1. Are you convinced that Rule 9(b) imposes a heightened pleading standard, as the Ninth Circuit held in Kearns, on claims that are “grounded in fraud” or “sound in fraud,” even when fraud is not an element of the claim? Hasn’t the Supreme Court twice rejected applying heightened pleading requirements outside the boundaries of Rule 9(b)? See Fairman, Heightened Pleading, 81 Tex.L.Rev. 551 (2002).
2. Kearns held that the Third Amended Complaint was deficient because it failed to allege the specific advertisements that plaintiff saw and relied upon. Under California law, plaintiff can win after trial if the misrepresentations and false statements are a part of an extensive campaign, without proof of individual reliance on a particular advertisement. Some district courts have questioned whether the Kearns approach to Rule 9(b) raises problems under the Rules Enabling Act, explaining that to require plaintiffs to plead claims with more particularity “than they are required to prove them at trial would abridge and modify their substantive legal rights.” Opperman v. Path, Inc., 84 F.Supp.3d 962, 978 (N.D.Cal. 2015). What is your response? But see Yastrab v. Apple Inc., 173 F.Supp.3d 972 (N.D.Cal. 2016) (particularity required for state consumer claims).

653

3.Do the reasons for requiring the heightened pleading of fraud apply as well to claims of mistake? See Richman, Lively & Mell, The Pleading of Fraud: Rhymes Without Reason, 60 S.Calif.L.Rev. 959, 979 (1987). According to one court, fraud and mistake share a “common thread” that justifies their similar treatment:

Unlike other intentional or negligent acts, both fraud and mistake are claims which, by their nature, involve mutual or unilateral confusion and/or delusion. Both claims derive from a party’s own subjective misperception, misapprehension or misunderstanding and subsequent reliance. Such claims often may not be readily apparent to others and may appear to contradict existing facts or contracts. Unless defendant and others share plaintiff’s view of the situation, they will find it difficult to grasp plaintiff’s claim. * * * Allegations of fraud and mistake seek to undermine the reality of presumed facts and are by their nature unsettling to the parties and their agreements.

Breeden v. Richmond Community College, 171 F.R.D. 189, 202 (M.D.N.C. 1997). But see Fairman, An Invitation to the Rulemakers—Strike Rule 9(b), 38 U.C.Davis L.Rev. 281 (2004) (questioning whether allegations of mistake pose any reputational injuries).

4.Is it reasonable to require plaintiff, on pain of dismissal, to plead with particularity matters that are within the exclusive custody of defendant? See Sovern, Reconsidering Federal Civil Rule 9(b): Do We Need Particularized Pleading Requirements in Fraud Cases?, 104 F.R.D. 143 (1985). If the pleading of fraud is special, might there also be a need for special discovery rules, for example, authorizing limited pre-filing discovery, mandatory discovery while the motion to dismiss is pending, or cost-shifting? Consider these possibilities in the context of discovery, Chapter 11, infra, and case management, Chapter 12, infra.

Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995

In the wake of the stock market crash of 1929, Congress enacted the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 in order to curb abusive and fraudulent conduct in the securities markets. Rule 10b–5 of the 1934 Act bars an individual or a company from making “any untrue statement of a material fact or [from] omit[ting] to state a material fact necessary in order to make the statements made, in the light of the circumstances under which they were made, not misleading.” 17 C.F.R. § 240.10b–5. Private investors may sue to enforce the statute; a defendant will be held liable for a violation of Rule 10b–5 only if plaintiff can prove scienter, namely, that defendant knew the statement was false or defendant was reckless in disregarding a substantial risk that the statement was false.

654

In 1995, Congress—reacting to concerns that class action securities lawsuits had become abusive—enacted (over a Presidential veto) the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act (PSLRA) of 1995. The PSLRA imposed what Professor Miller has called a “super-heightened pleading standard” on complaints brought under the 1934 Act. See Miller, The Pretrial Rush to Judgment: Are the “Litigation Explosion,” “Liability Crisis,” and Efficiency Clichés Eroding Our Day in Court and Jury Trial Commitments?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982, 1012 (2003). The pleader must specify every statement alleged to have been misleading and to provide reasons that the statement is misleading. Facts giving rise to a “strong inference” that defendant acted with the required state of mind must be stated with particularity. Moreover, if an allegation is made on information and belief, the pleader must provide all facts on which the belief is based and state those facts with particularity. The PSLRA stays discovery while a motion to dismiss is pending, providing a limited exception for “particularized discovery” if necessary “to preserve evidence or to prevent undue prejudice.” 15 U.S.C. § 78u–4(b)(3)(B). See Perino, Did the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act Work?, 2003 U.Ill.L.Rev. 913, 918–23.

One issue that divided the lower courts was the pleading of “loss causation”—whether defendant’s fraud caused plaintiff’s economic loss. In DURA PHARMACEUTICALS, INC. v. BROUDO, 544 U.S. 336, 125 S.Ct. 1627, 161 L.Ed.2d 577 (2005), the Court rejected the Ninth Circuit’s approach that loss causation could be sufficiently alleged by stating that “the price” of the security “on the date of purchase was inflated because of the misrepresentation.” Instead, the pleader must allege and prove a market decline that is attributable to the fraud. Some commentators criticized the Court’s approach as effectively converting the 1934 Securities Act into an ex post rule of immunity that is at odds with the statute’s requirement of ex ante disclosure. See Spindler, Why Shareholders Want Their CEOs To Lie More After Dura Pharmaceuticals, 95 Geo.L.J. 653, 657, 691 (2007). Another question that divided the courts concerned how a pleader could show the “strong inference” required under the PSLRA, a term that Congress did not define.

TELLABS, INC. v. MAKOR ISSUES & RIGHTS, LTD.

Supreme Court of the United States (2007).
551 U.S. 308, 127 S.Ct. 2499, 168 L.Ed.2d 179.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

JUSTICE GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Plaintiffs purchased shares in the defendant company, which manufactures specialized equipment for fiber optic networks. They filed a class action alleging that the company and its chief executive and other officers engaged in a scheme to deceive the investing public about the true value of Tellabs stock. In particular, the complaint alleged that the chief executive misled the public in four ways: by falsely stating financial results; by inflating revenue projections; by falsely claiming demand for its flagship product was strong; and by falsely announcing a next-generation product was ready to ship and demand was growing. The District Court dismissed the complaint without prejudice for failure to plead with particularity. Plaintiffs amended the complaint, adding references to 27 confidential sources and making specific references to the chief executive’s mental state. The District Court dismissed the amended complaint with prejudice, and the Court of Appeals reversed in relevant part, finding that the amended complaint sufficiently alleged that the chief executive had acted with the requisite state of mind. In so holding, the Court of Appeals stated that a complaint should survive “if it alleges facts from which, if true, a reasonable person could infer that the defendant acted with the required intent,” and, further, “[i]f a reasonable person could not draw such an inference from the alleged facts, the defendants are entitled to dismissal.”]

* * *

* * * We granted certiorari to resolve the disagreement among the Circuits on whether, and to what extent, a court must consider competing inferences in determining whether a securities fraud complaint gives rise to a “strong inference” of scienter. * * *

* * *

Exacting pleading requirements are among the control measures Congress included in the [Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, “PSLRA”] * * *. [The Act requires that] plaintiffs must “state with particularity facts giving rise to a strong inference that the defendant acted with the required state of mind.” * * *

* * * In the case before us, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that the “strong inference” standard would be met if the complaint “allege[d] facts from which, if true, a reasonable person could infer that the defendant acted with the required intent.” 437 F.3d 588, 602 (2006). That formulation, we conclude, does not capture the stricter demand Congress sought to convey * * *. Rather, to determine whether a complaint’s scienter allegations can survive threshold inspection for sufficiency, a court * * * must engage in a comparative evaluation; it must consider, not only inferences urged by the plaintiff, as the Seventh Circuit did, but also competing inferences rationally drawn from the facts alleged. An inference of fraudulent intent may be plausible, yet less cogent than other, nonculpable explanations for the defendant’s conduct. To qualify as “strong” we hold an inference of scienter must be more than merely plausible or reasonable—it must be cogent and at least as compelling as any opposing inference of nonfraudulent intent.

* * *

We establish the following prescriptions: First, faced with a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss * * * courts must * * * accept all factual allegations in the complaint as true. * * *

Second, courts must consider the complaint in its entirety, as well as other sources courts ordinarily examine when ruling on Rule 12(b)(6) motions to dismiss, in particular, documents incorporated into the complaint by reference, and matters of which a court may take judicial notice. * * * The inquiry * * * is whether all of the facts alleged, taken collectively, give rise to a strong inference of scienter, not whether any individual allegation, scrutinized in isolation, meets that standard. * * *

Third, in determining whether the pleaded facts give rise to a “strong” inference of scienter, the court must take into account plausible opposing inferences. The Seventh Circuit expressly declined to engage in such a comparative inquiry. * * *

The strength of an inference cannot be decided in a vacuum. The inquiry is inherently comparative: How likely is it that one conclusion, as compared to others, follows from the underlying facts? * * * A complaint will survive, we hold, only if a reasonable person would deem the inference of scienter cogent and at least as compelling as any opposing inference one could draw from the facts alleged. * * *

While we reject the Seventh Circuit’s approach * * *, we do not decide whether, under the standard we have described, * * * [plaintiff’s] allegations warrant “a strong inference that * * * [defendants] acted with the required state of mind” * * *. Neither the District Court nor the Court of Appeals had the opportunity to consider the matter in light of the prescriptions we announce today. We therefore vacate the Seventh Circuit’s judgment so that the case can be reexamined in accord with our construction * * *.

* * *

JUSTICE SCALIA, concurring in the judgment.

I fail to see how an inference that is merely “at least as compelling as any opposing inference” * * * can conceivably be called what the statute here at issue requires: a “strong inference,” 15 U.S.C. § 78u–4(b)(2). If a jade falcon were stolen from a room to which only A and B had access, could it possibly be said there was a “strong inference” that B was the thief? I think not, and I therefore think that the Court’s test must fail. In my view, the test should be whether the inference of scienter (if any) is more plausible than the inference of innocence. * * *

JUSTICE ALITO, concurring in the judgment.

I agree with the Court that the Seventh Circuit used an erroneously low standard for determining whether the plaintiffs in this case satisfied their burden of pleading * * *. I further agree that the case should be remanded to allow the lower courts to decide in the first instance whether the allegations survive under the correct standard. In two respects, however, I disagree with the opinion of the Court. First, the best interpretation of the statute is that only those facts that are alleged “with particularity” may properly be considered in determining whether the allegations of scienter are sufficient. Second, I agree with Justice SCALIA that a “strong inference” of scienter, in the present context, means an inference that is more likely than not correct.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The PSLRA includes two separate pleading requirements. As the Third Circuit has explained:

First, * * * the complaint “must specify each allegedly misleading statement, why the statement was misleading, and, if an allegation is made on information and belief, all facts supporting that belief with particularity.” * * * Second, the complaint must, “with respect to each act or omission alleged to violate this chapter, state with particularity facts giving rise to a strong inference that the defendant acted with the required state of mind.”

