions, and they exist in every possible case. The right to sue, if decided once, is decided for ever; but the power of Congress was exercised antecedently to the first decision on that right, and if it was constitutional then, it cannot cease to be so, because the particular question is decided. It may be revived at the will of the party, and most probably would be renewed, were the tribunal to be changed. But the question respecting the right to make a particular contract, or to acquire a particular property, or to sue on account of a particular injury, belongs to every particular case, and may be renewed in every case. The question forms an original ingredient in every cause. Whether it be in fact relied on or not, in the defence, it is still a part of the cause, and may be relied on. The right of the plaintiff to sue, cannot depend on the defence which the defendant may choose to set up. His right to sue is anterior to that defence, and must depend on the state of things when the action is brought. The questions which the case involves, then, must determine its character, whether those questions be made in the cause or not.

329

The appellants say, that the case arises on the contract; but the validity of the contract depends on a law of the United States, and the plaintiff is compelled, in every case, to show its validity. The case arises emphatically under the law. The act of Congress is its foundation. The contract could never have been made, but under the authority of that act. The act itself is the first ingredient in the case, is its origin, is that from which every other part arises. That other questions may also arise, as the execution of the contract, or its performance, cannot change the case, or give it any other origin than the charter of incorporation. The action still originates in, and is sustained by, that charter.

Id. at 823–25, 6 L.Ed. at 224–25.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In LIGHTFOOT v. CEDANT MORTGAGE CORP., 580 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 553, 196 L.Ed.2d 493 (2017), the Supreme Court clarified when a “sue-and-be-sued” clause of the sort at issue in Osborn vests jurisdiction or when it simply confers capacity to sue. Lightfoot involved the Federal National Mortgage Association (known as “Fannie Mae”), which, by statute, is authorized “to sue and to be sued, and to complain and to defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal.” 12 U.S.C. § 1723a(a). The Court interpreted the clause as permitting Fannie Mae to sue in any state or federal court, but only if the court is “already endowed with subject-matter jurisdiction over the suit”:

A court of competent jurisdiction is a court with the power to adjudicate the case before it. * * * It follows that a court of competent jurisdiction is a court with a grant of subject-matter jurisdiction covering the case before it. * * * As a result, this Court has understood the phrase “court of competent jurisdiction” as a reference to a court with an existing source of subject-matter jurisdiction. * * *

Id. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 560–61, 196 L.Ed.2d at 502.

330

2. Petitioner argued in Osborn that even if the Bank’s charter did vest federal jurisdiction, Congress lacked constitutional authority to make this grant of judicial power. On what basis did Chief Justice Marshall reject that view? Under his “ingredient” test, can Congress confer jurisdiction over disputes involving the Bank if claims arise under state law and no federal issue is involved? That question was raised in BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. PLANTERS’ BANK OF GEORGIA, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 904, 6 L.Ed. 244 (1824). The Bank of the United States had purchased notes issued by a state bank, which refused to honor them. The Bank sued for payment, and the state bank contested the federal court’s jurisdiction. The Supreme Court held that the question had been “fully considered” in Osborn, and that it was “unnecessary to repeat the reasoning used in that case.” Id. at 905, 6 L.Ed. at 244. What was the federal “ingredient” that provided the constitutional basis for jurisdiction in both cases?

3. In VERLINDEN B.V. v. CENTRAL BANK OF NIGERIA, 461 U.S. 480, 103 S.Ct. 1962, 76 L.Ed.2d 81 (1983), the Supreme Court, in a unanimous opinion written by Chief Justice Burger, observed that Osborn “reflects a broad conception of ‘arising under’ jurisdiction, according to which Congress may confer on the federal courts jurisdiction over any case or controversy that might call for the application of federal law,” but it declined to identify “the precise boundaries” of Article III jurisdiction. Id. at 492–93, 103 S.Ct. at 1971, 76 L.Ed.2d at 91–92. What is the benefit of according such a broad reading to the constitutional grant? Is it significant that the same constitutional language that authorizes Congress to confer jurisdiction on the lower federal courts likewise applies to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court?

4. The concept of “protective jurisdiction” draws from Osborn’s broad interpretation of Article III and allows a federal court, in the absence of diversity of citizenship, “to hear state law claims, even though the claims themselves neither incorporate an original federal ingredient nor seek to enforce rights conferred by federal law.” Pfander, Protective Jurisdiction, Aggregate Litigation, and the Limits of Article III, 95 Calif.L.Rev. 1423 (2007). The Supreme Court has never embraced this species of jurisdiction, finding ways to sidestep the issue when it has been argued. See, e.g., Mesa v. California, 489 U.S. 121, 137, 109 S.Ct. 959, 969, 103 L.Ed.2d 99, 115 (1989) (“We have, in the past, not found the need to adopt a theory of ‘protective jurisdiction’ to support Art. III ‘arising under’ jurisdiction, * * * and we do not see any need for doing so here * * *.” (citing Verlinden [Note 3, supra])). In TEXTILE WORKERS UNION v. LINCOLN MILLS, 353 U.S. 448, 474, 77 S.Ct. 912, 920, 1 L.Ed.2d 972, 990–91 (1957), Justice Frankfurter, dissenting, argued that the federal Constitution provides no basis for protective jurisdiction when the suit involves only state law claims, federal common law does not provide the rule of decision, and the requirements of diversity jurisdiction are not met.

The language of 28 U.S.C. § 1331, like its predecessor statute, tracks that of Article III, § 2 with the exception of referring to “civil actions” rather than to “cases.” See Chadbourn & Levin, Original Jurisdiction of Federal Questions, 90 U.Pa.L.Rev. 639, 645 (1942) (the 1875 statute referred to “suits”). The statute’s drafting history, although spare, shows Congress’s intent to confer jurisdiction that runs the full scope of Article III. See Collins, The Unhappy History of Federal Question Removal, 71 Iowa L.Rev. 717, 723 & nn.32–35 (1986). Nevertheless, the test for when Congress constitutionally may confer jurisdiction on the federal courts differs from whether it has conferred jurisdiction in a particular case; as is frequently stated, the Supreme Court has “more narrowly construed” the legislative grant than “its constitutional counterpart.” Currie, The Federal Courts and the American Law Institute, Part II, 36 U.Chi.L.Rev. 268, 268–69 (1969). Why might the Court feel constrained to limit the flow of cases to the district courts?

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. Co. v. MOTTLEY

Supreme Court of the United States, 1908.

211 U.S. 149, 29 S.Ct. 42, 53 L.Ed. 126.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky * * *.

* * * The appellees (husband and wife), being residents and citizens of Kentucky, brought this suit in equity in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Kentucky against the appellant, a railroad company and a citizen of the same state. * * *

The bill alleged that in September, 1871, plaintiffs, while passengers upon the defendant railroad, were injured by the defendant’s negligence, and released their respective claims for damages in consideration of the agreement for transportation during their lives, expressed in the contract. It is alleged that the contract was performed by the defendant up to January 1, 1907, when the defendant declined to renew the passes. The bill then alleges that the refusal to comply with the contract was based solely upon that part of the act of Congress of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. at L. 584, chap. 3591, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1907, p. 892), which forbids the giving of free passes or free transportation. The bill further alleges: First, that the act of Congress referred to does not prohibit the giving of passes under the circumstances of this case; and, second, that, if the law is to be construed as prohibiting such passes, it is in conflict with the 5th Amendment of the Constitution, because it deprives the plaintiffs of their property without due process of law. The defendant demurred to the bill. The judge of the circuit court overruled the demurrer, entered a decree for the relief prayed for, and the defendant appealed directly to this court.

MR. JUSTICE MOODY, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court:

Two questions of law were raised by the demurrer to the bill, were brought here by appeal, and have been argued before us. They are, first, whether * * * the act of Congress of June 29, 1906 * * * makes it unlawful to perform a contract for transportation of persons who, in good faith, before the passage of the act, had accepted such contract in satisfaction of a valid cause of action against the railroad; and, second, whether the statute, if it should be construed to render such a contract unlawful, is in violation of the 5th Amendment of the Constitution * * *. We do not deem it necessary, however, to consider either of these questions, because, in our opinion, the court below was without jurisdiction of the cause. Neither party has questioned that jurisdiction, but it is the duty of this court to see to it that the jurisdiction of the circuit court, which is defined and limited by statute, is not exceeded. * * *

There was no diversity of citizenship, and it is not and cannot be suggested that there was any ground of jurisdiction, except that the case was a “suit . . . arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States.” 25 Stat. at L. 434, chap. 866, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 509. It is the settled interpretation of these words, as used in this statute, conferring jurisdiction, that a suit arises under the Constitution and laws of the United States only when the plaintiff’s statement of his own cause of action shows that it is based upon those laws or that Constitution. It is not enough that the plaintiff alleges some anticipated defense to his cause of action, and asserts that the defense is invalidated by some provision of the Constitution of the United States. Although such allegations show that very likely, in the course of the litigation, a question under the Constitution would arise, they do not show that the suit, that is, the plaintiff’s original cause of action, arises under the Constitution. In Tennessee v. Union & Planters’ Bank, 152 U. S. 454, 38 L.Ed. 511, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 654, the plaintiff, the state of Tennessee, brought suit in the circuit court of the United States to recover from the defendant certain taxes alleged to be due under the laws of the state. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant claimed an immunity from the taxation by virtue of its charter, and that therefore the tax was void, because in violation of the provision of the Constitution of the United States, which forbids any state from passing a law impairing the obligation of contracts. The cause was held to be beyond the jurisdiction of the circuit court, the court saying, by Mr. Justice Gray (p. 464): “A suggestion of one party, that the other will or may set up a claim under the Constitution or laws of the United States, does not make the suit one arising under that Constitution or those laws.” Again, in Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. v. Montana Ore Purchasing Co., 188 U. S. 632, 47 L.Ed. 626, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 434, the plaintiff brought suit in the circuit court of the United States for the conversion of copper ore and for an injunction against its continuance. The plaintiff then alleged, for the purpose of showing jurisdiction, in substance, that the defendant would set up in defense certain laws of the United States. The cause was held to be beyond the jurisdiction of the circuit court, the court saying, by Mr. Justice Peckham (pp. 638, 639):

It would be wholly unnecessary and improper, in order to prove complainant’s cause of action, to go into any matters of defense which the defendants might possibly set up, and then attempt to reply to such defense, and thus, if possible, to show that a Federal question might or probably would arise in the course of the trial of the case. To allege such defense and then make an answer to it before the defendant has the opportunity to itself plead or prove its own defense is inconsistent with any known rule of pleading, so far as we are aware, and is improper.

The rule is a reasonable and just one that the complainant in the first instance shall be confined to a statement of its cause of action, leaving to the defendant to set up in his answer what his defense is, and, if anything more than a denial of complainant’s cause of action, imposing upon the defendant the burden of proving such defense.

Conforming itself to that rule, the complainant would not, in the assertion or proof of its cause of action, bring up a single Federal question. The presentation of its cause of action would not show that it was one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States.

* * *

* * * The application of this rule to the case at bar is decisive against the jurisdiction of the circuit court.

It is ordered that the judgment be reversed and the case remitted to the circuit court with instructions to dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Some commentators question whether the Court in Mottley properly interpreted 28 U.S.C. § 1331, pointing to the statute’s legislative history. See Chemerinsky, Federal Jurisdiction § 5.2 (8th ed.) (quoting the floor manager of the statute as saying the bill “gives precisely the power which the Constitution confers—nothing more, nothing less”). To what extent is statutory jurisdiction under Mottley narrower than the Osborn “ingredient” test for jurisdiction under Article III? If the Mottley test is not constitutionally required, does this mean the Supreme Court has discretion to give the statutory grant a more generous reading?

334

2. Following the Court’s decision, the Mottleys commenced an action in a Kentucky state court. The case ultimately was brought to the Supreme Court by appeal from the highest court in Kentucky on the question of the validity and construction of the 1906 Act; three years after the Supreme Court dismissed the federal action, it examined the merits of the Mottleys’ contentions and decided in favor of the railroad. See 219 U.S. 467, 31 S.Ct. 265, 55 L.Ed. 297 (1911). What was gained by the original dismissal?

3. After the Civil War, the number of lawsuits filed in the federal courts dramatically increased, but Congress was slow to increase judicial capacity or to meet the problems of court congestion. See Purcell, Jr., Reconsidering the Frankfurterian Paradigm: Reflections on Histories of Lower Federal Courts, 24 Law & Soc. Inquiry 679 (1999). In what way did Mottley help to resolve problems of federal docket overload?

4. Mottley is said to stand for the “well-pleaded complaint” rule. Vaden v. Discover Bank, 556 U.S. 49, 60, 129 S.Ct. 1262, 1272, 173 L.Ed.2d 206, 218 (2009) (citing Mottley as establishing “the longstanding well-pleaded complaint rule”). That is, plaintiff must allege the federal issue as an element of the claim; if the federal issue is assigned to defendant as an affirmative defense, federal question jurisdiction cannot be asserted under Section 1331. Why was federal jurisdiction not present on the face of the Mottleys’ complaint? Is it that the complaint anticipated a federal defense? What was that defense? The American Law Institute’s Study of the Division of Jurisdiction Between State and Federal Courts, published in 1969, proposed a reform—never adopted—that would permit retention of jurisdiction whenever defendant has introduced a federal defense or a federal counterclaim. See Doernberg, There’s No Reason for It; It’s Just Our Policy: Why the Well-Pleaded Complaint Rule Sabotages the Purposes of Federal Question Jurisdiction, 38 Hastings L.J. 597 (1987). What problems might arise from adoption of the ALI proposal?

NOTE ON THE DECLARATORY JUDGMENT ACT AND ARTFUL PLEADING

The Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201–02, allows the federal court to issue a declaration of “rights and other legal relations” to an “interested party” in “a case of actual controversy within its jurisdiction.” The statute creates a remedy but does not confer jurisdiction; a federal court can hear a declaratory judgment action only if the corresponding coercive action—meaning, an action seeking money damages or an injunction—could invoke jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 (or some other jurisdictional source).

In SKELLY OIL CO. v. PHILLIPS PETROLEUM CO., 339 U.S. 667, 673–74, 70 S.Ct. 876, 880, 94 L.Ed. 1194, 1201 (1950), suit was brought for a declaration that certain contracts were still in effect because a necessary federal certificate had been timely issued. Had the declaratory-plaintiff sued to enforce the contract following a breach, the complaint would not have raised a federal question, for the claim would have sounded in state contract law. However, defendant would have included in its answer to a post-breach complaint an affirmative defense derived from federal law. Skelly Oil asked whether the declaratory complaint, by anticipating the federal defense, satisfied the statutory test for federal jurisdiction. The Court held it did not: “[t]o sanction suits for declaratory relief as within the jurisdiction of the District Courts merely because, as in this case, artful pleading anticipates a defense based on federal law would contravene the whole trend of jurisdictional legislation by Congress, disregard the effective functioning of the federal judicial system and distort the limited procedural purposes of the Declaratory Judgment Act.” For a criticism of Skelly Oil, see Doernberg, The Trojan Horse: How the Declaratory Judgment Act Created a Cause of Action and Expanded Federal Jurisdiction While the Supreme Court Wasn’t Looking, 36 UCLA L.Rev. 529 (1989).

335

Skelly Oil coined the phrase “artful pleading” to refer, as Professor Miller has put it, to “an attempt by the plaintiff to create federal question jurisdiction through the anticipation and inclusion of a federal defense on the face of its complaint in an action brought under the Declaratory Judgment Act.” Miller, Artful Pleading: A Doctrine in Search of Definition, 76 Tex.L.Rev. 1781, 1783 (1998).

T. B. HARMS CO. v. ELISCU

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1964.

339 F.2d 823, cert. denied, 381 U.S. 915, 85 S.Ct. 1534, 14 L.Ed.2d 435 (1965).

FRIENDLY, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

A layman would doubtless be surprised to learn that an action wherein the purported sole owner of a copyright alleged that persons claiming partial ownership had recorded their claim in the Copyright Office and had warned his licensees against disregarding their interests was not one “arising under any Act of Congress relating to * * * copyrights” over which 28 U.S.C. § 1338 gives the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. Yet precedents going back for more than a century teach that lesson and lead us to affirm Judge Weinfeld’s dismissal of the complaint.

The litigation concerns four copyrighted songs. * * * The music for the songs was composed by Vincent Youmans for use in a motion picture, “Flying Down to Rio,” pursuant to a contract made in 1933 with RKO Studios, Inc. He agreed to assign to RKO the recordation and certain other rights relating to the picture during the existence of the copyrights and any renewals. RKO was to employ a writer of the lyrics and to procure the publishing rights in these for Youmans, who was “to pay said lyric writer the usual and customary royalties on sheet music and mechanical records.” Subject to this, Youmans could assign the publication and small performing rights to the music and lyrics as he saw fit. In fact RKO employed two lyric writers, Gus Kahn and the defendant Edward Eliscu, who agreed to assign to RKO certain rights described in a contract dated as of May 25, 1933. Max Dreyfus, principal stockholder of the plaintiff

336

Harms, which has succeeded to his rights, acquired Youmans’ reserved rights to the music and was his designee for the assignment with respect to the lyrics. Allegedly—and his denial of this is a prime subject of dispute—Eliscu then entered into an agreement dated June 30, 1933, assigning his rights to the existing and renewal copyrights to Dreyfus in return for certain royalties.

When the copyrights were about to expire, proper renewal applications were made by the children of Youmans, by the widow and children of Kahn, and by Eliscu. The two former groups executed assignments of their rights in the renewal copyrights to Harms. But Eliscu, by an instrument dated February 19, 1962, recorded in the Copyright Office, assigned his rights in the renewal copyrights to defendant Ross Jungnickel, Inc., subject to a judicial determination of his ownership. Thereafter Eliscu’s lawyer advised ASCAP and one Harry Fox—respectively the agents for the small performing rights and the mechanical recording license fees—that Eliscu had become vested with a half interest in the renewal copyrights and that any future payments which failed to reflect his interest would be made at their own risk; at the same time he demanded an accounting from Harms. Finally, Eliscu brought an action in the New York Supreme Court for a declaration that he owned a one-third interest in the renewal copyrights and for an accounting.

Harms then began the instant action in the District Court for the Southern District of New York for equitable and declaratory relief against Eliscu and Jungnickel. Jurisdiction was predicated on 28 U.S.C. § 1338; plaintiff alleged its own New York incorporation and did not allege the citizenship of the defendants, which concededly is in New York. Defendants moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted and for lack of federal jurisdiction; voluminous affidavits were submitted. The district court dismissed the complaint for want of federal jurisdiction * * *.

In line with what apparently were the arguments of the parties, Judge Weinfeld treated the jurisdictional issue as turning solely on whether the complaint alleged any act or threat of copyright infringement. He was right in concluding it did not. Infringement, as used in copyright law, does not include everything that may impair the value of the copyright; it is doing one or more of those things which * * * the Act * * * reserves exclusively to the copyright owner. * * *

Although Chief Justice Marshall, construing the “arising under” language in the context of Article III of the Constitution, indicated in Osborn v. Bank of the United States * * * that the grant extended to every case in which federal law furnished a necessary ingredient of the claim even though this was antecedent and uncontested, the Supreme Court has long given a narrower meaning to the “arising under” language in statutes defining the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts. * * * If the ingredient theory of Article III had been carried over to the general grant of federal question jurisdiction now contained in 28 U.S.C. § 1331, there would have been no basis—to take a well-known example—why federal courts should not have jurisdiction as to all disputes over the many western land titles originating in a federal patent, even though the controverted questions normally are of fact or of local land law. Quite sensibly, such extensive jurisdiction has been denied.

337

* * *

The cases dealing with statutory jurisdiction over patents and copyrights have taken the same conservative line. * * * Just as with western land titles, the federal grant of a patent or copyright has not been thought to infuse with any national interest a dispute as to ownership or contractual enforcement turning on the facts or on ordinary principles of contract law. Indeed, the case for an unexpansive reading of the provision conferring exclusive jurisdiction with respect to patents and copyrights has been especially strong since expansion would entail depriving the state courts of any jurisdiction over matters having so little federal significance.

In an endeavor to explain precisely what suits arose under the patent and copyright laws, Mr. Justice Holmes stated that “[a] suit arises under the law that creates the cause of action”; in the case sub judice, injury to a business involving slander of a patent, he said, “whether it is a wrong or not depends upon the law of the State where the act is done” so that the suit did not arise under the patent laws. American Well Works Co. v. Layne & Bowler Co. * * * The Holmes “creation” test explains the taking of federal jurisdiction in a great many cases, notably copyright and patent infringement actions, both clearly authorized by the respective federal acts, * * * and thus unquestionably within the scope of 28 U.S.C. § 1338; indeed, in the many infringement suits that depend only on some point of fact and require no construction of federal law, no other explanation may exist.

Harms’ claim is not within Holmes’ definition. The relevant statutes create no explicit right of action to enforce or rescind assignments of copyrights, nor does any copyright statute specify a cause of action to fix the locus of ownership. To be sure, not every federal cause of action springs from an express mandate of Congress; federal civil claims have been “inferred” from federal statutes making behavior criminal or otherwise regulating it. * * * Such statutes invariably impose a federal duty and usually create some express remedy as well, while the relevant copyright provision merely authorizes an assignment by written instrument, 17 U.S.C. § 28. * * *

It has come to be realized that Mr. Justice Holmes’ formula is more useful for inclusion than for the exclusion for which it was intended. Even though the claim is created by state law, a case may “arise under” a law of the United States if the complaint discloses a need for determining the meaning or application of such a law. * * * But Harms likewise does not meet this test. The crucial issue is whether or not Eliscu executed the assignment to Dreyfus; possibly the interpretation of the initial May, 1933, contract is also relevant, but if any aspect of the suit requires an interpretation of the Copyright Act, the complaint does not reveal it.

338

* * *

Mindful of the hazards of formulation in this treacherous area, we think that an action “arises under” the Copyright Act if and only if the complaint is for a remedy expressly granted by the Act, e.g., a suit for infringement or for the statutory royalties for record reproduction, * * * or asserts a claim requiring construction of the Act, * * * or, at the very least and perhaps more doubtfully, presents a case where a distinctive policy of the Act requires that federal principles control the disposition of the claim. The general interest that copyrights, like all other forms of property, should be enjoyed by their true owner is not enough to meet this last test.

* * *

Affirmed.

NOTE ON PRIVATE RIGHTS OF ACTION

The principal case emphasized that the Copyright Act did not create an “explicit right of action to enforce or rescind assignments of copyrights,” p. 337, supra. More generally, the term “private right of action” refers to a suit brought by a private person for violation of a statute or constitutional provision. See Stewart & Sunstein, Public Programs and Private Rights, 95 Harv.L.Rev. 1193, 1196 (1982). Legislation creating an enforceable private right of action may do so either expressly or by implication. Traditionally, when a statute did not explicitly create a private right of action, courts could use their common law power to imply such a right, “either by relying upon statutes to give specific content to the open-textured ‘reasonable man’ standard of negligence, or by creating an action in damages for statutory wrongs.” Id. at 1206. Even if a federal right of action does not exist, a state tort action may be available to enforce the federal standard. A similar issue arises when a party seeks to enforce rights under the United States Constitution. In BIVENS v. SIX UNKNOWN NAMED AGENTS OF THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF NARCOTICS, 403 U.S. 388, 91 S.Ct. 1999, 29 L.Ed.2d 619 (1971), the Court implied a private right of action for damages to redress a violation of the Fourth Amendment.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Would it be constitutional under the Osborn ingredient test for Congress to confer federal jurisdiction over a case in which the owner of a copyright sues a licensee for infringement?
2. Congress has given the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction over federal securities-law class actions, 15 U.S.C. § 77p(b) and (c); bankruptcy, 28 U.S.C. § 1334; patents and copyrights, 28 U.S.C. § 1338(a); actions against foreign consuls and vice-consuls, 28 U.S.C. § 1351; actions to recover a fine, penalty, or forfeiture under federal law, 28 U.S.C. § 1355; and actions involving certain seizures, 28 U.S.C. § 1356. In the principal case, why wasn’t plaintiff’s claim within the federal court’s exclusive jurisdiction? See Note, Exclusive Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts in Private Civil Actions, 70 Harv.L.Rev. 509 (1957).

339

3. The Second Circuit in the principal case referred to the “Holmes’ formula” for determining whether there is jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331. Justice Holmes articulated the “formula” in AMERICAN WELL WORKS CO. v. LAYNE & BOWLER CO., 241 U.S. 257, 36 S.Ct. 585, 60 L.Ed. 987 (1916). The case involved a claim by a pump manufacturer that a competitor had damaged its reputation by telling customers that plaintiff’s pump infringed defendant’s patent. The Supreme Court held that there was no federal jurisdiction over the suit. Justice Holmes explained:

A suit for damages to business caused by a threat to sue under the patent law is not itself a suit under the patent law. And the same is true when the damage is caused by a statement of fact,—that the defendant has a patent which is infringed. What makes the defendants’ act a wrong is its manifest tendency to injure the plaintiff’s business; and the wrong is the same whatever the means by which it is accomplished. But whether it is a wrong or not depends upon the law of the state where the act is done, not upon the patent law, and therefore the suit arises under the law of the state. A suit arises under the law that creates the cause of action. The fact that the justification may involve the validity and infringement of a patent is no more material to the question under what law the suit is brought than it would be in an action of contract. * * * The state is master of the whole matter, and if it saw fit to do away with actions of this type altogether, no one, we imagine, would suppose that they still could be maintained under the patent laws of the United States.

Id. at 259–60, 36 S.Ct. at 586, 60 L.Ed. at 989. Justice McKenna dissented, on the ground “that the case involves a direct and substantial controversy under the patent laws.” Id. at 260, 36 S.Ct. at 586, 60 L.Ed. at 989. For a criticism of the Holmes formula, see Woolhandler & Collins, Federal Question Jurisdiction and Justice Holmes, 84 Notre Dame L.Rev. 2151, 2186–87 (2009), arguing that prior to American Well Works there was “a long tradition” of exercising federal jurisdiction as a statutory matter over state law claims that included a federal ingredient.

4. Should all causes of action created by federal law confer federal question jurisdiction? SHOSHONE MINING CO. v. RUTTER, 177 U.S. 505, 20 S.Ct. 726, 44 L.Ed. 864 (1900), involved a federal statute establishing a system allowing miners to resolve conflicting claims to land patents. The federal statute provided that the right to possession was to be determined by the “local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.” Id. at 508, 20 S.Ct. at 727, 44 L.Ed. at 865. The Court determined that the suit did not arise under federal law for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 1331:

340

Inasmuch * * * as the “adverse suit” to determine the right of possession may not involve any question as to the construction or effect of the Constitution or laws of the United States, but may present simply a question of fact as to the time of the discovery of mineral, the location of the claim on the ground, or a determination of the meaning and effect of certain local rules and customs prescribed by the miners of the district, or the effect of state statutes, it would seem to follow that it is not one which necessarily arises under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Id. at 509, 20 S.Ct. at 727, 44 L.Ed. at 866.

5. In SMITH v. KANSAS CITY TITLE & TRUST CO., 255 U.S. 180, 41 S.Ct. 243, 65 L.Ed. 577 (1921), a shareholder sued to enjoin the Trust Company, a Missouri corporation, from investing in certain federal bonds on the ground that the Act of Congress authorizing their issuance was unconstitutional. Plaintiff claimed that under Missouri law an investment in securities, the issuance of which had not been authorized by a valid law, was ultra vires and so enjoinable. Although the cause of action was created by state law, the Supreme Court held that the action arose under federal law for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 1331:

The general rule is that where it appears from the bill or statement of the plaintiff that the right to relief depends upon the construction or application of the Constitution or laws of the United States, and that such federal claim is not merely colorable, and rests upon a reasonable foundation, the District Court has jurisdiction * * *.

Id. at 199, 41 S.Ct. at 245, 65 L.Ed. at 585. Justice Holmes dissented.

In MOORE v. CHESAPEAKE & OHIO RAILWAY CO., 291 U.S. 205, 54 S.Ct. 402, 78 L.Ed. 755 (1934), plaintiff brought an action under Kentucky’s Employer Liability Act, which barred an affirmative defense for contributory negligence or assumption of risk if defendant failed to meet state or federal safety requirements. Plaintiff alleged defendant’s failure to comply with the Federal Safety Appliance Act. The Supreme Court found that federal question jurisdiction did not exist:

[A] suit brought under the state statute which defines liability to employees who are injured while engaged in intrastate commerce, and brings within the purview of the statute a breach of the duty imposed by the federal statute, should [not] be regarded as a suit arising under the laws of the United States and cognizable in the federal court in the absence of diversity of citizenship.

Id. at 214–15, 54 S.Ct. at 406, 78 L.Ed. at 763. Can Moore be reconciled with Smith?

341

In MERRELL DOW PHARMACEUTICALS INC. v. THOMPSON, 478 U.S. 804, 106 S.Ct. 3229, 92 L.Ed.2d 650 (1986), plaintiff sued a drug manufacturer in state court on a number of state law claims including per se negligence, on the theory that defendant had failed to comply with labeling requirements under a federal statute. Defendant removed the action from state court to federal court on the basis of federal question jurisdiction.

The Court of Appeals reversed and remanded, so the action was returned to state court. After granting certiorari, the Supreme Court affirmed. The Court stated that “determinations about federal jurisdiction require sensitive judgments about congressional intent, judicial power, and the federal system,” and found it significant that Congress had not created a private right of action to enforce the federal labeling requirement. Id. at 810, 106 S.Ct. 3233, 92 L.Ed.2d at 659. On that basis, the Court held that the federal interest in the state negligence suit was too insubstantial to support jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331:

We * * * conclude that the congressional determination that there should be no federal remedy for the violation of this federal statute is tantamount to a congressional conclusion that the presence of a claimed violation of the statute as an element of a state cause of action is insufficiently “substantial” to confer federal-question jurisdiction. * * *

Id. at 814, 106 S.Ct. at 3235, 92 L.Ed.2d at 662. In a footnote, the Court elaborated on the significance of “the nature of the federal interest at stake” to the jurisdictional inquiry:

Focusing on the nature of the federal interest, moreover, suggests that the widely perceived “irreconcilable” conflict between the finding of federal jurisdiction in Smith * * * and the finding of no jurisdiction in Moore * * * is far from clear. For the difference in result can be seen as manifestations of the differences in the nature of the federal issues at stake. In Smith, as the Court emphasized, the issue was the constitutionality of an important federal statute. * * * In Moore, in contrast, the Court emphasized that the violation of the federal standard as an element of state tort recovery did not fundamentally change the state tort nature of the action. * * *

The importance of the nature of the federal issue in federal-question jurisdiction is highlighted by the fact that, despite the usual reliability of the Holmes test as an inclusionary principle, this Court has sometimes found that formally federal causes of action were not properly brought under federal-question jurisdiction because of the overwhelming predominance of state-law issues. See * * * Shoshone Mining * * *.

Id. at 814 n.12, 106 S.Ct. at 3235 n.12, 92 L.Ed.2d at 662 n.12.

Justice Brennan dissented. In particular, the dissent questioned whether it was appropriate to equate Congress’s decision not to create a private right of action to enforce a federal statute with a decision to withhold federal jurisdiction from an action to enforce the statute using state tort law. Justice Brennan also criticized the majority’s focus on “the importance of the federal issue,” characterizing this factor as “infinitely malleable” and based upon an “ad hoc evaluation” that was inevitably “vague and general.” Id. at 821 n.1, 106 S.Ct. at 3239 n.1, 92 L.Ed.2d at 667 n.1 (Brennan, J., dissenting).

Merrell Dow generated serious division among the circuits on a number of issues, including whether Smith continued to support jurisdiction over a state cause of action that turned on a federal issue for its resolution; whether a federal right of action was a bright-line condition for jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331; and whether the substantiality of a federal issue could support federal jurisdiction over a state law claim in the absence of a federal private right of action to enforce the federal standard.

GRABLE & SONS METAL PRODUCTS, INC. v. DARUE ENGINEERING & MANUFACTURING

Supreme Court of the United States, 2005.
545 U.S. 308, 125 S.Ct. 2363, 162 L.Ed.2d 257.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

JUSTICE SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question is whether want of a federal cause of action to try claims of title to land obtained at a federal tax sale precludes removal to federal court of a state action with nondiverse parties raising a disputed issue of federal title law. We answer no, and hold that the national interest in providing a federal forum for federal tax litigation is sufficiently substantial to support the exercise of federal-question jurisdiction over the disputed issue on removal, which would not distort any division of labor between the state and federal courts, provided or assumed by Congress.

I

In 1994, the Internal Revenue Service seized Michigan real property belonging to petitioner Grable & Sons Metal Products, Inc., to satisfy Grable’s federal tax delinquency. Title 26 U.S.C. § 6335 required the IRS to give notice of the seizure, and there is no dispute that Grable received actual notice by certified mail before the IRS sold the property to respondent Darue Engineering & Manufacturing. Although Grable also received notice of the sale itself, it did not exercise its statutory right to redeem the property within 180 days of the sale, § 6337(b)(1), and after that period had passed, the Government gave Darue a quitclaim deed, § 6339.

Five years later, Grable brought a quiet title action in state court, claiming that Darue’s record title was invalid because the IRS had failed to notify Grable of its seizure of the property in the exact manner required by § 6335(a), which provides that written notice must be “given by the Secretary to the owner of the property [or] left at his usual place of abode or business.” Grable said that the statute required personal service, not service by certified mail.

Darue removed the case to Federal District Court as presenting a federal question, because the claim of title depended on the interpretation of the notice statute in the federal tax law. The District Court declined to remand the case at Grable’s behest after finding that the “claim does pose a ‘significant question of federal law,’ ” * * * and ruling that Grable’s lack of a federal right of action to enforce its claim against Darue did not bar the exercise of federal jurisdiction. On the merits, the court granted summary judgment to Darue, holding that although § 6335 by its terms required personal service, substantial compliance with the statute was enough. * * *

The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed. * * * We granted certiorari on the jurisdictional question * * * to resolve a split within the Courts of Appeals on whether Merrell Dow * * * always requires * * * a federal cause of action as a condition for exercising federal-question jurisdiction. We now affirm.

II

Darue was entitled to remove the quiet title action if Grable could have brought it in federal district court originally, 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a), as a civil action “arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States,” § 1331. This provision for federal-question jurisdiction is invoked by and large by plaintiffs pleading a cause of action created by federal law (e.g., claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983). There is, however, another longstanding, if less frequently encountered, variety of federal “arising under” jurisdiction, this Court having recognized for nearly 100 years that in certain cases federal-question jurisdiction will lie over state-law claims that implicate significant federal issues. * * * The doctrine captures the commonsense notion that a federal court ought to be able to hear claims recognized under state law that nonetheless turn on substantial questions of federal law, and thus justify resort to the experience, solicitude, and hope of uniformity that a federal forum offers on federal issues. * * *

The classic example is Smith * * * [p. 340, Note 5, supra]. Although Missouri law provided the cause of action, the Court recognized federal-question jurisdiction because the principal issue in the case was the federal constitutionality of the bond issue. * * *

* * * Smith * * * has been subject to some trimming to fit earlier and later cases recognizing the vitality of the basic doctrine, but shying away from the expansive view that mere need to apply federal law in a state-law claim will suffice to open the “arising under” door. * * * [Justice Cardozo later explained] that a request to exercise federal-question jurisdiction over a state action calls for a “common-sense accommodation of judgment to [the] kaleidoscopic situations” that present a federal issue, in “a selective process which picks the substantial causes out of the web and lays the other ones aside.” Gully v. First Nat. Bank in Meridian, 299 U.S. 109, 117–118, 57 S.Ct. 96, 81 L.Ed. 70 (1936). It has in fact become a constant refrain in such cases that federal jurisdiction demands not only a contested federal issue, but a substantial one, indicating a serious federal interest in claiming the advantages thought to be inherent in a federal forum. * * *

But even when the state action discloses a contested and substantial federal question, the exercise of federal jurisdiction is subject to a possible veto. For the federal issue will ultimately qualify for a federal forum only if federal jurisdiction is consistent with congressional judgment about the sound division of labor between state and federal courts governing the application of § 1331. * * * Because arising-under jurisdiction to hear a state-law claim always raises the possibility of upsetting the state-federal line drawn (or at least assumed) by Congress, the presence of a disputed federal issue and the ostensible importance of a federal forum are never necessarily dispositive; there must always be an assessment of any disruptive portent in exercising federal jurisdiction. * * *

These considerations have kept us from stating a “single, precise, all-embracing” test for jurisdiction over federal issues embedded in state-law claims between nondiverse parties. * * * We have not kept them out simply because they appeared in state raiment, as Justice Holmes would have done [in American Well Works] * * *, but neither have we treated “federal issue” as a password opening federal courts to any state action embracing a point of federal law. Instead, the question is, does a state-law claim necessarily raise a stated federal issue, actually disputed and substantial, which a federal forum may entertain without disturbing any congressionally approved balance of federal and state judicial responsibilities.

III

A

This case warrants federal jurisdiction. Grable’s state complaint must specify “the facts establishing the superiority of [its] claim,” Mich. Ct. Rule

3.411(B)(2)(c) (West 2005), and Grable has premised its superior title claim on a failure by the IRS to give it adequate notice, as defined by federal law. Whether Grable was given notice within the meaning of the federal statute is thus an essential element of its quiet title claim, and the meaning of the federal statute is actually in dispute; it appears to be the only legal or factual issue contested in the case. The meaning of the federal tax provision is an important issue of federal law that sensibly belongs in a federal court. The Government has a strong interest in the “prompt and certain collection of delinquent taxes,” * * * and the ability of the IRS to satisfy its claims from the property of delinquents requires clear terms of notice to allow buyers like Darue to satisfy themselves that the Service has touched the bases necessary for good title. The Government thus has a direct interest in the availability of a federal forum to vindicate its own administrative action, and buyers (as well as tax delinquents) may find it valuable to come before judges used to federal tax matters. Finally, because it will be the rare state title case that raises a contested matter of federal law, federal jurisdiction to resolve genuine disagreement over federal tax title provisions will portend only a microscopic effect on the federal-state division of labor. * * *

B

Merrell Dow * * * [p. 341, supra], on which Grable rests its position, is not to the contrary. * * *

Because federal law provides for no quiet title action that could be brought against Darue, Grable argues that there can be no federal jurisdiction here, stressing some broad language in Merrell Dow * * * that on its face supports Grable’s position * * *. But an opinion is to be read as a whole, and Merrell Dow cannot be read whole as overturning decades of precedent, as it would have done by effectively adopting the Holmes dissent in Smith * * * and converting a federal cause of action from a sufficient condition for federal-question jurisdiction into a necessary one.

In the first place, Merrell Dow disclaimed the adoption of any bright-line rule, as when the Court reiterated that “in exploring the outer reaches of § 1331, determinations about federal jurisdiction require sensitive judgments about congressional intent, judicial power, and the federal system.” * * * The opinion included a lengthy footnote explaining that questions of jurisdiction over state-law claims require “careful judgments,” * * * about the “nature of the federal interest at stake,” * * * (emphasis deleted). And as a final indication that it did not mean to make a federal right of action mandatory, it expressly approved the exercise of jurisdiction sustained in Smith, despite the want of any federal cause of action available to Smith’s shareholder plaintiff. * * * Merrell Dow then, did not toss out, but specifically retained, the contextual enquiry that had been Smith’s hallmark for over 60 years. At the end of Merrell Dow, Justice Holmes was still dissenting.

Accordingly, Merrell Dow should be read in its entirety as treating the absence of a federal private right of action as evidence relevant to, but not dispositive of, the “sensitive judgments about congressional intent” that § 1331 requires. The absence of any federal cause of action affected Merrell Dow’s result two ways. The Court saw the fact as worth some consideration in the assessment of substantiality. But its primary importance emerged when the Court treated the combination of no federal cause of action and no preemption of state remedies for misbranding as an important clue to Congress’s conception of the scope of jurisdiction to be exercised under § 1331. The Court saw the missing cause of action not as a missing federal door key, always required, but as a missing welcome mat, required in the circumstances, when exercising federal jurisdiction over a state misbranding action would have attracted a horde of original filings and removal cases raising other state claims with embedded federal issues. For if the federal labeling standard without a federal cause of action could get a state claim into federal court, so could any other federal standard without a federal cause of action. And that would have meant a tremendous number of cases.

* * * “The violation of federal statutes and regulations is commonly given negligence per se effect in state tort proceedings.” Restatement (Third) of Torts § 14 Reporters’ Note, Comment a, p. 195 (Tent.Draft No. 1, Mar. 28, 2001). * * * A general rule of exercising federal jurisdiction over state claims resting on federal mislabeling and other statutory violations would thus have heralded a potentially enormous shift of traditionally state cases into federal courts. Expressing concern over the “increased volume of federal litigation,” and noting the importance of adhering to “legislative intent,” Merrell Dow thought it improbable that the Congress, having made no provision for a federal cause of action, would have meant to welcome any state-law tort case implicating federal law “solely because the violation of the federal statute is said to [create] a rebuttable presumption [of negligence] . . . under state law.” * * *^f (internal quotation marks omitted). In this situation, no welcome mat meant keep out. Merrell Dow’s analysis thus fits within the framework of examining the importance of having a federal forum for the issue, and the consistency of such a forum with Congress’s intended division of labor between state and federal courts.

As already indicated, however, a comparable analysis yields a different jurisdictional conclusion in this case. Although Congress also indicated ambivalence in this case by providing no private right of action to Grable, it is the rare state quiet title action that involves contested issues of federal law * * *. Consequently, jurisdiction over actions like Grable’s would not materially affect, or threaten to affect, the normal currents of litigation. Given the absence of threatening structural consequences and the clear interest the Government, its buyers, and its delinquents have in the availability of a federal forum, there is no good reason to shirk from federal jurisdiction over the dispositive and contested federal issue at the heart of the state-law title claim. * * *

IV

The judgment of the Court of Appeals * * * is affirmed.

It is so ordered.

Justice THOMAS, concurring.

The Court faithfully applies our precedents interpreting 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to authorize federal-court jurisdiction over some cases in which state law creates the cause of action but requires determination of an issue of federal law. * * * In this case, no one has asked us to overrule those precedents and adopt the rule Justice Holmes set forth in American Well Works Co. * * * [p. 339, Note 3, supra] limiting § 1331 jurisdiction to cases in which federal law creates the cause of action pleaded on the face of the plaintiff’s complaint. * * * In an appropriate case, and perhaps with the benefit of better evidence as to the original meaning of § 1331’s text, I would be willing to consider that course. * * *

GUNN V. MINTON
Supreme Court of the United States, 2013.
568 U.S. 251, 133 S.Ct. 1059, 185 L.Ed.2d 72.

Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Texas.

CHIEF JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over cases “arising under any Act of Congress relating to patents.” 28 U.S.C. § 1338(a). The question presented is whether a state law claim alleging legal malpractice in the handling of a patent case must be brought in federal court.

I

* * *

[Minton was represented by attorney Gunn in a federal patent infringement action in which his patent was declared invalid. Minton later sued his attorney for malpractice and on appeal argued that the attorney had failed to raise the “experimental use” exception under the federal patent law, causing his infringement claim to fail. The Texas Supreme Court, reversing the trial and intermediate appeals courts, held that the case properly belonged in federal court because the success of Minton’s malpractice claim turned on a question of federal patent law.]

348

II

* * *

* * * Adhering to the demands of “[l]inguistic consistency,” we have interpreted the phrase “arising under” [as set forth in 28 U.S.C. § 1338(a), which governs patent disputes] * * * identically [as under 28 U.S.C. § 1331], applying our § 1331 and § 1338(a) precedents interchangeably. * * *

For statutory purposes, a case can “aris[e] under” federal law in two ways. Most directly, a case arises under federal law when federal law creates the cause of action asserted. * * * As a rule of inclusion, this “creation” test admits of only extremely rare exceptions, see, e.g., Shoshone Mining Co. * * * [p. 339, Note 4, supra], and accounts for the vast bulk of suits that arise under federal law * * *. * * *

But even where a claim finds its origins in state rather than federal law—as Minton’s legal malpractice claim indisputably does—we have identified a “special and small category” of cases in which arising under jurisdiction still lies. In outlining the contours of this slim category, we do not paint on a blank canvas. Unfortunately, the canvas looks like one that Jackson Pollock got to first. * * *

In an effort to bring some order to this unruly doctrine several Terms ago, [Grable, p. 342, supra,] we condensed our prior cases into the following inquiry: Does the “state-law claim necessarily raise a stated federal issue, actually disputed and substantial, which a federal forum may entertain without disturbing any congressionally approved balance of federal and state judicial responsibilities”? * * *. * * *

III

Applying Grable’s inquiry here, it is clear that Minton’s legal malpractice claim does not arise under federal patent law. Indeed, for the reasons we discuss, we are comfortable concluding that state legal malpractice claims based on underlying patent matters will rarely, if ever, arise under federal patent law for purposes of § 1338(a). Although such cases may necessarily raise disputed questions of patent law, those cases are by their nature unlikely to have the sort of significance for the federal system necessary to establish jurisdiction.

A

To begin, we acknowledge that resolution of a federal patent question is “necessary” to Minton’s case. Under Texas law, a plaintiff alleging legal malpractice must establish four elements: (1) that the defendant attorney owed the plaintiff a duty; (2) that the attorney breached that duty; (3) that the breach was the proximate cause of the plaintiff’s injury; and (4) that damages occurred. * * * In cases like this one, in which the attorney’s alleged error came in failing to make a particular argument, the causation element requires a “case within a case” analysis of whether, had the argument been made, the outcome of the earlier litigation would have been different. * * * To prevail on his legal malpractice claim, therefore, Minton must show that he would have prevailed in his federal patent infringement case if only petitioners had timely made an experimental-use argument on his behalf. * * *

349

B

The federal issue is also “actually disputed” here—indeed, on the merits, it is the central point of dispute. Minton argues that the experimental-use exception properly applied * * *, saving his patent from the on-sale bar; petitioners argue that it did not. This is just the sort of “ ‘dispute . . . respecting the . . . effect of [federal] law’ ” that Grable envisioned. * * *^g

C

Minton’s argument founders on Grable’s next requirement, however, for the federal issue in this case is not substantial in the relevant sense. In reaching the opposite conclusion, the Supreme Court of Texas focused on the importance of the issue to the plaintiff’s case and to the parties before it. * * * As our past cases show, however, it is not enough that the federal issue be significant to the particular parties in the immediate suit; that will always be true when the state claim “necessarily raise[s]” a disputed federal issue, as Grable separately requires. The substantiality inquiry under Grable looks instead to the importance of the issue to the federal system as a whole.

* * *

Here, the federal issue carries no such significance. Because of the backward-looking nature of a legal malpractice claim, the question is posed in a merely hypothetical sense: If Minton’s lawyers had raised a timely experimental-use argument, would the result in the patent infringement proceeding have been different? No matter how the state courts resolve that hypothetical “case within a case,” it will not change the real-world result of the prior federal patent litigation. Minton’s patent will remain invalid.

Nor will allowing state courts to resolve these cases undermine “the development of a uniform body of [patent] law.” * * * Congress ensured such uniformity by vesting exclusive jurisdiction over actual patent cases in the federal district courts and exclusive appellate jurisdiction in the Federal Circuit. * * * In resolving the nonhypothetical patent questions those cases present, the federal courts are of course not bound by state court case-within-a-case patent rulings. * * * In any event, the state court case-within-a-case inquiry asks what would have happened in the prior federal proceeding if a particular argument had been made. In answering that question, state courts can be expected to hew closely to the pertinent federal precedents. * * *

As for more novel questions of patent law that may arise for the first time in a state court “case within a case,” they will at some point be decided by a federal court in the context of an actual patent case, with review in the Federal Circuit. If the question arises frequently, it will soon be resolved within the federal system, laying to rest any contrary state court precedent; if it does not arise frequently, it is unlikely to implicate substantial federal interests. * * *

Minton also suggests that state courts’ answers to hypothetical patent questions can sometimes have real-world effect on other patents through issue preclusion. * * * He argues that, in evaluating this separate application, the patent examiner could be bound by the Texas trial court’s interpretation of the scope of Minton’s original patent. * * * In fact, Minton has not identified any case finding such preclusive effect based on a state court decision. But even assuming that a state court’s case-within-a-case adjudication may be preclusive under some circumstances, the result would be limited to the parties and patents that had been before the state court. Such “fact-bound and situation-specific” effects are not sufficient to establish federal arising under jurisdiction. Empire Healthchoice Assurance, Inc. [p. 351, Note 1, infra] * * *.

Nor can we accept the suggestion that the federal courts’ greater familiarity with patent law means that legal malpractice cases like this one belong in federal court. * * * [T]he possibility that a state court will incorrectly resolve a state claim is not, by itself, enough to trigger the federal courts’ exclusive patent jurisdiction, even if the potential error finds its root in a misunderstanding of patent law.

* * *

D

It follows from the foregoing that Grable’s fourth requirement is also not met. * * * We have already explained the absence of a substantial federal issue within the meaning of Grable. The States, on the other hand, have “a special responsibility for maintaining standards among members of the licensed professions.” * * * We have no reason to suppose that Congress—in establishing exclusive federal jurisdiction over patent cases—meant to bar from state courts state legal malpractice claims simply because they require resolution of a hypothetical patent issue.

* * *

* * * In this case, although the state courts must answer a question of patent law to resolve Minton’s legal malpractice claim, their answer will have no broader effects. It will not stand as binding precedent for any future patent claim; it will not even affect the validity of Minton’s patent. Accordingly, there is no “serious federal interest in claiming the advantages thought to be inherent in a federal forum” * * *. Section 1338(a) does not deprive the state courts of subject matter jurisdiction.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Texas is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In EMPIRE HEALTHCHOICE ASSURANCE, INC. v. McVEIGH, 547 U.S. 677, 126 S.Ct. 2121, 165 L.Ed.2d 131 (2006), relied upon in Gunn v. Minton, the Supreme Court held that a suit by an insurance company to recoup benefits from the insured did not arise under federal law for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 1331. The insured was a federal employee, and the insurance benefits were provided by the plaintiff insurance company under a contract with the federal Office of Personnel Management (“OPM”). The Court acknowledged that the dispute raised “distinctly federal interests”; among other things, plaintiff and OPM engaged in negotiations about the master insurance contract, and any reimbursement received by plaintiff from the insured would be credited to the federal government. However, other features of the dispute cut against federal jurisdiction. First, the federal statute establishing benefit plans for federal employees gave the insurance company a right of action against the United States, but not against the insured; second, the dispute involved only private parties, and not the government; and third, the claim was “fact-bound and situation-specific,” and did not raise a pure question of law the resolution of which would affect “numerous other cases.” Id. at 700–01, 126 S.Ct. at 2137, 165 L.Ed.2d at 150.

Justice Breyer dissented, joined by Justices Kennedy, Souter, and Alito. The dissent emphasized that the insurance company’s claim involved a federal contract governed by federal common law, and “federal common law means federal jurisdiction where Congress so intends.” Id. at 707–08, 126 S.Ct. at 2141, 165 L.Ed.2d at 154–55. Congressional intent could be found because the United States would be credited with any court-ordered award in the lawsuit and so was the real party in interest. The reimbursement provision was a term in a federal contract, and federal common law usually governs the government’s commercial agreements. Moreover, the insurance was provided as part of a federal employment benefit package, underscoring the need for a uniform federal common law rule. (Federal common law is studied in Chapter 6, infra.) The absence of a private right of action, according to the dissent, was beside the point; its omission “may reflect inadvertence. Or it may reflect a belief that § 1331 covered such cases regardless.” Id. at 710, 126 S.Ct. at 2142, 165 L.Ed.2d at 156.

352

2. What is the test for jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 after Grable, Gunn, and Empire Healthchoice? Do these opinions incorporate the tests from Mottley, Shoshone, Smith, Moore, and Merrell Dow, or do they abrogate the earlier decisions? Keep in mind that these cases all address the possibility of Section 1331 jurisdiction over state law causes of action. When a cause of action is provided by federal law and federal law provides the rule of decision, subject-matter jurisdiction clearly exists.

3. It has been argued that it is futile to search for “a single, all-purpose, neutral analytical concept which marks out federal question jurisdiction.” Instead, the goal should be a “pragmatic” test that considers the significance of the state and federal issues, caseload congestion, and comparative judicial expertise. Cohen, The Broken Compass, The Requirement that a Case Arise “Directly” Under Federal Law, 115 U.Pa.L.Rev. 890, 907 (1967). Does the Court’s current multi-factor approach adequately address when a federal forum should be available? Is the test too difficult to administer? Would it be preferable to return to the bright-line rule of the Holmes formula? Compare Ryan, It’s Just Not Worth Searching for Welcome Mats with a Kaleidoscope and a Broken Compass, 7 Tenn.L.Rev. 659 (2008), with Mulligan, You Can’t Go Holmes Again, 107 Nw.U.L.Rev. 237 (2012). What would be the problem in withholding a federal forum from cases like Smith and Grable?

4. In MIMS v. ARROW FINANCIAL SERVICES, LLC, 565 U.S. 368, 132 S.Ct. 740, 181 L.Ed.2d 881 (2012), the Supreme Court resolved that Congress’s grant of jurisdiction to state courts to hear disputes arising under the federal Telephone Consumer Protection Act of 1991, regulating telemarketing, did not oust federal courts of jurisdiction to hear claims under the Act. Rather, the state and federal courts had concurrent jurisdiction. The relevant statutory language provided that a person “may, if otherwise permitted by the laws or rules of [a] court of a State, bring in an appropriate court of that State” an action to redress a violation of rights. 47 U.S.C. § 227(b)(3), (c)(5). Justice Ginsburg, writing for a unanimous Court, held that federal jurisdiction was “not swept away” by the statute: “[W]hen federal law creates a private right of action and furnishes the substantive rules of decision, the claim arises under federal law, and district courts possess federal-question jurisdiction under § 1331.” Id. at 378–79, 132 S.Ct. at 748–49, 181 L.Ed.2d at 894. The Court noted, “Even when a right of action is created by state law, if the claim requires resolution of significant issues of federal law, the case may arise under federal law for 28 U.S.C. § 1331 purposes.” Id. at 379 n.9, 132 S.Ct. at 749 n.9, 181 L.Ed.2d at 894 n.9.

353

D. THE SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS—SUPPLEMENTAL CLAIMS AND PARTIES

Read Article III, § 2 of the United States Constitution and 28 U.S.C. § 1367 in the Supplement.

In some cases, a transaction or series of occurrences will generate a dispute involving multiple legal theories and claims for relief. In that situation, different patterns of party and claim joinder might arise. For example, a plaintiff may wish to assert multiple claims against a single defendant or against multiple defendants; relatedly, multiple plaintiffs may wish to assert multiple claims against a single defendant or multiple defendants. To complicate matters, original jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 might be available over some but not all of the claims and the Strawbridge rule of complete diversity of citizenship under 28 U.S.C. § 1332, see p. 305, supra, might not be met.

Whether claims and parties may be joined in a single lawsuit is a separate question from whether the federal court has subject-matter jurisdiction over the case. (The joinder rules are studied in Chapter 9, infra.) The judicial doctrines of pendent and ancillary jurisdiction developed to deal with the jurisdictional issues posed by these different joinder situations. The term “pendent jurisdiction” was used when plaintiff, in her complaint, appended a claim lacking an independent basis for federal jurisdiction to a claim possessing such a basis. The term “ancillary jurisdiction” was used when either a plaintiff or a defendant injected a claim lacking an independent basis for federal jurisdiction by way of a counterclaim, crossclaim, or third-party complaint.

UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA v. GIBBS

Supreme Court of the United States, 1966.

383 U.S. 715, 86 S.Ct. 1130, 16 L.Ed.2d 218.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

Respondent Paul Gibbs was awarded compensatory and punitive damages in this action against petitioner United Mine Workers of America * * * [“UMW”] for alleged violations of § 303 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, and of the common law of Tennessee. The case grew out of the rivalry between the United Mine Workers and the Southern Labor Union over representation of workers in the southern Appalachian coal fields. Tennessee Consolidated Coal Company, not a party here, laid off 100 miners of the UMW’s Local 5881 when it closed one of its mines in southern Tennessee during the spring of 1960. Late that summer, Grundy Company, a wholly owned subsidiary of Consolidated, hired respondent as mine superintendent to attempt to open a new mine on Consolidated’s property at nearby Gray’s Creek through use of members of the Southern Labor Union. As part of the arrangement, Grundy also gave respondent a contract to haul the mine’s coal to the nearest railroad loading point.

354

On August 15 and 16, 1960, armed members of Local 5881 forcibly prevented the opening of the mine, threatening respondent and beating an organizer for the rival union. The members of the local believed Consolidated had promised them the jobs at the new mine; they insisted that if anyone would do the work, they would. * * * George Gilbert, the UMW’s field representative for the area including Local 5881, * * * [had] explicit instructions from his international union superiors to establish a limited picket line, to prevent any further violence, and to see to it that the strike did not spread to neighboring mines. There was no further violence at the mine site * * *.

Respondent lost his job as superintendent, and never entered into performance of his haulage contract. He testified that he soon began to lose other trucking contracts and mine leases he held in nearby areas. Claiming these effects to be the result of a concerted union plan against him, he sought recovery not against Local 5881 or its members, but only against petitioner, the international union. The suit was brought in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Tennessee, and jurisdiction was premised on allegations of secondary boycotts under § 303. The state law claim, for which jurisdiction was based upon the doctrine of pendent jurisdiction, asserted “an unlawful conspiracy and an unlawful boycott aimed at him and [Grundy] to maliciously, wantonly and willfully interfere with his contract of employment and with his contract of haulage.”

* * * The jury’s verdict was that the UMW had violated both § 303 and state law. Gibbs was awarded $60,000 as damages under the employment contract and $14,500 under the haulage contract; he was also awarded $100,000 punitive damages. On motion, the trial court set aside the award of damages with respect to the haulage contract on the ground that damage was unproved. It also held that union pressure on Grundy to discharge respondent as supervisor would constitute only a primary dispute with Grundy, as respondent’s employer, and hence was not cognizable under § 303. Interference with employment was cognizable as a state claim, however, and a remitted award was sustained on the state law claim. * * * The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed. * * * We granted certiorari. * * *

355

I.

A threshold question is whether the District Court properly entertained jurisdiction of the claim based on Tennessee law. * * *

* * * The Court held in Hurn v. Oursler, 289 U.S. 238, 53 S.Ct. 586, 77 L.Ed. 1148, that state law claims are appropriate for federal court determination if they form a separate but parallel ground for relief also sought in a substantial claim based on federal law. The Court distinguished permissible from non-permissible exercises of federal judicial power over state law claims by contrasting “a case where two distinct grounds in support of a single cause of action are alleged, one only of which presents a federal question, and a case where two separate and distinct causes of action are alleged, one only of which is federal in character. In the former, where the federal question averred is not plainly wanting in substance, the federal court, even though the federal ground be not established, may nevertheless retain and dispose of the case upon the nonfederal ground; in the latter it may not do so upon the nonfederal cause of action.” 289 U.S., at 246, 53 S.Ct., at 589. The question is into which category the present action fell.

Hurn was decided in 1933, before the unification of law and equity by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. At the time, the meaning of “cause of action” was a subject of serious dispute * * *. The Court in Hurn identified what it meant by the term by citation of Baltimore S. S. Co. v. Phillips, 274 U.S. 316, 47 S.Ct. 600, 71 L.Ed. 1069, a case in which “cause of action” had been used to identify the operative scope of the doctrine of res judicata. In that case the Court had noted that “ ‘the whole tendency of our decisions is to require a plaintiff to try his whole cause of action and his whole case at one time,’ ” 274 U.S., at 320, 47 S.Ct., at 602. It stated its holding in the following language, quoted in part in the Hurn opinion:

Upon principle, it is perfectly plain that the respondent [a seaman suing for an injury sustained while working aboard ship] suffered but one actionable wrong, and was entitled to but one recovery, whether his injury was due to one or the other of several distinct acts of alleged negligence, or to a combination of some or all of them. In either view, there would be but a single wrongful invasion of a single primary right of the plaintiff, namely, the right of bodily safety, whether the acts constituting such invasion were one or many, simple or complex.

A cause of action does not consist of facts, but of the unlawful violation of a right which the facts show. The number and variety of the facts alleged do not establish more than one cause of action so long as their result, whether they be considered severally or in combination, is the violation of but one right by a single legal wrong. The mere multiplication of grounds of negligence alleged as causing the same injury does not result in multiplying the causes of action. ‘The facts are merely the means, and not the end. They do not constitute the cause of action, but they show its existence by making the wrong appear,’ Id., at 321, 47 S.Ct., at 602.

356

Had the Court found a jurisdictional bar to reaching the state claim in Hurn, we assume that the doctrine of res judicata would not have been applicable in any subsequent state suit. But the citation of Baltimore S.S. Co. shows that the Court found that the weighty policies of judicial economy and fairness to parties reflected in res judicata doctrine were in themselves strong counsel for the adoption of a rule which would permit federal courts to dispose of the state as well as the federal claims.

With the adoption of the Federal Rules * * * and the unified form of action * * * much of the controversy over “cause of action” abated. The phrase remained as the keystone of the Hurn test, however, and * * * has been the source of considerable confusion. Under the Rules, the impulse is toward entertaining the broadest possible scope of action consistent with fairness to the parties; joinder of claims, parties and remedies are strongly encouraged. Yet because the Hurn question involves issues of jurisdiction as well as convenience, there has been some tendency to limit its application to cases in which the state and federal claims are, as in Hurn, “little more than the equivalent of different epithets to characterize the same group of circumstances.” 289 U.S., at 246, 53 S.Ct. at 590.

This limited approach is unnecessarily grudging. Pendent jurisdiction, in the sense of judicial power, exists whenever there is a claim “arising under [the] Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority * * *,” U.S. Const., Art. III, § 2, and the relationship between that claim and the state claims made in the complaint permits the conclusion that the entire action before the court comprises but one constitutional “case.” The federal claim must have substance sufficient to confer subject matter jurisdiction on the court. * * * The state and federal claims must derive from a common nucleus of operative fact. But if, considered without regard for their federal or state character, a plaintiff’s claims are such that he would ordinarily be expected to try them all in one judicial proceeding, then, assuming substantiality of the federal issues, there is power in federal courts to hear the whole.

That power need not be exercised in every case in which it is found to exist. It has consistently been recognized that pendent jurisdiction is a doctrine of discretion, not of plaintiff’s right. Its justification lies in considerations of judicial economy, convenience and fairness to litigants; if these are not present a federal court should hesitate to exercise jurisdiction over state claims, even though bound to apply state law to them, Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins * * * [p. 445, infra]. Needless decisions of state law should be avoided both as a matter of comity and to promote justice between the parties, by procuring for them a surer-footed reading of applicable law. Certainly, if the federal claims are dismissed before trial, even though not insubstantial in a jurisdictional sense, the state claims should be dismissed as well. Similarly, if it appears that the state issues substantially predominate, whether in terms of proof, of the scope of the issues raised, or of the comprehensiveness of the remedy sought, the state claims may be dismissed without prejudice and left for resolution to state tribunals. There may, on the other hand, be situations in which the state claim is so closely tied to questions of federal policy that the argument for exercise of pendent jurisdiction is particularly strong. In the present case, for example, the allowable scope of the state claim implicates the federal doctrine of pre-emption; while this interrelationship does not create statutory federal question jurisdiction, Louisville & N.R. Co. v. Mottley * * * [p. 331, supra] its existence is relevant to the exercise of discretion. Finally, there may be reasons independent of jurisdictional considerations, such as the likelihood of jury confusion in treating divergent legal theories of relief, that would justify separating state and federal claims for trial, Fed.Rule Civ.Proc. 42(b). If so, jurisdiction should ordinarily be refused.

357

The question of power will ordinarily be resolved on the pleadings. But the issue whether pendent jurisdiction has been properly assumed is one which remains open throughout the litigation. Pretrial procedures or even the trial may reveal a substantial hegemony of state law claims, or likelihood of jury confusion, which could not have been anticipated at the pleading stage. Although it will of course be appropriate to take account in this circumstance of the already completed course of the litigation, dismissal of the state claim might even then be merited. For example, it may appear that the plaintiff was well aware of the nature of his proofs and the relative importance of his claims; recognition of a federal court’s wide latitude to decide ancillary questions of state law does not imply that it must tolerate a litigant’s effort to impose upon it what is in effect only a state law case. Once it appears that a state claim constitutes the real body of a case, to which the federal claim is only an appendage, the state claim may fairly be dismissed.

We are not prepared to say that in the present case the District Court exceeded its discretion in proceeding to judgment on the state claim. * * *

It is true that the § 303 claims ultimately failed and that the only recovery allowed respondent was on the state claim. We cannot confidently say, however, that the federal issues were so remote or played such a minor role at the trial that in effect the state claim only was tried. Although the District Court dismissed as unproved the claims that petitioner’s secondary activities included attempts to induce coal operators other than Grundy to cease doing business with respondent, the court submitted the § 303 claims relating to Grundy to the jury. The jury returned verdicts against petitioner on those § 303 claims, and it was only on petitioner’s motion for a directed verdict and a judgment n.o.v. that the verdicts on those claims were set aside. * * * Although there was some risk of confusing the jury in joining the state and federal claims—especially since, as will be developed, differing standards of proof of UMW involvement applied—the possibility of confusion could be lessened by employing a special verdict form, as the District Court did. * * *

[The Court went on to hold that plaintiff could not recover damages for conspiracy under Tennessee common law on the basis of the record.]

Reversed.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE took no part in the decision of this case.

[A concurring opinion by JUSTICE HARLAN, joined by JUSTICE CLARK, agreed with “Part I of the Court’s opinion relating to pendent jurisdiction.”]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Hurn, discussed in Gibbs, the Supreme Court permitted a district court with original jurisdiction over a federal law claim to exercise pendent jurisdiction over a nondiverse state law claim when the two claims presented a “single cause of action,” but not when they were “separate and distinct causes of action.” How did Gibbs change the test for determining when pendent jurisdiction may be exercised?

2.What is the constitutional and statutory basis for the jurisdiction recognized in Hurn and in Gibbs? Recall that the language of 28 U.S.C. § 1331 is virtually identical to that of Article III. Is the term “civil action” that appears in the statute coextensive with the Constitution’s use of the term “case”?

3.What are the policy justifications for pendent and ancillary jurisdiction? Commentary points to at least two purposes:

First, it ensures that litigants will not be dissuaded from maintaining their federal rights in a federal court solely because they can dispose of all claims by one litigation in the state but not the federal forum. When jurisdiction over the federal claim is exclusive in the federal judiciary, only pendent jurisdiction makes possible a complete remedy for vindication of the plaintiff’s rights. Second, assuming that the litigants are in a federal forum, pendent jurisdiction serves the interest of avoiding piecemeal litigation, thus promoting judicial economy and greater expedition for the litigants.

Note, The Evolution and Scope of the Doctrine of Pendent Jurisdiction in the Federal Courts, 62 Colum.L.Rev. 1018, 1044 (1962). Are you convinced by these arguments? Under what circumstances might the exercise of pendent or ancillary jurisdiction not produce efficiency and convenience?

NOTE ON PENDENT AND ANCILLARY JURISDICTION AFTER GIBBS

In three cases after Gibbs, the Supreme Court considered whether pendent or ancillary jurisdiction could be asserted when the district court had original jurisdiction over a claim and plaintiff sought to join a state law claim against an additional nondiverse defendant.

1.In ALDINGER v. HOWARD, 427 U.S. 1, 96 S.Ct. 2413, 49 L.Ed.2d 276 (1976), a Washington State citizen brought a federal civil rights action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against several state officials; jurisdiction was invoked under 28 U.S.C. § 1343(a)(3). Plaintiff sought to join Spokane County, Washington as an additional defendant, but under the then-prevailing construction of the civil rights statute, counties were not liable under it.¹ Therefore, plaintiff sued the county under state law. Although the new claim shared a “common nucleus of operative fact” with the federal civil rights claim, and so satisfied Gibbs, the Supreme Court held that pendent jurisdiction could not be exercised:

* * * From a purely factual point of view, it is one thing to authorize two parties, already present in federal court by virtue of a case over which the court has jurisdiction, to litigate in addition to their federal claim a state-law claim over which there is no independent basis of federal jurisdiction. But it is quite another thing to permit a plaintiff, who has asserted a claim against one defendant with respect to which there is federal jurisdiction, to join an entirely different defendant on the basis of a state-law claim over which there is no independent basis of federal jurisdiction, simply because his claim against the first defendant and his claim against the second defendant “derive from a common nucleus of operative fact.” * * * True, the same considerations of judicial economy would be served * * *. But the addition of a completely new party would run counter to the well-established principle that federal courts, as opposed to state trial courts of general jurisdiction, are courts of limited jurisdiction marked out by Congress. * * *

There is also a significant legal difference. In * * * Gibbs Congress was silent on the extent to which the defendant, already properly in federal court under a statute, might be called upon to answer nonfederal questions or claims; the way was thus left open for the Court to fashion its own rules under the general language of Art. III. But the extension of Gibbs to this kind of “pendent party” jurisdiction—bringing in an additional defendant at the behest of the plaintiff—presents rather different statutory jurisdictional considerations. Petitioner’s contention that she should be entitled to sue Spokane County as a new third party, and then to try a wholly state-law claim against the county, all of which would be “pendent” to her federal claim against respondent county treasurer, must be decided, not in the context of congressional silence or tacit encouragement, but in quite the opposite context. The question here, which it was not necessary to address in Gibbs * * *, is whether by virtue of the statutory grant of subject-matter jurisdiction, upon which petitioner’s principal claim against the treasurer rests, Congress has addressed itself to the party as to whom jurisdiction pendent to the principal claim is sought. And it undoubtedly has done so.

360

* * *

Resolution of a claim of pendent-party jurisdiction, therefore, calls for careful attention to the relevant statutory language. As we have indicated, we think a fair reading of the language used in [the relevant statutes] * * * requires a holding that the joinder of a municipal corporation, like the county here, for purposes of asserting a state-law claim not within federal diversity jurisdiction, is without the statutory jurisdiction of the district court.

Id. at 14–17, 96 S.Ct. at 2420–22, 49 L.Ed.2d at 286–88. The Court declined to lay down any “sweeping pronouncement upon the existence or exercise of [pendent party] jurisdiction”:

* * * Other statutory grants and other alignments of parties and claims might call for a different result. When the grant of jurisdiction to a federal court is exclusive, for example, as in the prosecution of tort claims against the United States * * *, the argument of judicial economy and convenience can be coupled with the additional argument that only in a federal court may all of the claims be tried together. * * *

Id. at 18, 96 S.Ct. at 2422, 49 L.Ed.2d at 288.

2. In OWEN EQUIPMENT & ERECTION CO. v. KROGER, 437 U.S. 365, 98 S.Ct. 2396, 57 L.Ed.2d 274 (1978), Kroger, a citizen of Iowa, brought a diversity action in Nebraska against Omaha Public Power District (OPPD), a Nebraska corporation, for the wrongful death of her husband, who was electrocuted when the beam of a steel crane, next to which he was walking, came too close to a high-tension electric line. OPPD filed a third-party claim under Federal Rule 14(a) against the owner-operator of the crane, Owen Equipment and Erection Company (Owen), alleging that it was Owen’s negligence that had been the proximate cause of the decedent’s death. At the time, lower federal courts consistently held that an impleader complaint against a third party did not require an independent basis of federal jurisdiction.

Following OPPD’s impleader of Owen, plaintiff was allowed to amend her complaint to name Owen as a defendant, which she alleged was a Nebraska corporation with its principal place of business in Nebraska. OPPD requested, and was granted, summary judgment, leaving Owen as the sole defendant. During the course of the trial, it was discovered that Owen’s principal place of business actually was in Iowa.¹ Owen then moved to dismiss the case for a lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The district court denied the motion and the court of appeals affirmed. The Supreme Court reversed:

361

[The diversity jurisdiction statute] * * * and its predecessors have consistently been held to require complete diversity of citizenship. * * * Over the years Congress has repeatedly re-enacted or amended the statute conferring diversity jurisdiction, leaving intact this rule of complete diversity. Whatever may have been the original purposes of diversity-of-citizenship jurisdiction, this subsequent history clearly demonstrates a congressional mandate that diversity jurisdiction is not to be available when any plaintiff is a citizen of the same State as any defendant. * * *

Thus it is clear that the respondent could not originally have brought suit in federal court naming Owen and OPPD as codefendants, since citizens of Iowa would have been on both sides of the litigation. Yet the identical lawsuit resulted when she amended her complaint. Complete diversity was destroyed just as surely as if she had sued Owen initially. * * *

* * *

It is not unreasonable to assume that, in generally requiring complete diversity, Congress did not intend to confine the jurisdiction of federal courts so inflexibly that they are unable to protect legal rights or effectively to resolve an entire, logically entwined lawsuit. Those practical needs are the basis of the doctrine of ancillary jurisdiction. But neither the convenience of litigants nor considerations of judicial economy can suffice to justify extension of the doctrine of ancillary jurisdiction to a plaintiff’s cause of action against a citizen of the same State in a diversity case. * * * To allow the requirement of complete diversity to be circumvented as it was in this case would simply flout the congressional command.

Id. at 371–74, 377, 98 S.Ct. at 2401–03, 2404, 57 L.Ed.2d at 280–82, 284.

3. In FINLEY v. UNITED STATES, 490 U.S. 545, 109 S.Ct. 2003, 104 L.Ed.2d 593 (1989), plaintiff’s husband and two of her children were killed when their plane struck electric power lines on its approach to a city-run airfield in San Diego, California. Plaintiff alleged that the Federal Aviation Administration had been negligent in its operation and maintenance of the runway lights and in its performance of air traffic control functions, and invoked jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1346(b). Later, plaintiff was allowed to amend her complaint to include state tort claims against the city of San Diego and the utility company that maintained the power lines. The court of appeals reversed the district court’s decision to allow the amendment, and the Supreme Court affirmed:

* * * It remains rudimentary law that “[a]s regards all courts of the United States inferior to this tribunal, two things are necessary to create jurisdiction, whether original or appellate. The Constitution must have given to the court the capacity to take it, and an act of Congress must have supplied it To the extent that such action is not taken, the power lies dormant.” The Mayor v. Cooper, 6 Wall. 247, 252, 18 L.Ed. 851 (1868) (emphasis added) * * *.ⁱ

Despite this principle, in a line of cases by now no less well established we have held, without specific examination of jurisdictional statutes, that federal courts have “pendent” claim jurisdiction * * * to the full extent permitted by the Constitution. * * *

Analytically, petitioner’s case is fundamentally different from Gibbs in that it brings into question what has become known as pendent-party jurisdiction, that is, jurisdiction over parties not named in any claim that is independently cognizable by the federal court. We may assume, without deciding, that the constitutional criterion for pendent-party jurisdiction is analogous to the constitutional criterion for pendent-claim jurisdiction, and that petitioner’s state-law claims pass that test. Our cases show, however, that with respect to the addition of parties, as opposed to the addition of only claims, we will not assume that the full constitutional power has been congressionally authorized, and will not read jurisdictional statutes broadly. * * *

* * *

* * * [28 U.S.C. § 1346(b)] confers jurisdiction over “civil actions on claims against the United States.” It does not say “civil actions on claims that include requested relief against the United States,” nor “civil actions in which there is a claim against the United States”—formulations one might expect if the presence of a claim against the United States constituted merely a minimum jurisdiction requirement, rather than a definition of the permissible scope of FTCA actions. Just as the statutory provision “between . . . citizens of different States” has been held to mean citizens of different States and no one else, * * * so also here we conclude that “against the United States” means against the United States and no one else. * * *

* * *

* * * The Gibbs line of cases was a departure from prior practice, and a departure that we have no intent to limit or impair. But Aldinger indicated that the Gibbs approach would not be extended to the pendent-party field, and we decide today to retain that line. Whatever we say regarding the scope of jurisdiction conferred by a particular statute can of course be changed by Congress. What is of paramount importance is that Congress be able to legislate against a background of clear interpretive rules, so that it may know the effect of the language it adopts. All our cases * * * have held that a grant of jurisdiction over claims involving particular parties does not itself confer jurisdiction over additional claims by or against different parties. Our decision today reaffirms that interpretive rule; the opposite would sow confusion.

Id. at 547–49, 552, 556, 109 S.Ct. at 2006–07, 2008, 2010, 104 L.Ed.2d at 600–01, 603–04, 606. In dissent, Justice Stevens characterized the Court’s holding as a major departure from precedent:

In Aldinger, we adopted a rule of construction that assumed the existence of pendent jurisdiction unless “Congress in the statutes conferring jurisdiction has . . . expressly or by implication negated its existence” * * *.^k We rejected the assertion of pendent-party jurisdiction there because it arose “not in the context of congressional silence or tacit encouragement, but in quite the opposite context.” * * * If congressional silence were sufficient to defeat pendent jurisdiction, the careful reasoning in our Aldinger opinion was wholly unnecessary, for obviously the civil rights statutes do not affirmatively authorize the joinder of any state-law claims.

* * *

The Court today adopts a sharply different approach. Without even so much as acknowledging our statement in Aldinger that before a federal court may exercise pendent-party jurisdiction it must satisfy itself that Congress “has not expressly or by implication negated its existence,” * * * it now instructs that “a grant of jurisdiction over claims involving particular parties does not itself confer jurisdiction over additional claims by or against different parties.” * * *

Id. at 573, 574–75, 109 S.Ct. at 2020, 2021, 104 L.Ed.2d at 617, 618 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

Although the doctrines of pendent and ancillary jurisdiction were spawned from two separate lines of authorities, they became two species of the same general phenomenon. In 1990, Congress—abrogating Finley— undertook to codify these doctrines in 28 U.S.C. § 1367 and gave them the collective name of “supplemental jurisdiction.”

1. 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a) uses the words “so related” for determining when two claims “form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution.” Are two claims “so related” only if they derive from a “common nucleus of operative fact”? Is it significant that § 1367(a) does not incorporate this language from Gibbs? See Matasar, Rediscovering “One Constitutional Case”: Procedural Rules and the Rejection of the Gibbs Test for Supplemental Jurisdiction, 71 Calif.L.Rev. 1399, 1463 (1983) (arguing that Article III permits jurisdiction for some claims that “do not meet the Gibbs fact relationship requirements”).
2. Before the enactment of 28 U.S.C. § 1367, a permissive counterclaim joined under Federal Rule 13(b) was assumed to require an independent basis of federal jurisdiction, although not all judges agreed. See p. 728, infra (Friendly, J., concurring). After the enactment of Section 1367, some courts held that Congress had codified the conventional view. See Iglesias v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, 156 F.3d 237, 241 (1st Cir. 1998). However, in JONES v. FORD MOTOR CREDIT CO., 358 F.3d 205, 209, 213–14 (2d Cir. 2004), the Second Circuit held that the statute “displaced, rather than codified” the traditional rule with respect to permissive counterclaims, finding that supplemental jurisdiction may be exercised whenever there exists a “logical relationship between the counterclaim and the main claim.” See also Global Naps, Inc. v. Verizon New England Inc., 603 F.3d 71, 76 (1st Cir. 2010) (“§ 1367 supersedes case law on supplemental jurisdiction that had distinguished between compulsory and permissive counterclaims”). Under the Jones approach, is the availability of supplemental jurisdiction broader than the Gibbs transaction-or-occurrence test? See Fletcher, “Common Nucleus of Operative Fact” and Defensive Set-Off: Beyond the Gibbs Test, 74 Ind.L.J. 171 (1998).
3. The legislative history to 28 U.S.C. § 1367(b) indicates the intent to prohibit supplemental jurisdiction when its exercise would circumvent traditional limitations on the grant of diversity jurisdiction. The Strawbridge rule of complete diversity is one judge-made limit. Explain whether supplemental jurisdiction is available in these situations:
- (a) P, a citizen of Virginia, sues D, a citizen of Texas. D moves under Federal Rule 14 to implead TP, a citizen of Texas.
 - (b) P, a citizen of Virginia, sues D, a citizen of Texas. D moves under Federal Rule 14 to implead TP, a citizen of Virginia.
 - (c) Assuming the facts of (b), P moves to amend her complaint to allege a state law claim against TP.
- See Oakley, Kroger Redux, 51 Duke L.J. 663 (2001).

365

4. Multiple plaintiffs suing one defendant are permitted to aggregate their claims to meet the amount-in-controversy requirement of diversity jurisdiction only if their claims are common and indivisible. See p. 322, Note 4, supra. Prior to the enactment of 28 U.S.C. § 1367, this rule prevented a party (who met the citizenship requirement) from joining a lawsuit as a plaintiff under Federal Rule 20 when its claim did not exceed $75,000 and was separate and distinct from the claim of a diverse plaintiff whose claim did meet the dollar requirement. See CLARK v. PAUL GRAY, INC., 306 U.S. 583, 59 S.Ct. 744, 83 L.Ed. 1001 (1939). A similar rule applied to class actions under Rule 23; the named representative plaintiff and each and every unnamed class member were required to meet the amount-in-controversy requirement. See ZAHN v. INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO., 414 U.S. 291, 94 S.Ct. 505, 38 L.Ed.2d 511 (1973).
- The enactment of 28 U.S.C. § 1367 presented two distinct but related problems. The first was whether Section 1367(a), in its reference to “any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction,” incorporated the judge-made rules of Strawbridge and aggregation. The second problem concerned which parties and claims were excluded from § 1367(b)’s presumption of supplemental jurisdiction. The statute excludes “claims by plaintiffs against persons made parties under Rule 14, 19, 20, or 24,” but does not mention claims by plaintiffs made parties under Rule 20 or 23. Did that omission mean Congress intended to overrule both the Clark and the Zahn restrictions? See Pfander, Supplemental Jurisdiction and Section 1367: The Case for Sympathetic Textualism, 148 U.Pa.L.Rev. 109 (1999). The Court addressed this set of questions in the principal case that follows.

EXXON MOBIL CORP. v. ALLAPATTAH SERVICES, INC.

Supreme Court of the United States, 2005.
545 U.S. 546, 125 S.Ct. 2611, 162 L.Ed.2d 502.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit and for the Eleventh Circuit.

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

These consolidated cases present the question whether a federal court in a diversity action may exercise supplemental jurisdiction over additional plaintiffs whose claims do not satisfy the minimum amount-in-controversy requirement, provided the claims are part of the same case or controversy as the claims of plaintiffs who do allege a sufficient amount in controversy. Our decision turns on the correct interpretation of 28 U.S.C. § 1367. The question has divided the Courts of Appeals, and we granted certiorari to resolve the conflict. * * *

We hold that, where the other elements of jurisdiction are present and at least one named plaintiff in the action satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement, § 1367 does authorize supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of other plaintiffs in the same Article III case or controversy, even if those claims are for less than the jurisdictional amount specified in the statute setting forth the requirements for diversity jurisdiction. * * *

In 1991, about 10,000 Exxon dealers filed a class-action suit against the Exxon Corporation in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida. The dealers alleged an intentional and systematic scheme by Exxon under which they were overcharged for fuel purchased from Exxon. The plaintiffs invoked the District Court’s § 1332(a) diversity jurisdiction. After a unanimous jury verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, the District Court certified the case for interlocutory review, asking whether it had properly exercised § 1367 supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of class members who did not meet the jurisdictional minimum amount in controversy.

The Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit upheld the District Court’s extension of supplemental jurisdiction to these class members. Allapattah Services, Inc. v. Exxon Corp., 333 F.3d 1248 (2003). “[W]e find,” the court held, “that § 1367 clearly and unambiguously provides district courts with the authority in diversity class actions to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of class members who do not meet the minimum amount in controversy as long as the district court has original jurisdiction over the claims of at least one of the class representatives.” Id., at 1256. * * *

In [Ortega v. Star-Kist Foods, Inc., 370 F.3d 124 (1st Cir. 2004),] the other case now before us the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit took a different position on the meaning of § 1367(a). * * * In that case, a 9-year-old girl sued Star-Kist in a diversity action in the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, seeking damages for unusually severe injuries she received when she sliced her finger on a tuna can. Her family joined in the suit [under Federal Rule 20], seeking damages for emotional distress and certain medical expenses. The District Court granted summary judgment to Star-Kist, finding that none of the plaintiffs met the minimum amount-in-controversy requirement. The Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, however, ruled that the injured girl, but not her family members, had made allegations of damages in the requisite amount.

* * *

As the jurisdictional statutes existed in 1989 [when Finley, Note 3, p. 361, supra, was decided] * * * here is how matters stood: First, the diversity requirement in § 1332(a) required complete diversity; absent complete diversity, the district court lacked original jurisdiction over all of the claims in the action. * * * Second, if the district court had original jurisdiction over at least one claim, the jurisdictional statutes implicitly authorized supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims between the same parties arising out of the same Article III case or controversy * * *. Third, even when the district court had original jurisdiction over one or more claims between particular parties, the jurisdictional statutes did not authorize supplemental jurisdiction over additional claims involving other parties. * * *

All parties to this litigation and all courts to consider the question agree that § 1367 overturned the result in Finley. There is no warrant, however, for assuming that § 1367 did no more than to overrule Finley and otherwise to codify the existing state of the law of supplemental jurisdiction. We must not give jurisdictional statutes a more expansive interpretation than the text warrants * * *; but it is just as important not to adopt an artificial construction that is narrower than what the text provides. No sound canon of interpretation requires Congress to speak with extraordinary clarity in order to modify the rules of federal jurisdiction within appropriate constitutional bounds. Ordinary principles of statutory construction apply. In order to determine the scope of supplemental jurisdiction authorized by § 1367, then, we must examine the statute’s text in light of context, structure, and related statutory provisions.

Section 1367(a) is a broad grant of supplemental jurisdiction over other claims within the same case or controversy, as long as the action is one in which the district courts would have original jurisdiction. The last sentence of § 1367(a) makes it clear that the grant of supplemental jurisdiction extends to claims involving joinder or intervention of additional parties. The single question before us, therefore, is whether a diversity case in which the claims of some plaintiffs satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement, but the claims of other plaintiffs do not, presents a “civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction.” If the answer is yes, § 1367(a) confers supplemental jurisdiction over all claims, including those that do not independently satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement, if the claims are part of the same Article III case or controversy. If the answer is no, § 1367(a) is inapplicable and * * * the district court has no statutory basis for exercising supplemental jurisdiction over the additional claims.

We now conclude the answer must be yes. When the well-pleaded complaint contains at least one claim that satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement, and there are no other relevant jurisdictional defects, the district court, beyond all question, has original jurisdiction over that claim. The presence of other claims in the complaint, over which the district court may lack original jurisdiction, is of no moment. If the court has original jurisdiction over a single claim in the complaint, it has original jurisdiction over a “civil action” within the meaning of § 1367(a), even if the civil action over which it has jurisdiction comprises fewer claims than were included in the complaint. Once the court determines it has original jurisdiction over the civil action, it can turn to the question whether it has a constitutional and statutory basis for exercising supplemental jurisdiction over the other claims in the action.

* * *

* * * Nothing in § 1367 indicates a congressional intent to recognize, preserve, or create some meaningful substantive distinction between the jurisdictional categories we have historically labeled pendent and ancillary.

If § 1367(a) were the sum total of the relevant statutory language, our holding would rest on that language alone. The statute, of course, instructs us to examine § 1367(b) to determine if any of its exceptions apply, so we proceed to that section. While § 1367(b) qualifies the broad rule of § 1367(a), it does not withdraw supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of the additional parties at issue here. The specific exceptions * * *, moreover, provide additional support for our conclusion that 1367(a) confers supplemental jurisdiction over these claims. * * * Nothing in the text of § 1367(b) * * * withholds supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of plaintiffs permissively joined under Rule 20 * * * or certified as class-action members pursuant to Rule 23 * * *. The natural, indeed the necessary, inference is that § 1367 confers supplemental jurisdiction over claims by Rule 20 and Rule 23 plaintiffs. This inference, at least with respect to Rule 20 plaintiffs, is strengthened by the fact that § 1367(b) explicitly excludes supplemental jurisdiction over claims against defendants joined under Rule 20.