Institutional Invs. Group v. Avaya, Inc., 564 F.3d 242, 252–53 (3d Cir. 2009) (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 78u–4(b)(1)–(2)). How does this dual approach differ from the requirement of particularity under Rule 9(b)?

2.The relevant question under Tellabs is whether a reasonable person would think that the inference of scienter is cogent and compelling. Is it significant that the Supreme Court used the word “would” and not “could”? Some commentary has argued that this word choice suggests “that even if a reasonable person could conclude that the inference of scienter is sufficient, the complaint still fails if a reasonable person could also reach the opposite conclusion.” See Miller, Pleading After Tellabs, 2009 Wis.L.Rev. 507, 510 (2009).

3.The Court in Tellabs appears to have assumed that pre-filing investigation suffices to enable a plaintiff to meet its pleading standard. See Nelles & Huber, Pleading Securities Fraud Claims: The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly, 45 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 653 (2014). If this assumption is wrong, critics argue, then Tellabs does not simply weed out frivolous cases—as the PSLRA was intended to do—but rather “also weeds out cases where the allegations of scienter are not strong, but where, with the benefit of discovery, the plaintiff might be able to establish the requisite state of mind at trial.” Miller, A Modest Proposal for Securities Pleading After Tellabs, 7 L. & Contemp.Probs. 93, 102–03 (2012).

658

4.In MATRIXx INITIATIVES, INC. v. SIRACUSANO, 563 U.S. 27, 131 S.Ct. 1309, 179 L.Ed.2d 398 (2011), the Supreme Court addressed two separate pleading questions. The first involved the pleading of materiality under Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, and applied the plausibility standard of Twombly and Iqbal. The second involved the pleading of scienter, which was assessed under the PSLRA. For both, the Court held that an allegation of statistical significance was not required to show that the omitted statements—in this case, adverse pharmaceutical event reports—were material to the reasonable investor and that defendant acted with the requisite state of mind. Matrixx has generated a number of important questions, including the relationship between the plausibility and the PSLRA pleading standards. See Steinberg & Gomez-Cornejo, Blurring the Lines Between Pleading Doctrines: The Enhanced Rule 8(a)(2) Plausibility Pleading Standard Converges with the Heightened Fraud Pleading Standards under Rule 9(b) and the PSLRA, 30 Rev.Litig. 1 (2010).

5. Many empirical studies have tried to assess the PSLRA’s effect on securities markets, in terms of firm value, litigation practice, judicial filings, and disposition rates. In the first decade after the PSLRA’s enactment, the number of securities class action filings did not decrease, but the cases involved higher-value claims and took a longer period of time to settle. Beginning around 2005, filing rates began to decline. See Choi & Thompson, Securities Litigation and Its Lawyers: Changes During the First Decade after the PSLRA, 106 Colum.L.Rev. 148 (2006). In 2012, the number of filings declined to 152, a 19 percent drop from the previous year and 21 percent below the average number of filings in the period 1997–2011. See Cornerstone Research, Securities Class Action Filings: 2012 Year in Review (Jan. 2013). Moreover, district courts appeared to have granted an increased percentage of motions to dismiss, and in almost every case filed under the PSLRA, defendant moved to dismiss the action. See Wunderlich, The Importance of the Prefiling Phase for Securities-Fraud Litigation, 45 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 739, 752–53 (2014). Nevertheless, in the first half of 2017, the filing of securities fraud class actions in federal court spiked, and was higher than at any other time since Congress enacted the PSLRA—more than twice the 1996–2016 average. See Cornerstone Research, Securities Class Action Filings: 2017 Year in Review, at 1.

6.PLEADING DAMAGES

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(g) in the Supplement.

659

McCULLEN, JUDGE. This action was brought by respondent as plaintiff against appellant as defendant to recover damages for injuries plaintiff alleged she sustained as a result of a collision between an automobile driven by her and a motor vehicle (tractor-trailer, also referred to as truck) operated by defendant's employee. A trial before the court and a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendant in the sum of $2000.00. After an unavailing motion for a new trial defendant appealed.

* * * Describing her injuries plaintiff alleged in her petition that "Plaintiff sustained injuries to her neck, back, spine and nervous system and was otherwise injured and her earning capacity has been permanently impaired."

* * *

For its first point defendant contends that the trial court erred in permitting plaintiff's counsel in his opening statement, over defendant's objection, to state to the jury that plaintiff's blood pressure had increased by the accident and in refusing to declare a mistrial on defendant's motion because of such statement and in permitting plaintiff to introduce evidence over defendant's objection of plaintiff's increased blood pressure and in refusing to declare a mistrial on defendant's motion because of the introduction of such evidence and also in permitting [plaintiff] over defendant's objection to present evidence of an injury to her shoulder. Defendant points out that plaintiff's petition does not allege that she was caused to develop high blood pressure or that such an existing condition was aggravated by the accident. Defendant further contends that the evidence does not establish that a continuing elevation in blood pressure is an inevitable or necessary result of the injuries averred and that the evidence of such condition was, therefore, inadmissible. In support of these contentions defendant cites a number of cases which apply the principle of law that before a plaintiff can recover for a physical condition claimed to have resulted from the negligence of another, such condition must be pleaded or the evidence must establish the condition as being the inevitable or necessary result of injuries which are particularly set out in the petition. The reason underlying such decisions is that it would be unjust to permit a plaintiff to take advantage of a defendant at the trial by presenting evidence of injuries of which the defendant did not have the kind of notice required by law, namely, through allegations in plaintiff's petition.

It is true the evidence in this case does show, as plaintiff contends, that defendant had actual notice before trial of plaintiff's increased blood pressure, which she claimed was a result of the collision, through a statement made by plaintiff to that effect to the Claim Agent of defendant's insurer and through an examination of plaintiff made by defendant's doctor, Dr. Leo A. Will, and reported by him to said Claim Agent as well as through plaintiff's deposition which was taken by defendant. However, we are of the opinion that although it cannot be said that defendant was "surprised" when plaintiff presented evidence at the trial relating to the condition of her blood pressure, defendant nevertheless had the right to object to such evidence on the ground that it related to "special damages" which were not pleaded in plaintiff's petition. Although defendant could not have claimed "surprise" upon the introduction of such evidence, it was not required to do so and its objections at the trial to such evidence in the absence of proper allegations thereon in plaintiff's petition should have been sustained. No such special damages were pleaded by plaintiff, nor did plaintiff ask leave to amend her petition to include such special damages which she could have done on such terms, at that stage of the proceedings, as the court should order. However, plaintiff did not amend her petition, nor ask leave to amend, and defendant had the right to object to the evidence in question.

660

* * * [Missouri Rule of Civil Procedure 55.19] expressly provides: "When items of special damage are claimed, they shall be specifically stated." * * *

It has been held by our Supreme Court that a specific personal injury which is not the necessary or inevitable result of an injury alleged in the petition constitutes an element of "special damage" which must be specifically pleaded before evidence thereof is admissible. See State ex rel. Grisham v. Allen, 344 Mo. 66, 124 S.W.2d 1080 (1939). * * *

In the case at bar the only allegations in plaintiff's petition with respect to the injuries she suffered as the result of the collision were as follows: "Plaintiff sustained injuries to her neck, back, spine and nervous system and was otherwise injured and her earning capacity has been permanently impaired." It will be observed that not only is there no mention of increased blood pressure but no injuries are alleged from which it can reasonably be said that an increase in blood pressure was an inevitable or necessary result. Nor was there any evidence to show that the increased blood pressure was the necessary or inevitable result of the injuries alleged in the petition.

* * *

What we have said herein with respect to the evidence of plaintiff's increase of blood pressure applies with equal force to the evidence of the injury to plaintiff's shoulder. In the absence of any allegation in plaintiff's petition relating to that injury, it was error for the court to admit such evidence.

* * *

661

On Motion for Rehearing or, in the Alternative, to Transfer to Supreme Court.

McCULLEN, JUDGE. Plaintiff has filed an extended motion for rehearing in which she earnestly argues that this court committed error in holding that the trial court erred in permitting plaintiff to introduce evidence of her high blood pressure when no such damage was pleaded in plaintiff's petition. * * *

It is contended by plaintiff that [the Missouri rule] * * *, which provides that when "items of special damage" are claimed "they shall be specifically stated,” having been copied verbatim from Rule 9(g) of the Federal Rules * * *, the “construction” given said Rule 9(g) by the Federal Courts must be given to [the Missouri rule as well] * * *. [The language of Rule 9(g) was altered slightly in 2007.]

* * *

* * * Plaintiff evidently has found no case in point on the facts of this case (just as we have found none) because, as we see it, the words of both Federal Rule 9(g) and the state [rule] * * * are so simple, plain and unambiguous that no one has even heretofore contended in a court of last resort that a party could plead only “general” damages and recover for “special” damages.

* * *

[Motion denied.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Federal Rule 9(g) requires that a claim for special damages “be specifically stated.” Does the requirement of specific statement differ from Rule 9(b)’s requirement that the circumstances of a fraud be stated with “particularity”? The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has written, “It is hard to know how specific is specific enough, but ‘specificity’ must be something less than the ‘particularity’ standard that Rule 9(b) prescribes for allegations of fraud.” Pippen v. NBCUniversal Media, LLC, 734 F.3d 610, 614 (7th Cir. 2013).

2. Rule 9(g) does not define what damages are special. A typical definition looks to whether the damages would be “unusual” for the type of claim asserted. For example, in a suit alleging breach of contract, general damages are the benefit of the bargain; special damages would be compensation for additional losses. See Schonfeld v. Hilliard, 218 F.3d 164, 175 (2d Cir. 2000). In an action for trespass, general damages are those for injury to the land itself; special damages would be lost profits from plans to use the property. See Weyerhaeuser Co. v. Brantley, 510 F.3d 1256, 1266 (10th Cir. 2007).

3. Considering the different claims asserted, which of the following items of damages would require specificity in pleading?

662

- (a) Medical bills incurred as a result of personal injuries in a car crash.
- (b) Unpaid health insurance benefits for multiple services rendered.
- (c) Aggravation of a pre-existing medical condition.
- (d) Losses that flow from contractual breach other than the value of the promised performance.

4. The normal consequence of failing to plead special damages is barring the pleader from proving them at trial. However, with regard to a few types of cases the existence of special damages is an integral part of the claim, and the failure to plead them renders the complaint subject to dismissal. Does the fact that a distinction along these lines is drawn by the courts of the state in which the federal court sits have any relevance to Rule 9(g)? Whether the specificity requirement is met is governed by federal law. See Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. v. Jacobson, 713 F.2d 262 (7th Cir. 1983). However, the federal court looks to state law to determine the elements of the claim. Thus, when state law required a libel claim to allege special damages, and the complaint failed to contain this allegation, the complaint was dismissed. See McGowan v. Homeward Residential, Inc., 500 Fed.Appx. 882 (11th Cir. 2012).

5. Is a request for attorney’s fees an item of special damages that must be specifically stated in the complaint? In 1993, Federal Rule 54 was amended in order “to provide for a frequently recurring form of litigation not initially contemplated by the rules—disputes over the amount of attorney’s fees to be awarded in the large number of actions in which prevailing parties may be entitled to such awards.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 54, Advisory Committee Notes. Some courts take the view that a request for attorney’s fees is to be raised by motion under Rule 54(d)(2), and that Rule 9(g) does not control, but there is division on this issue. See Riordan v. State Farm. Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 589 F.3d 999 (9th Cir. 2009).