We cannot accept the view * * * that a district court lacks original jurisdiction over a civil action unless the court has original jurisdiction over every claim in the complaint. As we understand this position, it requires assuming either that all claims in the complaint must stand or fall as a single, indivisible “civil action” as a matter of definitional necessity—what we will refer to as the “indivisibility theory”—or else that the inclusion of a claim or party falling outside the district court’s original jurisdiction somehow contaminates every other claim in the complaint, depriving the court of original jurisdiction over any of these claims—what we will refer to as the “contamination theory.”

The indivisibility theory is easily dismissed, as it is inconsistent with the whole notion of supplemental jurisdiction. If a district court must have original jurisdiction over every claim in the complaint in order to have “original jurisdiction” over a “civil action,” then in Gibbs there was no civil action of which the district court could assume original jurisdiction under § 1331, and so no basis for exercising supplemental jurisdiction over any of the claims. The indivisibility theory is further belied by our practice—in both federal-question and diversity cases—of allowing federal courts to cure jurisdictional defects by dismissing the offending parties rather than dismissing the entire action. * * * If the presence of jurisdictionally problematic claims in the complaint meant the district court was without original jurisdiction over the single, indivisible civil action before it, then the district court would have to dismiss the whole action rather than particular parties.

369

* * *

The contamination theory * * * can make some sense in the special context of the complete diversity requirement because the presence of nondiverse parties on both sides of a lawsuit eliminates the justification for providing a federal forum. The theory, however, makes little sense with respect to the amount-in-controversy requirement, which is meant to ensure that a dispute is sufficiently important to warrant federal-court attention. The presence of a single nondiverse party may eliminate the fear of bias with respect to all claims, but the presence of a claim that falls short of the minimum amount in controversy does nothing to reduce the importance of the claims that do meet this requirement.

It is fallacious to suppose, simply from the proposition that § 1332 imposes both the diversity requirement and the amount-in-controversy requirement, that the contamination theory germane to the former is also relevant to the latter. There is no inherent logical connection between the amount-in-controversy requirement and § 1332 diversity jurisdiction. After all, federal-question jurisdiction once had an amount-in-controversy requirement as well. If such a requirement were revived under § 1331, it is clear beyond peradventure that § 1367(a) provides supplemental jurisdiction over federal-question cases where some, but not all, of the federal-law claims involve a sufficient amount in controversy. * * *

We also reject the argument * * * that while the presence of additional claims over which the district court lacks jurisdiction does not mean the civil action is outside the purview of § 1367(a), the presence of additional parties does. * * * Section 1367(a) applies by its terms to any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction, and the last sentence of § 1367(a) expressly contemplates that the court may have supplemental jurisdiction over additional parties. So it cannot be the case that the presence of those parties destroys the court’s original jurisdiction, within the meaning of § 1367(a), over a civil action otherwise properly before it. Also, § 1367(b) expressly withholds supplemental jurisdiction in diversity cases over claims by plaintiffs joined * * * under Rule 19. If joinder of such parties were sufficient to deprive the district court of original jurisdiction over the civil action within the meaning of § 1367(a), this specific limitation on supplemental jurisdiction in § 1367(b) would be superfluous. The argument that the presence of additional parties removes the civil action from the scope of § 1367(a) also would mean that § 1367 left the Finley result undisturbed. * * * Yet all concede that one purpose of § 1367 was to change the result reached in Finley.

370

Finally, it is suggested that our interpretation of § 1367(a) creates an anomaly regarding the exceptions listed in § 1367(b): It is not immediately obvious why Congress would withhold supplemental jurisdiction over plaintiffs joined as parties “needed for just adjudication” under Rule 19 but would allow supplemental jurisdiction over plaintiffs permissively joined under Rule 20.¹ The omission of Rule 20 plaintiffs from the list of exceptions in § 1367(b) may have been * * * [unintentional]. If that is the case, it is up to Congress rather than the courts to fix it. An alternative explanation for the different treatment of Rules 19 and 20 is that Congress was concerned that extending supplemental jurisdiction to Rule 19 plaintiffs would allow circumvention of the complete diversity rule: A nondiverse plaintiff might be omitted intentionally from the original action, but joined later under Rule 19 * * *. * * * The contamination theory described above, if applicable, means this ruse would fail, but Congress may have wanted to make assurance double sure. More generally,

Congress may have concluded that federal jurisdiction is only appropriate if the district court would have original jurisdiction over the claims of all those plaintiffs who are so essential to the action that they could be joined under Rule 19.

To the extent that the omission of Rule 20 plaintiffs from the list of § 1367(b) exceptions is anomalous, moreover, it is no more anomalous than the inclusion of Rule 19 plaintiffs in that list would be if the alternative view of § 1367(a) were to prevail. If the district court lacks original jurisdiction over a civil diversity action where any plaintiff’s claims fail to comply with all the requirements of § 1332, there is no need for a special § 1367(b) exception for Rule 19 plaintiffs who do not meet these requirements. Though the omission of Rule 20 plaintiffs from § 1367(b) presents something of a puzzle on our view of the statute, the inclusion of Rule 19 plaintiffs in this section is at least as difficult to explain under the alternative view.

And so we circle back to the original question. When the well-pleaded complaint in district court includes multiple claims, all part of the same case or controversy, and some, but not all, of the claims are within the court’s original jurisdiction, does the court have before it “any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction”? It does. Under § 1367, the court has original jurisdiction over the civil action comprising the claims for which there is no jurisdictional defect. * * * Though the special nature and purpose of the diversity requirement mean that a single nondiverse party can contaminate every other claim in the lawsuit, the contamination does not occur with respect to jurisdictional defects that go only to the substantive importance of individual claims [under the amount-in-controversy requirement].

* * *

The proponents of the alternative view of § 1367 insist that the statute is at least ambiguous and that we should look to other interpretive tools, including the legislative history * * *. We can reject this argument at the very outset simply because § 1367 is not ambiguous. * * * [I]nterpreting § 1367 to foreclose supplemental jurisdiction over plaintiffs in diversity cases who do not meet the minimum amount in controversy is inconsistent with the text * * *.

* * *

[The Court’s discussion of why the Class Action Fairness Act “has no bearing” on the analysis is omitted.]

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE BREYER joins, dissenting.

* * *

The legislative history of 28 U.S.C. § 1367 provides powerful confirmation of Justice GINSBURG’s interpretation of that statute. * * *

Not only does the House Report specifically say that § 1367 was not intended to upset Zahn * * *, but its entire explanation of the statute demonstrates that Congress had in mind a very specific and relatively modest task—undoing this Court’s 5-to-4 decision in Finley * * *.

* * *

The Court’s reasons for ignoring * * * congressional intent are unpersuasive. * * * What is determinative is that the House Report explicitly rejected that broad reading of the statutory text. Such a report has special significance as an indicator of legislative intent. In Congress, committee reports are normally considered the authoritative explication of a statute’s text and purposes, and busy legislators and their assistants rely on that explication in casting their votes. * * *

JUSTICE GINSBURG, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS, JUSTICE O’CONNOR, and JUSTICE BREYER join, dissenting.

These cases present the question whether Congress, by enacting 28 U.S.C. § 1367, overruled * * * Clark * * * and Zahn * * *. Clark held that, when federal-court jurisdiction is predicated on a specified amount in controversy, each plaintiff joined in the litigation must independently meet the jurisdictional amount requirement. Zahn confirmed that in class actions governed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(b)(3), “[e]ach [class member] . . . must satisfy the jurisdictional amount, and any [class member] who does not must be dismissed from the case.” * * * m

* * *

The Court adopts a plausibly broad reading of § 1367, a measure that is hardly a model of the careful drafter’s art. There is another plausible reading, however, one less disruptive of our jurisprudence regarding supplemental jurisdiction. * * * For the reasons that follow, I conclude that this narrower construction is the better reading of § 1367.

* * *

The rule that each plaintiff must independently satisfy the amount-in-controversy requirement, unless Congress expressly orders otherwise, was * * * the solidly established reading of § 1332 when Congress enacted the Judicial Improvements Act of 1990, which added § 1367 to Title 28.

* * *

* * * The Court should assume, as it ordinarily does, that Congress legislated against a background of law already in place and the historical development of that law. * * * Here, that background is the statutory grant of diversity jurisdiction, the amount-in-controversy condition that Congress, from the start, has tied to the grant, and the nonaggregation rule this Court has long applied to the determination of the “matter in controversy.”

* * *

* * * Under the majority’s reading, § 1367(a) permits the joinder of related claims cut loose from the nonaggregation rule that has long attended actions under § 1332. Only the claims specified in § 1367(b) * * * would be excluded from § 1367(a)’s expansion of § 1332’s grant of diversity jurisdiction. And because § 1367(b) contains no exception for joinder of plaintiffs under Rule 20 or class actions under Rule 23, * * * Clark and Zahn have been overruled. * * *

* * * But § 1367(a)’s text * * * can be read another way, one that would involve no rejection of Clark and Zahn. * * * § 1367(a) addresses “civil action[s] of which the district courts have original jurisdiction,” a formulation that, in diversity cases, is sensibly read to incorporate the rules on joinder and aggregation tightly tied to § 1332 at the time of § 1367’s enactment. On this reading, a complaint must first meet that “original jurisdiction” measurement. If it does not, no supplemental jurisdiction is authorized. If it does, § 1367(a) authorizes “supplemental jurisdiction” over related claims. In other words, § 1367(a) would preserve undiminished, as part and parcel of § 1332

373

“original jurisdiction” determinations, both the “complete diversity” rule and the decisions restricting aggregation to arrive at the amount in controversy. * * *

The less disruptive view I take of § 1367 also accounts for the omission of Rule 20 plaintiffs and Rule 23 class actions in § 1367(b)’s text. If one reads § 1367(a) as a plenary grant of supplemental jurisdiction to federal courts sitting in diversity, one would indeed look for exceptions in § 1367(b). Finding none for permissive joinder of parties or class actions, one would conclude that Congress effectively, even if unintentionally, overruled Clark and Zahn. But if one recognizes that the nonaggregation rule delineated in Clark and Zahn forms part of the determination whether “original jurisdiction” exists in a diversity case, * * * then plaintiffs who do not meet the amount-in-controversy requirement would fail at the § 1367(a) threshold. Congress would have no reason to resort to a § 1367(b) exception to turn such plaintiffs away from federal court, given that their claims, from the start, would fall outside the court’s § 1332 jurisdiction. * * *

What is the utility of § 1367(b) under my reading of § 1367(a)? * * * § 1367(b) stops plaintiffs from circumventing § 1332’s jurisdictional requirements by using another’s claim as a hook to add a claim that the plaintiff could not have brought in the first instance. Kroger is the paradigm case. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. According to the majority, when does “original jurisdiction” exist in a case invoking diversity jurisdiction for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a)? Do you agree that the presence of a single nondiverse party “contaminates” diversity jurisdiction, such that the court lacks original jurisdiction and thereby defeats supplemental jurisdiction? Why isn’t original jurisdiction destroyed by the presence of claims that do not meet the amount-in-controversy requirement?

2. Test your understanding of the principal case by answering the following problems:
- (a) A and B sue C for breach of contract. A and C are citizens of New York; B is a citizen of New Jersey. A seeks $100,000 damages and B seeks $50,000 damages. If the action is brought in federal court, can plaintiffs invoke either diversity or supplemental jurisdiction? Does your answer change if C is a citizen of Delaware?
 - (b) Assume the same facts as in (a), but A seeks $50,000 damages and B seeks $50,000.
 - (c) Assume that A, a citizen of New York, files a products liability class action against defendant company, which is incorporated and has its principal place of business in New Mexico. A alleges damages of $60,000. If the suit is filed in federal court, can A invoke diversity jurisdiction? Under what circumstance could A invoke supplemental jurisdiction?

374

EXECUTIVE SOFTWARE NORTH AMERICA, INC. v. UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE CENTRAL DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 1994.
24 F.3d 1545, overruled on other grounds. ¹¹

Executive Software North America, Inc., Craig Jensen, and Sally Jensen (“Petitioners”) petition this court for a writ of mandamus to compel the United States District Court for the Central District of California to retain jurisdiction over certain pendent state law claims filed in an employment discrimination suit against them by the plaintiff-real-party-in-interest, Donna Page. * * * For the reasons stated below, we grant the writ, but on narrower grounds than urged by the parties.

* * *

In her complaint, Page alleged two federal causes of action, (1) a claim under Title VII, 42 U.S.C. § 2000(e) et seq. (1988), and (2) a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (1988), as well as three state-law causes of action, including (1) a claim for unlawful religious and racial discrimination under the California Fair Employment and Housing Act (“FEHA”), * * * (2) a claim of wrongful termination in violation of the California Constitution, Art. I § 7(a), and (3) a claim for negligent supervision.

Based on the two federal claims, the defendants removed the action to federal court. Subsequently, on May 20, 1993, the district court issued an order sua sponte to show cause why the three state-law claims should not be remanded to state court. * * * After noting the requirements set forth in Gibbs [p. 353, supra] for exercising supplemental jurisdiction, the Court added:

Even if [the Gibbs test is] met, however, a federal court has discretion to decline jurisdiction over state law claims if, for instance, the state claims substantially predominate, the state claims involve novel or complex issues of state law, trial of the state and federal claims together is likely to result in jury confusion, or retention of the state claims requires the expenditure of substantial additional judicial time and effort. * * *

375

The Removing Party(ies)⁹ should also be aware that this Court does not interpret the 1990 enactment of Section 1367 as restricting the discretionary factors set forth in Gibbs. Rather, this Court interprets Section 1367 as merely allowing this Court, at its discretion, to exercise jurisdiction over supplemental parties, which was previously foreclosed by Finley * * *.

The district court thereafter remanded the three state law claims, but provided no reasons.

* * *

A. Did the District Court Commit Clear Error?

The district court provided no reasons for its remand. However, in its Show Cause Order, the court stated that it did not “interpret Section 1367 as restricting the discretionary factors set forth in Gibbs. * * *

We find this interpretation of section 1367 erroneous. It is clear that, once it is determined that the assertion of supplemental jurisdiction is permissible under sections 1367(a) and (b), section 1367(c) provides the only valid basis upon which the district court may decline jurisdiction and remand pendent claims. Moreover, we conclude that although subsections (c)(1)–(3) appear to codify most preexisting applications of the Gibbs doctrine, subsection (c)(4), which also permits a court to decline jurisdiction when, “in exceptional circumstances, there are other compelling reasons,” channels the district court’s discretion to identify new grounds for declining jurisdiction more particularly than did preexisting doctrine. Accordingly, we conclude the district court erred to the extent that it relied on a basis for remanding pendent claims not permitted under section 1367(c). Finally, we conclude that, because the district court failed to articulate reasons for its remand of the pendent claims, we cannot determine whether the district court relied on a statutory ground and exercised its discretion in a permissible manner. Consequently, we conclude that the district court clearly erred.

* * *

2. The Relationship of Section 1367(c) to Gibbs

* * *

* * * Congress, in codifying supplemental jurisdiction, has chosen to codify as well the discretionary factors that warrant declining jurisdiction. * * * By use of the word “shall,” the statute makes clear that if power is conferred under section 1367(a), and its exercise is not prohibited by section 1367(b), a court can decline to assert supplemental jurisdiction over a pendent claim only if one of the four categories specifically enumerated in section 1367(c) applies. * * *

376

By selecting this statutory structure, it is clear that Congress intended section 1367(c) to provide the exclusive means by which supplemental jurisdiction can be declined by a court. Not only is this conclusion supported by the legislative history, * * * but a contrary reading of the statute would appear to render section 1367(c) superfluous. Accordingly, unless a court properly invokes a section 1367(c) category in exercising its discretion to decline to entertain pendent claims, supplemental jurisdiction must be asserted. * * *

A consequence of the statutory structure chosen by Congress is that section 1367(c) somewhat changes the nature of the Gibbs discretionary inquiry. Although * * * Gibbs and its progeny identified a number of concrete instances in which declining pendent jurisdiction normally would be appropriate, the ultimate inquiry for the courts remained whether the assertion of pendent jurisdiction “best accommodate[s] the values of economy convenience, fairness and comity.” * * * Application of these underlying values to circumstances not identified in prior cases was not only contemplated, but demanded. * * *

The statute, however, channels the application of the underlying values to a greater degree than the Gibbs regime, although section 1367(c) continues to recognize the doctrine’s dynamic aspects. Subsections (c)(1)–(c)(3) appear to codify concrete applications of the underlying Gibbs values recognized in preexisting case law. * * *

By codifying preexisting applications of Gibbs in subsections (c)(1)–(3), however, it is clear that Congress intended the exercise of discretion to be triggered by the court’s identification of a factual predicate that corresponds to one of the section 1367(c) categories. Once that factual predicate is identified, the exercise of discretion, of course, still is informed by whether remanding the pendent state claims comports with the underlying objective of “most sensibly accommodat[ing]” the values of “economy, convenience, fairness, and comity.” * * *

We believe that the “catchall” * * * provided by subsection (c)(4) should be interpreted in a similar manner. Subsection (c)(4) permits a discretionary remand of pendent claims when “in exceptional circumstances, there are other compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction.” * * * Congress’s use of the word “other” to modify “compelling reasons” indicates that what ought to qualify as “compelling reasons” for declining jurisdiction under subsection (c)(4) should be of the same nature as the reasons that gave rise to the categories listed in subsections (c)(1)–(3). * * *

* * * By providing that an exercise of discretion under subsection 1367(c)(4) ought to be made only in “exceptional circumstances” Congress has sounded a note of caution that the bases for declining jurisdiction should be extended beyond the circumstances identified in subsections (c)(1)–(3) only if the circumstances are quite unusual. In short, although we find that “other compelling reasons” clearly refers the district court back to the subsection (c)(1)–(3) categories, and thus requires the court to balance the underlying values that they embody, we think “exceptional circumstances” requires an additional inquiry.

Of course, when the balance of the Gibbs values indicates that there are “compelling reasons” to decline jurisdiction, the underlying circumstances that inform this calculus usually will demonstrate how the circumstances confronted are “exceptional.” We do not believe, however, this always will be the case. Even when a court’s balancing of the Gibbs values provides, in its judgment, “compelling reasons” for declining jurisdiction, it might still be the case that the differences between the case it is confronting and the case in which supplemental jurisdiction is appropriate are not sufficient to justify the conclusion that the court would, in fact, be applying subsection (c)(4) properly. We think that it clear from the language chosen by Congress, however, that declining jurisdiction outside of subsection (c)(1)–(3) should be the exception, rather than the rule. Courts therefore must ensure that the reasons identified as “compelling” are not deployed in circumstances that threaten this principle. The inquiry is not particularly burdensome. A court simply must articulate why the circumstances of the case are exceptional in addition to inquiring whether the balance of the Gibbs values provide compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction in such circumstances.

We think this interpretation is compelled not only by our understanding of the meaning of the term “other” in subsection (c)(4) and a common-sense understanding of “exceptional,” but also by the statutory structure of section 1367(c). * * * Our interpretation of subsection (c)(4) carries forward this structure into that subsection: the court must identify the predicate that triggers the applicability of the category (the exceptional circumstances), and then determine whether, in its judgment, the underlying Gibbs values are best served by declining jurisdiction in the particular case (the compelling reasons).

* * *

With the above analysis providing the necessary conceptual foundation, we conclude that the district court clearly erred. The court, although acknowledging section 1367(c), stated that it did not rely on the statute, but Gibbs. Although this might be insignificant if the Show Cause Order indicated that the court considered only the codified applications of Gibbs enumerated therein, the court further intimated that Gibbs permitted it to decline jurisdiction when “retention of the state claims [would] require[] the expenditure of substantial judicial time and effort.”

If this statement was intended to go beyond preexisting applications of Gibbs by invoking its underlying values, it was an impermissible attempt. More fundamentally, as discussed above, subsection (c)(4) requires the district court not only to determine if consideration of the Gibbs values provides compelling reasons for a remand, but also to articulate how the circumstances that warrant declining jurisdiction are exceptional. * * *

LEAVY, CIRCUIT JUDGE, dissenting:

* * *

The district court committed no error unless it relied on an unauthorized ground in exercising its discretion to remand. The court did not say that it relied on an unauthorized ground nor does the record tell us that it did, unless the majority means to hold that likely jury confusion or the expenditure of substantial additional judicial time are not exceptional circumstances in which compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction can be found. The fact that the district court does not interpret the 1990 enactment of section 1367 as restricting the discretionary factors set forth in Gibbs is of no moment unless we can say that the trial court exceeded its lawful authority wherever it may be found.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Recall that Gibbs stated that pendent jurisdiction “is a doctrine of discretion, not of plaintiff’s right,” p. 356, supra. The Ninth Circuit in the principal case held that 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c) displaced the Gibbs factors, and so narrowed the district court’s discretion to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction. Does the Ninth Circuit’s approach transform supplemental jurisdiction into a matter of plaintiff’s right? See 13D Wright, Miller & Freer, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3567.3 (3d ed.). Would it be equally reasonable to hold that the statute codified the Gibbs factors so that the critical question remains whether the exercise of supplemental jurisdiction promotes convenience, fairness, and judicial economy? Alternatively, could the statute be read as channeling the court’s discretion in light of the policies announced in Gibbs? See Enochs v. Lampasas County, 641 F.3d 155, 159 (5th Cir. 2011) (stating that courts should “look to the statutory factors set forth by 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c), and to the common law factors of judicial economy, convenience, fairness, and comity” and then “consider and balance each of the factors”). The Supreme Court has not yet decided this question.

2. Does a district court have power to retain supplemental jurisdiction even after the federal claims are dismissed? Would it be an abuse of discretion to do so? Consider the following situations:

(a) The federal claims are dismissed after extensive discovery, the discovery record is closed, and the summary judgment record is complete. See Redondo Construction Corp. v. Izquierdo, 662 F.3d 42 (1st Cir. 2011).

379

(b) The federal claims are dismissed by entry of a default judgment. See Trustees of Construction Industry and Laborers Health and Welfare Trust v. Desert Valley Landscape Maint. Inc., 333 F.3d 923 (9th Cir. 2003).

(c) The federal claims are dismissed for failure to state a claim. See Parra v. PacifiCare of Arizona, Inc., 715 F.3d 1146 (9th Cir. 2013).

3. Section 1367(d) includes a tolling provision that enables a party to refile state claims in state court after some claims asserted under Section 1367(a) are dismissed. In JINKS v. RICHLAND COUNTY, S.C., 538 U.S. 456, 123 S.Ct. 1667, 155 L.Ed.2d 631 (2003), the Supreme Court held that the statute’s tolling of the state statute of limitations while the original lawsuit was pending in federal court was not unconstitutional, but rather was necessary and proper for the fair and efficient administration of the federal courts. In ARTIS v. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, 583 U.S. ___, 138 S.Ct. 594, 199 L.Ed.2d 473 (2018), the Court, five-to-four, held that the provision stops the clock on the state statute of limitations, thus suspending the limitations period while the federal action is pending and for 30 days after dismissal. Justice Gorsuch, in a dissenting opinion joined by Justices Kennedy, Thomas, and Alito, interpreted the provision as affording the plaintiff, after a dismissal of the party’s state law claim without a ruling on the merits, “whatever time state law allows, or at least 30 days, to refile the claim in state court.” Id. at ___, 138 S.Ct. at 608, 199 L.Ed.2d at 490.

NOTE ON NONSTATUTORY ANCILLARY JURISDICTION

After the codification of pendent and ancillary jurisdiction in 28 U.S.C. § 1367, do federal courts retain any inherent authority to exercise jurisdiction when it is not conferred by statute? This question was presented in KOKKONEN v. GUARDIAN LIFE INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA, 511 U.S. 375, 114 S.Ct. 1673, 128 L.Ed.2d 391 (1994). The action involved a dispute between an insurer and an insurance agent for breach of an agency agreement. The action was filed in state court and removed to federal court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction. Pursuant to Federal Rule 41(a)(1)(ii), the parties executed a Stipulation and Order of Dismissal, which the district court signed. Later, a dispute arose about the settlement agreement, and the insurer moved to enforce that agreement. The district court entered an enforcement order asserting it had “inherent authority” to do so, rejecting the argument that it lacked subject-matter jurisdiction over the settlement. The court of appeals affirmed, and the Supreme Court reversed and remanded. Significantly, the Supreme Court acknowledged that a residual category of ancillary jurisdiction—“over some matters (otherwise beyond their competence) that are incidental to other matters properly before them”—survives the enactment of 28 U.S.C. § 1367. Generally speaking, the assertion of ancillary jurisdiction is limited to two purposes: “(1) to permit disposition by a single court of claims that are, in varying respects and degrees, factually interdependent”; and “(2) to enable a court to function successfully, that is, to manage its proceedings, vindicate its authority, and effectuate its decrees.” Id. at 380, 114 S.Ct. at 1676, 128 L.Ed.2d at 397. The Court found that neither basis was present in this case. Moreover, although parties are free to agree to the retention of judicial jurisdiction to enforce a settlement agreement, the agreement did not do so:

380

If the parties wish to provide for the court’s enforcement of a dismissal-producing settlement agreement, they can seek to do so. When the dismissal is pursuant to * * * Rule * * * 41(a)(2), which specifies that the action “shall not be dismissed at the plaintiff’s instance save upon order of the court and upon such terms and conditions as the court deems proper,” the parties’ compliance with the terms of the settlement contract (or the court’s “retention of jurisdiction” over the settlement contract) may, in the court’s discretion, be one of the terms set forth in the order. Even when, as occurred here, the dismissal is pursuant to Rule 41(a)(1)(ii) (which does not by its terms empower a district court to attach conditions to the parties’ stipulation of dismissal) we think the court is authorized to embody the settlement contract in its dismissal order (or, what has the same effect, retain jurisdiction over the settlement contract) if the parties agree. Absent such action, however, enforcement of the settlement agreement is for state courts, unless there is some independent basis for federal jurisdiction.

Id. at 381–82, 114 S.Ct. at 1677, 128 L.Ed.2d at 398.

E. THE SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS—REMOVAL

Read 28 U.S.C. §§ 1441, 1442, 1443, 1445, 1446, 1447, and 1453 in the Supplement.

BACKGROUND NOTE ON REMOVAL JURISDICTION

Removal is a procedure that allows a party to relocate a suit originally filed in state court to federal court. Under the current general removal statute, only defendants can remove. Generally, all defendants, other than nominal parties, must join in the petition for removal. See Chicago, R.I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Martin, 178 U.S. 245, 20 S.Ct. 854, 44 L.Ed. 1055 (1900). An exception to the rule of unanimity applies to the removal of multiparty “single accident” cases under 28 U.S.C. § 1369, see 28 U.S.C. § 1441(e), as well as to class actions under the Class Action Fairness Act, see 28 U.S.C. § 1453(b), discussed in Chapter 10, infra.

381

The United States Constitution does not mention removal, but Congress has conferred jurisdiction to hear removed cases since the First Judiciary Act of 1789. The current general removal statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1441, traces to the Judiciary Act of 1875 and amendments enacted in 1887. See Collins, The Unhappy History of Federal Question Removal, 71 Iowa L.Rev. 717 (1986). Special removal statutes have been enacted for specific parties and claims. E.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1442 (removal by federal officers); 28 U.S.C. § 1443 (removal of certain cases involving civil rights); 28 U.S.C. § 1453 (removal of certain interstate class actions). Congress also has barred the removal of certain kinds of claims. E.g., 28 U.S.C. § 1445 (actions against railroads under the Federal Employers’ Liability Act).

The possibility of removal gives defendants a significant veto power over plaintiff’s forum choice. See Bassett & Perschbacher, The Roots of Removal, 77 Brooklyn L.Rev. 1, 2 (2011). The procedure is justified on a number of grounds. From the perspective of litigant equality, removal insures that defendants as well as plaintiffs “decide which cases federal courts hear.” Haiber, Removing the Bias Against Removal, 53 Cath.U.L.Rev. 609, 611 (2004). Moreover, in diversity actions, removal protects an out-of-state defendant from the threat of local bias. However, it is not uncommon for a defendant to base a decision to remove on tactical reasons, which, as one commentary explains, may include such considerations as “jury verdicts, trial rules and procedure, and the availability, caseload and personality of federal judges.” Reggio, Removal and Remand: A Guide to Navigating Between the State and Federal Courts, 23 Miss.L.Rev. 97, 98 (2004). The strategic significance of removal is underscored by empirical studies of win-loss rates in removed actions. Plaintiff’s win rate for a case filed in federal court under diversity jurisdiction is 71 percent, but drops to 34 percent for a case filed in state court and removed under diversity jurisdiction. See Clermont & Eisenberg, Do Case Outcomes Really Reveal Anything About the Legal System? Win Rates and Removal Jurisdiction, 83 Cornell L.Rev. 581, 581, 593 (1998); see also Clermont, Litigation Realities Redux, 84 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1919, 1927 (2009).

Section 1441(a) authorizes removal “by the defendant or the defendants.” SHAMROCK OIL & GAS CORP. v. SHEETS, 313 U.S. 100, 105–08, 61 S.Ct. 868, 871–72, 85 L.Ed. 1214, 1217–19 (1941), presented the question whether a plaintiff could remove a state court action to the federal courts because defendant had interposed a federal counterclaim. Justice Stone, writing for a unanimous Court, answered no:

Section 12 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 * * * declared that “if a suit be commenced in any state court against an alien * * * or * * * against a citizen of another state, and the matter in dispute exceeds” the jurisdictional amount “and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance in such state court, file a petition for the removal of the cause,” it shall be removable to the circuit court. In West v. Aurora City, 6 Wall. 139, 18 L.Ed. 819, this Court held that removal of a cause from a state to a federal court could be effected under § 12 only by a defendant against whom the suit is brought by process served upon him. Consequently a non-citizen plaintiff in the state court, against whom the citizen-defendant had asserted in the suit a claim by way of counterclaim which, under state law, had the character of an original suit, was not entitled to remove the cause. The Court ruled that the plaintiff, having submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the state court, was not entitled to avail himself of a right of removal conferred only on a defendant who has not submitted himself to the jurisdiction.

382

By § 3 of the Act of 1875 * * * the practice on removal was greatly liberalized. It authorized “either party, or any one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants entitled to remove any suit” from the state court to do so upon petition in such suit to the state court “before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried and before the trial thereof.” These provisions were continued until the adoption of the provisions of the present statute so far as now material by the Act of 1887 * * *.

We cannot assume that Congress, in thus revising the statute, was unaware of the history which we have just detailed, or certainly that it regarded as without significance the omission from the earlier act of the phrase “either party,” and the substitution for it of the phrase authorizing removal by the “defendant or defendants” in the suit, or the like omission of the provision for removal at any time before the trial, and the substitution for it of the requirement that the removal petition be filed by the “defendant” at or before the time he is required to plead in the state court.

Not only does the language of the Act of 1887 evidence the Congressional purpose to restrict the jurisdiction of the federal courts on removal, but the policy of the successive acts of Congress regulating the jurisdiction of federal courts is one calling for the strict construction of such legislation. * * *

The Supreme Court revisited this aspect of the removal statute more recently in HOME DEPOT U.S.A., INC. v. JACKSON, 587 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct. 1743, 204 L.Ed.2d 34 (2019). A bank filed a debt-collection action in state court, alleging that a consumer was liable for charges he had incurred on a Home Depot credit card. The consumer responded by filing third-party class-action claims against Home Depot, alleging that it had engaged in practices that violated state law. Home Depot removed the case to federal court, citing not only Section 1441(a) but also Section 1453(b) (the Class Action Fairness Act’s specialized removal provision for certain interstate class actions).

Writing for a five-to-four majority, Justice Thomas concluded that removal was not proper because “in the context of these removal provisions the term ‘defendant’ refers only to the party sued by the original plaintiff.” Id. at ___, 139 S.Ct. at 1746, 204 L.Ed.2d at 40. Although Justice Thomas recognized that “Shamrock Oil does not specifically address whether a party who was not the original plaintiff can remove a counterclaim filed against it,” he saw “no textual reason to reach a different conclusion for a counterclaim defendant who was not originally part of the lawsuit.” Id. at ___, 139 S.Ct. at 1749, 204 L.Ed.2d at 44.

In that regard, Shamrock Oil did not view the counterclaim as a separate action with a new plaintiff and a new defendant. Instead, the Court highlighted that the original plaintiff was still “the plaintiff.” * * * Similarly here, the filing of counterclaims that included class-action allegations against a third party did not create a new “civil action” with a new “plaintiff” and a new “defendant.”

Id. The same reasoning applied to removal under Section 1453(b), which likewise permits only a “defendant” to remove. Id. at ___, 139 S.Ct. at 1750, 204 L.Ed.2d at 45 (“Congress did not expand the types of parties eligible to remove a class action under § 1453(b) beyond § 1441(a)’s limits.”). Justice Alito wrote a dissent, joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justices Gorsuch and Kavanaugh. The dissent emphasized that a third-party defendant, like an original defendant, did not choose to litigate in state court, and “might face bias there, and with it the potential for crippling unjust losses.” Id. at ___, 139 S.Ct. at 1752, 204 L.Ed.2d at 47 (Alito, J., dissenting).

NOTE ON REMOVAL JURISDICTION AND PROCEDURE

(1) The Requirement of Original Jurisdiction

Removal jurisdiction is a creature of statute. Under the current general removal statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1441, only a defendant may remove, and removal is available only if the action falls within the federal court’s original jurisdiction.

We earlier saw that plaintiff cannot manufacture federal jurisdiction by anticipating defendant’s federal affirmative defense in the complaint. See p. 331, supra. Similarly, plaintiff cannot block removal by disguising the federal nature of the claim. In BRIGHT v. BECHTEL PETROLEUM, INC., 780 F.2d 766 (9th Cir. 1986), a worker challenged his employer’s practice of issuing paychecks net of state and federal income taxes, and styled the action as a state court breach of contract claim. The employer removed the case to federal court arguing that the complaint really was a challenge to the employer’s compliance with federal tax law. The Ninth Circuit held that removal was proper: “Although the plaintiff is generally considered the ‘master of his complaint’ and is free to choose the forum for his action, this principle is not without limitation. * * * A plaintiff will not be allowed to conceal the true nature of a complaint through ‘artful pleading.’ ” Id. at 769. See Miller, Artful Pleading: A Doctrine in Search of Definition, 76 Tex.L.Rev. 1781, 1783 (1998).

Relatedly, the doctrine of derivative jurisdiction traditionally barred the removal of actions when the state court lacked original jurisdiction over the claims. In practice the doctrine barred the removal of cases within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal court. The doctrine was premised on the view that if the state court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction, “there was, legally speaking, no action pending in the state court and hence no action which could be removed to the federal court.” See Mach. Co. v. Freeman, 131 F.2d 190, 194 (1st Cir. 1942), affirmed 319 U.S. 448, 63 S.Ct. 1146, 87 L.Ed. 1509 (1943). In 1986, Congress abrogated the derivative jurisdiction doctrine, making clear “that a federal court’s removal jurisdiction over a claim is not predicated upon the state court having subject-matter jurisdiction over that claim.” 14B Wright, Miller & Steinman, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3721 (4th ed.). In 2002, this provision was recodified as 28 U.S.C. § 1441(f) and limited to removal under 28 U.S.C. § 1441.

Finally, an important but complex doctrine governs claims that are “necessarily federal” and removable to federal court because the state claim is extinguished by federal law—known as the doctrine of complete preemption. Seinfeld, The Puzzle of Complete Preemption, 155 U.Pa.L.Rev. 537, 567 (2007). As the Supreme Court has explained, “[I]f a federal cause of action completely preempts a state cause of action any complaint that comes within the scope of the federal cause of action necessarily ‘arises under’ federal law.” Franchise Tax Bd. of State of California v. Construction Laborers Vacation Trust for Southern California, 463 U.S. 1, 24, 103 S.Ct. 2841, 2854, 77 L.Ed.2d 420, 440 (1983).

(2) Removal Based on Diversity Jurisdiction—Citizenship

A number of special rules apply when defendant seeks to remove on the basis of diversity jurisdiction. Section 1441(b)(2) bars removal “solely” on the basis of diversity jurisdiction “if any of the parties in interest properly joined and served as defendants is a citizen of the State in which such action is brought.” What is the rationale for preventing in-state defendants from removing based on diversity jurisdiction?

In LIVELY v. WILD OATS MARKETS, INC., 456 F.3d 933 (9th Cir. 2006), cert. denied, 549 U.S. 1207, 127 S.Ct. 1265, 167 L.Ed.2d 77 (2007), plaintiff did not object to removal. After the case had been pending for eight months, the district court determined that defendant was a citizen of the forum state and so remanded the action. The Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that the forum-state bar is a procedural, not a jurisdictional, rule and so subject to waiver. The circuits currently are divided on this question. See Metzler, Jr., A Lively Debate: The Eighth Circuit and the Forum Defendant Rule, 36 Wm. Mitchell

L.Rev. 1638 (2010); see also Dodson, In Search of Removal Jurisdiction, 102 Nw.U.L.Rev. 55 (2008).

Another special rule in diversity cases involves the judicial ban on fraudulent joinder, the situation when a plaintiff joins a nondiverse party in an effort to block removal. Removal is permitted if plaintiff has no cause of action against the nondiverse defendant; the district court may sever the nondiverse party from the action under Federal Rule 21. See Percy, Making a Federal Case of It: Removing Civil Cases to Federal Court Based on Fraudulent Joinder, 91 Iowa L.Rev. 189 (2005). Some courts will remand the case to allow the diverse defendant to move for severance and then to remove. See Osborn v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 341 F.Supp.2d 1123 (E.D.Cal. 2004). Which approach is preferable? See Marple, Removal to Federal Court Based on Misjoinder of Parties, 41 Tex.Tech L.Rev. 551 (2009).

Relatedly, a plaintiff may try to block removal by joining a nondiverse state law claim with an unrelated federal claim. See 28 U.S.C. § 1441(c). The current statute became effective in 2012. What is the constitutional significance of requiring the district court to sever and remand the claim that is nonremovable? Removal also is permitted when a federal claim is joined with a claim that is nonremovable by statute (for example, an action under a state worker’s compensation law). See 14B Wright, Miller & Steinman, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3722.3 (4th ed.).

(3)Removal Based on Diversity Jurisdiction— the Amount-in-Controversy

When jurisdiction is based on diversity jurisdiction, the case must meet the amount-in-controversy requirement. Explain whether the following situations will affect removal on the basis of diversity jurisdiction:

- (a)After removal, plaintiff amends the complaint to demand relief that is less than the amount-in-controversy requirement.
- (b)The complaint seeks recovery for “no more than $75,000.”
- (c)The complaint seeks declaratory relief.
- (d)The complaint does not seek a sum certain for relief in a state that does not require an ad damnum clause.

In 2012, Congress amended the removal statute as it affects the jurisdictional amount. See 28 U.S.C. § 1446(c). The Supreme Court interpreted this provision in DART CHEROKEE BASIN OPERATING CO. v. OWENS, 574 U.S. 81, 135 S.Ct. 547, 190 L.Ed.2d 495 (2014), a case involving removal under the Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA), 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(d) and 1453. The Court stated:

When a plaintiff invokes federal-court jurisdiction, the plaintiff’s amount-in-controversy allegation is accepted if made in good faith.* * * Similarly, when a defendant seeks federal-court adjudication, the defendant’s amount-in-controversy allegation should be accepted when not contested by the plaintiff or questioned by the court. * * *

If the plaintiff contests the defendant’s allegation, § 1446(c)(2)(B) instructs: “[R]emoval . . . is proper on the basis of an amount in controversy asserted” by the defendant “if the district court finds, by the preponderance of the evidence, that the amount in controversy exceeds” the jurisdictional threshold. * * * This provision * * * clarifies the procedure in order when a defendant’s assertion of the amount in controversy is challenged. In such a case, both sides submit proof and the court decides, by a preponderance of the evidence, whether the amount-in-controversy requirement has been satisfied.

Id. at 87–88, 135 S.Ct. at 553–54, 190 L.Ed.2d at 503. Should Dart Cherokee apply when the suit does not involve CAFA? The Court emphasized the fact that “no antiremoval presumption attends cases invoking CAFA,” but left open “whether such a presumption is proper in mine-run diversity cases.” Id. at 89, 135 S.Ct. at 554, 190 L.Ed.2d at 504. CAFA is discussed in Chapter 10, infra.

(4)Removal Procedure and Time Limits

Removal is subject to a number of different time limits.

- (a)What is the trigger date in an action involving multiple defendants who are served at different times? See 28 U.S.C. § 1446(b).
- (b)What is the time limit when removal is based on diversity of citizenship? See 28 U.S.C. § 1446(c).
- (c)Would it be proper for a defendant who has been joined but not yet served to seek removal—a practice known as “snap removal”? See 28 U.S.C. § 1446(b)(2)(A).
- (d)If a suit is not removable based on the initial pleading, what are defendant’s options if a later filing in the suit indicates a basis for removal? See 28 U.S.C. § 1446(b)(3).
- (e)What is the time limit if plaintiff acts in bad faith to block removal, for example, by deliberately refusing to disclose the actual amount in controversy? See 28 U.S.C. § 1446(c)(3)(B).

(5)Removal and Supplemental Jurisdiction

Supplemental jurisdiction, standing alone, may not be invoked as a basis for removal. However, in CITY OF CHICAGO v. INTERNATIONAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS, 522 U.S. 156, 118 S.Ct. 523, 139 L.Ed.2d 525 (1997), the Supreme Court clarified that supplemental jurisdiction may be exercised to permit removal in state court cases that also include claims for which there would be original jurisdiction in federal court. The Court noted that “[t]he propriety of removal * * * depends on whether the case originally could have been filed in federal court,” and that Section 1367(a) “applies with equal force to cases removed to federal court as to cases initially filed there.” Id. at 163, 165, 118 S.Ct. at 529, 530, 139 L.Ed.2d at 534, 535. If the federal claim on which removal is based is dismissed, the district court has discretion to remand the supplemental state claims to state court. See Carnegie-Mellon Univ. v. Cohill, 484 U.S. 343, 108 S.Ct. 614, 98 L.Ed.2d 720 (1988); see also 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)(3) (permitting a district court to “decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction” when “the district court has dismissed all claims over which it has original jurisdiction”).

387

F. CHALLENGING THE SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION OF THE COURT

1.DIRECT ATTACK ON A COURT’S LACK OF SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 8(a)(1), 12(b)(1), 12(h)(3), and 60(b)(4), Form 40, and 28 U.S.C. § 1653 in the Supplement.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. A defect in subject-matter jurisdiction may be raised by any party and by the court sua sponte, at any time during the proceeding, including for the first time on appeal. Moreover, it is settled that the jurisdiction of a federal court may not be created by agreement or by consent. See Mansfield, C. & L. M. Ry. Co. v. Swan, 111 U.S. 379, 4 S.Ct. 510, 28 L.Ed. 462 (1884).

2.Must a district court determine that subject-matter jurisdiction exists before making any other decision in the suit? In STEEL CO. v. CITIZENS FOR A BETTER ENVIRONMENT, 523 U.S. 83, 118 S.Ct. 1003, 140 L.Ed.2d 210 (1998), the Supreme Court underscored that the “requirement that jurisdiction be established as a threshold matter ‘springs from the nature and limits of the judicial power of the United States’ and is ‘inflexible and without exception.’ ” Id. at 94–95, 118 S.Ct. at 1012, 140 L.Ed.2d at 227 (citations omitted). It follows, the Court explained, that it is impermissible for a lower court to exercise “hypothetical” jurisdiction to resolve questions of law. Id. at 101, 118 S.Ct. at 1016, 140 L.Ed.2d at 231. See Steinman, After Steel Co.: “Hypothetical Jurisdiction” in the Federal Appellate Courts, 58 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 855 (2001).

However, in RUHRGAS AG v. MARATHON OIL CO., 526 U.S. 574, 119 S.Ct. 1563, 143 L.Ed.2d 760 (1999), the Supreme Court unanimously held that the lower court’s inquiry into personal jurisdiction could precede that of subject-matter jurisdiction. The Court explained:

388

Where * * * a district court has before it a straightforward personal jurisdiction issue presenting no complex question of state law, and the alleged defect in subject matter jurisdiction raises a difficult and novel question, the court does not abuse its discretion by turning directly to personal jurisdiction.

Id. at 588, 119 S.Ct. at 1572, 143 L.Ed.2d at 773. See Friedenthal, The Crack in the Steel Case, 68 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 258, 259 (2000). Similarly, the Court has held that a district court may dismiss an action on grounds of forum non conveniens before resolving that subject-matter jurisdiction exists. See Sinochem, p. 432, infra. For a criticism of post-Steel cases, see Idleman, The Emergence of Jurisdictional Resequencing in the Federal Courts, 87 Cornell L.Rev. 1 (2001).

3.Is a district court’s remand order reviewable by appeal? The text of 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) appears to bar appellate review of all remand orders other than in cases removed under 28 U.S.C. § 1442 (removal by federal officers) and 28 U.S.C. § 1443 (removal of certain cases involving civil rights). See Steinman, Reinventing Appellate Jurisdiction, 48 B.C.L.Rev. 1237 (2007). However, the Supreme Court has held that only remands based on grounds stated in Section 1447(c)—a lack of subject-matter jurisdiction or a procedural defect—are immune from review. See Powerex Corp. v. Reliant Energy Services, Inc., 551 U.S. 224, 127 S.Ct. 2411, 168 L.Ed.2d 112 (2007). In CARLSBAD TECHNOLOGY, INC. v. HIF BIO, INC., 556 U.S. 635, 129 S.Ct. 1862, 173 L.Ed.2d 843 (2009), the Court held that a remand order declining to exercise supplemental jurisdiction is reviewable by appeal notwithstanding Section 1447(d). Special rules apply to the review of remand orders in suits under the Class Action Fairness Act. See 28 U.S.C. § 1453(c).

In BP P.L.C. v. MAYOR & CITY COUNCIL OF BALTIMORE, 593 U.S. ___, 141 S.Ct. 1532, 209 L.Ed.2d 631 (2021), the Supreme Court addressed the provision of Section 1447(d) authorizing appellate review of “an order remanding a case to the State court from which it was removed pursuant to section 1442 or 1443.” Plaintiffs in that case sued various energy companies in Maryland state court, asserting state causes of action alleging that defendants promoted fossil fuels while concealing their environmental impacts. Defendants removed the case to federal court on several grounds. They primarily argued for removal under 28 U.S.C. § 1441, on the theory that plaintiffs’ claims necessarily arose under federal common law and, accordingly, federal subject-matter jurisdiction existed under 28 U.S.C. § 1331. But defendants asserted other grounds for removal as well—including federal officer removal under 28 U.S.C. § 1442. The district court rejected all of defendants’ grounds for removal—including federal officer removal—and ordered the case remanded to state court.

On appeal, defendants argued that the exception in Section 1447(d) permitted appellate review not only of the district court’s ruling on federal officer removal, but also its rulings on their other grounds for removal. In a 7–1 decision (Justice Alito did not participate), the Supreme Court agreed. As long as a defendant “premised removal in part on the federal officer removal statute, § 1442, or the civil rights removal statute, § 1443,” the appellate court could review the district court’s rulings on every ground for removal asserted. 593 U.S. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 1536, 209 L.Ed.2d at 637. Justice Gorsuch’s majority opinion reasoned that “the statute allows courts of appeals to examine the whole of a district court’s ‘order,’ not just some of its parts or pieces.” Id. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 1537–38, 209 L.Ed.2d at 639.

The Court also addressed plaintiffs’ argument that the majority’s interpretation of Section 1447(d) would encourage “gamesmanship” by defendants, who “may frivolously add § 1442 or § 1443 to their other grounds for removal, all with an eye to ensuring appellate review down the line if the case is remanded”:

[T]hanks to § 1447(c) a district court may order a defendant to pay the plaintiff’s costs and expenses (including attorney’s fees) if it frivolously removes a case from state court. Additionally, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow courts to sanction frivolous arguments made in virtually any context. Rules 11(b)–(c).
Id. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 1542–43, 209 L.Ed.2d at 645.

Justice Sotomayor was the lone dissenter. She wrote that the majority’s interpretation “lets defendants sidestep § 1447(d)’s bar on appellate review by shoehorning a § 1442 or § 1443 argument into their case for removal. In other words, it lets the exception swallow the rule.” Id. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 1543, 209 L.Ed.2d at 646 (Sotomayor, J., dissenting). Justice Sotomayor also cast doubt on the majority’s view that the possibility of sanctions would deter gamesmanship by defendants seeking a federal forum, noting that “[a] federal-officer claim can be so weak it is not worth pursuing on appeal, but not so meritless as to warrant sanctions.” Id. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 1547, 209 L.Ed.2d at 649. In the BP case itself, defendants “no longer advance their argument under § 1442, * * * [y]et that argument somehow opens a back door to appellate review that would otherwise be closed to them.” Id.

4.What are the consequences if a district court fails to remand an action that was improperly removed, but the jurisdictional defect is cured before a judgment on the merits is entered? In considering this question, the Supreme Court has drawn a line between “jurisdictional cures” that involve a change in the parties to the action, and those that involve post-filing changes to a party’s citizenship.

In CATERPILLAR INC. v. LEWIS, 519 U.S. 61, 117 S.Ct. 467, 136 L.Ed.2d 437 (1996), the district court mistakenly retained removal jurisdiction despite the absence of complete diversity. Diversity became complete prior to trial when the nondiverse party was formally dismissed from the action. The Sixth Circuit held it was error not to have remanded and vacated the district court’s judgment. The Supreme Court, in a unanimous decision, reversed, emphasizing the “overwhelming” effect of “considerations of finality, efficiency, and economy.” Id. at 75, 117 S.Ct. at 476, 136 L.Ed.2d at 451. By contrast, in GRUPO DATAFLUX v. ATLAS GLOBAL GROUP, L.P., 541 U.S. 567, 124 S.Ct. 1920, 158 L.Ed.2d 866 (2004), complete diversity became present when the citizenship of plaintiff, a limited partnership, changed while the action was pending due to the withdrawal of two Mexican citizens who were partners at the time of filing. The Supreme Court, in a five-to-four decision, adhered to the time-of-filing rule and refused to extend the Caterpillar rationale to this situation. See Simpson-Wood, Has the Seductive Siren of Judicial Frugality Ceased to Sing?: Dataflux and Its Family Tree, 53 Drake L.Rev. 281 (2005).

2.COLLATERAL ATTACK ON A JUDGMENT FOR LACK OF SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. An old and repeated maxim of jurisdiction doctrine is that a judgment rendered by a court that lacked jurisdiction over the subject matter (or the “cause,” to use the older terminology) is void and a nullity. See The Case of the Marshalsea, 10 Co. Rep. 68b, 77 Eng. Rep. 1027 (K.B. 1613); Elliot v. Peirsol’s Lessee, 26 U.S. (1 Pet.) 328, 7 L.Ed. 164 (1828). However, the subject is considerably more complex than the maxim would indicate. The question of when a judgment is vulnerable to collateral attack for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction remains particularly vexing.

Section 10 of the Restatement (First) of Judgments (1942) stated that if the court in the original action determined that it had subject-matter jurisdiction, the permissibility of collateral attack depended on weighing a non-exclusive list of factors:

- (a)the lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter was clear;
- (b)the determination as to jurisdiction depended upon a question of law rather than of fact;
- (c)the court was one of limited and not of general jurisdiction;
- (d)the question of jurisdiction was not actually litigated;
- (e)the policy against the court’s acting beyond its jurisdiction is strong.

Restatement (Second), Judgments §§ 12, 69 (1982) takes the approach that the judgment in a contested action, whether or not the question of subject-matter jurisdiction actually was litigated, is beyond collateral attack unless there are no justifiable interests of reliance that must be protected, and:

- (a) the subject matter of the action was so plainly beyond the court’s jurisdiction that its entertaining the action was a manifest abuse of authority; or
- (b) allowing the judgment to stand would substantially infringe the authority of another tribunal or agency of government; or

391

- (c) the judgment was rendered by a court lacking capability to make an adequately informed determination of a question concerning its own jurisdiction and as a matter of procedural fairness the party seeking to avoid the judgment should have opportunity belatedly to attack the court’s subject-matter jurisdiction.

In addition, collateral challenge generally is permitted under the Restatement (Second) when the judgment is entered by default. Id. at § 65. Does this approach go far enough, or too far, toward giving preclusive effect to the original court’s judgment? See generally Moore, Collateral Attack on Subject-Matter Jurisdiction: A Critique of the Restatement (Second) of Judgments, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 534 (1981).

2. In CHICOT COUNTY DRAINAGE DISTRICT v. BAXTER STATE BANK, 308 U.S. 371, 60 S.Ct. 317, 84 L.Ed. 329 (1940), parties who had notice but chose not to appear in the original action attempted to attack collaterally a judgment rendered by a district court sitting as a court of bankruptcy under a statute that was later declared unconstitutional. The Supreme Court refused to allow the attack:

- * * * If the general principles governing the defense of res judicata are applicable, [respondents], having the opportunity to raise the question of invalidity, were not the less bound by the decree because they failed to raise it. * * *
- * * * The lower federal courts are all courts of limited jurisdiction, that is, with only the jurisdiction which Congress has prescribed. But nonetheless they are courts with authority * * * to determine whether or not they have jurisdiction to entertain the cause and for this purpose to construe and apply the statute under which they are asked to act. Their determinations of such questions, while open to direct review, may not be assailed collaterally.

Id. at 375–76, 60 S.Ct. at 319, 84 L.Ed. at 333. In TRAVELERS INDEMNITY CO. v. BAILEY, 557 U.S. 137, 129 S.Ct. 2195, 174 L.Ed.2d 99 (2009), the Court relied on Chicot to bar a collateral challenge to a bankruptcy court’s order.

By contrast, collateral attack was allowed in KALB v. FEUERSTEIN, 308 U.S. 433, 60 S.Ct. 343, 84 L.Ed. 370 (1940), decided the same day as Chicot. The questions for decision in Kalb were whether a state court had jurisdiction to render a judgment confirming a foreclosure sale while the mortgagor’s petition under the Bankruptcy Act was pending in a bankruptcy court, and, if not, whether the mortgagor was prohibited from attacking the state-court judgment collaterally. The Court answered both questions in the negative:

- * * * It is generally true that a judgment by a court of competent jurisdiction bears a presumption of regularity and is not thereafter subject to collateral attack. But Congress, because its power over the subject of bankruptcy is plenary, may by specific bankruptcy legislation create an exception to that principle and render judicial acts taken with respect to the person or property of a debtor whom the bankruptcy law protects nullities and vulnerable collaterally. * * *

392

We think the language and broad policy of the * * * Act conclusively demonstrate that Congress intended to, and did deprive the Wisconsin County Court of the power and jurisdiction to continue or maintain in any manner the foreclosure proceedings against appellants without the consent * * * of the bankruptcy court * * *.

Id. at 438–40, 60 S.Ct. at 346, 84 L.Ed. at 374–75.

Which of the categories in the two Restatements seems determinative of the Kalb case? Are Chicot and Kalb reconcilable? See Boskey & Braucher, Jurisdiction and Collateral Attack: October Term, 1939, 40 Colum.L.Rev. 1006 (1940).

The Court again considered the question of collateral challenge for a defect in subject-matter jurisdiction in DURFEE v. DUKE, 375 U.S. 106, 84 S.Ct. 242, 11 L.Ed.2d 186 (1963), involving a dispute over title to a tract of bottom land on the Missouri River, which forms the boundary between Nebraska and Missouri. A Missouri federal district court allowed collateral attack on a Nebraska judgment quieting title, on the ground that considerations of territorial sovereignty outweighed the policies of res judicata. The Nebraska court’s subject-matter jurisdiction depended on whether the land was within Nebraska, which “depended entirely upon a factual question—whether a shift in the river’s course had been caused by avulsion or accretion.” The question had been fully litigated in the Nebraska action. The Supreme Court reversed:

- * * * [W]hile it is established that a court in one State, when asked to give effect to the judgment of a court in another State, may constitutionally inquire into the foreign court’s jurisdiction to render that judgment, the modern decisions of this Court have carefully delineated the permissible scope of such an inquiry. From these decisions there emerges the general rule that a judgment is entitled to full faith and credit—even as to questions of jurisdiction—when the second court’s inquiry discloses that those questions have been fully and fairly litigated and finally decided in the court which rendered the original judgment. * * *

To be sure, the general rule of finality of jurisdictional determinations is not without exceptions. Doctrines of federal preemption or sovereign immunity may in some contexts be controlling. Kalb v. Feuerstein * * *. But no such overriding considerations are present here.

Id. at 111, 114, 84 S.Ct. at 245–47, 11 L.Ed.2d at 191–193. The decision in Durfee was followed in UNDERWRITERS NATIONAL ASSURANCE CO. v. NORTH CAROLINA LIFE & ACC. & HEALTH INS. GUAR. ASS’N, 455 U.S. 691, 102 S.Ct. 1357, 71 L.Ed.2d 558 (1982). See generally 18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4428 (3d ed.); Dobbs, The Validation of Void Judgments: The Bootstrap Principle, Part I, 53 Va.L.Rev.

1003 (1967); Note, Filling the Void: Judicial Power and Jurisdictional Attacks on Judgments, 87 Yale L.J. 164 (1977). Although older decisions and commentary refer to judgments rendered without subject-matter jurisdiction as “void,” the Second Restatement of Judgments no longer uses that term. The Reporter’s Note observed:

While a court should have subject matter jurisdiction of a controversy that the court purports to adjudicate, it does not follow that a judgment rendered by a court lacking subject matter jurisdiction is legally ineffective. Indeed, under modern law, * * * such a judgment is usually as effective as if the court had jurisdiction. Using the term “void” only introduces a term that must be qualified into near insignificance.

Restatement (Second), Judgments § 11, Reporter’s Note (1982), The enforceability of judgments is studied in Chapter 17, infra.

^aRule 5015 of the New York Civil Practice Law and Rules allows a party to move for relief from an order that was entered without jurisdiction.

^bAn exception is that the Supreme Court may exercise its original jurisdiction even without statutory authorization from Congress. See Arizona v. California, 373 U.S. 546, 564, 83 S.Ct. 1468, 1479, 10 L.Ed.2d 542, 557 (1963).

^cSome courts and commentators refer to this jurisdictional grant as “alienage jurisdiction.” Consistent with the language of Article III and Section 1332 itself, we prefer “foreign-party jurisdiction.”

^dSource: United States Courts, Caseload Statistics Data Tables, Chiefly Table C-2, www.uscourts.gov/statistics-reports/caseload-statistics-data-tables. The large number of diversity cases reported in 2020 is greatly influenced by an enormous multidistrict litigation (MDL) proceeding, In re: 3M Combat Arms Earplug Products Liability Litigation, that began in 2019 and grew to include over 200,000 cases. See 2022 WL 504451, at *5 (N.D.Fla. 2022) (noting “the more than 200,000 cases in this MDL”). MDLs are studied in Chapter 5, Section B & Chapter 9, Section H, infra.

^eAt the time of the lawsuit, the amount-in-controversy requirement was a sum that exceeded $50,000.00.

^fAlteration in original.

^gAlteration in original.

^hMunicipalities and other governmental units have since been held to be amenable to suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. See Monell v. Dep’t of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 98 S.Ct. 2018, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978).

ⁱThe problem concerned the Missouri River, which generally marks the boundary between Iowa and Nebraska. Carter Lake, Iowa, where the accident occurred and where Owen had its main office, lies west of the river, adjacent to Omaha, Nebraska. Apparently, the river had avulsed at one of its bends, cutting Carter Lake off from the rest of Iowa. See Oakley, The Story of Owen Equipment v. Kroger: A Change in the Weather of Federal Jurisdiction, in Civil Procedure Stories 81–134 (Clermont ed., 2d ed. 2008).

^jAlteration and emphasis in original.

^kAlteration in original.

^lFederal Rule 19 now refers to “required party.”

^mAlteration in original.

ⁿA portion of the decision was overruled in California Dept. of Water Resources v. Powerex Corp., 533 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2008) (holding that a district court’s discretionary decision to decline supplemental jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c) must be challenged by an appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and not by a petition for a writ of mandamus).

^oIn original.

CHAPTER 5

VENUE, TRANSFER, AND FORUM NON CONVENIENS

This chapter considers venue, a doctrine that concerns the geographic location of a lawsuit. Venue plays an important administrative role by allocating cases among courts of the same type within a single judicial system, which can prevent docket congestion. Venue also helps to protect a defendant from having to litigate in a forum that has jurisdiction but nevertheless is inconvenient. Unlike personal jurisdiction and subject-matter jurisdiction, the venue of a civil action does not raise any federal constitutional questions. However, as an aspect of forum choice, the venue of an action holds great strategic significance for a party’s litigation success.

A. VENUE

1.GENERAL PRINCIPLES

STEVENS, VENUE STATUTES: DIAGNOSIS AND PROPOSED CURE, 49 Mich.L.Rev. 307, 308–15 (1951):

* * * Given a cause of action, and having decided what court has jurisdiction over the subject matter, the lawyer must lay the venue, that is, select the place * * * [for litigating the case]. In making this decision, the lawyer in every state of the United States turns in the first instance, not to common law, but to statute, constitutional provision or rule of court. And he finds that the “proper” venue of his action depends upon the theory of his claim, the subject matter of his claim, the parties involved, or a combination of these factors.

Most codes make provision for the place of trial in local actions, and all codes provide in one way or another for venue in transitory actions arising both within and without the state. Many states make special provision for divorce actions, actions against executors, and actions for the specific recovery of personal property. Most states also provide for venue in actions against residents, against nonresidents, against corporations, domestic and foreign, against partnerships, associations and individuals doing business in the state, and against the state, or a county, or a city or public officers generally or specifically. The nature of the plaintiff, as a resident or nonresident, corporation, domestic or foreign, or political entity, is another factor frequently considered and provided for. * * *

396

A comparative study of contemporary venue provisions reveals some thirteen different fact situations upon which venue statutes are predicated.

A. Where the subject of action or part thereof is situated. The common law concept of actions which were local because the facts could have occurred only in a particular place still persists. As might well be expected, the proper venue for such actions is the county where the subject of the action is situated. There is, however, considerable variation from state to state as to what types of cases are local and fall into this category. * * *

This type of venue * * * is based upon the idea that the court of the county in which the res, which is the subject matter of the suit, is located is best able to deal with the problem. The local sheriff can attach, deliver or execute upon the property. The local clerk can make the necessary entries with a minimum of red tape where title to land is affected. Trial convenience is served where “a view” is necessary or of value in reaching a determination. Third parties can readily ascertain, at a logical point of inquiry, the status of a res in which they may be interested.

It is submitted that these factors are of sufficient importance in this type of case to outweigh other considerations such as convenience of parties or witnesses in the selection of place of trial. * * *

B. Where the cause of action, or part thereof, arose or accrued. Convenience of witnesses is the most logical reason for venue provisions allowing the action to be brought in the county where the cause of action, or part thereof, arose or accrued. And since convenience of witnesses is a very practical problem in the trial of a law suit, one would expect to find venue based upon the place where the cause of action arose or accrued a rather common, and general, provision. * * *

The idea behind this type of venue provision * * * is sound and popular. * * * However, its usefulness has been somewhat impaired by difficulties arising out of problems of statutory interpretation. First, what do the words “arose” and “accrued” mean? Second, what is the difference, if any, between “arose” and “accrued”? And, third, what is the meaning of the phrase “or part thereof”? * * *

C. Where some fact is present or happened. There is a sizeable group of statutes which provide * * * [hearing] the action in the county where some particular fact or fact situation related to, but no part of, the cause of action is present or happened. * * *

If the purpose of venue is * * * convenience, either of parties, or witnesses, or the court or court officials, then it is hard to find any real justification for this group of venue provisions. Most if not all of them are examples of singling out certain specific types of actions for special treatment where a need for special treatment is not or at least no longer [is] apparent. * * *

397

D. Where the defendant resides. Convenience of the defendant is the reason usually given for venue statutes which provide for the place of trial in the county where the defendant resides—the theory probably being, as suggested by Professor E.R. Sunderland, “that since the plaintiff controls the institution of the suit he might behave oppressively toward the defendant unless restrained.” * * *

E. Where the defendant is doing business. * * * Convenience of the defendant, and of witnesses, appears to be the reason behind such provisions where they are tied to causes of action arising out of the doing of business in the state. Convenience of the defendant, and even more clearly, convenience of the plaintiff, by providing a county in which to lay the venue against a nonresident individual, partnership, company or corporation without undue inconvenience to defendant, is served by the broader type of provision—against certain classes of defendants generally. * * *

F. Where defendant has an office or place of business, or an agent, or representative, or where an agent or officer of defendant resides. [These venue statutes] * * * are quite common where a corporation, company or some other type of business organization is the defendant. Convenience of the plaintiff, rather than the defendant, is the moving consideration behind such statutes in most instances. * * *

G. Where the plaintiff resides. * * *

Convenience of the plaintiff is the obvious reason behind venue statutes of this nature. Convenience of plaintiff’s witnesses may or may not be served, depending upon the nature of the action. * * * In certain types of cases against certain classes of defendants—such as an action on a foreign cause of action against a nonresident—this type of provision is both logical and practical. * * *

H. Where the plaintiff is doing business. * * * Obviously the convenience of the plaintiff is the sole consideration behind such a provision. It is submitted that other * * * convenience [factors] such as convenience of witnesses and of the defendant are more important, and that in view of the number of adherents to this ground of venue, it would be wise to advocate its abandonment. * * *

I. Where the defendant may be found. Venue based upon the county where the defendant may be found is in accord with the common law doctrine that the right of action follows the person. * * *

It is difficult to find any sound reason for venue based upon where the defendant may be found. It serves no useful purpose—no * * * convenience of either witnesses or parties. It is a good example of a historical hangover—a type of provision which has long since outlived its usefulness. The problem which this type of provision was designed to solve was and is not one of venue but of service of process. * * *

J. Where the defendant may be summoned or served. Another group of statutes, also based upon the common law doctrine that the right of action follows the person, provides that venue may be laid in the county where the defendant may be summoned, or served with process. * * *

The comments which were made with respect to venue based upon where the defendant may be found apply with equal force to this type of provision. * * *

K. In the county designated in the plaintiff’s complaint. * * *

Venue provisions of this type give the plaintiff an unnecessary economic advantage not warranted by convenience of parties or witnesses. In the interests of justice and trial convenience they should be eliminated.

L. In any county. The broadest venue provision on the books is that which provides that the plaintiff may lay the venue in any county. * * *

M. Where the seat of government is located. * * *

Statutes of this sort have a sound and practical reason behind them. With one exception, this type of provision is reserved for actions by or against governmental units or agencies. Convenience of the government appears to be the controlling factor. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Professor Stevens’ explanation of venue is as relevant now as it was when published in 1951. However, in the decades since he wrote, venue largely has become the site of pretrial proceedings, leading to settlement or summary judgment, and not of a trial on the merits. Why is it necessary to superimpose venue requirements on a soundly conceived jurisdictional system, especially one that includes an analysis of party convenience? See Clermont, Restating Territorial Jurisdiction and Venue for State and Federal Courts, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 411 (1981). Does venue serve an additional function of protecting the judicial system from inconvenience?

2.Should the rules governing venue in a state system differ from those in the federal system? Does the territorial size of the judicial system affect your analysis? Within the federal system, what is the significance of venue in cases where a federal statute permits nationwide service of process? See p. 233, supra. Relatedly, the state and federal systems make use of specialized courts, such as the Surrogate’s Court where the accounting in Mullane took place, see p. 237, supra. Should the venue rules be different for these specialized courts?

3.What information might be relevant in drafting a venue statute for where state contract, tort, and property actions can be heard? Should any weight be given to the size of damage awards in comparable cases in different regions or cities? How much weight ought to be given to the parties’ preferences rather than to the systemic interest of a state in having its courts avoid an inconvenient lawsuit?

4.In BURLINGTON NORTHERN R.R. CO. v. FORD, 504 U.S. 648, 112 S.Ct. 2184, 119 L.Ed.2d 432 (1992), the Supreme Court held that it did not violate equal protection for Montana to limit the venue of an action against an in-state corporation to the county of its principal place of business, while extending the venue of an action against an out-of-state corporation to any county in the state. Justice Souter wrote for a unanimous Court:

Venue rules generally reflect equity or expediency in resolving disparate interests of parties to a lawsuit in the place of trial. * * * The forum preferable to one party may be undesirable to another, and the adjustment of such warring interests is a valid state concern. * * * [W]e have no doubt that a State would act within its constitutional prerogatives if it were to give so much weight to the interest of plaintiffs as to allow them to sue in the counties of their choice under all circumstances. It is equally clear that a State might temper such an “any county” rule to the extent a reasonable assessment of defendants’ interest so justified.

* * * Montana has decided that the any-county rule should give way to a single-county rule where a defendant resides in Montana, arguably on the reasonable ground that a defendant should not be subjected to a plaintiff’s tactical advantage of forcing a trial far from the defendant’s residence. At the same time, Montana has weighed the interest of a defendant who does not reside in Montana differently, arguably on the equally reasonable ground that for most nonresident defendants the inconvenience will be great whether they have to defend in, say, Billings or Havre. * * *

Id. at 651–52, 112 S.Ct. at 2186–87, 119 L.Ed.2d at 438. How far should the Court’s reasoning in Burlington Northern extend? Would it be permissible for a state to locate in a single county all lawsuits against non-United States corporations, or by members of a particular religion or racial group, or involving small claims? See generally Rubenstein, The Concept of Equality in Civil Procedure, 23 Cardozo L.Rev. 1865 (2002).

2.LOCAL AND TRANSITORY ACTIONS

REASOR-HILL CORP. v. HARRISON

Supreme Court of Arkansas, 1952.
220 Ark. 521, 249 S.W.2d 994.

GEORGE ROSE SMITH, JUSTICE. Petitioner asks us to prohibit the circuit court of Mississippi County from taking jurisdiction of a cross-complaint filed by D.M. Barton. In the court below the petitioner moved to dismiss the cross-complaint for the reason that it stated a cause of action for injury to real property in the state of Missouri. When the motion to dismiss was overruled the present application for prohibition was filed in this court.

400

The suit below was brought by the Planters Flying Service to collect an account for having sprayed insecticide upon Barton’s cotton crop in Missouri. In his answer Barton charged that the flying service had damaged his growing crop by using an adulterated insecticide, and by cross-complaint he sought damages from the petitioner for its negligence in putting on the market a chemical unsuited to spraying cotton. The petitioner is an Arkansas corporation engaged in manufacturing insecticides and is not authorized to do business in Missouri.

The question presented is one of first impression: May the Arkansas courts entertain a suit for injuries to real property situated in another State? For the respondent it is rightly pointed out that if the suit is not maintainable Barton has no remedy whatever. The petitioner cannot be served with summons in Missouri; so unless it is subject to suit in Arkansas it can escape liability entirely by staying out of Missouri until the statute of limitations has run. * * * The petitioner answers this argument by showing that with the exception of the Supreme Court of Minnesota every American court that has passed upon the question (and there have been about twenty) has held that jurisdiction does not exist.

We agree that the weight of authority is almost unanimously against the respondent, although in some States the rule has been changed by statute and in others it has been criticized by the courts and restricted as narrowly as possible. But before mechanically following the majority view we think it worthwhile to examine the origin of the rule and the reasons for its existence.

The distinction between local and transitory actions was recognized at the beginning of the fourteenth century in the common law of England. Before then all actions had to be brought where the cause of action arose, because the members of the jury were required to be neighbors who would know something of the litigants and of the dispute as well. But when cases were presented that involved separate incidents occurring in different communities the reason for localizing the action disappeared, for it was then impossible to obtain a jury who knew all the facts. Consequently the courts developed the distinction between a case that might have arisen anywhere, which was held to be transitory, and one that involved a particular piece of land, which was held to be local. * * *

As between judicial districts under the same sovereign the rule has many advantages and has been followed in America. As between counties our statutes in Arkansas require that actions for injury to real estate be brought where the land lies. * * * But we permit the defendant to be served anywhere in the State * * *; so the plaintiff is not denied a remedy even though the defendant is a resident of another county.

401

The English courts, in developing the law of local and transitory actions, applied it also to suits for injuries to real property lying outside England. If, for example, there had been a trespass upon land in France, the courts would not permit the plaintiff to bring suit in England, even though the defendant lived in England and could not be subjected to liability in France. The American courts, treating the separate States as independent sovereigns, have followed the English decisions.

In the United States the leading case is unquestionably Livingston v. Jefferson, Fed. Case No. 8411, 1 Brock 203. That suit was a part of the famous litigation between Edward Livingston and Thomas Jefferson * * *. The case was heard by Marshall as circuit justice and Tyler as district judge. Both agreed that the suit, which was for a wrongful entry upon land in Louisiana, could not be maintained in Virginia. In Marshall’s concurring opinion he examined the English precedents and concluded that the law was so firmly established that the court was bound to follow it, though Marshall expressed his dissatisfaction with a rule which produced “the inconvenience of a clear right without a remedy.”

Since then the American courts have relied almost uniformly upon the Livingston case in applying the rule to interstate litigation in this country. At least three reasons have been offered to justify the rule, but it is easy to show that each reason is more applicable to international controversies than to interstate disputes.

First, the ground most frequently relied upon is that the courts are not in a position to pass upon the title to land outside the jurisdiction. As between nations this reasoning may be sound. The members of this court have neither the training nor the facilities to investigate questions involving the ownership of land in France, in Russia, or in China. But the same difficulties do not exist with respect to land in another State. In our library we have the statutes and decisions of every other State, and it seldom takes more than a few hours to find the answer to a particular question. Furthermore, the American courts do not hesitate to pass upon an out-of-state title when the issue arises in a transitory action. If, for example, Barton had charged that this petitioner converted a mature crop in Missouri and carried it to Arkansas, our courts would decide the case even though it became necessary to pass upon conflicting claims of title to the land in Missouri. Again, a suit for damages for nonperformance of a contract to purchase land is transitory and may be maintained in another State, even though the sole issue is the validity of the seller's title. To put an extreme example, suppose that two companion suits, one local and one transitory, were presented to the same court together. In those States where the courts disclaim the ability to pass upon questions of title in local actions it might be necessary for the court to dismiss the local action for that reason and yet to decide the identical question in the allied transitory case.

Second, it has been argued that since the tort must take place where the land is situated the plaintiff should pursue his remedy before the defendant leaves the jurisdiction. This argument, too, has merit when nations are concerned. A sovereign, by its control of passports and ports of entry, may detain those who wish to cross its borders. But the citizens of the various States have a constitutional right to pass freely from one jurisdiction to another. * * * In the case at bar * * * Barton could hardly be expected to discover the damage and file an attachment suit before the pilot returned to his landing field in Arkansas.

Third, there is an understandable reluctance to subject one's own citizens to suits by aliens, especially if the other jurisdiction would provide no redress if the situation were reversed. * * * One may have some sympathy for this position in international disputes, but it has no persuasive effect when the States are involved. We do not feel compelled to provide a sanctuary in Arkansas for those who have willfully and wrongfully destroyed property, torn down houses, uprooted crops, polluted streams, and inflicted other injuries upon innocent landowners in our sister States. Yet every jurisdiction which follows the rule of the Livingston case affords that refuge to any person—whether one of its citizens or not—who is successful in fleeing from the scene of such misdeeds.

The truth is that the majority rule has no basis in logic or equity and rests solely upon English cases that were decided before America was discovered and in circumstances that are not even comparable to those existing in our Union. Basic principles of justice demand that wrongs should not go unredressed. * * * Under the majority rule we should have to tell Barton that he would have been much better off had the petitioner stolen his cotton outright instead of merely damaging it. And the only reason we could give for this unfortunate situation would be that English juries in the thirteenth century were expected to have personal knowledge of the disputes presented to them. We prefer to afford this litigant his day in court.

Writ denied.
GRIFFIN SMITH, C.J., concurs.
McFADDIN and WARD, J.J., dissent.
McFADDIN, JUSTICE (dissenting).

* * *

In the first place, the majority says that we have ample facilities to determine the land laws of other States in the United States. * * * This statement about the size of the law library seems rather weak, because land actions are tried in lower courts and not in the Supreme Court library. Just because we have a fine law library does not mean that we are prepared to determine the title to lands in Texas,⁴ Missouri, Vermont, or any other State. But if we have the jurisdiction which the majority claims, then we could determine ejectment actions involving ownership of lands in other States. We might undertake to do this, but the Full Faith and Credit clause of the U.S. Constitution would not require the Sister State to recognize our judgment. * * *

Secondly, the majority says that the rule, requiring that an action be brought in the jurisdiction in which the land is situated, is a good rule between Nations, but is not good as between States in the American Union. For answer to this, I say: I have always understood that each of the American States is Sovereign; that the Federal Government is a government of delegated powers; and that all powers not delegated to the Federal Government are retained by the States and the People. Surely the majority is not attempting to reduce our American States to the level of mere local administrative units. Yet such, unfortunately, is the natural conclusion to which the majority opinion would carry us, when it concedes one rule for Nations and another for States.

Thirdly, the majority says that it does not desire to afford Arkansas Citizens a sanctuary from damage actions by citizens of other States. This is an argument that should be made—if at all—in the Legislative branch of Government, rather than in a judicial opinion. It is for the Legislative Department to determine when and where actions may be prosecuted. * * *

* * * [M]any, many cases * * * have considered the question here involved; and each Court—with the sole exception of Minnesota—has seen fit to follow the great weight of authority which has come down to us from the common law. In matters affecting real property particularly, we should leave undisturbed the ancient landmarks. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why did the dissenting opinion in Reasor-Hill state that a judgment in ejectment rendered by the Arkansas courts involving land outside the state would not be entitled to Full Faith and Credit by a sister state? Does this suggest that it viewed the local action doctrine as a rule of subject-matter jurisdiction, and not of venue? If the rule is jurisdictional, would a court lack power to hear an action involving foreign land even if the parties did not raise an objection to venue? See Taylor v. Sommers Bros. Match Co., 35 Idaho 30, 204 P. 472 (1922).

404

2. In a state that recognizes the local action doctrine, could the court enforce a party-agreement locating a dispute about property in a district other than where the property is located? See Friedenthal, Kane, Miller & Steinman, Civil Procedure § 2.16 (6th ed.).

3. Have the justifications for the local action rule eroded over time? Is it relevant that courts now have widely available access to electronic research systems including aerial maps? Should the doctrine be limited to in rem and quasi in rem actions to determine ownership or control of real property? Should the doctrine be eliminated entirely? The federal local action doctrine is discussed on p. 408, Note 4, infra.

3.VENUE IN THE FEDERAL COURTS

Read 28 U.S.C. §§ 1390 and 1391 in the Supplement.

BATES v. C & S ADJUSTERS, INC.
United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1992.
980 F.2d 865.

NEWMAN, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This appeal concerns venue in an action brought under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act * * *. Specifically, the issue is whether venue exists in a district in which the debtor resides and to which a bill collector’s demand for payment was forwarded. The issue arises on an appeal by Phillip E. Bates from the May 21, 1992, judgment of the District Court for the Western District of New York, dismissing his complaint because of improper venue. We conclude that venue was proper under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(2) and therefore reverse and remand.

Background

Bates commenced this action in the Western District of New York upon receipt of a collection notice from C & S Adjusters, Inc. (“C & S”). Bates alleged violations of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, and demanded statutory damages, costs, and attorney’s fees. The facts relevant to venue are not in dispute. Bates incurred the debt in question while he was a resident of the Western District of Pennsylvania. The creditor, a corporation with its principal place of business in that District, referred the account to C & S, a local collection agency which transacts no regular business in New York. Bates had meanwhile moved to the Western District of New York. When C & S mailed a collection notice to Bates at his Pennsylvania address, the Postal Service forwarded the notice to Bates’ new address in New York.

405

In its answer, C & S asserted two affirmative defenses and also counterclaimed for costs, alleging that the action was instituted in bad faith and for purposes of harassment. C & S subsequently filed a motion to dismiss for improper venue, which the District Court granted.

Discussion

1. Venue and the 1990 amendments to 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)

Bates concedes that the only plausible venue provision for this action is 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(2), which allows an action to be brought in “a judicial district in which a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claim occurred.” Prior to 1990, section 1391 allowed for venue in “the judicial district * * * in which the claim arose.” * * * This case represents our first opportunity to consider the significance of the 1990 amendments.

Prior to 1966, venue was proper in federal question cases, absent a special venue statute, only in the defendant’s state of citizenship. If a plaintiff sought to sue multiple defendants who were citizens of different states, there might be no district where the entire action could be brought. * * * Congress closed this “venue gap” by adding a provision allowing suit in the district “in which the claim arose.” * * * Some courts thought it meant that there could be only one such district; others believed there could be several. Different tests developed, with courts looking for “substantial contacts,” the “weight of contacts,” the place of injury or performance, or even to the boundaries of personal jurisdiction under state law. * * *

The Supreme Court gave detailed attention to section 1391(b) in Leroy v. Great Western United Corp., 443 U.S. 173, 99 S.Ct. 2710, 61 L.Ed.2d 464 (1979). The specific holding of Leroy was that Great Western, a Texas corporation, which had attempted to take over an Idaho corporation, could not bring suit in Texas against Idaho officials who sought to enforce a state anti-takeover law. Although the effect of the Idaho officials’ action might be felt in Texas, the Court rejected this factor as a basis for venue, since it would allow the Idaho officials to be sued anywhere a shareholder of the target corporation could allege that he wanted to accept Great Western’s tender offer. * * * The Court made several further observations: (1) the purpose of the 1966 statute was to close venue gaps and should not be read more broadly than necessary to close those gaps * * *; (2) the general purpose of the venue statute was to protect defendants against an unfair or inconvenient trial location * * *; (3) location of evidence and witnesses was a relevant factor * * *; (4) familiarity of the Idaho federal judges with the Idaho anti-takeover statute was a relevant factor * * *; (5) plaintiff’s convenience was not a relevant factor * * *; and (6) in only rare cases should there be more than one district in which a claim can be said to arise * * *.

Subsequent to Leroy and prior to the 1990 amendment to section 1391(b), most courts have applied at least a form of the “weight of contacts” test * * *. Courts continued to have difficulty in determining whether more than one district could be proper. * * *

Against this background, we understand Congress’ 1990 amendment to be at most a marginal expansion of the venue provision. The House Report indicates that the new language was first proposed by the American Law Institute in a 1969 Study, and observes:

The great advantage of referring to the place where things happened . . . is that it avoids the litigation breeding phrase “in which the claim arose.” It also avoids the problem created by the frequent cases in which substantial parts of the underlying events have occurred in several districts.

H.R.Rep. No. 734, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. 23, reprinted in 1990 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6860, 6869. Thus it seems clear that Leroy’s strong admonition against recognizing multiple venues has been disapproved. Many of the factors in Leroy—for instance, the convenience of defendants and the location of evidence and witnesses—are most useful in distinguishing between two or more plausible venues. Since the new statute does not, as a general matter, require the District Court to determine the best venue, these factors will be of less significance. * * * Apart from this point, however, Leroy and other precedents remain important sources of guidance. * * *

2.Fair Debt Collection Practices Act

Under the version of the venue statute in force from 1966 to 1990, at least three District Courts held that venue was proper under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act in the plaintiff’s home district if a collection agency had mailed a collection notice to an address in that district or placed a phone call to a number in that district. * * * None of these cases involved the unusual fact, present in this case, that the defendant did not deliberately direct a communication to the plaintiff’s district.

We conclude, however, that this difference is inconsequential, at least under the current venue statute. The statutory standard for venue focuses not on whether a defendant has made a deliberate contact—a factor relevant in the analysis of personal jurisdiction—but on the location where events occurred. Under the new version of section 1391(b)(2), we must determine only whether a “substantial part of the events * * * giving rise to the claim” occurred in the Western District of New York.

In adopting this statute, Congress was concerned about the harmful effect of abusive debt practices on consumers. See 15 U.S.C. § 1692(a) (“Abusive debt collection practices contribute to the number of personal bankruptcies, to marital instability, to the loss of jobs, and to invasions of individual privacy.”). This harm does not occur until receipt of the collection notice. Indeed, if the notice were lost in the mail, it is unlikely that a violation of the Act would have occurred. Moreover, a debt collection agency sends its dunning letters so that they will be received. Forwarding such letters to the district to which a debtor has moved is an important step in the collection process. If the bill collector prefers not to be challenged for its collection practices outside the district of a debtor’s original residence, the envelope can be marked “do not forward.” We conclude that receipt of a collection notice is a substantial part of the events giving rise to a claim under the * * * Act.

The relevant factors identified in Leroy add support to our conclusion. Although “bona fide error” can be a defense to liability under the Act, * * * the alleged violations of the Act turn largely not on the collection agency’s intent, but on the content of the collection notice. The most relevant evidence—the collection notice—is located in the Western District of New York. Because the collection agency appears not to have marked the notice with instructions not to forward, and has not objected to the assertion of personal jurisdiction, trial in the Western District * * * would not be unfair.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Federal venue rules underwent significant revision in 1990, followed by additional reforms in 1992 and 1995, and then again pursuant to the Jurisdiction and Venue Clarification Act of 2011. Does the current version of 28 U.S.C. §§ 1390 & 1391 limit venue to a single geographic location or does it embrace the Bates view that there can be multiple venues for civil actions within its scope?

Unlike earlier versions of the federal venue statute, Section 1391(b) sets a unitary venue rule for diversity and federal question cases. Venue in both categories generally may be based on two criteria: defendant’s residence, if all defendants reside in the same state, and the location of the events giving rise to the claim or of a substantial part of the property that is the subject of the action. What is the default rule if no district meets the requirements of 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(1) or (2)? Why do you think Congress closed the “venue gap,” as discussed in Bates?

2. Test your knowledge of the statute by identifying the provision that applies in the following situations:

- (a) Determining the residence of a defendant-company that is incorporated in Delaware and has a principal place of business in Wilmington, Delaware.
- (b) Determining the residence of a defendant-partnership that has its main office in Brooklyn, New York and members in every one of the 50 states.
- (c) Determining the residence of a defendant-company that is incorporated in England and does business in Chicago, Illinois, in San Diego, California, and in Burlington, Vermont.

408

- (d) Determining the residence of a plaintiff-company that is incorporated in South Dakota and has a principal place of business in Atlanta, Georgia.
- (e) Determining the residence of a plaintiff-fraternal organization that has its main office in San Diego, California.
- (f) Determining the residence of a defendant-corporation that is incorporated in a state that has more than one judicial district.
- (g) Determining the residence of a natural person who is not a citizen but resides in the United States.
- (h) Determining the residence of a natural person who is a citizen but resides outside the United States.

3. How should substantiality be determined under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(2)? What approach did the Bates court take? Under the pre-2011 version of the federal venue statute, some circuits considered only defendant’s activities while others took a “holistic approach” that examined the activities of all of the parties and the nexus between intra-district activities and the claim. See Daniel v. American Bd. of Emergency Med., 428 F.3d 408 (2d Cir. 2005) (describing different approaches among the circuits). Does a defendant-only approach better promote the policy of protecting a defendant against an inconvenient or unfair place of trial? Does it run the risk of conflating the statutory test for venue with the constitutional test for personal jurisdiction? Does it take account of the judicial system’s own interest in promoting administrative convenience?

4. In LIVINGSTON v. JEFFERSON, 15 F. Cas. 660 (C.C.D.Va. 1811), the Circuit Court held that the local action doctrine applies in federal court. Chief Justice Marshall, sitting as Circuit Court Justice for Virginia, stated: “[A]ctions are deemed transitory where transactions on which they are founded, might have taken place anywhere, but are local where their cause is in its nature necessarily local.” Id. at 664. See Degnan, Livingston v. Jefferson—A Freestanding Footnote, 75 Calif.L.Rev. 115 (1987). In Ellenwood v. Marietta Chair Co., 158 U.S. 105, 15 S.Ct. 771, 239 L.Ed. 913 (1895), the Court treated the local action doctrine as a limitation on the federal court’s subject-matter jurisdiction. Does the federal venue statute continue to recognize a distinction between local and transitory actions? See 28 U.S.C. § 1391(a)(2). To what extent does the location of property affect the venue determination? See 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(2). Does the current statute suggest that the rule, at least now, is one of venue and not of subject-matter jurisdiction? Not all courts agree with that conclusion. See Eldee-K Rental Properties, LLC v. DirecTV Inc., 748 F.3d 943 (9th Cir. 2014).

5. In a lawsuit with multiple parties or multiple claims, does the federal court have discretion to apply a doctrine of “pendent venue”? Under this doctrine, venue would “be proper so long as otherwise improperly venued claims are joined with a properly-venued claim and all arise out of a common nucleus of operative fact.” Steinman, Claims, Civil Actions, Congress & the Court: Limiting the Reasoning of Cases Construing Poorly Drawn Statutes, 65 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 1593, 1665–66 (2008). Should the same considerations of party convenience and judicial efficiency that inform supplemental jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367 apply to “pendent venue”? See Corn, Pendent Venue: A Doctrine in Search of a Theory, 68 U.Chi.L.Rev. 931 (2001).

409

6. Some federal statutes contain special venue rules for actions within their compass. For example, the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (the statute at issue in Bates) provides that in an action by a debt collector on a debt not involving an interest in real property, venue is limited to either the district in which the consumer signed the contract giving rise to the debt or the district in which the consumer resides at the commencement of the action. See 15 U.S.C. § 1692i(a)(2). How does that special venue provision compare to the options a consumer has—given the Second Circuit’s reasoning in Bates—when suing for violations of the Act?

Another example of a special venue rule may be found in 42 U.S.C. § 2005e–5(f)(3), which defines the venue for an action under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Such actions may be brought:

[I]n any judicial district in the State in which the unlawful employment practice is alleged to have been committed, in the judicial district in which the employment records relevant to such practice are maintained and administered, or in the judicial district in which the aggrieved person would have worked but for the alleged unlawful employment practice, but if the respondent is not found within any such district, such an action may be brought within the judicial district in which the respondent has his principal office.

See James v. Verizon Services Corp., 639 F.Supp.2d 9, 12 (D.D.C. 2009). Does the general venue statute remain available to plaintiffs who bring suit under federal statutes with special venue rules? The Supreme Court has drawn a distinction that depends on whether the special venue rule is designed to be permissive or mandatory, restrictive or liberal. See Cortez Byrd Chips, Inc. v. Bill Harbert Construction Co., 529 U.S. 193, 204, 120 S.Ct. 1331, 1339, 146 L.Ed.2d 171, 181 (2000).

7.In TC HEARTLAND LLC v. KRAFT FOOD GROUP BRANDS LLC, 581 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 1514, 197 L.Ed.2d 816 (2017), the Supreme Court held that the general venue statute’s definition of residence did not apply to the special venue statute governing patent infringement cases. 28 U.S.C. § 1400. Rather, for purposes of the patent venue statute, a domestic corporation resides only in its state of incorporation or “where the defendant has committed acts of infringement and has a regular and established place of business.” The Court did not offer guidance regarding the latter basis for patent venue, but lower courts have interpreted it to require—among other things—a “physical place in the district” and the “regular, physical presence of an employee or other agent of the defendant.” In re Google LLC, 949 F.3d 1338, 1344 (Fed. Cir. 2020). Prior to TC Heartland, a patent owner could bring an infringement action in almost any district where defendant’s products were sold, and empirical studies showed that almost half of all patent suits in the period January 2014 through June 2016 were filed in only two federal districts. See Bone, Forum Shopping and Patent Law—A Comment on TC Heartland, 96 Tex.L.Rev. 141 (2017).

410

B. TRANSFER OF VENUE IN FEDERAL COURTS

Read 28 U.S.C. §§ 1404, 1406, 1407, and 1631 in the Supplement.

HOFFMAN V. BLASKI

Supreme Court of the United States, 1960.
363 U.S. 335, 80 S.Ct. 1084, 4 L.Ed.2d 1254.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

JUSTICE WHITTAKER delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

The instant cases present the question whether a District Court, in which a civil action has been properly brought, is empowered by § 1404(a) to transfer the action, on the motion of the defendant, to a district in which the plaintiff did not have a right to bring it.

Respondents, Blaski and others, residents of Illinois, brought this patent infringement action in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas against one Howell and a Texas corporation controlled by him, alleging that the defendants are residents of, and maintain their only place of business in, the City of Dallas, in the Northern District of Texas, where they are infringing respondents’ patents. After being served with process and filing their answer, the defendants moved, under § 1404(a), to transfer the action to the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois. Respondents objected to the transfer on the ground that, inasmuch as the defendants did not reside, maintain a place of business, or infringe the patents in, and could not have been served with process in, the Illinois district, the courts of that district lacked venue over the action and ability to command jurisdiction over the defendants; that therefore that district was not a forum in which the respondents had a right to bring the action, and, hence, the court was without power to transfer it to that district. Without mentioning that objection or the question it raised, the District Court found that “the motion should be granted for the convenience of the parties and witnesses in the interest of justice,” and ordered the case transferred to the Illinois district. Thereupon, respondents moved in the Fifth Circuit for leave to file a petition for a writ of mandamus directing the vacation of that order. That court, holding that “[t]he purposes for which § 1404(a) was enacted would be unduly circumscribed if a transfer could not be made ‘in the interest of justice’ to a district where the defendants not only waive venue but to which they seek the transfer,” denied the motion. * * *

411

Upon receipt of a certified copy of the pleadings and record, the Illinois District Court assigned the action to Judge Hoffman’s calendar. Respondents promptly moved for an order remanding the action on the ground that the Texas District Court did not have power to make the transfer order and, hence, the Illinois District Court was not thereby vested with jurisdiction of the action. After expressing his view that the “weight of reason and logic” favored “retransfer of this case to Texas,” Judge Hoffman, with misgivings, denied the motion. Respondents then filed in the Seventh Circuit a petition for a writ of mandamus directing Judge Hoffman to reverse his order. After hearing and rehearing, the Seventh Circuit, holding that “[w]hen Congress provided [in § 1404(a)] for transfer [of a civil action] to a district ‘where it might have been brought,’ it is hardly open to doubt but that it referred to a district where the plaintiff * * * had a right to bring the case,” and that respondents did not have a right to bring this action in the Illinois district, granted the writ, one judge dissenting. * * *

Petitioners’ “thesis” and sole claim is that § 1404(a), being remedial, * * * should be broadly construed, and, when so construed, the phrase “where it might have been brought” should be held to relate not only to the time of the bringing of the action but also to the time of the transfer; and that “if at such time the transferee forum has the power to adjudicate the issues of the action, it is a forum in which the action might then have been brought.” (Emphasis added.) They argue that in the interim between the bringing of the action and the filing of a motion to transfer it, the defendants may move their residence to, or, if corporations, may begin the transaction of business in, some other district, and, if such is done, the phrase “where it might have been brought” should be construed to empower the District Court to transfer the action, on motion of the defendants, to such other district; and that, similarly, if, as here, the defendants move to transfer the action to some other district and consent to submit to the jurisdiction of such other district, the latter district should be held one “in which the action might then have been brought.” (Emphasis added.)

We do not agree. * * *

It is not to be doubted that the transferee courts, like every District Court, had jurisdiction to entertain actions of the character involved, but it is obvious that they did not acquire jurisdiction over these particular actions when they were brought in the transferor courts. The transferee courts could have acquired jurisdiction over these actions only if properly brought in those courts, or if validly transferred thereto under § 1404(a). Of course, venue, like jurisdiction over the person, may be waived. A defendant, properly served with process by a court having subject matter jurisdiction, waives venue by failing seasonably to assert it, or even simply by making default. * * * But the power of a District Court under § 1404(a) to transfer an action to another district is made to depend not upon the wish or waiver of the defendant but, rather, upon whether the transferee district was one in which the action “might have been brought” by the plaintiff.

412

The thesis urged by petitioners would not only do violence to the plain words of § 1404(a), but would also inject gross discrimination. That thesis, if adopted, would empower a District Court, upon a finding of convenience, to transfer an action to any district desired by the defendants and in which they were willing to waive their statutory defenses as to venue and jurisdiction over their persons, regardless of the fact that such transferee district was not one in which the action “might have been brought” by the plaintiff. Conversely, that thesis would not permit the court, upon motion of the plaintiffs and a like showing of convenience, to transfer the action to the same district, without the consent and waiver of venue and personal jurisdiction defenses by the defendants. Nothing in § 1404(a), or in its legislative history, suggests such a unilateral objective and we should not, under the guise of interpretation, ascribe to Congress any such discriminatory purpose.

* * *

Affirmed.

[A concurring opinion by JUSTICE STEWART has been omitted.]

JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, whom JUSTICE HARLAN and JUSTICE BRENNAN join, dissenting.

* * *

The part of § 1404(a) the meaning of which is at issue here is its last phrase * * *. The significance of this phrase is this: even though a place be found to be an overwhelmingly more appropriate forum from the standpoint of “convenience” and “justice,” the litigation may not be sent to go forward there unless it is a place where the action “might have been brought.” Upon the scope to be given this phrase thus depends almost entirely the effectiveness of § 1404(a) to insure an appropriate place of trial, when the action is begun in an oppressive forum.

One would have to be singularly unmindful of the treachery and versatility of our language to deny that as a mere matter of English the words “where it might have been brought” may carry more than one meaning. * * * On the face of its words alone, the phrase may refer to * * * venue, amenability to service, or period of limitations, to all of them or to none of them, or to others as well. * * *

413

Surely, the Court creates its own verbal prison in holding that “the plain words” of § 1404(a) dictate that transfer may not be made in this case although transfer concededly was in the interest of “convenience” and “justice.” Moreover, the Court, while finding the statutory words “plain,” decides the case by applying, not the statutory language, but a formula of words found nowhere in the statute, namely, whether plaintiffs had “a right to bring these actions in the respective transferee districts.” This is the Court’s language, not that of Congress. * * * There can be expected to be very few, if any, alternative forums in a given case where the plaintiff has a “right” to sue, considering that that means places of unobjectionable venue where the defendant is amenable to service of process and where there are no other impediments such as a statute of limitations which the defendant can rely on to defeat the action.

* * * At the crux of the business, as I see it, is the realization that we are concerned here not with a question of a limitation upon the power of a federal court but with the place in which that court may exercise its power. We are dealing, that is, not with the jurisdiction of the federal courts, which is beyond the power of litigants to confer, but with the locality of a lawsuit, the rules regulating which are designed mainly for the convenience of the litigants. * * *

[W]hat are the competing considerations here? The transferee court in this case plainly had and has jurisdiction to adjudicate this action with the defendant’s acquiescence. As the defendant, whose privilege it is to object to the place of trial, has moved for transfer, and has acquiesced to going forward with the litigation in the transferee court, it would appear presumptively, unless there are strong considerations otherwise, that there is no impediment to effecting the transfer so long as “convenience” and “justice” dictate that it be made. It does not counsel otherwise that here the plaintiff is to be sent to a venue to which he objects, whereas ordinarily, when the defendant waives his privilege to object to the place of trial, it is to acquiesce in the plaintiff’s choice of forum. This would be a powerful argument if, under § 1404(a), a transfer were to be made whenever requested by the defendant. Such is not the case, and this bears emphasis. A transfer can be made under § 1404(a) to a place where the action “might have been brought” only when “convenience” and “justice” so dictate, not whenever the defendant so moves. A legitimate objection by the plaintiff to proceeding in the transferee forum will presumably be reflected in a decision that the interest of justice does not require the transfer, and so it becomes irrelevant that the proposed place of transfer is deemed one where the action “might have been brought.” * * *

414

On the other hand, the Court’s view restricts transfer, when concededly warranted in the interest of justice, to protect no legitimate interest on the part of the plaintiff. And by making transfer turn on whether the defendant could have been served with process in the transferee district on the day the action was brought, the Court’s view may create difficult problems in ascertaining that fact, especially in the case of non-corporate defendants. These are problems which have no conceivable relation to the proper administration of a provision meant to assure the most convenient and just place for trial.

* * *

The relevant legislative history of § 1404(a) is found in the statement in the Reviser’s Notes, accompanying the 1948 Judicial Code, that § 1404(a) “was drafted in accordance with the doctrine of forum non conveniens.” Under that doctrine, the remedy for an inconvenient forum was not to transfer the action, but to dismiss it. In Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert * * * [p. 420, infra] we held that “[i]n all cases in which the doctrine of forum non conveniens comes into play, it presupposes at least two forums in which the defendant is amenable to process; the doctrine furnishes criteria for choice between them.” It is entirely “in accordance” with this view of the doctrine of forum non conveniens to hold that transfer may be made at the instance of the defendant regardless of the plaintiff’s right as an original matter to sue him in the transferee court, so long as the defendant stipulates to going forward with the litigation there. Indeed, to hold otherwise as the Court does is to limit § 1404(a) to a much narrower operation than the nonstatutory doctrine of forum non conveniens. * * *

The only consideration of the Court not resting on the “plain meaning” of § 1404(a) is that it would constitute “gross discrimination” to permit transfer to be made with the defendant’s consent and over the plaintiff’s objection to a district to which the plaintiff could not similarly obtain transfer over the defendant’s objection. * * * Transfer cannot be made under this statute unless it is found to be in the interest of “convenience” and in the interest of “justice.” Whether a party is in any sense being “discriminated” against through a transfer is certainly relevant to whether the interest of justice is being served. If the interest of justice is being served, as it must be for a transfer to be made, how can it be said that there is “discrimination” in any meaningful sense? Moreover, the transfer provision cannot be viewed in isolation in finding “discrimination.” It, after all, operates to temper only to a slight degree the enormous “discrimination” inherent in our system of litigation, whereby the sole choice of forum, from among those where service is possible and venue unobjectionable, is placed with the plaintiff. * * *

415

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Congress amended 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), effective 2012. Does the amended statute abrogate Hoffman v. Blaski?
2. Is a district court limited in its transfer analysis to the specified factors of party and witness convenience, or is the “interest of justice” factor a separate consideration that embraces a range of private and public interests? The Supreme Court noted in VAN DUSEN v. BARRACK, 376 U.S. 612, 84 S.Ct. 805, 11 L.Ed.2d 945 (1964), that the legislative history of Section 1404(a) treated the “interest of justice” as a separate consideration: “The new subsection requires the court to determine that the transfer is necessary for convenience of the parties and witnesses, and further, that it is in the interest of justice to do so.” Id. at 634 n.30, 84 S.Ct. at 818 n.30, 11 L.Ed.2d at 960 n.30 (quoting Revision of Title 28, United States Code, Report of the House Committee on Revision of the Laws on H.R. 7124, 79th Cong., 2d sess., p. A127).
- Those courts that treat the “interest of justice” as a separate consideration tend to look at such factors as: (1) access to witnesses; (2) access to the forum; (3) docket congestion; (4) speed to trial; (5) relationship of the community to the dispute; (6) the court’s familiarity with the governing law; (7) plaintiff’s forum choice; (8) whether the original forum is where plaintiff resides; and (9) the existence of a presuit venue agreement. See Steinberg, The Motion To Transfer and the Interests of Justice, 66 Notre Dame L.Rev. 443 (1990). As the Seventh Circuit has explained, “The ‘interest of justice’ is a separate element of the transfer analysis that relates to the efficient administration of the court system.” See Research Automation, Inc. v. Schrader-Bridgeport Intern., Inc., 626 F.3d 973, 978 (7th Cir. 2010). See also p. 439, Note 4, infra (discussing the use of various private and public interest factors in connection with both Section 1404(a) and forum non conveniens motions).
3. In VAN DUSEN v. BARRACK, Note 2, above, the Supreme Court held that, in diversity cases, the law of the transferor forum applies even after defendant has transferred the action under 28 U.S.C. § 1404. “[W]here the defendants seek transfer,” the Court explained, “the transferee district court must be obligated to apply the state law that would have been applied if there had been no change of venue.” Id. at 639, 84 S.Ct. at 821, 11 L.Ed.2d at 962. The Court concluded, “[a] change of venue under § 1404(a) generally should be, with respect to state law, but a change of courtrooms.” Id. at 639, 84 S.Ct. at 821, 11 L.Ed.2d at 962–63.

In FERENS v. JOHN DEERE CO., 494 U.S. 516, 110 S.Ct. 1274, 108 L.Ed.2d 443 (1990), the Court applied the Van Dusen rule to a plaintiff-initiated transfer. In Ferens, plaintiff, a citizen of Pennsylvania, lost a hand when he accidentally caught it in a harvester manufactured by defendant, a Delaware corporation. Plaintiff failed to file suit within Pennsylvania’s two-year tort limitations period. But, in the third year, plaintiff filed one suit in federal court in Pennsylvania, raising contract and warranty claims that were not yet time-barred, and a second suit in federal court in Mississippi, alleging tort claims. Mississippi had a six-year tort statute of limitations, which the federal court was required to apply. The federal court in Mississippi then granted plaintiff’s motion to transfer the tort action to the Pennsylvania court under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). The Pennsylvania court refused to apply Mississippi’s statute of limitations and dismissed the tort claims as time-barred under Pennsylvania’s statute of limitations, and the court of appeals affirmed. Relying on Van Dusen, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that, in a diversity suit, the transferee forum is required to apply the law of the transferor court, including its choice-of-law rule, regardless of who initiates the transfer. Is this a sound result? See Bassett, The Forum Game, 84 N.C.L.Rev. 333, 352–70 (2006).

4.Of what relevance is the Van Dusen rule when the district court transfers an action within its federal question jurisdiction? See Marcus, Conflict Among Circuits and Transfers Within the Federal Judicial System, 93 Yale L.J. 677, 721 (1984). The circuits currently are divided on this question. Because federal law is assumed to be unitary, some circuits have held that the transferee court should exercise its own judgment when determining the requirements of federal law and not be bound by the law of the transferor court. E.g., Lanfear v. Home Depot, Inc., 536 F.3d 1217, 1223–24 (11th Cir. 2008). Other circuits have recognized a narrow role for Van Dusen in specific statutory contexts that, because of “unique language and purpose,” contemplate “circuit disharmony.” Olcott v. Delaware Flood Co., 76 F.3d 1538, 1546–47 (10th Cir. 1996).

Does your analysis change if a federal statute mandates the borrowing of a state statute of limitations? The Ninth Circuit, addressing this question as a matter of first impression, held that under this circumstance a transferee court must apply the state statute of limitations that the transferor court would have applied had the case not been transferred. See Hooper v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 688 F.3d 1037, 1046 (9th Cir. 2012). What are the arguments against taking this approach?

5.An empirical study found that plaintiffs won in 58 percent of nontransferred cases that went to judgment, but only in 29 percent of cases that were transferred. See Clermont & Eisenberg, Exorcising the Evil of Forum-Shopping, 80 Cornell L.Rev. 1507, 1515 (1995). The authors concluded that the reduced win-rate can be explained by “a possibly less favorable set of local biases” and the “shifted balance of inconveniences,” and not differences in the merits. Controlling for all variables, a later study found that the odds of a plaintiff prevailing went down from 50 to 40 percent in a transferred action. See Clermont, Litigation Realities Redux, 84 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1919, 1928 (2009).

6.When is a district court permitted to transfer under 28 U.S.C. § 1406(a), rather than under Section 1404(a)? When a case is transferred under Section 1406, the transferee court will treat the action as if it had been filed initially in that forum. Would it be appropriate to apply the Van Dusen rule, see p. 415, Note 3, supra, to a case transferred under Section 1406? Do you agree that a party should benefit from the law that would have been applied in the original federal forum only if that court were “a proper one to begin with”? Manley v. Engram, 755 F.2d 1463, 1470 (11th Cir. 1985). See 14D Wright, Miller & Freer, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3827 (4th ed.) (“[W]henver the original venue is improper, so that transfer is under Section 1406(a), the transferee court should apply whatever law it would have applied had the action been properly commenced there.”).

7.In GOLDLAWR, INC. v. HEIMAN, 369 U.S. 463, 82 S.Ct. 913, 8 L.Ed.2d 39 (1962), the Supreme Court held that 28 U.S.C. § 1406 authorizes the transfer of an action even if the transferor court lacks personal jurisdiction. In 1982, Congress enacted 28 U.S.C. § 1631, permitting transfer of an action between any two federal courts when the original court lacks jurisdiction. Section 1631 does not specify whether “jurisdiction” in this context means subject-matter jurisdiction, personal jurisdiction, or both. See Franco v. Mabe Trucking Co., 3 F.4th 788, 792–96 & n.5 (5th Cir. 2021) (describing what various courts have said about this issue and deciding that “the weight of circuit authority” has found that “the use of the term ‘jurisdiction’ in § 1631 encompasses both subject-matter and personal jurisdiction.”). In some cases, courts have permitted transfer for a lack of venue under Section 1631. The better view is that venue is not a jurisdictional concept and so transfer should be limited to Section 1406. See Sorcía v. Holder, 643 F.3d 117, 122 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 556 U.S. 1061, 132 S.Ct. 776, 181 L.Ed.2d 487 (2011).

8.In cases where venue is improper or personal jurisdiction is lacking in plaintiff’s initially chosen district, it is “within the sound discretion of the district court” whether to dismiss or transfer the case. Twin Flames Universe.com, Inc. v. Cole, 528 F.Supp.3d 708, 718 (E.D.Mich. 2021). “Unless evidence exists that the case was brought in the improper venue in bad faith or to harass the defendant, the interest of justice generally requires a transfer rather than a dismissal.” Id. Courts have also observed that “the reasons for transferring a case to a proper forum rather than dismissing are especially compelling if the statute of limitations has run since the commencement of the action, so that dismissal might prevent the institution of a new suit by the plaintiff and a resolution on the merits.” Jackson v. L & F Martin Landscape, 421 F. App’x 482, 484 (6th Cir. 2009). But compare McFarlane v. Esquire Mag., 74 F.3d 1296, 1301 (D.C.Cir. 1996) (affirming the district court’s dismissal notwithstanding the expiration of the statute of limitations when defendant’s answer put plaintiff on notice of his defense of lack of personal jurisdiction and plaintiff “failed to file a protective suit in [the proper forum]”).

NOTE ON THE PANEL ON MULTIDISTRICT LITIGATION (MDL)

In 1968 Congress enacted the Multidistrict Litigation Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1407. See generally Bradt, “A Radical Proposal”: The Multidistrict

Litigation Act of 1968, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 831 (2017). It created a special venue procedure that authorizes the temporary transfer of related cases to one district when the cases involve common questions of fact and law and transfer would be for the convenience of the parties and witnesses and “will promote the just and efficient conduct of such actions.” The statute established the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation (“JPML”), composed of seven judges from the federal district courts and courts of appeals who are appointed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. The JPML decides whether cases should be transferred under the statute, which authorizes consolidation for pretrial purposes only. Since its enactment, the MDL statute has been used very frequently for coordinated discovery in cases involving environmental disaster, employment, trademark, mass tort, consumer, and other high stakes matters. See Gluck & Burch, MDL Revolution, 96 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1 (2021); Miller, What Are Courts For? Have We Forsaken the Procedural Gold Standard?, 78 La.L.Rev. 739, 741–48 (2018); Sherman, The BP Oil Spill Litigation and the Evolving Supervision of Multidistrict Judges, 30 Miss.College L.Rev. 237 (2011).

418

In LEXECON INC. v. MILBERG WEISS BERSHAD HYNES & LERACH, 523 U.S. 26, 118 S.Ct. 956, 140 L.Ed.2d 62 (1998), the Supreme Court held that 28 U.S.C. § 1407 imposes a duty on the JPML to remand a transferred action to its original court for trial, and that a district court conducting such pretrial proceedings lacks authority to invoke 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) “to assign a transferred case to itself for trial.” Id. at 28, 118 S.Ct. at 959, 140 L.Ed.2d at 68. In so holding, the Court rejected a 30-year practice of self-assignment by the district courts that the JPML had sanctioned through its rulemaking authority. The Court declined to answer whether Section 1404(a) “permits self-transfer” by the transferee court “given that the statute explicitly provides for transfer only ‘to any other district.’ ” Id. at 41 n.4, 118 S.Ct. at 964 n.4, 140 L.Ed.2d at 76 n.4.

The Judicial Conference of the United States has requested that the mandatory remand provision be eliminated from 28 U.S.C. § 1407, but Congress has not yet done so. See Marcus, Cure-All For an Era of Dispersed Litigation? Toward a Maximalist Use of the Multidistrict Litigation Panel’s Transfer Power, 82 Tul.L.Rev. 2245 (2008). Because the procedure for multidistrict transfer is a rule of venue, may the parties waive the provision for mandatory remand? See Armstrong v. LaSalle Bank Nat. Ass’n, 552 F.3d 613 (7th Cir. 2009). As a matter of first impression, the Fifth Circuit held that waiver is permissible, but must be “clear and unambiguous.” In re Depuy Orthopaedics, Inc., 870 F.3d 345, 357 (5th Cir. 2017).

Until Lexecon, the majority of courts applied the law of the transferee circuit to questions of federal law in cases transferred under 28 U.S.C. § 1407. In doing so, the courts were influenced by the decision authored by then-Judge Ruth Bader Ginsburg in In re Korean Air Lines Disaster of Sept. 1, 1983, 829 F.2d 1171, 1174 (D.C.Cir. 1987), affirmed on other grounds sub nom. Chan v. Korean Air Lines, Ltd., 490 U.S. 122, 109 S.Ct. 1676, 104 L.Ed.2d 113 (1989). Her opinion stressed that applying “divergent interpretations” of federal law “would surely reduce the efficiencies achievable through consolidated preparatory proceedings”; moreover, the parties could seek review by the Supreme Court if interpretations by lower courts diverged. Id. at 1175–76. In a concurrence, Judge Douglas H. Ginsburg emphasized the practical problems of resolving the choice-of-law question under the existing language of 28 U.S.C. § 1407, which is silent on whether the transferee court is to apply the law of the transferor court. In particular, he observed that “Congress contemplated that transferred cases might never return to the transferor courts,” and that the majority of transferred cases do not return to the transferor courts. Id. at 1178. Does Lexecon undermine the rationale of applying the law of the transferee court? In a number of unpublished decisions, lower courts have been considering this question, but so far have concluded that they are compelled to follow existing circuit law and to apply the law of the transferee court until either Congress amends the statute or the Supreme Court announces a different rule. See, e.g., In re General Motors LLC Ignition Switch Litigation, 2016 WL 3920353 (S.D.N.Y.2016).

419

In IN RE MF GLOBAL HOLDINGS LTD. INVESTMENT LITIGATION, 857 F.Supp.2d 1378, 1380–81 (Jud.Pan.Mult.Lit. 2012), defendants in three actions and 12 “tag-along” actions pending in four districts moved for consolidation. The actions all followed in the wake of a holding company’s filing for bankruptcy after announcing a shortfall of an estimated $1.6 billion in commodities futures customer accounts. The JPML held that transfer was appropriate even though the various actions involved multiple claims based on different legal theories:

Plaintiffs opposing centralization of all actions together argue that claims under securities laws are separate and distinct from customer claims brought pursuant to the Commodities Exchange Act, 7 U.S.C. § 1, et seq. and related claims. They argue, inter alia, that centralization of both types of claims will be inefficient and inevitably slow the progress of the customer actions. We are not persuaded that the differences between these two types of claims weigh against centralizing all actions in a single proceeding. This is primarily because all actions arise from the common factual backdrop of the demise of MF Global Holdings, Ltd., and related entities and the reported shortfall in MF Global, Inc., commodities futures customer accounts. * * * [O]ur longstanding practice has been to leave the degree of coordination or consolidation of the different actions to the sound discretion of the transferee judge.* * * We see no reason to depart from this practice in these circumstances.

Why do you suppose some plaintiffs opposed the transfer? For some parties, won’t transfer potentially increase administrative costs, decrease attorney control, reduce attorney’s fees, and deflate settlement prospects? Did the JPML seriously consider these disparate effects? See Burch, Financiers as Monitors in Aggregate Litigation, 87 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1273, 1288–91 (2012).

The pretrial use of multidistrict litigation has increased significantly over the last decade, coinciding with a decline in the certification of national class actions that otherwise would have afforded a centralized treatment of claims by large numbers of parties. See Bradt, Something Less and Something More: MDL’s Roots as a Class Action Alternative, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1711 (2017). Some scholars have questioned whether MDL procedure produces optimal results and whether it favors certain litigants. See Burch & Williams, Repeat Players in Multidistrict Litigation: The Social Network, 102 Cornell L.Rev. 1445 (2017). The use of multidistrict litigation as an aggregation device is discussed in Chapter 9, infra.

420

C. FORUM NON CONVENIENS

GULF OIL CORP. v. GILBERT, 330 U.S. 501, 67 S.Ct. 839, 91 L.Ed. 1055 (1947), delineated the factors to be considered in deciding a motion based upon the principle of forum non conveniens:

The principle of forum non conveniens is simply that a court may resist imposition upon its jurisdiction even when jurisdiction is authorized by the letter of a general venue statute. These statutes are drawn with a necessary generality and usually give a plaintiff a choice of courts, so that he may be quite sure of some place in which to pursue his remedy. But the open door may admit those who seek not simply justice but perhaps justice blended with some harassment. A plaintiff sometimes is under temptation to resort to a strategy of forcing the trial at a most inconvenient place for an adversary, even at some inconvenience to himself.

Many of the states have met misuse of venue by investing courts with a discretion to change the place of trial on various grounds, such as the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice. The federal law contains no such express criteria to guide the district court in exercising its power. But the problem is a very old one affecting the administration of the courts as well as the rights of litigants, and both in England and in this country the common law worked out techniques and criteria for dealing with it.

* * *

If the combination and weight of factors requisite to given results are difficult to forecast or state, those to be considered are not difficult to name. An interest to be considered, and the one likely to be most pressed, is the private interest of the litigant. Important considerations are the relative ease of access to sources of proof; availability of compulsory process for attendance of unwilling, and the cost of obtaining attendance of willing witnesses; possibility of view of premises, if view would be appropriate to the action; and all other practical problems that make trial of a case easy, expeditious and inexpensive. There may also be questions as to the * * * [enforceability] of a judgment if one is obtained. The court will weigh relative advantages and obstacles to fair trial. It is often said that the plaintiff may not, by choice of an inconvenient forum, “vex,” “harass,” or “oppress” the defendant by inflicting upon him expense or trouble not necessary to his own right to pursue his remedy. But unless the balance is strongly in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff’s choice of forum should rarely be disturbed.

Factors of public interest also have place in applying the doctrine. Administrative difficulties follow for courts when litigation is piled up in congested centers instead of being handled at its origin. Jury duty is a burden that ought not to be imposed upon the people of a community which has no relation to the litigation. In cases which touch the affairs of many persons, there is reason for holding the trial in their view and reach rather than in remote parts of the country where they can learn of it by report only. There is a local interest in having localized controversies decided at home. There is an appropriateness, too, in having the trial of a diversity case in a forum that is at home with the state law that must govern the case, rather than having a court in some other forum untangle problems in conflict of laws, and in law foreign to itself.

Id. at 507–09, 67 S.Ct. at 842–43, 91 L.Ed. at 1062–63.

PIPER AIRCRAFT CO. v. REYNO

Supreme Court of the United States, 1981.
454 U.S. 235, 102 S.Ct. 252, 70 L.Ed.2d 419.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

I

A

In July 1976, a small commercial aircraft crashed in the Scottish highlands during the course of a charter flight from Blackpool to Perth. The pilot and five passengers were killed instantly. The decedents were all Scottish subjects and residents, as are their heirs and next of kin. There were no eyewitnesses to the accident. At the time of the crash the plane was subject to Scottish air traffic control.

The aircraft, a twin-engine Piper Aztec, was manufactured in Pennsylvania by petitioner Piper Aircraft Co. (Piper). The propellers were manufactured in Ohio by petitioner Hartzell Propeller, Inc. (Hartzell). At the time of the crash the aircraft was registered in Great Britain and was owned and maintained by Air Navigation and Trading Co., Ltd. (Air Navigation). It was operated by McDonald Aviation, Ltd. (McDonald), a Scottish air taxi service. Both Air Navigation and McDonald were organized in the United Kingdom. The wreckage of the plane is now in a hangar in Farnborough, England.

The British Department of Trade investigated the accident shortly after it occurred. A preliminary report found that the plane crashed after developing a spin, and suggested that mechanical failure in the plane or the propeller was responsible. At Hartzell's request, this report was reviewed by a three-member Review Board, which held a 9-day adversary hearing attended by all interested parties. The Review Board found no evidence of defective equipment and indicated that pilot error may have contributed to the accident. The pilot, who had obtained his commercial pilot's license only three months earlier, was flying over high ground at an altitude considerably lower than the minimum height required by his company's operations manual.

In July 1977, a California probate court appointed respondent Gaynell Reyno administratrix of the estates of the five passengers. Reyno is not related to and does not know any of the decedents or their survivors; she was a legal secretary to the attorney who filed this lawsuit. Several days after her appointment, Reyno commenced separate wrongful death actions against Piper and Hartzell in the Superior Court of California, claiming negligence and strict liability. Air Navigation, McDonald, and the estate of the pilot are not parties to this litigation. The survivors of the five passengers whose estates are represented by Reyno filed a separate action in the United Kingdom against Air Navigation, McDonald, and the pilot's estate. Reyno candidly admits that the action against Piper and Hartzell was filed in the United States because its laws regarding liability, capacity to sue, and damages are more favorable to her position than are those of Scotland. Scottish law does not recognize strict liability in tort. Moreover, it permits wrongful death actions only when brought by a decedent's relatives. The relatives may sue only for "loss of support and society."

On petitioners' motion, the suit was removed to the United States District Court for the Central District of California. Piper then moved for transfer to the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). Hartzell moved to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, or in the alternative, to transfer.⁵ In December 1977, the District Court quashed service on Hartzell and transferred the case to the Middle District of Pennsylvania. Respondent then properly served process on Hartzell.

B

In May 1978, after the suit had been transferred, both Hartzell and Piper moved to dismiss the action on the ground of forum non conveniens.

The District Court granted these motions in October 1979. It relied on the balancing test set forth by this Court in Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert * * *.

* * * [T]he District Court analyzed the facts of [this case]. It began by observing that an alternative forum existed in Scotland; Piper and Hartzell had agreed to submit to the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts and to waive any statute of limitations defense that might be available. It then stated that plaintiff's choice of forum was entitled to little weight. The court recognized that a plaintiff's choice ordinarily deserves substantial deference. It noted, however, that Reyno "is a representative of foreign citizens and residents seeking a forum in the United States because of the more liberal rules concerning products liability law," and that "the courts have been less solicitous when the plaintiff is not an American citizen or resident, and particularly when the foreign citizens seek to benefit from the more liberal tort rules provided for the protection of citizens and residents of the United States." * * *

The District Court next examined several factors relating to the private interests of the litigants, and determined that these factors strongly pointed towards Scotland as the appropriate forum. Although evidence concerning the design, manufacture, and testing of the plane and propeller is located in the United States, the connections with Scotland are otherwise "overwhelming." * * * The real parties in interest are citizens of Scotland, as were all the decedents. Witnesses who could testify regarding the maintenance of the aircraft, the training of the pilot, and the investigation of the accident—all essential to the defense—are in Great Britain. Moreover, all witnesses to damages are located in Scotland. Trial would be aided by familiarity with Scottish topography, and by easy access to the wreckage.

The District Court reasoned that because crucial witnesses and evidence were beyond the reach of compulsory process, and because the defendants would not be able to implead potential Scottish third-party defendants, it would be "unfair to make Piper and Hartzell proceed to trial in this forum." * * * The survivors had brought separate actions in Scotland against the pilot, McDonald, and Air Navigation. "[I]t would be fairer to all parties and less costly if the entire case was presented to one jury with available testimony from all relevant witnesses." * * * Although the court recognized that if trial were held in the United States, Piper and Hartzell could file indemnity or contribution actions against the Scottish defendants, it believed that there was a significant risk of inconsistent verdicts.

The District Court concluded that the relevant public interests also pointed strongly towards dismissal. The court determined that Pennsylvania law would apply to Piper and Scottish law to Hartzell if the case were tried in the Middle District of Pennsylvania.⁸ As a result, "trial in this forum would be hopelessly complex and confusing for a jury." * * * In addition, the court noted that it was unfamiliar with Scottish law and thus would have to rely upon experts from that country. The court also found that the trial would be enormously costly and time-consuming; that it would be unfair to burden citizens with jury duty when the Middle District of Pennsylvania has little connection with the controversy; and that Scotland has a substantial interest in the outcome of the litigation.

In opposing the motions to dismiss, respondent contended that dismissal would be unfair because Scottish law was less favorable. The District Court explicitly rejected this claim. * * *

C

On appeal, the * * * Third Circuit reversed and remanded for trial. The decision to reverse appears to be based on two alternative grounds. First, the Court held that the District Court abused its discretion in conducting the Gilbert analysis. Second, the Court held that dismissal is never appropriate where the law of the alternative forum is less favorable to the plaintiff.

The Court of Appeals began its review of the District Court’s Gilbert analysis by noting that the plaintiff’s choice of forum deserved substantial weight, even though the real parties in interest are nonresidents. It then rejected the District Court’s balancing of the private interests. It found that Piper and Hartzell had failed adequately to support their claim that key witnesses would be unavailable if trial were held in the United States: they had never specified the witnesses they would call and the testimony these witnesses would provide. The Court of Appeals gave little weight to the fact that Piper and Hartzell would not be able to implead potential Scottish third-party defendants, reasoning that this difficulty would be “burdensome” but not “unfair” * * *. Finally, the court stated that resolution of the suit would not be significantly aided by familiarity with Scottish topography, or by viewing the wreckage.

The Court of Appeals also rejected the District Court’s analysis of the public interest factors. It found that the District Court gave undue emphasis to the application of Scottish law: “the mere fact that the court is called upon to determine and apply foreign law does not present a legal problem of the sort which would justify the dismissal of a case otherwise properly before the court.” * * * In any event, it believed that Scottish law need not be applied. After conducting its own choice-of-law analysis, the Court of Appeals determined that American law would govern the actions against both Piper and Hartzell. The same choice-of-law analysis apparently led it to conclude that Pennsylvania and Ohio, rather than Scotland, are the jurisdictions with the greatest policy interests in the dispute, and that all other public interest factors favored trial in the United States.

In any event, it appears that the Court of Appeals would have reversed even if the District Court had properly balanced the public and private interests. * * * [T]he court decided that dismissal is automatically barred if it would lead to a change in the applicable law unfavorable to the plaintiff.

We granted certiorari * * *.

II

The Court of Appeals erred in holding that plaintiffs may defeat a motion to dismiss on the ground of forum non conveniens merely by showing that the substantive law that would be applied in the alternative forum is less favorable to the plaintiffs than that of the present forum. The possibility of a change in substantive law should ordinarily not be given conclusive or even substantial weight in the forum non conveniens inquiry.

* * *

In fact, if conclusive or substantial weight were given to the possibility of a change in law, the forum non conveniens doctrine would become virtually useless. Jurisdiction and venue requirements are often easily satisfied. As a result, many plaintiffs are able to choose from among several forums. Ordinarily, these plaintiffs will select that forum whose choice-of-law rules are most advantageous. Thus, if the possibility of an unfavorable change in substantive law is given substantial weight in the forum non conveniens inquiry, dismissal would rarely be proper.

* * *

The Court of Appeals’ approach is not only inconsistent with the purpose of the forum non conveniens doctrine, but also poses substantial practical problems. If the possibility of a change in law were given substantial weight, deciding motions to dismiss on the ground of forum non conveniens would become quite difficult. Choice-of-law analysis would become extremely important, and the courts would frequently be required to interpret the law of foreign jurisdictions. First, the trial court would have to determine what law would apply if the case were tried in the chosen forum, and what law would apply if the case were tried in the alternative forum. It would then have to compare the rights, remedies, and procedures available under the law that would be applied in each forum. Dismissal would be appropriate only if the court concluded that the law applied by the alternative forum is as favorable to the plaintiff as that of the chosen forum. The doctrine of forum non conveniens, however, is designed in part to help courts avoid conducting complex exercises in comparative law. As we stated in Gilbert, the public interest factors point towards dismissal where the court would be required to “untangle problems in conflict of laws, and in law foreign to itself.” * * *

Upholding the decision of the Court of Appeals would result in other practical problems. At least where the foreign plaintiff named an American manufacturer as defendant, a court could not dismiss the case on grounds of forum non conveniens where dismissal might lead to an unfavorable change in law. The American courts, which are already extremely attractive to foreign plaintiffs, would become even more attractive. The flow of litigation into the United States would increase and further congest already crowded courts.

* * *

We do not hold that the possibility of an unfavorable change in law should never be a relevant consideration in a forum non conveniens inquiry. Of course, if the remedy provided by the alternative forum is so clearly inadequate or unsatisfactory that it is no remedy at all, the unfavorable change in law may be given substantial weight; the district court may conclude that dismissal would not be in the interests of justice.²² In these cases, however, the remedies that would be provided by the Scottish courts do not fall within this category. Although the relatives of the decedents may not be able to rely on a strict liability theory, and although their potential damages award may be smaller, there is no danger that they will be deprived of any remedy or treated unfairly.

III

The Court of Appeals also erred in rejecting the District Court’s Gilbert analysis. The Court of Appeals stated that more weight should have been given to the plaintiff’s choice of forum, and criticized the District Court’s analysis of the private and public interests. However, the District Court’s decision regarding the deference due plaintiff’s choice of forum was appropriate. Furthermore, we do not believe that the District Court abused its discretion in weighing the private and public interests.

427

A

The District Court acknowledged that there is ordinarily a strong presumption in favor of the plaintiff’s choice of forum, which may be overcome only when the private and public interest factors clearly point towards trial in the alternative forum. It held, however, that the presumption applies with less force when the plaintiff or real parties in interest are foreign.

The District Court’s distinction between resident or citizen plaintiffs and foreign plaintiffs is fully justified. * * * When the home forum has been chosen, it is reasonable to assume that this choice is convenient. When the plaintiff is foreign, however, this assumption is much less reasonable. Because the central purpose of any forum non conveniens inquiry is to ensure that the trial is convenient, a foreign plaintiff’s choice deserves less deference.

B

The forum non conveniens determination is committed to the sound discretion of the trial court. It may be reversed only when there has been a clear abuse of discretion; where the court has considered all relevant public and private interest factors, and where its balancing of these factors is reasonable, its decision deserves substantial deference. * * * Here, the Court of Appeals expressly acknowledged that the standard of review was one of abuse of discretion. In examining the District Court’s analysis of the public and private interests, however, the Court of Appeals seems to have lost sight of this rule, and substituted its own judgment for that of the District Court.

(1)

In analyzing the private interest factors, the District Court stated that the connections with Scotland are “overwhelming.” * * * This characterization may be somewhat exaggerated. Particularly with respect to the question of relative ease of access to sources of proof, the private interests point in both directions. As respondent emphasizes, records concerning the design, manufacture, and testing of the propeller and plane are located in the United States. She would have greater access to sources of proof relevant to her strict liability and negligence theories if trial were held here. However, the District Court did not act unreasonably in concluding that fewer evidentiary problems would be posed if the trial were held in Scotland. A large proportion of the relevant evidence is located in Great Britain.

The Court of Appeals found that the problems of proof could not be given any weight because Piper and Hartzell failed to describe with specificity the evidence they would not be able to obtain if trial were held in the United States. It suggested that defendants seeking forum non conveniens dismissal must submit affidavits identifying the witnesses they would call and the testimony these witnesses would provide if the trial were held in the alternative forum. Such detail is not necessary. Piper and Hartzell have moved for dismissal precisely because many crucial witnesses are located beyond the reach of compulsory process, and thus are difficult to identify or interview. Requiring extensive investigation would defeat the purpose of their motion. Of course, defendants must provide enough information to enable the District Court to balance the parties’ interests. Our examination of the record convinces us that sufficient information was provided here. Both Piper and Hartzell submitted affidavits describing the evidentiary problems they would face if the trial were held in the United States.

428

The District Court correctly concluded that the problems posed by the inability to implead potential third party defendants clearly supported holding the trial in Scotland. Joinder of the pilot’s estate, Air Navigation, and McDonald is crucial to the presentation of petitioners’ defense. If Piper and Hartzell can show that the accident was caused not by a design defect, but rather by the negligence of the pilot, the plane’s owners, or the charter company, they will be relieved of all liability. It is true, of course, that if Hartzell and Piper were found liable after a trial in the United States, they could institute an action for indemnity or contribution against these parties in Scotland. It would be far more convenient, however, to resolve all claims in one trial. The Court of Appeals rejected this argument. Forcing petitioners to rely on actions for indemnity or contributions would be “burdensome” but not “unfair.” * * * Finding that trial in the plaintiff’s chosen forum would be burdensome, however, is sufficient to support dismissal on grounds of forum non conveniens.

(2)

The District Court’s review of the factors relating to the public interest was also reasonable. On the basis of its choice-of-law analysis, it concluded that if the case were tried in the Middle District of Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania law would apply to Piper and Scottish law to Hartzell. It stated that a trial involving two sets of laws would be confusing to the jury. It also noted its own lack of familiarity with Scottish law. Consideration of these problems was clearly appropriate under Gilbert; in that case we explicitly held that the need to apply foreign law pointed towards dismissal. The Court of Appeals found that the District Court’s choice-of-law analysis was incorrect, and that American law would apply to both Hartzell and Piper. Thus, lack of familiarity with foreign law would not be a problem. Even if the Court of Appeals’ conclusion is correct, however, all other public interest factors favored trial in Scotland.

Scotland has a very strong interest in this litigation. The accident occurred in its airspace. All of the decedents were Scottish. Apart from

429

Piper and Hartzell, all potential plaintiffs and defendants are either Scottish or English. As we stated in Gilbert, there is “a local interest in having localized controversies decided at home.” * * * Respondent argues that American citizens have an interest in ensuring that American manufacturers are deterred from producing defective products, and that additional deterrence might be obtained if Piper and Hartzell were tried in the United States, where they could be sued on the basis of both negligence and strict liability. However, the incremental deterrence that would be gained if this trial were held in an American court is likely to be insignificant. The American interest in this accident is simply not sufficient to justify the enormous commitment of judicial time and resources that would inevitably be required if the case were to be tried here.

* * *

Reversed.

[JUSTICE POWELL and JUSTICE O’CONNOR took no part in the decision of this case. JUSTICE WHITE concurred in part and dissented in part. JUSTICE STEVENS with whom JUSTICE BRENNAN joined, dissented. Their dissent argued that remand was appropriate to the Court of Appeals, to determine “whether the District Court correctly decided that Pennsylvania was not a convenient forum in which to litigate a claim against a Pennsylvania company that a plane was defectively designed and manufactured in Pennsylvania.”]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Lord Denning famously said: “As a moth is drawn to the light, so is a litigant drawn to the United States.” Smith Kline & French Labs. Ltd. v. Bloch, [1983] 2 All E.R. 72, 72 (Eng.C.A.1982). On this account, foreign litigants choose to sue in the United States for strategic reasons: the Federal Rules are thought to be pro-plaintiff because they offer access to discovery and the possibility of class relief; litigation can be financed through contingency fees; and tort awards can include compensation for pain and suffering. See Robertson, Transnational Litigation and Institutional Choice, 51 B.C.L.Rev. 1081 (2010). Forum preferences have adapted somewhat given procedural developments abroad and here in the United States. See Bookman, Litigation Isolationism, 67 Stan.L.Rev. 1081, 1109 (2015) (“many nations have begun to recognize higher damages awards, aggregate litigation procedures, and third-party litigation funding”).

2.In ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF IRAN v. PAHLAVI, 62 N.Y.2d 474, 478 N.Y.S.2d 597, 467 N.E.2d 245 (1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1108, 105 S.Ct. 783, 83 L.Ed.2d 778 (1985), the Islamic Republic of Iran sued the former ruler of Iran, Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, and his wife to recover $35 billion dollars in Iranian funds that the couple were alleged to have misappropriated. The Shah and his wife had withdrawn these assets from Iran after a fundamental Islamist revolution deposed the Shah in 1979. Plaintiff served the couple in New York while the Shah was undergoing medical treatment at a New York hospital. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed the lower courts’ dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds even though it appeared no alternative forum was available to plaintiff since the Shah would not return to Iran given the political situation under the Khomeini regime. Requiring proof of an alternative adequate forum, the court explained, “would place an undue burden on New York courts forcing them to accept foreign-based actions unrelated to this State merely because a more appropriate forum is unwilling or unable to accept jurisdiction.” Id. at 481, 478 N.Y.S.2d at 601, 467 N.E.2d at 249. Are the facts of this case sui generis?

430

3.In TUAZON v. R.J. REYNOLDS TOBACCO CO., 433 F.3d 1163 (9th Cir. 2006), plaintiff, a Philippine citizen, filed a federal action in Washington State against a United States tobacco company, alleging defendant’s “participation in a world-wide conspiracy to deny the addictive and harmful effects of smoking.” Id. at 1167. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court’s denial of defendant’s motion to dismiss on forum non conveniens, but rejected plaintiff’s contention that the Philippines judicial system would be inadequate because of corruption, delay, or potential influence by wealthy corporate defendants. Plaintiff’s only evidence on this issue consisted of a State Department Country Report and did not include “a single episode that [plaintiff] directly observed or of which he has personal knowledge” concerning civil litigation. Id. at 1179. Why would personal information be more probative than a State Department report? See id. (“[W]e note that the reports are focused on human rights in the Philippines, and the criminal justice system in particular. * * * [S]uch a general indictment provides insufficient substance to condemn the adequacy of Philippine courts in the face of the expert evidence offered by [defendant].”).

4.The Piper decision indicated that appellate courts must review a district court’s forum non conveniens ruling for abuse of discretion. That deference is not absolute, however. In NANDJOU v. MARRIOTT INTERNATIONAL, INC., 985 F.3d 135 (1st Cir. 2021), the court found that the district court’s “assessment of the private interest factors * * * is clearly wrong.” Id. at 143. The case was a wrongful death action by the estate of a father and child who died in a hotel swimming pool in Canada, and the district court found that Canada was a more appropriate forum. The appellate court concluded that “on this record, we do not agree that there is a supportable basis for saying that the defendants have met their heavy burden to show that concerns about private convenience justify depriving Nandjou of the forum she chose.” Id. at 147. It emphasized “the critically important role that her young children may play at trial as witnesses, as they alone are in a position to testify about the conditions at the pool at the moment of the drownings,” and found that “while the defendants have estimated that twenty-five non-party witnesses reside in Canada, they have not explained why live testimony from all of those witnesses is critical.” Id.

5.Should an international tribunal—such as the International Court of Justice, the World Trade Organization, or the United Nations Compensation Commission—ever be an acceptable alternative forum for purposes of forum non conveniens? In NEMARIAM v. FEDERAL DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF ETHIOPIA, 315 F.3d 390 (D.C.Cir. 2003), cert. denied, 540 U.S. 877, 124 S.Ct. 278, 157 L.Ed.2d 141 (2003), the D.C. Circuit held it was an abuse of discretion to dismiss on grounds of forum non conveniens when the alternative forum was a Claims Commission designed to resolve war-related suits involving Ethiopia and Eritrea. Relief in the Claims Commission was subject to offset by amounts due from one nation to the other. The court found that “it would be peculiar indeed to dismiss * * * [plaintiff’s] claim in the United States District Court—a forum in which * * * she is certain to be awarded full relief if she wins on the merits of her claim—in favor of a forum in which she has no certainty of getting relief for a meritorious claim.” Id. at 395.

6.Some courts have found that a foreign country’s remedies can be adequate even if they require a plaintiff to proceed against a different defendant or through a nonjudicial compensation scheme. In IMAMURA v. GENERAL ELECTRIC CO., 957 F.3d 98 (1st Cir. 2020), the First Circuit affirmed the district court’s forum non conveniens dismissal of a putative class action in Massachusetts federal court against the designer of a nuclear power plant, seeking damages for injuries caused by an earthquake-induced tsunami and a resulting nuclear disaster at the Fukushima Daiichi Nuclear Power Plant in Japan. It reasoned that forum non conveniens is permissible when the alternative forum “offers adequate remedies for the exact same injuries alleged by the plaintiff in U.S. court but channels liability for those injuries to a third party who is not the same defendant in the U.S. case.” Id. at 109. It also found that it was proper to consider the availability of Japan’s “administrative compensation scheme” in assessing the adequacy of the alternative forum. Id. at 112. In what situations should a nonjudicial forum be sufficiently “adequate” to permit a forum non conveniens dismissal?

7.How much weight should the court give to plaintiff’s forum preference? In WIWA v. ROYAL DUTCH PETROLEUM CO., 226 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 2000), three Nigerian émigrés living in the United States sued two foreign holding companies alleging that the companies had participated in human rights violations against them in retaliation for their political opposition to the companies’ oil exploration activities in Nigeria. The district court dismissed on the basis of forum non conveniens and the Second Circuit reversed, holding that the deference due to the forum choice of a United States resident depends on the party’s affiliation with the forum. “[T]he greater the plaintiff’s ties to the plaintiff’s chosen forum,” the court explained, “the more likely it is that the plaintiff would be inconvenienced by a requirement to bring the claim in a foreign jurisdiction.” Id. at 102. Conversely, absolute deference is not accorded to the forum choice of a United States citizen when the facts show a significant relationship with an alternative forum. See Carey v. Bayerische Hypo-Und Vereinsbank AG, 370 F.3d 234, 238 (2d Cir. 2004).

8.What deference should the court give to a United States plaintiff’s forum choice when the suit involves multiple plaintiffs, most of whom are not United States citizens? In OTTO CANDIES, LLC v. CITIGROUP, INC., 963

F.3d 1331 (11th Cir. 2020), the court reversed the district court’s forum non conveniens dismissal in a case involving two United States plaintiffs and 37 foreign plaintiffs: “There * * * does not appear to be any practical or doctrinal basis to reduce deference to domestic plaintiffs who sue alongside foreign plaintiffs, particularly when they all sue a single American defendant for conduct that they allege occurred in the United States.” Id. at 1344.

9.In SINOCHEM INTERNATIONAL CO. LTD. v. MALAYSIA INTERNATIONAL SHIPPING CORP., 549 U.S. 422, 127 S.Ct. 1184, 167 L.Ed.2d 15 (2007), the Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal of an action against a Chinese company on the basis of forum non conveniens even though the district court had not first ascertained whether subject-matter or personal jurisdiction was present. Justice Ginsburg explained that when a district court does not intend to resolve the merits of a case, it “has leeway ‘to choose among threshold grounds for denying audience to a case on the merits,’ ” id. at 431, 127 S.Ct. at 1191, 167 L.Ed.2d at 25 (quoting Ruhrgas, p. 387, supra), and “may dispose of an action by a forum non conveniens dismissal, bypassing questions of subject-matter and personal jurisdiction, when considerations of convenience, fairness, and judicial economy so warrant.” Id. at 432, 127 S.Ct. at 1192, 167 L.Ed.2d at 26.

Prior to the Court’s decision in Sinochem, district courts sometimes would condition a forum non conveniens dismissal on defendant’s waiver of a jurisdictional or limitations defense in the alternative forum. See In re Union Carbide Corp. Gas Plant Disaster at Bhopal, India in Dec., 1984, 809 F.2d 195 (2d Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 871, 108 S.Ct. 199, 98 L.Ed.2d 150 (1987). May a district court that has not yet determined its jurisdiction impose such conditions? May a district court exercising removal jurisdiction dismiss an action on grounds of forum non conveniens without first determining whether subject-matter jurisdiction is present? See Provincial Gov’t of Marinduque v. Placer Dome, Inc., 582 F.3d 1083, 1088 (9th Cir.

2009), cert. denied, 562 U.S. 827, 131 S.Ct. 65, 178 L.Ed.2d 22 (2010).

10. Commentators have criticized the doctrine of forum non conveniens as a ground for dismissal in transnational cases. In this context, it has been argued that the doctrine affords district courts excessive discretion; its use subverts congressional policy; and it produces unfair results for plaintiffs. See Gardner, Retiring Forum Non Conveniens, 92 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 390 (2017).

D. VENUE-SELECTION AGREEMENTS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(3) and 28 U.S.C. §§ 1404 and 1406 in the Supplement.

ATLANTIC MARINE CONSTRUCTION CO., INC. v. U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

Supreme Court of the United States, 2013.

571 U.S. 49, 134 S.Ct. 568, 187 L.Ed.2d 487.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

JUSTICE ALITO delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

I

Petitioner Atlantic Marine Construction Co., a Virginia corporation with its principal place of business in Virginia, entered into a contract with the United States Army Corps of Engineers to construct a child-development center at Fort Hood in the Western District of Texas. Atlantic Marine then entered into a subcontract with respondent J-Crew Management, Inc., a Texas corporation, for work on the project. This subcontract included a forum-selection clause, which stated that all disputes between the parties “ ‘shall be litigated in the Circuit Court for the City of Norfolk, Virginia, or the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, Norfolk Division.’ ” * * *

When a dispute about payment under the subcontract arose, however, J-Crew sued Atlantic Marine in the Western District of Texas, invoking that court’s diversity jurisdiction. Atlantic Marine moved to dismiss the suit, arguing that the forum-selection clause rendered venue in the Western District of Texas “wrong” under § 1406(a) and “improper” under Federal Rule * * * 12(b)(3). In the alternative, Atlantic Marine moved to transfer the case to the Eastern District of Virginia under § 1404(a). J-Crew opposed these motions.

The District Court denied both motions. It first concluded that § 1404(a) is the exclusive mechanism for enforcing a forum-selection clause that points to another federal forum. The District Court then held that Atlantic Marine bore the burden of establishing that a transfer would be appropriate under § 1404(a) and that the court would “consider a nonexhaustive and nonexclusive list of public and private interest factors,” of which the “forum-selection clause [was] only one such factor.” * * * Giving particular weight to its findings that “compulsory process will not be available for the majority of J-Crew’s witnesses” and that there would be “significant expense for those willing witnesses,” the District Court held that Atlantic Marine had failed to carry its burden of showing that transfer “would be in the interest of justice or increase the convenience to the parties and their witnesses.” * * *

Atlantic Marine petitioned the Court of Appeals for a writ of mandamus directing the District Court to dismiss the case under § 1406(a) or to transfer the case to the Eastern District of Virginia under § 1404(a).

The Court of Appeals denied Atlantic Marine’s petition because Atlantic Marine had not established a “ ‘clear and indisputable’ ” right to relief * * *. Relying on Stewart Organization, Inc. * * * [p. 486, infra], the Court of Appeals agreed with the District Court that § 1404(a) is the exclusive mechanism for enforcing a forum-selection clause that points to another federal forum when venue is otherwise proper in the district where the case was brought. * * * The court stated, however, that if a forum-selection clause points to a nonfederal forum, dismissal under Rule 12(b)(3) would be the correct mechanism to enforce the clause because § 1404(a) by its terms does not permit transfer to any tribunal other than another federal court. * * * The Court of Appeals then concluded that the District Court had not clearly abused its discretion in refusing to transfer the case after conducting the balance-of-interests analysis required by § 1404(a). * * * That was so even though there was no dispute that the forum-selection clause was valid. * * * We granted certiorari. * * *

II

Atlantic Marine contends that a party may enforce a forum-selection clause by seeking dismissal of the suit under § 1406(a) and Rule 12(b)(3). We disagree. Section 1406(a) and Rule 12(b)(3) allow dismissal only when venue is “wrong” or “improper.” Whether venue is “wrong” or “improper” depends exclusively on whether the court in which the case was brought satisfies the requirements of federal venue laws, and those provisions say nothing about a forum-selection clause.

* * * When venue is challenged, the court must determine whether the case falls within one of the three categories set out in § 1391(b). If it does, venue is proper; if it does not, venue is improper, and the case must be dismissed or transferred under § 1406(a). Whether the parties entered into a contract containing a forum-selection clause has no bearing on whether a case falls into one of the categories of cases listed in § 1391(b). As a result, a case filed in a district that falls within § 1391 may not be dismissed under § 1406(a) or Rule 12(b)(3).

Petitioner’s contrary view improperly conflates the special statutory term “venue” and the word “forum.” It is certainly true that, in some contexts, the word “venue” is used synonymously with the term “forum,” but § 1391 makes clear that venue in “all civil actions” must be determined in accordance with the criteria outlined in that section. That language cannot reasonably be read to allow judicial consideration of other, extrastatutory limitations on the forum in which a case may be brought.

The structure of the federal venue provisions confirms that they alone define whether venue exists in a given forum. In particular, the venue statutes reflect Congress’ intent that venue should always lie in some federal court whenever federal courts have personal jurisdiction over the defendant. * * * Yet petitioner’s approach would mean that in some number of cases—those in which the forum-selection clause points to a state or foreign court—venue would not lie in any federal district. That would not comport with the statute’s design, which contemplates that venue will always exist in some federal court.

The conclusion that venue is proper so long as the requirements of § 1391(b) are met, irrespective of any forum-selection clause, also follows from our prior decisions * * *. The question in Van Dusen was whether § 1404(a) allows transfer to a district in which venue is proper under § 1391 but in which the case could not have been pursued in light of substantive state-law limitations on the suit. * * * In holding that transfer is permissible in that context, we construed the phrase “where it might have been brought” to refer to “the federal laws delimiting the districts in which such an action ‘may be brought,’ ” * * *, noting that “the phrase ‘may be brought’ recurs at least 10 times” in §§ 1391–1406 * * *. We perceived “no valid reason for reading the words ‘where it might have been brought’ to narrow the range of permissible federal forums beyond those permitted by federal venue statutes.” * * *

* * *

B

Although a forum-selection clause does not render venue in a court “wrong” or “improper” within the meaning of § 1406(a) or Rule 12(b)(3), the clause may be enforced through a motion to transfer under § 1404(a). * * * Unlike § 1406(a), § 1404(a) does not condition transfer on the initial forum’s being “wrong.” And it permits transfer to any district where venue is also proper (i.e., “where [the case] might have been brought”) or to any other district to which the parties have agreed by contract or stipulation.

* * *

Atlantic Marine argues that § 1404(a) is not a suitable mechanism to enforce forum-selection clauses because that provision cannot provide for transfer when a forum-selection clause specifies a state or foreign tribunal, * * *. The Court of Appeals opined that a forum-selection clause pointing to a nonfederal forum should be enforced through Rule 12(b)(3), which permits a party to move for dismissal of a case based on “improper venue.” * * * As Atlantic Marine persuasively argues, however, that conclusion cannot be reconciled with our construction of the term “improper venue” in § 1406 to refer only to a forum that does not satisfy federal venue laws. If venue is proper under federal venue rules, it does not matter for the purpose of Rule 12(b)(3) whether the forum-selection clause points to a federal or a nonfederal forum.

Instead, the appropriate way to enforce a forum-selection clause pointing to a state or foreign forum is through the doctrine of forum non conveniens. Section 1404(a) is merely a codification of the doctrine of forum non conveniens for the subset of cases in which the transferee forum is within the federal court system; in such cases, Congress has replaced the traditional remedy of outright dismissal with transfer. * * * For the remaining set of cases calling for a nonfederal forum, § 1404(a) has no application * * *. And because both § 1404(a) and the forum non conveniens doctrine from which it derives entail the same balancing-of-interests standard, courts should evaluate a forum-selection clause pointing to a nonfederal forum in the same way that they evaluate a forum-selection clause pointing to a federal forum. * * *

* * *

III

Although the Court of Appeals correctly identified § 1404(a) as the appropriate provision to enforce the forum-selection clause in this case, the Court of Appeals erred in failing to make the adjustments required in a § 1404(a) analysis when the transfer motion is premised on a forum-selection clause. When the parties have agreed to a valid forum-selection clause, a district court should ordinarily transfer the case to the forum specified in that clause.⁵ Only under extraordinary circumstances unrelated to the convenience of the parties should a § 1404(a) motion be denied. And no such exceptional factors appear to be present in this case.

A

In the typical case not involving a forum-selection clause, a district court considering a § 1404(a) motion (or a forum non conveniens motion) must evaluate both the convenience of the parties and various public-interest considerations. Ordinarily, the district court would weigh the relevant factors and decide whether, on balance, a transfer would serve “the convenience of parties and witnesses” and otherwise promote “the interest of justice.” § 1404(a).

The calculus changes, however, when the parties’ contract contains a valid forum-selection clause * * *. The presence of a valid forum-selection clause requires district courts to adjust their usual § 1404(a) analysis in three ways.

First, the plaintiff’s choice of forum merits no weight. Rather, as the party defying the forum-selection clause, the plaintiff bears the burden of establishing that transfer to the forum for which the parties bargained is unwarranted. Because plaintiffs are ordinarily allowed to select whatever forum they consider most advantageous (consistent with jurisdictional and venue limitations), we have termed their selection the “plaintiff’s venue privilege.” * * * But when a plaintiff agrees by contract to bring suit only in a specified forum—presumably in exchange for other binding promises by the defendant—the plaintiff has effectively exercised its “venue privilege” before a dispute arises. Only that initial choice deserves deference, and the plaintiff must bear the burden of showing why the court should not transfer the case to the forum to which the parties agreed.

437

Second, a court evaluating a defendant’s § 1404(a) motion to transfer based on a forum-selection clause should not consider arguments about the parties’ private interests. When parties agree to a forum-selection clause, they waive the right to challenge the preselected forum as inconvenient or less convenient for themselves or their witnesses, or for their pursuit of the litigation. A court accordingly must deem the private-interest factors to weigh entirely in favor of the preselected forum. * * *

As a consequence, a district court may consider arguments about public-interest factors only. * * * Because those factors will rarely defeat a transfer motion, the practical result is that forum-selection clauses should control except in unusual cases. * * *

Third, when a party bound by a forum-selection clause flouts its contractual obligation and files suit in a different forum, a § 1404(a) transfer of venue will not carry with it the original venue’s choice-of-law rules—a factor that in some circumstances may affect public-interest considerations. See Piper Aircraft Co. v. Reyno, [p. 421, supra] (listing a court’s familiarity with the “law that must govern the action” as a potential factor). A federal court sitting in diversity ordinarily must follow the choice-of-law rules of the State in which it sits. See Klaxon * * * [p. 517, infra]. However, we previously identified an exception to that principle for § 1404(a) transfers, requiring that the state law applicable in the original court also apply in the transferee court. * * *

In Van Dusen, we were concerned that, through a § 1404(a) transfer, a defendant could “defeat the state-law advantages that might accrue from the exercise of [the plaintiff’s] venue privilege.” * * * But * * * a plaintiff who files suit in violation of a forum-selection clause enjoys no such “privilege” with respect to its choice of forum, and therefore it is entitled to no concomitant “state-law advantages.” Not only would it be inequitable to allow the plaintiff to fasten its choice of substantive law to the venue transfer, but it would also encourage gamesmanship. * * *

When parties have contracted in advance to litigate disputes in a particular forum, courts should not unnecessarily disrupt the parties’ settled expectations. A forum-selection clause, after all, may have figured centrally in the parties’ negotiations and may have affected how they set monetary and other contractual terms; it may, in fact, have been a critical factor in their agreement to do business together in the first place. In all but the most unusual cases, therefore, “the interest of justice” is served by holding parties to their bargain.

438

B

The District Court’s application of § 1404(a) in this case did not comport with these principles. The District Court improperly placed the burden on Atlantic Marine to prove that transfer to the parties’ contractually preselected forum was appropriate. As the party acting in violation of the forum-selection clause, J-Crew must bear the burden of showing that public-interest factors overwhelmingly disfavor a transfer.

The District Court also erred in giving weight to arguments about the parties’ private interests, given that all private interests, as expressed in the forum-selection clause, weigh in favor of the transfer. * * * [W]hen J-Crew entered into a contract to litigate all disputes in Virginia, it knew that a distant forum might hinder its ability to call certain witnesses and might impose other burdens on its litigation efforts. It nevertheless promised to resolve its disputes in Virginia, and the District Court should not have given any weight to J-Crew’s current claims of inconvenience.

The District Court also held that the public-interest factors weighed in favor of keeping the case in Texas because Texas contract law is more familiar to federal judges in Texas than to their federal colleagues in Virginia. That ruling, however, rested in part on the District Court’s belief that the federal court sitting in Virginia would have been required to apply Texas’ choice-of-law rules, which in this case pointed to Texas contract law. * * * But for the reasons we have explained, the transferee court would apply Virginia choice-of-law rules. * * *

We reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. Although no public-interest factors that might support the denial of Atlantic Marine’s motion to transfer are apparent on the record before us, we remand the case for the courts below to decide that question.

It is so ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The principal case held that a motion to transfer under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) is the procedural mechanism for enforcing a venue-selection provision that selects a federal district as the location of litigation. What is the mechanism for enforcing a venue-selection provision that selects a state court or a foreign forum? See Shannon, Enforcing Forum-Selection Clauses, 66 Hastings L.J. 777 (2015).
2. Is a venue-selection clause enforceable against a party who did not sign the contract term? In IN RE HOWMEDICA OSTEONICS CORP., 867 F.3d 390 (3d Cir. 2017), the court of appeals considered whether to grant a motion to transfer when some parties were bound by a contractual venue term and some were not. The court held that a venue-clause applies only to the parties who agree to be bound by it, and not to the case as a whole. According to the Third Circuit, the Atlantic Marine presumption in favor of enforcing a forum-selection clause does not apply to non-contracting parties who move to transfer under Section 1404 on the basis of their private interests.

439

3. The Court in Atlantic Marine assumed that the venue clause at issue in that case was valid, without deciding whether the validity of the clause would be governed by state, federal, or state and federal law. See Clermont, Governing Law on Forum-Selection Agreements, 66 Hastings L.J. 643 (2015); Steinman, Atlantic Marine Through the Lens of Erie, 66 Hastings L.J. 795 (2015). Reconsider this question after studying the material in Chapter 6, infra.
4. The Atlantic Marine decision may influence the analysis of Section 1404(a) motions that are based on grounds other than a forum-selection clause. See p. 415, Note 2, supra (discussing the factors courts consider when deciding Section 1404(a) motions). Atlantic Marine indicated that, as a general matter, Section 1404(a) motions are governed by the same private interest and public interest factors that govern forum non conveniens motions. Even if the same factors are considered, however, a party seeking a Section 1404(a) transfer faces a lower burden than one seeking a forum non conveniens dismissal. See PIPER v. REYNO [p. 421, supra] (“District courts were given more discretion to transfer under § 1404(a) than they had to dismiss on grounds of forum non conveniens.”); Sandvik AB v. Advent Int’l Corp., 83 F.Supp.2d 442, 449 (D.Del. 1999) (“Although both inquiries address the issue whether the litigation can be more appropriately conducted in a different tribunal, the moving party bears a higher burden when invoking the doctrine of forum non conveniens.”).

⁴ The writer knows by experience that only one skilled in Texas Land Law can successfully handle an action of Trespass to Try Title in the State of Texas.

⁵ The District Court concluded that it could not assert personal jurisdiction over Hartzell consistent with due process. However, it decided not to dismiss Hartzell because the corporation would be amenable to process in Pennsylvania.

⁸ Under Klaxon * * * [p. 517, infra], a court ordinarily must apply the choice-of-law rules of the State in which it sits. However, where a case is transferred pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), it must apply the choice-of-law rules of the State from which the case was transferred. Van Dusen * * * [p. 415, Note 3, supra]. Relying on these two cases, the District Court concluded that California choice-of-law rules would apply to Piper, and Pennsylvania choice-of-law rules would apply to Hartzell. It further concluded that California applied a “governmental interests” analysis in resolving choice-of-law problems, and that Pennsylvania employed a “significant contacts” analysis. The court used the “governmental interests” analysis to determine that Pennsylvania liability rules would apply to Piper, and the “significant contacts” analysis to determine that Scottish liability rules would apply to Hartzell.

²² At the outset of any forum non conveniens inquiry, the court must determine whether there exists an alternative forum. Ordinarily, this requirement will be satisfied when the defendant is “amenable to process” in the other jurisdiction. Gilbert * * *. In rare circumstances, however, where the remedy offered by the other forum is clearly unsatisfactory, the other forum may not be an adequate alternative, and the initial requirement may not be satisfied. Thus, for example, dismissal would not be appropriate where the alternative forum does not permit litigation of the subject matter of the dispute. * * *

⁵ Our analysis presupposes a contractually valid forum-selection clause.

441

CHAPTER 6

ASCERTAINING THE APPLICABLE LAW

This chapter focuses on the ways in which federalism and separation of powers affect choice of law in United States courts. Civil actions involving citizens of a single state and a transaction that occurred entirely within the boundaries of that state do not present any problems of choosing the proper body of substantive law to be applied in determining the rights and liabilities of the parties. However, as soon as the litigation touches two or more states, one is likely to be confronted with the serious question of choosing between two or more sources of law. For example, suppose plaintiff and defendant, both citizens of State X, are involved in an automobile accident or agree to perform a contract or engage in a sale of property in State Y. Should questions pertaining to defendant’s alleged negligence or failure to perform the contract or transfer the ownership of the property be decided under the law of State X or the law of State Y? Should the choice be made in the same way in tort, contract, and property actions? The complexity of these questions increases if plaintiff and defendant are citizens of different states and the event, relationship, or property that forms the predicate of the controversy can be traced to a third and perhaps a fourth or fifth state. You will be exposed to problems of this type on numerous occasions. Formal education in the philosophy of choosing among the laws of two or more states is the focus of a course in Conflict of Laws.

This chapter is devoted to choice-of-law problems of a somewhat different dimension. Let us suppose that plaintiff is a citizen of State X and defendant is a citizen of State Y and that plaintiff has decided to litigate a tort or contract claim against defendant in a federal district court in State Y. What law should the federal court apply to adjudicate this action? The law of State X? Of State Y? Federal law? Would the answer be different if, assuming personal jurisdiction could be acquired, the action was commenced in a federal district court in State X? The problem of choosing between federal and state law also is present when a state court is called upon to decide cases arising under federal statutes or cases in which federal rights and liabilities are at issue. As one might surmise, the process of choosing between the law of two states and that of choosing between federal and state law are analogous, but involve important differences.

442

A final observation before beginning: If the law applied by one court differs materially from that applied by another, an attorney interested in achieving a particular result for a client obviously may wish to steer the lawsuit, if the jurisdiction and venue rules permit, to a particular tribunal. To what extent should a court take account of this type of forum manipulation in choosing the law to be applied?

A. STATE LAW IN THE FEDERAL COURTS

1.THE RULE OF SWIFT V. TYSON

Although Article III of the Constitution sets limits on the jurisdiction of the federal court system, it does not establish any lower federal courts. The power to establish those “inferior” courts was left to Congress, which quickly used it. The Judiciary Act of 1789 established a lower federal court system and promulgated rules governing its jurisdiction and operation. See Chapter 4, supra. Among those rules, in Section 34 of the Judiciary Act, was the so-called Rules of Decision Act. The modern version of this Act is found in 28 U.S.C. § 1652: “The laws of the several states, except where the Constitution or treaties of the United States or Acts of Congress otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in civil actions in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply.”

For nearly one hundred years, the Supreme Court’s decision in SWIFT v. TYSON, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 1, 10 L.Ed. 865 (1842), provided the basic interpretation of the Rules of Decision Act. Consider this account:

The famous case of Swift v. Tyson arose from the following rather commonplace circumstances: Two persons, [Norton] and Keith, gave Swift a bill of exchange in payment of a promissory note. The bill was accepted, or guaranteed, by another person named Tyson who in so doing meant to pay for certain land which he was purchasing from Norton and Keith. Sadly enough for Tyson, he discovered that Norton and Keith could not sell him the land because they did not own it. Therefore, when Swift sued Tyson on the bill, Tyson defended on the ground that there had been a failure of consideration to him, and that Swift could not, under these circumstances recover as a bona-fide holder for valuable consideration because Swift had paid nothing for the bill—all he had done was to accept the bill as new evidence of an old debt. The controlling issue thus became whether a new bill of exchange for an old debt was an adequate consideration for Swift’s acceptance of the bill.

The bill was made in the State of Maine; it was accepted in New York. If governed by the laws of New York, which might have been thought applicable, Swift would probably have been found to have given no consideration.

443

Address of U.S. Supreme Court Associate Justice Hugo L. Black to the Missouri Bar Annual Banquet, Sept. 25, 1942, reprinted in 64 J.Mo.B. 26, 27 (2008). The principal question considered in Swift was whether the case was governed by New York decisional law, or whether the federal court could interpret principles of commercial law as it thought best.

Whether New York law applied turned upon the meaning of the phrase “laws of the several states” in the Rules of Decision Act. If the phrase encompassed state statutes and state decisions involving commercial relations, then the federal court was required to apply the New York rule. Justice Story, writing for a unanimous Court, concluded that the Act did not command the federal courts to follow state judicial decisions in general commercial matters:

[T]he courts of New York do not found their decisions upon this point upon any local statute, or positive, fixed, or ancient local usage: but they deduce the doctrine from the general principles of commercial law. It is, however, contended, that the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, furnishes a rule obligatory upon this court to follow the decisions of the state tribunals in all cases to which they apply. * * * In order to maintain the argument, it is essential, therefore, to hold, that the word “laws,” in this section, includes within the scope of its meaning the decisions of the local tribunals. In the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are, and are not of themselves laws. They are often reexamined, reversed, and qualified by the Courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective, or ill-founded, or otherwise incorrect. The laws of a state are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long established local customs having the force of laws. In all the various cases, which have hitherto come before us for decision, this court have uniformly supposed, that the true interpretation of the thirty-fourth section limited its application to state laws strictly local, that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It never has been supposed by us, that the section did apply, or was designed to apply, to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments and especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain upon general reasoning and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case. And we have not now the slightest difficulty in holding, that this section * * * is strictly limited to local statutes and local usages of the character before stated, and does not extend to contracts and other instruments of a commercial nature, the true interpretation and effect whereof are to be sought, not in the decisions of the local tribunals, but in the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence. * * *

444

Id. at 18–19, 10 L.Ed. at 871.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Accordi ng to Justice Story, why are judicial decisions only evidence of law, and not law itself? On what basis did Justice Story distinguish judicial decisions interpreting state statutes or “matters immovable and intraterritorial” from other judicial decisions?

2. According to Swift, what is the source of the federal courts’ authority to develop and apply general common law rules in commercial cases heard within the grant of diversity jurisdiction? Is Justice Story’s reading of the words “the law of the several states” in the Rules of Decision Act the only plausible reading of the statute? What are the competing interpretations? See Ritz, Holt & Larue, Rewriting the History of the Judiciary Act of 1789: Exposing Myths, Challenging Premises, and Using New Evidence (1990).

3. Does it make sense to have the federal courts promulgate general, uniformly applied commercial laws? Why should a person suing in federal court in Oklahoma not receive the same remedy as a person suing in federal court in Vermont? On the other hand, if a federal court sitting in diversity is forced to apply the forum state’s court decisions, what advantage would a party have in going to federal court? How might a uniform federal rule of decision in commercial matters have affected the nation’s economic development? See Freyer, Harmony & Dissonance: The Swift & Erie Cases in American Federalism (1981).

445

2.THE ERIE DOCTRINE: THE RULES OF DECISION ACT AND THE RULES ENABLING ACT

ERIE R. CO. v. TOMPKINS

Supreme Court of the United States, 1938.
304 U.S. 64, 58 S.Ct. 817, 82 L.Ed. 1188.

Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Slightly after midnight on July 27, 1934, Harry James Tompkins was walking home along a well-trodden footpath running parallel to the Erie Railroad tracks in Hughestown, Pennsylvania, when he was struck by “a black object that looked like a door” protruding from a passing train. Tompkins’ right arm was severed.

Under Pennsylvania law, a traveler like Tompkins on a parallel (or “longitudinal”) path was regarded as a trespasser to whom the railroad merely owes a duty to avoid wanton negligence. The majority rule in most states, however, was that a railroad owes a duty of ordinary care to a traveler on a parallel footpath.

Tompkins’ lawyers were well aware of the rule in Swift that, absent state statutory law, federal courts apply “general law,” and thus they tried to avoid the harsh Pennsylvania rule by suing the New York-based railroad in federal court. As anticipated, the district court applied “general law,” the majority rule, and the jury awarded Tompkins $30,000 in damages.

The court of appeals affirmed, holding that:

[U]pon questions of general law the federal courts are free, in absence of a local statute, to exercise their independent judgment as to what the law is; and it is well settled that the question of the responsibility of a railroad for injuries caused by its servants is one of general law. * * * Where the public has made open and notorious use of a railroad right of way for a long period of time and without objection, the company owes to persons on such permissive pathway a duty of care in the operation of its trains. * * * It is likewise generally recognized law that a jury may find that negligence exists toward a pedestrian using a permissive path on the railroad right of way if he is hit by some object projecting from the side of the train.]

* * *

First. Swift v. Tyson * * * held that federal courts exercising jurisdiction on the ground of diversity of citizenship need not, in matters of general jurisprudence, apply the unwritten law of the state as declared by its highest court; that they are free to exercise an independent judgment as to what the common law of the state is—or should be * * *.

446

* * * The federal courts assumed, in the broad field of “general law,” the power to declare rules of decision which Congress was confessedly without power to enact as statutes. Doubt was repeatedly expressed as to the correctness of the construction given section 34, and as to the soundness of the rule which it introduced. But it was the more recent research of a competent scholar, who examined the original document, which established that the construction given to it by the Court was erroneous; and that the purpose of the section was merely to make certain that, in all matters except those in which some federal law is controlling, the federal courts exercising jurisdiction in diversity of citizenship cases would apply as their rules of decision the law of the state, unwritten as well as written.⁵

Criticism of the doctrine became widespread after the decision of Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer Co., 276 U.S. 518, 48 S.Ct. 404, 72 L.Ed. 681, 57 A.L.R. 426. There, Brown & Yellow, a Kentucky corporation owned by Kentuckians, and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, also a Kentucky corporation, wished that the former should have the exclusive privilege of soliciting passenger and baggage transportation at the Bowling Green, Ky., railroad station; and that the Black & White, a competing Kentucky corporation, should be prevented from interfering with that privilege. Knowing that such a contract would be void under the common law of Kentucky, it was arranged that the Brown & Yellow reincorporate under the law of Tennessee, and that the contract with the railroad should be executed there. The suit was then brought by the Tennessee corporation in the federal court for Western Kentucky to enjoin competition by the Black & White; an injunction issued by the District Court was sustained by the Court of Appeals; and this Court, citing many decisions in which the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson had been applied, affirmed the decree.

Second. Experience in applying the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, had revealed its defects, political and social; and the benefits expected to flow from the rule did not accrue. Persistence of state courts in their own opinions on questions of common law prevented uniformity; and the impossibility of discovering a satisfactory line of demarcation between the province of general law and that of local law developed a new well of uncertainties.

On the other hand, the mischievous results of the doctrine had become apparent. Diversity of citizenship jurisdiction was conferred in order to prevent apprehended discrimination in state courts against those not citizens of the state. Swift v. Tyson introduced grave discrimination by noncitizens against citizens. It made rights enjoyed under the unwritten “general law” vary according to whether enforcement was sought in the state or in the federal court; and the privilege of selecting the court in which the right should be determined was conferred upon the noncitizen. Thus, the doctrine rendered impossible equal protection of the law. In attempting to promote uniformity of law throughout the United States, the doctrine had prevented uniformity in the administration of the law of the state.

447

The discrimination resulting became in practice far-reaching. This resulted in part from the broad province accorded to the so-called “general law” as to which federal courts exercised an independent judgment. In addition to questions of purely commercial law, “general law” was held to include the obligations under contracts entered into and to be performed within the state, the extent to which a carrier operating within a state may stipulate for exemption from liability for his own negligence or that of his employee; the liability for torts committed within the state upon persons resident or property located there, even where the question of liability depended upon the scope of a property right conferred by the state; and the right to exemplary or punitive damages. Furthermore, state decisions construing local deeds, mineral conveyances, and even devises of real estate, were disregarded.

In part the discrimination resulted from the wide range of persons held entitled to avail themselves of the federal rule by resort to the diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. Through this jurisdiction individual citizens willing to remove from their own state and become citizens of another might avail themselves of the federal rule. And, without even change of residence, a corporate citizen of the state could avail itself of the federal rule by reincorporating under the laws of another state, as was done in the Taxicab Case.

The injustice and confusion incident to the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson have been repeatedly urged as reasons for abolishing or limiting diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. Other legislative relief has been proposed. If only a question of statutory construction were involved, we should not be prepared to abandon a doctrine so widely applied throughout nearly a century. But the unconstitutionality of the course pursued has now been made clear, and compels us to do so.

Third. Except in matters governed by the Federal Constitution or by acts of Congress, the law to be applied in any case is the law of the state. And whether the law of the state shall be declared by its Legislature in a statute or by its highest court in a decision is not a matter of federal concern. There is no federal general common law. Congress has no power to declare substantive rules of common law applicable in a state whether they be local in their nature or “general,” be they commercial law or a part of the law of torts. And no clause in the Constitution purports to confer such a power upon the federal courts. As stated by Mr. Justice Field when protesting in Baltimore & Ohio R.R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U.S. 368, 401, 13 S.Ct. 914, 927, 37 L.Ed. 772, against ignoring the Ohio common law of fellow-servant liability: “I am aware that what has been termed the general law of the country—which is often little less than what the judge advancing the doctrine thinks at the time should be the general law on a particular subject—has been often advanced in judicial opinions of this court to control a conflicting law of a state. I admit that learned judges have fallen into the habit of repeating this doctrine as a convenient mode of brushing aside the law of a state in conflict with their views. And I confess that, moved and governed by the authority of the great names of those judges, I have, myself, in many instances, unhesitatingly and confidently, but I think now erroneously, repeated the same doctrine. But, notwithstanding the great names which may be cited in favor of the doctrine, and notwithstanding the frequency with which the doctrine has been reiterated, there stands, as a perpetual protest against its repetition, the constitution of the United States, which recognizes and preserves the autonomy and independence of the states,—independence in their legislative and independence in their judicial departments. Supervision over either the legislative or the judicial action of the states is in no case permissible except as to matters by the constitution specifically authorized or delegated to the United States. Any interference with either, except as thus permitted, is an invasion of the authority of the state, and, to that extent, a denial of its independence.”

448

The fallacy underlying the rule declared in Swift v. Tyson is made clear by Mr. Justice Holmes.²³ The doctrine rests upon the assumption that there is “a transcendental body of law outside of any particular State but obligatory within it unless and until changed by statute,” that federal courts have the power to use their judgment as to what the rules of common law are; and that in the federal courts “the parties are entitled to an independent judgment on matters of general law”:

But law in the sense in which courts speak of it today does not exist without some definite authority behind it. The common law so far as it is enforced in a State, whether called common law or not, is not the common law generally but the law of that State existing by the authority of that State without regard to what it may have been in England or anywhere else. * * *

449

The authority and only authority is the State, and if that be so, the voice adopted by the State as its own [whether it be of its Legislature or of its Supreme Court] should utter the last word.

Thus the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson is, as Mr. Justice Holmes said, “an unconstitutional assumption of powers by the Courts of the United States which no lapse of time or respectable array of opinion should make us hesitate to correct.” In disapproving that doctrine we do not hold unconstitutional section 34 of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789 or any other act of Congress. We merely declare that in applying the doctrine this Court and the lower courts have invaded rights which in our opinion are reserved by the Constitution to the several states.

Fourth. The defendant contended that by the common law of Pennsylvania * * * the only duty owed to the plaintiff was to refrain from willful or wanton injury. The plaintiff denied that such is the Pennsylvania law. In support of their respective contentions the parties discussed and cited many decisions of the Supreme Court of the State. The Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that the question of liability is one of general law; and on that ground declined to decide the issue of state law. As we hold this was error, the judgment is reversed and the case remanded to it for further proceedings in conformity with our opinion.

Reversed.

JUSTICE CARDOZO took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

JUSTICE BUTLER (dissenting).