7. THE PRAYER FOR RELIEF

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 8(a)(3) and 54(c) in the Supplement.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What is the relationship between Rule 8(a)(3), which requires the complaint to contain “a demand for the relief sought,” and Rule 54(c), which authorizes the court to order a final judgment granting “the relief to which each party is entitled, even if the party has not demanded that relief in its pleadings”? In ANHEUSER-BUSCH, INC. v. JOHN LABATT LTD., 89 F.3d 1339, 1349 (8th Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1109, 117 S.Ct. 944, 136 L.Ed.2d 833 (1997), plaintiff failed to mention punitive damages in its pleadings or answers to interrogatories. Plaintiff did plead a valid claim for injurious falsehood under state law and requested instructions on punitive damages a week prior to the trial. Over defendant’s objection the matter was presented to the jury, which awarded punitive damages in the amount of $5 million. The trial court struck the punitive damage award on the ground that plaintiff had not given sufficient notice of its intent to seek punitive damages. The appellate court affirmed. It did not cite Rules 8(a)(3), 9(g), or 54(c). If the goal is to prevent unfair surprise to defendant, should punitive damages (or some other form of relief) be available even if not specified in the demand for relief, so long as the facts justify such an award and no prejudice is shown? See Bowles v. Osmoste Utilities Services, Inc., 443 F.3d 671, 675 (8th Cir. 2006).

663

2. Most states follow the federal rule that relief is not limited by the ad damnum clause, with the exception that default judgments may not exceed the amount of damages sought or include a kind of relief not demanded in the complaint. Why should a defendant who defaults be protected by a cap on damages, but a defendant who participates be exposed to damages greater than those pleaded by the plaintiff? Should the remedy cap in Rule 54(c) apply if defendant appears but then does not respond to the complaint or defend the action? Default judgments are studied in Chapter 13, Section C, infra.

B. RESPONDING TO THE COMPLAINT

BACKGROUND NOTE ON FEDERAL RULE 12

After being served with the summons and complaint, defendant must respond to the lawsuit. Federal Rule 12 gives defendant two options. Defendant may file a responsive pleading, called an answer; or, defendant may file a motion that raises one or more of the defenses and objections set out in that rule.

Rule 12(b) sets out seven defenses—some of which are familiar to you from earlier chapters. For example, defendant may challenge the court’s subject-matter jurisdiction through a motion to dismiss on that ground under Rule 12(b)(1). What is the consequence of a defendant’s failure to raise an objection to subject-matter jurisdiction in its initial Rule 12 motion? See Rule 12(h)(3). By contrast, if defendant omits from the motion defenses listed in Rule 12(b)(2)–(5) (namely, lack of personal jurisdiction, improper venue, insufficient process, and insufficient service of process) those defenses are waived if they were available at the time of the motion. See Rule 12(g)(2) and Rule 12(h)(1). Which other defenses are preserved under Rule 12(h)?

The defenses in Rules 12(b)(1) through 12(b)(5) and 12(b)(7) are essentially modern counterparts to the common-law plea of abatement, which allowed defendant to challenge the pleading by asserting facts outside the record that create an impediment to the suit’s going forward. By raising a plea in abatement, the party conceded the merits. See Dodson, Hybridizing Jurisdiction, 99 Calif.L.Rev. 1439, 1452 (2011). There never was any doubt that courts may consider extra-pleading material on these motions. For a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, however, the court may consider material outside the pleadings only by treating the motion as one for summary judgment under Rule 56. See Rule 12(d).

664

1. THE TIME PERMITTED FOR A RESPONSE

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 4(d), 6(b), 12(a), and 12(b) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

Federal Rule 12(a), as amended in 2009, gives most defendants 21 calendar days from the date of service of the complaint to respond to the complaint either by a Rule 12 motion or by answering the complaint. How does the “waiver of service” provision under Rule 4(d) affect the time period for answering the complaint? The time to respond also may be extended by court order. See Rule 6(b). How does the filing of a Rule 12(b) motion affect the timing for the filings of a responsive pleading? See Rule 12(a)(4).

2. MOTION FOR A MORE DEFINITE STATEMENT AND MOTION TO STRIKE

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(e) and 12(f) in the Supplement.

GARCIA V. HILTON HOTELS INTERNATIONAL, INC.

United States District Court, District of Puerto Rico, 1951.
97 F.Supp. 5.

ROBERTS, DISTRICT JUDGE. The action here is for damages for defamation brought by plaintiff, a citizen and resident of Puerto Rico, against defendant, a Delaware corporation, in the District Court of Puerto Rico and removed to this Court by defendant corporation. The complaint sets forth two causes of action and the paragraphs considered herein are identical in each cause. Defendant has moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted and, in the alternative, to strike Paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 and for a more definite statement.

In support of its motion to dismiss, defendant contends that no publication of the alleged slanderous statement is alleged and that the complaint, therefore, fails to state a cause of action. This contention will be considered first with respect to Paragraph 4 of the complaint, which reads as follows: “4. On August 22, 1950, the plaintiff was violently discharged by the defendant, being falsely and slanderously accused of being engaged in bringing women from outside the Hotel and introducing them into the rooms thereof for the purpose of developing prostitution in the Hotel and that such women brought by him from outside the Hotel and introduced therein carried on acts of prostitution in said Hotel.”

* * *

The controlling question here, with respect to the motion to dismiss, is whether the allegations of Paragraph 4 of the complaint, state a claim upon which relief can be granted. An examination of the authorities is persuasive that [it] does. It is settled, with respect to motions to dismiss for insufficiency of statement, that the complaint is to be construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff with all doubts resolved in his favor and the allegations accepted as true. If, when a complaint is so considered, it reasonably may be anticipated that plaintiff, on the basis of what has been alleged, could make out a case at trial entitling him to some relief, the complaint should not be dismissed. * * *

Further, it has been a long recognized and generally accepted policy of the courts to look with disfavor upon the practice of terminating litigation, believed to be without merit, by dismissing the complaint for insufficiency of statement. * * *

‘That rule of procedure should be followed which will be most likely to result in justice between the parties, and, generally speaking, that result is more likely to be attained by leaving the merits of the cause to be disposed of after answer and the submission of proof, than by attempting to deal with the merits on motion to dismiss the bill.’

In the instant case, it is true that Paragraph 4, of the complaint, fails to state, in so many words, that there was a publication of the alleged slanderous utterance and, to that extent, the cause of action is defectively stated. However, it does not follow that the allegations do not state a claim upon which relief can be granted. It is alleged that plaintiff was “violently discharged” and was “falsely and slanderously accused” of procuring for prostitution. While in a technical sense, this language states a conclusion, it is clear that plaintiff used it intending to charge publication of the slanderous utterance and it would be unrealistic for defendant to claim that it does not so understand the allegations. * * * Clearly, under such allegations it reasonably may be conceived that plaintiff, upon trial, could adduce evidence tending to prove a publication. * * *

In further support of its motion to dismiss, defendant contends that the alleged slanderous utterance was conditionally privileged. Conceding that to be so does not require that a different conclusion be reached with respect to the motion to dismiss. Rule 12(b) requires that every defense in law or fact be asserted in a responsive pleading when one is required or permitted under the rules. The rule, however, enumerates certain defenses which may be asserted by motion to dismiss, all of which go to the jurisdiction except that of failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, rule 12(b)(6). And this latter defense may be asserted successfully by a motion prior to responsive pleading only when it appears to a certainty that plaintiff would be entitled to no relief under any state of fact which could be proved in support of the claim asserted by him. * * *

The conclusiveness of privilege as a defense depends upon whether the privilege involved [is] absolute or conditional. When the privilege involved is absolute, it constitutes a finally determinative or conclusive defense to an action based on the utterance. Consequently, when it appears from a complaint that absolute privilege exists, the defense of failure to state a claim properly may be asserted to accomplish a dismissal on motion under rule 12(b). It is for the court to determine the existence of privilege and when absolute privilege is found, it constitutes an unassailable defense and, clearly, in such a case, the claim stated is one upon which relief cannot be granted.

But conditional privilege is not a conclusive defense to an action based on a slanderous utterance. It is but a qualified defense which may be lost to the defendant if plaintiff can prove abuse of the privilege or actual malice. * * * When from the allegations contained therein, a complaint indicates the availability of the defense of conditional privilege, it cannot be held therefrom as a matter of law, that there has been a failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, such as will warrant dismissal of the complaint on motion under rule 12(b)(6), for the factual question remains whether defendant abused the privilege or made the communication maliciously. * * *

As has been noted, on motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim [the] complaint must be construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff with all doubts resolved in his favor and the allegation taken as true. That being so, when allegations are sufficient to sustain the defense of conditional privilege they will be, generally, sufficient to permit the introduction of evidence tending to prove abuse of the privilege or actual malice. Save in some extraordinary situation, allegations which are adequate for the admission of evidence to prove the defense of qualified privilege are adequate for the admission of evidence to negative that defense. It appears from the complaint in the instant case that defendant is entitled to raise the defense of conditional privilege. But this defense may be lost to it if plaintiff proves abuse of the privilege or actual malice. And, clearly, plaintiff may introduce evidence under the allegations for the purpose of proving abuse of the privilege or actual malice. Therefore, it is concluded that defendant’s motion to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted should be denied.

The conclusion to deny defendant’s motion to dismiss requires that consideration be given its alternative motion to strike Paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 of the complaint. It is alleged in these paragraphs, in substance, that upon being discharged, plaintiff made claim with the Labor Department of Puerto Rico for severance pay and overtime as is provided for by law (Section 20, Organic Act of Labor Department of Puerto Rico, approved April 14, 1931); that during a hearing on such claim held by the Labor Department, defendant, falsely and slanderously, repeated its charge that plaintiff had been engaged in procuring for prostitution; and, that, after said hearing defendant had compromised plaintiff’s claim for severance pay and overtime. As respects defendant’s motion to strike, the controlling allegations are contained in Paragraph 7 of this complaint.

Section 4 of “An Act Authorizing Civil Actions to recover Damages for Libel and Slander,” enacted by the Legislature of Puerto Rico and approved on February 19, 1902, (Code of Civil Procedure of Puerto Rico, Ed. 1933, page 309) provides in part as follows: “Section 4. A publication or communication shall not be held or deemed malicious when made in any legislative or judicial proceeding or in any other proceeding authorized by law. * * * ”

The effect of the above quoted portions of the statute is to confer absolute privilege upon any communication made in any of the proceedings contemplated therein. If the hearing held by the Labor Department on plaintiff’s claim for severance pay and overtime, referred to in Paragraph 7 of the complaint, is a proceeding within the meaning of the phrase “or any other proceeding authorized by law” as used in said Section 4 of the Act of February 19, 1902, the utterance was absolutely privileged and such privilege constitutes a conclusive defense in an action based on that utterance.