* * *

Defendant’s petition for writ of certiorari presented two questions: Whether its duty toward plaintiff should have been determined in accordance with the law as found by the highest court of Pennsylvania, and whether the evidence conclusively showed plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence. * * *

No constitutional question was suggested or argued below or here. And as a general rule, this Court will not consider any question not raised below and presented by the petition. * * * Here it does not decide either of the questions presented, but, changing the rule of decision in force since the foundation of the government, remands the case to be adjudged according to a standard never before deemed permissible.

* * *

The doctrine of * * * [Swift v. Tyson] has been followed by this Court in an unbroken line of decisions. So far as appears, it was not questioned until more than 50 years later, and then by a single judge.¹ Baltimore & O. Railroad Co. v. Baugh * * *.

450

And since that decision, the division of opinion in this Court has been of the same character as it was before. In 1910, Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for himself and two other Justices, dissented from the holding that a court of the United States was bound to exercise its own independent judgment in the construction of a conveyance made before the state courts had rendered an authoritative decision as to its meaning and effect. Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co. * * *. But that dissent accepted * * * as “settled” the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, and insisted * * * merely that the case under consideration was by nature and necessity peculiarly local.

* * *

So far as appears, no litigant has ever challenged the power of Congress to establish the rule as construed. It has so long endured that its destruction now without appropriate deliberation cannot be justified. There is nothing in the opinion to suggest that consideration of any constitutional question is necessary to a decision of the case. * * * Against the protest of those joining in this opinion, the Court declines to assign the case for reargument. It may not justly be assumed that the labor and argument of counsel for the parties would not disclose the right conclusion and aid the Court in the statement of reasons to support it. Indeed, it would have been appropriate to give Congress opportunity to be heard before divesting it of power to prescribe rules of decision to be followed in the courts of the United States. * * *

The course pursued by the Court in this case is repugnant to the Act of Congress of August 24, 1937, 50 Stat. 751, 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 17 and note, 349a, 380a and note, 401. It declares that: “Whenever the constitutionality of any Act of Congress affecting the public interest is drawn in question in any court of the United States in any suit or proceeding to which the United States, or any agency thereof, or any officer or employee thereof, as such officer or employee, is not a party, the court having jurisdiction of the suit or proceeding shall certify such fact to the Attorney General. In any such case the court shall permit the United States to intervene and become a party for presentation of evidence * * * and argument upon the question of the constitutionality of such Act.” * * * If defendant had applied for and obtained the writ of certiorari upon the claim that, as now held, Congress has no power to prescribe the rule of decision, section 34 as construed, it would have been the duty of this Court to issue the prescribed certificate to the Attorney General in order that the United States might intervene and be heard on the constitutional question. * * * Congress intended to give the United States the right to be heard in every case involving constitutionality of an act affecting the public interest. In view of the rule that, in the absence of challenge of constitutionality, statutes will not here be invalidated on that ground, the Act of August 24, 1937 extends to cases where constitutionality is first “drawn in question” by the Court. * * *

I am of opinion that the constitutional validity of the rule need not be considered, because under the law, as found by the courts of Pennsylvania and generally throughout the country, it is plain that the evidence required a finding that plaintiff was guilty of negligence that contributed to cause his injuries, and that the judgment below should be reversed upon that ground.

JUSTICE McREYNOLDS concurs in this opinion.

JUSTICE REED (concurring in part).

I concur in the conclusion reached in this case, in the disapproval of the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, and in the reasoning of the majority opinion, except in so far as it relies upon the unconstitutionality of the “course pursued” by the federal courts.

The “doctrine of Swift v. Tyson,” as I understand it, is that the words “the laws,” as used in section 34 of the Federal Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, do not include in their meaning “the decisions of the local tribunals.” * * *

To decide the case now before us and to “disapprove” the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson requires only that we say that the words “the laws” include in their meaning the decisions of the local tribunals. As the majority opinion shows, by its reference to Mr. Warren’s researches and the first quotation from Mr. Justice Holmes, that this Court is now of the view that “laws” includes “decisions,” it is unnecessary to go further and declare that the “course pursued” was “unconstitutional,” instead of merely erroneous.

The “unconstitutional” course referred to in the majority opinion is apparently the ruling in Swift v. Tyson that the supposed omission of Congress to legislate as to the effect of decisions leaves federal courts free to interpret general law for themselves. I am not at all sure whether, in the absence of federal statutory direction, federal courts would be compelled to follow state decisions. There was sufficient doubt about the matter in 1789 to induce the first Congress to legislate. No former opinions of this Court have passed upon it. * * * If the opinion commits this Court to the position that the Congress is without power to declare what rules of substantive law shall govern the federal courts, that conclusion also seems questionable. The line between procedural and substantive law is hazy, but no one doubts federal power over procedure. * * * The Judiciary Article, 3, and the “necessary and proper” clause of article 1, § 8, may fully authorize legislation, such as this section of the Judiciary Act.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Is Erie a constitutional decision or does it rest on other grounds? Is it significant that the Court found the rule of Swift to be unconstitutional, but did not invalidate the Rules of Decision Act? For efforts to explain the constitutional principle underlying Erie, see Clark, Ascertaining the Laws of the Several States: Positivism and Judicial Federalism After Erie, 145 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1459 (1997); Steinman, What Is the Erie Doctrine? (and What Does It Mean for the Contemporary Politics of Judicial Federalism?), 84 Notre Dame L.Rev. 245 (2008). For a skeptical view of Erie’s constitutional basis, see Green, Repressing Erie’s Myth, 96 Calif.L.Rev. 595 (2008) .

2.What is the constitutional basis for the statement in Erie that “Congress has no power to declare substantive rules of common law applicable in a State” and that “no clause in the Constitution purports to confer such a power upon the federal courts”? Consider, first, Article I of the Constitution. Does Congress have power under that provision to regulate commercial activities that affect interstate commerce? Keep in mind that by the time Erie was decided, Congress already had enacted legislation regulating railroads operating in interstate commerce with respect to employment and tort liability, e.g., Federal Employers’ Liability Act of 1908, 45 U.S.C. § 51. If Congress had power to legislate in this area, why couldn’t the courts act as well? See Clark, State Law in the Federal Courts: The Brooding Omnipresence of Erie v. Tompkins, 55 Yale L.J. 267, 278 (1946).

3.Does the statement that the rule in Swift “rendered impossible equal protection of the law” implicate constitutional or policy concerns? Does it matter that at the time of the decision the Court had not yet recognized an equal protection component in the Fifth Amendment? See Rutherglen, Reconstructing Erie: A Comment on the Perils of Legal Positivism, 10 Const. Comment. 285 (1993).

4. If discrimination against in-state defendants really is a problem, could it be solved by allowing in-state defendants to remove to federal court? Does it make sense to require federal courts to apply state law in diversity cases simply out of a desire for parity between in-state defendants who cannot remove and out-of-state defendants who can? Justice Brandeis used the Black & White Taxicab case to illustrate the evils resulting from Swift. Could the problem in that case have been handled without overruling Swift?

5.The Erie decision relied on research by Professor Warren, referenced in p. 446, footnote 5, supra, that revealed a previously unknown draft of what became the Rules of Decision Act of 1789. The draft read:

And be it further enacted, That the Statute law of the several States in force for the time being and their unwritten or common law now in use, whether by adoption from the common law of England, the ancient statutes of the same or otherwise, except where the Constitution, Treaties or Statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in the trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply.

453

Did Justice Brandeis properly interpret the Rules of Decision Act given this legislative history? Or did the shorter final version reflect congressional intent to limit the definition of “laws of the several states” to statutory laws, thus expanding the law-making power of federal courts in diversity cases? Can we be sure that Congress even saw the draft discussed by Professor Warren?

6. The Court in Swift associated law with transcendent principles that the judiciary discovered. See Ides, The Supreme Court and the Law to Be Applied in Diversity Cases: A Critical Guide to the Development and Application of the Erie Doctrine and Related Problems, 163 F.R.D. 19, 23 (1995). How does this concept of law differ from that expressed by Justice Holmes, quoted in Erie, that “law in the sense in which courts speak of it today does not exist without some definite authority behind it”? For a defense of the notion that judges can find or discover law, rather than make it, see Sachs, Finding Law, 107 Calif.L.Rev. 527 (2019). See also Nelson, The Persistence of General Law, 106 Colum.L.Rev. 503 (2006) (arguing that “modern-day courts continue to draw the governing rules of decision from a species of general law, distilled from the practices and precedents followed in many different jurisdictions”).

7.Does the Rules of Decision Act require federal courts to follow state procedures as “rules of decision”? Justice Reed’s concurring opinion in Erie emphasized the power of Congress to enact procedures for the federal courts. What constitutional provisions support that assertion? Until the adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Process Act of 1792, as amended in 1872, required federal courts to conform their procedure in common law disputes to those of the state in which the court sat. See Burbank, The Rules Enabling Act of 1934, 130 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1015 (1982).

8.“It is impossible to overstate the importance of the Erie decision.” Wright & Kane, Law of Federal Courts § 55 (8th ed.). Reactions to the Erie decision voiced shortly after it was handed down include Shulman, The Demise of Swift v. Tyson, 47 Yale L.J. 1336 (1938); and Tunks, Categorization and Federalism: “Substance” and “Procedure” After Erie Railroad v. Tompkins, 34 Ill.L.Rev. 271 (1939). Over time, comments about Erie have ranged from “ ‘transcendently significant,’ ” Nelson, A Critical Guide to Erie Railroad v. Tompkins, 54 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 921, 922 (2013) (quoting Krock, In the Nation: A Momentous Decision of the Supreme Court, N.Y. Times, May 3, 1938, at 22), to “the worst decision of all time,” Sherry, Wrong, Out of Step, and Pernicious: Erie as the Worst Decision of All Time, 39 Pepp.L.Rev. 129 (2011), to “a way of life.” Young, Erie As a Way of Life, 52 Akron L.Rev. 193 (2018). For an excellent discussion of the decision and the context in which it was decided, see Purcell, Jr., The Story of Erie: How Litigants, Lawyers, Judges, Politics, and Social Change Reshape the Law, in Civil Procedure Stories 21 (Clermont ed., 2d ed. 2008).

454

GUARANTY TRUST CO. v. YORK

Supreme Court of the United States, 1945.
326 U.S. 99, 65 S.Ct. 1464, 89 L.Ed. 2079.

Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE FRANKFURTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[The Guaranty Trust Company served as trustee for some of the noteholders of Van Sweringen Corporation. In October 1930, Guaranty loaned money to corporations affiliated with and controlled by Van Sweringen. By October 1931, it was evident that the corporation was having trouble meeting its financial obligations. Guaranty and several other banks worked out a plan by which Guaranty would offer to purchase the notes by paying $500 and twenty shares of Van Sweringen stock for each $1,000 note.

Respondent York received $6,000 of the notes from a donor who had not accepted Guaranty’s offer. York brought a diversity suit alleging that Guaranty had breached its fiduciary duties. York’s complaint involved allegations of fraud and misrepresentation, relief for which was governed by equitable principles. On appeal, the Circuit Court of Appeals, one judge dissenting, found that in a suit brought on the equity side of a federal district court the court was not required to apply the state statute of limitations that would govern similar suits in state courts, even though the exclusive basis of federal jurisdiction was diversity of citizenship. The Supreme Court granted review in order to decide whether federal courts should apply state statutes of limitations in such cases.]

* * *

Our starting point must be the policy of federal jurisdiction which Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins * * * embodies. In overruling Swift v. Tyson * * * Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins did not merely overrule a venerable case. It overruled a particular way of looking at law which dominated the judicial process long after its inadequacies had been laid bare. * * * Law was conceived as a “brooding omnipresence” of Reason, of which decisions were merely evidence and not themselves the controlling formulations. Accordingly, federal courts deemed themselves free to ascertain what Reason, and therefore Law, required wholly independent of authoritatively declared State law, even in cases where a legal right as the basis for relief was created by State authority and could not be created by federal authority and the case got into a federal court merely because it was “between Citizens of different States” under Art. III, § 2 of the Constitution * * *.

* * *

In exercising their jurisdiction on the ground of diversity of citizenship, the federal courts, in the long course of their history, have not differentiated in their regard for State law between actions at law and suits in equity. Although § 34 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 * * * directed that the “laws of the several states * * * shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials of common law * * *,” this was deemed, consistently for over a hundred years, to be merely declaratory of what would in any event have governed the federal courts and therefore was equally applicable to equity suits. * * * Indeed, it may fairly be said that the federal courts gave greater respect to State-created “substantive rights,” Pusey & Jones Co. v. Hanssen, 261 U.S. 491, 498, 43 S.Ct. 454, 456, 67 L.Ed. 763, in equity than they gave them on the law side, because rights at law were usually declared by State courts and as such increasingly flouted by extension of the doctrine of Swift v. Tyson, while rights in equity were frequently defined by legislative enactment and as such known and respected by the federal courts. * * *

455

Partly because the States in the early days varied greatly in the manner in which equitable relief was afforded and in the extent to which it was available, * * * Congress provided that “the forms and modes of proceeding in suits * * * of equity” would conform to the settled uses of courts of equity. * * * But this enactment gave the federal courts no power that they would not have had in any event when courts were given “cognizance,” by the first Judiciary Act, of suits “in equity.” From the beginning there has been a good deal of talk in the cases that federal equity is a separate legal system. And so it is, properly understood. The suits in equity of which the federal courts have had “cognizance” ever since 1789 constituted the body of law which had been transplanted to this country from the English Court of Chancery. * * * In giving federal courts “cognizance” of equity suits in cases of diversity jurisdiction, Congress never gave, nor did the federal courts ever claim, the power to deny substantive rights created by State law or to create substantive rights denied by State law.

This does not mean that whatever equitable remedy is available in a State court must be available in a diversity suit in a federal court, or conversely, that a federal court may not afford an equitable remedy not available in a State court. * * * State law cannot define the remedies which a federal court must give simply because a federal court in diversity jurisdiction is available as an alternative tribunal to the State’s courts. Contrariwise, a federal court may afford an equitable remedy for a substantive right recognized by a State even though a State court cannot give it. Whatever contradiction or confusion may be produced by a medley of judicial phrases severed from their environment, the body of adjudications concerning equitable relief in diversity cases leaves no doubt that the federal courts enforced State-created substantive rights if the mode of proceeding and remedy were consonant with the traditional body of equitable remedies, practice and procedure, and in so doing they were enforcing rights created by the States and not arising under any inherent or statutory federal law.

456

* * *

And so this case reduces itself to the narrow question whether, when no recovery could be had in a State court because the action is barred by the statute of limitations, a federal court in equity can take cognizance of the suit because there is diversity of citizenship between the parties. Is the outlawry, according to State law, of a claim created by the States a matter of “substantive rights” to be respected by a federal court of equity when that court’s jurisdiction is dependent on the fact that there is a State-created right, or is such statute of “a mere remedial character,” * * * which a federal court may disregard?

Matters of “substance” and matters of “procedure” are much talked about in the books as though they defined a great divide cutting across the whole domain of law. But, of course, “substance” and “procedure” are the same keywords to very different problems. Neither “substance” nor “procedure” represents the same invariants. Each implies different variables depending upon the particular problem for which it is used. * * * And the different problems are only distantly related at best, for the terms are in common use in connection with situations turning on such different considerations as those that are relevant to questions pertaining to ex post facto legislation, the impairment of the obligations of contract, the enforcement of federal rights in the State courts and the multitudinous phases of the conflict of laws. * * *

Here we are dealing with a right to recover derived not from the United States but from one of the States. When, because the plaintiff happens to be a non-resident, such a right is enforceable in a federal as well as in a State court, the forms and mode of enforcing the right may at times, naturally enough, vary because the two judicial systems are not identical. But since a federal court adjudicating a State-created right solely because of the diversity of citizenship of the parties is for that purpose, in effect, only another court of the State, it cannot afford recovery if the right to recover is made unavailable by the State nor can it substantially affect the enforcement of the right as given by the State.

And so the question is not whether a statute of limitations is deemed a matter of “procedure” in some sense. The question is whether such a statute concerns merely the manner and the means by which a right to recover, as recognized by the State, is enforced, or whether such statutory limitation is a matter of substance in the aspect that alone is relevant to our problem, namely, does it significantly affect the result of a litigation for a federal court to disregard a law of a State that would be controlling in an action upon the same claim by the same parties in a State court?

457

It is therefore immaterial whether statutes of limitation are characterized either as “substantive” or “procedural” in State court opinions in any use of those terms unrelated to the specific issue before us. Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins was not an endeavor to formulate scientific legal terminology. It expressed a policy that touches vitally the proper distribution of judicial power between State and federal courts. In essence, the intent of that decision was to insure that, in all cases where a federal court is exercising jurisdiction solely because of the diversity of citizenship of the parties, the outcome of the litigation in the federal court should be substantially the same, so far as legal rules determine the outcome of a litigation, as it would be if tried in a State court. The nub of the policy that underlies Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins is that for the same transaction the accident of a suit by a non-resident litigant in a federal court instead of in a State court a block away should not lead to a substantially different result. * * * A policy so important to our federalism must be kept free from entanglements with analytical or terminological niceties.

Plainly enough, a statute that would completely bar recovery in a suit if brought in a State court bears on a State-created right vitally and not merely formally or negligibly. As to consequences that so intimately affect recovery or non-recovery a federal court in a diversity case should follow State law. * * *

Diversity jurisdiction is founded on assurance to non-resident litigants of courts free from susceptibility to potential local bias. The Framers of the Constitution, according to Marshall, entertained “apprehensions” lest distant suitors be subjected to local bias in State courts, or, at least, viewed with “indulgence the possible fears and apprehensions” of such suitors. Bank of the United States v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch 61, 87, 3 L.Ed. 38. And so Congress afforded out-of-State litigants another tribunal, not another body of law. The operation of a double system of conflicting laws in the same State is plainly hostile to the reign of law. Certainly, the fortuitous circumstance of residence out of a State of one of the parties to a litigation ought not to give rise to a discrimination against others equally concerned but locally resident. The source of substantive rights enforced by a federal court under diversity jurisdiction, it cannot be said too often, is the law of the States. * * *

The judgment is reversed and the case is remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

Reversed.

JUSTICE ROBERTS and JUSTICE DOUGLAS took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

458

JUSTICE RUTLEDGE dissented in an opinion in which JUSTICE MURPHY joined.

* * * [T]he decision of today does not in so many words rule that Congress could not authorize the federal courts to administer equitable relief in accordance with the substantive rights of the parties, notwithstanding state courts had been forbidden by local statutes of limitations to do so. Nevertheless the implication to that effect seems strong, in view of the reliance upon Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins. * * * In any event, the question looms more largely in the issues than the Court’s opinion appears to make it. For if legislative acquiescence in long-established judicial construction can make it part of a statute, it has done so in this instance. More is at stake in the implications of the decision, if not in the words of the opinion, than simply bringing federal and local law into accord upon matters clearly and exclusively within the constitutional power of the state to determine. It is one thing to require that kind of an accord in diversity cases when the question is merely whether the federal court must follow the law of the state as to burden of proof, * * * contributory negligence, * * * or perhaps in application of the so-called parol evidence rule. These ordinarily involve matters of substantive law, though nominated in terms of procedure. But in some instances their application may lie along the border between procedure or remedy and substance, where the one may or may not be in fact but another name for the other. It is exactly in this borderland, where procedural or remedial rights may or may not have the effect of determining the substantive ones completely, that caution is required in extending the rule of the Erie case by the very rule itself.

The words “substantive” and “procedural” or “remedial” are not talismanic. Merely calling a legal question by one or the other does not resolve it otherwise than as a purely authoritarian performance. * * * But they have come to designate in a broad way large and distinctive legal domains within the greater one of the law and to mark, though often indistinctly or with overlapping limits, many divides between such regions.

* * * The large division between adjective law and substantive law still remains, to divide the power of Congress from that of the states and consequently to determine the power of the federal courts to apply federal law or state law in diversity matters.

This division, like others drawn by the broad allocation of adjective or remedial and substantive, has areas of admixture of these two aspects of the law. In these areas whether a particular situation or issue presents one aspect or the other depends upon how one looks at the matter. * * *

Whenever this integration or admixture prevails in a substantial measure, so that a clean break cannot be made, there is danger either of nullifying the power of Congress to control not only how the federal courts may act, but what they may do by way of affording remedies, or of usurping that function, if the Erie doctrine is to be expanded judicially to include such situations to the utmost extent.

459

It may be true that if the matter were wholly fresh the barring of rights in equity by statutes of limitation would seem to partake more of the substantive than of the remedial phase of law. But the matter is not fresh and it is not without room for debate. A long tradition, in the states and here, as well as in the common law which antedated both state and federal law, has emphasized the remedial character of statutes of limitations, more especially in application to equity causes, on many kinds of issues requiring differentiation of such matters from more clearly and exclusively substantive ones. * * * The tradition now in question is equally long and unvaried. I cannot say the tradition is clearly wrong in this case more than in that. Nor can I say, as was said in the Erie case, that the matter is beyond the power of Congress to control. If that be conceded, I think Congress should make the change if it is to be made. The Erie decision was rendered in 1938. Seven years have passed without action by Congress to extend the rule to these matters. That is long enough to justify the conclusion that Congress also regards them as not governed by Erie and as wishing to make no change. This should be reason enough for leaving the matter at rest until it decides to act. * * *

Applicable statutes of limitations in state tribunals are not always the ones which would apply if suit were instituted in the courts of the state which creates the substantive rights for which enforcement is sought. The state of the forum is free to apply its own period of limitations, regardless of whether the state originating the right has barred suit upon it. Whether or not the action will be held to be barred depends therefore not upon the law of the state which creates the substantive right, but upon the law of the state where suit may be brought. This in turn will depend upon where it may be possible to secure service of process, and thus jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. It may be therefore that because of the plaintiff’s inability to find the defendant in the jurisdiction which creates his substantive right, he will be foreclosed of remedy by the sheer necessity of going to the haven of refuge within which the defendant confines its “presence” for jurisdictional purposes. The law of the latter may bar the suit even though suit still would be allowed under the law of the state creating the substantive right.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.What purposes do statutes of limitations serve? Are these purposes “substantive”? Procedural? Consider the following comment:

Limitations law is famously a body of rules that are neither grass nor hay, being at once both substantive and procedural. In one sense, limitations law is clearly procedural—a sibling or at least a cousin to summary judgment. It is a means of clearing dockets, of protecting both the court and the defendant from waste, and of protecting the defendant from the unjust coercion that can result simply from the threat of waste. It is also a crude means of evaluating proof, a device to protect fact finders from being beguiled by stale and, therefore, suspect proof. * * * They are a tool of judicial administration and an allocation of scarce judicial resources, and thus in classical American conflicts dogma are characterized as procedural.

460

In another sense, however, limitations law is substantive. Repose is a social and political value with economic consequences. Limitations law is thus a means of healing and stabilizing relationships. It reduces the general level of stress and anxiety, protecting even plaintiffs from the self-injuries that result when resentments are nourished for too long. Limitations “quicken diligence by making it in some measure equivalent to right.” * * * They also facilitate and induce economic planning and development. These effects of limitations law occur outside the courthouse and have no bearing on the quality or accuracy of judicial proceedings. To the extent that these considerations are paramount, limitations law can be characterized as substantive.

Carrington, “Substance” and “Procedure” in the Rules Enabling Act, 1989 Duke L.J. 281, 290.

2.If a New York equity court would not grant relief for whatever reason, should a federal court sitting in diversity nevertheless do so on the identical claim? In answering this question, consider Justice Frankfurter’s discussion of the difference between recognizing a state-created right and providing a remedy for infringement of that right. Could it not be argued that available remedies actually define the scope of the underlying rights? Compare Sonner v. Premier Nutrition Corp., 971 F.3d 834, 841–44 (9th Cir. 2020) (finding that a federal court cannot award equitable restitution when an adequate legal remedy exists even if state law authorizes such relief “unhampered” by that restriction), with New Mexico ex rel. Balderas v. Real Estate Law Center, P.C., 401 F.Supp.3d 1229, 1348–50 n.93 (D.N.M. 2019) (applying New Mexico’s standard for equitable relief even though it was “less stringent” than the federal test).

3.To what extent does York require the displacement of a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure in favor of a contrary state practice? Does that result follow from application of the Rules of Decision Act? If not, what is the basis for the Court’s holding?

4. Four years after York, the Supreme Court, all on the same day, decided a trio of cases involving the Erie doctrine:

RAGAN v. MERCHANTS TRANSFER & WAREHOUSE CO., 337 U.S. 530, 69 S.Ct. 1233, 93 L.Ed. 1520 (1949), grew out of a highway accident that occurred on October 1, 1943. On September 4, 1945, Ragan filed a diversity action in a federal court in Kansas. However, service was not made on defendant until December 28. Kansas had a two-year statute of limitations on tort claims. Ragan claimed that according to Federal Rule 3, the suit was commenced (and hence the statute tolled) by the filing of the complaint. Defendant countered that Kansas law dictated that service had to have been made within the two-year period. The Supreme Court held that state law would determine in a diversity action when the statute was tolled. Justice Douglas, writing for the Court, explained:

461

[T]here can be no doubt that the suit was properly commenced in the federal court. But in the present case we look to local law to find the cause of action on which suit is brought. Since that cause of action is created by local law, the measure of it is to be found only in local law. It carries the same burden and is subject to the same defense in the federal court as in the state court. * * * It accrues and comes to an end when local law so declares. * * * Where local law qualifies or abridges it, the federal court must follow suit. Otherwise there is a different measure of the cause of action in one court than in the other, and the principle of Erie * * * is transgressed.

Id. at 533, 69 S.Ct. at 1235, 93 L.Ed. at 1523. Justice Rutledge dissented. Under Ragan, does state or federal law determine whether a suit to enforce federal law “was properly commenced in the federal court”?

In WOODS v. INTERSTATE REALTY CO., 337 U.S. 535, 69 S.Ct. 1235, 93 L.Ed. 1524 (1949), the Court held that a Tennessee corporation that had not qualified to do business in Mississippi could not maintain a diversity action in a federal court in that state if, by virtue of its failure to qualify, the Mississippi state courts were closed to it. Justice Douglas, again writing for the Court, explained:

The York case was premised on the theory that a right which local law creates but which it does not supply with a remedy is no right at all for purposes of enforcement in a federal court in a diversity case; that where in such cases one is barred from recovery in the state court, he should likewise be barred in the federal court. The contrary result would create discriminations against citizens of the State in favor of those authorized to invoke the diversity jurisdiction of the federal courts. It was that element of discrimination that Erie * * * was designed to eliminate.

Id. at 538, 69 S.Ct. at 1237, 93 L.Ed. at 1527. Justices Jackson, Rutledge, and Burton dissented.

Finally, in COHEN v. BENEFICIAL INDUSTRIAL LOAN CORP., 337 U.S. 541, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 93 L.Ed. 1528 (1949), the Court, in an opinion written by Justice Jackson, held that a federal court must apply a New Jersey statute requiring a plaintiff in a shareholder derivative suit to post a security-for-expenses bond—even though what is now Federal Rule 23.1, which ostensibly governs such cases, did not require a bond. The Court found that regardless of whether the New Jersey statute was classified as procedural or substantive, it created substantive liabilities for expenses. In the Court’s view, the federal rule did not contradict the New Jersey statute, but rather addressed independent concerns. Justice Douglas, joined by Justice Frankfurter, dissented on the ground that the New Jersey statute regulated “only the procedure for instituting a particular cause of action and hence need not be applied” in a diversity suit. Justice Rutledge’s lengthy dissent “expressed grave doubt” whether Erie’s rule that federal diversity courts follow state decisional law rested on “any solid constitutional foundation,” and he criticized ceding control of diversity jurisdiction from Congress to the states. Id. at 558, 69 S.Ct. at 1231, 93 L.Ed. at 1543.

462

5.Almost any legal rule, whether labeled procedural or substantive, has the potential to affect the outcome of litigation. Does this mean that, after York, a federal court in a diversity case must apply every state legal rule that, if enforced, would affect the lawsuit’s result? Does this include housekeeping rules like rules about the size of briefs or the color of paper used? Did Justice Frankfurter mean any rule that could affect the outcome, or would he say that only rules that influence a lawyer’s choice of forum at the time of filing are “outcome determinative”?

6.Evaluate the following passage:

The York case, of necessity, spelled death to the hope for a completely uniform federal procedure. When its doctrine is logically applied, each important step in a diversity action must be examined in the light of two systems of law—first, under the Federal Rules, and then under the law of the state in which the federal court sits. In one state, a particular Rule might not clash with a local law or decision which significantly bears upon the outcome of a litigation. Under such circumstances, the Rule should prevail, although the determination as to its applicability is actually made under state law. In another state, the same Rule might conflict in some substantial way with that state’s policy or law. In such instances, state law, and not the Rule, will govern a federal court’s decision.

Merrigan, Erie to York to Ragan—A Triple Play on the Federal Rules, 3 Vand. L. Rev. 711, 717 (1950).

BYRD v. BLUE RIDGE RURAL ELECTRIC COOPERATIVE, INC.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1958.
356 U.S. 525, 78 S.Ct. 893, 2 L.Ed.2d 953.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case was brought in the District Court for the Western District of South Carolina. Jurisdiction was based on diversity of citizenship. * * * The petitioner, a resident of North Carolina, sued respondent, a South Carolina corporation, for damages for injuries allegedly caused by the respondent's negligence. He had judgment on a jury verdict. The Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit reversed and directed the entry of judgment for the respondent. * * *

463

The respondent is in the business of selling electric power to subscribers in rural sections of South Carolina. The petitioner was employed as a lineman in the construction crew of a construction contractor. The contractor, R.H. Bouligny, Inc., held a contract with the respondent * * * for the building of some * * * power lines, the reconversion to higher capacities of * * * existing lines, and the construction of 2 new substations and a breaker station. The petitioner was injured while connecting power lines to one of the new substations.

One of respondent's affirmative defenses was that under the South Carolina Workmen's Compensation Act, the petitioner—because the work contracted to be done by his employer was work of the kind also done by the respondent's own construction and maintenance crews—had the status of a statutory employee of the respondent and was therefore barred from suing the respondent at law because obliged to accept statutory compensation benefits as the exclusive remedy for his injuries. Two questions concerning this defense are before us: (1) whether the Court of Appeals erred in directing judgment for respondent without a remand to give petitioner an opportunity to introduce further evidence; and (2) whether petitioner, state practice notwithstanding, is entitled to a jury determination of the factual issues raised by this defense.

* * *

[The Supreme Court initially decided to remand the case to the trial court to provide the petitioner an opportunity to introduce evidence on the question of whether the respondent was a statutory employer.]

A question is also presented as to whether on remand the factual issue is to be decided by the judge or by the jury. The respondent argues on the basis of the decision of the Supreme Court of South Carolina in Adams v. Davison-Paxon Co., 230 S.C. 532, 96 S.E.2d 566, that the issue of immunity should be decided by the judge and not by the jury. That was a negligence action brought in the state trial court against a store owner by an employee of an independent contractor who operated the store's millinery department. The trial judge denied the store owner's motion for a directed verdict made upon the ground that [South Carolina Code, 1952] § 72–111 barred the plaintiff's action. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The South Carolina Supreme Court reversed, holding that it was for the judge and not the jury to decide on the evidence whether the owner was a statutory employer, and that the store owner had sustained his defense. * * *

464

The respondent argues that this state-court decision governs the present diversity case and “divests the jury of its normal function” to decide the disputed fact question of the respondent's immunity under § 72–111. This is to contend that the federal court is bound under Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins * * * to follow the state court's holding to secure uniform enforcement of the immunity created by the State.

First. It was decided in Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins that the federal courts in diversity cases must respect the definition of state-created rights and obligations by the state courts. We must, therefore, first examine the rule in Adams v. Davison-Paxon Co. to determine whether it is bound up with these rights and obligations in such a way that its application in the federal court is required. * * *

The Workmen's Compensation Act is administered in South Carolina by its Industrial Commission. The South Carolina courts hold that, on judicial review of actions of the Commission under § 72–111, the question whether the claim of an injured workman is within the Commission's jurisdiction is a matter of law for decision by the court, which makes its own findings of fact relating to that jurisdiction. The South Carolina Supreme Court states no reasons in Adams v. Davison-Paxon Co. why, although the jury decides all other factual issues raised by the cause of action and defenses, the jury is displaced as to the factual issue raised by the affirmative defense under § 72–111. * * * A State may, of course, distribute the functions of its judicial machinery as it sees fit. The decisions relied upon, however, furnish no reason for selecting the judge rather than the jury to decide this single affirmative defense in the negligence action. They simply reflect a policy * * * that administrative determination of “jurisdictional facts” should not be final but subject to judicial review. The conclusion is inescapable that the Adams holding is grounded in the practical consideration that the question had theretofore come before the South Carolina courts from the Industrial Commission and the courts had become accustomed to deciding the factual issue of immunity without the aid of juries. We find nothing to suggest that this rule was announced as an integral part of the special relationship created by the statute. Thus the requirement appears to be merely a form and mode of enforcing the immunity * * * and not a rule intended to be bound up with the definition of the rights and obligations of the parties. * * *

Second. But cases following Erie have evinced a broader policy to the effect that the federal courts should conform as near as may be—in the absence of other considerations—to state rules even of form and mode where the state rules may bear substantially on the question whether the litigation would come out one way in the federal court and another way in the state court if the federal court failed to apply a particular local rule. E.g., Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. York * * *; Bernhardt v. Polygraphic Co., 350 U.S. 198, 76 S.Ct. 273, 100 L.Ed. 199. Concededly the nature of the tribunal which tries issues may be important in the enforcement of the parcel of rights making up a cause of action or defense, and bear significantly upon achievement of uniform enforcement of the right. It may well be that in the instant personal-injury case the outcome would be substantially affected by whether the issue of immunity is decided by a judge or a jury. Therefore, were “outcome” the only consideration, a strong case might appear for saying that the federal court should follow the state practice.

465

But there are affirmative countervailing considerations at work here. The federal system is an independent system for administering justice to litigants who properly invoke its jurisdiction. An essential characteristic of that system is the manner in which, in civil common-law actions, it distributes trial functions between judge and jury and, under the influence—if not the command—of the Seventh Amendment, assigns the decisions of disputed questions of fact to the jury. * * * The policy of uniform enforcement of state-created rights and obligations * * * cannot in every case exact compliance with a state rule—not bound up with rights and obligations—which disrupts the federal system of allocating functions between judge and jury. * * * Thus the inquiry here is whether the federal policy favoring jury decisions of disputed fact questions should yield to the state rule in the interest of furthering the objective that the litigation should not come out one way in the federal court and another way in the state court.

We think that in the circumstances of this case the federal court should not follow the state rule. It cannot be gainsaid that there is a strong federal policy against allowing state rules to disrupt the judge-jury relationship in the federal courts. In Herron v. Southern Pacific Co., [283 U.S. 91, 51 S.Ct. 383, 75 L.Ed. 857 (1931)] * * * the trial judge in a personal-injury negligence action brought in the District Court for Arizona on diversity grounds directed a verdict for the defendant when it appeared as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The federal judge refused to be bound by a provision of the Arizona Constitution which made the jury the sole arbiter of the question of contributory negligence. This Court sustained the action of the trial judge, holding that “state laws cannot alter the essential character or function of a federal court” because that function “is not in any sense a local matter, and state statutes which would interfere with the appropriate performance of that function are not binding upon the federal court under either the Conformity Act or the ‘Rules of Decision’ Act.” * * * Perhaps even more clearly in light of the influence of the Seventh Amendment, the function assigned to the jury “is an essential factor in the process for which the Federal Constitution provides.” * * * Concededly the Herron case was decided before Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, but even when Swift v. Tyson * * * was governing law and allowed federal courts sitting in diversity cases to disregard state decisional law, it was never thought that state statutes or constitutions were similarly to be disregarded. * * * Yet Herron held that state statutes and constitutional provisions could not disrupt or alter the essential character or function of a federal court.¹⁴

466

Third. We have discussed the problem upon the assumption that the outcome of the litigation may be substantially affected by whether the issue of immunity is decided by a judge or a jury. But clearly there is not present here the certainty that a different result would follow * * * or even the strong possibility that this would be the case * * *. There are factors present here which might reduce that possibility. The trial judge in the federal system has powers denied the judges of many States to comment on the weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses, and discretion to grant a new trial if the verdict appears to him to be against the weight of the evidence. We do not think the likelihood of a different result is so strong as to require the federal practice of jury determination of disputed factual issues to yield to the state rule in the interest of uniformity of outcome.¹⁵

* * *

Reversed and remanded.

* * *

[JUSTICE WHITTAKER concurred in Part I of the Court’s opinion but dissented from Part II on the ground that the South Carolina rule requiring “its courts—not juries—to determine whether jurisdiction over the subject matter of cases like this is vested in its Industrial Commission” should be honored by a federal court. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER and JUSTICE HARLAN dissented on the ground that the evidence required the District Court to direct a verdict for the respondent.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.The Cou rt’s analysis in Byrd proceeds in three parts. It starts with an analysis of the South Carolina statute. Do you agree with Justice Brennan’s assertion that the South Carolina rule is “merely a form and mode of enforcing the immunity * * * and not a rule intended to be bound up with the definition of the rights and obligations of the parties”? Most states have adopted their worker-compensation schemes only after carefully balancing the equities

involved in the typical workplace accident. These statutes are complex and detailed and often are the result of a political compromise. Does it seem likely, then, that South Carolina randomly would have appropriated to the judge the function of defining a statutory employee?

2.In the second part of the decision, the Court moved toward a consideration of the importance of the federal interest that is at stake. What does Justice Brennan mean that “the influence * * * if not the command of the Seventh Amendment” determined the result in Byrd? If the Seventh Amendment provides a rule of decision for Byrd, isn’t the Rules of Decision Act inapplicable by its own terms? Indeed, if the Seventh Amendment “commands” that a federal court utilize a jury to decide who is a statutory employee, could the Rules of Decision Act dictate a contrary result? On the other hand, if the Seventh Amendment does not “command” the result in Byrd, why should it “influence” the result? Of what relevance is the fact that the Seventh Amendment, unlike other provisions of the Bill of Rights, does not apply to the states through incorporation in the Fourteenth Amendment? For further discussion of the Seventh Amendment, see Chapter 14, infra.

3.The Court’s analysis concludes with an assessment of whether the judge/jury allocation may affect the outcome of the lawsuit. Do you agree with the Court’s conclusion? Is the analysis consistent with York?

4.In carrying out the Byrd-balancing test, how does a federal court identify and weigh the competing state and federal policies? In ALLSTATE INS. CO. v. CHARNESKI, 286 F.2d 238 (7th Cir. 1960), the court dismissed an action for a judgment declaring an insurance company’s nonliability. The court, after reviewing the major Erie-doctrine cases and concluding that a Wisconsin court would dismiss the action before it, employed the following reasoning:

First, as to the State of Wisconsin. This is not a case where a federal declaratory judgment action is filed in a state which has no statute providing for such relief. Wisconsin has passed a general statute providing declaratory relief. However, this statute was held not applicable * * * [by the Wisconsin Supreme Court] because it conflicted with the Wisconsin state policy of providing direct actions against insurance companies. This is a declaration of the substantive law of Wisconsin. The Wisconsin Supreme Court held that to allow declaratory relief in such circumstances would undercut its policy of direct actions against an insurance company and thereby concluding the action—defining the rights of the insurer, the insured, and the injured party—in a single suit. This holding represents a legitimate and proper implementation of Wisconsin policy. * * *

The federal interest to be served here is slight. There is the general interest of a court controlling its own procedure. There is the general policy evidenced by the federal Declaratory Judgments Act. However, no right to jury trial, guaranteed by the Seventh Amendment, is involved here, as in Byrd. The cause of action arising from the accident, the issue of coverage of the policy, and the rights of the insured, the insurer and the injured parties are intimately connected with Wisconsin law and have no connection with the federal government except that the latter provides a fair and orderly forum in which to try the diversity case. Finally, relief under the Federal act is expressly discretionary. Such relief is permissive and not absolute. Declaratory relief “may” be granted, and need not be when it would create an unnecessary federal-state conflict.

Id. at 244. Is the court’s analysis of the Wisconsin and federal policies adequate? Is it persuasive?

5.Commentators associate Byrd with a balancing test for determining when state law should displace federal law in a diversity action. Does the balancing test replace the outcome-determinative test of York? If a state rule is “bound up with the definition of the rights and obligations of the parties,” does a federal court still engage in balancing?

In 1934, Congress passed 28 U.S.C. § 2072, known as the Rules Enabling Act. Read the current version of this Act, which is in the Supplement.

HANNA V. PLUMER

Supreme Court of the United States, 1965.
380 U.S. 460, 85 S.Ct. 1136, 14 L.Ed.2d 8.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit.

CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question to be decided is whether, in a civil action where the jurisdiction of the United States District Court is based upon diversity of citizenship * * *, service of process shall be made in the manner prescribed by state law or that set forth in Rule 4(d)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.^a

On February 6, 1963, petitioner, a citizen of Ohio, filed her complaint in the District Court for the District of Massachusetts, claiming damages in excess of $10,000 for personal injuries resulting from an automobile accident in South Carolina, allegedly caused by the negligence of one Louise Plumer Osgood, a Massachusetts citizen deceased at the time of the filing of the complaint. Respondent,

Mrs. Osgood’s executor and also a Massachusetts citizen, was named as defendant. On February 8, service was made by leaving copies of the summons and the complaint with respondent’s wife at his residence, concededly in compliance with Rule

469

4(d)(1) * * *. Respondent filed his answer on February 26, alleging, inter alia, that the action could not be maintained because it had been brought “contrary to and in violation of the provisions of Massachusetts General Laws (Ter.Ed.) Chapter 197, Section 9.” That section provides:

Except as provided in this chapter, an executor or administrator shall not be held to answer to an action by a creditor of the deceased which is not commenced within one year from the time of his giving bond for the performance of his trust, or to such an action which is commenced within said year unless before the expiration thereof the writ in such action has been served by delivery in hand upon such executor or administrator or service thereof accepted by him or a notice stating the name of the estate, the name and address of the creditor, the amount of the claim and the court in which the action has been brought has been filed in the proper registry of probate. * * *

On October 17, 1963, the District Court granted respondent’s motion for summary judgment, citing Ragan * * * and York * * * in support of its conclusion that the adequacy of the service was to be measured by § 9, with which, the court held, petitioner had not complied. On appeal, petitioner * * * argued that Rule 4(d)(1) defines the method by which service of process is to be effected in diversity actions. The Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, finding that “[r]elatively recent amendments [to § 9] evince a clear legislative purpose to require personal notification within the year,”¹ concluded that the conflict of state and federal rules was over “a substantive rather than a procedural matter,” and unanimously affirmed. * * *

We conclude that the adoption of Rule 4(d)(1), designed to control service of process in diversity actions, neither exceeded the congressional mandate embodied in the Rules Enabling Act nor transgressed constitutional bounds, and that the Rule is therefore the standard against which the District Court should have measured the adequacy of the service. Accordingly, we reverse the decision of the Court of Appeals.

470

* * * Under the cases construing the scope of the Enabling Act, Rule 4(d)(1) clearly passes muster. Prescribing the manner in which a defendant is to be notified that a suit has been instituted against him, it relates to the “practice and procedure of the district courts.” * * *

The test must be whether a rule really regulates procedure,—the judicial process for enforcing rights and duties recognized by substantive law and for justly administering remedy and redress for disregard or infraction of them. Sibbach v. Wilson & Co. * * * [p. 477, infra].

In Mississippi Pub. Corp. v. Murphree, 326 U.S. 438, 66 S.Ct. 242, 90 L.Ed. 185, this Court upheld Rule 4(f),^b which permits service of a summons anywhere within the State (and not merely the district) in which a district court sits:

We think that Rule 4(f) is in harmony with the Enabling Act * * *. Undoubtedly most alterations of the rules of practice and procedure may and often do affect the rights of litigants. Congress’ prohibition of any alteration of substantive rights of litigants was obviously not addressed to such incidental effects as necessarily attend the adoption of the prescribed new rules of procedure upon the rights of litigants who, agreeably to rules of practice and procedure, have been brought before a court authorized to determine their rights. * * * The fact that the application of Rule 4(f) will operate to subject petitioner’s rights to adjudication by the district court for northern Mississippi will undoubtedly affect those rights. But it does not operate to abridge, enlarge or modify the rules of decision by which that court will adjudicate its rights. Id., at 445–446, 66 S.Ct. at 246.

Thus were there no conflicting state procedure, Rule 4(d)(1) would clearly control. National Equipment Rental, Ltd. v. Szukhent * * * [p. 257, supra]. However, respondent, focusing on the contrary Massachusetts rule, calls to the Court’s attention another line of cases, a line which—like the Enabling Act—had its birth in 1938. Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins * * * held that federal courts sitting in diversity cases, when deciding questions of “substantive” law, are bound by state court decisions as well as state statutes. The broad command of Erie was therefore identical to that of the Enabling Act: federal courts are to apply state substantive law and federal procedural law. However, as subsequent cases sharpened the distinction between substance and procedure, the line of cases following Erie diverged markedly from the line construing the Enabling Act. * * *

471

Respondent, by placing primary reliance on York and Ragan, suggests that the Erie doctrine acts as a check on the Federal Rules * * *, that despite the clear command of Rule 4(d)(1), Erie and its progeny demand the application of the Massachusetts rule. Reduced to essentials, the argument is: (1) Erie, as refined in York, demands that federal courts apply state law whenever application of federal law in its stead will alter the outcome of the case. (2) In this case, a determination that the Massachusetts service requirements obtain will result in immediate victory for respondent. If, on the other hand, it should be held that Rule 4(d)(1) is applicable, the litigation will continue, with possible victory for petitioner. (3) Therefore, Erie demands application of the Massachusetts rule. The syllogism possesses an appealing simplicity, but is for several reasons invalid.

In the first place, it is doubtful that, even if there were no Federal Rule making it clear that in hand service is not required in diversity actions, the Erie rule would have obligated the District Court to follow the Massachusetts procedure. “Outcome determination” analysis was never intended to serve as a talisman. Byrd v. Blue Ridge Rural Elec. Cooperative * * *. Indeed, the message of York itself is that choices between state and federal law are to be made not by application of any automatic, “litmus paper” criterion, but rather by reference to the policies underlying the Erie rule. * * *

The Erie rule is rooted in part in a realization that it would be unfair for the character or result of a litigation materially to differ because the suit had been brought in a federal court. * * * The decision was also in part a reaction to the practice of “forum-shopping” which had grown up in response to the rule of Swift v. Tyson. * * * That the York test was an attempt to effectuate these policies is demonstrated by the fact that the opinion framed the inquiry in terms of “substantial” variations between state and federal litigation. * * * Not only are nonsubstantial, or trivial, variations not likely to raise the sort of equal protection problems which troubled the Court in Erie; they are also unlikely to influence the choice of a forum. The “outcome-determination” test therefore cannot be read without reference to the twin aims of the Erie rule: discouragement of forum-shopping and avoidance of inequitable administration of the laws.⁹

472

The difference between the conclusion that the Massachusetts rule is applicable, and the conclusion that it is not, is of course at this point “outcome-determinative” in the sense that if we hold the state rule to apply, respondent prevails, whereas if we hold that Rule 4(d)(1) governs, the litigation will continue. But in this sense every procedural variation is “outcome-determinative.” For example, having brought suit in a federal court, a plaintiff cannot then insist on the right to file subsequent pleadings in accord with the time limits applicable in state courts, even though enforcement of the federal timetable will, if he continues to insist that he must meet only the state time limit, result in determination of the controversy against him. So it is here. Though choice of the federal or state rule will at this point have a marked effect upon the outcome of the litigation, the difference between the two rules would be of scant, if any, relevance to the choice of a forum. Petitioner, in choosing her forum, was not presented with a situation where application of the state rule would wholly bar recovery; rather, adherence to the state rule would have resulted only in altering the way in which process was served.¹¹ Moreover, it is difficult to argue that permitting service of defendant’s wife to take the place of in hand service of defendant himself alters the mode of enforcement of state-created rights in a fashion sufficiently “substantial” to raise the sort of equal protection problems to which the Erie opinion alluded.

There is, however, a more fundamental flaw in respondent’s syllogism: the incorrect assumption that the rule of Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins constitutes the appropriate test of the validity and therefore the applicability of a Federal Rule * * *. The Erie rule has never been invoked to void a Federal Rule. It is true that there have been cases where this Court has held applicable a state rule in the face of an argument that the situation was governed by one of the Federal Rules. But the holding of each such case was not that Erie commanded displacement of a Federal Rule by an inconsistent state rule, but rather that the scope of the Federal Rule was not as broad as the losing party urged, and therefore, there being no Federal Rule which covered the point in dispute, Erie commanded the enforcement of state law. * * * (Here, of course, the clash is unavoidable; Rule 4(d)(1) says—implicitly, but with unmistakable clarity—that in hand service is not required in federal courts.) At the same time, in cases adjudicating the validity of Federal Rules, we have not applied the York rule or other refinements of Erie, but have to this day continued to decide questions concerning the scope of the Enabling Act and the constitutionality of specific Federal Rules in light of the distinction set forth in Sibbach. * * *

473

Nor has the development of two separate lines of cases been inadvertent. The line between “substance” and “procedure” shifts as the legal context changes. * * * It is true that both the Enabling Act and the Erie rule say, roughly, that federal courts are to apply state “substantive” law and federal “procedural” law, but from that it need not follow that the tests are identical. For they were designed to control very different sorts of decisions. When a situation is covered by one of the Federal Rules, the question facing the court is a far cry from the typical, relatively unguided Erie choice: the court has been instructed to apply the Federal Rule, and can refuse to do so only if the Advisory Committee, this Court, and Congress erred in their prima facie judgment that the Rule in question transgresses neither the terms of the Enabling Act nor constitutional restrictions.

We are reminded by the Erie opinion that neither Congress nor the federal courts can, under the guise of formulating rules of decision for federal courts, fashion rules which are not supported by a grant of federal authority contained in Article I or some other section of the Constitution; in such areas state law must govern because there can be no other law. But the opinion in Erie, which involved no Federal Rule and dealt with a question which was “substantive” in every traditional sense * * *, surely neither said nor implied that measures like Rule 4(d)(1) are unconstitutional. For the constitutional provision for a federal court system (augmented by the Necessary and Proper Clause) carries with it congressional power to make rules governing the practice and pleading in those courts, which in turn includes a power to regulate matters which, though falling within the uncertain area between substance and procedure, are rationally capable of classification as either. * * * Neither York nor the cases following it ever suggested that the rule there laid down for coping with situations where no Federal Rule applies is coextensive with the limitation on Congress to which Erie had adverted. Although this Court has never before been confronted with a case where the applicable Federal Rule is in direct collision with the law of the relevant State, courts of appeals faced with such clashes have rightly discerned the implications of our decisions.

“One of the shaping purposes of the Federal Rules is to bring about uniformity in the federal courts by getting away from local rules. This is especially true of matters which relate to the administration of legal proceedings, an area in which federal courts have traditionally exerted strong inherent power, completely aside from the powers Congress expressly conferred in the Rules. The purpose of the Erie doctrine, even as extended in York and Ragan, was never to bottle up federal courts with ‘outcome-determinative’ and ‘integral-relations’ stoppers when there are ‘affirmative countervailing [federal] considerations’ and when there is a Congressional mandate (the Rules) supported by constitutional authority.” Lumbermen’s Mutual Casualty Co. v. Wright, 322 F.2d 759, 764 (C.A.5th Cir. 1963).

474

Erie and its offspring cast no doubt on the long-recognized power of Congress to prescribe housekeeping rules for federal courts even though some of those rules will inevitably differ from comparable state rules. * * * Thus, though a court, in measuring a Federal Rule against the standards contained in the Enabling Act and the Constitution, need not wholly blind itself to the degree to which the Rule makes the character and result of the federal litigation stray from the course it would follow in state courts, * * * it cannot be forgotten that the Erie rule, and the guidelines suggested in York, were created to serve another purpose altogether. To hold that a Federal Rule * * * must cease to function whenever it alters the mode of enforcing state-created rights would be to disembowel either the Constitution’s grant of power over federal procedure or Congress’ attempt to exercise that power in the Enabling Act. Rule 4(d)(1) is valid and controls the instant case.

Reversed.

JUSTICE BLACK concurs in the result.

JUSTICE HARLAN, concurring.

* * *

Erie was something more than an opinion which worried about “forum-shopping and avoidance of inequitable administration of the laws,” * * * although to be sure these were important elements of the decision. I have always regarded that decision as one of the modern cornerstones of our federalism, expressing policies that profoundly touch the allocation of judicial power between the state and federal systems. Erie recognized that there should not be two conflicting systems of law controlling the primary activity of citizens, for such alternative governing authority must necessarily give rise to a debilitating uncertainty in the planning of everyday affairs. And it recognized that the scheme of our Constitution envisions an allocation of law-making functions between state and federal legislative processes which is undercut if the federal judiciary can make substantive law affecting state affairs beyond the bounds of congressional legislative powers in this regard. * * *

The shorthand formulations which have appeared in some past decisions are prone to carry untoward results that frequently arise from oversimplification. The Court is quite right in stating that the “outcome-determinative” test of [Guaranty Trust Co. v. York] * * * if taken literally, proves too much, for any rule, no matter how clearly “procedural,” can affect the outcome of litigation if it is not obeyed. In turning from the “outcome” test of Guaranty back to the unadorned forum-shopping rationale of Erie, however, the Court falls prey to like oversimplification, for a simple forum-shopping rule also proves too much; litigants often choose a federal forum merely to obtain what they consider the advantages of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or to try their cases before a supposedly more favorable judge. To my mind the proper line of approach in determining whether to apply a state or a federal rule, whether “substantive” or “procedural,” is to stay close to basic principles by inquiring if the choice of rule would substantially affect those primary decisions respecting human conduct which our constitutional system leaves to state regulation. If so, Erie and the Constitution require that the state rule prevail, even in the face of a conflicting federal rule.

475

The Court weakens, if indeed it does not submerge, this basic principle by finding, in effect, a grant of substantive legislative power in the constitutional provision for a federal court system * * *, and through it, setting up the Federal Rules as a body of law inviolate. * * * So long as a reasonable man could characterize any duly adopted federal rule as “procedural,” the Court, unless I misapprehend what is said, would have it apply no matter how seriously it frustrated a State’s substantive regulation of the primary conduct and affairs of its citizens. Since the members of the Advisory Committee, the Judicial Conference, and this Court who formulated the Federal Rules are presumably reasonable men, it follows that the integrity of the Federal Rules is absolute. Whereas the unadulterated outcome and forum-shopping tests may err too far toward honoring state rules, I submit that the Court’s “arguably procedural, ergo constitutional” test moves too fast and far in the other direction.

The courts below relied upon this Court’s decisions in Ragan * * * and Cohen * * *. Those cases deserve more attention than this Court has given them, particularly Ragan which, if still good law, would in my opinion call for affirmance of the result reached by the Court of Appeals. * * *

In Ragan * * * the Court held that for purposes of the Kansas statute of limitations a diversity tort action commenced only when service was made upon the defendant. I think that the decision was wrong. At most, application of the Federal Rule would have meant that potential Kansas tort defendants would have to defer for a few days the satisfaction of knowing that they had not been sued within the limitations period. The choice of the Federal Rule would have had no effect on the primary stages of private activity from which torts arise, and only the most minimal effect on behavior following the commission of the tort. In such circumstances the interest of the federal system in proceeding under its own rules should have prevailed.

476

Cohen * * * held that a diversity court must apply a state statute requiring a small stockholder in a stockholder derivative suit to post a bond * * *. Such a statute is not “outcome determinative”; the plaintiff can win with or without it. The Court now rationalizes the case on the ground that the statute might affect the plaintiff’s choice of forum * * * but as has been pointed out, a simple forum-shopping test proves too much. The proper view of Cohen is in my opinion, that the statute was meant to inhibit small stockholders from instituting “strike suits,” and thus it was designed and could be expected to have a substantial impact on private primary activity. Anyone who was at the trial bar during the period when Cohen arose can appreciate the strong state policy reflected in the statute. I think it wholly legitimate to view Federal Rule 23^c as not purporting to deal with the problem. But even had the Federal Rules purported to do so, and in so doing provided a substantially less effective deterrent to strike suits, I think the state rule should still have prevailed. * * *

It remains to apply what has been said to the present case. * * * The evident intent of [the Massachusetts] statute is to permit an executor to distribute the estate which he is administering without fear that further liabilities may be outstanding for which he could be held personally liable. If the Federal District Court in Massachusetts applies Rule 4(d)(1) * * * instead of the Massachusetts service rule, what effect would that have on the speed and assurance with which estates are distributed? As I see it, the effect would not be substantial. It would mean simply that an executor would have to check at his own house or the federal courthouse as well as the registry of probate before he could distribute the estate with impunity. As this does not seem enough to give rise to any real impingement on the vitality of the state policy which the Massachusetts rule is intended to serve, I concur in the judgment of the Court.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. How do the Rules Enabling Act and the Rules of Decision Act interact? Upon which of these two statutes is the holding in Hanna based? Can you explain why?

2.The distinction between substance and procedure is important to both the Rules Enabling Act and the Rules of Decision Act. The second sentence of the Rules Enabling Act says that no Federal Rule may “abridge, enlarge, or modify any substantive right,” and the distinction between substance and procedure is at the core of the line of cases interpreting the Rules of Decision Act. How does Chief Justice Warren treat the distinction between substance and procedure in Hanna? How does he define that distinction for purposes of the Rules Enabling Act? For purposes of the Rules of Decision Act? Are the definitions the same?

477

3.Chief Justice Warren’s opinion in Hanna relied on SIBBACH v. WILSON & CO., 312 U.S. 1, 61 S.Ct. 422, 85 L.Ed. 479 (1941), to define when a rule complies with the Rules Enabling Act. In Sibbach, plaintiff sued in an Illinois federal district court for damages inflicted in Indiana. The Supreme Court affirmed the district court’s order that plaintiff undergo a physical examination pursuant to Federal Rule 35, despite an Illinois policy forbidding compulsory physical examinations. The Court concluded that Rule 35 was within the ambit of the rulemaking power granted by Congress, since Rule 35 does not “abridge, enlarge, [or] modify substantive rights, in the guise of regulating procedure.” The Court rejected plaintiff’s argument that the Rules Enabling Act’s “substantive rights” limitation prohibited any rules that “deal with important and substantial rights.” In an opinion written by Justice Roberts, the Court held:

* * * If we were to adopt the suggested criterion of the importance of the alleged right we should invite endless litigation and confusion * * *. The test must be whether a rule really regulates procedure—the judicial process for enforcing rights and duties recognized by substantive law and for justly administering remedy and redress for disregard or infraction of them. That the rules in question are such is admitted.

Id. at 14, 61 S.Ct. at 426, 85 L.Ed. at 485. Justice Roberts also emphasized that the Rules Enabling Act empowers Congress to block proposed rules: “[T]he rules were submitted to the Congress so that that body might examine them and veto their going into effect if contrary to the policy of the legislature. * * * That no adverse action was taken by Congress indicates, at least, that no transgression of legislative policy was found.” Id. at 14–16, 61 S.Ct. at 427–28, 85 L.Ed. at 485–86.

Justice Frankfurter dissented in Sibbach. He argued that Rule 35, which provides for “the invasion of the person,” is quite different from other rules of procedure. He noted, furthermore, that the Rules automatically are effective absent a veto by Congress, so that “to draw any inference of tacit approval from non-action by Congress is to appeal to unreality.” In the dissent’s view, therefore, “to make the drastic change that Rule 35 sought to introduce would require explicit legislation.” Id. at 18, 61 S.Ct. at 428–29, 85 L.Ed. at 487.

4.Chief Justice Warren asserted that “the Erie rule is rooted in part in a realization that it would be unfair for the character or result of a litigation materially to differ because the suit had been brought in federal court” and “in part a reaction to the practice of ‘forum-shopping.’ ” Has he abandoned part of Justice Brandeis’s argument in Erie?

5. On what basis did Justice Harlan concur? What does he mean by “primary” decisions of conduct? Are you convinced that these activities are left by “our constitutional system * * * to state regulation”? Do you share his concern that under the majority opinion in Hanna any “arguably procedural” rule would apply “no matter how seriously it frustrated a State’s substantive regulation of the primary conduct and affairs of its citizens”? How does Justice Harlan identify and measure state interests for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 2072?

478

6. Justice Harlan called Erie “one of the modern cornerstones of our federalism.” Federalism in the United States is associated with a number of different values, including “freedom to experiment,” “flexibility in tailoring regulation to local needs,” “decentralization as a strategy to minimize factional control,” “independence as a source of strengthened protection of rights,” and “the superior democratic pedigree that comes from closer contact with the citizenry.” Kramer, The Lawmaking Power of the Federal Courts, 12 Pace L.Rev. 263, 295–96 (1992). How does Erie serve these values? How does Hanna?

7. Under Hanna, is a federal court required to apply a state statute that closes the doors of the state courts to suits by foreign corporations that have not registered to do business in the state? See Woods, p. 461, Note 4, supra. Can the authorization of diversity jurisdiction in Article III of the Constitution be said to generate a federal policy that there be a forum in every state for the protection of foreign corporations? Does anything turn on the nature of the policies underlying the state statute? See Szantay v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 349 F.2d 60 (4th Cir. 1965).

8. Professor Ely, who served as a law clerk to Chief Justice Warren the term that Hanna was decided, has emphasized the distinct analytic questions that a federal court must consider when faced with a federal-state choice-of-law question:

* * * [T]he indiscriminate admixture of all questions respecting choices between federal and state law in diversity cases, under the single rubric of “the Erie doctrine” or “the Erie problem,” has served to make a major mystery out of what are really three distinct and rather ordinary problems of statutory and constitutional interpretation. Of course there will be occasions with respect to all three on which reasonable persons will differ, but that does not make the problems mysterious or even very unusual. The United States Constitution, I shall argue, constitutes the relevant text only where Congress has passed a statute creating law for diversity actions, and it is in this situation alone that Hanna’s “arguably procedural” test controls. Where a nonstatutory rule is involved, the Constitution necessarily remains in the background, but it is functionally irrelevant because the applicable statutes are significantly more protective of the prerogatives of state law. Thus, where there is no relevant Federal Rule of Civil Procedure or other Rule promulgated pursuant to the Enabling Act and the federal rule in issue is therefore wholly judge-made, whether state or federal law should be applied is controlled by the Rules of Decision Act, the statute construed in Erie and York. Where the matter in issue is covered by a Federal Rule, however, the Enabling Act—and not the Rules of Decision Act itself or the line of cases construing it—constitutes the relevant standard.

479

To say that, however, and that is one of the things Hanna said, is by no means to concede the validity of all Federal Rules, for the Enabling Act contains significant limiting language of its own. The Court has correctly sensed that that language cannot be construed to protect state prerogatives as strenuously as the Rules of Decision Act protects them in the absence of a Federal Rule. However, the Court’s recent appreciation that the Enabling Act constitutes the only check on the Rules—that “Erie” does not stand there as a backstop—should lead it in an appropriate case to take the Act’s limiting language more seriously than it has in the past.

Ely, The Irrepressible Myth of Erie, 87 Harv.L.Rev. 693, 697–98 (1974). In the cases that follow, consider whether “in an appropriate case” the Court has taken the language of 28 U.S.C. § 2072(b) “more seriously than it has in the past.”

NOTE ON DETERMINING WHETHER A FEDERAL RULE OR STATUTE IS PERTINENT

Under Hanna, what is the test for determining whether a Federal Rule is pertinent and so displaces a contrary state rule? Chief Justice Warren emphasized that in earlier cases, a state rule applied not because “Erie commanded displacement of a Federal Rule by an inconsistent statute,” but rather because there was “no Federal Rule which covered the point in dispute,” p. 472, supra. In Hanna, however, the “clash” between Federal Rule 4 and the state rule was said to be “unavoidable,” p. 472, supra. How should a court determine whether a Federal Rule is pertinent to a dispute? Consider this analysis:

* * * If a valid and pertinent federal rule exists, then of course it applies, notwithstanding any state rule to the contrary. The supremacy clause says so. The real task under Erie, therefore, is not to choose between federal law and state law, but rather to decide if there really is a valid federal rule on the issue. * * *

[T]he Rules of Decision Act is an explicit grant of authority: It directs the federal courts to apply state law with regard to any issue that is not governed by a pertinent and valid federal rule. It reminds the federal courts that if a valid federal rule exists—whether constitutional, statutory, or judge-made—the federal rule shall govern. * * *

* * *

To understand how Erie operates in diversity cases, it is important to distinguish between the pertinence of federal rules and their validity. To say a federal rule is “pertinent” means that it was intended or designed to govern the issue at hand—that the rule’s purposes would be served by applying it. To say a rule is “valid” means that it has been adopted in conformity with the legal norms controlling the creation of federal law—that it is consistent with the Constitution and other organic statutes regulating the formation of federal law. These combined qualities of pertinence and validity are necessary and sufficient for the proper application of a federal rule: If either quality is absent, a federal rule cannot be lawfully applied; if both are present, the federal rule must be applied.

480

* * *

Federal rules of civil procedure should be analyzed in the same way as federal statutes, except the rules must satisfy an additional standard of validity. The pertinence analysis is precisely the same for rules as it is for other laws. The court must determine whether the framers of a rule intended that it govern the issue at hand; if so (and if the rule is valid), the rule applies; if not, state law applies.

Westen & Lehman, Is There Life for Erie After the Death of Diversity?, 78 Mich.L.Rev. 311, 314–15, 342, 359 (1980).

WALKER V. ARMCO STEEL CORP.
Supreme Court of the United States, 1980.
446 U.S. 740, 100 S.Ct. 1978, 64 L.Ed.2d 659.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit.

JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion for a unanimous Court.

This case presents the issue whether in a diversity action the federal court should follow state law or, alternatively, Rule 3 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in determining when an action is commenced for the purpose of tolling the state statute of limitations.

I

According to the allegations of the complaint, petitioner, a carpenter, was injured on August 22, 1975, in Oklahoma City, Okla., while pounding a Sheffield nail into a cement wall. Respondent was the manufacturer of the nail. Petitioner claimed that the nail contained a defect which caused its head to shatter and strike him in the right eye, resulting in permanent injuries. The defect was allegedly caused by respondent’s negligence in manufacture and design.

Petitioner is a resident of Oklahoma, and respondent is a foreign corporation having its principal place of business in a State other than Oklahoma. Since there was diversity of citizenship, petitioner brought suit in the United States District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma. The complaint was filed on August 19, 1977. Although summons was issued that same day, service of process was not made on respondent’s authorized service agent until December 1, 1977. On January 5, 1978, respondent filed a motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the action was barred by the applicable Oklahoma statute of limitations. Although the complaint had been filed within the 2-year statute of limitations, * * * state law does not deem the action “commenced” for purposes of the statute of limitations until service of the summons on the defendant, Okla.Stat., Tit. 12, § 97 (1971). If the complaint is filed within the limitations period, however, the action is deemed to have commenced from that date of filing if the plaintiff serves the defendant within 60 days, even though that service may occur outside the limitations period. * * * In this case, service was not effectuated until long after this 60-day period had expired. Petitioner in his reply brief to the motion to dismiss admitted that his case would be foreclosed in state court, but he argued that Rule 3 of the Federal Rules * * * governs the manner in which an action is commenced in federal court for all purposes, including the tolling of the state statute of limitations.

481

The District Court dismissed the complaint as barred by the Oklahoma statute of limitations. * * * The court concluded that Okla.Stat., Tit. 12, § 97 (1971) was “an integral part of the Oklahoma statute of limitations,” and therefore under Ragan * * * [p. 460, Note 4, supra], state law applied. The court rejected the argument that Ragan had been implicitly overruled in Hanna v. Plumer * * *.

The * * * Tenth Circuit affirmed. * * * That court concluded that Okla.Stat., Tit. 12, § 97 (1971), was in “direct conflict” with Rule 3. * * * However, the Oklahoma statute was “indistinguishable” from the statute involved in Ragan, and the court felt itself “constrained” to follow Ragan. * * *

We granted certiorari * * * because of a conflict among the Courts of Appeals. We now affirm.

II

The question whether state or federal law should apply on various issues arising in an action based on state law which has been brought in federal court under diversity of citizenship jurisdiction has troubled this Court for many years. * * *

* * *

In * * * York [p. 454, supra], we concluded that the state statute of limitations [that would completely bar recovery] should be applied. * * *

The decision in York led logically to our holding in Ragan * * *. In Ragan, the plaintiff had filed his complaint in federal court on September 4, 1945, pursuant to Rule 3 * * *. The accident from which the claim arose had occurred on October 1, 1943. Service was made on the defendant on December 28, 1945. The applicable statute of limitations supplied by Kansas law was two years. Kansas had an additional statute [regarding tolling that was essentially identical to the Oklahoma statute at issue in this case]. The defendant moved for summary judgment on the ground that the Kansas statute of limitations barred the action since service had not been made within either the 2-year period or the 60-day period. It was conceded that had the case been brought in Kansas state court it would have been barred. Nonetheless, the District Court held that the statute had been tolled by the filing of the complaint. The Court of Appeals reversed * * *.

482

We affirmed, relying on Erie and York. “We cannot give [the cause of action] longer life in the federal court than it would have had in the state court without adding something to the cause of action. We may not do that consistently with Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins.” * * * We rejected the argument that Rule 3 * * * governed the manner in which an action was commenced in federal court for purposes of tolling the state statute of limitations. Instead, we held that the service of summons statute controlled because it was an integral part of the state statute of limitations, and under York, that statute of limitations was part of the state-law cause of action.

Ragan was not our last pronouncement in this difficult area, however. * * *

The Court in Hanna * * * concluded that the Erie doctrine was simply not the appropriate test of the validity and applicability of one of the Federal Rules * * *. The Court cited Ragan as one of the examples of this proposition * * *. The Court explained that where the Federal Rule was clearly applicable, as in Hanna, the test was whether the Rule was within the scope of the Rules Enabling Act * * * and if so, within a constitutional grant of power such as the Necessary and Proper Clause of Art. I. * * *

III

The present case is indistinguishable from Ragan. The statutes in both cases require service of process to toll the statute of limitations, and in fact the predecessor to the Oklahoma statute in this case was derived from the predecessor to the Kansas statute in Ragan. * * * Here, as in Ragan, the complaint was filed in federal court under diversity jurisdiction within the 2-year statute of limitations, but service of process did not occur until after the 2-year period and the 60-day service period had run. In both cases the suit would concededly have been barred in the applicable state court, and in both instances the state service statute was held to be an integral part of the statute of limitations by the lower court more familiar than we with state law. Accordingly, as the Court of Appeals held below, the instant action is barred by the statute of limitations unless Ragan is no longer good law.

Petitioner argues that the analysis and holding of Ragan did not survive our decision in Hanna.⁸ Petitioner’s position is that Okla.Stat., Tit. 12, § 97 (1971), is in direct conflict with the Federal Rule. Under Hanna, petitioner contends, the appropriate question is whether Rule 3 is within the scope of the Rules Enabling Act and, if so, within the constitutional power of Congress. In petitioner’s view, the Federal Rule is to be applied unless it violates one of those two restrictions. * * *

483

We note at the outset that the doctrine of stare decisis weighs heavily against petitioner in this case. Petitioner seeks to have us overrule our decision in Ragan. * * *

This Court in Hanna distinguished Ragan rather than overruled it, and for good reason. Application of the Hanna analysis is premised on a “direct collision” between the Federal Rule and the state law. * * * In Hanna itself the “clash” between Rule 4(d)(1) and the state in-hand service requirement was “unavoidable.” * * * The first question must therefore be whether the scope of the Federal Rule in fact is sufficiently broad to control the issue before the Court. It is only if that question is answered affirmatively that the Hanna analysis applies.⁹

As has already been noted, we recognized in Hanna that the present case is an instance where “the scope of the Federal Rule [is] not as broad as the losing party urge[s], and therefore, there being no Federal Rule which cover[s] the point in dispute, Erie command[s] the enforcement of state law.” * * * Rule 3 simply states that “[a] civil action is commenced by filing a complaint with the court.” There is no indication that the Rule was intended to toll a state statute of limitations,¹⁰ much less that it purported to displace state tolling rules for purposes of state statutes of limitations. In our view, in diversity actions¹¹ Rule 3 governs the date from which various timing requirements of the Federal Rules begin to run, but does not affect state statutes of limitations. * * *

484

In contrast to Rule 3, the Oklahoma statute is a statement of a substantive decision by that State that actual service on, and accordingly actual notice by, the defendant is an integral part of the several policies served by the statute of limitations. * * * The statute of limitations establishes a deadline after which the defendant may legitimately have peace of mind; it also recognizes that after a certain period of time it is unfair to require the defendant to attempt to piece together his defense to an old claim. A requirement of actual service promotes both of those functions of the statute. * * * As such, the service rule must be considered part and parcel of the statute of limitations. Rule 3 does not replace such policy determinations found in state law. Rule 3 and Okla.Stat., Tit. 12, § 97 (1971), can exist side by side, therefore, each controlling its own intended sphere of coverage without conflict.

Since there is no direct conflict between the Federal Rule and the state law, the Hanna analysis does not apply. Instead, the policies behind Erie and Ragan control the issue. * * * [A]lthough in this case failure to apply the state service law might not create any problem of forum shopping, the result would be an “inequitable administration” of the law. Hanna v. Plumer * * *. There is simply no reason why, in the absence of a controlling federal rule, an action based on state law which concededly would be barred in the state courts by the state statute of limitations should proceed through litigation to judgment in federal court solely because of the fortuity that there is diversity of citizenship between the litigants. The policies underlying diversity jurisdiction do not support such a distinction between state and federal plaintiffs, and Erie and its progeny do not permit it.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Federal Rule 3 does not specify the purposes for which an action is commenced. Two arguments thus were available for the Court in Walker to find that Rule 3 did not operate to toll the Oklahoma statute of limitations. First, the Court could have held that Rule 3 applies only to time requirements in other Federal Rules, tolling neither state nor federal statutes of limitations. Alternatively, the Court could have found that Rule 3 tolls federal but not state statutes of limitations.

Which argument is more persuasive? Which argument does the Court make in Walker? Note that there was abundant authority, cited in footnote 11 of the Court’s opinion (including a dictum in Ragan), suggesting that Rule 3 does operate to toll federal statutes of limitations. Walker reserved this question, holding that, even if Rule 3 governs federal statutes of limitations, it does not apply to state statutes. But if Rule 3 does not toll federal statutes of limitations, what does?

485

2.Can you reconcile the Court’s interpretation of Rule 3 in Walker with its interpretation of Rule 4 in Hanna? Rule 4 says simply that service may be made by leaving a copy of the summons and complaint at defendant’s home with someone of suitable age or discretion who also resides there; it does not qualify this permission in any way or say anything about federal-question cases or diversity cases. Therefore, the Hanna Court concluded, Rule 4 says “implicitly, but with unmistakable clarity” that in-hand service is not required in either type of case. Rule 3 is equally plain: It says that an action is commenced in federal court by filing the complaint. Yet the Walker Court assumes, contrary to the apparent intent of the Advisory Note (quoted on p. 483, footnote 10), that Rule 3 may toll federal but not state statutes of limitations. Why is Rule 4 read broadly, making a clash with state law “unavoidable,” while Rule 3 is read to incorporate an implied exception for state statutes? Is the difference that Oklahoma’s tolling provision serves a substantive purpose while the Massachusetts service rule in Hanna is purely procedural in nature? And what do you make of the statement in footnote 9, p. 483, that Federal Rules are not “to be narrowly construed in order to avoid a ‘direct collision’ with state law”? Isn’t that exactly what the Court did in Walker?

3.In BURLINGTON NORTHERN R. CO. v. WOODS, 480 U.S. 1, 107 S.Ct. 967, 94 L.Ed.2d 1 (1987), Woods obtained a jury verdict against Burlington Northern in a personal injury action prosecuted in an Alabama federal district court. After the verdict was affirmed on appeal without modification, the court of appeals assessed the penalty (10 percent of the damages) prescribed by Alabama law for all unsuccessful appeals of money judgments. Burlington Northern objected, arguing that Rule 38 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure controlled the case—and that, under Rule 38, penalties were appropriate only if, in the judgment of the appellate court, the appeal was frivolous.

The Supreme Court held that Appellate Rule 38 controlled:

In Hanna * * *, we set forth the appropriate test for resolving conflicts between state law and the Federal Rules. The initial step is to determine whether, when fairly construed, the scope of Federal Rule 38 is “sufficiently broad” to cause a “direct collision” with the state law or, implicitly, to “control the issue” before the court, thereby leaving no room for the operation of that law. * * * The Rule must then be applied if it represents a valid exercise of Congress’ rulemaking authority * * *.

* * * Rule 38 affords a court of appeals plenary discretion to assess “just damages” in order to penalize an appellant who takes a frivolous appeal and to compensate the injured appellee for the delay and added expense of defending the district court’s judgment. Thus, the Rule’s discretionary mode of operation unmistakably conflicts with the mandatory provision of Alabama’s affirmance penalty statute. Moreover, the purposes underlying the Rule are sufficiently coextensive with the asserted purposes of the Alabama statute to indicate that the Rule occupies the statute’s field of operation so as to preclude its application in federal diversity actions.

486

Respondents argue that, because Alabama has a similar Appellate Rule which may be applied in state court alongside the affirmance penalty statute, * * * a federal court sitting in diversity could impose the mandatory penalty and likewise remain free to exercise its discretionary authority under Federal Rule 38. This argument, however, ignores the significant possibility that a court of appeals may, in any given case, find a limited justification for imposing penalties in an amount less than 10% of the lower court’s judgment. Federal Rule 38 adopts a case-by-case approach to identifying and deterring frivolous appeals; the Alabama statute precludes any exercise of discretion within its scope of operation. Whatever circumscriptive effect the mandatory affirmance penalty statute may have on the state court’s exercise of discretion under Alabama’s Rule 38, that Rule provides no authority for defining the scope of discretion allowed under Federal Rule 38.

Federal Rule 38 regulates matters which can reasonably be classified as procedural, thereby satisfying the constitutional standard for validity. Its displacement of the Alabama statute also satisfies the statutory constraints of the Rules Enabling Act. The choice made by the drafters of the Federal Rules in favor of a discretionary procedure affects only the process of enforcing litigants’ rights and not the rights themselves.

Id. at 4–8, 107 S.Ct. at 969–71, 94 L.Ed.2d at 7–9. Is the Alabama penalty substantive or procedural? What purpose is served by interpreting Appellate Rule 38 to displace this Alabama rule in a diversity case? In what sense would an award under the Alabama statute be incompatible with an award under Appellate Rule 38?

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit.

JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents the issue whether a federal court sitting in diversity should apply state or federal law in adjudicating a motion to transfer a case to a venue provided in a contractual forum-selection clause.

I

The dispute underlying this case grew out of a dealership agreement that obligated petitioner company, an Alabama corporation, to market copier products of respondent, a nationwide manufacturer with its principal place of business in New Jersey. The agreement contained a forum-selection clause providing that any dispute arising out of the contract could be brought only in a court located in Manhattan. Business relations between the parties soured under circumstances that are not relevant here. In September 1984, petitioner brought a complaint in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alabama. The core of the complaint was an allegation that respondent had breached the dealership agreement, but petitioner also included claims for breach of warranty, fraud, and antitrust violations.

487

Relying on the contractual forum-selection clause, respondent moved * * * either to transfer the case to the Southern District of New York under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) or to dismiss the case for improper venue under 28 U.S.C. § 1406. The District Court denied the motion. * * * It reasoned that the transfer motion was controlled by Alabama law and that Alabama looks unfavorably upon contractual forum-selection clauses. The court certified its ruling for interlocutory appeal * * * and the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit accepted jurisdiction.

On appeal, a divided panel of the Eleventh Circuit reversed the District Court. The panel concluded that questions of venue in diversity actions are governed by federal law, and that the parties’ forum-selection clause was enforceable as a matter of federal law. * * * The panel therefore reversed * * * and remanded with instructions to transfer the case to a Manhattan court. After petitioner successfully moved for rehearing en banc, * * * the full Court of Appeals proceeded to adopt the result, and much of the reasoning, of the panel opinion. * * * The en banc court, citing Congress’ enactment or approval of several rules to govern venue determinations in diversity actions, first determined that [v]enue is a matter of federal procedure,” * * *. The Court of Appeals then applied the standards articulated in the admiralty case of The Bremen * * * [p. 198, supra], to conclude that “the choice of forum clause in the contract is in all respects enforceable generally as a matter of federal law. . . .” * * *⁴ We now affirm under somewhat different reasoning.

II

Both the panel opinion and the opinion of the full Court of Appeals referred to the difficulties that often attend “the sticky question of which law, state or federal, will govern various aspects of the decisions of federal courts sitting in diversity.” * * * A district court’s decision whether to apply a federal statute such as § 1404(a) in a diversity action, however, involves a considerably less intricate analysis than that which governs the “relatively unguided Erie choice.” * * * Our cases indicate that when the federal law sought to be applied is a congressional statute, the first and

488

chief question for the district court’s determination is whether the statute is “sufficiently broad to control the issue before the Court.” * * * This question involves a straightforward exercise in statutory interpretation to determine if the statute covers the point in dispute.⁴

If the district court determines that a federal statute covers the point in dispute, it proceeds to inquire whether the statute represents a valid exercise of Congress’ authority under the Constitution. * * * If Congress intended to reach the issue before the district court, and if it enacted its intention into law in a manner that abides with the Constitution, that is the end of the matter; “[f]ederal courts are bound to apply rules enacted by Congress with respect to matters * * * over which it has legislative power” * * *.⁶ Thus, a district court sitting in diversity must apply a federal statute that controls the issue before the court and that represents a valid exercise of Congress’ constitutional powers.

III

* * *

B

* * * Under the analysis outlined above, we first consider whether [28 U.S.C. § 1404(a)] is sufficiently broad to control the issue before the court. * * * We believe that the statute, fairly construed, does cover the point in dispute.

Section 1404(a) is intended to place discretion in the district court to adjudicate motions for transfer. * * * A motion to transfer under § 1404(a) thus calls on the district court to weigh in the balance a number of case-specific factors. The presence of a forum-selection clause such as the parties entered into in this case will be a significant factor that figures centrally in the district court’s calculus.

In its resolution of the § 1404(a) motion in this case, for example, the District Court will be called on to address such issues as the convenience of a Manhattan forum given the parties’ expressed preference for that venue, and the fairness of transfer in light of the forum-selection clause and the parties’ relative bargaining power. The flexible and individualized analysis Congress prescribed in § 1404(a) thus encompasses consideration of the parties’ private expression of their venue preferences.

489

Section 1404(a) may not be the only potential source of guidance for the District Court to consult in weighing the parties’ private designation of a suitable forum. The premise of the dispute between the parties is that Alabama law may refuse to enforce forum-selection clauses providing for out-of-state venues as a matter of state public policy. If that is so, the District Court will have either to integrate the factor of the forum-selection clause into its weighing of considerations as prescribed by Congress, or else to apply, as it did in this case, Alabama’s categorical policy disfavoring forum-selection clauses. Our cases make clear that, as between these two choices in a single “field of operation,” * * * the instructions of Congress are supreme. * * *

It is true that § 1404(a) and Alabama’s putative policy regarding forum-selection clauses are not perfectly coextensive. Section 1404(a) directs a district court to take account of factors other than those that bear solely on the parties’ private ordering of their affairs. The district court also must weigh in the balance the convenience of the witnesses and those public-interest factors of systemic integrity and fairness that, in addition to private concerns, come under the heading of “the interest of justice.” It is conceivable in a particular case, for example, that because of these factors a district court acting under § 1404(a) would refuse to transfer a case notwithstanding the counterweight of a forum-selection clause, whereas the coordinate state rule might dictate the opposite result. * * * But this potential conflict in fact frames an additional argument for the supremacy of federal law. Congress has directed that multiple considerations govern transfer within the federal court system, and a state policy focusing on a single concern or a subset of the factors identified in § 1404(a) would defeat that command. Its application would impoverish the flexible and multifaceted analysis that Congress intended to govern motions to transfer within the federal system. The forum-selection clause, which represents the parties’ agreement as to the most proper forum, should receive neither dispositive consideration (as respondent might have it) nor no consideration (as Alabama law might have it), but rather the consideration for which Congress provided in § 1404(a). * * * This is thus not a case in which state and federal rules “can exist side by side * * * each controlling its own intended sphere of coverage without conflict.” * * *

Because § 1404(a) controls the issue * * *, it must be applied if it represents a valid exercise of Congress’ authority under the Constitution. The constitutional authority of Congress to enact § 1404(a) is not subject to serious question. * * * Section 1404(a) is doubtless capable of classification as a procedural rule, and indeed, we have so classified it in holding that a transfer pursuant to § 1404(a) does not carry with it a change in the applicable law. * * * It therefore falls comfortably within Congress’ powers under Article III as augmented by the Necessary and Proper Clause. * * *

490

We hold that federal law, specifically 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), governs the District Court’s decision whether to give effect to the parties’ forum-selection clause and transfer this case to a court in Manhattan. * * * The case is remanded so that the District Court may determine * * * the appropriate effect under federal law of the parties’ forum-selection clause on respondent’s § 1404(a) motion.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE KENNEDY, with whom JUSTICE O’CONNOR joins, concurring.

I concur in full. I write separately only to observe that enforcement of valid forum-selection clauses, bargained for by the parties, protects their legitimate expectations and furthers vital interests of the justice system. Although our opinion in The Bremen * * * involved a Federal District Court sitting in admiralty, its reasoning applies with much force to federal courts sitting in diversity. The justifications we noted in The Bremen to counter the historical disfavor forum-selection clauses had received in American courts * * * should be understood to guide the District Court’s analysis under § 1404(a).

* * * Courts should announce and encourage rules that support private parties who negotiate such clauses. Though state policies should be weighed in the balance, the authority and prerogative of the federal courts to determine the issue, as Congress has directed by § 1404(a), should be exercised so that a valid forum-selection clause is given controlling weight in all but the most exceptional cases. * * *

JUSTICE SCALIA, dissenting.

* * *

When a litigant asserts that state law conflicts with a federal procedural statute or formal Rule of Procedure, a court’s first task is to determine whether the disputed point in question in fact falls within the scope of the federal statute or Rule. In this case, the Court must determine whether the scope of § 1404(a) is sufficiently broad to cause a direct collision with state law or implicitly to control the issue before the Court, i.e., validity between the parties of the forum-selection clause, thereby leaving no room for the operation of state law. * * * I conclude that it is not.

Although the language of § 1404(a) provides no clear answer, in my view it does provide direction. The provision vests the district courts with authority to transfer a civil action to another district “[f]or the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice.” This language looks to the present and the future. As the specific reference to convenience of parties and witnesses suggests, it requires consideration of what is likely to be just in the future, when the case is tried, in light of things as they now stand. Accordingly, the courts in applying § 1404(a) have examined a variety of factors, each of which pertains to facts that currently exist or will exist * * *. In holding that the validity between the parties of a forum-selection clause falls within the scope of § 1404(a), the Court inevitably imports, in my view without adequate textual foundation, a new retrospective element into the court’s deliberations, requiring examination of what the facts were concerning, among other things, the bargaining power of the parties and the presence or absence of overreaching at the time the contract was made. * * *

491

* * *

II

Since no federal statute or Rule of Procedure governs the validity of a forum-selection clause, the remaining issue is whether federal courts may fashion a judge-made rule to govern the question. If they may not, the Rules of Decision Act * * * mandates use of state law. * * *

* * * Whatever the scope of the federal courts’ authority to create federal common law in other areas, it is plain that the mere fact that petitioner company here brought an antitrust claim * * * does not empower the federal courts to make common law on the question of the validity of the forum-selection clause. * * * The federal courts do have authority, however, to make procedural rules that govern the practice before them. * * *

In deciding what is substantive and what is procedural for these purposes, we have adhered to a functional test based on the “twin aims of the Erie rule: discouragement of forum-shopping and avoidance of inequitable administration of the laws.” Hanna * * *.

Under the twin-aims test, I believe state law controls the question of the validity of a forum-selection clause between the parties. * * * Venue is often a vitally important matter, as is shown by the frequency with which parties contractually provide for and litigate the issue. Suit might well not be pursued, or might not be as successful, in a significantly less convenient forum. Transfer to such a less desirable forum is, therefore, of sufficient import that plaintiffs will base their decisions on the likelihood of that eventuality when they are choosing whether to sue in state or federal court. * * *

I believe creating a judge-made rule fails the second part of the twin-aims test as well, producing inequitable administration of the laws. * * * It is difficult to imagine an issue of more importance, other than one that goes to the very merits of the lawsuit, than the validity of a contractual forum-selection provision. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What test did Stewart apply in determining whether a federal statute “covers the point in dispute”? To what extent does this test differ from the requirement of a “direct collision” as applied in Hanna and Walker? What is the basis for Justice Scalia’s dissenting opinion that 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) is not on point? Why would application of the state rule on forum-selection clauses be incompatible with the federal statute?

492

2.Why might a state not want to give effect to a forum-selection clause? See Rowe, Not Bad for Government Work: Does Anyone Else Think the Supreme Court Is Doing a Halfway Decent Job in Its Erie-Hanna Jurisprudence?, 73 Notre Dame L.Rev. 963, 994 (1998). Should federal courts consider state regulatory interests on a case-by-case basis or as a general matter through the rulemaking process? See Dudley, Jr. & Rutherglen, Deforming the Federal Rules: An Essay on What’s Wrong with the Recent Erie Decisions, 92 Va.L.Rev. 707, 738–47 (2006).

3.On what basis did Justice Kennedy concur? Are you persuaded by his analogy to The Bremen, a case that involves admiralty and not diversity jurisdiction?

GASPERINI V. CENTER FOR HUMANITIES, INC.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1996.
518 U.S. 415, 116 S.Ct. 2211, 135 L.Ed.2d 659.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court.

Under the law of New York, appellate courts are empowered to review the size of jury verdicts and to order new trials when the jury’s award “deviates materially from what would be reasonable compensation.” N. Y. Civ. Prac. Law and Rules (CPLR) § 5501(c) * * *. Under the Seventh Amendment, which governs proceedings in federal court, but not in state court, “the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.” The compatibility of these provisions, in an action based on New York law but tried in federal court by reason of the parties’ diverse citizenship, is the issue we confront in this case. * * *

We hold that New York’s law controlling compensation awards for excessiveness or inadequacy can be given effect, without detriment to the Seventh Amendment, if the review standard set out in CPLR § 5501(c) is applied by the federal trial court judge, with appellate control of the trial court’s ruling limited to review for “abuse of discretion.”

I

Petitioner William Gasperini, a journalist for CBS News and the Christian Science Monitor, began reporting on events in Central America in 1984. * * * During the course of his seven-year stint in Central America, Gasperini took over 5,000 slide transparencies, depicting active war zones, political leaders, and scenes from daily life. In 1990, Gasperini agreed to supply his original color transparencies to The Center for Humanities, Inc. (Center) for use in an educational videotape, Conflict in Central America. Gasperini selected 300 of his slides for the Center; its videotape included 110 of them. The Center agreed to return the original transparencies, but upon the completion of the project, it could not find them.

493

Gasperini commenced suit in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, invoking the court’s diversity jurisdiction * * *. The Center conceded liability for the lost transparencies and the issue of damages was tried before a jury.

At trial, Gasperini’s expert witness testified that the “industry standard” within the photographic publishing community valued a lost transparency at $1,500. * * *

After a three-day trial, the jury awarded Gasperini $450,000 in compensatory damages. This sum, the jury foreperson announced, “is [$]1500 each, for 300 slides.” Moving for a new trial under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 59, the Center attacked the verdict on various grounds, including excessiveness. Without comment, the District Court denied the motion. * * *

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit vacated the judgment entered on the jury’s verdict. * * * Mindful that New York law governed the controversy, the Court of Appeals endeavored to apply CPLR § 5501(c), which instructs that, when a jury returns an itemized verdict, as the jury did in this case, the New York Appellate Division “shall determine that an award is excessive or inadequate if it deviates materially from what would be reasonable compensation.” The Second Circuit’s application of § 5501(c) as a check on the size of the jury’s verdict followed Circuit precedent elaborated two weeks earlier * * *. Surveying Appellate Division decisions that reviewed damage awards for lost transparencies, the Second Circuit concluded that testimony on industry standard alone was insufficient to justify a verdict; prime among other factors warranting consideration were the uniqueness of the slides’ subject matter and the photographer’s earning level.

Guided by Appellate Division rulings, the Second Circuit held that the $450,000 verdict “materially deviates from what is reasonable compensation.” * * * [T]he Second Circuit set aside the $450,000 verdict and ordered a new trial, unless Gasperini agreed to an award of $100,000.

* * *

II

Before 1986, state and federal courts in New York generally invoked the same judge-made formulation in responding to excessiveness attacks on jury verdicts: courts would not disturb an award unless the amount was so exorbitant that it “shocked the conscience of the court.” * * *

494

In both state and federal courts, trial judges made the excessiveness assessment in the first instance, and appellate judges ordinarily deferred to the trial court’s judgment. * * *

In 1986, as part of a series of tort reform measures, New York codified a standard for judicial review of the size of jury awards. * * *

* * * New York state-court opinions confirm that § 5501(c)’s “deviates materially” standard calls for closer surveillance than “shock the conscience” oversight. * * *

Although phrased as a direction to New York’s intermediate appellate courts, § 5501(c)’s “deviates materially” standard, as construed by New York’s courts, instructs state trial judges as well. * * * Application of § 5501(c) at the trial level is key to this case.

To determine whether an award “deviates materially from what would be reasonable compensation,” New York state courts look to awards approved in similar cases. * * *

III

In cases like Gasperini’s, in which New York law governs the claims for relief, does New York law also supply the test for federal-court review of the size of the verdict? The Center answers yes. The “deviates materially” standard, it argues, is a substantive standard that must be applied by federal appellate courts in diversity cases. The Second Circuit agreed. * * * Gasperini, emphasizing that § 5501(c) trains on the New York Appellate Division, characterizes the provision as procedural, an allocation of decisionmaking authority regarding damages, not a hard cap on the amount recoverable. Correctly comprehended, Gasperini urges, § 5501(c)’s direction to the Appellate Division cannot be given effect by federal appellate courts without violating the Seventh Amendment’s Reexamination Clause.

As the parties’ arguments suggest, CPLR § 5501(c), appraised under Erie * * * and decisions in Erie’s path, is both “substantive” and “procedural”: “substantive” in that § 5501(c)’s “deviates materially” standard controls how much a plaintiff can be awarded; “procedural” in that § 5501(c) assigns decisionmaking authority to New York’s Appellate Division. Parallel application of § 5501(c) at the federal appellate level would be out of sync with the federal system’s division of trial and appellate court functions, an allocation weighted by the Seventh Amendment. The dispositive question, therefore, is whether federal courts can give effect to the substantive thrust of § 5501(c) without untoward alteration of the federal scheme for the trial and decision of civil cases.

495

A

* * *

Classification of a law as “substantive” or “procedural” for Erie purposes is sometimes a challenging endeavor.² * * * York * * * [p. 454, supra], an early interpretation of Erie, propounded an “outcome-determination” test. * * * A later pathmarking case * * * explained that the “outcome-determination” test must not be applied mechanically to sweep in all manner of variations; instead, its application must be guided by “the twin aims of the Erie rule: discouragement of forum shopping and avoidance of inequitable administration of the laws.” Hanna * * * [p. 468, supra].

* * * [W]e address the question whether New York’s “deviates materially” standard, codified in CPLR § 5501(c), is outcome affective in this sense: Would “application of the [standard] . . . have so important an effect upon the fortunes of one or both of the litigants that failure to [apply] it would [unfairly discriminate against citizens of the forum State, or] be likely to cause a plaintiff to choose the federal court”? * * *³

We start from a point the parties do not debate. Gasperini acknowledges that a statutory cap on damages would supply substantive law for Erie purposes. * * * Although CPLR § 5501(c) is less readily classified, it was designed to provide an analogous control.

* * *

It thus appears that if federal courts ignore the change in the New York standard and persist in applying the “shock the conscience” test to damage awards on claims governed by New York law, “ ‘substantial’ variations between state and federal [money judgments]” may be expected. * * * We therefore agree with the Second Circuit that New York’s check on excessive damages implicates what we have called “twin aims.” * * * Just as the Erie principle precludes a federal court from giving a state-created claim “longer life . . . than [the claim] would have had in the state court,” * * * so Erie precludes a recovery in federal court significantly larger than the recovery that would have been tolerated in state court.

B

CPLR § 5501(c) * * * is phrased as a direction to the New York Appellate Division. Acting essentially as a surrogate for a New York appellate forum, the Court of Appeals reviewed Gasperini’s award to determine if it “deviate[d] materially” from damage awards the Appellate Division permitted in similar circumstances. The Court of Appeals performed this task without benefit of an opinion from the District Court, which had denied “without comment” the Center’s Rule 59 motion. Concentrating on the authority § 5501(c) gives to the Appellate Division, Gasperini urges that the provision shifts fact finding responsibility from the jury and the trial judge to the appellate court. Assigning such responsibility to an appellate court, he maintains, is incompatible with the Seventh Amendment’s Reexamination Clause, and therefore, Gasperini concludes, § 5501(c) cannot be given effect in federal court. Although we reach a different conclusion than Gasperini, we agree that the Second Circuit did not attend to “an essential characteristic of [the federal-court] system,” * * * when it used § 5501(c) as “the standard for [federal] appellate review.” * * *

496

* * *

The Seventh Amendment, which governs proceedings in federal court, but not in state court, bears not only on the allocation of trial functions between judge and jury, the issue in Byrd [p. 462, supra]; it also controls the allocation of authority to review verdicts, the issue of concern here. * * *

Byrd involved the first Clause of the Amendment, the “trial by jury” Clause. This case involves the second, the “Reexamination” Clause. In keeping with the historic understanding, the Reexamination Clause does not inhibit the authority of trial judges to grant new trials “for any of the reasons for which new trials have heretofore been granted in actions at law in the courts of the United States.” That authority is large. * * * This discretion includes overturning verdicts for excessiveness and ordering a new trial without qualification, or conditioned on the verdict winner’s refusal to agree to a reduction (remittitur). * * *

In contrast, appellate review of a federal trial court’s denial of a motion to set aside a jury’s verdict as excessive is a relatively late, and less secure, development. Such review was once deemed inconsonant with the Seventh Amendment’s Reexamination Clause. * * *

As the Second Circuit explained, appellate review for abuse of discretion is reconcilable with the Seventh Amendment as a control necessary and proper to the fair administration of justice * * *. We now * * * make explicit * * * : “[N]othing in the Seventh Amendment . . . precludes appellate review of the trial judge’s denial of a motion to set aside [a jury verdict] as excessive.” * * *

C

In Byrd, the Court faced a one-or-the-other choice: trial by judge as in state court, or trial by jury according to the federal practice. In the case before us, a choice of that order is not required, for the principal state and federal interests can be accommodated. The Second Circuit correctly recognized that when New York substantive law governs a claim for relief, New York law and decisions guide the allowable damages. * * *

497

New York’s dominant interest can be respected, without disrupting the federal system, once it is recognized that the federal district court is capable of * * * apply[ing] the State’s “deviates materially” standard in line with New York case law evolving under CPLR § 5501(c).²² * * *

Within the federal system, practical reasons combine with Seventh Amendment constraints to lodge in the district court, not the court of appeals, primary responsibility for application of § 5501(c)’s “deviates materially” check. * * *

District court applications of the “deviates materially” standard would be subject to appellate review under the standard the Circuits now employ when inadequacy or excessiveness is asserted on appeal: abuse of discretion. * * * In light of Erie’s doctrine, the federal appeals court must be guided by the damage-control standard state law supplies, but as the Second Circuit itself has said: “If we reverse, it must be because of an abuse of discretion. * * * We must give the benefit of every doubt to the judgment of the trial judge.”

IV

It does not appear that the District Court checked the jury’s verdict against the relevant New York decisions demanding more than “industry standard” testimony to support an award of the size the jury returned in this case. * * * Accordingly, we vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals and instruct that court to remand the case to the District Court so that the trial judge, revisiting his ruling on the new trial motion, may test the jury’s verdict against CPLR § 5501(c)’s “deviates materially” standard.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting.

* * *

I

* * *

The District Court had its opportunity to consider the propriety of the jury’s award, and it erred. The Court of Appeals has now corrected that error after “drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of” petitioner. * * * As there is no reason to suppose that the Court of Appeals has reached a conclusion with which the District Court could permissibly disagree on remand, I would not require the District Court to repeat a task that has already been well performed by the reviewing court. * * *

498

* * *

III

* * * I agree with the majority that the Reexamination Clause does not bar federal appellate courts from reviewing jury awards for excessiveness. I confess to some surprise, however, at its conclusion that “ ‘the influence—if not the command—of the Seventh Amendment,’ ” * * * requires federal courts of appeals to review district court applications of state-law excessiveness standards for an “abuse of discretion.” * * *

Certainly, our decision in Byrd does not make the Clause relevant. There, we considered only whether the Seventh Amendment’s first clause should influence our decision to give effect to a state-law rule denying the right to a jury altogether. * * * That holding in no way requires us to consult the Amendment’s second clause to determine the standard of review for a district court’s application of state substantive law.

My disagreement is tempered, however, because the majority carefully avoids defining too strictly the abuse-of-discretion standard it announces. To the extent that the majority relies only on “practical reasons” for its conclusion that the Court of Appeals should give some weight to the District Court’s assessment in determining whether state substantive law has been properly applied * * * I do not disagree with its analysis.

* * *

In the end, therefore, my disagreement with the label that the majority attaches to the standard of appellate review should not obscure the far more fundamental point on which we agree. Whatever influence the Seventh Amendment may be said to exert, Erie requires federal appellate courts sitting in diversity to apply “the damage-control standard state law supplies.” * * *

IV

Because I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals, and because I do not agree that the Seventh Amendment in any respect influences the proper analysis of the question presented, I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE SCALIA, with whom the CHIEF JUSTICE and JUSTICE THOMAS join, dissenting.

499

I

* * *

I am persuaded that our prior cases were correct that, at common law, “reexamination” of the facts found by a jury could be undertaken only by the trial court, and that appellate review was restricted to writ of error which could challenge the judgment only upon matters of law. * * *

* * *

II

The Court’s holding that federal courts of appeals may review district court denials of motions for new trials for error of fact is not the only novel aspect of today’s decision. The Court also directs that the case be remanded to the District Court, so that it may “test the jury’s verdict against CPLR § 5501(c)’s ‘deviates materially’ standard.” * * * This disposition contradicts the principle that “the proper role of the trial and appellate courts in the federal system in reviewing the size of jury verdicts is . . . a matter of federal law.” Donovan v. Penn Shipping Co., 429 U.S. 648, 649, 97 S.Ct. 835, 837, 51 L.Ed.2d 112 (1977) (per curiam).^f

* * * The Court approves the “accommodat[ion]” achieved by having district courts review jury verdicts under the “deviates materially” standard, because it regards that as a means of giving effect to the State’s purposes “without disrupting the federal system.” * * * But changing the standard by which trial judges review jury verdicts does disrupt the federal system, and is plainly inconsistent with the “strong federal policy against allowing state rules to disrupt the judge-jury relationship in the federal court.” * * *

* * * It seems to me quite wrong to regard [Section 5501(c)] as a “substantive” rule for Erie purposes. The “analog[y]” to “a statutory cap on damages” * * * fails utterly. There is an absolutely fundamental distinction between a rule of law such as that, which would ordinarily be imposed upon the jury in the trial court’s instructions, and a rule of review, which simply determines how closely the jury verdict will be scrutinized for compliance with the instructions. A tighter standard for reviewing jury determinations can no more plausibly be called a “substantive” disposition than can a tighter appellate standard for reviewing trial-court determinations. The one, like the other, provides additional assurance that the law has been complied with; but the other, like the one, leaves the law unchanged.

The Court commits the classic Erie mistake of regarding whatever changes the outcome as substantive * * *. * * * Outcome-determination * * * does not have the power to convert the most classic elements of the process of assuring that the law is observed into the substantive law itself.

500

The right to have a jury make the findings of fact, for example, is generally thought to favor plaintiffs, and that advantage is often thought significant enough to be the basis for forum selection. But no one would argue that Erie confers a right to a jury in federal court wherever state courts would provide it; or that, were it not for the Seventh Amendment, Erie would require federal courts to dispense with the jury whenever state courts do so.

In any event, the Court exaggerates the difference that the state standard will make. It concludes that different outcomes are likely to ensue depending on whether the law being applied is the state “deviates materially” standard of § 5501(c) or the “shocks the conscience” standard. * * * of course, it is not the federal appellate standard but the federal district-court standard for granting new trials that must be compared with the New York standard to determine whether substantially different results will obtain—and it is far from clear that the district-court standard ought to be “shocks the conscience.” * * * What seems to me far more likely to produce forum shopping is the consistent difference between the state and federal appellate standards, which the Court leaves untouched. * * * The only result that would produce the conformity the Court erroneously believes Erie requires is the one adopted by the Second Circuit and rejected by the Court: de novo federal appellate review under the § 5501(c) standard.

To say that application of § 5501(c) in place of the federal standard will not consistently produce disparate results is not to suggest that the decision the Court has made today is not a momentous one. The principle that the state standard governs is of great importance, since it bears the potential to destroy the uniformity of federal practice and the integrity of the federal court system. Under the Court’s view, a state rule that directed courts “to determine that an award is excessive or inadequate if it deviates in any degree from the proper measure of compensation” would have to be applied in federal courts, effectively requiring federal judges to determine the amount of damages de novo, and effectively taking the matter away from the jury entirely. * * * Or consider a state rule that allowed the defendant a second trial on damages, with judgment ultimately in the amount of the lesser of two jury awards. * * * Under the reasoning of the Court’s opinion, even such a rule as that would have to be applied in the federal courts.

The foregoing describes why I think the Court’s Erie analysis is flawed. But in my view, one does not even reach the Erie question in this case. The standard to be applied by a district court in ruling on a motion for a new trial is set forth in Rule 59 * * *, which provides that “[a] new trial may be granted . . . for any of the reasons for which new trials have heretofore been granted in actions at law in the courts of the United States” (emphasis added).⁸ That is undeniably a federal standard.¹² Federal district courts in the Second Circuit have interpreted that standard to permit the granting of new trials where “ ‘it is quite clear that the jury has reached a seriously erroneous result’ ” and letting the verdict stand would result in a “ ‘miscarriage of justice.’ ” * * * Assuming (as we have no reason to question) that this is a correct interpretation of what Rule 59 requires, it is undeniable that the Federal Rule is “ ‘sufficiently broad’ to cause a ‘direct collision’ with the state law or, implicitly, to ‘control the issue’ before the court, thereby leaving no room for the operation of that law.” * * * It is simply not possible to give controlling effect both to the federal standard and the state standard in reviewing the jury’s award. That being so, the court has no choice but to apply the Federal Rule * * *.

* * * I respectfully dissent.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Did the Court apply the Rules of Decision Act or the Rules Enabling Act? Are you persuaded that Federal Rule 59 does not cover the point in dispute? What is the basis for Justice Scalia’s dissenting view that there is a federal standard of excessiveness governing the decision to grant a new trial? Is there a way to read Rule 59 as pertinent but not in conflict with New York’s regulatory interests?
2. To what extent did the majority’s approach to the “unguided Erie choice” differ from earlier decisions? What role did York play in the analysis? What role did Byrd play in the assessment of the respective state and federal interests? Is it significant that the majority did not discuss Byrd until it already had determined the applicable law? Does Gasperini provide a new approach that replaces Byrd, or can the two decisions be reconciled? Finally, what role did the “twin aims” play in the determination of the applicable law?
3. What are the implications of Gasperini for other Federal Rules that conflict with state rules or state regulatory interests? Under Justice Ginsburg’s approach, ought state law provide the standard for granting summary judgment or a motion to dismiss? See Steinman, What is the Erie Doctrine? (And What Does it Mean for the Contemporary Politics of Judicial Federalism?), 84 Notre Dame L.Rev. 245 (2008).

SHADY GROVE ORTHOPEDIC ASSOCIATES V. ALLSTATE INSURANCE CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 2010.
559 U.S. 393, 130 S.Ct. 1431, 176 L.Ed.2d 311.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Justice SCALIA announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I and II-A, an opinion with respect to Parts II-B and II-D, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Justice THOMAS, and Justice SOTOMAYOR join, and an opinion with respect to Part II-C, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE and Justice THOMAS join.

New York law prohibits class actions in suits seeking penalties or statutory minimum damages. We consider whether this precludes a federal district court sitting in diversity from entertaining a class action under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23.

I

The petitioner’s complaint alleged the following: Shady Grove Orthopedic Associates, P. A., provided medical care to Sonia E. Galvez for injuries she suffered in an automobile accident. As partial payment for that care, Galvez assigned to Shady Grove her rights to insurance benefits under a policy issued in New York by Allstate Insurance Co. Shady Grove tendered a claim for the assigned benefits to Allstate, which under New York law had 30 days to pay the claim or deny it. * * * Allstate apparently paid, but not on time, and it refused to pay the statutory interest that accrued on the overdue benefits * * *.

Shady Grove filed this diversity suit in the Eastern District of New York to recover the unpaid statutory interest. Alleging that Allstate routinely refuses to pay interest on overdue benefits, Shady Grove sought relief on behalf of itself and a class of all others to whom Allstate owes interest. The District Court dismissed the suit for lack of jurisdiction. * * * It reasoned that N.Y. Civ. Prac. Law Ann. § 901(b), which precludes a suit to recover a “penalty” from proceeding as a class action, applies in diversity suits in federal court, despite Federal Rule * * * 23. * * * And, since Shady Grove conceded that its individual claim (worth roughly $500) fell far short of the amount-in-controversy requirement for individual suits under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a), the suit did not belong in federal court.

The Second Circuit affirmed. * * *

II

The framework for our decision is familiar. We must first determine whether Rule 23 answers the question in dispute. * * * If it does, it governs—New York’s law notwithstanding—unless it exceeds statutory authorization or Congress’s rulemaking power. * * * We do not wade into Erie’s murky waters unless the federal rule is inapplicable or invalid. * * *

The question in dispute is whether Shady Grove’s suit may proceed as a class action. Rule 23 provides an answer. It states that “[a] class action may be maintained” if two conditions are met: The suit must satisfy the criteria set forth in subdivision (a) * * *, and it also must fit into one of the three categories described in subdivision (b). * * * By its terms this creates a categorical rule entitling a plaintiff whose suit meets the specified criteria to pursue his claim as a class action. * * * Thus, Rule 23 provides a one-size-fits-all formula for deciding the class-action question. Because § 901(b) attempts to answer the same question—i.e., it states that Shady Grove’s suit “may not be maintained as a class action” (emphasis added)^h because of the relief it seeks—it cannot apply in diversity suits unless Rule 23 is ultra vires.

The Second Circuit believed that § 901(b) and Rule 23 do not conflict because they address different issues. Rule 23, it said, concerns only the criteria for determining whether a given class can and should be certified; section 901(b), on the other hand, addresses an antecedent question: whether the particular type of claim is eligible for class treatment in the first place—a question on which Rule 23 is silent. * * *

We disagree. To begin with, the line between eligibility and certifiability is entirely artificial. Both are preconditions for maintaining a class action. Allstate suggests that eligibility must depend on the “particular cause of action” asserted, instead of some other attribute of the suit * * *. But that is not so. Congress could, for example, provide that only claims involving more than a certain number of plaintiffs are “eligible” for class treatment in federal court. In other words, relabeling Rule 23(a)’s prerequisites “eligibility criteria” would obviate Allstate’s objection—a sure sign that its eligibility-certifiability distinction is made-to-order.

There is no reason, in any event, to read Rule 23 as addressing only whether claims made eligible for class treatment by some other law should be certified as class actions. Allstate asserts that Rule 23 neither explicitly nor implicitly empowers a federal court “to certify a class in each and every case” where the Rule’s criteria are met. * * * But that is exactly what Rule 23 does: It says that if the prescribed preconditions are satisfied “[a] class action may be maintained” (emphasis added)—not “a class action may be permitted.” Courts do not maintain actions; litigants do. The discretion suggested by Rule 23’s “may” is discretion residing in the plaintiff: He may bring his claim in a class action if he wishes. * * *

Allstate points out that Congress has carved out some federal claims from Rule 23’s reach * * *—which shows, Allstate contends, that Rule 23 does not authorize class actions for all claims, but rather leaves room for laws like § 901(b). But Congress, unlike New York, has ultimate authority over the Federal Rules * * *; it can create exceptions to an individual rule as it sees fit * * *. * * * The fact that Congress has created specific exceptions to Rule 23 hardly proves that the Rule does not apply generally. In fact, it proves the opposite. * * *

Allstate next suggests that the structure of § 901 shows that Rule 23 addresses only certifiability. Section 901(a), it notes, establishes class-certification criteria roughly analogous to those in Rule 23 (wherefore it agrees that subsection is pre-empted). But § 901(b)’s rule barring class actions for certain claims is set off as its own subsection, and where it applies § 901(a) does not. This shows, according to Allstate, that § 901(b) concerns a separate subject. Perhaps it does concern a subject separate from * * * § 901(a). But the question before us is whether it concerns a subject separate from the subject of Rule 23—and for purposes of answering that question the way New York has structured its statute is immaterial. Rule 23 permits all class actions that meet its requirements, and a State cannot limit that permission by structuring one part of its statute to track Rule 23 and enacting another part that imposes additional requirements. * * *

The dissent argues that § 901(b) has nothing to do with whether Shady Grove may maintain its suit as a class action, but affects only the remedy it may obtain if it wins. * * * Accordingly, the dissent says, Rule 23 and New York’s law may coexist in peace.

We need not decide whether a state law that limits the remedies available in an existing class action would conflict with Rule 23; that is not what § 901(b) does. * * * Unlike a law that sets a ceiling on damages (or puts other remedies out of reach) in properly filed class actions, § 901(b) says nothing about what remedies a court may award; it prevents the class actions it covers from coming into existence at all. * * *

The dissent asserts that a plaintiff can avoid § 901(b)’s barrier by omitting from his complaint (or removing) a request for statutory penalties. * * * Even assuming all statutory penalties are waivable, the fact that a complaint omitting them could be brought as a class action would not at all prove that § 901(b) is addressed only to remedies. If the state law instead banned class actions for fraud claims, a would-be class-action plaintiff could drop the fraud counts from his complaint and proceed with the remainder in a class action. Yet that would not mean the law provides no remedy for fraud; the ban would affect only the procedural means by which the remedy may be pursued. * * *

The dissent all but admits that the literal terms of § 901(b) address the same subject as Rule 23—i.e., whether a class action may be maintained—but insists the provision’s purpose is to restrict only remedies. * * * Unlike Rule 23, designed to further procedural fairness and efficiency, § 901(b) (we are told) “responds to an entirely different concern”: the fear that allowing statutory damages to be awarded on a class-wide basis would “produce overkill.” * * *

* * * [E]vidence of the New York Legislature’s purpose is pretty sparse. But even accepting the dissent’s account of the Legislature’s objective at face value, it cannot override the statute’s clear text. * * * The dissent’s concern for state prerogatives is frustrated rather than furthered by revising state laws when a potential conflict with a Federal Rule arises; the state-friendly approach would be to accept the law as written and test the validity of the Federal Rule.

The dissent’s approach of determining whether state and federal rules conflict based on the subjective intentions of the state legislature is an enterprise destined to produce “confusion worse confounded,” Sibbach * * * [p. 477, Note 3, supra]. It would mean, to begin with, that one State’s statute could survive pre-emption (and accordingly affect the procedures in federal court) while another State’s identical law would not, merely because its authors had different aspirations. It would also mean that district courts would have to discern, in every diversity case, the purpose behind any putatively pre-empted state procedural rule, even if its text squarely conflicts with federal law. That task will often prove arduous. Many laws further more than one aim, and the aim of others may be impossible to discern. Moreover, to the extent the dissent’s purpose-driven approach depends on its characterization of § 901(b)’s aims as substantive, it would apply to many state rules ostensibly addressed to procedure. Pleading standards, for example, often embody policy preferences about the types of claims that should succeed—as do rules governing summary judgment, pretrial discovery, and the admissibility of certain evidence. Hard cases will abound. It is not even clear that a state supreme court’s pronouncement of the law’s purpose would settle the issue, since existence of the factual predicate for avoiding federal pre-emption is ultimately a federal question. Predictably, federal judges would be condemned to poring through state legislative history—which may be less easily obtained, less thorough, and less familiar than its federal counterpart * * *.

But while the dissent does indeed artificially narrow the scope of § 901(b) by finding that it pursues only substantive policies, that is not the central difficulty of the dissent’s position. The central difficulty is that even artificial narrowing cannot render § 901(b) compatible with Rule 23. Whatever the policies they pursue, they flatly contradict each other. * * * Rule 23 unambiguously authorizes any plaintiff, in any federal civil proceeding, to maintain a class action if the Rule’s prerequisites are met.

506

We cannot contort its text, even to avert a collision with state law that might render it invalid. * * * ⁸ What the dissent’s approach achieves is not the avoiding of a “conflict between Rule 23 and § 901(b),” * * * but rather the invalidation of Rule 23 * * * to the extent that it conflicts with the substantive policies of § 901. There is no other way to reach the dissent’s destination. We must therefore confront head-on whether Rule 23 falls within the statutory authorization.

B

* * *

We have long held that [the limitations in the Rules Enabling Act] means that the Rule must “really regulat[e] procedure,—the judicial process for enforcing rights and duties recognized by substantive law and for justly administering remedy and redress for disregard or infraction of them,” Sibbach * * *. The test is not whether the rule affects a litigant’s substantive rights; most procedural rules do. * * * What matters is what the rule itself regulates: If it governs only “the manner and the means” by which the litigants’ rights are “enforced,” it is valid; if it alters “the rules of decision by which [the] court will adjudicate [those] rights,” it is not. * * *

Applying that test, we have rejected every statutory challenge to a Federal Rule that has come before us. * * * Each of these rules [for example, the service of process rule in Hanna, p. 468, supra] had some practical effect on the parties’ rights, but each undeniably regulated only the process for enforcing those rights; none altered the rights themselves, the available remedies, or the rules of decision by which the court adjudicated either.

Applying that criterion, we think it obvious that rules allowing multiple claims (and claims by or against multiple parties) to be litigated together are also valid. * * * Such rules neither change plaintiffs’ separate entitlements to relief nor abridge defendants’ rights; they alter only how the claims are processed. For the same reason, Rule 23—at least insofar as it allows willing plaintiffs to join their separate claims against the same defendants in a class action—falls within § 2072(b)’s authorization. A class action, no less than traditional joinder (of which it is a species), merely enables a federal court to adjudicate claims of multiple parties at once, instead of in separate suits. And like traditional joinder, it leaves the parties’ legal rights and duties intact and the rules of decision unchanged.

Allstate contends that the authorization of class actions is not substantively neutral: Allowing Shady Grove to sue on behalf of a class “transform[s] [the] dispute over a five hundred dollar penalty into a dispute over a five million dollar penalty.” * * * Allstate’s aggregate liability, however, does not depend on whether the suit proceeds as a class action. Each of the 1,000-plus members of the putative class could (as Allstate acknowledges) bring a freestanding suit asserting his individual claim. It is undoubtedly true that some plaintiffs who would not bring individual suits for the relatively small sums involved will choose to join a class action. That has no bearing, however, on Allstate’s or the plaintiffs’ legal rights. The likelihood that some (even many) plaintiffs will be induced to sue by the availability of a class action is just the sort of “incidental effec[t]” we have long held does not violate § 2072(b) * * *.

507

Allstate argues that Rule 23 violates § 2072(b) because the state law it displaces, § 901(b), creates a right that the Federal Rule abridges—namely, a “substantive right . . . not to be subjected to aggregated class-action liability” in a single suit. * * * To begin with, we doubt that that is so. Nothing in the text of § 901(b) (which is to be found in New York’s procedural code) confines it to claims under

New York law; and of course New York has no power to alter substantive rights and duties created by other sovereigns. * * * As a fallback argument, Allstate argues that even if § 901(b) is a procedural provision, it was enacted “for substantive reasons,” * * * (emphasis added).” * * *

The fundamental difficulty with both these arguments is that the substantive nature of New York’s law, or its substantive purpose, makes no difference. A Federal Rule of Procedure is not valid in some jurisdictions and invalid in others—or valid in some cases and invalid in others—depending upon whether its effect is to frustrate a state substantive law (or a state procedural law enacted for substantive purposes). * * * [Sibbach and] Hanna unmistakably expressed the same understanding that compliance of a Federal Rule with the Enabling Act is to be assessed by consulting the Rule itself, and not its effects in individual applications * * *.

In sum, it is not the substantive or procedural nature or purpose of the affected state law that matters, but the substantive or procedural nature of the Federal Rule. * * * [T]he validity of a Federal Rule depends entirely upon whether it regulates procedure. * * * If it does, it is authorized by § 2072 and is valid in all jurisdictions, with respect to all claims, regardless of its incidental effect upon state-created rights.

C

A few words in response to the concurrence. * * * The concurrence agrees with us that Rule 23 and § 901(b) conflict * * * and departs from us only with respect to the second part of the test, i.e., whether application of the Federal Rule violates § 2072(b) * * *. Like us, it answers no, but for a reason different from ours. * * *

The concurrence would decide this case on the basis, not that Rule 23 is procedural, but that the state law it displaces is procedural, in the sense that it does not “function as a part of the State’s definition of substantive rights and remedies.” * * * A state procedural rule is not preempted, according to the concurrence, so long as it is “so bound up with,” or “sufficiently intertwined with,” a substantive state-law right or remedy “that it defines the scope of that substantive right or remedy” * * *.

508

This analysis squarely conflicts with Sibbach, which established the rule we apply. The concurrence contends that Sibbach did not rule out its approach, but that is not so. Recognizing the impracticability of a test that turns on the idiosyncrasies of state law, Sibbach adopted and applied a rule with a single criterion: whether the Federal Rule “really regulates procedure.” * * * [T]hat rule leaves no room for special exemptions based on the function or purpose of a particular state rule. * * *

In reality, the concurrence seeks not to apply Sibbach, but to overrule it (or, what is the same, to rewrite it). Its approach, the concurrence insists, gives short shrift to the statutory text forbidding the Federal Rules from “abridg[ing], enlarg[ing], or modify[ing] any substantive right” * * *. * * * There is something to that. It is possible to understand how it can be determined whether a Federal Rule “enlarges” substantive rights without consulting State law: If the Rule creates a substantive right, even one that duplicates some state-created rights, it establishes a new federal right. But it is hard to understand how it can be determined whether a Federal Rule “abridges” or “modifies” substantive rights without knowing what state-created rights would obtain if the Federal Rule did not exist. Sibbach’s exclusive focus on the challenged Federal Rule—driven by the very real concern that Federal Rules which vary from State to State would be chaos * * *—is hard to square with § 2072(b)’s terms.¹¹

Sibbach has been settled law, however, for nearly seven decades. * * * In all events, Allstate has not even asked us to overrule Sibbach, let alone carried its burden of persuading us to do so. * * * Why we should cast aside our decades-old decision escapes us, especially since (as the concurrence explains) that would not affect the result.¹³

509

The concurrence also contends that applying Sibbach and assessing whether a Federal Rule regulates substance or procedure is not always easy. * * * Undoubtedly some hard cases will arise (though we have managed to muddle through well enough in the 69 years since Sibbach was decided). But as the concurrence acknowledges, * * * the basic difficulty is unavoidable: The statute itself refers to “substantive right[s]” * * * so there is no escaping the substance-procedure distinction. What is more, the concurrence’s approach does nothing to diminish the difficulty, but rather magnifies it many times over. * * * At the end of the day, one must come face to face with the decision whether or not the state policy (with which a putatively procedural state rule may be “bound up”) pertains to a “substantive right or remedy,” * * *—that is, whether it is substance or procedure. The more one explores the alternatives to Sibbach’s rule, the more its wisdom becomes apparent.

D

We must acknowledge the reality that keeping the federal-court door open to class actions that cannot proceed in state court will produce forum shopping. That is unacceptable when it comes as the consequence of judge-made rules created to fill supposed “gaps” in positive federal law. * * * But divergence from state law, with the attendant consequence of forum shopping, is the inevitable (indeed, one might say the intended) result of a uniform system of federal procedure. Congress itself has created the possibility that the same case may follow a different course if filed in federal instead of state court. * * * The short of the matter is that a Federal Rule governing procedure is valid whether or not it alters the outcome of the case in a way that induces forum shopping. To hold otherwise would be to “disembowel either the Constitution’s grant of power over federal procedure” or Congress’s exercise of it. * * * [Hanna].

* * *

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

The New York law at issue * * * is a procedural rule that is not part of New York’s substantive law. Accordingly, I agree with Justice SCALIA that [the] Federal Rule * * * must apply in this case and join Parts I and II-A of the Court’s opinion. But I also agree with Justice GINSBURG that there are some state procedural rules that federal courts must apply in diversity cases because they function as a part of the State’s definition of substantive rights and remedies.

510

* * *

* * * When a federal rule appears to abridge, enlarge, or modify a substantive right, federal courts must consider whether the rule can reasonably be interpreted to avoid that impermissible result. * * * And when such a “saving” construction is not possible and the rule would violate the Enabling Act, federal courts cannot apply the rule. * * * A federal rule, therefore, cannot govern a particular case in which the rule would displace a state law that is procedural in the ordinary use of the term but is so intertwined with a state right or remedy that it functions to define the scope of the state-created right. And absent a governing federal rule, a federal court must engage in the traditional Rules of Decision Act inquiry, under the Erie line of cases. * * *

Justice SCALIA believes that the sole Enabling Act question is whether the federal rule “really regulates procedure,” * * * which means, apparently, whether it regulates “the manner and the means by which the litigants’ rights are enforced,” * * *. I respectfully disagree. This interpretation of the Enabling Act is consonant with the Act’s first limitation to “general rules of practice and procedure” * * *. But it ignores the second limitation that such rules also “not abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right” * * *,⁸ and in so doing ignores the balance that Congress struck between uniform rules of federal procedure and respect for a State’s construction of its own rights and remedies. * * *

Although the plurality appears to agree with much of my interpretation of § 2072 * * *, it nonetheless rejects that approach for two reasons, both of which are mistaken. First, Justice SCALIA worries that if federal courts inquire into the effect of federal rules on state law, it will enmesh federal courts in difficult determinations about whether application of a given rule would displace a state determination about substantive rights. * * * I do not see why an Enabling Act inquiry that looks to state law necessarily is more taxing than Justice SCALIA’s. But in any event, that inquiry is what the Enabling Act requires * * *. * * * Although, Justice SCALIA may generally prefer easily administrable, bright-line rules, his preference does not give us license to adopt a second-best interpretation of the Rules Enabling Act. * * *

Second, the plurality argues that its interpretation of the Enabling Act is dictated by this Court’s decision in Sibbach, which applied a Federal Rule about when parties must submit to medical examinations. But the plurality misreads that opinion. * * * The petitioner raised only the facial question whether “Rules 35 and 37 [of the Federal Rules] are . . . within the mandate of Congress to this court” and not the specific question of “the obligation of federal courts to apply the substantive law of a state.” * * * The Court, therefore, had no occasion to consider whether the particular application of the Federal Rules in question would offend the Enabling Act.

511

Nor, in Sibbach, was any further analysis necessary to the resolution of the case because the matter at issue, requiring medical exams for litigants, did not pertain to “substantive rights” under the Enabling Act. Although most state rules bearing on the litigation process are adopted for some policy reason, few seemingly “procedural” rules define the scope of a substantive right or remedy. The matter at issue in Sibbach reflected competing federal and state judgments about privacy interests. Those privacy concerns may have been weighty and in some sense substantive; but they did not pertain to the scope of any state right or remedy at issue in the litigation. * * *

Notwithstanding the plain language of Rule 23, I understand the dissent to find that Rule 23 does not govern the question of class certification in this matter because New York has made a substantive judgment that such a class should not be certified, as a means of proscribing damages. * * *

* * * The dissent would apply the Rules of Decision Act inquiry under Erie even to cases in which there is a governing federal rule, and thus the Act, by its own terms, does not apply. * * * [This] approach would, in my view, work an end run around Congress’ system of uniform federal rules * * * and our decision in Hanna. * * * If my dissenting colleagues feel strongly that § 901(b) is substantive and that class certification should be denied, then they should argue within the Enabling Act’s framework. Otherwise, “the Federal Rule applies regardless of contrary state law.” * * *

In my view, * * * the bar for finding an Enabling Act problem is a high one. The mere fact that a state law is designed as a procedural rule suggests it reflects a judgment about how state courts ought to operate and not a judgment about the scope of state-created rights and remedies. And for the purposes of operating a federal court system, there are costs involved in attempting to discover the true nature of a state procedural rule and allowing such a rule to operate alongside a federal rule that appears to govern the same question. The mere possibility that a federal rule would alter a state-created right is not sufficient. * * *

The text of CPLR § 901(b) expressly and unambiguously applies not only to claims based on New York law but also to claims based on federal law or the law of any other State. And there is no interpretation from New York courts to the contrary. It is therefore hard to see how § 901(b) could be understood as a rule that, though procedural in form, serves the function of defining New York’s rights or remedies. This is all the more apparent because lawsuits under New York law could be joined in federal class actions well before New York passed § 901(b) in 1975, and New York had done nothing to prevent that. * * *

512

The legislative history, moreover, does not clearly describe a judgment that § 901(b) would operate as a limitation on New York’s statutory damages. In evaluating that legislative history, it is necessary to distinguish between procedural rules adopted for some policy reason and seemingly procedural rules that are intimately bound up in the scope of a substantive right or remedy. * * * New York clearly crafted § 901(b) with the intent that only certain lawsuits—those for which there were not statutory penalties—could be joined in class actions in New York courts. That decision reflects a policy judgment about which lawsuits should proceed in New York courts in a class form and which should not. * * *

The difference of degree is relevant to the forum shopping considerations that are part of the Rules of Decision Act or Erie inquiry. If the applicable federal rule did not govern the particular question at issue (or could be fairly read not to do so), then those considerations would matter, for precisely the reasons given by the dissent. * * * But that is not this case. * * *

* * * Although one can argue that class certification would enlarge New York’s “limited” damages remedy, * * * such arguments rest on extensive speculation about what the New York Legislature had in mind when it created § 901(b). * * * In order to displace a federal rule, there must be more than just a possibility that the state rule is different than it appears.

Accordingly, I concur in part and concur in the judgment.

JUSTICE GINSBURG, with whom JUSTICE KENNEDY, JUSTICE BREYER, and JUSTICE ALITO join, dissenting.

The Court today approves Shady Grove’s attempt to transform a $500 case into a $5,000,000 award, although the State creating the right to recover has proscribed this alchemy. * * *

The Court reads Rule 23 relentlessly to override New York’s restriction on the availability of statutory damages. Our decisions, however, caution us to ask, before undermining state legislation: Is this conflict really necessary? * * * Had the Court engaged in that inquiry, it would not have read Rule 23 to collide with New York’s legitimate interest in keeping certain monetary awards reasonably bounded. I would continue to interpret Federal Rules with awareness of, and sensitivity to, important state regulatory policies. * * *

513

I

* * *

Our decisions instruct over and over again that, in the adjudication of diversity cases, state interests—whether advanced in a statute, * * * or a procedural rule * * *—warrant our respectful consideration. Yet today, the Court gives no quarter to New York’s limitation on statutory damages and requires the lower courts to thwart the regulatory policy at stake: To prevent excessive damages, New York’s law controls the penalty to which a defendant may be exposed in a single suit. * * *

The Court, I am convinced, finds conflict where none is necessary. * * * Rule 23 prescribes the considerations relevant to class certification and postcertification proceedings—but it does not command that a particular remedy be available when a party sues in a representative capacity. * * * Section 901(b), in contrast, trains on that latter issue. Sensibly read, Rule 23 governs procedural aspects of class litigation, but allows state law to control the size of a monetary award a class plaintiff may pursue.

* * * Rule 23 describes a method of enforcing a claim for relief, while § 901(b) defines the dimensions of the claim itself. In this regard, it is immaterial that § 901(b) bars statutory penalties in wholesale, rather than retail, fashion. The New York Legislature could have embedded the limitation in every provision creating a cause of action for which a penalty is authorized; § 901(b) operates as shorthand to the same effect. * * *

The Court single-mindedly focuses on whether a suit “may” or “may not” be maintained as a class action. * * * Putting the question that way, the Court does not home in on the reason why. Rule 23 authorizes class treatment for suits satisfying its prerequisites because the class mechanism generally affords a fair and efficient way to aggregate claims for adjudication. Section 901(b) responds to an entirely different concern; it does not allow class members to recover statutory damages because the New York Legislature considered the result of adjudicating such claims en masse to be exorbitant. * * * The fair and efficient conduct of class litigation is the legitimate concern of Rule 23; the remedy for an infraction of state law, however, is the legitimate concern of the State’s lawmakers and not of the federal rulemakers. * * *

* * * The Court suggests that the analysis might differ if the statute “limit[ed] the remedies available in an existing class action,” * * * such that Rule 23 might not conflict with a state statute prescribing that “no more than $1,000,000 may be recovered in a class action.” There is no real difference in the purpose and intended effect of these two hypothetical statutes. The notion that one directly impinges on Rule 23’s domain, while the other does not, fundamentally misperceives the office of Rule 23. * * *

514

II

 I would decide this case by inquiring “whether application of the [state] rule would have so important an effect upon the fortunes of one or both of the litigants that failure to [apply] it would be likely to cause a plaintiff to choose the federal court.” Hanna ***.

Seeking to pretermite that inquiry, Shady Grove urges that the class-action bar in § 901(b) must be regarded as “procedural” because it is contained in the CPLR, which “govern[s] the procedure in civil judicial proceedings in all courts of the state.”  Placement in the CPLR is hardly dispositive. The provision held “substantive” for Erie purposes in Gasperini is also contained in the CPLR , as are limitations periods,  prescriptions plainly “substantive” for Erie purposes however they may be characterized for other purposes ***.

 Shady Grove’s effort to characterize § 901(b) as simply “procedural” cannot successfully elide this fundamental norm: When no federal law or rule is dispositive of an issue, and a state statute is outcome affective in the sense our cases on Erie (pre and post-Hanna) develop, the Rules of Decision Act commands application of the State’s law in diversity suits.  As the plurality acknowledges,  forum shopping will undoubtedly result if a plaintiff need only file in federal instead of state court to seek a massive monetary award explicitly barred by state law. ***

III

The Court’s erosion of Erie’s federalism grounding impels me to point out the large irony in today’s judgment. Shady Grove is able to pursue its claim in federal court only by virtue of the recent enactment of the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 (CAFA) . In CAFA, Congress opened federal-court doors to state-law-based class actions so long as there is minimal diversity, at least 100 class members, and at least $5,000,000 in controversy.  By providing a federal forum, Congress sought to check what it considered to be the overreadiness of some state courts to certify class actions.  In other words, Congress envisioned fewer—not more—class actions overall. Congress surely never anticipated that CAFA would make federal courts a mecca for suits of the kind Shady Grove has launched:  claims that would be barred from class treatment in the State’s own courts. ***

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In the absence of a majority opinion, does Justice Scalia’s plurality or Justice Stevens’ concurrence state the rule that federal courts should apply in determining when a state rule is displaced by a Federal Rule? Why? See p. 158,

515

Note 1, supra. The Eleventh Circuit, in Lisk v. Lumber One Wood Preserving, LLC, 792 F.3d 1331 (11th Cir. 2015), held it was not necessary to choose between Justice Scalia’s and Justice Stevens’ opinions: “Regardless of which Shady Grove opinion is binding, the holding is binding.” Id. at 1335. That holding “controls our case” because “[t]here is no relevant, meaningful distinction between a statutorily created penalty of the kind at issue in Shady Grove, on the one hand, and a statutorily created claim for deceptive practices of the kind at issue here.” Id. Accordingly, it held that Federal Rule 23 did not alter rights under the Alabama Deceptive Trade Practices Act (ADTPA), and so Alabama’s bar on private ADTPA class actions was inapplicable in federal court.

- 2.How does the plurality’s approach to the validity of a Federal Rule under 28 U.S.C. § 2072 differ from that of the concurrence?
- 3.In what respect does Justice Stevens’ concurrence differ from the dissenting opinion authored by Justice Ginsburg? Are you persuaded by the dissent’s position that Rule 23 does not conflict with the New York rule? What is the argument?
- 4.Justice Ginsburg’s dissent relied extensively on the legislative history to the New York rule. In ascertaining the meaning and purpose of a state rule, is a court sitting in diversity obliged to follow the state’s approach to interpreting legislative history, or can it use a different federal approach? Does either the Rules of Decision Act or the Rules Enabling Act speak to this question? See pp. 521–522, infra.
- 5.Would the result in Shady Grove have been different if the New York legislature had stated explicitly that CPLR § 901(b) was substantive? In 2016, following the Eleventh Circuit’s Lisk decision, supra, Note 1, the Alabama legislature enacted a statute stating that its ban on class actions seeking remedies under the ADTPA “is a substantive limitation” and that “allowing a consumer or other person to bring a class action or other representative action for a violation of this chapter would abridge, enlarge, or modify the substantive rights created by this chapter.” Ala. Code § 8–19–10(f). Federal courts in Alabama have found that this language did not change the Eleventh Circuit’s conclusion in Lisk. See, e.g., Jones v. Coty Inc., 362 F.Supp.3d 1182, 1198–1200 & nn.10–11 (S.D.Ala. 2018) (“Whether the Alabama legislature chooses to label something a ‘substantive right’ is certainly not dispositive of, and perhaps not even relevant to,  whether a substantive right actually is at stake for Rules Enabling Act purposes.”). See also Hershkoff, Shady Grove: Duck-Rabbits, Clear Statements, and Federalism, 74 Alb.L.Rev. 1703 (2011) (discussing but criticizing the possibility of using “a clear statement rule to determine whether a state law is substantive or procedural for purposes of the Rules of Enabling Act”).

Even after Shady Grove, however, some federal courts have found state-law class-action bans to be binding in federal court. See, e.g., Fejzulai v. Sam’s West, Inc., 205 F.Supp.3d 723, 729 (D.S.C. 2016) (holding that a class prohibition that “is part of the same sentence that conveys the substantive right” under the South Carolina Unfair Trade Practices Act (SCUTPA) is binding in federal court, because “the seed from which Plaintiffs’ SCUTPA cause of action must germinate simply does not contain the requisite DNA to grow into a class action claim”).

6. Shady Grove continues to generate division among the lower federal courts, especially in cases involving rules that are not neatly categorized as procedural or substantive. Compare Scottsdale Insurance Co. v. Tolliver, 636 F.3d 1273 (10th Cir. 2011) (holding that the Oklahoma statute providing for recovery of costs and fees after offer of judgment was substantive and not preempted by Federal Rule 68 which does not provide for attorney’s fees to prevailing defendant), with Goldberg v. Pacific Indemnification Co., 627 F.3d 752 (9th Cir. 2010) (holding that the Arizona statute providing for recovery costs and fees after offer of judgment was preempted by Federal Rule 68 barring defendants’ recovery of expert witness fees and double costs).

One particularly challenging issue has been the role of state “SLAPP” laws (Strategic Lawsuits Against Public Participation), which impose special rules for defamation and similar actions that can chill freedom of speech. See, e.g., Cal.Civ.Proc.Code § 425.16(a) (describing the purpose of California’s “anti-SLAPP” provisions as addressing “lawsuits brought primarily to chill the valid exercise of the constitutional rights of freedom of speech and petition for the redress of grievances”). Federal courts have had to address whether such state provisions conflict with the Federal Rules governing pleading (Rule 8), motions for sanctions (Rule 11), motions to dismiss (Rule 12), and motions for summary judgment (Rule 56). See, e.g., Carbone v. Cable News Network, Inc., 910 F.3d 1345 (11th Cir. 2018) (“Under [the Shady Grove] framework, we cannot apply the dismissal provision of the Georgia anti-SLAPP statute. The question in dispute is whether Carbone’s complaint states a claim for relief supported by sufficient evidence to avoid pretrial dismissal. Taken together, Rules 8, 12, and 56 provide an answer.”); Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc. v. Center for Medical Progress, 890 F.3d 828, 834 (9th Cir.), amended, 897 F.3d 1224 (9th Cir. 2018) (interpreting California’s anti-SLAPP provisions to avoid a “stark collision of the state rules of procedure with the governing Federal Rules * * * while in a federal district court”); CoreCivic Inc. v. Candide Grp. LLC, 2021 WL 1267259 (N.D.Cal. 2021) (finding that the anti-SLAPP statute’s attorney’s fees provisions were binding in federal court, reasoning that there was no procedural conflict with Rule 11 because the statute created a substantive right to recover attorney’s fees under specified conditions).

B. THE PROBLEM OF ASCERTAINING STATE LAW

1.DETERMINING WHICH STATE’S LAW GOVERNS

In Erie, the parties and the courts appear to have assumed that if state law applied, Pennsylvania tort law would govern even though the action was heard in a federal court in New York. Why did they make this assumption? Was the federal court free to choose the most appropriate state law to govern the dispute? Or was it that New York’s choice-of-law rules pointed to an application of Pennsylvania law?

517

KLAXON CO. v. STENTOR ELECTRIC MFG. CO., 313 U.S. 487, 61 S.Ct. 1020, 85 L.Ed. 1477 (1941). The Supreme Court held that in order to promote the uniform application of substantive law within a state, federal courts must apply the conflicts-of-law rules of the states in which they sit. The Court explained:

* * * Whatever lack of uniformity this may produce between federal courts in different states is attributable to our federal system, which leaves to a state, within the limits permitted by the Constitution, the right to pursue local policies diverging from those of its neighbors. It is not for the federal courts to thwart such local policies by enforcing an independent “general law” of conflict of laws. * * * [T]he proper function of [a] federal court is to ascertain what the state law is, not what it ought to be.

Id. at 496–97, 61 S.Ct. at 1022, 85 L.Ed. at 1480–81.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Supreme Court reaffirmed the Klaxon rule in Day & Zimmermann, Inc. v. Challoner, 423 U.S. 3, 96 S.Ct.167, 46 L.Ed.2d 3 (1975), underscoring that the diversity court “is not free to engraft onto * * * state [conflicts] rules exceptions or modifications which * * * have not commended themselves to the State in which the federal court sits.” Id. at 4, 96 S.Ct. at 168, 46 L.Ed.2d at 5. Is the Klaxon rule constitutionally compelled? Is it required by the Rules of Decision Act?

2.Could Congress enact a statute specifying choice-of-law rules for federal courts in diversity cases? In answering this question, remember that, although today every state contains at least one federal judicial district, there is no constitutional provision that compels this. What if Congress had established only regional courts? Under such a scheme, would Congress or the courts have been forced to establish their own choice-of-law rules?

3.In ALLSTATE INSURANCE CO. v. HAGUE, p. 106, Note 3, supra, the Supreme Court held that a state could apply its substantive law in a case, so long as the state had significant contacts or a significant aggregation of contacts with the parties and the transaction. Doesn’t Hague encourage plaintiffs to forum shop, with Klaxon sealing defendant’s fate even in federal court?

4.The Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA) of 2005 authorizes diversity jurisdiction over multistate disputes despite the absence of complete diversity of citizenship. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d). Should state or federal conflicts rules apply in class actions under the statute? See Nagareda, Bootstrapping in

Choice of Law After the Class Action Fairness Act, 74 UMKC L.Rev. 661, 684 (2006). If Congress intended to overrule Klaxon, how explicit did CAFA need to be? CAFA is discussed later in these materials, see p. 870, Note 4, infra.

5.In FLINTKOTE COMPANY v. ACIA PLC, 177 F.Supp.3d 1165, 1174 (N.D.Cal. 2016), an insurance contract’s choice-of-law provision stated that disputes were to be resolved “in accordance with applicable common law of the states of the United States.” The district court rejected the argument that this provision allowed it to rely on “generally applicable contract interpretation rules that apply to insurance policies,” because that would be inconsistent with Erie’s guidance that “there is no such thing as a ‘national common law.’ ” Instead, the court looked to Klaxon and the presumption that in a diversity case, the court will look first to the conflicts principles of the forum state. Under that test, the California choice-of-law rule applied, which required the application of California substantive law. Was this decision analytically sound? Was it wise?

2.ASCERTAINING THE STATE LAW

MASON v. AMERICAN EMERY WHEEL WORKS
United States Court of Appeals, First Circuit, 1957.
241 F.2d 906.

MAGRUDER, CHIEF JUDGE. Whit Mason, a citizen of Mississippi, filed his complaint in the United States District Court for the District of Rhode Island against The American Emery Wheel Works, a Rhode Island corporation. The case was one in tort for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff in Mississippi as a result of negligent misfeasance by the defendant in putting out in commerce without adequate care and inspection, a dangerously defective emery wheel. According to the allegations of the complaint, at some time prior to the date of the accident defendant negligently manufactured, inspected and tested a certain emery wheel designed for attachment to a bench grinder; that due to such negligence the emery wheel was not reasonably fit for the use for which it was intended, but on the contrary subjected to a risk of personal injury all persons lawfully using a bench grinder with the emery wheel attached * * *.

* * *

* * * Plaintiff’s evidence tended to show that a certain emery wheel * * * was purchased by the Hoover Company, a New Jersey corporation, from the defendant for attachment to a bench grinding machine made by the Hoover Company; that the Hoover Company affixed to the said bench grinding machine, with emery wheel attached, a label indicating that the bench grinder had been manufactured by Miller Falls Company, a Massachusetts corporation; that said bench grinder * * * was successively sold by the Hoover Company to Miller Falls Company, by the latter to Komp Equipment Company, and finally by Komp Equipment Company to T.H. Pearce Company, the plaintiff’s employer; * * * that while plaintiff was using it in the ordinary and proper manner the emery wheel disintegrated and exploded in plaintiff’s face, causing the injuries complained of.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff’s case defendant made an oral motion to dismiss the complaint under Rule 41(b) * * *. This motion to dismiss was granted * * * and an order was entered dismissing the complaint, from which the present appeal was taken.

Since the injury was inflicted in Mississippi, the district court, no doubt correctly under now familiar authorities, deemed itself to be obliged to apply the Mississippi local law to determine the tort liability, if any, of a manufacturer to one not in privity of contract with him. * * * The district court came to the conclusion “reluctantly” that it was bound by the Mississippi law as declared in Ford Motor Co. v. Myers, 1928, 151 Miss. 73, 117 So. 362; that the “harsh rule” of Mississippi as so declared, “contrary to the great weight of authority” elsewhere, was that a manufacturer was not liable for negligence in the manufacture of appliances which could and would become highly dangerous when put to the uses for which they are intended, where there is no privity of contract between the user and the manufacturer.

Ford Motor Co. v. Myers, supra, was the only Mississippi case relied upon, or even referred to, by the district court. In that case the Supreme Court of Mississippi, in a half-page opinion, did in fact apply what was at one time the prevailing rule, in holding that Ford Motor Company as the manufacturer of a truck owed no duty of care to a remote subvendee of the truck who was injured when the truck collapsed and plunged into a ditch because of a defect which could have been detected by reasonable inspection by the manufacturer before the vehicle left the factory.

* * *

MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., [217 N.Y. 382, 111 N.E. 1050 (1916)], * * * started a new trend in this particular field of the law, and its substantive result has found favor in § 395 of the * * * Restatement of Torts. If the Supreme Court of Mississippi had recently reconsidered the rule it applied in Ford Motor Co. v. Myers, supra, and had decided to adhere to it on the ground of stare decisis, no doubt the federal courts would have had to accept the local law as so declared. But it would be gratuitous and unwarranted to assume that the Supreme Court of Mississippi would now so hold, when we bear in mind the readiness of other courts, in conservative jurisdictions at that, to overrule their earlier holdings and to bring their jurisprudence into accord with what is now the overwhelming weight of authority. * * * In Anderson v. Linton, 7 Cir., 1949, 178 F.2d 304, the court of appeals declined to accept as the local law of Iowa what it narrowly construed to be a dictum of the Supreme Court of Iowa enunciating the old ruling of nonliability * * *. * * *

Of course it is not necessary that a case be explicitly overruled in order to lose its persuasive force as an indication of what the law is. A decision may become so overloaded with illogical exceptions that by erosion of time it may lose its persuasive or binding force even in the inferior courts of the same jurisdiction. And where, as in Ford Motor Co. v. Myers, the Supreme Court of Mississippi, twenty or thirty years ago, applied an old rule which has since been generally discredited elsewhere, it is relevant to consider what the Supreme Court of Mississippi has subsequently said on the point. * * * We think that appellant herein rightly stresses the importance of E.I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co. v. Ladner, 1954, 221 Miss. 378, 73 So.2d 249. In that very recent case, the Supreme Court of Mississippi was able to dispose of the particular issue on another ground without the necessity of expressly overruling its earlier decision in Ford Motor Co. v. Myers. But the court did take occasion, in a long and careful opinion, to indicate its awareness of the modern trend in the area * * *. And it quoted, with apparent approval, many more recent authorities in support of the “modern doctrine.” * * * We think it is fair to infer from this latest expression by the Supreme Court of Mississippi that it is prepared to reconsider and revise the rule it applied in Ford Motor Co. v. Myers whenever it may have before it a case that squarely presents the issue. We have no doubt that when this occasion does come to pass, the Supreme Court of Mississippi will declare itself in agreement with the more enlightened and generally accepted modern doctrine.

A judgment will be entered vacating the order of the District Court, dismissing the complaint and remanding the case to the District Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

HARTIGAN, CIRCUIT JUDGE (concurring).

I concur in the opinion of the court but I am constrained to comment briefly. We were informed in oral argument by counsel for the appellee that the district court in deciding this case had before it both the Ford and the Du Pont decisions. Moreover, the district court knew from the official Mississippi report that the MacPherson case, then approximately twelve years old, had been considered and rejected by the Mississippi Supreme Court sitting in the Ford case. Therefore, “reluctantly” Judge Day adopted the Ford holding since it, as the only binding and conclusive statement of Mississippi law on the issue, had not been expressly modified or overruled. * * *

We, however, have inferred from pure dicta in the Du Pont case and from the status of the law elsewhere on this issue that Mississippi is prepared to discard the Ford rule and adopt the modern rule. I believe this is a sound inference since the dicta in the Du Pont case though not expressly mentioning Ford, is sufficiently clear and the Ford rule is sufficiently outdated. Yet, in doing so I realize that we present a difficult problem for district judges when they must apply the Erie doctrine to situations wherein the considerations as between conflicting holdings and dicta are not as clearly defined as they are here. The question of how clear dicta must be to prevail over a prior controlling decision does not lend itself to easy solution.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The history of the privity rule in Mississippi following Mason is interesting. Relying heavily on Judge Magruder’s opinion, the Fifth Circuit held in Grey v. Hayes-Sammons Chem. Co., 310 F.2d 291 (5th Cir. 1962), that under Mississippi law a lack of privity was not a bar to a claim by a Mississippi consumer against a manufacturer of a cotton spray. The Fifth Circuit reached similar conclusions in Necaise v. Chrysler Corp., 335 F.2d 562 (5th Cir. 1964), and Putman v. Erie City Mfg. Co., 338 F.2d 911 (5th Cir. 1964). Finally, the Mississippi Supreme Court, in State Stove Mfg. Co. v. Hodges, 189 So. 2d 113 (Miss.1966), cert. denied, 386 U.S. 912, 87 S.Ct. 860, 17 L.Ed.2d 784 (1967), reconsidered the privity question and overruled its decision in Ford Motor Co. v. Myers. In doing so, the court did not cite either the First Circuit’s decision in Mason or the series of decisions in the Fifth Circuit.

2. It seems fairly clear that when the state’s highest court has declared the state law in question, the federal court is required to follow it. Does that mean that the federal court is required to treat an established state rule as static, or may it consider lower court decisions and statutory developments to see if the rule is in flux? See Bernhardt v. Polygraphic Co. of America, 350 U.S. 198, 205, 76 S.Ct. 273, 277, 100 L.Ed. 199, 206 (1956). The general rule is that if the state’s highest court has not declared the meaning of the state law in question, “federal courts must act as ‘another court of the State’ and choose from a variety of sources, including high court dicta and lower court rulings” to interpret the law. Kaye & Weissman, Interactive Judicial Federalism: Certified Questions in New York, 69 Fordham L.Rev. 373, 376 (2000). This process is sometimes called making an “Erie guess,” by which the federal court “must select the rule that it believes the state’s highest court, from all that is known about its methods of reaching decisions and the authorities it tends to rely on, is likely to adopt sometime in the not too distant future.” 19 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4507 (3d ed.).

In McKENNA v. ORTHO PHARMACEUTICAL CORP., 622 F.2d 657, 662 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 976, 101 S.Ct. 387, 66 L.Ed.2d 237 (1980), the court of appeals emphasized that the federal court’s process of ascertaining state law is not one of “speculative * * * crystal-ball gazing,” but rather requires:

[A]n examination of all relevant sources of that state’s law in order to isolate those factors that would inform its decision. * * * In the absence of authority directly on point, decisions by that court in analogous cases provide useful indications of the court’s probable disposition of a particular question of law. * * * Considered dicta by the state’s highest court may also provide a federal court with reliable indicia of how the state tribunal might rule on a particular question.

The difficulties of this process are illustrated by POMERANTZ v. CLARK, 101 F.Supp. 341, 345–46 (D.Mass. 1951), a diversity action by policy holders against directors of an insurance company to retrieve for the company certain sums allegedly improvidently and illegally loaned. Judge Wyzanski held that no action was maintainable under Massachusetts law and stated:

In considering whether * * * [to create] an exception to the Massachusetts rule that before bringing a derivative suit a member must first lay his case before the body of members, the never-to-be-forgotten caution is that this Court is not free to render such decision as seems to it equitable, just and in accordance with public policy and responsive to all those jurisprudential criteria which so often enter into what Justice Cardozo called ‘The Nature of the Judicial Process.’ A federal judge sitting in a diversity jurisdiction case has not a roving commission to do justice or to develop the law according to his, or what he believes to be the sounder, views. His problem is less philosophical and more psychological. His task is to divine the views of the state court judges. * * *

The eminence of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, an eminence not surpassed by any American tribunal, is in large measure due to its steadiness, learning and understanding of the durable values long prized in this community. Subtle variations and blurred lines are not characteristic of that court. Principles are announced and adhered to in broad magisterial terms. The emphasis is on precedent and adherence to the older ways, not on creating new causes of action or encouraging the use of novel judicial remedies that have sprung up in less conservative communities. Here abides the ancient faith in the right of men to choose their own associates, make their own arrangements, govern themselves and thus grow in responsibility without much in the way of either hindrance or help from the state. This basic philosophy permeates the Massachusetts rules governing derivative suits * * *.

See also Nolan v. Transocean Air Lines, 276 F.2d 280, 281 (2d Cir. 1960), in which Judge Friendly stated: “Our principal task, in this diversity of citizenship case, is to determine what the New York courts would think the California courts would think on an issue about which neither has thought.” Does this task require the federal courts to apply the principles of statutory interpretation of the relevant state? See Gluck, Intersystemic Statutory Interpretation: Methodology as “Law” and the Erie Doctrine, 120 Yale L.J. 1898 (2011).

3.If state law is unclear or unresolved, may the district court conclude “there is simply no law to apply,” and rule against the party with the burden on that question? See Clark, Ascertaining the Laws of the Several States: Positivism and Judicial Federalism After Erie, 145 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1459, 1462 (1997). In this situation, would it be appropriate for a diversity court to decline to exercise jurisdiction? In MEREDITH v. CITY OF WINTER HAVEN, 320 U.S. 228, 234–35, 64 S.Ct. 7, 11, 88 L.Ed. 9, 13 (1943), Chief Justice Stone stated that unless “exceptional circumstances” are present, abstention “merely because the answers to the questions of state law are difficult or uncertain or have not yet been given by the highest court of the state, would thwart the purpose of the jurisdictional act.”

Later, in LOUISIANA POWER & LIGHT CO. v. CITY OF THIBODAUX, 360 U.S. 25, 29, 79 S.Ct. 1070, 1073, 3 L.Ed.2d 1058, 1062 (1959), the Supreme Court found such an exceptional circumstance in the “special nature of eminent domain,” allowing the district court to stay its proceeding to give the state tribunal an opportunity “to speak definitely” about a disputed state statute. Is it relevant that a decision to abstain results in the dismissal of the action, while a decision to stay the proceedings postpones the court’s exercise of diversity jurisdiction?

4. As an alternative to abstention, a district court may invoke a procedure called certification that allows it to petition a state court to answer an unresolved question of state law. In 1945, Florida became the first state to adopt such a procedure, and its use by the federal courts was endorsed by the Supreme Court in CLAY v. SUN INSURANCE OFFICE LTD., 363 U.S. 207, 80 S.Ct. 1222, 4 L.Ed.2d 1170 (1960). The procedure now is available in 49 states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. See Stahle v. CTS Corp., 817 F.3d 96, 113 (4th Cir. 2016) (“North Carolina remains the only state in the nation never to have enacted some form of certification procedure.”) (Thacker, J., concurring). Certification procedures vary; some high state courts accept questions only from the Supreme Court, while others also answer questions from the federal courts of appeal, federal district courts, and other state courts. See Winship, Cooperative Interbranch Federalism: Certification of State-Law Questions by Federal Agencies, 63 Vand.L.Rev. 181 (2010).

The Supreme Court appeared to express a preference for certification in ARIZONANS FOR OFFICIAL ENGLISH v. ARIZONA, 520 U.S. 43, 76, 117 S.Ct. 1055, 1073, 137 L.Ed.2d 170, 199 (1997), because the procedure was assumed to reduce costs and to ensure an “authoritative response” from the state. See Thomas-Jensen, Certification after Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona: A Survey of Federal Appellate Courts’ Practices, 87 Denv.U.L.Rev. 139 (2009). In MCKESSON v. DOE, 592 U.S. ___, 141 S.Ct. 48, 208 L.Ed.2d 158 (2020), the Supreme Court declined to decide whether a state-law tort claim against the organizer of a protest would violate the organizer’s First Amendment rights. Instead, it held in a per curiam opinion that the Fifth Circuit should have certified to the Louisiana Supreme Court two questions about whether such a tort claim was viable under state law: “the Fifth Circuit should not have ventured into so uncertain an area of tort law—one laden with value judgments and fraught with implications for First Amendment rights—without first seeking guidance on potentially controlling Louisiana law from the Louisiana Supreme Court.” Id. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 51, 208 L.Ed.2d at 162.

5.In TUNICK v. SAFIR, 228 F.3d 135 (2d Cir. 2000), a photographer challenged the locality’s refusal to grant him a permit to conduct a photo shoot of 75 to 100 nude models configured “in an abstract formation” on a residential street in New York City. Tunick claimed that his planned event was exempt from a New York statute that bans public nudity except for “any person entertaining or performing in a play, exhibition, show or entertainment.” The Second Circuit petitioned New York’s highest court to resolve the scope of the public nudity ban, emphasizing the need for expedition given the important First Amendment rights at stake. The New York court declined to answer, explaining that “even with an expedited schedule for new briefing, argument and deliberation, this Court’s necessary decisional process would add some months to the life of this case.” 94 N.Y.2d 709, 711, 709 N.Y.S.2d 881, 883, 731 N.E.2d 597, 599 (2000). Would the New York court have been obliged to answer a certified question had it come from the Supreme Court?

6.A noted federal appellate judge has warned that when interpreting state law, “federal courts often get state law wrong because federal judges don’t know state law and are not the ultimate decisionmakers on it. Inevitably, this leads to considerable forum shopping of just the sort that Erie sought to avoid.” Calabresi, Federal and State Courts: Restoring a Workable Balance, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1293, 1300 (2003). He suggested that in this situation, the federal appeals court should write an opinion stating what it thinks “that law ought to be,” and then certify the question to the state’s highest court. The state court would be free to decline the certification, but the federal court could then claim “authority to impose” its view “provisionally, until the highest court of the state decides to resolve the question.” Id. at 1302. Does this approach solve the problem of delay discussed in Note 5, above?

Does the sometimes erroneous interpretation of state law by federal diversity courts provide an argument for abolishing diversity jurisdiction? See Sloviter, A Federal Judge Views Diversity Jurisdiction Through the Lens of Federalism, 78 Va.L.Rev. 1671, 1681–82, 1687 (1992). Or, does the risk of error argue for greater use of certification to enable state courts to interpret their own state’s laws? See Nash, The Uneasy Case for Transjurisdictional Adjudication, 94 Va.L.Rev. 1869 (2008).

7.In FACTORS ETC., INC. v. PRO ARTS, INC., 652 F.2d 278 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 927, 102 S.Ct. 1973, 72 L.Ed.2d 442 (1982), a federal court sitting in New York was required to apply Tennessee law to the question of whether Elvis Presley’s right of publicity survived his death. Tennessee state courts had not addressed that issue, but the Sixth Circuit (the circuit encompassing Tennessee) had decided a similar case. The Second Circuit held that the district court, in such a circumstance, should “defer to the views of the Sixth Circuit” with respect to Tennessee law. The court reasoned that the Sixth Circuit was more familiar with Tennessee law since it frequently was required to interpret Tennessee law.

525

The dissent argued that there was no reason to follow the Sixth Circuit’s views when they were not derived from the laws or decisions of the state. Since the Sixth Circuit was only espousing what it considered the preferable common-law rule, its decision should be accorded no greater deference than that given to any circuit court’s views. The dissent also pointed out that, considering the physical size of the circuit and the relatively small number of diversity cases appealed to the court, the Sixth Circuit was unlikely to have any special familiarity with Tennessee law.

Which position do you think is correct? Or are both incorrect in that the relevant question is not what Tennessee’s law is, but, rather, what a federal court thinks a New York state court thinks Tennessee’s law is? By the time the district court heard the case on remand from the Second Circuit, a Tennessee court had addressed the issue. Accordingly, the district court applied the Tennessee court’s holding to the facts of the case. See 562 F.Supp. 304 (S.D.N.Y. 1983).

8.In SALVE REGINA COLLEGE v. RUSSELL, 499 U.S. 225, 111 S.Ct. 1217, 113 L.Ed.2d 190 (1991), the Court considered the weight a federal appeals court should give to a district court’s determination of state law when sitting in diversity, and held that the court of appeals should conduct de novo review, just as it does when questions of federal law are in dispute. Chief Justice Rehnquist authored a strong dissent in which Justice White and Justice Stevens joined:

Federal courts of appeals perform a different role when they decide questions of state law than they do when they decide questions of federal law. In the former case, these courts are not sources of law but only reflections of the jurisprudence of the courts of a State. While in deciding novel federal questions, courts of appeals are likely to ponder the policy implications as well as the decisional law, only the latter need be considered in deciding questions of state law.

Id. at 242, 111 S.Ct. at 1227, 113 L.Ed.2d at 205. Which approach best promotes the twin aims of Erie?

C. FEDERAL “COMMON LAW”

MELTZER, STATE COURT FORFEITURES OF FEDERAL RIGHTS, 99 Harv.L.Rev. 1128, 1167–71 (1986) (footnotes omitted):

Despite Erie’s declaration that “[t]here is no federal general common law,” courts have fashioned what Judge Friendly has termed “specialized federal common law” to govern a broad range of areas. Unlike the “spurious” federal common law of the era of Swift v. Tyson, this new federal common law is binding under the supremacy clause in the state courts.

The proper scope of federal common lawmaking is a matter of considerable uncertainty. If Erie held that federal court jurisdiction does not in itself provide the power to fashion common law, then some more specialized source must be found for each example of judicial lawmaking. The lawmaking power of federal courts has been viewed as far more limited than that of Congress, for two reasons extrapolated from the constitutional structure. The first is the idea of separation of powers and the supremacy (in matters not governed by the Constitution) of Congress. But perhaps more important is the view that federal law is and should be interstitial, operating against a background of existing bodies of state law. Restricted federal common lawmaking reduces the number of agencies broadly fashioning federal rules of decision, and preserves the primary role for Congress, in which the interests of the states are more strongly represented—and in which inertia is more powerful. Hence, state law is presumptively operative, and if it is to be displaced, ordinarily it must be Congress that does so.

526

But these structural concerns do not indicate whether federal common law should be considered altogether illegitimate or simply restricted in scope. And important countervailing arguments support the existence of some common law power in the federal courts. Numerous cases raise issues implicating important federal interests that are not specifically governed by a statutory or constitutional rule. Congress could have enacted a rule governing the issue, but may not have done so, because it lacked time, foresight, or a political consensus. The Court has, accordingly, recognized that federal common law may be a “necessary expedient.” Nor does Congress’s failure to specify a view on a particular subject indicate that Congress preferred that state rules be followed. Here, as elsewhere, congressional inaction is hardly a clear-cut guide for determining congressional intent, and a failure by a court to make law is itself an important and controversial decision.

Thus, legislative inertia and the political safeguards of federalism are ultimately a double-edged sword. They help explain why the authority to make federal common law is nowhere near so broad as congressional authority to legislate, but also argue that federal common lawmaking may be necessary to fill in the interstices of congressional and constitutional mandates or otherwise to deal with matters of important national concern. Despite extensive discussion in the cases and commentary, no clear standard for judging the appropriateness of federal common law has emerged. * * * I wish * * * to stress some * * * general points that are, I believe, accepted by most cases and commentators.

To begin with, there must be a strong need for the formulation of federal common law in order to justify displacing otherwise operative state rules. Moreover, federal common law, perhaps even more than federal law generally, should be interstitial, building upon the total “corpus juris” of the states. Federal common law fits most easily when it supplements federal constitutional or statutory provisions, providing rules of decision that implement or safeguard the norms embodied in such provisions.

527

Even where federal interests are implicated, it is often possible, and desirable, to rely upon extant state law for the rule of decision. Such reliance eliminates the need for (and possible difficulties in) fashioning a new rule from scratch, and also promotes intrastate uniformity, which may be of great value. Thus, the decision to formulate federal common law is one of judicial policy, in which a court must find that the advantages of borrowing state law are outweighed by either the need for national uniformity or the inconsistency of state law (either of states generally or of the particular state involved) with federal interests.

Regardless of how the balance is struck in particular cases, it is clear that there is a distinctive body of federal common law, and recognized and defensible authority for its creation. * * *

Federal common law has developed in several broad situations. For example, federal common law is used to resolve cases involving important federal interests. These strong federal interests have emerged in several contexts. When interstate disputes have erupted, federal common law has been adopted where it would be unfair to apply the statutes or decisional law from either state. See, e.g., Hinderlider v. La Plata River & Cherry Creek Ditch Co., 304 U.S. 92, 58 S.Ct. 803, 82 L.Ed. 1202 (1938) (dispute over the apportionment of the water of an interstate stream).

Similarly, federal common law has become firmly established in the admiralty and maritime contexts because the desire for a uniform body of substantive law has long been considered of primary importance. See, e.g., Kossick v. United Fruit Co., 365 U.S. 731, 81 S.Ct. 886, 6 L.Ed.2d 56 (1961). And, cases implicating the international relations of the United States have provided another occasion for resort to federal common law, including cases involving commercial disputes between United States citizens and foreign parties. See, e.g., Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 84 S.Ct. 923, 11 L.Ed.2d 804 (1964). The Supreme Court has recently instructed, however, that “before federal judges may claim a new area for common lawmaking, strict conditions must be satisfied”; “one of the most basic” requirements is that, unless there is congressional authorization, federal common law “must be necessary to protect uniquely federal interests.” Rodriguez v. FDIC, 589 U.S. ___, ___, 140 S.Ct. 713, 717, 206 L.Ed.2d 62, 67 (2020).

Another important use of federal common law occurs in cases involving the legal activities of the United States. These cases often invoke issues concerning the federal government’s contract rights, rights to collect loans and proceeds due to it, or the management of United States bonds and securities.

528

CLEARFIELD TRUST CO. v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1943.
318 U.S. 363, 63 S.Ct. 573, 87 L.Ed. 838.

Certiorari to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

JUSTICE DOUGLAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

[A check issued by the United States had been mailed, but was not received by its intended recipient. An unknown person, who presumably had stolen the check, cashed it at a J.C. Penney store by signing the name of the intended recipient. J.C. Penney in turn endorsed the check to Clearfield Trust, which accepted it. Clearfield then endorsed the check with a guaranty of all prior endorsements, collected the amount of the check from the Federal Reserve and paid it to J.C. Penney. Neither Penney nor Clearfield had suspected forgery. Federal officials did not inform any of the interested parties of the forgery until eight months after they had learned that the intended recipient had not received the check.

The United States sued Clearfield on Clearfield’s express guaranty of prior endorsements. The district court held that the rights of the parties were to be determined by the law of Pennsylvania. Since the United States had unreasonably delayed giving notice of the forgery, it was barred from recovery under Pennsylvania law and the district court dismissed the complaint. The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit reversed.]

* * *

We agree with the Circuit Court of Appeals that the rule of Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins * * * does not apply to this action. The rights and duties of the United States on commercial paper which it issues are governed by federal rather than local law. When the United States disburses its funds or pays its debts, it is exercising a constitutional function or power. This check was issued for services performed under the Federal Emergency Relief Act of 1935 * * *. The authority to issue the check had its origin in the Constitution and the statutes of the United States and was in no way dependent on the laws of Pennsylvania or of any other state. * * * The duties imposed upon the United States and the rights acquired by it as a result of the issuance find their roots in the same federal sources.¹⁹ * * * In absence of an applicable Act of Congress it is for the federal courts to fashion the governing rule of law according to their own standards. * * *

In our choice of the applicable federal rule we have occasionally selected state law. * * * But reasons which may make state law at times the appropriate federal rule are singularly inappropriate here. The issuance of commercial paper by the United States is on a vast scale and transactions in that paper from issuance to payment will commonly occur in several states. The application of state law, even without the conflict of laws rules of the forum, would subject the rights and duties of the United States to exceptional uncertainty. It would lead to great diversity in results by making identical transactions subject to the vagaries of the laws of the several states. The desirability of a uniform rule is plain. And while the federal law merchant developed for about a century under the regime of Swift v. Tyson * * * represented general commercial law rather than a choice of a federal rule designed to protect a federal right, it nevertheless stands as a convenient source of reference for fashioning federal rules applicable to these federal questions.

529

United States v. National Exchange Bank, 214 U.S. 302, 29 S.Ct. 665, 53 L.Ed. 1006 * * * falls in that category. The Court held that the United States could recover as drawee from one who presented for payment a pension check on which the name of the payee had been forged, in spite of a protracted delay on the part of the United States in giving notice of the forgery. * * *

The National Exchange Bank case went no further than to hold that prompt notice of the discovery of the forgery was not a condition precedent to suit. It did not reach the question whether lack of prompt notice might be a defense. We think it may. If it is shown that the drawee on learning of the forgery did not give prompt notice of it and that damage resulted, recovery by the drawee is barred. * * * The fact that the drawee is the United States and the laches those of its employees are not material. * * * The United States as drawee of commercial paper stands in no different light than any other drawee. As stated in National Exchange Bank * * *, “The United States does business on business terms.” It is not excepted from the general rules governing the rights and duties of drawees “by the largeness of its dealings and its having to employ agents to do what if done by a principal in person would leave no room for doubt.” * * * But the damage occasioned by the delay must be established and not left to conjecture. Cases * * * place the burden on the drawee of giving prompt notice of the forgery—injury to the defendant being presumed by the mere fact of delay. * * * But we do not think that he who accepts a forged signature of a payee deserves that preferred treatment. It is his neglect or error in accepting the forger’s signature which occasions the loss. * * * He should be allowed to shift that loss to the drawee only on a clear showing that the drawee’s delay in notifying him of the forgery caused him damage. * * * No such damage has been shown by Clearfield Trust Co. who so far as appears can still recover from J.C. Penney Co. * * * The inference is that the more prompt the notice the more likely the detection of the forger. But that falls short of a showing that the delay caused a manifest loss. * * * It is but another way of saying that mere delay is enough.

530

Affirmed.

JUSTICE MURPHY and JUSTICE RUTLEDGE did not participate in the consideration or decision of this case.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1. Why doesn’t Clearfield Trust rely upon the Rules of Decision Act?
- 2.How does the federal common law rule recognized in Clearfield Trust differ from the regime of general common law under Swift v. Tyson? Is the former rule binding on the states but the latter rule is not? Is your answer constitutionally compelled?
- 3.In UNITED STATES v. KIMBELL FOODS, INC., 440 U.S. 715, 99 S.Ct. 1448, 59 L.Ed.2d 711 (1979), the question was whether state or federal law determined the government’s priority to collect on loans offered by the Small Business Administration (“SBA”) and the Farmers Home Administration (“FHA”). The Court embarked upon a two-step analysis. First, the Court interpreted Clearfield Trust broadly as permitting federal courts to develop federal law for “questions involving the rights of the United States arising under nationwide federal programs.” Thus, the Court held that “the priority of liens stemming from federal lending programs must be determined with reference to federal law” and that the “SBA and FHA unquestionably perform federal functions within the meaning of Clearfield.”

Having decided that federal law controlled, the Court turned to the second and more challenging task of determining the content of the federal law:

Controversies directly affecting the operations of federal programs, although governed by federal law, do not inevitably require resort to uniform federal rules. * * * Whether to adopt state law or to fashion a nationwide federal rule is a matter of judicial policy “dependent upon a variety of considerations always relevant to the nature of the specific governmental interests and to the effects upon them of applying state law.” * * *

Undoubtedly, federal programs that “by their nature are and must be uniform in character throughout the Nation” necessitate formulation of controlling federal rules. * * * Conversely, when there is little need for a nationally uniform body of law, state law may be incorporated as the federal rule of decision. Apart from considerations of uniformity, we must also determine whether application of state law would frustrate specific objectives of the federal programs. If so, we must fashion special rules solicitous of those federal interests. Finally, our choice of law inquiry must consider the extent to which application of a federal rule would disrupt commercial relationships predicated on state law. * * *

Id. at 727–29, 99 S.Ct. at 1458–59, 59 L.Ed.2d at 723–24. After weighing these factors with respect to priority rules for the SBA and FHA loans, the Court held that there was no need for an independent federal rule. Thus, the Court chose to adopt the state rule as federal law rather than to develop a separate federal rule.

4. In BANK OF AMERICA NATIONAL TRUST & SAVINGS ASSOCIATION v. PARNELL, 352 U.S. 29, 77 S.Ct. 119, 1 L.Ed.2d 93 (1956), liability turned on whether defendants had taken bearer bonds, guaranteed by the United States, in good faith and without knowledge or notice of their defects in title. The Supreme Court declined to endorse a federal common law rule of liability:

Securities issued by the Government generate immediate interests of the Government. * * * But they also radiate interests in transactions between private parties. The present litigation is purely between private parties and does not touch the rights and duties of the United States. The only possible interest of the United States in a situation like the one here, exclusively involving the transfer of Government paper between private persons, is that the floating of securities of the United States might somehow or other be adversely affected by the local rule of a particular State regarding the liability of a converter. * * *

We do not mean to imply that litigation with respect to Government paper necessarily precludes the presence of a federal interest, to be governed by federal law, in all situations merely because it is a suit between private parties, or that it is beyond the range of federal legislation to deal comprehensively with Government paper. * * *

Id. at 33–34, 77 S.Ct. at 121, 1 L.Ed.2d at 96–97. Does Parnell suggest that the absence of the United States as a party forecloses the possibility of a federal common law rule of decision? In a dissenting opinion, Justice Black and Justice Douglas argued that a “federal law merchant” should apply to all transactions involving the commercial paper of the United States, even in disputes between private parties.

BOYLE V. UNITED TECHNOLOGIES CORP.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1988.
487 U.S. 500, 108 S.Ct. 2510, 101 L.Ed.2d 442.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.
JUSTICE SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.
This case requires us to decide when a contractor providing military equipment to the Federal Government can be held liable under state tort law for injury caused by a design defect.