It appears that the hearing on plaintiff’s claim by the Labor Department, referred to in Paragraph 7 of the complaint, is a proceeding “authorized by law” within the meaning of Section 4 of the Act of February 19, 1902. The Labor Department is authorized to hold such a hearing by Act No. 122 of the Legislature of Puerto Rico, approved April 27, 1949, which statute requires the Commissioner of Labor to enforce labor protecting laws. * * *

It appears, upon examination, that this Statute (Act No. 122) has for its purpose the protection of the welfare of the workman and the furtherance of the public good, and that when hearings are held pursuant to its terms it is necessary, if those purposes are to be effectuated, that those called upon to give evidence therein must be protected against liability, civil or criminal, for communications given in evidence at such hearings. And this without regard for the motives of the witness or the truth or falsity of his statements. For otherwise, the giving of full, free and honest testimony, essential to the enforcement of such laws, will be discouraged. Therefore, communications made by witnesses in the course of such hearings, [sic] should be absolutely privileged in the same manner and to like extent as those made in the course of a judicial proceeding.

668

* * *

Clearly, then, the utterance of the defendant made during the Labor Department hearing referred to in Paragraph 7 of the complaint was absolutely privileged and that Paragraph 7 is, therefore, redundant in that it fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. It appears then, that defendant’s motion to strike Paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 should be granted.

The parties have agreed on hearing in open court that Paragraph 9 of the complaint should be stricken. And this Court being of the opinion that Paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 should be stricken as redundant, defendant’s motion for a more definite statement need be considered only with respect to the allegations of Paragraph 4 of the complaint.

As has been noted herein, conditional privilege is an affirmative defense which properly should be raised by its assertion in a responsive pleading. Consequently, when it appears from a complaint that the defense of conditional privilege may be available to a defendant, the allegations thereof should be reasonably adequate to permit the preparation of a responsive pleading asserting such defense. But when, in an action for slander, the complaint fails to set out substantially the utterance alleged to have been slanderously made or the facts relied upon to establish a publication of such utterance, such omission constitutes vagueness such as is a ground for granting a motion for more definite statement within the contemplation of rule 12(e). Obviously, when such material allegations are insufficient, it would be unreasonable to require the defendant to prepare a responsive pleading without a more definite statement of the pertinent facts.

Considering the allegations of Paragraph 4 of the complaint, * * * [they] suffer from vagueness with respect to the utterance alleged to have been slanderously made and the facts relied upon to establish a publication of the utterance. It is concluded that the defendant here is entitled to a more definite statement setting forth substantially the words alleged to have been slanderously uttered and the facts relied upon to establish a publication thereof.

Defendant’s motion to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted is denied. Defendant’s motion to strike Paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 of the complaint is granted. Defendant’s motion for a more definite statement with respect to the matters prescribed in this opinion, is granted. Paragraph 9 of the complaint is ordered stricken. The decisions herein reached are hereby made applicable to the second cause of action set out in the complaint.

669

1.As originally adopted, Rule 12(e) had two roles. A motion for a more definite statement under the rule could be made when the complaint was so vague or unintelligible as to make the opposing party unable to respond. Rule 12(e) also could operate as a “bill of particulars” to elicit the facts supporting the claim. In that latter role, Rule 12(e) generated a great deal of litigation, and came to be regarded as dilatory and unnecessary given the availability of discovery later in the litigation. Amendments adopted in 1948 eliminated the bill of particulars from federal practice. See Advisory Committee Note to proposed 1948 amendment to Rule 12(e), stating, “The tendency of some courts freely to grant extended bills of particulars has served to neutralize any helpful benefits derived from Rule 8, and has overlooked the intended use of the rules on depositions and discovery.”

2.In defendants’ hands, Rule 12(f) provides a mechanism for asking the court “to strike” from the complaint “redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter.” The motion is typically not granted absent a showing of prejudice to the movant. See Sheffield v. City of Boston, 319 F.R.D. 52 (D.Mass. 2016). As held in GATEWAY BOTTLING, INC. v. DAD’S ROOTBEER CO., 53 F.R.D. 585, 588 (W.D.Pa. 1971): “To strike material as scandalous it must be obviously false and unrelated to the subject matter of the action. * * * The facts here may be unpleasant for plaintiff to have on the record and they certainly contain charges of reprehensible conduct but the same is true of many facts of life which are entitled to be pleaded as relevant to a cause of action or defense.” The question whether allegations really are prejudicial seems to turn on whether the contents of the pleadings will be disclosed to the jury. Because the motion to strike may be used as a dilatory tactic, and the sanction of striking a portion of the complaint may be a drastic remedy, the motion is disfavored and frequently is denied. Note that Rule 12(f) can also be used by plaintiffs to strike an insufficient defense. See p. 683, Note 3, infra.

3.Rule 12(f) may not be used to dismiss all or part of a complaint. For example, in WHITTLESTONE, INC. v. HANDI-CRAFT CO., 618 F.3d 970 (9th Cir. 2010), the court of appeals held it was an abuse of discretion for the district court to strike a claim for lost profits and consequential damages from the complaint on the ground that the damages were precluded as a matter of law. Rather, the appropriate mechanism was a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). Why should the number of the rule and the form of the objection carry such significance?

4.The court has authority on its own initiative and without a motion by defendant to strike portions of a complaint and so to relieve defendant of responding to the redundant or immaterial allegations. See Simmons v. Abruzzo, 49 F.3d 83, 86–87 (2d Cir. 1995). Before dismissing a complaint that is not concise and direct, see p. 646, Note 1, supra, would it be appropriate for

670

- the court initially to strike matters that are prolix or repetitive? See Salahuddin v. Cuomo, 861 F.2d 40 (2d Cir. 1988).
- 5.What are the consequences to defendant of moving under Rule 12(e) or Rule 12(f) without including Rule 12(b) defenses at the same time? See Rule 12(g) and (h). Should it matter whether the motions are granted or denied? Is a defense “available” if the complaint is so prolix as to be incomprehensible? See 5C Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1388 (3d ed.).
- 6.What is the effect of a motion for a more definite statement on the timing of a responsive pleading? See Rule 12(a)(4)(B). Does the extension of time apply to a grant of a motion to strike under Rule 12(f)?
- 7.To what extent could plaintiff in Garcia have phrased the complaint to avoid the granting of defendant’s motions? How should plaintiff in Garcia alter the complaint to satisfy the court’s order for a more definite statement? Can he merely eliminate some of the allegations that gave rise to the conditional privilege? Suppose the court had denied defendant’s Rule 12(e) motion. How else might defendant have learned the details of the alleged defamatory publication? What are the advantages of the Rule 12(e) motion compared to these other means?
- 8.The decision in Garcia referred to the policy of deferring consideration of a motion to dismiss a complaint “believed to be without merit” until “after answer and the submission of proof.” Does that policy survive Twombly/ Iqbal? If not, what is the current utility of Rule 12(e)?

3.MOTION TO DISMISS FOR FAILURE TO STATE A CLAIM

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) and 12(d) and the materials accompanying them in the Supplement.

a.Historical Antecedents: The Common Law Demurrer

At common law, a party who faced a complaint could either answer, responding to each of the claims, or demur. If defendant demurred, he was not allowed to contest the complaint’s facts if the demurrer was overruled. On the other hand, if the demurrer was sustained, plaintiff had no right to replead or amend her complaint. Later, these harsh rules were modified to allow a party to proceed to the merits if the demurrer was overruled and to allow plaintiff to amend her complaint if the demurrer was sustained. The common law demurrer was incorporated into code pleading. In most code states, a complaint could be dismissed on the pleadings by a motion for failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, absence of subject-matter jurisdiction, and deficiencies in the form of the pleading. The demurrer and its code equivalents elevated the importance of technicalities and produced considerable delay and dissatisfaction. The “speaking demurrer,” a demurrer that attempted to introduce material outside the pleadings, was not permitted at common law or under the Codes. See Pike, Objections to Pleadings Under the New Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 47 Yale L.J. 50, 51 (1937).

671

b.Rule 12(b)(6) and Its Relation to Rule 8(a)

Federal Rule 12(b)(6) is the federal system’s counterpart to the common law demurrer. The purpose of the motion is to test the sufficiency of the complaint, and not to prove or disprove the allegations of the complaint. The motion must be made before the filing of a responsive pleading, but the defense is preserved and may be raised even at trial. See Rule 12(h)(2).

Practice under Rule 12(b)(6) must be read in tandem with Rule 8(a). So long as the complaint was expected only to give notice to defendant of plaintiff’s claim, the utility of the Rule 12(b)(6) motion was as a screening device for complaints that failed as a pure question of law. The earlier judicial attitude was expressed by the Ninth Circuit in RENNIE & LAUGHLIN, INC. v. CHRYSLER CORP., 242 F.2d 208, 213 (9th Cir. 1957):

Pretrial conference; the discovery procedures; and motions for a more definite statement, judgment on the pleadings and summary judgment, all provide useful tools for the sifting of allegations and the determination of the legal sufficiency of an asserted claim. The salvaged minutes that may accrue from circumventing these procedures can turn to wasted hours if the appellate court feels constrained to reverse the dismissal of an action. That is one of the reasons why a motion to dismiss is viewed with disfavor in the federal courts. Another is the basic precept that the primary objective of the law is to obtain a determination of the merits of any claim; and that a case should be tried on the proofs rather than the pleadings. * * * This is not to say or imply that a motion to dismiss should never be granted. It is obvious that there are cases which justify and indeed compel the granting of such motion. The line between the totally unmeritorious claims and the others cannot be drawn by scientific instruments but must be carved out case by case by the sound judgment of trial judges. That judgment should be exercised cautiously on such a motion.

The Supreme Court’s decisions in Twombly and Iqbal, p. 617 and p. 628, supra, signaled courts to place greater emphasis on the Rule 12(b)(6) motion to filter out cases prior to discovery. As earlier discussed, see p. 643, Note 9, supra, studies emphasize the difficulty of measuring these cases’ effects on litigant and judicial behavior, but generally they report higher grant rates of motions to dismiss.

SWANSON v. CITIBANK, N.A.
United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 2010.
614 F.3d 400.

WOOD, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

Gloria Swanson sued Citibank, Andre Lanier, and Lanier’s employer, PCI Appraisal Services, because she believed that all three had discriminated against her on the basis of her race (African-American) when Citibank turned down her application for a home-equity loan. * * * Swanson is proceeding pro se * * *. She was unsuccessful in the district court, which dismissed in response to the defendants’ [Rule 12(b)(6)] motion * * *.

Swanson based her complaint on the following set of events, which we accept as true for purposes of this appeal.* * * In February 2009 Citibank announced a plan to make loans using funds that it had received from the federal government’s Troubled Assets Relief Program. Encouraged by this prospect, Swanson went to a Citibank branch to apply for a home-equity loan. A representative named Skertich told Swanson that she could not apply alone, because she owned her home jointly with her husband; he had to be present as well. Swanson was skeptical, suspecting that Skertich’s demand was a ploy to discourage loan applications from African-Americans. She therefore asked to speak to a manager. When the manager joined the group, Swanson disclosed to both Skertich and the manager that Washington Mutual Bank previously had denied her a home-equity loan. The manager warned Swanson that, although she did not want to discourage Swanson from applying for the loan, Citibank’s loan criteria were more stringent than those of other banks.

Still interested, Swanson took a loan application home and returned the next day with the necessary information. She was again assisted by Skertich, who entered the information that Swanson had furnished into the computer. When he reached a question regarding race, Skertich told Swanson that she was not required to respond. At some point during this exchange, Skertich pointed to a photograph on his desk and commented that his wife and son were part African-American.

A few days later Citibank conditionally approved Swanson for a home-equity loan of $50,000. It hired Andre Lanier, who worked for PCI Appraisal Services, to visit Swanson’s home for an onsite appraisal. Although Swanson had estimated in her loan application that her house was worth $270,000, Lanier appraised it at only $170,000. The difference was critical: Citibank turned down the loan and explained that its conditional approval had been based on the higher valuation. Two months later Swanson paid for and obtained an appraisal from Midwest Valuations, which thought her home was worth $240,000.

Swanson saw coordinated action in this chain of events, and so she filed a complaint (later amended) charging that Citibank, Lanier, and PCI disfavor providing home-equity loans to African-Americans, and so they deliberately lowered the appraised value of her home far below its actual market value, so that they would have an excuse to deny her the loan. She charges that in so doing, they violated the Fair Housing Act, 42 U.S.C. § 3605, and the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1691(a)(1). The district court granted the defendants’ motions to dismiss both theories. * * * Initially, the court liberally construed Swanson’s complaint to include a common-law fraud claim and declined to dismiss that aspect of the case. Later, however, the defendants moved to dismiss the fraud claim as well, and the district court granted the motion on the grounds that the statements on which Swanson relied were too indefinite and her reliance was unreasonable. This appeal followed.

* * * It is by now well established that a plaintiff must do better than putting a few words on paper that, in the hands of an imaginative reader, might suggest that something has happened to her that might be redressed by the law. * * * The question with which courts are still struggling is how much higher the Supreme Court meant to set the bar * * *. This is not an easy question to answer, as the thoughtful dissent from this opinion demonstrates. On the one hand, the Supreme Court has adopted a “plausibility” standard, but on the other hand, it has insisted that it is not requiring fact pleading, nor is it adopting a single pleading standard to replace Rule 8, Rule 9, and specialized regimes like the one in the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act * * *.

Critically, in none of the three recent decisions—Twombly [p. 617, supra], Erickson [p. 645, supra], or Iqbal [p. 628, supra]—did the Court cast any doubt on the validity of Rule 8 * * *. To the contrary: at all times it has said that it is interpreting Rule 8, not tossing it out the window.

* * *

* * * As one respected treatise put it in 2004, all that is necessary is that the claim for relief be stated with brevity, conciseness, and clarity. . . . [T]his portion of Rule 8 indicates that a basic objective of the rules is to avoid civil cases turning on technicalities and to require that the pleading discharge the function of giving the opposing party fair notice of the nature and basis or grounds of the pleader’s claim and a general indication of the type of litigation that is involved. . . .

5 CHARLES A. WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 1215 at 165–173 (3d ed. 2004).

Nothing in the recent trio of cases has undermined these broad principles. As Erickson underscored, “[s]pecific facts are not necessary.”

674

551 U.S. at 93, 127 S.Ct. 2197. The Court was not engaged in a sub rosa campaign to reinstate the old fact-pleading system called for by the Field Code or even more modern codes. We know that because it said so in Erickson: “the statement need only give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.” * * * Instead, the Court has called for more careful attention to be given to several key questions: what, exactly, does it take to give the opposing party “fair notice”; how much detail realistically can be given, and should be given, about the nature and basis or grounds of the claim; and in what way is the pleader expected to signal the type of litigation that is being put before the court?

* * * As we understand it, the Court is saying * * * that the plaintiff must give enough details about the subject-matter of the case to present a story that holds together. In other words, the court will ask itself could these things have happened, not did they happen. For cases governed only by Rule 8, it is not necessary to stack up inferences side by side and allow the case to go forward only if the plaintiff’s inferences seem more compelling than the opposing inferences. * * *

The Supreme Court’s explicit decision to reaffirm the validity of [Swierkiewicz, p. 614, supra] * * *, which was cited with approval in [Twombly] * * *, indicates that in many straightforward cases, it will not be any more difficult today for a plaintiff to meet that burden than it was before the Court’s recent decisions. A plaintiff who believes that she has been passed over for a promotion because of her sex will be able to plead that she was employed by Company X, that a promotion was offered, that she applied and was qualified for it, and that the job went to someone else. That is an entirely plausible scenario, whether or not it describes what “really” went on in this plaintiff’s case. A more complex case involving financial derivatives, or tax fraud that the parties tried hard to conceal, or antitrust violations, will require more detail, both to give the opposing party notice of what the case is all about and to show how, in the plaintiff’s mind at least, the dots should be connected. * * *

* * *

Returning to Swanson’s case, we must analyze her allegations defendant-by-defendant. We begin with Citibank. On appeal, Swanson challenges only the dismissal of her Fair Housing Act and fraud claims. The Fair Housing Act prohibits businesses engaged in residential real estate transactions, including “[t]he making . . . Of loans or providing other financial assistance . . . secured by residential real estate,” from discriminating against any person on account of race. 42 U.S.C. § 3605(a), (b)(1)(B). Swanson’s complaint identifies the type of discrimination that she thinks occurs (racial), by whom (Citibank, through Skertich, the manager, and the outside appraisers it used), and when (in connection with her effort in early 2009 to obtain a home-equity loan). This is all that she needed to put in the complaint. * * *

675

The fact that Swanson included other, largely extraneous facts in her complaint does not undermine the soundness of her pleading. She points to Citibank’s announced plan to use federal money to make more loans, its refusal to follow through in her case, and Skertich’s comment that he has a mixed-race family. She has not pleaded herself out of court by mentioning these facts; * * *. It was therefore error for the district court to dismiss Swanson’s Fair Housing Act claim against Citibank.
Her fraud claim against Citibank stands on a different footing. * * * of special relevance here, a plaintiff must plead actual damages arising from her reliance on a fraudulent statement. * * * Without a contract, only out-of-pocket losses allegedly arising from the fraud are recoverable. * * * Swanson asserts that Citibank falsely announced plans to make federal funds available in the form of loans to all customers, when it actually intended to exclude African-American customers from those who would be eligible for the loans. Swanson relied, she says, on that false information when she applied for her home-equity loan. But she never alleged that she lost anything from the process of applying for the loan. We do not know, for example, whether there was a loan application fee, or if Citibank or she covered the cost of the appraisal. This is the kind of particular information that Rule 9 requires, and its absence means that the district court was entitled to dismiss the claim.

* * *

Swanson accuses the appraisal defendants [Lanier and PCI] of skewing their assessment of her home because of her race. It is unclear whether she believes that they did so as part of a conspiracy with Citibank, or if she thinks that they deliberately undervalued her property on their own initiative. Once again, we find that she has pleaded enough to survive a motion under Rule 12(b)(6). The appraisal defendants knew her race, and she accuses them of discriminating against her in the specific business transaction that they had with her. When it comes to proving her case, she will need to come up with more evidence than the mere fact that PCI (through Lanier) placed a far lower value on her house than Midwest Valuations did. * * * All we hold now is that she is entitled to take the next step in this litigation.

This does not, however, save her common-law fraud claim against Lanier and PCI. She has not adequately alleged that she relied on their appraisal, nor has she pointed to any out-of-pocket losses that she suffered because of it.

We therefore REVERSE the judgment of the district court insofar as it dismissed Swanson’s Fair Housing Act claims against all three defendants, and we AFFIRM insofar as it dismissed the common-law fraud claims against all three. Each side will bear its own costs on appeal.

676

POSNER, CIRCUIT JUDGE, dissenting in part.

I join the majority opinion except with respect to reversing the dismissal of the plaintiff’s claim of housing discrimination. I have difficulty squaring that reversal with [Iqbal] * * *, unless Iqbal is limited to cases in which there is a defense of official immunity * * *.

* * *

Even before Twombly and Iqbal, complaints were dismissed when they alleged facts that refuted the plaintiffs’ claims. * * * Under the new regime, it should be enough that the allegations render a claim implausible. The complaint alleges that Citibank was the second bank to turn down the plaintiff’s application for a home-equity loan. This reinforces the inference that she was not qualified. We further learn that, subject to the appraisal, which had not yet been conducted, Citibank had approved the $50,000 home-equity loan that the plaintiff was seeking on the basis of her representation that her house was worth $270,000. But she didn’t think it was worth that much when she applied for the loan. The house had been appraised at $260,000 in 2004, and the complaint alleges that home values had fallen by “only” 16 to 20 percent since. This implies that when she applied for the home-equity loan her house was worth between $208,000 and $218,400—much less than what she told Citibank it was worth.

If the house was worth $208,000, she would have owed a total of $196,000 had she gotten the loan, or just a shade under the market value of the house. If the bank had insisted that she have a 20 percent equity in the house, which would be $41,600, it would have lent her only $20,400 ($166,400—80 percent of $208,000—minus the $146,000 that she already owed on the house). The loan figure rises to $28,720 if the house was worth $218,400 rather than $208,000. In either case a $50,000 loan would have been out of the question, especially in the wake of the financial crash of September 2008, when credit, including home-equity credit, became extremely tight. * * *

* * *

The majority opinion relies heavily on [Swierkiewicz] * * *, cited with approval in Twombly, * * * (though not cited in Iqbal) and not overruled. Although it is regarded in some quarters as dead after Iqbal,* * * lower-court judges are not to deem a Supreme Court decision overruled even if it is plainly inconsistent with a subsequent decision.* * * But that principle is not applicable here; Swierkiewicz is distinguishable.

* * * Swierkiewicz holds that the judiciary is not authorized to amend Rule 9 without complying with the procedures in the Rules Enabling Act. * * * But Title VII cases are not exempted by Swierkiewicz from the doctrine of the Iqbal case. Iqbal establishes a general requirement of “plausibility” applicable to all civil cases in federal courts.

677

It does so, however, in opaque language: “The plausibility standard is not akin to a ‘probability requirement,’ but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully.” * * * In statistics the range of probabilities is from 0 to 1, and therefore encompasses “sheer possibility” along with “plausibility.” It seems (no stronger word is possible) that what the Court was driving at was that even if the district judge doesn’t think a plaintiff’s case is more likely than not to be a winner (that is, doesn’t think $p > .5$), as long as it is substantially justified that’s enough to avert dismissal.* * * But when a bank turns down a loan applicant because the appraisal of the security for the loan indicates that the loan would not be adequately secured, the alternative hypothesis of racial discrimination does not have substantial merit; it is implausible.

* * *

The plaintiff has an implausible case of discrimination, but she will now be permitted to serve discovery demands that will compel elaborate document review by Citibank and require its executives to sit for many hours of depositions. (Not that the plaintiff is capable of conducting such proceedings as a pro se, but on remand she may—indeed she would be well advised to—ask the judge to help her find a lawyer.) The threat of such an imposition will induce Citibank to consider settlement even if the suit has no merit at all. That is the pattern that the Supreme Court’s recent decisions are aimed at disrupting.