I

On April 27, 1983, David A. Boyle, a United States Marine helicopter copilot, was killed when the CH-53D helicopter in which he was flying crashed off the coast of Virginia Beach, Virginia, during a training exercise. Although Boyle survived the impact of the crash, he was unable to escape from the helicopter and drowned. Boyle’s father, petitioner here, brought this diversity action in Federal District Court against the Sikorsky Division of United Technologies Corporation (Sikorsky), which built the helicopter for the United States.

At trial, petitioner presented two theories of liability under Virginia tort law that were submitted to the jury. First, petitioner alleged that Sikorsky had defectively repaired a device called the servo in the helicopter’s automatic flight control system, which allegedly malfunctioned and caused the crash. Second, petitioner alleged that Sikorsky had defectively designed the copilot’s emergency escape system: the escape hatch opened out instead of in (and was therefore ineffective in a submerged craft because of water pressure), and access to the escape hatch handle was obstructed by other equipment. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of petitioner and awarded him $725,000. The District Court denied Sikorsky’s motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

The Court of Appeals reversed and remanded with directions that judgment be entered for Sikorsky. 792 F.2d 413 (CA4 1986). It found, as a matter of Virginia law, that Boyle had failed to meet his burden of demonstrating that the repair work performed by Sikorsky, as opposed to work that had been done by the Navy, was responsible for the alleged malfunction of the flight control system. * * * It also found, as a matter of federal law, that Sikorsky could not be held liable for the allegedly defective design of the escape hatch because, on the evidence presented, it satisfied the requirements of the “military contractor defense,” which the court had recognized the same day in Tozer v. LTV Corp., 792 F.2d 403 (CA4 1986). * * *

Petitioner sought review here, challenging the Court of Appeals’ decision on three levels: First, petitioner contends that there is no justification in federal law for shielding Government contractors from liability for design defects in military equipment. Second, he argues in the alternative that even if such a defense should exist, the Court of Appeals’ formulation of the conditions for its application is inappropriate. Finally, petitioner contends that the Court of Appeals erred in not remanding for a jury determination of whether the elements of the defense were met in this case. We granted certiorari * * *.

II

Petitioner’s broadest contention is that, in the absence of legislation specifically immunizing Government contractors from liability for design defects, there is no basis for judicial recognition of such a defense. We disagree. * * * [W]e have held that a few areas, involving “uniquely federal interests,” * * * are so committed by the Constitution and laws of the United States to federal control that state law is pre-empted and replaced, where necessary, by federal law of a content prescribed (absent explicit statutory directive) by the courts—so-called “federal common law.” * * *

The dispute in the present case borders upon two areas that we have found to involve such “uniquely federal interests.” We have held that obligations to and rights of the United States under its contracts are governed exclusively by federal law. * * * The present case does not involve an obligation to the United States under its contract, but rather liability to third persons. That liability may be styled one in tort, but it arises out of performance of the contract—and traditionally has been regarded as sufficiently related to the contract that until 1962 Virginia would generally allow design defect suits only by the purchaser and those in privity with the seller. * * *

Another area that we have found to be of peculiarly federal concern, warranting the displacement of state law, is the civil liability of federal officials for actions taken in the course of their duty. We have held in many contexts that the scope of that liability is controlled by federal law. * * * The present case involves an independent contractor performing its obligation under a procurement contract, rather than an official performing his duty as a federal employee, but there is obviously implicated the same interest in getting the Government’s work done.

We think the reasons for considering these closely related areas to be of “uniquely federal” interest apply as well to the civil liabilities arising out of the performance of federal procurement contracts. * * *

Moreover, it is plain that the Federal Government’s interest in the procurement of equipment is implicated by suits such as the present one—even though the dispute is one between private parties. * * * The imposition of liability on Government contractors will directly affect the terms of Government contracts: either the contractor will decline to manufacture the design specified by the Government, or it will raise its price. Either way, the interests of the United States will be directly affected.

That the procurement of equipment by the United States is an area of uniquely federal interest does not, however, end the inquiry. That merely establishes a necessary, not a sufficient, condition for the displacement of state law. * * * Displacement will occur only where, as we have variously described, a “significant conflict” exists between an identifiable “federal policy or interest and the [operation] of state law,” * * * or the application of state law would “frustrate specific objectives” of federal legislation * * *.

* * * [I]t is easy to conceive of [a] * * * situation * * * in which the duty sought to be imposed on the contractor is not identical to one assumed under the contract, but is also not contrary to any assumed. If, for example, the United States contracts for the purchase and installation of an air conditioning-unit, specifying the cooling capacity but not the precise manner of construction, a state law imposing upon the manufacturer of such units a duty of care to include a certain safety feature would not be a duty identical to anything promised the Government, but neither would it be contrary. The contractor could comply with both its contractual obligations and the state-prescribed duty of care. No one suggests that state law would generally be pre-empted in this context.

* * * Here the state-imposed duty of care that is the asserted basis of the contractor’s liability (specifically, the duty to equip helicopters with the sort of escape-hatch mechanism petitioner claims was necessary) is precisely contrary to the duty imposed by the Government contract (the duty to manufacture and deliver helicopters with the sort of escape-hatch mechanism shown by the specifications). Even in this sort of situation, it would be unreasonable to say that there is always a “significant conflict” between the state law and a federal policy or interest. If, for example, a federal procurement officer orders, by model number, a quantity of stock helicopters that happen to be equipped with escape hatches opening outward, it is impossible to say that the Government has a significant interest in that particular feature. That would be scarcely more reasonable than saying that a private individual who orders such a craft by model number cannot sue for the manufacturer’s negligence because he got precisely what he ordered.

* * *

There is * * * a statutory provision that demonstrates the potential for, and suggests the outlines of, “significant conflict” between federal interests and state law in the context of Government procurement. In the [Federal Tort Claims Act], Congress authorized damages to be recovered against the United States for harm caused by the negligent or wrongful conduct of Government employees, to the extent that a private person would be liable under the law of the place where the conduct occurred. 28 U.S.C. § 1346(b). It excepted from this consent to suit, however,

“[a]ny claim . . . based upon the exercise or performance or the failure to exercise or perform a discretionary function or duty on the part of a federal agency or an employee of the Government, whether or not the discretion involved be abused.” 28 U.S.C. § 2680(a).ⁱ

We think that the selection of the appropriate design for military equipment to be used by our Armed Forces is assuredly a discretionary function within the meaning of this provision. It often involves not merely engineering analysis but judgment as to the balancing of many technical, military, and even social considerations, including specifically the trade-off between greater safety and greater combat effectiveness. And we are further of the view that permitting “second-guessing” of these judgments, * * * through state tort suits against contractors would produce the same effect sought to be avoided by the FTCA exemption. The financial burden of judgments against the contractors would ultimately be passed through, substantially if not totally, to the United States itself, since defense contractors will predictably raise their prices to cover, or to insure against, contingent liability for the Government-ordered designs. To put the point differently: It makes little sense to insulate the Government against financial liability for the judgment that a particular feature of military equipment is necessary when the Government produces the equipment itself, but not when it contracts for the production. In sum, we are of the view that state law which holds Government contractors liable for design defects in military equipment does in some circumstances present a “significant conflict” with federal policy and must be displaced. * * *

535

Accordingly the judgment is vacated and the case is remanded.

So ordered.

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom JUSTICE MARSHALL and JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, dissenting.

* * * We may assume, for purposes of this case, that Lt. Boyle was trapped under water and drowned because respondent United Technologies negligently designed the helicopter’s escape hatch. We may further assume that any competent engineer would have discovered and cured the defects, but that they inexplicably escaped respondent’s notice. Had respondent designed such a death trap for a commercial firm, Lt. Boyle’s family could sue under Virginia tort law and be compensated for his tragic and unnecessary death. But respondent designed the helicopter for the Federal Government, and that, the Court tells us today, makes all the difference: Respondent is immune from liability so long as it obtained approval of “reasonably precise specifications”—perhaps no more than a rubber stamp from a federal procurement officer who might or might not have noticed or cared about the defects, or even had the expertise to discover them.

If respondent’s immunity “bore the legitimacy of having been prescribed by the people’s elected representatives,” we would be duty bound to implement their will, whether or not we approved. * * * Congress, however, has remained silent—and conspicuously so, having resisted a sustained campaign by Government contractors to legislate for them some defense. * * * The Court—unelected and unaccountable to the people—has unabashedly stepped into the breach to legislate a rule denying Lt. Boyle’s family the compensation that state law assures them. This time the injustice is of this Court’s own making.

536

Worse yet, the injustice will extend far beyond the facts of this case, for the Court’s newly discovered Government contractor defense is breathtakingly sweeping. It applies not only to military equipment like the CH-53D helicopter, but (so far as I can tell) to any made-to-order gadget that the Federal Government might purchase after previewing plans—from NASA’s Challenger space shuttle to the Postal Service’s old mail cars. The contractor may invoke the defense in suits brought not only by military personnel like Lt. Boyle, or Government employees, but by anyone injured by a Government contractor’s negligent design, including, for example, the children who might have died had respondent’s helicopter crashed on the beach. It applies even if the Government has not intentionally sacrificed safety for other interests like speed or efficiency, and, indeed, even if the equipment is not of a type that is typically considered dangerous; thus, the contractor who designs a Government building can invoke the defense when the elevator cable snaps or the walls collapse. And the defense is invocable regardless of how blatant or easily remedied the defect, so long as the contractor missed it and the specifications approved by the Government, however unreasonably dangerous, were “reasonably precise.” * * *

In my view, this Court lacks both authority and expertise to fashion such a rule, whether to protect the Treasury of the United States or the coffers of industry. Because I would leave that exercise of legislative power to Congress, where our Constitution places it, I would reverse the Court of Appeals and reinstate petitioner’s jury award.

* * *

IV

At bottom, the Court’s analysis is premised on the proposition that any tort liability indirectly absorbed by the Government so burdens governmental functions as to compel us to act when Congress has not. That proposition is by no means uncontroversial. The tort system is premised on the assumption that the imposition of liability encourages actors to prevent any injury whose expected cost exceeds the cost of prevention. If the system is working as it should, Government contractors will design equipment to avoid certain injuries (like the deaths of soldiers or Government employees), which would be certain to burden the Government. The Court therefore has no basis for its assumption that tort liability will result in a net burden on the Government (let alone a clearly excessive net burden) rather than a net gain.

Perhaps tort liability is an inefficient means of ensuring the quality of design efforts, but “[w]hatever the merits of the policy” the Court wishes to implement, “its conversion into law is a proper subject for congressional action, not for any creative power of ours.” * * * If Congress shared the Court’s assumptions and conclusion it could readily enact “A BILL [t]o place limitations on the civil liability of government contractors to ensure that such liability does not impede the ability of the United States to procure necessary goods and services,” H.R. 4765, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. (1986); see also S. 2441, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. (1986). It has not.

Were I a legislator, I would probably vote against any law absolving multibillion dollar private enterprises from answering for their tragic mistakes, at least if that law were justified by no more than the unsupported speculation that their liability might ultimately burden the United States Treasury. Some of my colleagues here would evidently vote otherwise (as they have here), but that should not matter here. We are judges not legislators, and the vote is not ours to cast.

I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting.

When judges are asked to embark on a lawmaking venture, I believe they should carefully consider whether they, or a legislative body, are better equipped to perform the task at hand. There are instances of so-called interstitial lawmaking that inevitably become part of the judicial process. * * * But when we are asked to create an entirely new doctrine—to answer “questions of policy on which Congress has not spoken,” * * * we have a special duty to identify the proper decisionmaker before trying to make the proper decision.

When the novel question of policy involves a balancing of the conflicting interests in the efficient operation of a massive governmental program and the protection of the rights of the individual—whether in the social welfare context, the civil service context, or the military procurement context—I feel very deeply that we should defer to the expertise of the Congress. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Can the Court’s decision in Boyle be reconciled with its rejection of a federal common law rule in Parnell, p. 531, Note 4, supra?
- 2.What is the justification for the contractor’s immunity? Is it to reduce fiscal costs that might be passed on to the United States? Is it to protect government decisions that affect the military? See Green & Matasar, The Supreme Court and the Products Liability Crisis: Lessons from Boyle’s Government Contractor Defense, 63 S.Calif.L.Rev. 637, 642 (1989–1990). Should a contractor’s immunity be extended to manufacturers who produce goods that the government purchases through the general commercial market? See Bellia, Jr., State Courts and the Making of Federal Common Law, 153 U.Pa.L.Rev. 825 (2005).
- 3.In 1979, Vietnam War veterans, their spouses, and their children filed a federal lawsuit in the Eastern District of New York alleging injury from the veterans’ exposure to Agent Orange, a phenoxy herbicide that the military used in South East Asia. Defendants were private companies alleged to have designed, manufactured, or marketed the chemical. The lawsuit was consolidated for pretrial purposes with 600 similar cases filed nationwide. See Comment, Procedural History of the Agent Orange Product Liability Litigation, 52 Brooklyn L.Rev. 335 (1986). The trial court denied a motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, finding that plaintiffs’ claims arose under federal common law and so federal question jurisdiction was available. The Second Circuit reversed, finding no “identifiable” federal policy, and so no basis for fashioning a federal common law rule of decision. IN RE “AGENT ORANGE” PRODUCT LIABILITY LITIGATION, 506 F.Supp. 737, 741–42 (E.D.N.Y.1979), reversed, 635 F.2d 987, 995 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1128, 102 S.Ct. 980, 71 L.Ed.2d 116 (1981). After many years of litigation, including disputes as to whether Klaxon, p. 517, supra, foreclosed the federal court from applying a national conflicts rule, plaintiffs’ claims were dismissed under the government contractor defense announced in Boyle. See In re Agent Orange Product Liability Litigation, 517 F.3d 76 (2d Cir. 2008).

4.In AMERICAN ELEC. POWER CO., INC. v. CONNECTICUT, 564 U.S. 410, 131 S.Ct. 2527, 180 L.Ed.2d 435 (2011), the Court addressed whether plaintiffs, which included several States, New York City, and three private land trusts, could bring federal common law nuisance claims against four private power companies and the federal Tennessee Valley Authority for their excessive emission of carbon dioxide. Plaintiffs sought an order setting emissions caps for each defendant. The Court acknowledged that environmental protection is within the national power and one in which the federal courts may devise federal rules of decision. However, the Court held that Congress had chosen to assert that power through the Clean Air Act’s establishment of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). The Court rejected the argument that “federal common law is not displaced until EPA actually exercises its regulatory authority, i.e., until it sets standards governing emissions from the defendants’ plants.” Id. at 412, 131 S.Ct. at 2531, 180 L.Ed.2d at 441. In her opinion for the Court, Justice Ginsburg explained:

* * * [T]he relevant question for purposes of displacement is “whether the field has been occupied, not whether it has been occupied in a particular manner.” * * *

The Clean Air Act is no less an exercise of the legislature’s “considered judgment” concerning the regulation of air pollution because it permits emissions until EPA acts. * * * The critical point is that Congress delegated to EPA the decision whether and how to regulate carbon-dioxide emissions from power plants; the delegation is what displaces federal common law. Indeed, were EPA to decline to regulate carbon-dioxide emissions altogether at the conclusion of its ongoing * * * rulemaking, the federal courts would have no warrant to employ the federal common law of nuisance to upset the agency’s expert determination.

539

EPA’s judgment, we hasten to add, would not escape judicial review. Federal courts * * * can review agency action (or a final rule declining to take action) to ensure compliance with the statute Congress enacted. * * *

Indeed, this prescribed order of decisionmaking—the first decider under the Act is the expert administrative agency, the second, federal judges—is yet another reason to resist setting emissions standards by judicial decree under federal tort law. * * *

Id. at 426, 131 S.Ct. at 2538–39, 180 L.Ed.2d at 448–49. Is it appropriate for an agency’s inaction to displace the federal judiciary’s common law power?

5.In RODRIGUEZ v. FDIC, 589 U.S. ___, 140 S.Ct. 713, 206 L.Ed.2d 62 (2020), the Supreme Court rejected the view that federal common law determined which of multiple affiliated corporate entities could claim a particular tax refund. Writing for a unanimous Court, Justice Gorsuch noted that “[j]udicial lawmaking in the form of federal common law plays a necessarily modest role under a Constitution that vests the federal government’s ‘legislative Powers’ in Congress and reserves most other regulatory authority to the States.” Id. at ___, 140 S.Ct. at 717, 206 L.Ed.2d at 66. Federal common law was proper when “necessary to protect uniquely federal interests,” id., but no such interests were present with respect to this issue. Although “[t]he federal government may have an interest in regulating how it receives taxes from corporate groups,” it had no “unique interest” in determining how a particular tax refund would be “distributed among group members.” Id. at ___, 140 S.Ct. at 717–18, 206 L.Ed.2d at 67.

NOTE ON FEDERAL COMMON LAW PROCEDURE AND FEDERAL RULES OF PRECLUSION

Another area in which federal courts develop common law pertains to procedures that are internal to the courts themselves. The existence of this doctrine is somewhat anomalous. As Justice Amy Coney Barrett (then a law professor) observed:

With few exceptions, this body of law falls outside of the traditional definitions of federal common law. Procedural common law does not generally bind state courts; though developed without congressional authorization, it falls outside of the traditionally recognized enclaves of federal common law; and Congress’s ability to abrogate it is often called into question.

Barrett, Procedural Common Law, 94 Va.L.Rev. 813, 815 (2008). Examples of procedural common law include the doctrines of forum non conveniens, abstention, stare decisis, and res judicata. Likewise, the preclusive effect of a federal judgment, even when the judgment is rendered by a court sitting in diversity, is governed by a federal common law rule. See SEMTEK INTERNATIONAL INC. v. LOCKHEED MARTIN CORP., 531 U.S. 497, 121 S.Ct. 1021, 149 L.Ed.2d 32 (2001), p. 1373, infra. In determining the content of the federal rule of preclusion, the federal court may choose to borrow a state rule. See Burbank, Semtek, Forum Shopping, and Federal Common Law, 77 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1027 (2002). Why is the creation of a federal common law rule of preclusion consistent with the Rules of Decision Act? See Degnan, Federalized Res Judicata, 85 Yale L.J. 741 (1976). Does the Rules Enabling Act delegate to the Court power to adopt a federal rule of preclusion?

540

D. FEDERAL LAW IN THE STATE COURTS

DICE V. AKRON, CANTON & YOUNGSTOWN R. CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1952.
342 U.S. 359, 72 S.Ct. 312, 96 L.Ed. 398.

Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Ohio.

Opinion of the Court by JUSTICE BLACK, announced by JUSTICE DOUGLAS.

Petitioner, a railroad fireman, was seriously injured when an engine in which he was riding jumped the track. Alleging that his injuries were due to respondent’s negligence, he brought this action for damages under the Federal Employers’ Liability Act, 35 Stat. 65, 45 U.S.C. § 51 et seq., in an Ohio court of common pleas. Respondent’s defenses were (1) a denial of negligence and (2) a written document signed by petitioner purporting to release respondent in full for $924.63. Petitioner admitted that he had signed several receipts for payments made him in connection with his injuries but denied that he had made a full and complete settlement of all his claims. He alleged that the purported release was void because he had signed it relying on respondent's deliberately false statement that the document was nothing more than a mere receipt for back wages.

After both parties had introduced considerable evidence the jury found in favor of petitioner and awarded him a $25,000 verdict. The trial judge later entered judgment notwithstanding the verdict. In doing so he reappraised the evidence as to fraud, found that petitioner had been "guilty of supine negligence" in failing to read the release, and accordingly held that the facts did not "sustain either in law or equity the allegations of fraud by clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence." This judgment notwithstanding the verdict was reversed by the Court of Appeals of Summit County, Ohio, on the ground that under federal law, which controlled, the jury's verdict must stand because there was ample evidence to support its finding of fraud. The Ohio Supreme Court, one judge dissenting, reversed * * * and sustained the trial court's action, holding that: (1) Ohio, not federal, law governed; (2) under that law petitioner, a man of ordinary intelligence who could read, was bound by the release even though he had been induced to sign it by the deliberately false statement that it was only a receipt for back wages; and (3) under controlling Ohio law factual issues as to fraud in the execution of this release were properly decided by the judge rather than by the jury. * * *

541

First. We agree with the Court of Appeals of Summit County, Ohio, and the dissenting judge in the Ohio Supreme Court and hold that validity of releases under the Federal Employers' Liability Act raises a federal question to be determined by federal rather than state law. Congress in § 1 of the Act granted petitioner a right to recover against his employer for damages negligently inflicted. State laws are not controlling in determining what the incidents of this federal right shall be. * * * Manifestly the federal rights affording relief to injured railroad employees under a federally declared standard could be defeated if states were permitted to have the final say as to what defenses could and could not be properly interposed to suits under the Act. Moreover, only if federal law controls can the federal Act be given that uniform application throughout the country essential to effectuate its purposes. * * * Releases and other devices designed to liquidate or defeat injured employees' claims play an important part in the federal Act's administration. * * * Their validity is but one of the many interrelated questions that must constantly be determined in these cases according to a uniform federal law.

Second. In effect the Supreme Court of Ohio held that * * * the negligence of an innocent worker is sufficient to enable his employer to benefit by its deliberate fraud. Application of so harsh a rule to defeat a railroad employee's claim is wholly incongruous with the general policy of the Act to give railroad employees a right to recover just compensation for injuries negligently inflicted by their employers. And this Ohio rule is out of harmony with modern judicial and legislative practice to relieve injured persons from the effect of releases fraudulently obtained. * * * We hold that the correct federal rule is that * * * a release of rights under the Act is void when the employee is induced to sign it by the deliberately false and material statements of the railroad's authorized representatives made to deceive the employee as to the contents of the release. The trial court's charge to the jury correctly stated this rule of law.

Third. Ohio provides and has here accorded petitioner the usual jury trial of factual issues relating to negligence. But Ohio treats factual questions of fraudulent releases differently. It permits the judge trying a negligence case to resolve all factual questions of fraud "other than fraud in the factum." The factual issue of fraud is thus split into fragments, some to be determined by the judge, others by the jury.

It is contended that since a state may consistently with the Federal Constitution provide for trial of cases under the Act by a nonunanimous verdict, Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Bombolis, 241 U.S. 211, 36 S.Ct. 595, 60 L.Ed. 961, Ohio may lawfully eliminate trial by jury as to one phase of fraud while allowing jury trial as to all other issues raised. The Bombolis case might be more in point had Ohio abolished trial by jury in all negligence cases including those arising under the federal Act. But Ohio has not done this. It has provided jury trials for cases arising under the federal Act but seeks to single out one phase of the question of fraudulent releases for determination by a judge rather than by a jury. * * *

542

We have previously held that "The right to trial by jury is 'a basic and fundamental feature of our system of federal jurisprudence' " and that it is "part and parcel of the remedy afforded railroad workers under the Employers' Liability Act." Bailey v. Central Vermont R. Co., 319 U.S. 350, 354, 63 S.Ct. 1062, 1064, 87 L.Ed. 1444. We also recognized in that case that to deprive railroad workers of the benefit of a jury trial where there is evidence to support negligence "is to take away a goodly portion of the relief which Congress has afforded them." It follows that the right to trial by jury is too substantial a part of the rights accorded by the Act to permit it to be classified as a mere "local rule of procedure" for denial in the manner that Ohio has here used. * * *

Reversed and remanded with directions.

JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, whom JUSTICE REED, JUSTICE JACKSON and JUSTICE BURTON join, concurring for reversal but dissenting from the Court's opinion.

Ohio, as do many other States, maintains the old division between law and equity as to the mode of trying issues, even though the same judge administers both. * * * [I]n all cases in Ohio, the judge is the trier of fact on this issue of fraud, rather than the jury. It is contended that the Federal Employers' Liability Act requires that Ohio courts send the fraud issue to a jury in the cases founded on that Act. To require Ohio to try a particular issue before a different fact-finder in negligence actions brought under the Employers' Liability Act from the fact-finder on the identical issue in every other negligence case disregards the settled distribution of judicial power between Federal and State courts where Congress authorizes concurrent enforcement of federally-created rights.

* * *

In 1916 the Court decided without dissent that States in entertaining actions under the Federal Employers' Liability Act need not provide a jury system other than that established for local negligence actions. States are not compelled to provide the jury required of Federal courts by the Seventh Amendment. Minneapolis & St. L.R. Co. v. Bombolis * * *. In the thirty-six years since * * *, the Bombolis case has often been cited by this Court but never questioned. Until today its significance has been to leave to States the choice of the fact-finding tribunal in all negligence actions, including those arising under the Federal Act. * * *

543

Although a State must entertain negligence suits brought under the * * * Act if it entertains ordinary actions for negligence, it need conduct them only in the way in which it conducts the run of negligence litigation. The Bombolis case directly establishes that the * * * Act does not impose the jury requirements of the Seventh Amendment on the States pro tanto for Employers' Liability litigation. If its reasoning means anything, the Bombolis decision means that, if a State chooses not to have a jury at all, but to leave questions of fact in all negligence actions to a court, certainly the Employers' Liability Act does not require a State to have juries for negligence actions brought under the Federal Act in its courts. Or, if a State chooses to retain the old double system of courts, common law and equity * * *, surely there is nothing in the * * * Act that requires traditional distribution of authority for disposing of legal issues as between common law and chancery courts to go by the board. * * * So long as all negligence suits in a State are treated in the same way, by the same mode of disposing equitable, non-jury, and common law, jury issues, the State does not discriminate against Employers' Liability suits nor does it make any inroad upon substance.

Ohio and her sister States with a similar division of functions between law and equity are not trying to evade their duty under the * * * Act * * *. The States merely exercise a preference in adhering to historic ways of dealing with a claim of fraud; they prefer the traditional way of making unavailable through equity an otherwise valid defense. The State judges and local lawyers who must administer the Federal Employers' Liability Act in State courts are trained in the ways of local practice; it multiplies the difficulties and confuses the administration of justice to require, on purely theoretical grounds, a hybrid of State and Federal practice in the State courts as to a single class of cases. Nothing in the * * * Act or in the judicial enforcement of the Act for over forty years forces such judicial hybridization upon the States. The fact that Congress authorized actions under the * * * Act to be brought in State as well as in Federal courts seems a strange basis for the inference that Congress overrode State procedural arrangements controlling all other negligence suits in a State * * *. Such an inference is admissible, so it seems to me, only on the theory that Congress included as part of the right created by the Employers' Liability Act an assumed likelihood that trying all issues to juries is more favorable to plaintiffs. * * *

Even though the method of trying the equitable issue of fraud which the State applies in all other negligence cases governs Employers' Liability cases, two questions remain for decision: Should the validity of the release be tested by a Federal or a State standard? And if by a Federal one, did the Ohio courts in the present case correctly administer the standard? If the States afford courts for enforcing the Federal Act, they must enforce the substance of the right given by Congress. They cannot depreciate the legislative currency issued by Congress—either expressly or by local methods of enforcement that accomplish the same result. * * * In order to prevent diminution of railroad workers' nationally-uniform right to recover, the standard for the validity of a release of contested liability must be Federal. * * *

544

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In BROWN v. WESTERN RY. OF ALABAMA, 338 U.S. 294, 70 S.Ct. 105, 94 L.Ed. 100 (1949), respondent demurred to petitioner's complaint in an action brought in a Georgia state court under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA). The theory of the demurrer was that the complaint failed to "set forth a cause of action and is otherwise insufficient in law." The Georgia courts sustained the demurrer on the basis of a state practice rule requiring pleading allegations to be construed "most strongly against the pleader." The Supreme Court reversed, stating in part:

It is contended that this construction of the complaint is binding on us. The argument is that while state courts are without power to detract from "substantive rights" granted by Congress in FELA cases, they are free to follow their own rules of "practice" and "procedure." To what extent rules of practice and procedure may themselves dig into "substantive rights" is a troublesome question at best * * *. [It is] our duty to construe the allegations of this complaint ourselves in order to determine whether petitioner has been denied a right of trial granted him by Congress. This federal right cannot be defeated by the forms of local practice. * * *

Strict local rules of pleading cannot be used to impose unnecessary burdens upon rights of recovery authorized by federal laws. * * * Should this Court fail to protect federally created rights from dismissal because of over-exacting local requirements for meticulous pleadings, desirable uniformity in adjudication of federally created rights could not be achieved.

Id. at 296, 298–99, 70 S.Ct. at 106, 108, 94 L.Ed. at 102–04. Of what relevance is the presence or absence under Georgia practice of a right to replead following a demurrer?

2.How does the right to jury trial in Dice relate to the right to jury trial in Byrd, see p. 462, supra? Is it inconsistent to hold in Dice that a state court adjudicating a federal law claim must follow federal practice regarding jury trials, while holding in Byrd that a federal court adjudicating a state law claim may disregard state practice regarding jury trials? Does the Court in Dice explain more generally when state courts are obliged to follow federal procedure? See Clermont, Reverse-Erie, 82 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1 (2006) (arguing that the role of federal procedure in state court is a function of both formal preemption—when state and federal laws “directly collide”—and a more open-ended “judicial choice-of-law methodology” that seeks to “balance the state’s interests in having its legal rule applied in state court” against “the federal interests in having federal law displace the rule of this particular state, while trying to avoid differences in outcome”).

⁵ Charles Warren, New Light on the History of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789, 37 Harv.L.Rev. 49, 51–52, 81–88, 108 (1923).

³²³ Kuhn v. Fairmont Coal Co., 215 U.S. 349, 370–372, 30 S.Ct. 140, 54 L.Ed. 228; Black & White Taxicab, etc., Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab, etc., Co., 276 U.S. 518, 532–536, 48 S.Ct. 404, 408, 409, 72 L.Ed. 681, 57 A.L.R. 426.

¹Mr. Justice Field filed a dissenting opinion * * *.

¹⁴ Diederich v. American News Co., 10 Cir., 128 F.2d 144, decided after Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, held that an almost identical provision of the Oklahoma Constitution, art. 23, § 6, O.S.1951 was not binding on a federal judge in a diversity case.

¹⁵ Stoner v. New York Life Ins. Co., 311 U.S. 464, 61 S.Ct. 336, 85 L.Ed. 284, is not contrary. It was there held that the federal court should follow the state rule defining the evidence sufficient to raise a jury question whether the state-created right was established. But the state rule did not have the effect of nullifying the function of the federal judge to control a jury submission as did the Arizona constitutional provision which was denied effect in Herron. The South Carolina rule here involved affects the jury function as the Arizona provision affected the function of the judge: The rule entirely displaces the jury without regard to the sufficiency of the evidence to support a jury finding of immunity.

^aRule 4, and particularly Rule 4(d)(1), has been amended several times since 1965. Most recently, this provision was renumbered as Rule 4(e)(2)(B).

¹ Section 9 is in part a statute of limitations, providing that an executor need not “answer to an action * * * which is not commenced within one year from the time of his giving bond * * *.” This part of the statute, the purpose of which is to speed the settlement of estates, * * * is not involved in this case, since the action clearly was timely commenced. (Respondent filed bond on March 1, 1962; the complaint was filed February 6, 1963; and the service—the propriety of which is in dispute—was made on February 8, 1963.) * * *

Section 9 also provides for the manner of service. Generally, service of process must be made by “delivery in hand.” * * * The purpose of this part of the statute, which is involved here, is, as the court below noted, to insure that executors will receive actual notice of claims. * * * Actual notice is of course also the goal of Rule 4(d)(1); however, the Federal Rule reflects a determination that this goal can be achieved by a method less cumbersome than that prescribed in § 9. In this case the goal seems to have been achieved; although the affidavit filed by respondent in the District Court asserts that he had neither been served in hand nor accepted service, it does not allege lack of actual notice.

^bThis provision has been amended and renumbered since 1965. Rule 4(e)(1) currently provides that service in federal court may occur by “following state law for serving a summons in an action brought in courts of general jurisdiction in the state where the district court is located or where service is made.” See Chapter 3, supra.

² The Court of Appeals seemed to frame the inquiry in terms of how “important” Section 9 is to the State. In support of its suggestion that Section 9 serves some interest the State regards as vital to its citizens, the court noted that something like Section 9 has been on the books in Massachusetts a long time, that Section 9 has been amended a number of times, and that Section 9 is designed to make sure that executors receive actual notice. * * * The apparent lack of relation among these three observations is not surprising, because it is not clear to what sort of question the Court of Appeals was addressing itself. One cannot meaningfully ask how important something is without first asking “important for what purpose?” Erie and its progeny make clear that when a federal court sitting in a diversity case is faced with a question of whether or not to apply state law, the importance of a state rule is indeed relevant, but only in the context of asking whether application of the rule would make so important a difference to the character or result of the litigation that failure to enforce it would unfairly discriminate against citizens of the forum State, or whether application of the rule would have so important an effect upon the fortunes of one or both of the litigants that failure to enforce it would be likely to cause a plaintiff to choose the federal court.

¹¹¹ * * * We cannot seriously entertain the thought that one suing an estate would be led to choose the federal court because of a belief that adherence to Rule 4(d)(1) is less likely to give the executor actual notice than Section 9, and therefore more likely to produce a default judgment. Rule 4(d)(1) is well designed to give actual notice, as it did in this case. * * *

⁵Now Rule 23.1.

⁸ Mr. Justice Harlan in his concurring opinion in Hanna concluded that Ragan was no longer good law. * * *

² This is not to suggest that the Federal Rules * * * are to be narrowly construed in order to avoid a “direct collision” with state law. The Federal Rules should be given their plain meaning. If a direct collision with state law arises from that plain meaning, then the analysis developed in Hanna v. Plumer applies.

¹⁰ “Rule 3 simply provides that an action is commenced by filing the complaint and has as its primary purpose the measuring of time periods that begin running from the date of commencement; the rule does not state that filing tolls the statute of limitations.” 4 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1057, p. 191 (1969) * * *. The Note of the Advisory Committee on the Rules states:

“When a Federal or State statute of limitations is pleaded as a defense, a question may arise under this rule whether the mere filing of the complaint stops the running of the statute, or whether any further step is required, such as, service of the summons and complaint or their delivery to the marshal for service. The answer to this question may depend on whether it is competent for the Supreme Court, exercising the power to make rules of procedure without affecting substantive rights, to vary the operation of statutes of limitations. The requirement of Rule 4(a) that the clerk shall forthwith issue the summons and deliver it to the marshal for service will reduce the chances of such a question arising.” * * * [Rule 4(a) no longer mentions marshals.]

This Note establishes that the Advisory Committee predicted the problem which arose in Ragan and arises again in the instant case. It does not indicate, however, that Rule 3 was intended to serve as a tolling provision for statute of limitations purposes; it only suggests that the Advisory Committee thought the Rule might have that effect.

¹¹¹ The Court suggested in Ragan that in suits to enforce rights under a federal statute Rule 3 means that filing of the complaint tolls the applicable statute of limitations. * * * We do not here address the role of Rule 3 as a tolling provision for a statute of limitations, whether set by federal law or borrowed from state law, if the cause of action is based on federal law.

^dAlteration in original.

⁴ Our cases at times have referred to the question at this stage of the analysis as an inquiry into whether there is a “direct collision” between state and federal law. * * * Logic indicates, however, and a careful reading of the relevant passages confirms, that this language is not meant to mandate that federal law and state law be perfectly coextensive and equally applicable to the issue at hand; rather, the “direct collision” language, at least where the applicability of a federal statute is at issue, expresses the requirement that the federal statute be sufficiently broad to cover the point in dispute. * * * It would make no sense for the supremacy of federal law to wane precisely because there is no state law directly on point.

⁶ If no federal statute or Rule covers the point in dispute, the district court then proceeds to evaluate whether application of federal judge-made law would disserve the so-called “twin aims of the Erie rule: * * * If application of federal judge-made law would disserve these two policies, the district court should apply state law. * * *

² Concerning matters covered by the Federal Rules * * *, the characterization question is usually unproblematic: It is settled that if the Rule in point is consonant with the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2072, and the Constitution, the Federal Rule applies regardless of contrary state law. * * * Federal courts have interpreted the Federal Rules, however, with sensitivity to important state interests and regulatory policies. * * *

^eAlteration in original.

²²² Justice SCALIA finds in Federal Rule * * * 59 a “federal standard” for new trial motions in “ ‘direct collision’ ” with, and “ ‘leaving no room for the operation of,’ ” a state law like CPLR § 5501(c). * * * The relevant prescription, Rule 59(a), has remained unchanged since the adoption of the Federal Rules * * *. Rule 59(a) is as encompassing as it is uncontroversial. It is indeed “Hornbook” law that a most usual ground for a Rule 59 motion is that “the damages are excessive.” See C. Wright, Law of Federal Courts 676–677 (5th ed. 1994). Whether damages are excessive for the claim-in-suit must be governed by some law. And there is no candidate for that governance other than the law that gives rise to the claim for relief—here, the law of New York. * * *

^fAlteration in original.

^gAlteration in original. Rule 59(a) was amended in 2007 but the change did not affect substance.

¹² I agree with the Court’s entire progression of reasoning in its footnote 22 * * *, leading to the conclusion that state law must determine “whether damages are excessive.” But the question whether damages are excessive is quite separate from the question of when a jury award may be set aside for excessiveness. * * * It is the latter that is governed by Rule 59 * * *.

^hEmphasis in original here and throughout opinion.

⁸ The cases chronicled by the dissent * * * each involved a Federal Rule that we concluded could fairly be read not to “control the issue” addressed by the pertinent state law, thus avoiding a “direct collision” between federal and state law, Walker * * * (internal quotation marks omitted). But here, as in Hanna * * *, a collision is “unavoidable.”

¹¹ The concurrence’s approach, however, is itself unfaithful to the statute’s terms. Section 2072(b) bans abridgement or modification only of “substantive rights,” but the concurrence would prohibit pre-emption of “procedural rules that are intimately bound up in the scope of a substantive right or remedy,” * * *. This would allow States to force a wide array of parochial procedures on federal courts so long as they are “sufficiently intertwined with a state right or remedy.” * * *

¹³ The concurrence is correct * * * that under our disposition any rule that “really regulates procedure,” * * * will pre-empt a conflicting state rule, however “bound up” the latter is with substantive law. The concurrence is wrong, however, that that result proves our interpretation of § 2072(b) implausible * * *. The result is troubling only if one stretches the term “substantive rights” in § 2072(b) to mean not only state-law rights themselves, but also any state-law procedures closely connected to them. Neither the text nor our precedent supports that expansive interpretation. The examples the concurrence offers—statutes of limitations, burdens of proof, and standards for appellate review of damages awards—do not make its broad definition of substantive rights more persuasive. They merely illustrate that in rare cases it may be difficult to determine whether a rule “really regulates” procedure or substance. If one concludes the latter, there is no pre-emption of the state rule; the Federal Rule itself is invalid.

The concurrence’s concern would make more sense if many Federal Rules that effectively alter state-law rights “bound up with procedures” would survive under Sibbach. But as the concurrence concedes, * * * very few would do so. The possible existence of a few outlier instances does not prove Sibbach’s interpretation is absurd. Congress may well have accepted such anomalies as the price of a uniform system of federal procedure.

⁸ * * * In some instances, a state rule that appears procedural really is not. A rule about how damages are reviewed on appeal may really be a damages cap. * * * A rule that a plaintiff can bring a claim for only three years may really be a limit on the existence of the right to seek redress. A rule that a claim must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt may really be a definition of the scope of the claim. These are the sorts of rules that one might describe as “procedural,” but they nonetheless define substantive rights. Thus, if a federal rule displaced such a state rule, the federal rule would have altered the State’s “substantive rights.”

¹⁹ Various Treasury Regulations govern the payment and endorsement of government checks and warrants and the reimbursement of the Treasurer of the United States by Federal Reserve banks and member bank depositories on payment of checks or warrants bearing a forged endorsement. * * * Forgery of the check was an offense against the United States. * * *

ⁱAlteration in original.

CHAPTER 7

THE DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN PROCEDURE

This chapter examines the historical foundations of the modern system of pleading, from the development of the writs and forms of action during the reign of Henry II in twelfth-century England, to the adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1938. Encompassing ornate distinctions such as that between trespass and case, the recognition of indebitatus assumpsit, and the emergence of the action of trover, the materials carry more than simply antiquarian appeal. Rather, they are critical to an understanding of the ways in which substantive law develops in relation to procedure—in the famous words of Sir Henry Maine, how substantive law appears “secreted in the interstices of Procedure.” Maine, Early Law and Custom 389 (1886). Even after eight centuries of common law development, it remains true, as Oliver Wendell Holmes observed, that “whenever we trace a leading doctrine of substantive law far enough back, we are very likely to find some forgotten circumstance of procedure at its source.” Holmes, The Common Law 253 (1881). However, Holmes also warned that “[i]t is revolting to have no better reason for a rule of law than that so it was laid down in the time of Henry IV.” Holmes, Jr., The Path of the Law, in Collected Legal Papers 167, 187 (1920). As you study these materials, consider how the categories of substance and procedure interact and evolve.

A. COMMON LAW PLEADING

STEPHEN, THE PRINCIPLES OF PLEADING IN CIVIL ACTIONS 37, 147–50 (Tyler ed. 1882):^a

In the course of administering justice between litigating parties there are two successive objects: to ascertain the subject for decision, and to decide. It is evident that, towards the attainment of the first of these results, there is, in a general point of view, only one satisfactory mode of proceeding; and that this consists in making each of the parties state his own case, and collecting, from the opposition of their statements, the points of the legal controversy. Thus far, therefore, the course of every system of judicature is the same. It is common to them all to require, on behalf of each contending party, before the decision of the cause, a statement of his case. But from this point the coincidence naturally ceases. * * *

The manner of allegation in our courts may be said to have been first methodically formed and cultivated as a science in the reign of Edward I [1272–1307]. From this time the judges began systematically to prescribe and enforce certain rules of statement * * *. None of them seem to have been originally of legislative enactment, or to have had any authority except usage or judicial regulation; but, from the general perception of their wisdom and utility, they acquired the character of fixed and positive institutions, and grew up into an entire and connected system of pleading. * * *

As the object of all pleading or judicial allegation is to ascertain the subject for decision, so the main object of that system of pleading established in the common law of England is to ascertain it by the production of an issue; and this appears to be peculiar to that system. * * *

The author is of opinion that this peculiarity of coming to issue took its rise in the practice of oral pleading. It seems a natural incident of that practice, to compel the pleaders to short and terse allegations, applying to each other by way of answer, in somewhat of a logical form, and at length reducing the controversy to a precise point. For while the pleading was merely oral, * * * the court and the pleaders would have to rely exclusively on their memory for retaining the tenor of the discussion; and the development of some precise question or issue would then be a very convenient practice, because it would prevent the necessity of reviewing the different statements, and leave no burden on the memory but that of retaining the question itself so developed. And even after the practice of recording was introduced, the same brief and logical forms of allegation would naturally continue to be acceptable, while the pleadings were still viva voce * * *.

A co-operative reason for coming to issue was the variety of the modes of decision which the law assigned to different kinds of question. * * * As questions of law were decided by the court, and matters of fact referred to other kinds of investigation, it was, in the first place, necessary to settle whether the question in the cause or issue was a matter of law or fact. Again, if it happened to be a matter of fact, it required to be developed in a form sufficiently specific to show what was the method of trial appropriate to the case. And, unless the state of the question were thus adjusted between the parties, it is evident that they would not have known whether they were to put themselves on the judgment of the court or to go to trial; nor, in the latter case, whether they were to prepare themselves for trial by jury or for one of the other various modes of deciding [the] matter of fact.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The change from oral to written pleadings cannot be dated precisely. The shift began in the late fourteenth century and extended into the second half of the sixteenth. Predictably the change increased the rigor and technicality of the pleading rules.

* * * [T]his system of oral pleading had one great advantage over the later system of written pleadings. It made for far greater freedom in the statement of the case. * * * [W]hen all objections to the writ and process had been disposed of * * * the debate between the opposing counsel, carried on subject to the advice or the rulings of the judge, allowed the parties considerable latitude in pleading to the issue. Suggested pleas will, after a little discussion, be seen to be untenable; a proposition to demur will, after a few remarks by the judge, be obviously the wrong move. The counsel feel their way towards an issue which each can accept and allow to be enrolled. * * *

3 Holdsworth, A History of English Law 635 (4th ed. 1935). Milsom, Historical Foundations of the Common Law 28–37, 39–40 (1969), contains a good description of oral pleadings as well as an excellent explanation of the Yearbooks, from which most of our knowledge of early pleading is derived; this book is a particularly valuable reference for most of the matters covered in this chapter.

2. In this discussion we are concerned with pleading in the royal courts. It should be noted that at the time of the Norman Conquest (1066) and for a century or more afterward the ordinary recourse of suitors was not to the royal courts but to local, or communal, courts and to feudal courts in which a lord heard cases involving his tenants. The royal courts existed primarily to try offenses against the king's laws and to hear cases involving his tenants-in-chief, which came before the king in his capacity as a feudal lord. Gradually, however, these royal courts began to absorb business from the communal and feudal courts.

A person with a grievance against another sought justice from the king, and the king issued a writ, ordering the sheriff to bring the other person before the king's judges to answer the complaint. In the course of the twelfth century this pattern became standardized. When it became established that the king's courts would hear a particular kind of case—for example, an action for assault, an action for debt, an action for the possession of land—the complainant in such a case could obtain a writ from the king's chief minister, the chancellor, as a matter of course. See Milsom, Historical Foundations of the Common Law 22–25 (1969).

The writ, strictly speaking, was simply the document that commenced the action, similar in function to the modern summons; but each writ came to embody a form of action, a concept that governed the method of commencing the suit, the substantive requirements of the case, the manner of trial, and the type of sanction that would attend the eventual judgment. For the present it is enough to say that there was a writ for each type of case—or form of action—that the royal courts would hear; thus, for example, there was a writ of trespass, a writ of debt, and a writ of nuisance. If plaintiff selected a writ that did not fit the case, the action would fail. If there was no writ that fit the case, and the chancellor would not draw up a new one, plaintiff could obtain no relief in the royal courts.

3.The “modes of decision” for issues of fact, referred to in the extract from Stephen, were, at an early date, “trial” by ordeal, by combat, and by oath. These were not trials in the sense in which we now understand and use that term; rather they were proofs undertaken by one of the parties (or both in the case of combat) at the direction of the court. Ordeal—proof by carrying a red-hot iron unscathed or by sinking when thrown into a pool of water ^b—disappeared in England after it was proscribed by the Lateran Council in 1215. Combat—waged by champions of the parties—was resisted as a Norman importation, and during the reign of Henry II (1154–1189) an early form of jury began to supplant it, although it was not formally abolished until 1819.

For our purpose the most important of these early methods of proof was that by oath, or as more generally known, wager of law or compurgation. It required one of the parties to swear to his case with strict and elaborate formalities, accompanied by a number of “oath-helpers,” usually twelve, who swore to the truthfulness of the party’s oath, or in later periods to their belief in its truth. If all went as prescribed, he prevailed; but if the party or any of the “helpers” made an error by using a wrong word, that party lost.

It is hard for us to say how this ancient procedure worked in practice, hard to tell how easy it was to get oath-helpers who would swear falsely, hard to tell how much risk there was in an ordeal. The rational element of law must, it would seem, have asserted itself in the judgment which decided how and by whom the proof should be given; the jurisprudence of the old courts must have been largely composed of the answers to this question; * * * for example, we can see that even before the Norman Conquest the man who has been often accused has to go to the ordeal instead of being allowed to purge himself with oath-helpers.

Maitland, Equity, Also the Forms of Action at Common Law 310 (1909).

The importance of this procedure in legal history lies in the fact that a right to wage one’s law was firmly established in certain classes of cases by the last half of the twelfth century, long before the jury began to emerge as an instrument for fact-determination. In its original form the jury, developed as a body for valuing property for taxes, decided cases on its own knowledge rather than after hearing witnesses. Even in this form suitors saw in the jury a more rational mode of trial, and sought to use forms of action such as trespass, which having developed at a relatively late period did not provide a right to wager of law.^c Thus, as we shall see in Section B of this chapter, judicial development of the law for four-and-a-half centuries was channeled and motivated to a substantial degree by increasingly successful attempts to avoid the older modes of trial.^d

551

1.A BRIEF OVERVIEW OF COMMON LAW PLEADING

The basic structure of common law pleading was simple and well-calculated to bring the parties to an issue of law or of fact. It was based on the following analysis. A substantive response to a claim—other than an expression of total agreement—will fall into one of three categories: (1) A party can deny that the alleged facts, even if true, give the claimant any legal right; (2) a party can deny that the alleged facts are true; or (3) a party can say that even if the alleged facts are true and taken alone would establish a right, additional facts not mentioned by the claimant negate that right. Responses (1) and (2) raise issues of law and of fact respectively. Response (3) does not itself raise a contested issue; there is as yet no necessary disagreement between the parties. To raise the necessary issue the claimant must respond to the response, and this response also may fall into any of the three categories. If this response is again of type (3) no issue will have been raised and the process must continue.

Of course the real process was more complex than this. Plaintiff’s claim was set forth in the declaration. This document had to meet many formal requirements that might differ from one type of case to another. But stripped of much verbiage, and stated in modern English, it might have said: “Defendant promised to deliver a horse to plaintiff and plaintiff promised to pay 100 dollars for it, but defendant has refused to deliver the horse.”

At this point, defendant had to demur or plead. A demurrer would challenge the legal sufficiency of the declaration. Thus prior to STRANGBOROUGH & WARNERS CASE, 4 Leon. 3, 74 Eng.Rep. 686 (K.B. 1589), the modern language declaration set out above would have failed on demurrer, because a promise was not regarded as good consideration. A demurrer also would succeed if plaintiff had chosen the wrong writ (or form of action). There were also a great many technical sins that the declaration might commit, but by statute, 27 Eliz. 1, c. 5, § 1 (1585) and 4 Anne, c. 16, § 1 (1705), unless these defects were raised by a special demurrer, which precisely spelled out the faults, they were waived. If a demurrer was sustained, plaintiff was out of court, although he generally was free to begin again if he could correct the mistake, as by suing in another form of action if the original form was incorrect. If the demurrer was quashed, judgment was entered for plaintiff.

552

If defendant did not demur, he responded to the declaration in a plea. Pleas were of two types, dilatory and peremptory. Dilatory pleas did not deny the merits of plaintiff’s claim, but challenged plaintiff’s right to have the court hear the case; they included pleas to the jurisdiction of the court, pleas of a variance between the declaration and the writ, and pleas that the case must be suspended (when, for example, one of the parties was under age at the time of suit). A peremptory plea, or plea in bar, was on the merits. If defendant denied that he had promised to sell the horse, the plea was a traverse; a traverse terminated the pleadings and the case would go to trial to dispose of the issue raised by plaintiff’s allegation and defendant’s denial. But suppose defendant wanted to allege that at the time of the purported contract he was a minor; defendant would then plead by confession and avoidance, that is, admit the allegations of the declaration and seek to avoid them by pleading minority. If defendant followed this course, no issue would have been reached, and plaintiff would have to respond.

Plaintiff’s response might be a demurrer to defendant’s plea, which would raise the question whether minority was a defense to the agreement he had pleaded and defendant had confessed.⁶ Or plaintiff might plead in a replication, either traversing defendant’s allegation of his age, or confessing it, and alleging that defendant had lied about his age when making the contract. If plaintiff pleaded in confession and avoidance, defendant would again have to respond, by demurrer or by rejoinder. The pleas in confession and avoidance theoretically might go on indefinitely, and in some of the cases we read of a surrejoinder, a rebutter, and a surrebutter. Lack of formal names beyond that point suggests that even the ingenuity of the common law pleader may have had its limits.

The common law pleading system may seem ornate to you, even after only the brief description on the preceding pages. Yet bear in mind that this is only a skeletal outline. When the outline is filled in with special instances, inexplicable exceptions, arbitrary rules, and untraversable fictions, the result is one of the most complex and snare-ridden creations ever devised by man. Let us look at a common law record and decision. (The reporter of the case, it should be noted, is the victorious lawyer, Saunders.)

553

VEALE v. WARNER

Court of King’s Bench, 1670.

1 Wms. Saund. 323, 326, 85 Eng.Rep. 463, 468.

Be it remembered that * * * before our lord the King at Westminster came Thomas Veale Esquire * * * and brought here * * * his certain bill against William Warner, * * * in the custody of the marshal, & c. Of a plea of debt: and there are pledges of prosecution, to wit, John Doe and Richard Roe; which said bill follows in these words, * * * [Veale] complains of [Warner] * * * that he render to him 2000*l.*, of lawful money of England, which he owes to, and unjustly detains from him; for that whereas the said William, * * * at London aforesaid, to wit, in the parish of St. Mary-le Bow in the ward of Cheap, by his certain writing obligatory, sealed * * * and to the Court of our said lord the King now here shewn, * * * acknowledged himself to be held and firmly bound to * * * [Veale] in the said 2000*l.* to be paid to the said Thomas when he should be thereunto requested. Nevertheless, the said William (although often requested) hath not yet paid the said 2000*l.* to the said Thomas, but to pay the same to him hath hitherto altogether refused, and yet refuses, to the damage of him the said Thomas of 100*l.*: and therefore he brings suit, & c.

And [Warner] * * * comes and defends the wrong and injury when, & c. and prays oyer of the said writing obligatory, and it is read to him, & c. He also prays oyer of the condition of the said writing, & c. and it is read to him in these words, to wit: “The condition of this obligation is such, that if * * * [Warner] shall and do in all things well and truly stand to, obey, abide, perform, fulfil, and keep the award * * * of John Coggs, gent. and John Foxwell, arbitrators * * * to arbitrate * * * and determine of and concerning all and all manner of action and actions, cause and causes of actions, suits, bills, bonds, specialties, judgments, executions, extents, quarrels, controversies, trespasses, damages, and demands whatsoever, at any time heretofore had, made, moved, brought, commenced, sued, prosecuted, done, suffered, committed, or depending by or between the said parties, * * * then this obligation to be void and of none effect, or else to remain in full force and virtue.” Which being read and heard, the said William saith, that * * * [Veale] ought not to have his aforesaid action against him, because he saith that * * * the arbitrators in the said condition named, * * * made their award * * * that [Warner] * * * should satisfy, content, and pay to [Veale] * * * the full sum of 3169*l.* 16*s.* and 3*d.* Of lawful money of England. And they further awarded that [Warner] * * * should seal, and as his deed deliver to [Veale] * * * a full and general release and discharge of all and all manner of actions, and causes of actions, suits, bills, bonds, specialties, judgments, executions, extents, quarrels, controversies, trespasses, damages, and demands whatsoever, at any time before the date of the bond brought here into Court had, made, moved, commenced, sued, prosecuted, committed, or depending by or between the said parties. And * * * [Warner] further saith, that he the said William * * * paid to * * * [Veale] the said sum * * * and also, then and there did seal, and as his deed deliver to * * * [Veale] the said full release * * * and this he is ready to verify: wherefore he prays judgment if the said Thomas ought to have or maintain his said action thereof against him & c.

554

And * * * [Veale] saith, that he by any thing by * * * [Warner] above in pleading alleged, ought not to be barred from having his said action thereof against the said William, because he saith that * * * [Warner] did not pay the said sum * * * as the said William hath above thereof in pleading alleged; and this he prays may be inquired of by the country, & c.

And * * * [Warner] saith that * * * [Veale] ought not to be admitted to say that he the said William hath not paid the said sum * * * because he saith that he the said Thomas, * * * by his certain writing acknowledged that he the said William had paid the said sum to the said Thomas * * * and this he is ready to verify: wherefore he prays judgment if the said Thomas ought to be admitted, against his own acknowledgment, to say, that he the said William hath not paid the said sum of money, & c.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

And now in this term the plaintiff moved to have judgment. And Saunders for the defendant objected that the plaintiff could not have judgment, because it appeared by the record that the award was void, being all to be performed by the defendant and nothing by the plaintiff: and, therefore, if the award is void, it is not material whether the defendant has performed it or not, although he has pleaded a performance of it. And now he has acknowledged the contrary by his waiver of the issue offered by the plaintiff and pleading a bad rejoinder. And the plaintiff and defendant have both agreed, that the award pleaded by the defendant was the true award made by the arbitrators, which is altogether vicious. But if the plaintiff would have helped himself, he ought to have shewn the other part of the award before he assigned the breach, which he has not done here; and therefore he cannot have judgment.

And of such opinion was the whole Court clearly. But they would not give judgment for the defendant, because they conceived it was a trick in pleading; but they gave the plaintiff leave to discontinue on payment of costs. And Kelynge Chief Justice, reprehended Saunders for pleading so subtly on purpose to trick the plaintiff by the omission of the other part of the award. But it was a case of the greatest hardship on the defendant; for the bond of submission was only in the penalty of 2000*l.*, and the arbitrators had awarded him to pay 3100*l.*, being 1100*l.* more than the real penalty of the bond; when in truth there was nothing at all due to the plaintiff, but he was indebted to the defendant. And afterwards the defendant exhibited an English bill in the Exchequer, disclosing bad practice of the plaintiff with the arbitrators, and had relief against the bond: and so this matter was at rest. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. “[B]efore our lord the King at Westminster.” Veale v. Warner was brought in the Court of King’s Bench, one of the three royal common law courts, maintaining separate existence until merged in the High Court of Justice in 1873. The others were the Court of Common Pleas and the Court of Exchequer. All three developed out of the Curia Regis (the King’s Court), which at the time of the Norman Conquest and for a period thereafter performed administrative and judicial functions in conjunction with the king. The first offshoot was Exchequer, which originally was charged with the collection and administration of the king’s finances, but by 1250 had acquired full judicial jurisdiction. Next to develop separate status was Common Pleas, established by Henry II as the primary tribunal to hear cases not involving the crown. The remaining part of the King’s Court supervised Common Pleas through the writ of error, and heard matters particularly touching the king’s interests, such as criminal actions and cases involving his tenants in chief; it developed into King’s Bench, but the fiction was maintained that hearings before that tribunal were before the king himself. See Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 143–51 (5th ed. 1956).

2. “[H]is * * * bill against William Warner, * * * in the custody of the marshal, & c.” Common Pleas was supposed to have exclusive jurisdiction over actions of debt, such as Veale v. Warner. But the judges and lawyers of each common law court zealously sought to expand the jurisdiction of their tribunal, and Veale v. Warner illustrates one method by which King’s Bench accomplished this. Not all common law proceedings were commenced by writ; to an undefined extent each court could proceed on a bill, which was a complaint addressed directly to the court. See 2 Holdsworth, A History of English Law 339 (3d ed. 1923). One instance in which a court clearly could proceed on a bill was an action against one of the court’s officers or a person within its custody, and such a bill might be brought on a cause of action that ordinarily was not within the jurisdiction of the court. Thus, a plaintiff who desired to bring an action of debt in King’s Bench would first charge defendant with trespass, and by a “bill of Middlesex” that court would order the sheriff of Middlesex to arrest defendant and deliver him to the custody of the marshal of the Marshalsea—the court’s prison; once defendant was within the custody of King’s Bench, plaintiff could proceed against him by bill in the action of debt. Predictably, the arrest and commitment eventually became wholly fictitious, but defendant was not permitted to challenge the allegation that they had occurred. A similar device used to expand the jurisdiction of Exchequer was the writ of quo minus, by which a debtor to the crown could bring suit in that court on the theory that anyone withholding money from the debtor was rendering him unable to pay what was owed the king; in time, the allegation of plaintiff’s debt to the king also became untraversable. See Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 161, 387 (5th ed. 1956); Milsom, Historical Foundations of the Common Law 53–59 (1969).

3. “[P]ledges of prosecution.” The original writ in a lawsuit directed the sheriff, to whom it was addressed, to take some action, conditioned on plaintiff’s “mak[ing] you secure of prosecuting his claim.” Thus plaintiff had to furnish sureties, who would be liable to pay a fine that was imposed upon unsuccessful claimants. As the names of the pledges in the case suggest, the requirement became a sham.

4. “[I]n the parish of St. Mary-le Bow in the ward of Cheap.” As the jury originally decided cases on its own knowledge, it was necessary that jurors be drawn from the vicinity in which a transaction had occurred; the action therefore had to be brought near the place at which it arose, and the declaration had to show this. Since an English court could not summon jurors from abroad, technically it would have been impossible to bring an action on a contract made outside England. In such cases, however, plaintiff made an untraversable allegation that the contract had been made in the aforesaid parish and ward of the city of London. See Sack, Conflict of Laws in the History of English Law, in 3 Law: A Century of Progress 342, 370 (1937). Some cases actually must have arisen there, but you cannot tell from the records which they are.

5. “[T]o the Court * * * now here shewn”; “prays oyer.” A plaintiff suing upon a deed or a bond made profert of the document—that is, plaintiff formally tendered it to the court, although it was strictly speaking not a part of the pleading. If defendant wanted to get the document in the pleadings in order to raise a question of law about it, she had to demand oyer of it, which meant that defendant was entitled to read it and copy as much of it as he chose into the plea. At this point you might conclude that if defendant demurred, he would be demurring to his own pleading, but even though the document was set out in the plea, it was treated as if it were a part of the declaration. See Sutton, Personal Actions at Common Law 103 (1929), which is a particularly valuable introduction to common law pleading.

6.“[W]herefore he prays judgment if the said Thomas ought to have or maintain his said action.” This is the standard conclusion of a pleading in confession and avoidance. Compare the conclusion of plaintiff’s replication in the next paragraph of the report of the case. Why was defendant’s allegation that he had performed the bond treated as a matter of confession and avoidance?

7.“[W]herefore he prays judgment if the said Thomas ought to be admitted, against his own acknowledgment, to say.” Plaintiff in his replication had traversed defendant’s claim of payment. Thus the replication already had created an issue, and defendant’s rejoinder could not be one of the three responses described in the Overview of Common Law Pleading; it is a plea of estoppel, and as stated in Saunders’ argument waives the issue created by the traverse in plaintiff’s replication. Why was this rejoinder “bad”? Did it allege that the award had been paid?

557

8.Why did Saunders, a thoroughly capable lawyer, file what he knew was an inadequate rejoinder? The answer lies in a peculiar facet of the demurrer:

* * * [O]n demurrer the court will consider the whole record, and give judgment for the party, who on the whole, appears to be entitled to it. Thus, on demurrer to the replication, if the court think the replication bad, but perceive a substantial fault in the plea, they will give judgment, not for the defendant, but the plaintiff, provided the declaration be good; but if the declaration also be bad in substance, then, upon the same principle, judgment would be given for the defendant.

Stephen, The Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions 160 (Tyler ed. 1882). Thus, by making a rejoinder that he knew plaintiff would demur to, Saunders baited the trap he had set in his plea.

9.“[A]n English bill in the Exchequer.” That part of the report of Veale v. Warner beginning, “But it was a case of the greatest hardship * * * ” is not a part of the record, but is simply the reporter’s justification of his own tactics. An English bill was a bill in equity, so-called because it was written in English rather than in the Latin of the common law courts. As we will see, many instances of fraud and overreaching did not constitute defenses at law, but when such factors were established equity would enjoin a victorious plaintiff from enforcing the judgment at law. How could such relief be obtained in Exchequer, which was a common law court? The answer is that Exchequer had an equity side.

2.THE QUEST FOR A SINGLE ISSUE: PATHS AND PITFALLS

The principal aim of common law pleading was the production of a single issue; in many ways, the most serious problems in common law pleading grew out of this persistent drive. To achieve the goal of singleness of issue, it was necessary to prohibit duplicity in pleading. That term did not connote fraud, but simply meant raising more than one issue in a pleading. Thus, in our example concerning the sale of the horse, defendant might wish to deny that he had made any promise and to assert that he was a minor at the time and to contend that a promise was not good consideration for another promise. There would be nothing devious or inconsistent in claiming all three defenses, but he was not permitted to do so. The traverse, the plea in confession and avoidance, and the demurrer were mutually exclusive.

A procedure was available that, in effect, permitted a party to delay the “demurrer.” After trial and verdict for plaintiff, defendant could move to arrest the judgment, thereby raising the question whether the pleadings could support the judgment. In the case of a verdict for defendant, plaintiff’s equivalent motion was for judgment notwithstanding the verdict—a term that has now come to identify a motion on a quite different theory. See Chapter 14, infra. By following this procedure, however, a party could not escape the expense of trial (costs not being awarded to the prevailing party on such a motion), and that party assumed the risk that the defect in a pleading might be cured by a later pleading or aided by the verdict; in any event, a fault that required the use of a special demurrer would not support such a delayed motion. Nonetheless, the practice became very popular.

558

No such procedure was available to the party who wanted to deny his adversary’s allegations and at the same time advance affirmative allegations of his own. For the plea in confession and avoidance had to give color. “As a term of pleading, * * * [‘color’] signifies an apparent or prima facie right; and the meaning of the rule, that every pleading in confession and avoidance must give color, is, that it must admit an apparent right in the opposite party, and rely, therefore, on some new matter by which that apparent right is defeated.” Stephen, The Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions 206–07 (Tyler ed. 1882). A plea in confession and avoidance that failed to give color was doomed, even though it revealed a defense that could have been raised by traverse. In GIBBONS v. PEPPER, 1 Ld. Raym. 38, 91 Eng.Rep. 922 (K.B. 1695), an action for running down plaintiff, defendant admitted the trespass but pleaded that his horse had become so frightened he could not control it; on demurrer the court ordered judgment for plaintiff, holding that if defendant’s facts were true there had been no battery at all and the plea should have been a traverse.

Out of this rule that a party could not plead new matter without confessing the opposing party’s prima-facie right grew one of the weirder formulae of common law pleading—the giving of express color. Today, we mercifully are spared the necessity of learning the hoary details that surrounded this device, but a brief look at it will illustrate the complexities of the system that lay beneath the surface of our original simple outline.

Suppose that plaintiff had brought an action of trespass against defendant for entering on plaintiff's land, and that the only genuine issue in the case was the title to the land, defendant contending that although plaintiff had been in possession of the land, defendant was the true owner. If defendant denied the trespass by a traverse, he would be permitted to establish his own title as a defense. However, even if the only issue concerning his title was a question of law, there would have to be a full trial and the case would be decided by a jury under the guidance of the judge. Trial could not be avoided unless defendant somehow could introduce the new matter—his claim of title—into the pleadings and thereby permit it to be made the subject of a demurrer. Yet under the rule that required a plea in confession and avoidance to give color to plaintiff's claim, defendant could not assert new matter without confessing plaintiff's apparent right. The solution of express color was for defendant to confess the existence of a potential, but imperfect, title in plaintiff, and then to assert his own title by way of avoidance. Having done this, plaintiff could not traverse the confession—even though it was the sheerest fiction—for that would leave two issues in the case; he had to respond to the matter pleaded in avoidance, and when the validity of defendant's claim turned on a question of law, the appropriate response would be a demurrer. You should note, however, that although giving express color enabled defendant to introduce his claim of title into the case, defendant was not able at the same time to deny that he had entered the land at all.

559

The insistence on arriving at a single issue also prohibited raising more than one issue of fact in a pleading. The fault could be challenged only by a special demurrer, and over a long period the strictness of the prohibition against multiple issues was relaxed, but it never ceased to pose a problem for the pleader. Originally a declaration could not state more than one cause of action; at an early date, however, plaintiffs were permitted to join causes of action arising under the same writ, and, as long as they were stated in separate counts, different versions of the same cause of action could be pleaded.^f Defendant was permitted to plead separately to each count, and indeed might demur to one, traverse a second, and confess and avoid a third. But defendant could not plead two or more defenses to a single count and the ability to deny more than one of its allegations was severely restricted. By a statute, 4 Anne, c. 16, § 4 (1705), this was changed to allow more than one plea to a count with the court's permission, but as long as common law pleading survived there could be no more than one replication to a plea.

As a consequence of these rules, a defendant who did not demur was safest if he could make a defense under a plea of the general issue, which challenged plaintiff's whole case.^g This plea spared defendant the necessity of spelling out his defense, which meant that he did not have to divulge it to plaintiff or run the risk of misstating it. More importantly, the general issue in effect permitted defendant to traverse a number of plaintiff's allegations and, in addition, to raise defenses that ordinarily would be matters of confession and avoidance. Of course not all defenses could be raised under the general issue, and knowing which defenses had to be specially pleaded in particular forms of action was a matter of subtle learning. Although the whole theoretical structure of common law pleading and its quest for a single issue was threatened by the general issue, inexorable pressures—particularly in the eighteenth century—gradually expanded its scope and availability. In conjunction with the common counts—a particularly cryptic form of declaration in contract—the plea of the general issue permitted some cases to come to trial with the issues not only unnarrowed, but indeed undisclosed. A good example of the problem was stated by Henry Brougham in a seminal speech to Parliament on law reform:

560

* * * The plaintiff declares, that the defendant, being indebted to him for so much money had and received to the use of the said plaintiff * * * undertook and faithfully promised to pay it, but broke his engagement; and the count is thus framed, the self-same terms being invariably used, whatever be the cause of action which can be brought into Court under this head. * * * In the first place, such is the declaration for money paid by one individual to another, for the use and benefit of the plaintiff; this is what alone the words of the count imply, but to express this they are rarely, indeed, made use of. 2dly, The self-same terms are used on suing for money received on a consideration that fails, and used in the same way to describe all the endless variety of cases which can occur of such failure * * *. 3dly, The same words are used * * * to recover money paid under mistake of fact. 4thly, To recover money paid by one person to a stakeholder, in consideration of an illegal contract made with another person. 5thly, Money paid to revenue officers for releasing the goods illegally detained, of the person paying. 6thly, To try the right to any office, instead of bringing an assize. 7thly, To try the liability of the landlord for rates levied on his tenant. What information, then, does such a declaration give?

* * *

In the [form of action of] indebitatus assumpsit, from which I took my first example, * * * under [a plea of the general issue] no less than eight different defences may be set up; as, for instance, a denial of the contract, payment, usury, gaming, infancy, coverture, accord and satisfaction, release.

Brougham, Present State of the Law 70–71, 73 (1828).

Thus the pleadings in the English common law courts immediately preceding the period of reform that began in 1825 presented a strange potpourri of ornate and sinuous paths toward an elusive single issue, side by side with a series of pleading rules that fostered abstract and unilluminating statements of dispute.

B. THE FORMS OF ACTION

1.THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE FORMS—CHIEFLY OF TRESPASS

MAITLAND, EQUITY, ALSO THE FORMS OF ACTION AT COMMON LAW 296, 298–99, 304–05, 314–15, 332, 335, 342–47, 359–61 (1909):

Let it be granted that one man has been wronged by another; the first thing that he or his advisers have to consider is what form of action he shall bring. * * * This choice is not merely a choice between a number of queer technical terms, it is a choice between methods of procedure adapted to cases of different kinds.

* * * '[A] form of action' has implied a particular original process, a particular mesne process, a particular final process, a particular mode of pleading, of trial, of judgment. But further to a very considerable degree the substantive law administered in a given form of action has grown up independently of the law administered in other forms. Each procedural pigeon-hole contains its own rules of substantive law, and it is with great caution that we may argue from what is found in one to what will probably be found in another; each has its own precedents. It is quite possible that a litigant will find that his case will fit some two or three of these pigeon-holes. If that be so he will have a choice, which will often be a choice between the old, cumbrous, costly, on the one hand, the modern, rapid, cheap, on the other. Or again he may make a bad choice, fail in his action, and take such comfort as he can from the hints of the judges that another form of action might have been more successful. * * * Lastly he may find that, plausible as his case may seem, it just will not fit any one of the receptacles provided by the courts and he may take to himself the lesson that where there is no remedy there is no wrong.

* * * So long as the forms of action were still in use, it was difficult to tell the truth about their history. * * * But now, * * * the truth might be discovered and be told, and one part of the truth is assuredly this that throughout the early history of the forms of action there is an element of struggle, of struggle for jurisdiction. In order to understand them we must not presuppose a centralized system of justice * * *; rather we must think that the forms of action, the original writs, are the means whereby justice is becoming centralized, whereby the king's court is drawing away business from other courts.

* * * I shall attempt a sketch in brief outline of the order in which the different forms of action are developed. * * *

I.1066–1154. The first [period] * * * would end with the great reforms of Henry II. Litigation of an ordinary kind still takes place chiefly in the communal and feudal courts; even the king's court may be considered as a feudal court, a court of and for the king's tenants in chief. * * * His court is concerned chiefly with (1) the pleas of the crown, i.e. cases in which royal rights are concerned, (2) litigation between the king's tenants in chief—for such tenants it is the proper feudal court, (3) complaints of default of justice in lower courts. * * *

562

II.1154–1189. The legislative activity of Henry II's reign marks a second period. Under Henry II the exceptional becomes normal. He places royal justice at the disposal of anyone who can bring his case within a certain formula. From the end of his reign we have Glanvill's book, and we see already a considerable apparatus of writs * * *; they have assumed distinct forms, forms which they will preserve until the nineteenth century * * *; each writ is the beginning of a particular form of action. * * *

As regards those claims which in after days give rise to the personal actions, those actions which, as we say, are founded on contract or founded on tort, Glanvill has but little to tell us; they are seldom prosecuted in the king's court. But the action of Debt is known there. * * *

III.1189–1272. This, our third period, extending from the death of Henry II to the accession of Edward I, is a period of rapid growth * * *. New writs are freely invented, though towards the end of Henry III's reign this gives rise to murmurs * * *. There is now a large store of original writs which are writs of course (brevia de cursu), that is to say, they may be obtained from the subordinate officers of the royal chancery * * *.

Meanwhile the actions which came to be known as personal make their appearance. The oldest seems to be 'Debt-Detinue' * * *. Gradually this action divides itself into two, Detinue for a specific chattel, Debt for a sum of money—this differentiation takes place early in the thirteenth century. As in Detinue the judgment given for the plaintiff awards him either the chattel itself, or its value; and, as the defendant thus has the option of giving back the chattel or paying its value, Bracton is led to make the important remark that there is no real action for chattels—an important remark, for it is the foundation of all our talk about real and personal property. To Debt and Detinue we must now add Replevin, the action for goods unlawfully taken in distress. * * * Covenant also has appeared * * *. Gradually the judges came to the opinion that the only acceptable evidence of a covenant is a sealed writing, and one of the foundations of our law of contract is thus laid. * * *

But the most important phenomenon is the appearance of Trespass—that fertile mother of actions. Instances of what we can not but call actions of trespass are found even in John's reign, but I think it clear that the writ of trespass did not become a writ of course until very late in Henry III's reign. Now trespass * * * has its roots in criminal law * * *. The old criminal action (yes, action) was the Appeal of Felony * * *. It was but slowly supplanted by indictment—the procedure of the common accuser set going by Henry II, the appeal on the other hand being an action brought by a person aggrieved by the crime.

* * * The new phenomenon appears about the year 1250, it is an action which might be called an attenuated appeal based on an act of violence. * * * The action of trespass is founded on a breach of the king's peace:—with force and arms the defendant has assaulted and beaten the plaintiff, broken the plaintiff's close, or carried off the plaintiff's goods; he is sued for damages. The plaintiff seeks not violence but compensation, but the unsuccessful defendant will also be punished and pretty severely. In other actions the unsuccessful party has to pay an amercement for making an unjust, or resisting a just claim; the defendant found guilty of trespass is fined and imprisoned. What is more, the action for trespass shows its semi-criminal nature in the process that can be used against a defendant who will not appear—if he will not appear, his body can be seized and imprisoned; if he can not be found, he may be outlawed. We thus can see that the action of trespass is one that will become very popular with plaintiffs because of the stringent process against defendants. I very much doubt whether in Henry III's day the action could as yet be used save where there really had been what we might fairly call violence and breach of the peace; but gradually the convenience of this new action showed itself. In order to constitute a case for 'Trespass vi et armis,' it was to the last necessary that there should be some wrongful application of physical force to the defendant's lands or goods or person—but a wrongful step on his land, a wrongful touch to his person or chattels was held to be force enough and an adequate breach of the king's peace. This action then has the future before it.

* * *

IV. 1272–1307. The reign of 'the English Justinian' may be treated as a period by itself—a period of statutory activity. Statutes made by king and parliament now interfere with many details both of substantive law and of procedure. * * * The whole system stiffens. Men have learnt that a power to invent new remedies is a power to create new rights and duties, and it is no longer to be suffered that the chancellor or the judges should wield this power. How far the process of crystallisation had gone, how rigid the system was becoming, we learn from a section of the Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edw. I c. 24 (1285). Men have been obliged to depart from the Chancery without getting writs, because there are none which will exactly fit their cases, although these cases fall within admitted principles. It is not to be so for the future * * *. 'And whensoever from henceforth it shall fortune in the Chancery, that in one case a writ is found, and in a like case falling under like law, and requiring like remedy, is found none, the clerks of the Chancery shall agree in making the writ; or * * * let the cases be written in which they can not agree, and let them refer them until the next Parliament, and by consent of men learned in the law, a writ shall be made, lest it might happen after that the court should long time fail to minister justice unto complainants.' * * * [W]hen we say that but little use was made of this Statute there is one great exception. It is regarded as the statutory warrant for the variation of the writs of trespass so as to suit special cases, until at length—about the end of the Middle Ages—lawyers perceive that they have a new form 'Trespass upon the special case' or 'Case.' * * * It is worth noting that a writ issued by the Chancery is not necessarily a good writ. The justices may quash it as contrary to law, and in the later Middle Ages the judges are conservative * * *. At any rate the tale of common law (i.e. non-statutory) actions was now regarded as complete. The king's courts had come to be regarded as omniscient courts, they had to do all the important civil justice of the realm and to do it with the limited supply of forms of action which had been gradually accumulated in the days when feudal justice and ecclesiastical justice were serious competitors with royal justice.

V. 1307–1833 * * *

From Edward I's day onwards trespass vi et armis is a common action. We may notice three main varieties—unlawful force has been used against the body, the goods, the land of the plaintiff; so we have trespass in assault and battery, trespass de bonis asportatis, trespass quare clausum fregit. * * *

I have already said that the writ-making power wielded by the king and his Chancellor was gradually curbed by our parliamentary constitution, and in Edward I's day it has become necessary to tell the Chancery that it is not to be too pedantic, but may make variations in the old formulas when a new case falls under an old rule. * * * [T]he most important use made of this liberty consisted in some extensions of the action of trespass. Gradually during Edward III's reign we find a few writs occurring which in form are extremely like writs of trespass—and they are actually called writs of trespass—but the wrong complained of does not always consist of a direct application of unlawful physical force * * *; sometimes the words vi et armis do not appear. Sometimes there is no mention of the king's peace. Still they are spoken of as writs of trespass * * *. The plaintiff is said to bring an action upon his case, or upon the special case, and gradually it becomes apparent that really a new and a very elastic form of action has thus been created. I think that lawyers were becoming conscious of this about the end of the fourteenth century. Certain procedural differences have made their appearance—when there is vi et armis in the writ, then the defendant if he will not appear may be taken by capias ad respondendum or may be outlawed—this can not be if there is no talk of force and arms or the king's peace. Thus Case falls apart from Trespass—during the fifteenth century the line between them becomes always better marked. * * *

Case becomes a sort of general residuary action; much, particularly, of the modern law of negligence developed within it. Sometimes it is difficult to mark off case from trespass.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.Case developed into a remedy not only for wrongs that were similar to those governed by trespass, but for wrongs that were much more similar to those for which the action of debt was appropriate. Yet case never lost its roots in trespass. Why didn't actions of debt on the case develop? See Kiralfy, The Action on the Case 3, 44 (1951).
- 2.Maitland's conclusions that trespass grew out of the appeal of felony and that case drew its authority from the Statute of Westminster II are debatable. Others have found the root of trespass in the assize of novel disseisin, in the proceedings of local courts, and in querela ("innominate" actions without writ frequently found in the records of royal courts throughout the thirteenth century). The diversity of opinion is comprehensively reported in Fifoot, History and Sources of the Common Law—Tort and Contract 44–56, 66–74 (1949), a book of very great value in the study of the forms. See also Milsom, Historical Foundations of the Common Law 244–70 (1969).
- 3.The American colonies recognized the distinctions among the forms of action, but did not enforce them with the rigor that characterized procedure in England. For example, there are instances of the use of both trespass and case for the specific recovery of chattels and real property, and trover and assumpsit frequently were not distinguished from case. Ejectment, when it was still regarded as a modern improvement in England, was unused in New England because of its technicalities. See Morris, Studies in the History of American Law 46–59 (2d ed. 1959). Since law books were scarce in the colonies, and many of the judges were laymen, these developments were to be expected. The most technical applications of the forms of action in this country came during the first half of the nineteenth century after the bar had grown in influence, and texts such as Blackstone had become available. See, e.g., Adams v. Hemmenway, 1 Mass. 145 (1804); Wilson v. Smith, 10 Wend. 324 (N.Y.1833).

2.THE LINES BLUR

a.Trespass or Case?

SCOTT, AN INFANT, BY HIS NEXT FRIEND V. SHEPHERD, AN INFANT, BY GUARDIAN
Court of Common Pleas, 1773.
2 Wm.Bl. 892, 96 Eng.Rep. 525.

Trespass and assault * * *. On not guilty pleaded, the cause came on to be tried before Nares, J., * * * when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff with 100£. damages, subject to the opinion of the Court on this case: * * * [D]efendant threw a lighted squib, made of gunpowder, & c. from the street into the market-house, * * * where a large concourse of people were assembled; which lighted squib, * * * fell upon the standing of one Yates, who sold gingerbread, & c. That one Willis instantly, and to prevent injury to himself and the said wares of the said Yates, took up the said lighted squib from off the said standing, and then threw it across the said market-house, when it fell upon another standing there of one Ryal, * * * who instantly, and to save his own goods from being injured, took up the said lighted squib from off the said standing, and then threw it to another part of the said market-house, and, in so throwing it, struck the plaintiff * * * in the face therewith, and the combustible matter then bursting, put out one of the plaintiff's eyes. Qu. If this action be maintainable?

566

* * *

Nares, J., was of opinion, that trespass would well lie in the present case. That the natural and probable consequence of the act done by the defendant was injury to somebody, and therefore the act was illegal at common law. * * * Being therefore unlawful, the defendant was liable to answer for the consequences, be the injury mediate or immediate. * * * The principle I go upon is what is laid down in Reynolds and Clark, Stra. 634, that if the act in the first instance be unlawful, trespass will lie. Wherever therefore an act is unlawful at first, trespass will lie for the consequences of it. * * * [Defendant] * * * is the person, who, in the present case, gave the mischievous faculty to the squib. That mischievous faculty remained in it till the explosion. No new power of doing mischief was communicated to it by Willis or Ryal. It is like the case of a mad ox turned loose in a crowd. The person who turns him loose is answerable in trespass for whatever mischief he may do. The intermediate acts of Willis and Ryal will not purge the original tort in the defendant. * * *

Blackstone, J., was of opinion, that an action of trespass did not lie for Scott against Shepherd upon this case. He took the settled distinction to be, that where the injury is immediate, an action of trespass will lie; where it is only consequential, it must be an action on the case: Reynolds and Clarke, Lord Raym. 1401. * * * The lawfulness or unlawfulness of the original act is not the criterion; though something of that sort is put into Lord Raymond's mouth in Stra. 635 * * *. But this cannot be the general rule; for it is held by the Court in the same case, that if I throw a log of timber into the highway, (which is an unlawful act), and another man tumbles over it, and is hurt, an action on the case only lies, it being a consequential damage; but if in throwing it I hit another man, he may bring trespass, because it is an immediate wrong. Trespass may sometimes lie for the consequences of a lawful act. If in lopping my own trees a bough accidentally falls on my neighbour's ground, and I go thereon to fetch it, trespass lies. * * * But then the entry is of itself an immediate wrong. And case will sometimes lie for the consequence of an unlawful act. If by false imprisonment I have a special damage, as if I forfeit my recognizance thereby, I shall have an action on the case. * * * Yet here the original act was unlawful, and in the nature of trespass. So that lawful or unlawful is quite out of the case; the solid distinction is between direct or immediate injuries on the one hand, and mediate or consequential on the other. And trespass never lay for the latter. If this be so, the only question will be, whether the injury which the plaintiff suffered was immediate, or consequential only; and I hold it to be the latter. The original act was, as against Yates, a trespass; not as against Ryal, or Scott. The tortious act was complete when the squib lay at rest upon Yates's stall. He, or any bystander, had, I allow, a right to protect themselves by removing the squib, but should have taken care to do it in such a manner as not to endamage others. But Shepherd, I think, is not answerable in an action of trespass and assault for the mischief done by the squib in the new motion impressed upon it, and the new direction given it, by either Willis or Ryal; who both were free agents, and acted upon their own judgment. This differs it from the cases put of turning loose a wild beast or a madman. They are only instruments in the hand of the first agent. Nor is it like diverting the course of an enraged ox, or of a stone thrown, or an arrow glancing against a tree; because there the original motion, the vis impressa, is continued, though diverted. Here the instrument of mischief was at rest, till a new impetus and a new direction are given it, not once only, but by two successive rational agents. But it is said that the act is not complete, nor the squib at rest, till after it is spent or exploded. It certainly has a power of doing fresh mischief, and so has a stone that has been thrown against my windows, and now lies still. Yet if any person gives that stone a new motion, and does farther mischief with it, trespass will not lie for that against the original thrower. No doubt but Yates may maintain trespass against Shepherd. And, according to the doctrine contended for, so may Ryal and Scott. Three actions for one single act! nay, it may be extended in infinitum. If a man tosses a football into the street, and after being kicked about by one hundred people, it at last breaks a tradesman's windows; shall he have trespass against the man who first produced it? Surely only against the man who gave it that mischievous direction. But it is said, if Scott has no action against Shepherd, against whom must he seek his remedy? I give no opinion whether case would lie against Shepherd for the consequential damage; though, as at present advised, I think, upon the circumstances, it would. But I think, in strictness of law, trespass would lie against Ryal, the immediate actor in this unhappy business. * * * The throwing it across the market-house, instead of brushing it down, or throwing [it] out of the open sides into the street, (if it was not meant to continue the sport, as it is called), was at least an unnecessary and incautious act. * * * And I admit that the defendant is answerable in trespass for all the direct and inevitable effects caused by his own immediate act. * * * But he is not responsible for the acts of other men. * * * In our case the verdict is suspended till the determination of the Court. And though after verdict the Court will not look with eagle's eyes to spy out a variance, yet, when a question is put by the jury upon such a variance, and it is made the very point of the cause, the Court will not wink against the light, and say that evidence, which at most is only applicable to an action on the case, will maintain an action of trespass. * * * The same evidence that will maintain trespass, may also frequently maintain case, but not e converso. Every action of trespass with a "per quod" includes an action on the case. I may bring trespass for the immediate injury, and subjoin a "per quod" for the consequential damages;—or may bring case for the consequential damages, and pass over the immediate injury * * *. But if I bring trespass for an immediate injury, and prove at most only a consequential damage, judgment must be for the defendant * * *.

567

568

Gould, J., was of the same opinion with Nares, J., that this action was well maintainable.—The whole difficulty lies in the form of the action, and not in the substance of the remedy. The line is very nice between case and trespass upon these occasions: I am persuaded there are many instances wherein both or either will lie. I agree with brother Nares, that wherever a man does an unlawful act, he is answerable for all the consequences; and trespass will lie against him, if the consequence be in nature of trespass. But, exclusive of this, I think the defendant may be considered in the same view as if he himself had personally thrown the squib in the plaintiff's face. The terror impressed upon Willis and Ryal excited self-defence, and deprived them of the power of recollection. * * *

De Grey, C.J. * * * I agree with my brother Blackstone as to the principles he has laid down, but not in his application of those principles to the present case. The real question certainly does not turn upon the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the original act; for actions of trespass will lie for legal acts when they become trespasses by accident * * *. They may also not lie for the consequences even of illegal acts, as that of casting a log in the highway, & c.—But the true question is, whether the injury is the direct and immediate act of the defendant; and I am of opinion, that in this case it is. The throwing the squib was an act unlawful and tending to affright the bystanders. So far, mischief was originally intended; not any particular mischief, but mischief indiscriminate and wanton. Whatever mischief therefore follows, he is the author of it * * *. Every one who does an unlawful act is considered as the doer of all that follows. * * * I look upon all that was done subsequent to the original throwing as a continuation of the first force and first act, which will continue till the squib was spent by bursting. And I think that any innocent person removing the danger from himself to another is justifiable; the blame lights upon the first thrower. * * * It has been urged, that the intervention of a free agent will make a difference: but I do not consider Willis and Ryal as free agents in the present case, but acting under a compulsive necessity for their own safety and self-preservation. * * *

569

Postea to the plaintiff.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In what ways does Justice Blackstone differ from Chief Justice De Grey? From Justice Nares? On what facts might Chief Justice De Grey and Justice Nares reach a different result? Chief Justice De Grey and Justice Gould? Since Justice Blackstone believes an action in case would lie against Shepherd, is there really any substantive difference between him and his brethren? Would they have agreed with him that Scott could have maintained an action against Ryal? What would have been the nature of that action? In light of Gibbons v. Pepper, p. 558, supra, would actions of trespass lie against both Shepherd and Ryal?