We should affirm the dismissal of the suit in its entirety.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What are the points of disagreement between the majority and dissent in Swanson? Would the majority agree that the complaint alleged merely a “sheer possibility” that race discrimination caused the loan rejection? Why was “the mere fact” that the appraiser put a lower value on Swanson’s home sufficient to meet the standard of plausible pleading? For a discussion of the connection between appraisal values and racial bias, see Rothwell & Perry, Biased appraisals and the devaluation of housing in Black neighborhoods, Brookings (Nov. 17, 2021), https:// www. brookings. edu/ research/ biased-appraisals-and-the-devaluation-of-housing-in-black-neighborhoods/.

2. In SHAW v. MERRITT-CHAPMAN & SCOTT CORP., 554 F.2d 786 (6th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 852, 98 S.Ct. 167, 54 L.Ed.2d 122 (1977), the Sixth Circuit held that absent specific language to the contrary by the district court, a dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) constitutes an adjudication on the merits, and the dismissal is with prejudice, so further actions on the same claim are barred. It may, however, be an abuse of discretion for a court to grant a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal without giving plaintiff an opportunity to amend its complaint. See Eminence Capital, LLC v. Aspeon, Inc., 316 F.3d 1048, 1052 (9th Cir. 2003) (“Dismissal with prejudice and without leave to amend is not appropriate unless it is clear on de novo review that the complaint could not be saved by amendment. A district court’s failure to consider the relevant factors and articulate why dismissal should be with prejudice instead of without prejudice may constitute an abuse of discretion.”). Without access to discovery, will a curative amendment always be possible?

678

3. Does the requirement of plausible pleading apply to defenses raised under Rules 12(b)(1) through (b)(5)? For example, does it supplant the requirement that in a diversity jurisdiction suit, the amount in controversy alleged by plaintiff will be accepted unless the court can determine to a “legal certainty” that recovery is jurisdictionally insufficient? See Chapter 4, p. 320, supra. See Mallgren v. Microsoft Corp., 975 F.Supp.2d 451 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) (dismissing diversity suit for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction because the allegations of damages were “conclusory”).

4. Recall that the consequence of omitting a defense under Rule 12 depends upon the defense that is omitted. Does a defendant who omits a defense under Rule 12(b)(6) waive that defense? See Rule 12(g)(2) and Rule 12(h)(2). In IN RE APPLE IPHONE ANTITRUST LITIGATION, 846 F.3d 313 (9th Cir. 2017), affirmed on other grounds sub nom., Apple Inc. v. Pepper, 587 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct. 1514, 203 L.Ed.2d 802 (2019), the district court granted defendant’s fourth motion to dismiss, which asserted a ground for Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal that defendant had failed to raise in its earlier motions. The Ninth Circuit reversed the dismissal, but not because of defendant’s omission. The appellate court stated that although the district court “may have erred” in considering the motion, the error was harmless, and explained that “a reviewing court * * * should generally be forgiving of a district court’s ruling on the merits of a late-filed Rule 12(b)(6) motion.” Id. at 316, 319. In its view, “[d]enying late-filed Rule 12(b)(6) motions and relegating defendants to the three procedural avenues specified in Rule 12(h)(2) can produce unnecessary and costly delays, contrary to the direction of Rule 1.” Id. at 318. What is your response?

4.ANSWERING THE COMPLAINT

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 8 and 10 in the Supplement.

If defendant has moved under Rule 12(b) or Rule 12(e) but the court denies the motion, defendant must file an answer or otherwise plead in response. What is the current time period in which to respond? See Rule 12(a)(4)(A)–(B). An answer is a kind of pleading, and is governed by Rule 8 and, as to its form, Rule 10.

679

a. Denials

Federal Rule 8(b) requires a defendant to make one of three responses to the contents of plaintiff’s complaint: Defendant may admit, deny, or plead insufficient information in response to each allegation. How will the court treat averments to which defendant does not specifically respond? See Rule 8(b)(6). To avoid an unintended admission, defendants often will include an all-inclusive paragraph in their answers denying each and every averment of the complaint unless otherwise admitted.

Rule 8 (and most state rules) allow the defendant to make a general denial of the complaint, but only if the pleader “intends in good faith to deny all the allegations of the pleading,” including jurisdiction. Using a general denial can be risky. If a court decides that a general denial does not “fairly respond to the substance of the allegation,” Rule 8(b)(2), it may deem defendant to have admitted plaintiff’s specific averments. In addition, a general denial does not put in issue such matters as capacity or conditions precedent, which under Rule 9 defendant must specifically challenge.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. An admission in an answer is binding on the party and may not be controverted at trial or on appeal, unless the court allows it to be withdrawn. Further, as explained in Crest Hill Land Development, LLC v. City of Joliet, 396 F.3d 801, 805 (7th Cir. 2005), admitting an allegation in the answer “has the effect of withdrawing the question” from contention.

2. In BIGGS v. PUBLIC SERVICE COORDINATED TRANSPORT, 280 F.2d 311, 313–14 (3d Cir. 1960), a diversity-of-citizenship case, defendant specifically denied that the amount in controversy exceeded the statutory requirement, and entered a qualified general denial that included the paragraph alleging that defendant was incorporated in New Jersey. The court stated:

We cannot for a moment believe that defendant’s counsel was denying in good faith that his client was a New Jersey corporation. We think the only fair interpretation of the pleading in this case is that the denial does not run to the allegation of defendant’s citizenship. Therefore, that allegation must be deemed to be admitted.

Even if the allegation is deemed to be admitted, does the court have an independent obligation to determine its subject-matter jurisdiction?

3. To what extent should defendant be permitted to respond that “it neither admits nor denies” plaintiff’s allegations? Some states have pleading rules that prohibit “evasive denials.” E.g., 2022 Conn. Practice Book (Revision of 1998), § 10–47, Ct. R. Super. Ct. Civ. § 10–47 (“[W]here any matter of fact is alleged with divers circumstances, some of which are untruly stated, it shall not be sufficient to deny it as alleged, but so much as is true and material should be stated or admitted, and the rest only denied.”). Compare the language of Federal Rule 8(b). In KING VISION PAY PER VIEW, LTD. v. J.C. DIMITRI’S RESTAURANT, INC., 180 F.R.D. 332 (N.D.Ill. 1998), defendant responded to several allegations in the complaint with “Neither admit nor deny the allegations of said Paragraph—, but demand strict proof thereof.” The court found that this response violated Rule 8(b) and therefore deemed defendant to have admitted those allegations. Id. at 333–34.

680

4. Does the plausible pleading standard apply to a denial? Several years ago, Professor Miller concluded that the answer is “[s]omewhat uncertain,” focusing on the absence from Rule 8(b) of “the magic word ‘showing,’ ” upon which the Court placed emphasis in Twombly, and the fact that a defensive pleading typically is alleged “in a formulary, conclusory, and uninformative fashion along the style illustrated in Form 30” (now abrogated with all of the forms, see p. 639, Note 3, supra). He adds:

If, in fact, plausibility pleading is retained and held to turn strictly on the language of Rule 8(a)(2), federal courts might not extend it to Rules 8(a)(1), 8(a)(3), 8(b), and 8(c). If that proves to be true, the Advisory Committee would have to consider whether to revise Rule 8 in order to correct this pleading burden imbalance in deference to the quest for the metaphorical level litigation playing field. What’s good for the goose should be good for the gander. Conversely, if the new pleading structure is applied to all pleading elements by judicial decision or Rule revision, then in theory defensive allegations could be challenged by a Rule 12(f) motion to strike for insufficiency as a corollary to Rule 12(b)(6), although the former now speaks of an “insufficient defense” and the latter of a “failure to state a claim.” In reality, any increase in the burden of pleading jurisdiction, the demand for relief, or the plausibility of denials and affirmative defenses, also would cause cost and delay, consequences that would have to be considered in determining whether efficiency and cost savings actually were being realized from the shift to plausibility pleading.

Miller, From Conley to Twombly to Iqbal: A Double Play on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 60 Duke L.J. 1, 102–03 (2010).

5. Some statements are phrased in the negative but imply the affirmative. Suppose plaintiff alleged that defendant owes her $89,000 under a contract. Defendant’s denial “that he owes plaintiff $89,000” could be held to be an admission that the amount owed is a penny less than the stated amount. See Thompson v. Hamilton Motor Co., 170 Cal. 737, 151 P. 122 (1915). The cases taking this approach are from the early twentieth century. Is the underlying principle consistent with the requirement of Federal Rule 8(b)(2), that a denial “must fairly respond to the substance of the allegation”? Is it also consistent with the requirements of Rule 8(b)(4), that “[a] party that intends in good faith to deny only part of an allegation must admit the part that is true and deny the rest”?

681

6. A conjunctive denial is a statement in which all propositions considered together are not true, but which does not specifically deny the truth of each proposition alone. See Luse v. United States, 49 F.2d 241, 244 (9th Cir. 1931) (“It is a familiar rule of pleading that a conjunctive denial is an ineffective denial of the several conjoined statements for the reason that, if any one of them is not true, the conjunctive denial would be true.”). Is a conjunctive denial insufficient under the Federal Rules?

b. Affirmative Defenses

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(c) in the Supplement.

Defenses under Federal Rule 12(b) may be raised either by a pre-answer motion or responsive pleading. Rule 8(c)(1) instructs that a responding party must “affirmatively state any avoidance or affirmative defense,” and then provides a non-exhaustive list of 18 such defenses. The rule’s reference to “an avoidance or affirmative defense” generally includes two types of defensive allegations:

An affirmative defense admits the allegations of the complaint, but challenges plaintiff’s legal right to bring the action by suggesting a reason why relief is not available;

An avoidance avers matters outside the complaint that cannot be raised by denial.

See 5 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1271 (4th ed.). The rule does not define when a defensive allegation is to be treated as an avoidance or as an affirmative defense, and a large case law has developed on this question. It traditionally was said that affirmative defenses may be raised only in a responsive pleading.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. If a defense is assigned to defendant and it is not raised as an avoidance or affirmative defense, the defense is waived. Other than with the specific defenses listed in Rule 8(c), how does the court determine on whom to assign the burden of pleading? Review p. 612, Note 3, supra. In INGRAHAM v. UNITED STATES, 808 F.2d 1075 (5th Cir. 1987), the Fifth Circuit explained:

Determining whether a given defense is “affirmative” within the ambit of Rule 8(c) is not without some difficulty. We find the salient comments of Judge Charles E. Clark, Dean of the Yale Law School, later Chief Judge of the United States Second Circuit Court of Appeals, and the principal author of the Federal Rules, to be instructive:

682

[J]ust as certain disfavored allegations made by the plaintiff . . . must be set forth with the greatest particularity, so like disfavored defenses must be particularly alleged by the defendant. These may include such matters as fraud, statute of frauds . . . , statute of limitations, truth in slander and libel . . . and so on. In other cases the mere question of convenience may seem prominent, as in the case of payment, where the defendant can more easily show the affirmative payment at a certain time than the plaintiff can the negative of nonpayment over a period of time. Again it may be an issue which may be generally used for dilatory tactics, such as the question of the plaintiff’s right to sue . . . a vital question, but one usually raised by the defendant on technical grounds. These have been thought of as issues “likely to take the opposite party by surprise,” which perhaps conveys the general idea of fairness or the lack thereof, though there is little real surprise where the case is well prepared in advance.

Clark, Code Pleading, 2d ed. 1947, § 96, at 609–10, quoted in 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil, § 1271, p. 313 (1969).

Also pertinent to the analysis is the logical relationship between the defense and the cause of action asserted by the plaintiff. This inquiry requires a determination (1) whether the matter at issue fairly may be said to constitute a necessary or extrinsic element in the plaintiff’s cause of action; (2) which party, if either, has better access to relevant evidence; and (3) policy considerations: should the matter be indulged or disfavored? * * *

Central to requiring the pleading of affirmative defenses is the prevention of unfair surprise. A defendant should not be permitted to “lie behind a log” and ambush a plaintiff with an unexpected defense. * * * The instant cases illustrate this consideration. Plaintiffs submit that, had they known the statute [limiting non-medical damages] would be applied, they would have made greater efforts to prove medical damages which were not subject to the statutory limit. In addition, plaintiffs maintain that they would have had an opportunity and the incentive to introduce evidence to support their constitutional attacks on the statute.

* * *

We view the limitation on damages as an “avoidance” within the intendment of the residuary clause of 8(c). Black’s Law Dictionary, 5th ed. 1979, defines an avoidance in pleadings as “the allegation or statement of new matter, in opposition to a former pleading, which, admitting the facts alleged in such former pleading, shows cause why they should not have their ordinary legal effect.” Applied to the present discussion, a plaintiff pleads the traditional tort theory of malpractice and seeks full damages. The defendant responds that assuming recovery is in order under the ordinary tort principles, because of the new statutory limitation, the traditional precedents “should not have their ordinary legal effect.”

683

* * * [W]e conclude that the Texas statutory limit on medical malpractice damages is an affirmative defense which must be pleaded timely and that in the cases at bar the defense has been waived.

808 F.2d at 1078–79.

Note, however, that this sort of waiver is not irreversible. A defendant that omits an affirmative defense from its answer might still amend its answer to add the defense—although such an amendment may require permission from either the court or the opposing party. See Section E, infra. Some defenses, however, cannot be saved from waiver. As discussed on p. 663, supra, the defenses listed in Rule 12(b)(2)–(5) (lack of personal jurisdiction, improper venue, insufficient process, and insufficient service of process) can be irretrievably waived if omitted from either a pre-answer motion or defendant’s initial answer.

2.Can the court, sua sponte, consider an affirmative defense that defendant has failed to plead? In DAY v. McDONOUGH, 547 U.S. 198, 126 S.Ct. 1675, 164 L.Ed.2d 376 (2006), the Supreme Court held that district courts may, but are not required to, raise sua sponte the timeliness of a state prisoner’s habeas petition when the state defendant has failed to raise the limitations period as an affirmative defense. To mitigate any unfairness, the Court further held that the district court is required to give the parties fair notice and an opportunity to present their positions on why the limitations period should not yield dismissal. Should this practice extend to affirmative defenses that do not have systemic implications for the justice system? Should it matter if plaintiff can show no prejudice or had notice of the defense? Is the approach consistent with the language of Rule 8(c), which provides that a party “must affirmatively state” any avoidance or affirmative defense?

3.Federal Rule 12(f) may be used to strike an affirmative defense from the responsive pleading. Should the motion be granted (with leave to amend) if the affirmative defense fails to meet the standard of plausible pleading otherwise applicable to a pleading? See p. 680, Note 4, supra. Before Twombly and Iqbal, an affirmative defense generally was treated as sufficient if it provided notice of the possible existence of the defense and defendant’s intention to advance it. Courts are divided on whether affirmative defenses are now subject to the requirement of plausible pleading. For discussion of this issue, see Miller, From Conley to Twombly to Iqbal: A Double Play on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 60 Duke L.J. 1, 101–03 (2010); Soucek &

684

Lamons, Heightened Pleading Standards for Defendants: A Case Study of Court-Counting Precedent, 70 Ala.L.Rev. 875 (2019).

C. THE REPLY

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 7(a) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Pleadings basically have two levels in the federal courts, the complaint and the answer. If defendant’s answer contains a counterclaim, plaintiff must serve an answer to the counterclaim. See Rule 12(a)(1)(B); Rule 7(a)(3). Otherwise, it is within the discretion of the court to order plaintiff to serve a reply to defendant’s answer. See Rule 7(a)(7). If a third party is brought into the action under Federal Rule 14, a third-party complaint will be filed and a third-party answer will be allowed. See Rule 7(a)(5), (6).

2.Under Federal Rule 7, is a crossclaim a pleading? Is a notice of removal a pleading? Is the answer to a crossclaim a pleading?

3.Allegations to which a reply is not required are considered avoided or denied and plaintiff may controvert them at trial. Conversely, matters requiring a responsive pleading are taken as admitted if not denied in the reply or if a reply is not filed. Rule 8(b)(6).

D. MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(c) in the Supplement.

KEGERISE v. SUSQUEHANNA TOWNSHIP SCHOOL DISTRICT
United States District Court, Middle District of Pennsylvania, 2016.
321 F.R.D. 121.

CALDWELL, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

Plaintiff is Dr. Susan M. Kegerise, the former superintendent of the Susquehanna Township School District. The defendants are the School District and three members of the District’s School Board, Carol L. Karl, Jesse Rawls, Sr., and Mark Y. Sussman. Plaintiff filed this lawsuit mainly seeking redress for her alleged discharge as superintendent, which she asserts violated both federal and state law.

685

We are considering Plaintiff’s motion for judgment on the pleadings under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(c) on some of the claims set forth in Plaintiff’s third amended complaint. As part of that motion, Plaintiff argues that Defendants’ responses to some of the allegations in her pleading were insufficient under Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(b). Based on the claimed inadequacy of the responses, Plaintiff contends that the corresponding allegations should be deemed admitted. And once those allegations are deemed admitted, Plaintiff argues she is entitled to judgment on the pleadings on Counts II, III, IV, VIII, IX and X of her third amended complaint.

We agree with Plaintiff that, except for a few responses, the responses are insufficient. Instead of deeming Plaintiff’s allegations admitted, however, we will grant Defendants an opportunity to file an amended answer curing the defects in their responses. * * *

* * *

A. Rule 8(b)(4): Denying Only Part of an Allegation Without Also Either Admitting or Denying the Rest of the Allegation

Plaintiff contends that Defendants violated Rule 8(b)(4) in their responses to the following allegations of the third amended complaint: paragraphs 48, 55, 63, 67, 81, 84, 86, 93, 99, 150, and 199. * * * After review of the allegations, we agree with Plaintiff that Defendants’ responses violated Rule 8(b)(4) by denying part of the allegation, admitting part of it, but without saying that the rest of the allegation was denied.

We will rely on one of the examples Plaintiff uses in her brief to explain what we mean. Paragraph 48 of the third amended complaint alleges as follows:

48. In 2013, a consensual decision was made to transfer a long time high school gym teacher and coach to a district elementary school. Believing this transfer was against the will of the teacher and discriminatory, Defendant Rawls attempted to intervene by usurping the role and judgment of the Administration. Defendant Rawls went so far as to approach the president of the teachers’ union, stating the transfer should be “grieved” by the district.

(Doc. 39, Third Am. Compl. ¶ 48). Defendants’ response to this allegation was as follows: “It is admitted that there was a decision to transfer a high school gym teacher to district [sic] elementary school. It is denied that Defendant Rawls attempted to intervene.” (Doc. 46, Answer ¶ 48). When a party intends to deny only part of an allegation, Rule 8(b)(4) requires the party to “admit the part that is true and deny the rest.” Here, Defendants intended to deny, and did deny, only part of the allegation. While they admitted the part that was true, they did not “deny the rest” of the allegation. As Plaintiff points out, they did not deny that defendant Rawls approached the president of the teachers’ union, stating the transfer should be “grieved” by the district. The responses therefore violate Rule 8(b)(4).

686

The responses to the other allegations mentioned above suffer from similar defects. * * * We will therefore require Defendants to file an amended answer complying with Rule 8(b)(4). Defendants need not deny any part of the allegations that were left without a response in the original answer if in fact that part should be admitted. For example, Defendants need not deny that Rawls approached the president of the teachers’ union, stating the transfer should be grieved by the district, simply because it was not admitted in the original answer. Defendants must simply admit the part that is true and deny the rest so that all parts of the allegation have been either admitted or denied.

B. Rule 8(b) Does Not Permit a Response that an Allegation Is a “Conclusion of Law” to Which No Response Is Required

Plaintiff argues that Defendants’ responses to the following allegations of the third amended complaint violated Rule 8(b): paragraphs 3, 10, 11, 20, 23, 26, 102, 119–131, 133–134, 136–138, 140, 142–143, 146–147, 149, 156–159, 167, 169–172, 174–175, 177, 196, and 199. Defendants’ responses to these allegations was as follows: “This paragraph states a conclusion of law to which no response is required.” Plaintiff asserts the responses were improper because they neither admitted nor denied the allegations. * * *

In opposing Plaintiff’s motion, Defendants argue that under Rule 8(b)(6) they are not obligated to respond to allegations that are conclusions of law. They also point out that some of the allegations are “sweeping conclusions of law” that contain no factual averments about Plaintiff’s case.

Defendants’ reliance on Rule 8(b)(6) is misplaced. In pertinent part, that Rule provides that when “a responsive pleading is required” an allegation is admitted if it is not denied. It is only when “a responsive pleading is not required, [that] an allegation is considered denied or avoided.” Rule 8(b)(6). Here, Defendants were required to file a responsive pleading—their answer—to Plaintiff’s third amended complaint. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(a)(1)(A). Hence, if anything, Rule 8(b)(6) would require us to deem Plaintiff’s allegations admitted for failure of Defendants to deny them. * * *

Defendants are simply incorrect in contending that they could respond to conclusions of law by asserting no response is necessary.⁴ Rule 8(b) permits a party only three ways to respond to an allegation: (1) admit it (2) deny it or (3) state that the party lacks knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief about the truth of the allegation. * * * Rule 8(b) does not permit a party to refuse to respond to an allegation by asserting it is a conclusion of law. * * *

687

This rule applies even when a party has made “a sweeping conclusion of law,” as Defendants put it, meaning an allegation purely of law.⁵ * * *

We will * * * require amended responses to these allegations * * *.

C. A Party Cannot Claim Lack of Knowledge or Information When He Does Have Knowledge or It Is Reasonably Available to Him

Defendants have denied paragraphs 30, 46 and 51 of the third amended complaint by asserting that they lack knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief about the truth of the allegations. Plaintiff argues these responses were improper as Defendants either had information that they could have used to respond to the allegations or the information was readily accessible to them. The pertinent allegations are as follows:

30.Defendant Rawls also approached a Union official to suggest the Union file a grievance against [the School District] regarding a personnel issue.

* * *

46.On February 5, 2013, Defendant Rawls visited the District Middle School and High School without giving prior notice to the administration.

* * *

50.On January 28, 2013, Defendant Rawls, at a public meeting of the Board, falsely accused Plaintiff of nepotism as grounds to not renew her contract.