2. Trials ordinarily were held at common law before a single judge and a jury. After verdict, if the losing party wanted the judgment of the entire court on a question of law that was involved in the case, that party asked for a rule nisi. A hearing before the court en banc was then held, and if that court sustained the rulings of the trial judge it denied the rule; otherwise, it made the rule absolute. When a verdict was taken subject to the opinion of the court en banc, as in Scott v. Shepherd, the ordinary procedure of applying for a rule nisi was unnecessary. Therefore, instead of denying a rule or making it absolute, the order of the court en banc was in the form of a postea to the prevailing party, which authorized the entry of judgment.

b. Case Captures Negligence

The close of the eighteenth century brought before the judges a great number of cases of a kind theretofore little known but which ever since have glutted our courts: running-down accidents and vehicular collisions. Echoes of Lord Raymond’s distinction in Reynolds v. Clarke were less frequently heard, but the categories of direct and indirect injuries became mixed with those of willful and negligent conduct, often in a context complicated by the involvement of servants. Matters would not stay within the simple confines that Justice Blackstone envisioned.

DAY v. EDWARDS, 5 T.R. 648, 101 Eng.Rep. 361 (K.B.1794), was an action in case against a defendant who had driven his cart “so furiously, negligently and improperly” that it “struck with great force and violence * * * against plaintiff’s carriage.” Plaintiff’s lawyer touched on all the elements that had been or would become significant—legality, indirectness, negligence; the “act of driving * * * in consequence of which the injury arose, was a legal one in itself, although negligently exercised,” he said. But Lord Kenyon merely repeated the immediate injury-consequential injury distinction, found that plaintiff “complains of the immediate act,” and gave judgment for defendant.

570

One year later in MORLEY v. GAISFORD, 2 H. Bl. 441, 126 Eng.Rep. 639 (C.P.1795), Common Pleas held case was proper when defendant’s servant was alleged to have “badly, ignorantly, and negligently” driven a cart against plaintiff’s chaise, saying “it was difficult to put a case where the master could be considered as a trespasser for an act of his servant, which was not done at his command.”

The Morley holding clearly turned on the issue of a master’s liability in trespass, but when plaintiffs brought an action of case against defendants for having “so incautiously, carelessly, negligently, and inexpertly managed, steered and directed” their ship that it collided with plaintiffs’ vessel, their counsel relied upon Morley solely for the proposition that trespass lay for willful conduct and case for negligence, and two of the three judges accepted it. OGLE v. BARNES, 8 T.R. 188, 101 Eng.Rep. 1338 (K.B.1799). Lord Kenyon continued to insist upon the distinction between an immediate and a consequential injury, but he agreed that case was proper, since the charge was that by reason of defendants’ negligence, their ship sailed against plaintiffs’ vessel.

By 1803, we find defendant in LEAME v. BRAY, 3 East 593, 102 Eng.Rep. 724 (K.B.), challenging an action of trespass for a highway collision on the ground that the evidence showed his conduct to be negligent only, and that the action should therefore have been case. The court, however, reaffirmed its position in Day v. Edwards, that trespass lay for an immediate injury. Justice Lawrence, who had sat in Ogle, explained now that “what I principally relied on there was, that it did not appear that the mischief happened from the personal acts of the defendants: it might have happened from the operation of the wind and tide counteracting their personal efforts at the time: or indeed they might not even have been on board.”

Common Pleas, which now clearly favored case for these actions, twice suggested that Leame be reconsidered, but King’s Bench under Lord Ellenborough stood fast. In HALL v. PICKARD, 3 Camp. 187, 170 Eng.Rep. 1350 (K.B.1812), however, he raised the question whether it “may * * * be worthy of consideration, whether, in those instances where trespass may be maintained, the party may not waive the trespass, and proceed for the tort?” Later cases built on this suggestion until at last WILLIAMS v. HOLLAND, 10 Bing. 112, 131 Eng.Rep. 848 (C.P.1833), was accepted as settling the matter:

The declaration * * * states the ground of action to be an injury occasioned by the carelessness and negligence of the Defendant in driving his own gig; * * * and the jury have found in the very terms of the declaration, that the jury [sic] was so occasioned. Under such a form of action, therefore, and with such a finding by the jury, the present objection ought not to prevail, unless some positive and inflexible rule of law, or some authority too strong to be overcome, is brought forward in its support. * * *

571

But upon examining the cases cited in argument, both in support of, and in answer to, the objection, we cannot find one in which it is distinctly held, that the present form of action is not maintainable under the circumstances of this case.

* * * [T]he late case of Moreton v. Hardern 4 Moreton v. Hardern [4 B. & C. 223, 107 Eng.Rep. 1042 (K.B.1825)], appears to us to go the full length of deciding, that * * * where the injury is occasioned by the carelessness and negligence of the Defendant, the Plaintiff is at liberty to bring an action on the case, notwithstanding the act is immediate, so long as it is not a wilful act * * *.

3.THE LOSS AND DETENTION OF PERSONAL PROPERTY

The writ of detinue lay when defendant had possession of plaintiff’s personal property and refused to relinquish it. The writ would lie, for example, against a bailee who refused to redeliver bailed goods or an executor who withheld the title-deed to an heir’s real property. Although the gist of the action was wrongful detention, rather than wrongful taking, detinue would lie against a thief. But in this type of case trespass de bonis asportatis was preferred because detinue had several drawbacks: Defendant had a right to wage his law, and could deliver up the property in lieu of paying damages, even though it was damaged, for detinue did not lie for mere harm to goods.

Not surprisingly, plaintiffs began to try to substitute an action on the case in circumstances that seemed to call for detinue. They succeeded, first in the situation in which detinue was clearly inadequate—when the goods had spoiled—and then in situations in which its remedy might be appropriate but its mode of trial was unsatisfactory. See Fifoot, History and Sources of the Common Law—Tort and Contract 102–04 (1949). By 1500, case was essentially an alternative to detinue, and in the course of the sixteenth century a distinct species of case developed—the action of trover. The form of this new action was predicated upon a fiction—plaintiff alleged that he had lost goods, that they had been found by defendant and were now in that party’s possession, and that defendant refused to deliver them upon request. Loss and finding soon became recognized as formal allegations only, but the allegations concerning the request for return of the goods and defendant’s refusal to deliver retained some significance; after all, your bailee cannot be considered to have committed a tort if you have not asked for your goods back. What might constitute a legitimate, conditional refusal to deliver—as in the case of a finder who wished to check the credentials of a claimant—became an important issue. Apart from the fact that defendant was not entitled to wage his law, trover differed from detinue in this respect: Plaintiff was under no obligation to take back the goods, and in an action against a thief was under no obligation to demand them. The essence of trover was the conversion of the goods.

572

The term “conversion” troubled the courts for several hundred years. The most famous definition is that of Chief Justice Holt, in BALDWIN v. COLE, 6 Mod. 212, 87 Eng.Rep. 964 (K.B.1705): “[W]hat is a conversion, but an assuming upon one’s self the property and right of disposing another’s goods; and he that takes upon himself to detain another man’s goods from him without cause, takes upon himself the right of disposing of them * * *.” Is this really helpful? Consider the following case.

BUSHEL v. MILLER
Court of King’s Bench, 1718.
1 Strange 128, 93 Eng.Rep. 428.

Upon the Custom-House quay there is a hut, where particular porters put in small parcels of goods, if the ship is not ready to receive them when they are brought upon the quay. The porters, who have a right in this hut, have each particular boxes or cupboards, and as such the defendant had one. The plaintiff being one of the porters puts in goods belonging to A and lays them so that the defendant could not get to his chest without removing them. He accordingly does remove them about a yard from the place where they lay, towards the door, and without returning them into their place goes away, and the goods are lost. The plaintiff satisfies A of the value of the goods, and brings trover against the defendant. And upon the trial two points were ruled by the C.J.

- 1.That the plaintiff having made satisfaction to A for the goods, had thereby acquired a sufficient property in them to maintain trover.
- 2.That there was no conversion in the defendant. The plaintiff by laying his goods where they obstructed the defendant from going to his chest, was in that respect a wrong-doer. The defendant had a right to remove the goods, so that thus far he was in no fault. Then as to the not returning the goods to the place where he found them; if this were an action of trespass, perhaps it might be a doubt; but he was clear it could not amount to a conversion.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Plainti ff’s goods were delivered by a ship’s captain to defendant wharfingers to be held for plaintiff. The goods were then lost or stolen from defendants. Could defendants be said to have converted them? In ROSS v. JOHNSON, 5 Burrow 2825, 98 Eng.Rep. 483 (K.B.1772), Lord Mansfield said case, not trover, was the only remedy: “[I]n order to maintain trover, there must be an injurious conversion. This is not to be deemed a refusal to deliver the goods. They can’t deliver them: it is not in their power to do it. It is a bare omission.”

573

2.If defendant so negligently kept 20 barrels of plaintiff’s butter that “they were become of little value,” would trover lie? See Walgrave v. Ogden, 1 Leon. 224, 74 Eng.Rep. 205 (K.B.1590).

GORDON v. HARPER

In trover for certain goods, being household furniture * * *. [Plaintiff leased a house with the goods in question to A for a term still extant at the time of trial. While A was in possession under the lease, defendant sheriff seized the goods in execution of a judgment against B, who had sold the furniture to plaintiff sometime before the lease. Defendant after the seizure sold the goods.]

LORD KENYON, CH. J. The only point for the consideration of the Court in the case of Ward v. Macauley [4 T.R. 489, 100 Eng.Rep. 1135 (K.B.1791)] was, whether in a case like the present, the landlord could maintain an action of trespass against the sheriff for seizing goods, let with a house, under an execution against the tenant; and it was properly decided that no such action could be maintained. What was said further by me in that case, that trover was the proper remedy, was an extrajudicial opinion, to which upon further consideration I cannot subscribe. The true question is, whether when a person has leased goods in a house to another for a certain time, whereby he parts with the right of possession during the term to the tenant, and has only a reversionary interest, he can notwithstanding recover the value of the whole property pending the existence of the term in an action of trover. The very statement of the proposition affords an answer to it. If, instead of household goods, the goods here taken had been machines used in manufacture, which had been leased to a tenant, no doubt could have been made but that the sheriff might have seized them under an execution against the tenant, and the creditor would have been entitled to the beneficial use of the property during the term: the difference of the goods then cannot vary the law. * * * I forbear to deliver any opinion as to what remedy the landlord has in this case, not being at present called upon so to do: but it is clear that he cannot maintain trover.

ASHHURST, J. I have always understood the rule of law to be, that in order to maintain trover the plaintiff must have a right of property in the thing, and a right of possession, and that unless both these rights concur, the action will not lie. * * *

GROSE, J. The only question is whether trover will lie where the plaintiff had neither the actual possession of the goods taken at the time, nor the right of possession. * * * Where goods are delivered to a carrier, the owner has still a right of possession as against a tortfeasor, and the carrier is no more than his servant. But here it is clear that the plaintiff had no right of possession; and he would be a trespasser if he took the goods from the tenant: then by what authority can he recover them from any other person during the term? * * *

574

LAWRENCE, J. * * *. Now here if the taking of the goods by the sheriff determined the interest of the tenant in them, and revested it in the landlord, I admit that the latter might maintain trover for them * * *: but it is clearly otherwise; for here the tenant’s property and interest did not determine by the sheriff’s trespass, and the tenant might maintain trespass against the wrong-doer, and recover damages. * * *

Postea to the defendant.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Plainti ff pawned a jeweled hatband to X for 25*l.* with no certain time fixed for redemption. X delivered it to defendant, and then died. Plaintiff tendered 25*l.* to the executrix, who refused it, and then demanded the hatband of defendant. Would trover lie? See Ratcliff v. Davies, Croke Jac. 244, 79 Eng.Rep. 210 (K.B.1611).

2.Plain tiff leased a farm with cattle to Y for one year. After a few months, Y sold the cattle to defendant and absconded. What theory might be used to allow plaintiff to bring trover against defendant? See Swift v. Moseley, 10 Vt. 208 (1838).

4.THE CREATION OF CONTRACT LAW

a.Special Assumpsit

Glanvill said, shortly before 1200: “[I]t is not the custom of the court of the lord king to protect private agreements, nor does it concern itself with such contracts as can be considered to be like private agreements.” The treatise on the laws and customs of the realm of England commonly called Glanvill, Bk. X [18] (Hall ed. 1965). By the middle of the fourteenth century, there remained a good deal of truth in this. Two forms of action, each with significant shortcomings, lay for breach of contract—the writs of covenant and debt. Covenant required a sealed instrument and did not lie when debt was available. Debt lay only when an agreement had been fully performed by one party and he was entitled to a sum certain, and as in the case of detinue, defendant was entitled to wage his law, unless the agreement was sealed. Again, plaintiffs resorted to case as a safety valve for the deficiencies of covenant and debt, but progress was slower than it had been in the evasion of detinue, perhaps because the effort was not so much to avoid a particular writ as to create a new area of substantive law.

575

By 1400, plaintiff could maintain case against a defendant who had carried out his promise so badly that plaintiff was in a worse position than before defendant made his promise. Thus in 1370 case was held to lie against a defendant who, having undertaken to cure plaintiff’s horse, treated it so negligently that it died. WALDON v. MARSHALL, Y.B. Mich. 43 Ed. 3, f. 33, pl. 38. Chief Justice Cavendish, in an action against a surgeon for maiming plaintiff while trying to cure him, said “this action of covenant of necessity is maintained without specialty, since for every little thing a man cannot always have a Clerk to make a specialty for him.” THE SURGEON’S CASE, Y.B. Hil. 48 Ed. 3, f. 6, pl. 11 (K.B.1375). But case did not lie for nonfeasance. Through the fifteenth century there were occasional departures, but the courts seemed always to return to this rule. Then suddenly it was abandoned for good, and a new form of action developed from case and received judicial acceptance—special assumpsit. No single case seems to have established assumpsit as a remedy for nonperformance of a promise, but shortly after 1500 it had become the accepted view.

b.General Assumpsit

Special assumpsit filled a major gap left by the action of debt, but it did not take the place of debt, as trover substantially had taken the place of detinue. For another century, argument flared on the question whether assumpsit would lie for a debt. Gradually it was established that if a person, who already was indebted to another, made a fresh promise to pay the debt, assumpsit would lie for a breach of that promise, even though it would not have lain for the debt itself. The question then arose whether the fresh promise actually had to be made, or assumpsit would lie even when the promise was a fiction. In part, the answer lay in the desires of two courts to draw business to themselves; debt was the exclusive province of Common Pleas, while assumpsit with its background in trespass could be brought there or in King’s Bench. For 30 years they squabbled over the matter.

SLADE’S CASE

Court of Exchequer Chamber, 1602.
4 Co.Rep. 92b, 76 Eng.Rep. 1074.

John Slade brought an action on the case in the King’s Bench against Humphrey Morley * * * and declared, that whereas the plaintiff * * * was possessed of a close of land * * * and being so possessed, the plaintiff * * * the said close had sowed with wheat and rye, which wheat and rye * * * were grown into blades, the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of the said Humphrey, had bargained and sold to him the said blades of wheat and rye growing upon the said close, * * * assumed and promised the plaintiff to pay him 16*l.* * * *; and for non-payment thereof * * * the plaintiff brought the said action: the defendant pleaded non assumpsit modo et forma; and on the trial of this issue the jurors gave a special verdict, sc. that the defendant bought of the plaintiff the wheat and rye in blades growing upon the said close * * * and further found, that between the plaintiff and the defendant there was no other promise or assumption but only the said bargain * * *. And for the honour of the law, and for the quiet of the subject in the appeasing of such diversity of opinions * * * the case was openly argued before all the Justices of England, and Barons of the Exchequer, * * * and after many conferences between the justices and Barons, it was resolved, that the action was maintainable, and that the plaintiff should have judgment. And in this case these points were resolved:—1. That although an action of debt lies upon the contract, yet the bargainor may have an action on the case, or an action of debt at his election * * *. 3. It was resolved, that every contract executory imports in itself an assumpsit, for when one agrees to pay money, or to deliver anything, thereby he assumes or promises to pay, or deliver it, and therefore when one sells any goods to another, and agrees to deliver them at a day to come, and the other in consideration thereof agrees to pay so much money as such a day, in that case both parties may have an action of debt, or an action on the case on assumpsit, for the mutual executory agreement of both parties imports in itself reciprocal actions upon the case, as well as actions of debt * * *. 4. It was resolved, that the plaintiff in this action on the case on assumpsit should not recover only damages for the special loss (if any be) which he had, but also for the whole debt, so that a recovery or bar in this action would be a good bar in an action of debt brought upon the same contract * * *. And as to the objection which has been made, that it would be mischievous to the defendant that he should not wage his law, forasmuch as he might pay it in secret: to that it was answered, that it should be accounted his folly that he did not take sufficient witnesses with him to prove the payment he made: but the mischief would be rather on the other party, for now experience proves that men’s consciences grow so large that the respect of their private advantage rather induces men (and chiefly those who have declining estates) to perjury * * *.

576

NOTE

In considering the demise of wager of law, remember that at this time, and for two centuries more, parties were incompetent to testify at a trial. The enactment of the Statute of Frauds, 29 Charles 2, c. 3 (1677), which required several kinds of contracts to be in writing, is attributed by many to the problem of proof posed by the result in Slade’s Case. See, e.g., Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 648 (5th ed. 1956).

577

The recognition of indebitatus assumpsit (literally, “being indebted, he promised”), or general assumpsit, did more than deliver the quietus to debt. The contract-like sanction it imposed upon an obligation that did not really arise out of an actual promise provided the structure for wholly new developments. When A has delivered goods to B or has performed services for the latter, it may be presumed that A expects payment and B expects to pay; but the common law had furnished no remedy in the absence of an actual agreement. Now a new action of quantum meruit developed based upon an implied promise to pay the reasonable value of the goods or services, not unlike the imputed promise to pay the debt that furnished the basis for Slade’s Case. Even more significant was the extension of this same formula into circumstances in which a promise to pay was the last thing in defendant’s mind.

LAMINE V. DORRELL

Court of Queen’s Bench, 1705.
2 Ld.Raym. 1216, 92 Eng.Rep. 303.

In an indebitatus assumpsit for money received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff as administrator of J.S. on non assumpsit pleaded, upon evidence the case appeared to be, that J.S. died intestate possessed of certain Irish debentures; and the defendant pretending to a right to be administrator, got administration granted to him, and by that means got these debentures into his hands, and disposed of them: then the defendant’s administration was repealed, and administration granted to the plaintiff, and he brought this action against the defendant for the money he sold the debentures for. And it being objected upon the evidence, that this action would not lie, because the defendant sold the debentures as one that claimed a title and interest in them, and therefore could not be said to receive the money for the use of the plaintiff, which indeed he received to his own use; but the plaintiff ought to have brought trover or detinue for the debentures: the point was saved to the defendant, and now the Court was moved, and the same objection made.

POWELL JUSTICE. It is clear the plaintiff might have maintained detinue or trover for the debentures * * *. But the plaintiff may dispense with the wrong, and suppose the sale made by his consent, and bring an action for the money they were sold for, as money received to his use. * * *

HOLT CHIEF JUSTICE. These actions have crept in by degrees. * * * So the defendant in this case pretending to receive the money the debentures were sold for in the right of the intestate, why should he not be answerable for it to the intestate’s administrator? If an action of trover should be brought by the plaintiff for these debentures after judgment in this indebitatus assumpsit, he may plead this recovery in bar of the action of trover, in the same manner as it would have been a good plea in bar for the defendant to have pleaded to the action of trover, that he sold the debentures, and paid to the plaintiff in satisfaction. * * * This recovery may be given in evidence upon not guilty in the action of trover, because by this action the plaintiff makes and affirms the act of the defendant in the sale of the debentures to be lawful, and consequently the sale of them is no conversion.

578

* * *

MOSES v. MACFERLAN, 2 Burrow 1005, 97 Eng.Rep. 676 (K.B.1760). Plaintiff had endorsed four promissory notes to defendant under a written agreement that he should not be liable thereon; in defendant’s suit in a Court of Conscience (a small claims court), however, the agreement was not recognized, and plaintiff was found liable for six pounds, which he paid. (On these facts, would Lamine v. Dorrell support an action for money had and received?) Lord Mansfield said:

2d objection.—“That no assumpsit lies, except upon an express or implied contract: but here it is impossible to presume any contract to refund money, which the defendant recovered by an adverse suit.”

Answer. If the defendant be under an obligation, from the ties of natural justice, to refund; the law implies a debt, and gives this action, founded in the equity of the plaintiff’s case, as it were upon a contract (“quasi ex contractu,” as the Roman law expresses it).

* * *

Money may be recovered by a right and legal judgment; and yet the iniquity of keeping that money may be manifest, upon grounds which could not be used by way of defence against the judgment.

* * *

Suppose a man recovers upon a policy for a ship presumed to be lost, which afterwards comes home;—or upon the life of a man presumed to be dead, who afterwards appears;—or upon a representation of a risque deemed to be fair, which comes out afterwards to be grossly fraudulent.

* * *

One great benefit, which arises to suitors from the nature of this action, is, that the plaintiff needs not state the special circumstances from which he concludes “that, ex aequo & bono, the money received by the defendant, ought to be deemed as belonging to him:” he may declare generally, “that the money was received to his use;” and make out his case, at the trial.

579

* * *

This kind of equitable action to recover back money, which ought not in justice to be kept, is very beneficial, and therefore much encouraged. It lies only for money which, ex aequo et bono, the defendant ought to refund: it does not lie for money paid by the plaintiff, which is claimed of him as payable in point of honor and honesty, although it could not have been recovered from him by any course of law; as in payment of a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations, or contracted during his infancy, or to the extent of principal and legal interest upon an usurious contract, or, for money fairly lost at play: because in all these cases, the defendant may retain it with a safe conscience, though by positive law he was barred from recovering.

An important procedural result of the development of indebitatus assumpsit was a new manner of pleading contract actions. The declaration in money had and received, as Lord Mansfield noted in his opinion in Moses v. MacFerlan, was broad in the extreme. The declarations in other actions derived from indebitatus assumpsit were equally broad. Pleadings seized upon this liberality to develop what became known as the “common counts,” standardized allegations concealing virtually all of the particulars of an action. The principal common counts were for money had and received, for goods sold and delivered, for work done, for money lent, for money paid by plaintiff to the use of defendant, and for money due on an account stated. See Fifoot, History and Sources of the Common Law—Tort and Contract 369–70, 393–94 (1949).

C. THE OTHER SYSTEM: EQUITY

1. THE RISE OF CHANCERY

MAITLAND, EQUITY, ALSO THE FORMS OF ACTION AT COMMON LAW 2–10 (1909):

In Edward I’s day, at the end of the thirteenth century, three great courts have come into existence * * *.

One of the three courts, namely, the Exchequer, is more than a court of law. From our modern point of view it is not only a court of law but a ‘government office’. * * * What we should call the ‘civil service’ of the country is transacted by two great offices or ‘departments’; there is the Exchequer which is the fiscal department, there is the Chancery which is the secretarial department, while above these there rises the king’s permanent Council. At the head of the Chancery stands the Chancellor, usually a bishop; he is we may say the king’s secretary of state for all departments, he keeps the king’s great seal and all the already great mass of writing that has to be done in the king’s name has to be done under his supervision.

580

He is not as yet a judge, but already he by himself or his subordinates has a great deal of work to do which brings him into a close connexion with the administration of justice. One of the duties of that great staff of clerks over which he presides is to draw up and issue those writs whereby actions are begun in the courts of law—such writs are sealed with the king’s seal. * * *

But by another route the Chancellor is brought into still closer contact with the administration of justice. Though these great courts of law have been established there is still a reserve of justice in the king. Those who can not get relief elsewhere present their petitions to the king and his council praying for some remedy. * * * In practice a great share of this labour falls on the Chancellor. He is the king’s prime minister, he is a member of the council, and the specially learned member of the council. It is in dealing with these petitions that the Chancellor begins to develop his judicial powers.

* * * Very often the petitioner requires some relief at the expense of some other person. He complains that for some reason or another he can not get a remedy in the ordinary course of justice and yet he is entitled to a remedy. He is poor, he is old, he is sick, his adversary is rich and powerful, will bribe or will intimidate jurors, or has by some trick or some accident acquired an advantage of which the ordinary courts with their formal procedure will not deprive him. The petition is often couched in piteous terms, the king is asked to find a remedy for the love of God and in the way of charity. Such petitions are referred by the king to the Chancellor. Gradually in the course of the fourteenth century petitioners, instead of going to the king, will go straight to the Chancellor * * *. Now one thing that the Chancellor may do in such a case is to invent a new writ and so provide the complainant with a means of bringing an action in a court of law. But in the fourteenth century the courts of law have become very conservative and are given to quashing writs which differ in material points from those already in use. But another thing that the Chancellor can do is to send for the complainant’s adversary and examine him concerning the charge that has been made against him. Gradually a procedure is established. The Chancellor having considered the petition, or ‘bill’ as it is called, orders the adversary to come before him and answer the complaint. The writ whereby he does this is called a subpoena—because it orders the man to appear upon pain of forfeiting a sum of money * * *. It is very different from the old writs whereby actions are begun in the courts of law. They tell the defendant what is the cause of action against him * * *. The subpoena, on the other hand, will tell him merely that he has got to come before the Chancellor and answer complaints made against him by A.B.

581

Then when he comes before the Chancellor he will have to answer on oath, and sentence by sentence, the bill of the plaintiff. * * *

I do not think that in the fourteenth century the Chancellors considered that they had to administer any body of substantive rules that differed from the ordinary law of the land. * * * The complaints that come before them are in general complaints of indubitable legal wrongs * * * of which the ordinary courts take cognizance, wrongs which they ought to redress. * * * However this sort of thing can not well be permitted. * * * And so the Chancellor is warned off the field of common law—he is not to hear cases which might go to the ordinary courts, he is not to make himself a judge of torts and contracts, of property in lands and goods.

But then just at this time it is becoming plain that the Chancellor is doing some convenient and useful works that could not be done, or could not easily be done by the courts of common law. He has taken to enforcing uses or trusts. * * * No doubt they were troublesome things, things that might be used for fraudulent purposes, and statutes were passed against those who employed them for the purpose of cheating their creditors or evading the law of mortmain. But I have not a doubt that they were very popular, and I think we may say that had there been no Chancery, the old courts would have discovered some method of enforcing these fiduciary obligations. That method however must have been a clumsy one. A system of law which will never compel, which will never even allow, the defendant to give evidence, a system which sends every question of fact to a jury, is not competent to deal adequately with fiduciary relationships. On the other hand the Chancellor had a procedure which was very well adapted to this end.

* * * And then there were some other matters that were considered to be fairly within his jurisdiction. An old rhyme allows him ‘fraud, accident, and breach of confidence’—there were many frauds which the stiff old procedure of the courts of law could not adequately meet, and ‘accident,’ in particular the accidental loss of a document, was a proper occasion for the Chancellor’s interference.

* * * In James I’s day occurred the great quarrel between Lord Chancellor Ellesmere and Chief Justice Coke which finally decided that the Court of Chancery was to have the upper hand over the courts of law. If the Chancery was to carry out its maxims about trust and fraud it was essential that it should have a power to prevent men from going into the courts of law and to prevent men from putting in execution the judgments that they had obtained in courts of law. In fraud or in breach of trust you obtain a judgment against me in a court of law; I complain to the Chancellor, and he after hearing what you have to say enjoins you not to put in force your judgment, says in effect that if you do put your judgment in force you will be sent to prison. Understand well that the Court of Chancery never asserted that it was superior to the courts of law; it never presumed to send to them such mandates as the Court of King’s Bench habitually sent to the inferior courts, telling them that they must do this or must not do that or quashing their proceedings * * *. It was addressed not to the judges, but to the party. * * * For all this, however, it was natural that the judges should take umbrage at this treatment of their judgments. Coke declared that the man who obtained such an injunction was guilty of the offence denounced by the Statutes of Praemunire, that of calling in question the judgments of the king’s courts in other courts (these statutes had been aimed at the Papal curia). King James had now a wished-for opportunity of appearing as supreme over all his judges, and all his courts * * *.

582

ARGUMENTS PROVING FROM ANTIQUITY THE DIGNITY, POWER, AND JURISDICTION OF THE COURT OF CHANCERY

1 Chan.Rep. (App.) 1, 20, 23–24, 49–50, 21 Eng.Rep. 576, 581–82, 588 (1616).

* * *

His said Majesty being informed of this Difference between his two Courts of Chancery and King’s Bench, * * * directed, That his Attorney General, calling to him the Rest of his Learned Counsel, should peruse the * * * Precedents, and certify his Majesty the Truth thereof with their Opinions.

* * *

And afterwards a Case was presented to his Majesty as followeth.

The Case.

A. hath a Judgment and Execution in the King’s Bench or Common Pleas against B. in an Action of Debt of £1000, and in an Ejectione Firmae of the Manor of D. B. complains in the Chancery to be relieved against these Judgments according to Equity and Conscience, allowing the Judgment to be lawful and good by the Rigour and strict Rules of the Law, and the Matter in Equity to be such, as the Judges of the Common Law being no Judges of Equity, but bound by their Oaths to do the Law, cannot give any Remedy or Relief for the same, either by Error or Attaint, or by any other Means.

Question.

Whether the Chancery may relieve B. in this or such like Cases, or else leave him utterly remediless and undone? And if the Chancery be restrained herein by any Statute of Praemunire, then by what Statute, and by what Words in any Statute is the Chancery so restrained, and Conscience and Equity excluded, banished and damned?

583

Which Case his Majesty referred again to his said Attorney and Learned Counsel * * *.

* * *

Upon which Certificate the King gave his Judgment as followeth.

Forasmuch as Mercy and Justice be the true Supporters of our Royal Throne, and that it properly belongeth unto us in our Princely Office to take Care and provide, that our Subjects have equal and indifferent Justice ministered unto them: And that where their Case deserveth to be relieved in Course of Equity by Suit in our Court of Chancery, they should not be abandoned and exposed to perish under the Rigor and Extremity of our Laws, We in our Princely Judgment * * * do approve, ratify and confirm, * * * the Practice of our Court of Chancery * * *. And do will and command that our Chancellor, or Keeper of the Great Seal for the Time being, shall not hereafter desist to give unto our Subjects, * * * such Relief in Equity (notwithstanding any Proceedings at the Common Law against them) as shall stand with the Merit and Justice of their Cause, and with the former, ancient and continued Practice and Presidency of our Chancery have done. * * *

BEALE, EQUITY IN AMERICA, 1 Cambridge L.J. 21, 22–23 (1921):

At about the time of the English Revolution colonies came to be more rigorously governed. Most of the old charters were forfeited, and a new provincial form of government was established; and from that time the Judges were appointed, through the royal governors, by the Crown, and they came to be regarded, naturally, as the enemies of popular rights and as creatures of the Crown. The situation at about the time of the American Revolution was that Judges in the North were still regarded as tools of the King and as enemies of the popular will. * * *

In the South conditions were very different. The ruling class was well satisfied with the condition of affairs in England, and, although there were popular uprisings in some parts of the South, notably in Virginia and Maryland, the power of the aristocracy on the whole was never shaken. They determined the laws, they had no distrust of Judges, and in those States there was no desire to hamper a Judge or to exalt the jury at his expense. * * *

We should not be surprised, therefore, to find that in the North at least the people were very jealous of giving any jurisdiction to the Court of Equity, there being no jury in that Court. Equity seemed to the people of America, a hundred years ago even, as a non-popular method of applying law, which it was the duty of the people alone to deal with. The Courts administering equity were, so to speak, royalist persons administering the law of an effete monarchy which had never taken foothold in the democratic part of America. The consequence was that in New England there was no equity jurisdiction and very little admixture of equity in the law. The law administered was the strictly legal portion of the law; and the books cited, when they came to cite books, were the reports of the common law Courts. In New York there was a Chancellor from the time of the original constitution; but that Chancellor was not supposed to be a Judge who administered the English system of equity. * * *

584

Pennsylvania never had any Court of equity. The law, however, had more of what they regarded as equitable doctrines in it than the law of Massachusetts * * *. In New Jersey and Delaware, however, and throughout the South, there was set up at the time of our Revolution a separate Court of Chancery, sitting beside the Common Law Court and administering the principles of English equity.

2.PROCEDURE IN EQUITY

BOWEN, PROGRESS IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE DURING THE VICTORIAN PERIOD, 1 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 516, 524–27 (1907):

* * * A bill in a Chancery suit was a marvellous document, which stated the plaintiff's case at full length and three times over. There was first the part in which the story was circumstantially set forth. Then came the part which "charged" its truth against the defendant—or, in other words, which set it forth all over again in an aggrieved tone. Lastly came the interrogating part, which converted the original allegations into a chain of subtly framed inquiries addressed to the defendant, minutely dovetailed and circuitously arranged so as to surround a slippery conscience and to stop up every earth. No layman, however intelligent, could compose the "answer" without professional aid. It was inevitably so elaborate and so long, that the responsibility for the accuracy of the story shifted, during its telling, from the conscience of the defendant to that of his solicitor and counsel, and truth found no difficulty in disappearing during the operation. * * * [The form of the answer] often rendered necessary a re-statement of the plaintiff's whole position, in which case an amended bill was drawn requiring another answer, until at last the voluminous pleadings were completed and the cause was at issue. By a system which to lawyers in 1887 appears to savour of the Middle Ages, the evidence for the hearing was thereupon taken by interrogatories written down beforehand upon paper and administered to the witnesses in private before an examiner or commissioner. At this meeting none of the parties were allowed to be present, either by themselves or their agents, and the examiner himself was sworn to secrecy. If cross-examined at all (for cross-examination under such conditions was of necessity somewhat of a farce), the witnesses could only be cross-examined upon written inquiries prepared equally in advance by a counsel who had never had the opportunity of knowing what had been said during the examination-in-chief. * * * On the day of the publication of the depositions copies were furnished to the parties at their own expense; but, from that moment, no further evidence was admissible, nor could any slip in the proofs be repaired, except by special permission of the court, when, if such leave was granted, a fresh commission was executed with the same formalities and in the same secret manner as before. The expense of the pleadings, of the preparation for the hearing, and of the other stages of the litigation may be imagined, when we recollect that it was a necessary maxim of the Court of Chancery that all parties interested in the result must be parties to the suit. If, for example, relief was sought against a breach of trust, all who were interested in the trust estate had to be joined, as well as all who had been privy to the breach of trust itself. During the winding journey of the cause towards its termination, whenever any death occurred, bills of review or supplemental suits became necessary to reconstitute the charmed circle of litigants which had been broken. On every such catastrophe the plaintiff had again to begin wearily to weave his web, liable on any new death to find it unravelled and undone. It was satirically observed that a suit to which fifty defendants were necessary parties (a perfectly possible contingency) could never hope to end at all, since the yearly average of deaths in England was one in fifty, and a death, as a rule, threw over the plaintiff's bill for at least a year. The hearing in many cases could not terminate the cause. Often inquiries or accounts were necessary, and had still to be taken under the supervision of a master. Possibly some issue upon the disputed facts required to be sent for trial at the assizes, or a point of law submitted to a common law court. In such cases, the verdict of the jury, or the opinions of the court so taken, in no way concluded the conscience of the Court of Chancery. It resumed charge of the cause again, when the intermediate expedition to the common law was over, and had the power, if it saw fit, to send the same issue to a new trial, or to disregard altogether what had been the result. * * * When a cause had reached its final stage—when all inquiries had been made, all parties represented, all accounts taken, all issues tried—justice was done with vigour and exactitude. Few frauds ever in the end successfully ran the gauntlet of the Court of Chancery. But the honest suitor emerged from the ordeal victorious rather than triumphant, for too often he had been ruined by the way.

585

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.What differences do you find between procedure at common law and procedure in equity as it is described by Bowen? What are the differences in pleading, the manner of receiving evidence, the attitude toward singleness of issue, and the determination of questions of fact? The rules of evidence, which are chiefly concerned with the exclusion of testimony of doubtful value, were developed in the common law courts and were never strictly applied in equity. How is this fact related to the differences in equity and common law procedures?

586

2.Although the division between law and equity in the federal courts never took the form of separate courts or judges of law and equity, the two were separately administered in the federal system until 1938. From the beginning, procedure at law was conformed to that of the state in which the court was held, but—due in part to the fact that some states had no system of equity in 1789—equity procedure in the federal courts was governed by statutes of Congress and rules promulgated by the Supreme Court. In 1915, Congress provided that when “a suit at law should have been brought in equity or a suit in equity should have been brought at law, the court shall order any amendments to the pleadings which may be necessary to conform them to the proper practice,” and that in “all actions at law equitable defenses may be interposed by answer, plea, or replication without the necessity of filing a bill on the equity side of the court.” 38 Stat. 956.

The elements of procedure in equity discussed in the foregoing materials are significant because of their impact on the substantive and remedial doctrines of equity. Together with the method of enforcing equity decrees, which is discussed below, these elements largely determined the type of case that equity would hear and the disposition it would order. As you read the materials that follow, ask yourself how these differences between law and equity may explain the particular equitable approach in question.

3.THE UNIQUE CHARACTER OF EQUITABLE RELIEF

a.Specific Relief

The ordinary judgment of a common law court consisted of a declaration of a legal relationship. When plaintiff prevailed in the action, this declaration in all but rare instances was that plaintiff was entitled to a sum of money from defendant. Even this declaration was not an order that defendant pay the sum; if defendant did not pay, plaintiff had to take further steps to execute the judgment. The decree in equity, on the other hand, was an order directed at defendant; imprisonment and fines were used not only to coerce compliance, but to punish disobedience. This difference between the remedies in the two systems of courts was summed up in the maxim that equity acts in personam and not in rem. The primary means by which equity acted in personam was the injunction—an order directing defendant to perform or to stop performing an act.

The injunction and other forms of specific relief shaped the substantive doctrines of equity. But it affected the common law as well in at least three important ways. First, the availability of specific relief through the injunction or specific performance when compensatory relief through a judgment for damages would be inadequate was the chief basis for drawing common law causes into equity. As a result equity now dominates many areas of controversy originally governed by the common law, because damages are an impotent remedy in such cases; a good example is nuisance. Similarly the enforcement of contracts for the sale of real property has become principally a concern of equity, because specific performance is ordered as a matter of course. Second, the availability of specific relief in equity effectively has dampened pressures to develop common law remedies in that direction. Third, the injunction was the means by which equity imposed its substantive doctrines on the common law courts. As noted in the extract from Maitland, if the chancellor found that a common law judgment had been obtained by fraud, the equity court did not purport to negate it; the chancellor simply took the equally effective step of threatening the judgment creditor with jail if the latter sought to enforce it. In similar fashion equity enjoined the bringing of suits in inconvenient fora and compelled interpleader and class actions in multiparty suits.

587

A plaintiff who sought specific relief also might have sustained an injury that an injunction could not cure. But there was no necessity for choosing between equitable relief and compensatory damages. A “clean-up” doctrine gave Chancery authority to accord full relief in any case of which it had cognizance even though giving such relief might mean redressing injuries for which there was an adequate remedy at law.

b.Availability of Relief

You must not think that the doctrine of the adequate remedy at law was the only restriction on the use of equitable remedies. Equity carefully preserved its power. It was reluctant to issue orders that it might not be able to enforce or that might involve it in detailed supervision of a transaction. Traditionally, equity would not direct a party to take action outside its territorial jurisdiction or order specific performance of a building or personal services contract. For other reasons, activity that might be criminal ordinarily would not be enjoined. While the Court of Star Chamber flourished there was no call for criminal jurisdiction in equity, and after that court was abolished in 1642, Chancery, perhaps for fear of meeting a similar fate, refrained from encroaching on this particular domain of the common law courts. What aspects of Chancery procedure might have seemed particularly odious in criminal cases to people who celebrated the common law as the palladium of their liberty?

The availability of equitable relief also was hedged by doctrines of fairness and justice. Thus the opinions of the chancellor continually repeat that he who seeks equity must do equity, that he must come into equity with “clean hands,” that equity abhors a forfeiture, and that equity will not protect one who sleeps on his rights. Is there any reason why these ideas should have been applied only in equity?

588

c.Fraud

Fraud often is spoken of as a fount of equitable jurisdiction. Yet the common law also permitted actions for fraud, and defenses as well. Why was protection against fraud thought to be a peculiarly equitable concern? For at least two reasons. For one thing, it was a function of equity’s getting there first and going further. The common law would not recognize fraud as a defense to an action on a sealed instrument. Thus, before the rise of assumpsit, at a time when most of the agreements that were enforced by the courts were under seal, equity furnished the only remedy for fraud in the great bulk of cases. When simple contracts—to which fraud was a common law defense—became enforceable, Chancery sustained its lead by developing the doctrine of constructive fraud, a doctrine in which the rigid technicalities of the common law fraud concept played little part.

The second reason lay in equity’s procedure. Equity implemented its concern with fraud in two ways. First, by denying its own relief to fraudulent complainants, and second, by enjoining legal suitors from pressing their claims or enforcing their judgments. The fraud concept in the latter case has come to be known as an “equitable defense,” together with such doctrines as accident, undue influence, and estoppel. Of course, the term “equitable defense” does not indicate a defense in an equity suit, but connotes an effective—if not technical—defense to an action at law.

d.Discovery

Equity and the common law should not be thought of as conflicting systems. In many respects the relationship was one of cooperation, especially after the confrontation of 1616. The most important aspect of this mutual assistance, for our purposes, was discovery, by which a party at law might obtain through equity information for his case. The procedure and the limitations are set forth by Lord Chief Baron Abinger:

* * * A party has a right to compel the production of a document in which he has an equal interest, though not equal in degree, yet to a certain extent equal, with the party who detains it from him. In that case he may file a bill of discovery, in order to have the possession of it, and the inspection of it. A party has also a right to file a bill of discovery for the purpose of obtaining such facts as may tend to prove his case; and if those facts are either in possession of the other party, or, if they consist of documents in possession of the other party, in which he either has an interest, or which tend to prove his case, and have no relation to the case of the other party, he has a right to have them produced, and he may file a bill of discovery, in order to aid him in law or in equity, to exhibit those documents in evidence, or compel a statement of those facts. * * * Has he a right, as against the defendant, to discover the defendant’s case? * * * The ground on which he files his bill, is to make the defendant discover what is material to his (the plaintiff’s) case; but he has no right to say to the defendant, “Tell me what your title is—tell me what your case is—tell me how you mean to prove it—tell me the evidence you have to support it—disclose the documents you mean to make use of in support of it—tell me all these things, that I may find a flaw in your title.” Surely that is not the principle of a bill of discovery.

589

COMBE v. CITY OF LONDON, 4 Y. & C. Ex. 139, 154, 160 Eng.Rep. 953, 959 (Exch.1840). What aspects of equitable procedure explain the availability of discovery in equity?

D. REFORM: NEW PLEADING, ABOLITION OF THE FORMS, AND THE MERGER OF LAW AND EQUITY

1.THE EMERGENCE OF CODE PROCEDURE

The first significant reform in procedure occurred in England in the period between 1825 and 1834. Chancery practice was substantially reformed during these years. One form of writ was adopted for all three common law courts. All but three real actions were abolished. Debt and detinue were reshaped. Wager of law was ended.

The capstone of the reform was a body of new rules of pleading, drafted by a committee that included Henry Stephen, author of the treatise cited earlier in this chapter, and Sir James Parke, who, as a judge of the Court of Exchequer, was to become the foremost expositor of the new rules. Many of their recommendations were distinct improvements on existing practice; one—not accepted—would have permitted the joinder of counts in trespass and case, and amendments from the one form of action to the other. The principal defect the commissioners found in the existing system of pleading, however, was the ubiquitous availability of the general issue. The commissioners attributed to pleas of the general issue “the unnecessary accumulation of proof,” the failure to raise questions of law by demurrer, the imposition of the duty to separate law and fact upon the busy nisi prius judge, and the proliferation of new trials. This position was reflected by the new rules announced under the authority of an Act of Parliament by the judges of all three common law courts at Hilary Term, 1834, and known as the Hilary Rules; the defenses that could be proved under a plea of the general issue were greatly reduced, and special pleading was substantially restored. 2 C. & M. 1–30, 149 Eng.Rep. 651–63 (1834).

The result was a disaster. “Under the common-law system the matter was bad enough with a pleading question decided in every sixth case. But under the Hilary Rules it was worse. Every fourth case decided a question on the pleadings. Pleading ran riot.” Whittier, Notice Pleading, 31 Harv.L.Rev. 501, 507 (1918). Fortunately, corrective action was not long in coming. The Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852, 1854, and 1860 weakened the forms of action, expanded joinder, and liberalized pleading. Finally, the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 combined Chancery and the common law courts into one Supreme Court of Judicature, fused law and equity, and abolished the forms of action. See 15 Holdsworth, A History of English Law 104–38 (Goodhart & Hanbury ed. 1965).

590

Meanwhile in the United States,¹ a new constitution in New York in 1846 abolished the Court of Chancery and directed the legislature to provide for the appointment of commissioners to “revise, reform, simplify, and abridge” the civil procedure of the state. N.Y. Const. 1846 Art. VI, § 24. The legislature implemented this directive in 1847 and expressly charged the newly appointed commissioners to “provide for the abolition of the present forms of actions and pleadings in cases at common law; for a uniform course of proceeding in all cases whether of legal or equitable cognizance, and for the abandonment * * * of any form and proceeding not necessary to ascertain or preserve the rights of the parties.” N.Y. Laws 1847, c. 59, § 8.

FIRST REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS ON PRACTICE AND PLEADINGS (New York) 73–74, 87, 123–24, 137–38, 140–41, 144 (1848):

The history of jurisprudence, both in this state and in England, * * * affords a most convincing proof of the wisdom of the measure adopted by the people of this state, in abolishing the distinction between law and equity tribunals. Notwithstanding their separate existence, they had, under the institutions of this state, but one common object, the administration of justice—depending not upon the mere discretion of the court, but ascertained by fixed and certain rules of law. And yet, while they were kept distinct, though their jurisdictions continually encroached upon each other, there were certain rules, not well defined, but yet existing, by which their powers were distinguished. It is, therefore, no matter of surprise, that the books are filled with cases, in which the injustice has been imposed upon parties, of suffering the loss of a substantial right, because of a mistake in the choice of a forum, before which its enforcement was sought. * * *

From the period [in which the forms of action developed] * * *—a period comparatively benighted and ignorant, in all that is valuable in science—to the present, these forms have been adhered to with a sort of bigoted devotion. While the principles of legal science have expanded and adapted themselves to the exigencies of each successive age, through which they have passed, we find ourselves met with the standing argument against improvement, that the time-honored institutions of ages must be held sacred, and that these forms, which may have been well suited to the age in which they originated, must be left untouched.

591

* * * It seems to us, clear, that neither the forms of remedies, nor the mode in which they are stated, require the complexity, in which both are now enveloped. The embarrassments, to which they have given rise, have resulted from no difficulty in determining the real rights of parties, but simply in the means of enforcing them; and in this respect, we feel no hesitation in recommending, that the retention of forms, which serve no valuable purpose, should no longer constitute a portion of the remedial law of this state. * * *

The rules respecting parties in the courts of law, differ from those in the courts of equity. The blending of the jurisdictions makes it necessary to revise these rules, to some extent. In doing so, we have had a three-fold purpose in view: first, to do away with the artificial distinctions existing in the courts of law, and to require the real party in interest to appear in court as such: second, to require the presence of such parties as are necessary to make an end of the controversy: and third, to allow otherwise great latitude in respect to the number of parties who may be brought in.

* * *

The courts of law generally administer justice betweee [sic] those parties only who stand in the same relation to * * * [each] other; while courts of equity bring before them various parties, standing in different relations, that the whole controversy may be settled, if possible, in one suit, and others avoided. This reasonable and just rule, we would adopt for all actions. * * *

As has been already remarked, the change in the mode of pleading is the key of the reform which we propose. Without this, we should despair of any substantial and permanent improvement in our modes of legal controversy. * * *

The pleadings, we have said, are the written allegations of the parties of the cause of action on one side, and the defence on the other. Their object is three-fold: to present the facts on which the court is to pronounce the law; to present them in such a manner, as that the precise points in dispute shall be perceived, to which the proofs may be directed; and to preserve the record of the rights determined. Not one of these objects is gained by the law of pleading as it now exists in this state.

* * *

There are many treatises and books of forms, indispensable to the lawyer, on the mode of pleading and the forms of the allegations. The rules and the commentaries upon them, form one of the most technical and abstruse branches of the law * * *. We are * * * disposed to pronounce it a system of dialectics, very fit for the schoolmen with whom it originated, but unfit for the practical business of life.

So unfit has it been found, that in instances almost numberless, the legislature and the courts have departed from it and gone to the other extreme. * * * A form of plea was devised which in many cases would virtually deny every material allegation of the declaration without disclosing any particular defence. The courts from time to time have admitted new defences under these general issues, and still further to encourage them, a statute has been passed allowing the defendant to plead the general issue, and with it give notice of any defence, which he could not otherwise introduce under such issue. * * *

Besides the general issues, we have general declarations, or in technical language, common counts. These have been so contrived as to give no information of the particular demand. They also have been encouraged by the courts and numberless demands allowed to be proven under them. * * *

In truth the arguments of those who defend the present system destroy each other. One is the advantage of having the question of fact drawn out so precisely, that the court and jury may see what they have to try, and the parties be prepared with their proofs; the other is the advantage of having the facts stated in so general a form, that the allegations shall cover any state of facts that may appear on the trial, or in other words, the advantage of having no question of fact drawn out by the pleadings at all.

* * *

Disentangling the questions and separating those of fact and of law, is rarely effected by the present system of pleading at common law. * * * This is necessarily so, so long as the pleadings state the conclusions of fact, instead of the facts themselves. * * *

Following the report of the commissioners, the New York legislature enacted a Code of Civil Procedure, commonly called the Field Code after David Dudley Field, the most influential of the commissioners. N.Y Laws 1848, c. 379. Among its most important provisions were the following:

§ 69. [§ 62]ⁱ The distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms of all such actions and suits, heretofore existing, are abolished; and, there shall be in this state, hereafter, but one form of action, for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress of private wrongs, which shall be denominated a civil action.

§ 140. [§ 118] All the forms of pleading heretofore existing, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are abolished * * *.

§ 142. [§ 120] The complaint shall contain:

- 1.* * *
- 2.A statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended;
- 3.A demand of the relief, to which the plaintiff supposes himself entitled. If the recovery of money be demanded, the amount thereof shall be stated.

§ 156. [§ 132] No other pleading shall be allowed than the complaint, answer, reply and demurrers.

§ 159. [§ 136] In the construction of a pleading, for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed, with a view to substantial justice between the parties.

§ 176. [§ 151] The court shall, in every stage of an action, disregard any error, or defect in the pleadings or proceedings, which shall not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party; and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect.

NOTE

In 1851 the New York legislature amended Section 142(2) to read: “A plain and concise statement of the facts constituting a cause of action without unnecessary repetition.” N.Y. Laws 1851, c. 479, § 1.

2.SOME OLD PROBLEMS PERSIST

Could it have been reasonably expected that the transition from the common law system of procedure to the code system would represent a clean break with the past? Consider the following factors:

(a)The substantive law was supposed to remain unaltered, yet the substantive law had been intimately tied to the older mode of procedure.

594

Moreover, certain procedural institutions—notably trial by jury—had acquired the character of substantive rights.

(b)The most fundamental aspects of procedure—such as the necessity of striking a balance between the function of pleading as setting the limits of the controversy and the function of trial as determining the true merits of the case—are not created by a particular system of procedure but are an integral part of an adjudicative process based upon a theory of party-presentation. Indeed it is rare that any system of procedure attempts by rigid rule to settle these issues definitively. Much will depend on the attitudes, experiences, and predispositions of those who are called upon to apply the rules.

(c)The problems presented by the change in procedure confronted a profession that had traditionally chosen precedent as its polestar, a profession comprised of people who might feel they had an interest in their established ways of proceeding and who in any event were trained in analysis under the older system. The judges who were called upon to interpret the new provisions were of course established members of this profession; indeed, if the methods of judicial selection were effective, they were lawyers who had performed quite competently under the older procedure and they understandably may have been a little impatient with complaints that this procedure was replete with snares and absurdities.

Whatever the reasons, it is clear that many courts did not view the new codes as having been written on a clean slate. Even today concepts of the common law system occasionally seem to assume a significant role in the decision of pleading and procedure questions. We will see more of this in the next chapter. See Chapter 8, infra. For the present we will look at one aspect of the perseverance of common law notions—the “theory of the pleading” doctrine and related questions.

JONES V. WINSOR

Supreme Court of South Dakota, 1908.
22 S.D. 480, 118 N.W. 716.

CORSON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order overruling his demurrer to the complaint.

It is alleged in the complaint, in substance: That on or about the 1st of April, 1907, the plaintiffs, being desirous of securing a franchise for a city railway system in the city of Sioux Falls, employed the defendant to act as an attorney for them in securing or attempting to secure an ordinance from the city council granting the plaintiffs such license; that carrying out their purpose, * * * it became necessary for the plaintiffs to make a deposit with the city treasurer, and on said day the plaintiffs delivered to the defendant the sum of $2,500 to be by him deposited with the said treasurer of the city, and which money was so deposited * * *; that on or about the 4th day of

595

April the defendant received a further sum of $130, which was to be used by the defendant for these plaintiffs in securing or attempting to secure the said franchise; that the said franchise which plaintiffs were attempting to secure from said city was not granted to these plaintiffs, and thereupon, about the 17th day of April, the city treasurer returned to the defendant the said sum of $2,500 “as money belonging to these plaintiffs and for their use and benefit”; that on or about the same day the said defendant rendered to these plaintiffs an account of all moneys received by him for and on account of these plaintiffs, with an itemized statement of all disbursements, and in connection therewith a pretended charge for his services or fee of $1,250, and with said account was a draft drawn in favor of the plaintiffs for $1,012.25; that the pretended charge of the defendant of the sum of $1,250 as shown upon said account and alleged to be for services rendered by him is unjust, unlawful, and fraudulent, and the reasonable value of the services rendered by the defendant was not and is not of the value of more than $250; that of the moneys so received by the defendant for and on behalf of these plaintiffs and for their use and benefit there remains in his hands the sum of $1,000, which he has refused and still refuses to pay over to these plaintiffs, although frequently requested so to do, and “he has wrongfully and fraudulently converted to his own use the said sum of $1,000”; that on or about the 10th day of September, 1907, the plaintiffs demanded of the said defendant payment * * * “but the said defendant then and there refused and still refuses to pay the same or any part thereof to the plaintiffs and has wrongfully converted the same to his own use.” Wherefore “plaintiffs demand judgment against the said defendant for the sum of $1,000 and interest thereon from the 17th day of April, 1907, for the wrongful conversion of said property and for the costs of this action.” * * *

It is contended by the appellant that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in trover or conversion, for the reason that the complaint nowhere alleges ownership by the plaintiffs of the property alleged to have been converted at the time the action was brought; nor does it allege ownership or possession of the property in the plaintiffs at the time it is alleged to have been converted which is absolutely essential in the form of action. Assuming that the complaint in this case was intended to state an action for the conversion of this money by the defendant, it is clearly insufficient in not alleging that the plaintiffs, at the time the defendant is charged with having converted it, were the owners or in possession of the money so alleged to have been converted. * * * But it is somewhat difficult to determine from the complaint whether the plaintiffs intended that their action should be for a tort or one ex contractu, as the complaint seems to have been framed with a double aspect. Taking a general view of the allegations of the complaint, it would seem that the pleaders intended to state a cause of action as for money had and received; but looking at the complaint in another aspect, and giving effect to some of the allegations therein, it would seem that the pleaders intended it as an action in conversion, in the nature of the old action of trover. It is contended by the respondent, in support of the ruling of the court below upon the demurrer, that the action is to recover money had and received by the plaintiffs, and that the allegations contained in the complaint alleged [sic] the fraudulent conversion of the property, etc., may be treated as surplusage. Such a complaint, framed with a double aspect or to unite distinct and incongruous causes of actions, cannot be sustained on demurrer. While our Code has abolished forms of pleading, and only requires that the facts shall be stated in a plain and concise manner without unnecessary repetition, still the distinctions between actions as they formerly existed cannot be entirely ignored. In Pierce v. Carey, 37 Wis. 232, * * * Chief Justice Ryan, quotes with approval * * * Supervisors of Kewaunee County v. Decker, 30 Wis. 624, as follows: “Dixon, C.J. It would certainly be a most anomalous and hitherto unknown condition of the laws of pleading, were it established that the plaintiff in a civil action could file and serve a complaint, the particular nature and object of which no one could tell, but which might and should be held good, as a statement of two or three or more different and inconsistent causes of action, as one in tort, one upon money demand on contract, and one in equity, all combined or fused and moulded into one count or declaration, so that the defendant must await the accidents and events of trial, and until the plaintiff’s proofs are all in, before being informed with any certainty or definiteness, what he was called upon to meet. The proposition that a complaint, or any single count of it, may be so framed with a double, treble, or any number of aspects looking to so many distinct and incongruous causes of action, in order to hit the exigencies of the plaintiff’s case or any possible demands of his proofs at the trial, we must say, strikes us as something exceedingly novel in the rules of pleading. We do not think it is the law * * *.”

As before stated, it is contended by the respondents that these allegations for conversion, etc., may be treated as surplusage, and the complaint held good as an action in assumpsit for money had and received; but in our opinion we would not be justified in holding that these allegations constitute mere surplusage and might be disregarded by the court. To so hold would introduce into the law too much uncertainty and ambiguity in pleading which would have a tendency to mislead the courts and the opposing party. A complaint should be framed upon the theory that it is either a complaint in tort or one ex contractu, and the two theories cannot be combined in one action; neither can an action at law and an action in equity be combined in one count in the same action. As was stated in the headnote in the case of Supervisors of Kewaunee County v. Decker, supra: “ * * * On demurrer to a complaint, or any count thereof, the court must determine what cause of action such complaint or count is designed to state, and then whether it states facts sufficient to constitute such a cause of action; and, if not, the demurrer must be sustained, though facts may be stated sufficient to show that plaintiff has a cause of action of a different character.”

* * *

The order of the circuit court overruling the demurrer is reversed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.Reread the provision of the Field Code, p. 592, supra, that tells what a complaint shall contain. Is there language in that provision that lends support to the decision in the principal case?
- 2.Is it appropriate for a court to insist that plaintiff’s complaint is based on a theory that is not supported by the alleged facts, as in Jones v. Winsor, especially when the facts are adequate to support a different theory? Would your answer be different if the facts in the complaint were adequate to sustain either theory but the less apparent theory was the only one proved at trial? Is the result in Jones consistent with Section 159 of the Field Code, which is set out on p. 593, supra?

CONAUGHTY v. NICHOLS, 42 N.Y. 83 (1870). Plaintiff alleged that he had consigned goods to defendants for sale, that they had been sold for $690.82, and that after deducting the expenses of the sale there was due to plaintiff $618.43, that defendants had refused to pay this amount over to plaintiff and “have converted the same to their own use.” After trial, plaintiff moved to amend the complaint by striking the allegation of conversion, but this motion was denied by the referee who then nonsuited plaintiff “on the ground that the cause of action stated in the complaint was for a tort, and the proof established a cause of action upon contract.” The General Term reversed the judgment, and the court of appeals affirmed:

* * * If the words “and have converted the same to their own use” had been omitted in the complaint, it could not reasonably be contended, that the same was not adapted to the cause of action established by the evidence. The case, therefore, seems to be reduced to the proposition, whether the plaintiff, having alleged facts constituting a cause of action, and having sustained them by proof upon the trial, should have been nonsuited, because the pleading contained an allegation adapted to a complaint in an action ex delicto, and which was unnecessary to be stated or proved, to justify a recovery on contract. We are of opinion that no such rigid rule of construction in regard to pleading should prevail under the liberal system introduced by the Code.

* * * If the complaint in question had merely stated facts sufficient to authorize a recovery for a wrongful detention of the money, and upon the trial, the plaintiff had applied to amend by inserting facts appropriate to a cause of action on contract, and thereby changing the form and character of the action, the application should have been denied. That, however, was not the case, as the facts were fully stated, and the defendants apprized of what they were to meet upon the trial, and there was no pretense that they were surprised. If they chose to accept the complaint without moving to strike out any portion of it, or to compel the plaintiff to make it more definite, or to elect in regard to the form of action, they should not, upon the trial, have been allowed to prevent a recovery by the plaintiff of a judgment for the amount of his demand. * * * It is quite probable that the plaintiff intended, down to the trial, to recover against the defendants for a wrongful conversion of the proceeds of the sale of the property consigned to them, and doubtless the mistake should have been fatal but for the ample statement of facts contained in the complaint, which justified a recovery on contract for the amount of his demand. It does not follow that, because the parties go down to the trial upon a particular theory, which is not supported by the proof, the cause is to be dismissed, when there are facts alleged in the complaint, and sustained by the evidence, sufficient to justify a recovery upon a different theory or form of action. * * *

598

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

Is Conaughty consistent with Jones v. Winsor? “The reasoning of the Court in Conaughty v. Nichols that where the pleading is misleading the defendant should move to make it definite or to have the pleader elect between the possible theories, and that if he proceeds without doing so he is to be taken as fully understanding the pleading, seems very weak.” Whittier, The Theory of a Pleading, 8 Colum.L.Rev. 523, 534 (1908). Why? If you were preparing a complaint in New York after Conaughty, what lesson would you draw from the opinion in that case?

GARRITY V. STATE BOARD OF ADMINISTRATION

Supreme Court of Kansas, 1917.
99 Kan. 695, 162 P. 1167.

PORTER, J. * * * A demurrer to the petition was sustained; plaintiff elected to stand upon the petition and appeals.

The petition charges that in July, 1911, the board of regents of the state university, by its assistant curator of mammals, wrongfully and without plaintiff’s knowledge or consent, entered upon his farm in Wallace county and removed therefrom a large and valuable fossil, the property of plaintiff, and wrongfully converted it to the use and benefit of the board of regents and its successors, depositing the fossil in the museum of the university for exhibition and scientific purposes; that the fossil was of the value of $2,500, and plaintiff had received no compensation therefor. It is alleged that the board of administration is a board created by law for the government, management, and control of the university of Kansas, * * * and is the successor of the board of regents, subrogated to the rights, duties, and responsibilities of the board of regents, and subject to its obligations and liable for its debts and contracts. * * *

599

1.It is the defendants’ contention that both the original and the amended petition were subject to demurrer because, if they stated a cause of action at all, it was barred by the statute of limitations; that the action is one sounding in tort, and therefore barred by the two-year statute * * *. On the other hand the plaintiff claims the right to waive the tort and recover upon an implied promise to pay what the fossil is worth. We think, if [the] petition stated a cause of action against defendants, it must be held that sufficient facts were stated to authorize plaintiff to waive the tort and rely upon an implied promise to pay the value of the property converted. * * *

The two-year statute of limitations was therefore no bar to the action.

* * *

3.The principal question raised by the appeal is whether the action can be maintained against the board of administration, the original defendant. Prior to 1913 the state university was managed and controlled by a board of regents which was a body corporate created by the Legislature. It went out of existence when the act of 1913 placed the state educational institutions in control of the state board of administration, which was not made a body corporate. The act * * * provided that the board shall manage and control the property of the educational institutions named, including the state university, and conferred upon the board power “to execute trusts or other obligations now or hereafter committed to any of the said institutions * * *.” The power “to execute trusts or other obligations now or hereafter committed to any of * * * said institutions” cannot be construed so as to make either the board of administration or its members liable for a tort committed by the board of regents; and the plaintiff cannot, by waiving the tort, make either the board or its members liable upon the theory of an implied promise.

* * *

The judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Is Garrity, in either its statute-of-limitations aspect or its liability aspect, concerned with the theory of the pleading? In what way, if any, is the problem in Garrity different?

600

2.Why did the court hold that the action was in contract for purposes of the statute of limitations but in tort for purposes of deciding whether the Board was liable for the Regents’ action?

3.Governments generally are immune from suit except as their immunity has been expressly waived by statute. ¹ Suits in contract were more commonly consented to than suits in tort. See 3 Davis, Administrative Law Treatise § 25.01 (1958). Under a statute consenting to suit in contract only, should a plaintiff be permitted to “waive” a tort and sue in “assumpsit”?

4. In a contract action, may a claim for money had and received based upon a conversion be brought as a counterclaim under a statute that provides that “in an action on contract, any other cause of action on contract” may be brought as a counterclaim? See Manhattan Egg Co. v. Seaboard Terminal & Refrig. Co., 137 Misc. 14, 242 N.Y.S. 189 (N.Y. City Ct. 1929).

3.THE ARRIVAL OF MODERN PROCEDURE

Modern procedure arrived on September 16, 1938, when the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure came into effect. The adoption of the Federal Rules followed an extended period of agitation for uniform procedural rules in the federal district courts and for uniting the procedure of law and equity under one form of action. In 1934, Congress passed the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2072, authorizing the United States Supreme Court to promulgate rules of procedure for the district courts. On June 3, 1935, the Supreme Court appointed an Advisory Committee of distinguished lawyers and law professors to prepare and submit a draft of unified rules. The Committee prepared and received public comments on two published drafts. It submitted its final report to the Supreme Court in November 1937. The Supreme Court carefully reviewed and made a number of changes in the rules recommended by the Committee. The rules as adopted by the Court on December 20, 1937, were transmitted to the Attorney General and were submitted by him to the 75th Congress on January 3, 1938. Pursuant to the terms of the Rules Enabling Act, the rules came into effect when the Congress adjourned without taking action to postpone their effective date. See generally Burbank, The Rules Enabling Act of 1934, 130 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1015 (1982).

The chief characteristics of the Federal Rules were intended to be common sense, simplicity, and flexibility of procedure, with the goal of providing a uniform set of rules for all substantive areas of law. The original version of Rule 1 stated that the purpose of the rules was “to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action and proceeding.” Some of the major aspects in which the Rules advanced federal practice were the union of law and equity as one form of action, the simplification of pleadings and issues, pretrial procedure, discovery, and trial reforms. See Subrin, How Equity Conquered Common Law: The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in Historical Perspective, 135 U.Pa.L.Rev. 909 (1987). Over time, the federal rules have become more complex, substantively-specific, and less uniform. See Marcus, The Past, Present, and Future of Trans-Substantivity in Federal Civil Procedure, 59 De Paul L.Rev. 371 (2010); Bone, The Process of Making Process: Court Rulemaking, Democratic Legitimacy, and Procedural Efficacy, 87 Geo.L.J. 887 (1999).

601

NOTE

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have had a strong impact on court procedures in most of the states. Nonetheless, state rules of civil procedure still vary greatly. Some states had adopted code systems similar to New York’s Field Code, others modeled their rules after the Federal Rules, and others maintained common law rules. Most states have been influenced by two or more of these models and have adopted elements of each. For example, some states, such as Delaware and New Jersey, have maintained separate court systems for law and for equity, yet they have abandoned common law pleading. For a state-by-state discussion, see Oakley, A Fresh Look at the Federal Rules in State Courts, 3 Nev.L.J. 354 (2003); and Oakley & Coon, The Federal Rules in State Courts: A Survey of State Court Systems of Civil Procedure, 61 Wash.L.Rev. 1367 (1986). The practice of state procedure also has had an effect on the development and amendment of the Federal Rules, and the process of reform continues to draw from state procedural experiences. See Koeltl, Progress in the Spirit of Rule 1, 60 Duke L.J. 537, 541 (2010).

This edition is based upon Stephen’s own second edition of 1827, which is the last of his editions before the reform of common law pleading in England in 1834.

^bSee Lea, Superstition and Force 252, 279 (3d ed. 1878). In ordeal by water, it was thought that the water would reject the evildoer; a rope was tied to the person making the proof in the hope that if proved innocent he could be kept from drowning.

^cA similar desire to avoid trial by combat was among the causes for the desuetude of the writ of right, once the most important action. Preference for jury trial also encouraged the expanding jurisdiction of royal courts at the expense of the feudal courts since the jury was found only in the former.

^dFor a time in the fourteenth century it seemed that wager of law might be denied when the facts were well known to witnesses, but this development aborted. Fifoot, History and Sources of the Common Law—Tort and Contract 28–29 (1949). By the last quarter of the sixteenth century, however, “a defendant proposing to wage his law was somehow examined and admonished.” Milsom, Historical Foundations of the Common Law 292–93 (1969).

^eAfter a successful demurrer to a dilatory plea, judgment was not entered for plaintiff, but by an order respondeat ouster, defendant was directed to plead over.

^fThis privilege was widely used because of the strictness of the rule against variances between pleading and proof. A good example of the prohibition on variances is Latham v. Rutley, 2 B. & C. 20, 107 Eng.Rep. 290 (K.B. 1823). Plaintiff who had pleaded breach of a contract to carry and deliver goods safely was nonsuited because he proved a contract to carry and deliver goods safely, fire and robbery excepted, even though the verdict established that the loss was not caused by either fire or robbery.

^gPlaintiff’s equivalent to the plea of the general issue, the replication de injuria, was less frequently available, and in most cases plaintiff was permitted to seize on only one facet of the plea. The most famous illustration is Crogate’s Case, 8 Coke 66b, 77 Eng.Rep. 574 (K.B. 1608), which forms the basis for a brilliant satire on the common law system. Hayes, Crogate’s Case: A Dialogue in Ye Shades on Special Pleading, in 9 Holdsworth, A History of English Law 417 (2d ed. 1938).

^hThe textual discussion is limited to states with a common law heritage. Louisiana had adopted a system based on Spanish law with only one form of action by 1812, the year it was admitted to the Union. Texas experimented briefly with separate systems but by 1845 had a unitary system based on Spanish-Mexican jurisprudence.

ⁱThe New York legislature added several sections to the Code in 1849, and renumbered the provisions first enacted in 1848 with some very slight changes in language. N.Y. Laws 1849, c. 438. Because the 1849 version became the best known, it is used here. Section numbers in brackets refer to the sections of the 1848 Code.

^jIt was not until the late nineteenth century that the United States waived its immunity to contract disputes, see Tucker Act, Ch. 359, 24 Stat. 505 (1887) (codified as amended in scattered sections of 28 U.S.C., and especially 28 U.S.C. § 1346(a)(2) & § 1491). In the mid-twentieth century, the United States waived its immunity in tort actions, see Federal Tort Claims Act of 1946, Ch. 753, 60 Stat. 843 (codified as amended in scattered sections of 28 U.S.C.). See 14 Wright, Miller & Hershkoff, Federal Practice and Procedure §§ 3651–3660.1 (4th ed.).

CHAPTER 8

MODERN PLEADING

This chapter explores modern pleading rules and how they relate to other aspects of pretrial practice. Federal Rule 8, which governs pleading, calls for a short and plain statement of the claim, which, if established, entitles the pleader to relief. This rule, combined with the requirement of a certification under Federal Rule 11 that the pleadings are not frivolous, was considered sufficient to provide notice to defendant, to set out the facts, to narrow the issues, and to deter the filing of baseless claims that may clog a court’s calendar and harass an opponent. Over the last two decades, the Supreme Court has reoriented this pleading regime to heighten the complaint’s screening function. As you read these materials, consider whether this doctrinal shift reflects an appropriate response to unwarranted litigation or, as Professor Miller has written, an excessive emphasis on cost reduction that in some cases blocks even meritorious claims from obtaining relief. See Miller, Simplified Pleading, Meaningful Days in Court, and Trials on the Merits: Reflections on the Deformation of Federal Procedure, 88 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 286 (2013).

A. THE COMPLAINT

1.PLEADING AT COMMON LAW

Pleading rules in the United States owe their origins to the manner of allegation that developed in the English royal courts during the medieval period. See Chapter 7, supra. At common law, a person with a grievance against another sought justice from the king, and the king issued a writ, ordering the sheriff to bring the other person before the king’s judges to answer the complaint. During the twelfth century, this pattern became standardized. When it became established that the king’s courts would hear a particular kind of case, the complainant could obtain a writ from the king’s chief minister, the chancellor, as a matter of course. The writ was the document that commenced the action, similar in function to the modern summons. Each writ came to embody a form of action, a concept that governed the method of commencing the suit, the substantive requirements of the case, the manner of trial, and the type of sanction that would attend the eventual judgment. If plaintiff selected a writ that did not fit the dispute, the action would fail. Sir Henry Maine famously stated that the common law developed “in the interstices of Procedure,” as courts adapted the royal writs to recognize new rights and remedies. Maine, Early Law and Custom 389 (1886).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.At comm on law, plaintiff’s claim was set forth in the declaration. Stripped of much verbiage, and stated in modern English, it might have said: “Defendant promised to deliver a horse to plaintiff and plaintiff promised to pay 100 dollars for it, but defendant has refused to deliver the horse.”

2.A substantive response to a claim, other than an expression of total agreement, would require defendant to demur or to plead. A demurrer would challenge the legal sufficiency of plaintiff’s declaration. If defendant did not demur, he responded to the declaration in a plea. Pleas were of two types, dilatory and peremptory. A dilatory plea did not deny the merits of plaintiff’s claim, but rather challenged plaintiff’s right to have the court hear the case and included various pleas to the jurisdiction of the court. A peremptory plea, or plea in bar, was on the merits.

3.If defendant entered a plea, plaintiff had three choices. First, plaintiff could demur on the ground that the plea did not state a valid defense. For example, if plaintiff had alleged a breach of contract and defendant had pleaded that he was a minor at the time the contract was entered into, the demurrer would raise the question whether defendant’s minority was a defense. Second, plaintiff could plead in a replication that defendant had not been a minor. Or, finally, plaintiff might have admitted that defendant had been a minor and pleaded, by way of confession and avoidance, that defendant had lied about his age.

2.DETAIL REQUIRED UNDER THE CODES

In the United States, New York took the lead in reforming common law pleading. In 1848, that state’s legislature enacted a Code of Civil Procedure, commonly called the Field Code. The Field Code proved to be a prototype for codes in numerous other states; at one time more than half the states had codes patterned after the Field Code. This Code also was a precursor to the Federal Rules.

Code pleading differed from the writ system by requiring the pleader to allege a statement of facts constituting the cause of action for which relief was sought. In theory, code pleading operated according to the logic of a syllogism: The allegations provided the minor premise, the law provided the major premise, and the court provided the conclusion. See Julian, Charles E. Clark and Simple Pleading: Against a “Formalism of Generality,” 104 Nw.U.L.Rev. 1179, 1186 (2010). In practice, code pleading became mired in technicality, for it was not simple to know what facts to state. Professor Clark, the key architect of the Federal Rules, criticized the codes as resting on a “vain attempt to restrict the pleading to only ‘the ultimate facts,’ excluding on the one hand evidential facts and on the other legal conclusions.” Clark, Pleading Negligence, 32 Yale L.J. 483, 484 (1923).

605

Code pleading persists in some states, requiring a “statement of facts” constituting a “cause of action” or demonstrating a “right to relief.” Is there a difference between these formulations? Some state provisions call for a statement of “ultimate facts.” A number of these codes soften any harsh results of technical enforcement by stating that a pleading is satisfactory if it gives “fair notice” to the opposing party.

COOK, STATEMENTS OF FACT IN PLEADING UNDER THE CODES, 21 Colum.L.Rev. 416, 416–19, 423 (1921) (footnotes omitted):

In * * * [California Packing Corp. v. Kelly Storage & Distributing Co., 228 N.Y. 49, 126 N.E. 269 (1920)] the plaintiff alleged in his complaint that the promise for the breach of which he was suing was made in exchange for “a valuable consideration.” The case went to the Court of Appeals upon the question whether this allegation is a “statement of fact” or a “conclusion of law.” [The court held it was the former.] * * * An examination of the authorities in [New York and] other code jurisdictions reveals a conflict of authority. * * *

* * *

[Upon careful analysis] * * * it will appear at once that there is no logical distinction between statements which are grouped by the courts under the phrases “statements of fact” and “conclusions of law.” It will also be found that many, although by no means all, pleadings held bad because they are said to plead “evidence” rather than “the facts constituting the cause of action” or defense really do nevertheless “state” the operative facts which the pleader will have to prove at the trial, but in a form different from that to which courts and lawyers are accustomed to recognize as a proper method of pleading. * * *

* * *

The facts of life which compose the group of “operative facts” to which the law attaches legal consequences are always specific and not generic. * * * [I]n an action on the case for, let us say, negligently injuring the plaintiff by the operation of an automobile, the “operative” or “ultimate” facts proved at the trial will always be specific. It will appear that the defendant was driving a particular kind of automobile at some particular rate of speed, etc., etc. If now a plaintiff were to state the facts thus specifically in his complaint he would doubtless be told by the average court that he had “pleaded his evidence” and not the “facts constituting the cause of action.” This would of course be erroneous. What is according to accepted notions the proper way to plead is merely a mode of stating the facts generically rather than specifically.

606

It must of course be recognized that at times a pleader really does err by “pleading evidence,” i.e., by stating, generically or specifically, facts which do not form part of the group of operative facts, but are merely facts from which by some process of logical inference the existence of the operative facts can be inferred. More often, however, the “error” consists merely in pleading the operative facts more specifically than is usual.

* * * Let us now examine “conclusions of law.” The first thing noticed upon analysis is that a so-called “conclusion of law” is a generic statement which can be made only after some legal rule has been applied to some specific group of operative facts. Consider, for example, a statement in a pleading that “defendant owes plaintiff $500.” Standing by itself in a pleading this is usually treated as a mere “conclusion of law.” It can, however, be made only when one knows certain facts and also the applicable legal rule. It is, in fact, the conclusion of a logical argument: Whenever certain facts, a, b, c, etc., exist, B (defendant) owes A (plaintiff) $500; facts a, b, c, etc., exist; therefore B owes A $500. This being so, when the bare statement is made that “B owes A $500” we may, if we wish, regard it as a statement in generic form that all the facts necessary to create the legal duty to pay money described by the word “owe” are true as between A and B. In dealing, for example, with misrepresentation, such statements are more often than otherwise regarded in exactly this way. The same statement may, however, under proper circumstances be merely a statement as to the law applicable to facts given or known, and so be purely a statement of a “conclusion of law.” * * *

* * *

* * * How specific or how generic statements in a pleading may and must be can obviously not be settled by mere logic, but according to notions of fairness and convenience. The pleading should give the adversary and the court reasonable notice of the real nature of the claim or defense; nothing more should be required. * * *

In GILLISPIE v. GOODYEAR SERVICE STORES, 258 N.C. 487, 128 S.E.2d 762 (1963), plaintiff alleged:

[T]he defendants, without cause or just excuse and maliciously came upon and trespassed upon the premises occupied by the plaintiff as a residence, and by the use of harsh and threatening language and physical force directed against the plaintiff assaulted the plaintiff and placed her in great fear, and humiliated and embarrassed her by subjecting her to public scorn and ridicule, and caused her to be seized and exhibited to the public as a prisoner, and to be confined in a public jail, all to her great humiliation, embarrassment and harm.

607

Id. at 487, 128 S.E.2d at 763. Under the North Carolina code then in force, plaintiff was required to provide a “plain and concise statement of the facts constituting a cause of action.” North Carolina cases interpreting the pleading standard had stated that the complaint must “disclose the issuable facts” and allege “the material, essential and ultimate facts upon which plaintiff’s right of action is based.” The court held that the allegations were insufficient, noting that the pleading was necessary not only to enable the opposing party to respond but also to enable the court to declare the law upon the facts stated. The court could not do so if “a mere legal conclusion” such as “assault” or “trespass” was stated. The court concluded:

The complaint states no facts upon which * * * legal conclusions may be predicated. Plaintiff’s allegations do not disclose what occurred, when it occurred, where it occurred, who did what, the relationships between defendants and plaintiff or of defendants inter se, or any other factual data that might identify the occasion or describe the circumstances of the alleged wrongful conduct of defendants.

Id. at 490, 128 S.E.2d at 766.

The court also discussed the sufficiency of pleadings in other types of cases:

When a complaint alleges defendant is indebted to plaintiff in a certain amount and such debt is due, but does not allege in what manner or for what cause defendant became indebted to plaintiff, it is demurrable for failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. * * *

“In an action or defense based upon negligence, it is not sufficient to allege the mere happening of an event of an injurious nature and call it negligence on the part of the party sought to be charged. This is necessarily so because negligence is not a fact in itself, but is the legal result of certain facts. Therefore, the facts which constitute the negligence charged and also the facts which establish such negligence as the proximate cause, or as one of the proximate causes, of the injury must be alleged.” Shives v. Sample, 238 N.C. 724, 79 S.E.2d 193 (1953).

Id. at 489–90, 128 S.E.2d at 765.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Under the codes, a complaint could be defective as a matter of fact or of law. Writing in 1947, Professor Clark observed: “Quite commonly an allegation has been held bad as a statement of law only. The stating of evidence, while subject to criticism, is not so often held to render the pleading bad, since the court itself will draw the ultimate conclusion where it is the one necessarily following from the allegations made.” Clark, Code Pleading § 38 (2d ed. 1947). Is it so clear when an ultimate conclusion will “necessarily follow” from the statement of facts? Compare Robinson v. Meyer, 135 Conn. 691, 693–94, 68 A.2d 142, 143 (1949), in which the court inferred title by adverse possession on the basis of allegations of “all the facts necessary to establish ouster,” with O’Regan v. Schermerhorn, 25 N.J. Misc. 1, 50 A.2d 10 (Sup.Ct.1946), in which the court refused to infer the defense of truth in a defamation suit when defendant alleged he believed the statement to be true and further alleged the facts on which that belief was based.

608

2.Is the court in Gillispie legitimately concerned with the inability of defendants to ascertain the claims against them in order that they might answer and prepare their defenses? Can it be said that the pleading in Gillispie is unsatisfactory because the trial judge will not know what evidence is or is not relevant?

3.To what extent might the court in Gillispie have been motivated by the notion that a detailed account of the facts might show that plaintiff did not have a valid claim for relief? Is it significant that at the time of the Gillispie decision North Carolina did not have a provision for summary judgment, which allows a party to challenge an opponent’s allegations that lack evidentiary support? Has the North Carolina court simply followed a hard and fast line concerning the “fact” pleading requirement, thereby undermining its basic purpose as a device for pretrial communication?

4.Plaintiff was given leave to amend the complaint after the Gillispie decision. Suppose that plaintiff’s amended complaint also is deficient. Will she be given leave to amend again? How should the right to amend affect the question of whether a pleading is satisfactory?

3.DETAIL REQUIRED UNDER THE FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 8(a) and 12(b) in the Supplement.

DIOGUARDI V. DURNING

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1944.
139 F.2d 774.

CLARK, CIRCUIT JUDGE. In his complaint, obviously home drawn, plaintiff attempts to assert a series of grievances against the Collector of Customs at the Port of New York growing out of his endeavors to import merchandise from Italy “of great value,” consisting of bottles of “tonics.” We may pass certain of his claims as either inadequate or inadequately stated and consider only these two: (1) that on the auction day, October 9, 1940, when defendant sold the merchandise at “public custom,” “he sold my merchandise to another bidder with my price of $110, and not of his price of $120,” and (2) “that three weeks before the sale, two cases, of 19 bottles each case, disappeared.” Plaintiff does not make wholly clear how these goods came into the collector’s hands, since he alleges compliance with the revenue laws; but he does say he made a claim for “refund of merchandise which was two-thirds paid in Milano, Italy,” and that the collector denied the claim. These and other circumstances alleged indicate (what, indeed, plaintiff’s brief asserts) that his original dispute was with his consignor as to whether anything more was due upon the merchandise, and that the collector, having held it for a year (presumably as unclaimed merchandise under 19 U.S.C.A. § 1491), then sold it, or such part of it as was left, at public auction. For his asserted injuries plaintiff claimed $5,000 damages, together with interest and costs, against the defendant individually and as collector. This complaint was dismissed by the District Court, with leave, however, to plaintiff to amend, on motion of the United States Attorney, appearing for the defendant, on the ground that it “fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.”

609

Thereupon plaintiff filed an amended complaint, wherein, with an obviously heightened conviction that he was being unjustly treated, he vigorously reiterates his claims, including those quoted above and now stated as that his “medicinal extracts” were given to the Springdale Distilling Company “with my betting [bidding?] price of $110: and not their price of $120,” and “It isn’t so easy to do away with two cases with 37 bottles of one quart. Being protected, they can take this chance.” An earlier paragraph suggests that defendant had explained the loss of the two cases by “saying that they had leaked, which could never be true in the manner they were bottled.” On defendant’s motion for dismissal on the same ground as before, the court made a final judgment dismissing the complaint, and plaintiff now comes to us with increased volubility, if not clarity.

It would seem, however, that he has stated enough to withstand a mere formal motion, directed only to the face of the complaint, and that here is another instance of judicial haste which in the long run makes waste. Under the new rules of civil procedure, there is no pleading requirement of stating “facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action,” but only that there be “a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,” * * *. Rule 12(b) is for failure to state “a claim upon which relief can be granted.” The District Court does not state why it concluded that the complaints showed no claim upon which relief could be granted; and the United States Attorney’s brief before us does not help us, for it is limited to the prognostication—unfortunately ill founded so far as we are concerned—that “the most cursory examination” of them will show the correctness of the District Court’s action.

610

We think that, however inartistically they may be stated, the plaintiff has disclosed his claims that the collector has converted or otherwise done away with two of his cases of medicinal tonics and has sold the rest in a manner incompatible with the public auction he had announced—and, indeed, required by 19 U.S.C.A. § 1491, above cited, and the Treasury Regulations promulgated under it * * *. As to this latter claim, it may be that the collector’s only error is a failure to collect an additional ten dollars from the Springdale Distilling Company; but giving the plaintiff the benefit of reasonable intendments in his allegations (as we must on this motion), the claim appears to be in effect that he was actually the first bidder at the price for which they were sold, and hence was entitled to the merchandise. Of course, defendant did not need to move on the complaint alone; he could have disclosed the facts from his point of view, in advance of a trial if he chose, by asking for a pre-trial hearing or by moving for a summary judgment with supporting affidavits. But, as it stands, we do not see how the plaintiff may properly be deprived of his day in court to show what he obviously so firmly believes and what for present purposes defendant must be taken as admitting. * * *

On remand, the District Court may find substance in other claims asserted by plaintiff, which include a failure properly to catalogue the items (as the cited Regulations provide), or to allow plaintiff to buy at a discount from the catalogue price just before the auction sale (a claim whose basis is not apparent), and a violation of an agreement to deliver the merchandise to the plaintiff as soon as he paid for it, by stopping the payments. In view of plaintiff’s limited ability to write and speak English, it will be difficult for the District Court to arrive at justice unless he consents to receive legal assistance in the presentation of his case. The record indicates that he refused further help from a lawyer suggested by the court, and his brief (which was a recital of facts, rather than an argument of law) shows distrust of a lawyer of standing at this bar. It is the plaintiff’s privilege to decline all legal help * * *; but we fear that he will be indeed ill advised to attempt to meet a motion for summary judgment or other similar presentation of the merits without competent advice and assistance.

Judgment is reversed and the action is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Dioguar di’s amended complaint read as follows:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK
JOHN DIOGUARDI
Plaintiff,
-against-
HARRY M. DURNING Individually and as Collector of Customs at the Port of New York Defendant
Plaintiff, as and for his bill of amended complaint the defendant, respectfully alleges:
FIRST: I want justice done on the basis of my medicinal extracts which have disappeared saying that they had leaked, which could never be true in the manner they were bottled.
SECOND: Mr. E.G. Collord Clerk in Charge, promised to give me my merchandise as soon as I paid for it. Then all of a sudden payments were stopped.
THIRD: Then, he didn’t want to sell me my merchandise at catalogue price with the 5% off, which was very important to me, after I had already paid $5,000 for them, beside a few other expenses.
FOURTH: Why was the medicinally given to the Springdale Distilling Co. with my betting price of $110; and not their price of $120.
FIFTH: It isn’t so easy to do away with two cases with 37 bottles of one quart. Being protected, they can take this chance.
SIXTH: No one can stop my rights upon my merchandise, because of both the duly and the entry.
WHEREFORE: Plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant, individually and as Collector of Customs at the Port of New York, in the sum of Five Thousand Dollars ($5,000) together with interest from the respective dates of payment as set forth herein, together with the costs and disbursements of this action.

What facts did Dioguardi’s complaint allege? Did it articulate a legal theory of relief? Although Judge Clark’s opinion identified a conversion claim, did the complaint ever allege that the Collector of Customs took plaintiff’s tonic? On what basis did the Court of Appeals draw the inferences needed to uphold the sufficiency of the complaint and permit plaintiff to proceed to discovery to prove his allegations? The Dioguardi decision was sharply criticized in McCaskill, The Modern Philosophy of Pleading: A Dialogue Outside the Shades, 38 A.B.A.J. 123 (1952), which became a focal point of opposition to the notice pleading standard introduced by the Federal Rules.

2. How would Dioguardi have been decided in a code jurisdiction that requires a statement of “facts constituting a cause of action”?

3. The burden of pleading determines which party is required to introduce an issue into the litigation by alleging the matter in the pleading. See Hamabe, Functions of Rule 12(b)(6) in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: A Categorization Approach, 15 Campbell L.Rev. 119, 172 (1993). If the burden is assigned to plaintiff, then the complaint must allege the issue, and if plaintiff fails to do so, the complaint is vulnerable to dismissal for failure to state a claim. If the burden is assigned to defendant, then defendant must raise the issue as an affirmative defense, and if defendant fails to do so, defendant will be barred from proving that defense at trial. Generally, the burden of pleading is assigned to the party who has the burden of proof on that issue at trial, but the burdens do not always coincide. It often is said that plaintiff must plead an issue that is essential to the case. Isn’t this circular? Should plaintiff have to plead the nonexistence of defenses that defendant potentially has and might raise? Lee, Pleading and Proof: The Economics of Legal Burdens, 1997 B.Y.U.L.Rev. 1.

4. By surviving a motion to dismiss, plaintiff in Dioguardi met the burden of pleading. But that does not mean that plaintiff won the lawsuit. Rather, the case would now move forward to discovery and to resolution on the merits. See Clark, Simplified Pleading, 2 F.R.D. 456 (1941).

In CONLEY v. GIBSON, 355 U.S. 41, 78 S.Ct. 99, 2 L.Ed.2d 80 (1957), the Supreme Court cited Dioguardi and expressed its views on the degree of detail required by Rule 8(a). Justice Black’s opinion for a unanimous Court stated:

* * * In appraising the sufficiency of the complaint we follow, of course, the accepted rule that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief. * * *

* * * [T]he Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not require a claimant to set out in detail the facts upon which he bases his claim. To the contrary, all the Rules require is “a short and plain statement of the claim” that will give the defendant fair notice of what the plaintiff’s claim is and the grounds upon which it rests. The illustrative forms appended to the Rules plainly demonstrate this. Such simplified “notice pleading” is made possible by the liberal opportunity for discovery and the other pretrial procedures established by the Rules to disclose more precisely the basis of both claim and defense and to define more narrowly the disputed facts and issues. * * * [W]e have no doubt that petitioners’ complaint adequately set forth a claim and gave the respondents fair notice of its basis. The Federal Rules reject the approach that pleading is a game of skill in which one misstep by counsel may be decisive to the outcome and accept the principle that the purpose of pleading is to facilitate a proper decision on the merits. * * *

Id. at 45–48, 78 S.Ct. 102–03, 2 L.Ed.2d at 84–86.

NOTE AND QUESTION

The Conley litigation was brought by a group of Black workers alleging that their union had discriminated against them in violation of its duty of fair representation under the federal Railway Labor Act. See Sherwin, The Story of Conley: Precedent by Accident, in Civil Procedure Stories 282 (Clermont ed., 2d ed. 2008). Research drawn from Justice Black’s papers suggests how the Conley standard developed:

The “no set of facts” language appears in Black’s initial draft and there is no suggestion in the papers that it was viewed within the Court as controversial in any way. * * * [The language] was borrowed from extant commentary of the time * * * [and] Black’s draft * * * cited Moore’s Federal Practice for the proposition. The Court’s final decision substituted three case citations for Moore’s. But the powerful closing paragraph of the Court’s decision underwent some interesting evolution, first at Black’s hand and then in response to a request from Justice John Marshall Harlan. After some revising, the paragraph appeared as follows when first printed and circulated within the Court on November 13, 1957:

The Federal Rules reject the approach that pleading is a game of skill in which one misstep by counsel may be decisive to the outcome and accept the principle that pleadings simply serve as a useful means to facilitate a proper decision on the merits. . . . Under the Rules the best cause, not the cleverest pleader, is to prevail.

Black received the following note from Harlan later that same day:

Dear Hugo:

As you know, I have more of a yen for procedural rules than you have, and this leads me to ask you to consider omitting the last two sentences in the run-over paragraph on page 7. In suggesting this, I am prompted by two considerations; first, that what you say there is not at all necessary to your opinion, and second, that I like your opinion and want to be able to join it.

While I agree that we have moved a long distance away from the technicalities of common law and code pleading—and properly so—I think that proper pleading still has its place in the sound administration of justice!

Sincerely,

JMH./s/

Black responded with the final language, which revised the next to last sentence of his opinion and dropped the last. * * *

Gavil, Civil Rights and Civil Procedure: The Legacy of Conley v. Gibson, 52 How.L.J. 1, 10–12 (2008). How would the omitted language have affected the Conley pleading standard?

SWIERKIEWICZ v. SOREMA N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002), addressed whether a complaint in an employment discrimination lawsuit “must contain specific facts establishing a prima facie case of discrimination.” In a unanimous opinion for the Court, Justice Thomas wrote that “an employment discrimination complaint need not include such facts and instead must contain only ‘a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.’ ” The opinion explained:

Petitioner Akos Swierkiewicz is a native of Hungary, who at the time of his complaint was 53 years old. * * * In April 1989, petitioner began working for respondent Sorema N. A., a reinsurance company headquartered in New York and principally owned and controlled by a French parent corporation. Petitioner was initially employed in the position of senior vice president and chief underwriting officer (CUO). Nearly six years later, Francois M. Chavel, respondent’s Chief Executive Officer, demoted petitioner to a marketing and services position and transferred the bulk of his underwriting responsibilities to Nicholas Papadopoulos, a 32-year-old who, like Mr. Chavel, is a French national. About a year later, Mr. Chavel stated that he wanted to “energize” the underwriting department and appointed Mr. Papadopoulos as CUO. Petitioner claims that Mr. Papadopoulos had only one year of underwriting experience at the time he was promoted, and therefore was less experienced and less qualified to be CUO than he, since at that point he had 26 years of experience in the insurance industry.

Following his demotion, petitioner contends that he “was isolated by Mr. Chavel . . . and excluded from business decisions and meetings and denied the opportunity to reach his true potential at SOREMA.” * * * ^b Petitioner unsuccessfully attempted to meet with Mr. Chavel to discuss his discontent. Finally, in April 1997, petitioner sent a memo to Mr. Chavel outlining his grievances and requesting a severance package. Two weeks later, respondent’s general counsel presented petitioner with two options: He could either resign without a severance package or be dismissed. Mr. Chavel fired petitioner after he refused to resign.

615

Petitioner filed a lawsuit alleging that he had been terminated on account of his national origin in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 * * * and on account of his age in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 (ADEA) * * *. The United States District Court for the Southern District of New York dismissed petitioner’s complaint because it found that he “ha[d] not adequately alleged a prima facie case, in that he ha[d] not adequately alleged circumstances that support an inference of discrimination.” * * * The * * * Second Circuit affirmed * * *. We granted certiorari, * * * and now reverse.

Applying Circuit precedent, the Court of Appeals required petitioner to plead a prima facie case of discrimination in order to survive respondent’s motion to dismiss. * * * [P]etitioner was thus required to allege in his complaint: (1) membership in a protected group; (2) qualification for the job in question; (3) an adverse employment action; and (4) circumstances that support an inference of discrimination. * * *

The prima facie case * * *, however, is an evidentiary standard, not a pleading requirement. * * * [T]his Court has reiterated that the prima facie case relates to the employee’s burden of presenting evidence that raises an inference of discrimination. * * *

* * * [U]nder a notice pleading system, it is not appropriate to require a plaintiff to plead facts establishing a prima facie case because * * * [this] framework does not apply in every employment discrimination case. For instance, if a plaintiff is able to produce direct evidence of discrimination, he may prevail without proving all the elements of a prima facie case. * * * Under the Second Circuit’s heightened pleading standard, a plaintiff without direct evidence of discrimination at the time of his complaint must plead a prima facie case of discrimination, even though discovery might uncover such direct evidence. It thus seems incongruous to require a plaintiff, in order to survive a motion to dismiss, to plead more facts than he may ultimately need to prove to succeed on the merits if direct evidence of discrimination is discovered.

616

* * *

Applying the relevant standard, petitioner’s complaint easily satisfies the requirements of Rule 8(a) because it gives respondent fair notice of the basis for petitioner’s claims. Petitioner alleged that he had been terminated on account of his national origin in violation of Title VII and on account of his age in violation of the ADEA. * * * His complaint detailed the events leading to his termination, provided relevant dates, and included the ages and nationalities of at least some of the relevant persons involved with his termination. * * * In addition, they state claims upon which relief could be granted under Title VII and the ADEA.

Respondent argues that allowing lawsuits based on conclusory allegations of discrimination to go forward will burden the courts and encourage disgruntled employees to bring unsubstantiated suits. * * * Whatever the practical merits of this argument, the Federal Rules do not contain a heightened pleading standard for employment discrimination suits. * * * Furthermore, Rule 8(a) establishes a pleading standard without regard to whether a claim will succeed on the merits. * * *

534 U.S. at 508–12, 122 S.Ct. 995–99, 152 L.Ed.2d at 7–11.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Would a complaint alleging a violation of Title VII, the statute at issue in Swierkiewicz, be sufficient if it stated, “I was denied employment because of my gender”? See Sparrow v. United Air Lines, Inc., 216 F.3d 1111, 1115 (D.C. Cir. 2000). What additional facts did Swierkiewicz include in his complaint?
 2. Prior to Swierkiewicz, the Court in LEATHERMAN v. TARRANT COUNTY NARCOTICS INTELLIGENCE & COORDINATION UNIT, 507 U.S. 163, 113 S.Ct. 1160, 122 L.Ed.2d 517 (1993), unanimously held that Federal Rule 8 did not impose a heightened pleading standard on civil rights complaints filed under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The Court made clear that changes to the pleading standard to require more detailed allegations would have to go through the formal process for amending the Federal Rules:
- Perhaps if Rules 8 and 9 were rewritten today, claims against municipalities under § 1983 might be subjected to the added specificity requirement of Rule 9(b). But that is a result which must be obtained by the process of amending the Federal Rules, and not by judicial interpretation. In the absence of such an amendment, federal courts and litigants must rely on summary judgment and control of discovery to weed out unmeritorious claims sooner rather than later.

617

Id. at 168–69, 113 S.Ct. at 1163, 122 L.Ed.2d at 524. See Marcus, The Puzzling Persistence of Pleading Practice, 76 Tex.L.Rev. 1749 (1998).

Read the complaint in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, which is reproduced in the Supplement.

BELL ATLANTIC CORP. v. TWOMBLY

Supreme Court of the United States, 2007.
550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

I

* * *

[Plaintiffs, subscribers to local telephone services, filed a class action against the major telephone companies in the United States sometimes called Incumbent Local Exchange Carriers (hereinafter ILECs), alleging that they had violated Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act through efforts (1) to inhibit the growth of competitive local exchange carriers (hereinafter CLECs) and (2) to eliminate competition among themselves in territories where any one was dominant.]

* * *

The United States District Court for the Southern District of New York dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The District Court acknowledged that “plaintiffs may allege a conspiracy by citing instances of parallel business behavior that suggest an agreement,” but emphasized that “while ‘[c]ircumstantial evidence of consciously parallel behavior may have made heavy inroads into the traditional judicial attitude toward conspiracy[, . . .]’ “conscious parallelism” has not yet read conspiracy out of the Sherman Act entirely.’ ” 313 F.Supp.2d 174, 179 (2003) * * *. Thus, the District Court understood that allegations of parallel business conduct, taken alone, do not state a claim under § 1; plaintiffs must allege additional facts that “ten[d] to exclude independent self-interested conduct as an explanation for defendants’ parallel behavior.” * * * The District Court found plaintiffs’ allegations of parallel ILEC actions to discourage competition inadequate because “the behavior of each ILEC in resisting the incursion of CLECs is fully explained by the ILEC’s own interests in defending its individual territory.” * * * As to the ILECs’ supposed agreement against competing with each other, the District Court found that the complaint does not “alleg[e] facts . . . suggesting that refraining from competing in other territories as CLECs was contrary to [the ILECs’] apparent economic interests, and consequently [does] not rais[e] an inference that [the ILECs’] actions were the result of a conspiracy.” * * *

618

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed, holding that the District Court tested the complaint by the wrong standard. It held that “plus factors are not required to be pleaded to permit an antitrust claim based on parallel conduct to survive dismissal.” 425 F.3d 99, 114 (2005) (emphasis in original). Although the Court of Appeals took the view that plaintiffs must plead facts that “include conspiracy among the realm of ‘plausible’ possibilities in order to survive a motion to dismiss,” it then said that “to rule that allegations of parallel anticompetitive conduct fail to support a plausible conspiracy claim, a court would have to conclude that there is no set of facts that would permit a plaintiff to demonstrate that the particular parallelism asserted was the product of collusion rather than coincidence.” Ibid.

We granted certiorari to address the proper standard for pleading an antitrust conspiracy through allegations of parallel conduct * * * and now reverse.

II
A

Because § 1 of the Sherman Act “does not prohibit [all] unreasonable restraints of trade . . . but only restraints effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy,” * * * “[t]he crucial question” is whether the challenged anticompetitive conduct “stem[s] from independent decision or from an agreement, tacit or express,” * * *. While a showing of parallel “business behavior is admissible circumstantial evidence from which the fact finder may infer agreement,” it falls short of “conclusively establish[ing] agreement or . . . itself constitut[ing] a Sherman Act offense.”^d * * * Even “conscious parallelism,” a common reaction of “firms in a concentrated market [that] recogniz[e] their shared economic interests and their interdependence with respect to price and output decisions” is “not in itself unlawful.” * * *

B

This case presents the antecedent question of what a plaintiff must plead in order to state a claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) requires only “a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,” in order to “give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests,” Conley * * *. While a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations * * *, a plaintiff’s obligation to provide the “grounds” of his “entitle[ment] to relief” requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do, see Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 286, 106 S.Ct. 2932, 92 L.Ed.2d 209 (1986) (on a motion to dismiss, courts “are not bound to accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation”). Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level, see 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1216, pp. 235–236 (3d ed. 2004) (hereinafter Wright & Miller) (“[T]he pleading must contain something more . . . than . . . a statement of facts that merely creates a suspicion [of] a legally cognizable right of action”),^{3, e} on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true (even if doubtful in fact), see, e.g., Swierkiewicz * * *.

619

In applying these general standards to a § 1 claim, we hold that stating such a claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made. Asking for plausible grounds to infer an agreement does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement. And, of course, a well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of those facts is improbable, and “that a recovery is very remote and unlikely.” * * * In identifying facts that are suggestive enough to render a § 1 conspiracy plausible, we have the benefit of the prior rulings and considered views of leading commentators, already quoted, that lawful parallel conduct fails to bespeak unlawful agreement. It makes sense to say, therefore, that an allegation of parallel conduct and a bare assertion of conspiracy will not suffice. Without more, parallel conduct does not suggest conspiracy, and a conclusory allegation of agreement at some unidentified point does not supply facts adequate to show illegality. Hence, when allegations of parallel conduct are set out in order to make a § 1 claim, they must be placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action.

620

* * *

We alluded to the practical significance of the Rule 8 entitlement requirement in Dura Pharmaceuticals, Inc. v. Broudo, 544 U.S. 336, 125 S.Ct. 1627, 161 L.Ed.2d 577 (2005), when we explained that something beyond the mere possibility of loss causation must be alleged, lest a plaintiff with “ ‘a largely groundless claim’ ” be allowed to “ ‘take up the time of a number of other people, with the right to do so representing an in terrorem increment of the settlement value.’ ” Id., at 347, 125 S.Ct. 1627 * * *. * * *

Thus, it is one thing to be cautious before dismissing an antitrust complaint in advance of discovery * * * but quite another to forget that proceeding to antitrust discovery can be expensive. As we indicated over 20 years ago * * *, “a district court must retain the power to insist upon some specificity in pleading before allowing a potentially massive factual controversy to proceed.” * * * That potential expense is obvious enough in the present case: plaintiffs represent a putative class of at least 90 percent of all subscribers to local telephone or high-speed Internet service in the continental United States, in an action against America’s largest telecommunications firms (with many thousands of employees generating reams and gigabytes of business records) for unspecified (if any) instances of antitrust violations that allegedly occurred over a period of seven years.

It is no answer to say that a claim just shy of a plausible entitlement to relief can, if groundless, be weeded out early in the discovery process through “careful case management,” * * * given the common lament that the success of judicial supervision in checking discovery abuse has been on the modest side. See, e.g., Easterbrook, Discovery as Abuse, 69 B.U.L.Rev. 635, 638 (1989) (“Judges can do little about impositions on discovery when parties control the legal claims to be presented and conduct the discovery themselves”). And it is self-evident that the problem of discovery abuse cannot be solved by “careful scrutiny of evidence at the summary judgment stage,” much less “lucid instructions to juries”; * * * the threat of discovery expense will push cost-conscious defendants to settle even anemic cases before reaching those proceedings. Probably, then, it is only by taking care to require allegations that reach the level suggesting conspiracy that we can hope to avoid the potentially enormous expense of discovery in cases with no “ ‘reasonably founded hope that the [discovery] process will reveal relevant evidence’ ” to support a § 1 claim. * * *⁶

621

Plaintiffs do not, of course, dispute the requirement of plausibility and the need for something more than merely parallel behavior * * *, and their main argument against the plausibility standard at the pleading stage is its ostensible conflict with an early statement of ours construing Rule 8. Justice Black’s opinion for the Court in Conley v. Gibson spoke not only of the need for fair notice of the grounds for entitlement to relief but of “the accepted rule that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.” * * * This “no set of facts” language can be read in isolation as saying that any statement revealing the theory of the claim will suffice unless its factual impossibility may be shown from the face of the pleadings; and the Court of Appeals appears to have read Conley in some such way when formulating its understanding of the proper pleading standard * * *.

On such a focused and literal reading of Conley’s “no set of facts,” a wholly conclusory statement of claim would survive a motion to dismiss whenever the pleadings left open the possibility that a plaintiff might later establish some “set of [undisclosed] facts” to support recovery.^f So here, the Court of Appeals specifically found the prospect of unearthing direct evidence of conspiracy sufficient to preclude dismissal, even though the complaint does not set forth a single fact in a context that suggests an agreement. * * * It seems fair to say that this approach to pleading would dispense with any showing of a “ ‘reasonably founded hope’ ” that a plaintiff would be able to make a case * * *. Mr. Micawber’s optimism would be enough.

Seeing this, a good many judges and commentators have balked at taking the literal terms of the Conley passage as a pleading standard. * * *

* * * [A]fter puzzling the profession for 50 years, this famous observation has earned its retirement. The phrase is best forgotten as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard: once a claim has been stated adequately, it may be supported by showing any set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint. * * * Conley, then, described the breadth of opportunity to prove what an adequate complaint claims, not the minimum standard of adequate pleading to govern a complaint’s survival.

622

III

When we look for plausibility in this complaint, we agree with the District Court that plaintiffs’ claim of conspiracy in restraint of trade comes up short. To begin with, the complaint leaves no doubt that plaintiffs rest their § 1 claim on descriptions of parallel conduct and not on any independent allegation of actual agreement among the ILECs. * * * Although in form a few stray statements speak directly of agreement, on fair reading these are merely legal conclusions resting on the prior allegations. * * * The nub of the complaint, then, is the ILECs’ parallel behavior, consisting of steps to keep the CLECs out and manifest disinterest in becoming CLECs themselves, and its sufficiency turns on the suggestions raised by this conduct when viewed in light of common economic experience.

* * * [T]here is no reason to infer that the companies had agreed among themselves to do what was only natural anyway; so natural, in fact, that if alleging parallel decisions to resist competition were enough to imply an antitrust conspiracy, pleading a § 1 violation against almost any group of competing businesses would be a sure thing.

* * *

Plaintiffs’ second conspiracy theory rests on the competitive reticence among the ILECs themselves in the wake of the 1996 Act * * *, * * *

But [such reticence] * * * was not suggestive of conspiracy, not if history teaches anything. In a traditionally unregulated industry with low barriers to entry, sparse competition among large firms dominating separate geographical segments of the market could very well signify illegal agreement, but here we have an obvious alternative explanation. * * * In the decade preceding the 1996 Act and well before that, monopoly was the norm in telecommunications, not the exception. * * * The ILECs were born in that world, doubtless liked the world the way it was, and surely knew the adage about him who lives by the sword. Hence, a natural explanation for the noncompetition alleged is that the former Government-sanctioned monopolists were sitting tight, expecting their neighbors to do the same thing.

* * *

Plaintiffs say that our analysis runs counter to Swierkiewicz * * *. Even though Swierkiewicz’s pleadings “detailed the events leading to his termination, provided relevant dates, and included the ages and nationalities of at least some of the relevant persons involved with his termination,” the Court of Appeals dismissed the complaint for failing to allege certain additional facts that Swierkiewicz would need at the trial stage to support his claim in the absence of direct evidence of discrimination. * * * We reversed on the ground that the Court of Appeals had impermissibly applied what amounted to a heightened pleading requirement by insisting that Swierkiewicz allege “specific facts” beyond those necessary to state his claim and the grounds showing entitlement to relief. * * *

623

Here, in contrast, we do not require heightened fact pleading of specifics, but only enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. Because the plaintiffs here have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible, their complaint must be dismissed.

* * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE GINSBURG joins except as to Part IV, dissenting.

* * *

* * * If the defendants acted independently, their conduct was perfectly lawful. If, however, that conduct is the product of a horizontal agreement among potential competitors, it was unlawful. Plaintiffs have alleged such an agreement and, because the complaint was dismissed in advance of answer, the allegation has not even been denied. Why, then, does the case not proceed? Does a judicial opinion that the charge is not “plausible” provide a legally acceptable reason for dismissing the complaint? I think not.

Respondents’ amended complaint describes a variety of circumstantial evidence and makes the straightforward allegation that petitioners “entered into a contract, combination or conspiracy to prevent competitive entry in their respective local telephone and/or high speed internet services markets and have agreed not to compete with one another and otherwise allocated customers and markets to one another.” * * * [Amended Complaint ¶ 51].

The complaint explains that, contrary to Congress’ expectation when it enacted the 1996 Telecommunications Act, and consistent with their own economic self-interests, * * * [the ILECs] have assiduously avoided infringing upon each other’s markets and have refused to permit nonincumbent competitors to access their networks. The complaint quotes * * * the former chief executive officer of one such ILEC, as saying that competing in a neighboring ILEC’s territory “ ‘might be a good way to turn a quick dollar but that doesn’t make it right.’ ” * * * [Amended Complaint ¶ 42]. * * * Moreover, respondents allege that petitioners “communicate amongst themselves” through numerous industry associations. * * * [Amended Complaint ¶ 46] * * *. In sum, respondents allege that petitioners entered into an agreement that has long been recognized as a classic per se violation of the Sherman Act. * * *

624

* * *

The Court and petitioners’ legal team are no doubt correct that the parallel conduct alleged is consistent with the absence of any contract, combination, or conspiracy. But that conduct is also entirely consistent with the presence of the illegal agreement alleged in the complaint. And the charge that petitioners “agreed not to compete with one another” is not just one of “a few stray statements” * * *; it is an allegation describing unlawful conduct. As such, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, our longstanding precedent, and sound practice mandate that the District Court at least require some sort of response from petitioners before dismissing the case.

Two practical concerns presumably explain the Court’s dramatic departure from settled procedural law. Private antitrust litigation can be enormously expensive, and there is a risk that jurors may mistakenly conclude that evidence of parallel conduct has proved that the parties acted pursuant to an agreement when they in fact merely made similar independent decisions. Those concerns merit careful case management, including strict control of discovery, careful scrutiny of evidence at the summary judgment stage, and lucid instructions to juries; they do not, however, justify the dismissal of an adequately pleaded complaint without even requiring the defendants to file answers denying a charge that they in fact engaged in collective decisionmaking. More importantly, they do not justify an interpretation of Federal Rule * * * 12(b)(6) that seems to be driven by the majority’s appraisal of the plausibility of the ultimate factual allegation rather than its legal sufficiency.

* * *

Under the relaxed pleading standards of the Federal Rules, the idea was not to keep litigants out of court but rather to keep them in. The merits of a claim would be sorted out during a flexible pretrial process and, as appropriate, through the crucible of trial. * * *

II

* * *

Consistent with the design of the Federal Rules, Conley’s “no set of facts” formulation permits outright dismissal only when proceeding to discovery or beyond would be futile. Once it is clear that a plaintiff has stated a claim that, if true, would entitle him to relief, matters of proof are appropriately relegated to other stages of the trial process. Today, however, in its explanation of a decision to dismiss a complaint that it regards as a fishing expedition, the Court scraps Conley’s “no set of facts” language. Concluding that the phrase has been “questioned, criticized, and explained away long enough,” * * * the Court dismisses it as careless composition.

625

If Conley’s “no set of facts” language is to be interred, let it not be without a eulogy. That exact language, which the majority says has “puzzl[ed] the profession for 50 years,” * * * has been cited as authority in a dozen opinions of this Court and four separate writings. In not one of those 16 opinions was the language “questioned,” “criticized,” or “explained away.” Indeed, today’s opinion is the first by any Member of this Court to express any doubt as to the adequacy of the Conley formulation. Taking their cues from the federal courts, 26 States and the District of Columbia utilize as their standard for dismissal of a complaint the very language the majority repudiates: whether it appears “beyond doubt” that “no set of facts” in support of the claim would entitle the plaintiff to relief. * * *

Petitioners have not requested that the Conley formulation be retired, nor have any of the six amici who filed briefs in support of petitioners. I would not rewrite the Nation’s civil procedure textbooks and call into doubt the pleading rules of most of its States without far more informed deliberation as to the costs of doing so. Congress has established a process—a rulemaking process—for revisions of that order. * * *

The “pleading standard” label the majority gives to what it reads into the Conley opinion—a statement of the permissible factual support for an adequately pleaded complaint—would not, therefore, have impressed the Conley Court itself. Rather, that Court would have understood the majority’s remodeling of its language to express an evidentiary standard, which the Conley Court had neither need nor want to explicate. Second, it is pellucidly clear that the Conley Court was interested in what a complaint must contain, not what it may contain. * * *

* * *

The * * * the Conley Court cited approvingly [Dioguardi,] * * * written by Judge Clark himself. * * * As any civil procedure student knows, Judge Clark’s opinion disquieted the defense bar and gave rise to a movement to revise Rule 8 to require a plaintiff to plead a “ ‘cause of action.’ ” See 5 Wright & Miller § 1201, at 86–87. The movement failed * * *; Dioguardi was explicitly approved in Conley; and “[i]n retrospect the case itself seems to be a routine application of principles that are universally accepted,” 5 Wright & Miller § 1220, at 284–285.

* * * Conley’s statement that a complaint is not to be dismissed unless “no set of facts” in support thereof would entitle the plaintiff to relief is hardly “puzzling[.]” * * * It reflects a philosophy that, unlike in the days of code pleading, separating the wheat from the chaff is a task assigned to the pretrial and trial process. Conley’s language, in short, captures the policy choice embodied in the Federal Rules and binding on the federal courts.

626

We have consistently reaffirmed that basic understanding of the Federal Rules in the half century since Conley. * * *

* * *

Everything today’s majority says would * * * make perfect sense if it were ruling on a Rule 56 motion for summary judgment and the evidence included nothing more than the Court has described. But it should go without saying * * * that a heightened production burden at the summary judgment stage does not translate into a heightened pleading burden at the complaint stage. The majority rejects the complaint in this case because—in light of the fact that the parallel conduct alleged is consistent with ordinary market behavior—the claimed conspiracy is “conceivable” but not “plausible[.]” * * * But even if the majority’s speculation is correct, its “plausibility” standard is irreconcilable with Rule 8 and with our governing precedents. * * * [F]ear of the burdens of litigation does not justify factual conclusions supported only by lawyers’ arguments rather than sworn denials or admissible evidence.

* * *

III

* * * [T]he theory on which the Court permits dismissal is that, so far as the Federal Rules are concerned, no agreement has been alleged at all. This is a mind-boggling conclusion.

 I am  willing to entertain the majority’s belief that any agreement among the companies was unlikely. But the plaintiffs allege in three places in their complaint,  that the ILECs did in fact agree both to prevent competitors from entering into their local markets and to forgo competition with each other. And as the Court recognizes, at the motion to dismiss stage, a judge assumes “that all the allegations in the complaint are true (even if doubtful in fact).” ***

The majority circumvents this obvious obstacle to dismissal by pretending that it does not exist. The Court admits that “in form a few stray statements in the complaint speak directly of agreement,” but disregards those allegations by saying that “on fair reading these are merely legal conclusions resting on the prior allegations” of parallel conduct.  The Court’s dichotomy between factual allegations and “legal conclusions” is the stuff of a bygone era . That distinction was a defining feature of code pleading , but was conspicuously abolished when the Federal Rules were enacted in 1938.  “Defendants entered into a contract” is no more a legal conclusion than “defendant negligently drove,” see Form 9^b . Indeed it is less of one. ***

627

To be clear, if I had been the trial judge in this case, I would not have permitted the plaintiffs to engage in massive discovery based solely on the allegations in this complaint. On the other hand, I surely would not have dismissed the complaint without requiring the defendants to answer the charge that they “have agreed not to compete with one another and otherwise allocated customers and markets to one another.” Even a sworn denial of that charge would not justify a summary dismissal without giving the plaintiffs the opportunity to take depositions from  at least one responsible executive representing each of the  defendants.

IV

 Whether the Court’s actions will benefit only defendants in antitrust treble-damages cases, or whether its test for the sufficiency of a complaint will inure to the benefit of all civil defendants, is a question that the future will answer. But that the Court has announced a significant new rule that does not even purport to respond to any congressional command is glaringly obvious.

The transparent policy concern that drives the decision is the interest in protecting antitrust defendants—who in this case are some of the wealthiest corporations in our economy—from the burdens of pretrial discovery.  Even if it were not apparent that the legal fees petitioners have incurred in arguing the merits of their Rule 12(b) motion have far exceeded the cost of limited discovery, or that those discovery costs would burden respondents as well as petitioners, that concern would not provide an adequate justification for this law-changing decision. For in the final analysis it is only a lack of confidence in the ability of trial judges to control discovery, buttressed by appellate judges’ independent appraisal of the plausibility of profoundly serious factual allegations, that could account for this stark break from precedent.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Does Conley’s standard of notice pleading survive Twombly? If not, what is the new standard under Rule 8(a)? Is this standard consistent with the language of the Federal Rule? Does it mark a return to the requirements of fact pleading under the Codes? Does the new standard reflect an appropriate act of judicial interpretation given the rule amendment process? See p. 616, Note 2, supra.

628

2.Can you explain why the Twombly complaint was not “plausible”? Consider the claim of conspiracy. The majority stated that the complaint contained no “independent allegation of actual agreement” among the ILECs, underscoring that the complaint did not allege which ILECs and which employees agreed, or when and where the illicit agreement took place. Why was it not sufficient simply to allege a conspiracy not to compete? Was the allegation about a conspiracy defective because it was alleged on information and belief? Since a conspiracy takes place in secret, was it reasonable to expect plaintiffs, through a pre-filing investigation but without the benefit of discovery, to uncover the hidden details of a conspiracy? Why did the fact of parallel behavior—that none of the ILECs expanded into new markets—not support an inference of conspiracy? Was the Court’s view of implausibility based on a particular theory of market behavior?

3.What role did the anticipated cost of discovery play in the Court’s decision? How did the dissenters in Twombly respond to this argument? Is this an appropriate factor to consider at the pleading stage of litigation? See Steinman, The Pleading Problem, 62 Stan.L.Rev. 1293, 1351–56 (2010) (discussing the relationship between pleading standards and discovery costs). Professor Epstein has argued that “as the costs of discovery mount, the case for terminating litigation earlier in the cycle gets ever stronger.” Epstein, Bell Atlantic v. Twombly: How Motions To Dismiss Become (Disguised) Summary Judgments, 25 Wash.U.J.L. & Pol’y 61, 66–67 (2007). Do concerns about the cost of discovery justify extending the plausibility standard of pleading to the many cases that are not discovery-rich? See Dodson, New Pleading, New Discovery, 109 Mich.L.Rev. 53 (2010).

Read the complaint in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, which is reproduced in the Supplement.

ASHCROFT v. IQBAL
Supreme Court of the United States, 2009.
556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Plaintiff-respondent, a Pakistani Muslim man, filed a damages action to redress the violation of his constitutional rights resulting from his pretrial detention in a maximum-security unit as a person of “high interest” during the federal government’s investigation of the attacks of

629

September 11, 2001. Defendants included John Ashcroft, the former Attorney General of the United States, and Robert Mueller, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). As to these parties, the complaint alleged that they had adopted an unconstitutional policy that subjected plaintiff-respondent to harsh conditions on account of his race, religion, or national origin. Ashcroft and Mueller moved to dismiss based on qualified immunity, but the district court denied their motion. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed on an interlocutory appeal.]

IV

A

* * *

To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to “state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.” [Twombly, p. 617, supra] A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. * * * The plausibility standard is not akin to a “probability requirement,” but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. * * * Where a complaint pleads facts that are “merely consistent with” a defendant’s liability, it “stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of ‘entitlement to relief.’ ” * * *

Two working principles underlie our decision in Twombly. First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice. * * * (Although for the purposes of a motion to dismiss we must take all of the factual allegations in the complaint as true, we “are not bound to accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation” (internal quotation marks omitted)). Rule 8 marks a notable and generous departure from the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era, but it does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions. Second, only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. * * * Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will, as the Court of Appeals observed, be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. * * * But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged—but it has not “show[n]”—“that the pleader is entitled to relief.” Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2).

In keeping with these principles a court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.

630

* * *

B

Under Twombly’s construction of Rule 8, we conclude that respondent’s complaint has not “nudged [his] claims” of invidious discrimination “across the line from conceivable to plausible.” * * *

We begin our analysis by identifying the allegations in the complaint that are not entitled to the assumption of truth. Respondent pleads that petitioners “knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [him]” to harsh conditions of confinement “as a matter of policy, solely on account of [his] religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest.” Complaint ¶ 96 * * *. * * * These bare assertions, much like the pleading of conspiracy in Twombly, amount to nothing more than a “formulaic recitation of the elements” of a constitutional discrimination claim, * * * namely, that petitioners adopted a policy “ ‘because of,’ not merely ‘in spite of,’ its adverse effects upon an identifiable group.” * * * [Pers. Adm. Of Mass. v.] Feeney, 442 U.S. [256,] * * * 279

[(1979)]. As such, the allegations are conclusory and not entitled to be assumed true. To be clear, we do not reject these bald allegations on the ground that they are unrealistic or nonsensical. We do not so characterize them any more than the Court in Twombly rejected the plaintiffs’ express allegation of a “ ‘contract, combination or conspiracy to prevent competitive entry,’ ” because it thought that claim too chimerical to be maintained. It is the conclusory nature of respondent’s allegations, rather than their extravagantly fanciful nature, that disentitles them to the presumption of truth.

We next consider the factual allegations in respondent’s complaint to determine if they plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief. The complaint alleges that “the [FBI], under the direction of Defendant MUELLER, arrested and detained thousands of Arab Muslim men . . . as part of its investigation of the events of September 11.” Complaint ¶ 47 * * *. It further claims that “[t]he policy of holding post-September-11th detainees in highly restrictive conditions of confinement until they were ‘cleared’ by the FBI was approved by Defendants ASHCROFT and MUELLER in discussions in the weeks after September 11, 2001.” Id., ¶ 69 * * *. Taken as true, these allegations are consistent with petitioners’ purposefully designating detainees “of high interest” because of their race, religion, or national origin. But given more likely explanations, they do not plausibly establish this purpose.

631

The September 11 attacks were perpetrated by 19 Arab Muslim hijackers who counted themselves members in good standing of al Qaeda, an Islamic fundamentalist group. Al Qaeda was headed by another Arab Muslim—Osama bin Laden—and composed in large part of his Arab Muslim disciples. It should come as no surprise that a legitimate policy directing law enforcement to arrest and detain individuals because of their suspected link to the attacks would produce a disparate, incidental impact on Arab Muslims, even though the purpose of the policy was to target neither Arabs nor Muslims. On the facts respondent alleges the arrests Mueller oversaw were likely lawful and justified by his nondiscriminatory intent to detain aliens who were illegally present in the United States and who had potential connections to those who committed terrorist acts. As between that “obvious alternative explanation” for the arrests, and the purposeful, invidious discrimination respondent asks us to infer, discrimination is not a plausible conclusion.

But even if the complaint’s well-pleaded facts give rise to a plausible inference that respondent’s arrest was the result of unconstitutional discrimination, that inference alone would not entitle respondent to relief. It is important to recall that respondent’s complaint challenges neither the constitutionality of his arrest nor his initial detention * * *. Respondent’s constitutional claims against petitioners rest solely on their ostensible “policy of holding post-September-11th detainees” in the [Administrative Maximum Special Housing Unit, known as “ADMAX SHU”] once they were categorized as “of high interest.” Complaint ¶ 69 * * *. To prevail on that theory, the complaint must contain facts plausibly showing that petitioners purposefully adopted a policy of classifying post-September-11 detainees as “of high interest” because of their race, religion, or national origin.

This the complaint fails to do. Though respondent alleges that various other defendants, who are not before us, may have labeled him a person of “of high interest” for impermissible reasons, his only factual allegation against petitioners accuses them of adopting a policy approving “restrictive conditions of confinement” for post-September-11 detainees until they were “ ‘cleared’ by the FBI.” Ibid. Accepting the truth of that allegation, the complaint does not show, or even intimate, that petitioners purposefully housed detainees in the ADMAX SHU due to their race, religion, or national origin. All it plausibly suggests is that the Nation’s top law enforcement officers, in the aftermath of a devastating terrorist attack, sought to keep suspected terrorists in the most secure conditions available until the suspects could be cleared of terrorist activity. Respondent does not argue, nor can he, that such a motive would violate petitioners’ constitutional obligations. He would need to allege more by way of factual content to “nudge[e]” his claim of purposeful discrimination “across the line from conceivable to plausible.”

* * *

632

C

Respondent offers three arguments that bear on our disposition of his case, but none is persuasive.

1

Respondent first says that our decision in Twombly should be limited to pleadings made in the context of an antitrust dispute. * * * This argument is not supported by Twombly and is incompatible with the Federal Rules * * *. Though Twombly determined the sufficiency of a complaint sounding in antitrust, the decision was based on our interpretation and application of Rule 8. * * * That Rule in turn governs the pleading standard “in all civil actions and proceedings in the United States district courts.” Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 1. Our decision in Twombly expounded the pleading standard for “all civil actions,” * * * and it applies to antitrust and discrimination suits alike. * * *

2

Respondent next implies that our construction of Rule 8 should be tempered where, as here, the Court of Appeals has “instructed the district court to cabin discovery in such a way as to preserve” petitioners’ defense of qualified immunity “as much as possible in anticipation of a summary judgment motion.” * * * We have held, however, that the question presented by a motion to dismiss a complaint for insufficient pleadings does not turn on the controls placed upon the discovery process. * * *

Our rejection of the careful-case-management approach is especially important in suits where Government-official defendants are entitled to assert the defense of qualified immunity. The basic thrust of the qualified-immunity doctrine is to free officials from the concerns of litigation, including “avoidance of disruptive discovery.” Siegert v. Gilley, 500 U.S. 226, 236, 111 S.Ct. 1789, 114 L.Ed.2d 277 (1991) (KENNEDY, J., concurring in judgment). There are serious and legitimate reasons for this. If a government official is to devote time to his or her duties, and to the formulation of sound and responsible policies, it is counterproductive to require the substantial diversion that is attendant to participating in litigation and making informed decisions as to how it should proceed. Litigation, though necessary to ensure that officials comply with the law, exacts heavy costs in terms of efficiency and expenditure of valuable time and resources that might otherwise be directed to the proper execution of the work of the Government. The costs of diversion are only magnified when Government officials are charged with responding to * * * “a national and international security emergency unprecedented in the history of the American Republic.” * * *

It is no answer to these concerns to say that discovery for petitioners can be deferred while pretrial proceedings continue for other defendants.

633

It is quite likely that, when discovery as to the other parties proceeds, it would prove necessary for petitioners and their counsel to participate in the process to ensure the case does not develop in a misleading or slanted way that causes prejudice to their position. Even if petitioners are not yet themselves subject to discovery orders, then, they would not be free from the burdens of discovery.

We decline respondent’s invitation to relax the pleading requirements on the ground that the Court of Appeals promises petitioners minimally intrusive discovery. That promise provides especially cold comfort in this pleading context, where we are impelled to give real content to the concept of qualified immunity for high-level officials who must be neither deterred nor detracted from the vigorous performance of their duties. Because respondent’s complaint is deficient under Rule 8, he is not entitled to discovery, cabined or otherwise.

3

Respondent finally maintains that the Federal Rules expressly allow him to allege petitioners’ discriminatory intent “generally,” which he equates with a conclusory allegation. It follows, respondent says, that his complaint is sufficiently well pleaded because it claims that petitioners discriminated against him “on account of [his] religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest.” Complaint ¶ 96 * * *. Were we required to accept this allegation as true, respondent’s complaint would survive petitioners’ motion to dismiss. But the Federal Rules do not require courts to credit a complaint’s conclusory statements without reference to its factual context.

It is true that Rule 9(b) requires particularity when pleading “fraud or mistake,” while allowing “[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person’s mind [to] be alleged generally.” But “generally” is a relative term. In the context of Rule 9, it is to be compared to the particularity requirement applicable to fraud or mistake. Rule 9 merely excuses a party from pleading discriminatory intent under an elevated pleading standard. It does not give him license to evade the less rigid—though still operative—strictures of Rule 8. See 5A C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1301, p. 291 (3d ed. 2004) (“[A] rigid rule requiring the detailed pleading of a condition of mind would be undesirable because, absent overriding considerations pressing for a specificity requirement, as in the case of averments of fraud or mistake, the general ‘short and plain statement of the claim’ mandate in Rule 8(a) . . . should control the second sentence of Rule 9(b)”)¹. And Rule 8 does not empower respondent to plead the bare elements of his cause of action, affix the label “general allegation,” and expect his complaint to survive a motion to dismiss.

634

V

We hold that respondent’s complaint fails to plead sufficient facts to state a claim for purposeful and unlawful discrimination against petitioners. The Court of Appeals should decide in the first instance whether to remand to the District Court so that respondent can seek leave to amend his deficient complaint.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.
It is so ordered.

JUSTICE SOUTER, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS, JUSTICE GINSBURG, and JUSTICE BREYER join, dissenting.

* * *
I
A

The Court granted certiorari on * * * [two] questions. The first is about pleading; the second goes to the liability standard. In the first question, Ashcroft and Mueller * * * conceded in their petition for certiorari that they would be liable if they had “actual knowledge” of discrimination by their subordinates and exhibited “ ‘deliberate indifference’ ” to that discrimination. * * * [T]hey asked the Court to address whether Iqbal’s allegations against them (which they call conclusory) were sufficient to satisfy Rule 8(a)(2), and in particular whether the Court of Appeals misapplied our decision in Twombly construing that rule. * * *

In the second question, Ashcroft and Mueller asked this Court to say whether they could be held personally liable for the actions of their subordinates based on the theory that they had constructive notice of their subordinates’ unconstitutional conduct. * * * This was an odd question to pose, since Iqbal has never claimed that Ashcroft and Mueller are liable on a constructive notice theory. * * * [T]he second question challenged only one possible ground for imposing supervisory liability. * * *

The briefing at the merits stage was no different. Ashcroft and Mueller argued that the factual allegations in Iqbal’s complaint were insufficient to overcome their claim of qualified immunity; they also contended that they could not be held liable on a theory of constructive notice. Again they conceded, however, that they would be subject to supervisory liability if they “had actual knowledge of the assertedly discriminatory nature of the classification of suspects as being ‘of high interest’ and they were deliberately indifferent to that discrimination.” * * * Iqbal argued that the allegations in his complaint were sufficient under Rule 8(a)(2) and Twombly, and conceded that as a matter of law he could not recover under a theory of respondeat superior. * * * Thus, the parties agreed as to a proper standard of supervisory liability, and the disputed question was whether Iqbal’s complaint satisfied Rule 8(a)(2).

635

Without acknowledging the parties’ agreement as to the standard of supervisory liability, the Court asserts that it must sua sponte decide the scope of supervisory liability here. * * * I agree that, absent Ashcroft and Mueller’s concession, that determination would have to be made; without knowing the elements of a supervisory liability claim, there would be no way to determine whether a plaintiff had made factual allegations amounting to grounds for relief on that claim. * * * But deciding the scope of supervisory * * * liability in this case is uncalled for. * * *

First, Ashcroft and Mueller have * * * made the critical concession that a supervisor’s knowledge of a subordinate’s unconstitutional conduct and deliberate indifference to that conduct are grounds for * * * liability. Iqbal seeks to recover on a theory that Ashcroft and Mueller at least knowingly acquiesced (and maybe more than acquiesced) in the discriminatory acts of their subordinates; if he can show this, he will satisfy Ashcroft and Mueller’s own test for supervisory liability. * * * We do not normally override a party’s concession * * *. I would * * * accept Ashcroft and Mueller’s concession for purposes of this case and proceed to consider whether the complaint alleges at least knowledge and deliberate indifference.

Second, because of the concession, we have received no briefing or argument on the proper scope of supervisory liability, much less the full-dress argument we normally require. * * *

Finally, the Court’s approach is most unfair to Iqbal. He was entitled to rely on Ashcroft and Mueller’s concession, both in their petition for certiorari and in their merits briefs, that they could be held liable on a theory of knowledge and deliberate indifference. By overriding that concession, the Court denies Iqbal a fair chance to be heard on the question.

B

The majority, however, does ignore the concession. According to the majority, because Iqbal concededly cannot recover on a theory of respondeat superior, it follows that he cannot recover under any theory of supervisory liability. * * * Lest there be any mistake, * * * the majority is not narrowing the scope of supervisory liability; it is eliminating * * * supervisory liability entirely. The nature of a supervisory liability theory is that the supervisor may be liable, under certain conditions, for the wrongdoing of his subordinates, and it is this very principle that the majority rejects. * * *

* * * Even if an employer is not liable for the actions of his employee solely because the employee was acting within the scope of employment, there still might be conditions to render a supervisor liable for the conduct of his subordinate. * * *

636

* * *

* * * [W]hat is most remarkable about its foray into supervisory liability is that its conclusion has no bearing on its resolution of the case. The majority says that all of the allegations in the complaint that Ashcroft and Mueller authorized, condoned, or even were aware of their subordinates’ discriminatory conduct are “conclusory” and therefore are “not entitled to be assumed true.” * * *

II

Given petitioners’ concession, the complaint satisfies Rule 8(a)(2). Ashcroft and Mueller admit they are liable for their subordinates’ conduct if they “had actual knowledge of the assertedly discriminatory nature of the classification of suspects as being ‘of high interest’ and they were deliberately indifferent to that discrimination.” * * * Iqbal alleges that after the September 11 attacks the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) “arrested and detained thousands of Arab Muslim men,” Complaint ¶ 47 * * *, that many of these men were designated by high-ranking FBI officials as being “ ‘of high interest,’ ” id., ¶¶ 48, 50 * * *, and that in many cases, including Iqbal’s, this designation was made “because of the race, religion, and national origin of the detainees, and not because of any evidence of the detainees’ involvement in supporting terrorist activity,” id., ¶ 49. The complaint further alleges that Ashcroft was the “principal architect of the policies and practices challenged,” id., ¶ 10 * * *, and that Mueller “was instrumental in the adoption, promulgation, and implementation of the policies and practices challenged,” id., ¶ 11. According to the complaint, Ashcroft and Mueller “knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [Iqbal] to these conditions of confinement as a matter of policy, solely on account of [his] religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest.” Id., ¶ 96 * * *. The complaint thus alleges, at a bare minimum, that Ashcroft and Mueller knew of and condoned the discriminatory policy their subordinates carried out. Actually, the complaint goes further in alleging that Ashcroft and Mueller affirmatively acted to create the discriminatory detention policy. If these factual allegations are true, Ashcroft and Mueller were, at the very least, aware of the discriminatory policy being implemented and deliberately indifferent to it.

Ashcroft and Mueller argue that these allegations fail to satisfy the “plausibility standard” of Twombly. They contend that Iqbal’s claims are implausible because such high-ranking officials “tend not to be personally involved in the specific actions of lower-level officers down the bureaucratic chain of command.” * * * But this response bespeaks a fundamental misunderstanding of the enquiry that Twombly demands. Twombly does not require a court at the motion-to-dismiss stage to consider whether the factual allegations are probably true. We made it clear, on the contrary, that a court must take the allegations as true, no matter how skeptical the court may be. * * * The sole exception to this rule lies with allegations that are sufficiently fantastic to defy reality as we know it: claims about little green men, or the plaintiff’s recent trip to Pluto, or experiences in time travel. That is not what we have here.

637

Under Twombly, the relevant question is whether, assuming the factual allegations are true, the plaintiff has stated a ground for relief that is plausible. * * * The complaint alleges that FBI officials discriminated against Iqbal solely on account of his race, religion, and national origin, and it alleges the knowledge and deliberate indifference that, by Ashcroft and Mueller’s own admission, are sufficient to make them liable for the illegal action. Iqbal’s complaint therefore contains “enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.” * * *

I do not understand the majority to disagree with this understanding of “plausibility” under Twombly. Rather, the majority discards the allegations discussed above with regard to Ashcroft and Mueller as conclusory, and is left considering only two statements in the complaint: that “the [FBI], under the direction of Defendant MUELLER, arrested and detained thousands of Arab Muslim men . . . as part of its investigation of the events of September 11,” Complaint ¶ 47 * * *, and that “[t]he policy of holding post-September-11th detainees in highly restrictive conditions of confinement until they were ‘cleared’ by the FBI was approved by Defendants ASHCROFT and MUELLER in discussions in the weeks after September 11, 2001,” id., ¶ 69 * * *. I think the majority is right in saying that these allegations suggest only that Ashcroft and Mueller “sought to keep suspected terrorists in the most secure conditions available until the suspects could be cleared of terrorist activity,” * * * and that this produced “a disparate, incidental impact on Arab Muslims,” * * *. And I agree that the two allegations selected by the majority, standing alone, do not state a plausible entitlement to relief for unconstitutional discrimination.

But these allegations do not stand alone as the only significant, nonconclusory statements in the complaint, for the complaint contains many allegations linking Ashcroft and Mueller to the discriminatory practices of their subordinates. See Complaint ¶ 10 * * * (Ashcroft was the “principal architect” of the discriminatory policy); id., ¶ 11 (Mueller was “instrumental” in adopting and executing the discriminatory policy); id., ¶ 96 * * * (Ashcroft and Mueller “knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject” Iqbal to harsh conditions “as a matter of policy, solely on account of [his] religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest”).

638

The majority says that these are “bare assertions” that, “much like the pleading of conspiracy in Twombly, amount to nothing more than a ‘formulaic recitation of the elements’ of a constitutional discrimination claim” and therefore are “not entitled to be assumed true.” * * * The fallacy of the majority’s position, however, lies in looking at the relevant assertions in isolation. The complaint contains specific allegations that, in the aftermath of the September 11 attacks, the Chief of the FBI’s International Terrorism Operations Section and the Assistant Special Agent in Charge for the FBI’s New York Field Office implemented a policy that discriminated against Arab Muslim men, including Iqbal, solely on account of their race, religion, or national origin. See Complaint ¶¶ 47–53 * * *. Viewed in light of these subsidiary allegations, the allegations singled out by the majority as “conclusory” are no such thing. Iqbal’s claim is not that Ashcroft and Mueller “knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject” him to a discriminatory practice that is left undefined; his allegation is that “they knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject” him to a particular, discrete, discriminatory policy detailed in the complaint. Iqbal does not say merely that Ashcroft was the architect of some amorphous discrimination, or that Mueller was instrumental in an ill-defined constitutional violation; he alleges that they helped to create the discriminatory policy he has described. Taking the complaint as a whole, it gives Ashcroft and Mueller “ ‘fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.’ ” Twombly, * * * (quoting Conley * * *). * * *

That aside, the majority’s holding that the statements it selects are conclusory cannot be squared with its treatment of certain other allegations in the complaint as nonconclusory. For example, the majority takes as true the statement that “[t]he policy of holding post-September-11th detainees in highly restrictive conditions of confinement until they were ‘cleared’ by the FBI was approved by Defendants ASHCROFT and MUELLER in discussions in the weeks after September 11, 2001.” Complaint ¶ 69 * * *. This statement makes two points: (1) after September 11, the FBI held certain detainees in highly restrictive conditions, and (2) Ashcroft and Mueller discussed and approved these conditions. If, as the majority says, these allegations are not conclusory, then I cannot see why the majority deems it merely conclusory when Iqbal alleges that (1) after September 11, the FBI designated Arab Muslim detainees as being of “ ‘high interest’ ” “because of the race, religion, and national origin of the detainees, and not because of any evidence of the detainees’ involvement in supporting terrorist activity,” Complaint ¶¶ 48–50 * * *, and (2) Ashcroft and Mueller “knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed” to that discrimination, id., ¶ 96 * * *. By my lights, there is no principled basis for the majority’s disregard of the allegations linking Ashcroft and Mueller to their subordinates’ discrimination.

639

I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE BREYER, dissenting.

I agree with JUSTICE SOUTER and join his dissent. I write separately to point out that, like the Court, I believe it important to prevent unwarranted litigation from interfering with “the proper execution of the work of the Government.” * * * But I cannot find in that need adequate justification for the Court’s interpretation of * * * Twombly and Federal Rule * * * 8. The law, after all, provides trial courts with other legal weapons designed to prevent unwarranted interference. * * * A district court, for example, can begin discovery with lower level government defendants before determining whether a case can be made to allow discovery related to higher level government officials. * * * Neither the briefs nor the Court’s opinion provides convincing grounds for finding these alternative case-management tools inadequate, either in general or in the case before us. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. After Twombly and Iqbal, which allegations are presumed true when the court decides a motion to dismiss? Does the presumption of truth attach to allegations that are conclusory? Does it attach to allegations that are legal statements in disguise? Does it attach to allegations that are implausible because they are fantastic or unusual? See Steinman, The Pleading Problem, 62 Stan.L.Rev. 1293, 1298 (2010).
2. Recall that the complaint in Iqbal alleged that defendants “knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject him to harsh confinement as a matter of policy solely on account of * * * religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest,” see First Amended Complaint ¶ 96, reproduced in the Supplement. Why was this allegation treated as conclusory and so ignored? What facts would have transformed this allegation from a “formulaic recitation” to one entitled to the presumption of truth? Must a complaint allege evidentiary facts to survive a motion to dismiss?
3. The original version of the Federal Rules included an Appendix of Forms, accompanying Rule 84. The forms were intended “to indicate, subject to the provisions of these rules, the simplicity and brevity of statement which the rules contemplate.” Final Report of the Advisory Committee on Rules for Civil Procedure 55 (Nov. 1937). Rule 84 was amended in 1946 to clarify that the Forms were not mere guides but rather “sufficient to withstand attack under the rules.” Rule 84 Advisory Committee Note (1946 amendment). Judge Clark called the forms “the most important part of the rules” because they illustrated the level of detail a pleader was expected to allege in order to survive a motion to dismiss. Clark, Pleading Under the Federal Rules, 12 Wyo.L.J. 177, 181 (1958). In 2015, Rule 84 and the Appendix of Forms were abrogated; the accompanying Advisory Committee Note states, “The abrogation of Rule 84 does not alter existing pleading standards or otherwise change the requirement of Civil Rule 8.” If those forms were sufficient before 2015, and their removal “does not alter existing pleading standards,” wouldn’t they remain sufficient after 2015? See Steinman, Notice Pleading in Exile, 41 Cardozo L.Rev. 1057, 1068–71 (2020).

Looking at abrogated Form 11 as a benchmark, which of the following allegations would be sufficient to state a claim? Which are too specific? Which are too vague? Are the allegations sufficient under Conley? Under Twombly/Iqbal?
 - (a) D is legally liable to P for damages.
 - (b) D negligently caused P’s injury.
 - (c) D negligently caused P’s injuries on July 4, 20__, at Dreamworld Amusement Park.
 - (d) D negligently operated a roller coaster ride on which P was a passenger on July 4, 20__, at Dreamworld Amusement Park. As a result of this negligence, P suffered a broken arm and was otherwise injured, and P incurred hospital and other medical expenses, and was prevented from transacting business, resulting in damages of $500,000.
 - (e) D negligently operated a roller coaster ride on which P was a passenger on July 4, 20__, at Dreamworld Amusement Park. D was negligent because it was operating the roller coaster at excessive speed and the ride was improperly maintained. As a result of this negligence, P suffered a broken arm and was otherwise injured, and P incurred hospital and other medical expenses, and was prevented from transacting business, resulting in damages of $500,000.
 - (f) D negligently operated a roller coaster ride on which P was a passenger on July 4, 20__, at Dreamworld Amusement Park. D was negligent because it was operating the roller coaster at excessive speed (the roller coaster was traveling at a speed of thirty-two mph, exceeding the safe speed by five mph) and the ride was improperly maintained. As a result of this negligence, P suffered a broken arm and was otherwise injured, and P incurred hospital and other medical expenses, and was prevented from transacting business, resulting in damages of $500,000.
 - (g) D negligently operated a roller coaster ride on which P was a passenger on July 4, 20__, at Dreamworld Amusement Park. D was negligent because it was operating the roller coaster at excessive speed (the roller coaster was traveling at a speed of thirty-two mph, exceeding the safe speed by five mph), and the ride was improperly maintained. P was not contributorily negligent. As a result of this negligence, P suffered a broken arm and was otherwise injured, and P incurred hospital and other medical expenses, and was prevented from transacting business, resulting in damages of $500,000.

641

4. Professor Miller has criticized the Twombly/Iqbal standard as favoring “defendants best able to keep their records, conduct, and institutional secrets to themselves”:

Twombly and Iqbal both ignore the problem of information asymmetry. In many contemporary litigation contexts, critical information, such as the formulation and testing of a pharmaceutical or the design and manufacture of other products, is entirely in the defendant’s possession and unavailable to the plaintiff. One can understand requiring a plaintiff to plead what he or she knows or could know with reasonable effort, but it is rather futile and a bit absurd to tell someone to plead what he or she does not know and cannot access.

Miller, Simplified Pleading, Meaningful Days in Court, and Trials on the Merits: Reflections on the Deformation of Federal Procedure, 88 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 286, 340 (2013). In this context, consider Turkmen v. Hasty, 789 F.3d 218 (2d Cir. 2015), reversed in part, vacated in part sub nom. Ziglar v. Abbasi, 582 U.S. ___, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 1864, 194 L.Ed.2d 290, 316 (2017), which was filed—like Iqbal—in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks. The complaint alleged that Muslim, South Asian, and Arab non-citizens who were in the United States in violation of immigration laws were unconstitutionally detained on suspicion of terrorism. After the Supreme Court’s decision in Iqbal, plaintiffs filed a fourth amended complaint, and were able to supplement their allegations with information from two reports of the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Justice. Motions to dismiss were granted as to some defendants, but denied as to others. On review, the Supreme Court concluded that the complaint plausibly alleged that some defendants showed deliberate indifference to the detainees’ brutal conditions of confinement and abuse sufficient to state a plausible constitutional claim:

The complaint alleges that guards routinely abused respondents; that the warden encouraged the abuse by referring to respondents as “terrorists”; that he prevented respondents from using normal grievance procedures; that he stayed away from the Unit to avoid seeing the abuse; that he was made aware of the abuse via “inmate complaints, staff complaints, hunger strikes, and suicide attempts”; that he ignored other “direct evidence of [the] abuse, including logs and other official [records]”; that he took no action “to rectify or address the situation”; and that the abuse resulted in the injuries described above * * *. These allegations—assumed here to be true, subject to proof at a later stage—plausibly show the warden’s deliberate indifference to the abuse. Consistent with the opinion of every judge in this case to have considered the question, including the dissenters in the Court of Appeals, the Court concludes that the prisoner abuse allegations against Warden Hasty state a plausible ground to find a constitutional violation if a Bivens remedy is to be implied.

642

582 U.S. at ___, 137 S.Ct. at 1864, 194 L.Ed.2d at 316. Without access to the Inspector General’s reports, how could plaintiffs in Abbasi have satisfied the plausibility standard unless permitted to engage in discovery? See Reinert, Pleading as Information-Forcing, 75 L. & Contemp.Probs. 1 (2012).

5.Does the plausibility standard differ from the heightened pleading approach rejected in Swierkiewicz, p. 614, supra, and Leatherman, p. 616, Note 2, supra? See Clermont & Yeazell, Inventing Tests, Destabilizing Systems, 95 Iowa L.Rev. 821, 832–33 (2010) (stating that plausible pleading is “a test not for factual detail, but for factual convincingness”). Does the plausibility standard differ from the requirement of fact-pleading under the codes? See Clermont, Three Myths about Twombly-Iqbal, 45 Wake Forest L.Rev. 1337, 1346 (2010).

6.Does the plausibility standard require the pleader to allege the best explanation, the most likely explanation, a reasonable explanation, a probable explanation, a possible explanation, or some other kind of explanation of the conduct that is alleged to be illicit? The Court in Iqbal, quoting Twombly, insisted that a plausibility requirement “is not akin to a ‘probability requirement,’ but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully.” See Cavanagh, Making Sense of Twombly, 63 S.C.L.Rev. 97, 112 (2011) (“We are left with a sort of Goldilocks approach: probability (too much); possibility (too little); plausibility (just right).”). The Seventh Circuit has said, “What is plausible has a moderately high likelihood of occurring.” In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litig., 630 F.3d 622, 629 (7th Cir. 2010) (Posner, J.).

7.By referring to the pleading standard as a “context-specific task,” is Iqbal faithful to the principle of transsubstantivity set out in Rule 1, or does the pleading standard now depend on the category of the claim? Moreover, by having the merits of a legal claim turn on the individual judge’s “experience and common sense,” is there a danger that decisions to grant or deny a motion to dismiss will unduly reflect the judge’s implicit biases? Complicating matters still more, lower courts have taken divergent approaches in applying Twombly and Iqbal. See Steinman, The Rise and Fall of Plausibility Pleading?, 69 Vand.L.Rev. 333 (2016). One commentator has warned:

These dismissals will normally take place without discovery, discovery that is sorely needed in some lawsuits such as discrimination cases, where intent is a necessary element. The new “plausibility” test, to be applied after a judge strikes allegations that he or she thinks are conclusory, is an invitation to ad hoc decision making. Judges, like all of us, look at life’s occurrences through the lenses of personal experience.

643

Subrin, The Limitations of Transsubstantive Procedure: An Essay on Adjusting the “One Size Fits All” Assumption, 87 Denv.U.L.Rev. 377, 389 (2010).

8.Many civil law systems (as in Germany or Italy) require the pleader to set forth the facts of the claim with particularity. See Sherman, Transnational Perspectives Regarding the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 56 J. Legal Educ. 510, 515 (2006). The Principles of Transnational Civil Procedure, issued by the American Law Institute together with the International Institute for the Unification of Private Law, likewise require that pleadings “be in detail with particulars as to the basis of claim and that the particulars reveal a set of facts that, if proved, would entitle the claimant to a judgment.” Hazard, Taruffo, Sturmer & Gidi, Introduction to the Principles and Rules of Transnational Civil Procedure, 33 N.Y.U. J. Int’l L. & Pol. 769, 775 (2001). Have pleading rules in the United States converged with those in force in other countries? See Dodson, Comparative Convergences in Pleading Standards, 158 U.Pa.L.Rev. 441 (2010). Or does the requirement of plausible pleading set out a different requirement?

9. Numerous studies have tried to measure the effects of Twombly and Iqbal on case-dismissal rates. A study comparing cases in 2006 (before Twombly) and 2010 (after Iqbal) concluded: “Iqbal and Twombly are associated with a pleading regime in which plaintiffs do worse at nearly every stage. They are more likely to have their case dismissed, and less likely to proceed to discovery and adjudication of the merits of their claims. Even if they survive dismissal, the cases are less likely to be successful in 2010 than in 2006.” Reinert, Measuring the Impact of Plausibility Pleading, 101 Va.L.Rev. 2117, 2171 (2015). Another study found “an overall increase in the dismissal rate (as a function of motions) of all claims from 73.3% pre-Twombly to 77.2% post-Iqbal”—and that lawsuits filed by prisoners, in forma pauperis, and pro se are “highly correlative with dismissal-rate increases.” Dodson, A New Look: Dismissal Rates of Federal Civil Claims, 9 Judicature 127, 132, 134 (2012). However, the literature emphasizes the difficulty of using grant rates as a measure of the effects of the new pleading standard. As Professor Gelbach has explained:

[B]ecause parties can be expected to change their behavior in response to perceived changes in the pleading standard, grant rate changes do not identify judicial behavior effects. Second, even if judicial behavior effects could, somehow, be identified, they are only part of the normatively relevant story of pleading standard changes.

Gelbach, Can the Dark Arts of the Dismal Science Shed Light on the Empirical Reality of Civil Procedure?, 2 Stan. J. Complex Litig. 223, 293 (2014). For other studies on the practical impact of Twombly and Iqbal, see Gelbach, Material Facts in the Debate Over Twombly and Iqbal, 68 Stan.L.Rev. 369 (2016); Cooper, King Arthur Confronts Twlqy Pleading, 90 Or.L.Rev. 955 (2012).

10.State courts are not required to follow the Federal Rules or federal judicial standards governing the sufficiency of a complaint. State courts so far have not unanimously rejected or adopted the Twombly or Iqbal standards.

644

See, e.g., Warne v. Hall, 373 P.3d 588, 595 (Colo. 2016) (adopting Twombly and Iqbal in interpreting the pleading standard in the Colorado Rules of Civil Procedure); Walsh v. U.S. Bank, N.A., 851 N.W.2d 598, 603 (Minn. 2014) (“[W]e now decline to engraft the plausibility standard from Twombly and Iqbal onto our traditional interpretation of Minn.R.Civ.P. 8.01.”); McCurry v. Chevy Chase Bank, 169 Wash.2d 96, 233 P.3d 861 (2010) (declining to apply the plausibility standard and explaining that the federal approach “is predicated on policy determinations specific to the federal trial courts”); Sisney v. Best Inc., 754 N.W.2d 804, rehearing denied (S.D. 2008) (adopting Twombly standard for state court pleadings); Colby v. Umbrella, Inc., 184 Vt. 1, 955 A.2d 1082 (2008) (rejecting Twombly and retaining Conley standard for state court pleadings); Cullen v. Auto-Owners Insurance Co., 218 Ariz. 417, 189 P.3d 344 (2008) (rejecting Twombly and Conley standards and retaining unique Arizona state pleading requirements). See generally Clopton, Procedural Retrenchment and the States, 106 Calif.L.Rev. 411, 424–27 (2018). One empirical study found no systematic increase in the rate of removal in notice-pleading states. See Curry & Ward, Are Twombly & Iqbal Affecting Where Plaintiffs File? A Study Comparing Removal Rates by State, 45 Tex.Tech.L.Rev. 827 (2013).

11. In JOHNSON v. CITY OF SHELBY, MISS., 574 U.S. 10, 135 S.Ct. 346, 190 L.Ed.2d 309 (2014), the Supreme Court summarily reversed the Fifth Circuit’s dismissal of a civil rights suit for failure to invoke 42 U.S.C. § 1983 in the complaint. The Court distinguished the case from Twombly and Iqbal, which pertain to the factual sufficiency of a complaint, and not its legal theory:

Petitioners stated simply, concisely, and directly events that, they alleged, entitled them to damages from the city. Having informed the city of the factual basis for their complaint, they were required to do no more to stave off threshold dismissal for want of an adequate statement of their claim. See Fed. Rules Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2) and (3), (d)(1), (e). For clarification and to ward off further insistence on a punctiliously stated “theory of the pleadings,” petitioners, on remand, should be accorded an opportunity to add to their complaint a citation to § 1983. See 5 Wright & Miller, [Federal Practice and Procedure] § 1219, at 277–278 (“The federal rules effectively abolish the restrictive theory of the pleadings doctrine, making it clear that it is unnecessary to set out a legal theory for the plaintiff’s claim for relief.” * * *).

Id. at 12, 135 S.Ct. at 347, 190 L.Ed.2d at 309. Similarly, in SKINNER v. SWITZER, 562 U.S. 521, 131 S.Ct. 1289, 179 L.Ed.2d 233 (2011), the Supreme Court reversed the dismissal of a complaint filed by a convicted state prisoner seeking DNA testing of crime-scene evidence. Justice Ginsburg, for a divided Court, underscored:

Skinner’s complaint is not a model of the careful drafter’s art, but under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a complaint need not pin plaintiff’s claim for relief to a precise legal theory. Rule 8(a)(2) of the Federal Rules * * * generally requires only a plausible “short and plain” statement of the plaintiff’s claim, not an exposition of his legal argument. See 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, [Federal Practice and Procedure] § 1219, pp. 277–278 (3d ed. 2004 and Supp. 2010).

645

Id. at 530, 190 S.Ct. at 1296, 179 L.Ed.2d at 241.

NOTE ON PLEADING STANDARDS AND PRO SE LITIGATION

Read the complaint in Erickson v. Pardus, which is reproduced in the Supplement.

ERICKSON v. PARDUS, 551 U.S. 89, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 167 L.Ed.2d 1081 (2007), was decided less than a month after Twombly. Plaintiff, an inmate in a Colorado prison, filed a pro se complaint alleging that defendants refused to give him necessary treatment for Hepatitis C, thereby putting his life in jeopardy in violation of the Eighth Amendment to the federal Constitution. The district court dismissed the complaint for failing to allege that the denial of treatment caused substantial harm. The court of appeals affirmed, finding that the complaint made “only conclusionary allegations” of harm. Erickson v. Pardus, 198 Fed.Appx. 694, 698 (10th Cir. 2006). The Supreme Court reversed, per curiam, emphasizing: “Specific facts are not necessary; the statement need only ‘give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds on which it rests.’” Bell Atlantic v. Twombly * * * (quoting Conley v. Gibson * * *).” 551 U.S. at 93, 127 S.Ct. at 2200, 167 L.Ed.2d at 1085.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Can Erickson be reconciled with Twombly and Iqbal? Do you agree with the statement that Erickson “appeared to exclude pro se cases from the application of Twombly”? See Hubbard, Testing for Change in Procedural Standards with Application to Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, 42 J. Legal Stud. 35, 61 (2013). Isn’t it as reasonable to say that the complaint in Erickson satisfied the Twombly standard because the statement that the prison refused to treat the inmate’s medical condition gave defendant fair notice of the claim; provided the basic facts of who-what-where-when-and-how supporting the claim; and read in the light of “judicial experience and common sense” plausibly alleged illicit behavior leading to physical harm?

2. Pro se lawsuits are estimated to comprise between 25 to 37 percent of total federal cases filed. See Rhodes, The Battle Lines of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) and the Effects on a Pro Se Litigant’s Ability to Survive a Motion to Dismiss, 22 St. Thomas L.Rev. 527, 531–32 (2010). The Supreme Court has held that pro se complaints are subject “to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers.” Haines v. Kerner, 404 U.S. 519,

646

520, 92 S.Ct. 594, 596, 30 L.Ed.2d 652, 654 (1972). Nevertheless, post-Twombly, the rate of dismissal of pro se complaints has increased more than the overall dismissal rate. See Schneider, Illiberal Construction of Pro Se Pleadings, 159 U.Pa.L.Rev. 585, 605 (2011).

3. Is plaintiff’s inability or unwillingness to retain counsel suggestive that the claims are not plausible? That they lack merit? For an interesting discussion of this question by a divided court of appeals, see Merritt v. Faulkner, 823 F.2d 1150 (7th Cir. 1987). Why might a party with a meritorious claim be unable to secure counsel? See Jefferson, Brennan Lecture—Liberty and Justice for Some: How the Legal System Falls Short in Protecting Basic Rights, 88 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1953 (2013).

4.FORM OF PLEADINGS; ALTERNATIVE AND INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 8(d) and 10(b) and related materials in the Supplement.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Can a court reject a pleading for including too much information? Federal Rule 8(d) states that “[e]ach allegation must be simple, concise, and direct.” In HEARNS v. SAN BERNADINO POLICE DEPARTMENT, 30 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 2008), the Court of Appeals held it was an abuse of discretion to dismiss the first amended complaint solely on the basis of its length. Similarly, in Swanson v. Citibank, N.A., p. 672, infra, the Seventh Circuit held that a claim for housing discrimination was not rendered defective by the inclusion of extraneous facts in the complaint. However, in DEYO v. INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE, 2002 WL 1482517, *1 (D.Conn. 2002), the district court conditionally dismissed a complaint because it was “neither short nor plain,” and instead ran for 43 pages including “verbatim dialogue from such things as telephone conversations.” In some cases, the pleading defect is not the document’s length, but rather the inability of the court and opposing party “to select the relevant material from a mass of verbiage.” Salahuddin v. Cuomo, 861 F.2d 40, 42 (2d Cir. 1988). Do the Federal Rules provide a mechanism for striking redundant allegations? Keep this question in mind when you read Rule 12(f).

2. At common law, pleadings were designed to reduce every controversy to a single issue of law or fact. Alternative and hypothetical allegations would have made the search for the single issue impossible and therefore they were forbidden. See McDonald, Alternative Pleading: I, 48 Mich.L.Rev. 311 (1950). Despite occasional statements indicating that inconsistent allegations are improper, see, e.g., Sinclair v. Fotomat Corp., 140 Cal.App.3d 217, 189 Cal.Rptr. 393, 399 (1983) (a case involving verified pleadings), the pleading of inconsistent and alternative statements is permitted, if “at least one set of facts” is sufficient to support the plausibility of the pleading. Elena v.

647

Municipality of San Juan, 677 F.3d 1, 8 (1st Cir. 2012). For example, in LEAL v. McHUGH, 731 F.3d 405 (5th Cir. 2013), suit was brought by applicants for federal jobs who had been passed over during the hiring process in favor of another applicant. Plaintiffs alleged age discrimination and personal relationship as the reasons for the selection, and the appeals court held that at the motion to dismiss stage, the pleading of inconsistent allegations was “not fatal to the complaint.” Id. at 415.

3. Rule 8(d) permits the pleading of inconsistent claims, which, as the Eleventh Circuit has emphasized, allows plaintiff to assert “alternative and contradictory theories of liability.” ADINOLFE v. UNITED TECHS. CORP., 768 F.3d 1161, 1175 (11th Cir. 2014). As commentary observes, “[T]he federal rules recognize that inconsistency in the pleadings does not necessarily mean dishonesty, and that frequently a party, after a reasonable inquiry and for proper purposes, must assert contradictory statements when he or she legitimately is in doubt about the factual background of the case or the legal bases that underlie affirmative recovery or defense.” 5 Wright, Miller & Spencer, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1283 (4th ed.).

4. Rule 10(b) requires pleadings to contain separately numbered paragraphs, and provides that “as far as practicable,” paragraphs should contain separate counts for claims arising from different transactions. For a criticism, see Tompkins v. Central Laborers’ Pension Fund, 2009 WL 3836893 (C.D.Ill. 2009) (calling a requirement that the complaint set out each legal theory in a separate count “a throwback to code pleading, perhaps all the way back to the forms of action”), quoting Bartholet v. Reishauer A.G. \(Zurich\), 953 F.2d 1073, 1078 (7th Cir. 1992).

5.PLEADING SPECIAL MATTERS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9 and the related materials in the Supplement.

KEARNS v. FORD MOTOR COMPANY
United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 2009.
567 F.3d 1120.

N.R. SMITH, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

[Plaintiff filed a class action in California state court alleging violations of the California Consumers Legal Remedies Act (“CLRA”) and the California Unfair Competition Law (“UCL”). The action was removed to federal court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction and, after unsuccessfully challenging remand, plaintiff filed an amended complaint.

648

Plaintiff claimed that Ford Motor Company and its dealerships acted illegally to increase sales of Certified Pre-Owned (“CPO”) vehicles, in violation of the CLRA and UCL. The district court dismissed the amended complaint with leave to amend, and plaintiff filed a Second Amended Complaint. The district court dismissed the Second Amended Complaint, with leave to amend for failing to meet the particularity requirement of Federal Rule 9(b). Plaintiff filed a Third Amended Complaint, which Defendant moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion with leave to amend. Plaintiff then filed a Notice of Intent Not to File an Amended Complaint, whereupon the district court dismissed the case and Plaintiff timely filed a notice of appeal. The Third Amended Complaint (“TAC”) was the operative complaint on appeal.]

* * *

Ford offers potential buyers three classifications of cars to purchase—new, used, and CPO. CPO vehicles are late model used vehicles, which Ford purports to put through a rigorous inspection process in order to certify that the vehicle’s safety, reliability, and road-worthiness surpass non-certified used vehicles. Ford advertises and markets these CPO vehicles to purchasers at a premium (above that charged for ordinary used cars).

Ford Motor Company markets and sells the CPO program to its dealerships as a way of repackaging its used car inventory while increasing their profit margin. Ford Motor Company then charges each dealership (1) an annual fee for the program and (2) a per-vehicle fee for each vehicle in the program. Once enrolled, the dealership is supplied with marketing materials, instructional guides, and access to the CPO database, which allows the dealerships to print standard “Maroney-type” window stickers. In addition, Ford Motor Company pays to promote, market, and advertise the CPO program through a variety of print, broadcast, online, and other media. Local dealerships are responsible for the implementation of the sale and service of CPO vehicles.

Kearns makes several allegations concerning the purported benefits of CPO vehicles. Specifically, Kearns contends that Ford makes false and misleading statements concerning the safety and reliability of its CPO vehicles. Kearns claims that, by making such false statements, Ford conspires to mislead class members into believing that the CPO program guarantees a safer, more reliable, and more roadworthy used vehicle. Such statements are allegedly made to get purchasers to rely on the notion that CPO vehicles are safer due to the certification process. Ford engages in such conduct to give the buyers of CPOs “peace of mind,” which purportedly costs $1,080 dollars, an amount Kearns claims exceeds the benefit of this “peace of mind.”

Kearns also alleges that Ford has failed to disclose the very little oversight it has over the certification process. Kearns claims that Ford misrepresents (1) the quality of the complete repair and accident-history report; (2) the level of training of CPO technicians; and (3) the rigorous certification inspection. Such misrepresentations are claimed to provide the consumer with a sense of security that their CPO has passed a rigorous inspection, has an extended warranty, and therefore is more safe, more reliable, and more roadworthy than a regular used vehicle. Kearns argues that the inspection is not rigorous; the warranty does not cover all components; and the CPO vehicles are not any safer, more reliable, or more roadworthy than a regular used vehicle.

* * *

Kearns argues that his claims should not be subject to Rule 9(b), because (1) California state law precedent is contrary to Rule 9(b); (2) some of his claims are not based in fraud; and (3) the complaint should have been evaluated under the unfairness prong of the UCL instead. * * * We review de novo dismissals under Rule 9(b). * * * Thus, the panel must consider the matter anew, as if no decision previously had been rendered.* * *

* * *

Rule 9(b) demands that the circumstances constituting the alleged fraud “be ‘specific enough to give defendants notice of the particular misconduct . . . so that they can defend against the charge and not just deny that they have done anything wrong.’ ” * * * “Averments of fraud must be accompanied by ‘the who, what, when, where, and how’ of the misconduct charged.” * * * A party alleging fraud must “set forth more than the neutral facts necessary to identify the transaction.” * * *

Rule 9(b) serves three purposes: (1) to provide defendants with adequate notice to allow them to defend the charge and deter plaintiffs from the filing of complaints “as a pretext for the discovery of unknown wrongs”; (2) to protect those whose reputation would be harmed as a result of being subject to fraud charges; and (3) to “prohibit[] plaintiff[s] from unilaterally imposing upon the court, the parties and society enormous social and economic costs absent some factual basis.” * * * “[W]hile a federal court will examine state law to determine whether the elements of fraud have been pled sufficiently to state a cause of action, the Rule 9(b) requirement that the circumstances of the fraud must be stated with particularity is a federally imposed rule.” [Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097, 1103 (9th Cir. 2003)] * * *.

A.

Kearns’s first argument—that Rule 9(b) does not apply to California’s consumer protection statutes because California courts have not applied Rule 9(b) to the Consumer Protection Statutes, which include the CLRA and UCL—is unavailing. It is well-settled that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure apply in federal court, “irrespective of the source of the subject matter jurisdiction, and irrespective of whether the substantive law at issue is state or federal.” * * *

The CLRA prohibits “unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices undertaken by any person in a transaction intended to result or which results in the sale . . . of goods or services to any consumer.” Cal. Civ. Code § 1770. The UCL prohibits “unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act[s] or practice[s]” and “unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising.” Cal. Bus. & Prof.Code § 17200. Rule 9(b)’s particularity requirement applies to these state-law causes of action. * * *

B.

Kearns next argues that some of his claims are not grounded in fraud, and so should not be subject to Rule 9(b). This argument is also unavailing.

While fraud is not a necessary element of a claim under the CLRA and UCL, a plaintiff may nonetheless allege that the defendant engaged in fraudulent conduct. * * * A plaintiff may allege a unified course of fraudulent conduct and rely entirely on that course of conduct as the basis of that claim. In that event, the claim is said to be ‘grounded in fraud’ or to ‘sound in fraud,’ and the pleading * * * as a whole must satisfy the particularity requirement of Rule 9(b). * * *

Reviewing the complaint, Kearns alleges that Ford engaged in a fraudulent course of conduct. Kearns’s TAC alleges that Ford Motor Company conspires with its dealerships to misrepresent the benefits of its CPO program to sell more cars and increase revenue. Kearns alleges that Ford’s marketing materials and representations led him to believe that CPO vehicles were inspected by specially trained technicians and that the CPO inspections were more rigorous and therefore more safe. Kearns alleges he was exposed to these representations through (1) Ford’s televised national marketing campaign; (2) sales materials found at the dealership where he bought his vehicle; and (3) sales personnel working at the dealership where he bought his vehicle. In reliance on these representations, Kearns claims he purchased a CPO vehicle. Therefore he alleges that Ford engaged in a fraudulent course of conduct.

However, Kearns fails to allege in any of his complaints the particular circumstances surrounding such representations. Nowhere in the TAC does Kearns specify what the television advertisements or other sales material specifically stated. Nor did Kearns specify when he was exposed to them or which ones he found material. Kearns also failed to specify which sales material he relied upon in making his decision to buy a CPO vehicle. Kearns does allege that he was specifically told “CPO vehicles were the best used vehicles available as they were individually hand-picked and rigorously inspected used vehicles with a Ford-backed extended warranty.” Kearns does not, however, specify who made this statement or when this statement was made. Kearns failed to articulate the who, what, when, where, and how of the misconduct alleged. The pleading of these neutral facts fails to give Ford the opportunity to respond to the alleged misconduct. Accordingly, these pleadings do not satisfy the requirement of Rule 9(b) that “a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud. . . .” Because Kearns failed to plead his averments of fraud with particularity, we affirm the district court’s dismissal of his TAC.

651

Kearns counters that his entire TAC was not grounded in fraud because all of his allegations were not averments in fraud. For example, Kearns contends that his claims against Ford for their failure to disclose information pertinent to consumers are not based in fraud. * * *

* * *

The court in Vess held that “where fraud is not an essential element of a claim, only allegations (‘averments’) of fraudulent conduct must satisfy the heightened pleading requirements of Rule 9(b).” Vess, 317 F.3d at 1105. Applying this rule, the court found that, “[b]ecause Vess’s allegations . . . do not rely entirely on a unified fraudulent course of conduct, his claims . . . are not ‘grounded in fraud’ ” as a whole. Id. at 1106. The court found that some of Vess’s claims were “not based on fraud . . . neither mention[ing] the word ‘fraud,’ nor alleg[ing] facts that would necessarily constitute fraud.”¹ Id. at 1105–06. The claims of failure to disclose in Vess were held to “describe non-fraudulent conduct.” Id. at 1106.

However, in Vess, this court derived its elements of fraudulent misrepresentation from the California Court of Appeals case, Hackethal v. National Casualty Co., 189 Cal.App.3d 1102, 234 Cal.Rptr. 853, 857 (1987). Id. at 1105, 234 Cal.Rptr. 853 * * *. These elements, however, have been changed by the Supreme Court of California to include nondisclosure. * * * Because the Supreme Court of California has held that nondisclosure is a claim for misrepresentation in a cause of action for fraud, it (as any other fraud claim) must be pleaded with particularity under Rule 9(b). * * * Kearns’s claims of nondisclosure were couched in general pleadings alleging Ford’s intent to conceal from customers that CPO vehicles were essentially the same as ordinary used vehicles. Such general pleadings do not satisfy the heightened pleading requirements of Rule 9(b). * * *

C.

Finally, Kearns contends that the district court erred by failing to specifically evaluate his complaint under the unfairness prong of the UCL. Specifically, Kearns contends that a determination of whether a business practice violates the unfairness prong is fact intensive and not conducive to resolution on a motion to dismiss. We disagree.

652

The UCL prohibits unfair competition, which it broadly defines as including “any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice and unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising.” * * * Each prong of the UCL is a separate and distinct theory of liability; thus, the “unfair” practices prong offers an independent basis for relief. * * *

We held in Vess that if “the claim is said to be ‘grounded in fraud’ . . . the pleading of that claim as a whole must satisfy the particularity requirement of Rule 9(b).” Id. at 1103–04 (emphasis added).¹ Kearns’s TAC alleges a unified course of fraudulent conduct, namely that Ford Motor Company and its “co-conspirator” dealerships knowingly misrepresent to the public that CPO vehicles are safer and more reliable, with an intent to induce reliance and defraud consumers. Because Kearns’s TAC alleges a unified fraudulent course of conduct, his claims against Ford are grounded in fraud. His entire complaint must therefore be pleaded with particularity. Thus, the TAC was properly dismissed and no error was committed by not separately analyzing his claims under the unfairness prong of the UCL.

* * *

IV. CONCLUSION

The requirement in Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules * * * that allegations of fraud be pleaded with particularity applies to claims which are made in federal court under the CLRA and UCL. We hold that Kearns’s entire TAC was grounded in fraud. Thus, under Rule 9(b), Kearns’s failure to plead his claims with particularity merited that complaint’s dismissal. * * *

AFFIRMED.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