51.This accusation resulted in a special investigation which cleared Dr. Kegerise of any wrongdoing. The investigation cost [the School District] in excess of $15,000.00.

(Doc. 39, Third Am. Compl. ¶¶ 30, 46, 50 and 51). * * *

* * * [A] party “may not deny sufficient information or knowledge with impunity, but is subject to the requirements of honesty in pleading.” David v. Crompton & Knowles Corp., 58 F.R.D. 444, 446 (E.D. Pa. 1973). “An avermment will be deemed admitted when the matter is obviously one as to which defendant has knowledge or information.” * * * A party may also “be held to the duty to exert reasonable effort to obtain knowledge of a fact.” Greenbaum v. United States, 360 F.Supp. 784, 787 (E.D. Pa. 1973).

688

Here, Defendants should be able to answer paragraphs 30 and 46 from the personal knowledge of Defendant Rawls. If they find paragraph 30 too vague, they may so respond. The response to paragraph 51 can come from a reasonable effort to obtain knowledge from School District records. * * Greenbaum*, 360 F.Supp. at 787–88 (the defendant’s response was inadequate when it failed to investigate its files).

Based on the foregoing, we will issue an order requiring Defendants to file an amended answer with responses that conform to the pleading requirements of Rule 8(b). * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1. WHY WAS MOVING FOR JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS STRATEGICALLY ADVANTAGEOUS TO THE PLAINTIFF?
- 2.How does a Rule 12(c) motion differ from a Rule 12(f) motion to strike a defense from defendant’s responsive leading?
- 3.How does a Rule 12(c) motion differ from a Rule 12(b)(6) motion? Does either motion depend on the truth of the allegations?

E. AMENDMENTS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

BEECK V. AQUASLIDE ‘N’ DIVE CORP.
United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 1977.
562 F.2d 537.

BENSON, DISTRICT JUDGE.

* * *

This case is an appeal from the trial court’s exercise of discretion on procedural matters in a diversity personal injury action. Jerry A. Beeck was severely injured on July 15, 1972, while using a water slide. He and his wife, Judy A. Beeck, sued Aquaslide ‘N’ Dive Corporation (Aquaslide), a Texas corporation, alleging it manufactured the slide involved in the accident, and sought to recover substantial damages on theories of negligence, strict liability and breach of implied warranty.

689

Aquaslide initially admitted manufacture of the slide, but later moved to amend its answer to deny manufacture; the motion was resisted. The district court granted leave to amend. On motion of the defendant, a separate trial was held on the issue of “whether the defendant designed, manufactured or sold the slide in question.” This motion was also resisted by the plaintiffs. The issue was tried to a jury, which returned a verdict for the defendant, after which the trial court entered summary judgment of dismissal of the case. Plaintiffs took this appeal, and stated the issues presented for review to be:

- 1.Where the manufacturer of the product, a water slide, admitted in its Answer and later in its Answer to Interrogatories both filed prior to the running of the statute of limitations that it designed, manufactured and sold the water slide in question, was it an abuse of the trial court’s discretion to grant leave to amend to the manufacturer in order to deny these admissions after the running of the statute of limitations?

* * *

I.Facts

* * *

In 1971 Kimberly Village Home Association of Davenport, Iowa, ordered an Aquaslide product from one George Boldt, who was a local distributor handling defendant’s products. The order was forwarded by Boldt to Sentry Pool and Chemical Supply Co. in Rock Island, Illinois, and Sentry forwarded the order to Purity Swimming Pool Supply in Hammond, Indiana. A slide was delivered from a Purity warehouse to Kimberly Village, and was installed by Kimberly employees. On July 15, 1972, Jerry A. Beeck was injured while using the slide at a social gathering sponsored at Kimberly Village by his employer, Harker Wholesale Meats, Inc. Soon after the accident investigations were undertaken by representatives of the separate insurers of Harker and Kimberly Village. On October 31, 1972, Aquaslide first learned of the accident through a letter sent by a representative of Kimberly’s insurer to Aquaslide * * *. Aquaslide forwarded this notification to its insurer. Aquaslide’s insurance adjuster made an on-site investigation of the slide in May, 1973, and also interviewed persons connected with the ordering and assembly of the slide. An inter-office letter dated September 23, 1973, indicates that Aquaslide’s insurer was of the opinion the “Aquaslide in question was definitely manufactured by our insured.” The complaint was filed October 15, 1973. Investigators for three different insurance companies, representing Harker, Kimberly and the defendant, had concluded that the slide had been manufactured by Aquaslide, and the defendant, with no information to the contrary, answered the complaint on December 12, 1973, and admitted that it “designed, manufactured, assembled and sold” the slide in question.

690

The statute of limitations on plaintiff’s personal injury claim expired on July 15, 1974. About six and one-half months later Carl Meyer, president and owner of Aquaslide, visited the site of the accident prior to the taking of his deposition by the plaintiff. From his on-site inspection of the slide, he determined it was not a product of the defendant. Thereafter, Aquaslide moved the court for leave to amend its answer to deny manufacture of the slide.

II. Leave to Amend

* * *

In Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 83 S.Ct. 227, 9 L.Ed.2d 222 (1962), the Supreme Court had occasion to construe * * * Rule 15(a) * * *.

If the underlying facts or circumstances relied upon by a plaintiff may be a proper subject of relief, he ought to be afforded an opportunity to test his claim on the merits. In the absence of any apparent or declared reason—such as undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive on the part of the movant, repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed, undue prejudice to the opposing party by virtue of allowance of the amendment, futility of amendment, etc.—the leave sought should, as the rules require, be “freely given.” of course, the grant or denial of an opportunity to amend is within the discretion of the District Court * * *.

371 U.S. at 182, 83 S.Ct. at 230. * * *

This Court in Hanson v. Hunt Oil Co., 398 F.2d 578, 582 (8th Cir. 1968), held that “[p]rejudice must be shown.” (Emphasis added). The burden is on the party opposing the amendment to show such prejudice. In ruling on a motion for leave to amend, the trial court must inquire into the issue of prejudice to the opposing party, in light of the particular facts of the case. * * *

Certain principles apply to appellate review of a trial court’s grant or denial of a motion to amend pleadings. First, as noted in Foman v. Davis, allowance or denial of leave to amend lies within the sound discretion of the trial court, * * * and is reviewable only for an abuse of discretion. * * * The appellate court must view the case in the posture in which the trial court acted in ruling on the motion to amend. * * *

It is evident from the order of the district court that in the exercise of its discretion in ruling on defendant’s motion for leave to amend, it searched the record for evidence of bad faith, prejudice and undue delay which might be sufficient to overbalance the mandate of Rule 15(a) * * * and Foman v. Davis, that leave to amend should be “freely given.” Plaintiffs had not at any time conceded that the slide in question had not been manufactured by the defendant, and at the time the motion for leave to amend was at issue, the court had to decide whether the defendant should be permitted to litigate a material factual issue on its merits.

691

In inquiring into the issue of bad faith, the court noted the fact that the defendant, in initially concluding that it had manufactured the slide, relied upon the conclusions of three different insurance companies, each of which had conducted an investigation into the circumstances surrounding the accident. This reliance upon investigations of three insurance companies, and the fact that “no contention has been made by anyone that the defendant influenced this possibly erroneous conclusion,” persuaded the court that “defendant has not acted in such bad faith as to be precluded from contesting the issue of manufacture at trial.” The court further found “[t]o the extent that ‘blame’ is to be spread regarding the original identification, the record indicates that it should be shared equally.”

In considering the issue of prejudice that might result to the plaintiffs from the granting of the motion for leave to amend, the trial court held that the facts presented to it did not support plaintiffs’ assertion that, because of the running of the two year Iowa statute of limitations on personal injury claims, the allowance of the amendment would sound the “death knell” of the litigation. In order to accept plaintiffs’ argument, the court would have had to assume that the defendant would prevail at trial on the factual issue of manufacture of the slide, and further that plaintiffs would be foreclosed, should the amendment be allowed, from proceeding against other parties if they were unsuccessful in pressing their claim against Aquaslide. On the state of the record before it, the trial court was unwilling to make such assumptions, and concluded “[u]nder these circumstances, the Court deems that the possible prejudice to the plaintiffs is an insufficient basis on which to deny the proposed amendment.” The court reasoned that the amendment would merely allow the defendant to contest a disputed factual issue at trial, and further that it would be prejudicial to the defendant to deny the amendment.

The court also held that defendant and its insurance carrier, in investigating the circumstances surrounding the accident, had not been so lacking in diligence as to dictate a denial of the right to litigate the factual issue of manufacture of the slide.

On this record we hold that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the defendant to amend its answer.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Parties may amend their complaints at various points in a litigation. In Beeck, defendant initially moved to amend before the trial took place. Should the court have granted the motion then?
2. Federal Rule 15(a) permits amendment without consent of the court in certain circumstances. What is the justification for this rule? Until 2009, the rule allowed a party to amend as a matter of course only before being served with a responsive pleading. What are the time limits under the current rule?
3. Rule 15(b) permits amendment of the pleadings both during and after trial. How does the procedure described in Rule 15(b)(1) differ from that in Rule 15(b)(2)? What are the consequences of a failure to amend under each subdivision? Keep in mind that Rule 15(b) applies to defenses as well as claims, and it may be used to amend a pleading during or after trial to include a defense that was not earlier asserted.

In MOORE v. MOORE, 391 A.2d 762 (D.C. 1978), a custody suit brought by the father, the court granted the mother’s post-trial motion to conform the pleadings to the evidence and for attorney’s fees, and awarded her custody despite the absence of any request for affirmative relief in her pretrial pleadings. The father argued that it was an abuse of discretion under the state amendment rule for the court to have permitted a post-trial pleading amendment and to award affirmative relief, contending that he did not have notice. In particular, he argued that he did not know that matters contained in the counterclaim were at stake and “he was not prepared, nor given an adequate opportunity, to contest them.” Id. at 768. The court rejected these arguments:

Our treatment of this argument must begin with [District of Columbia] Rule 15(b), which is identical to Fed.R.Civ.Pro. 15(b). Our analysis is accordingly aided by authorities which have interpreted the federal rule. * * * If issues not raised in pleadings are tried by express consent of the parties, there can be no question about the propriety of permitting amendment. The difficult issue arises when, as in most Rule 15(b) cases, “implied consent” is asserted.

Whether parties have impliedly contested a matter—i.e., whether parties recognize that an issue not stated by the pleadings entered the case * * *—is determined by searching the trial record for indications that the party contesting the amendment received actual notice of the injection of the unpleaded matters, as well as an adequate opportunity to litigate such matters and to cure any surprise from their introduction. * * *

The clearest indications of a party’s implied consent to try an issue lie in the failure to object to evidence, or in the introduction of evidence which is clearly apposite to the new issue but not to other matters specified in the pleadings. * * *

A. Custody

Although at the time of trial only appellant, and not his wife, had filed an action for custody, we conclude—without difficulty —that appellant was on timely notice that the court would decide not merely whether he was entitled to custody but, more broadly, would determine who was entitled to custody. Mrs. Moore asserted in her answer to appellant’s complaint that “the best interests of the child” would be served by the child’s being in her custody. Moreover, both parties introduced evidence supporting their respective qualifications for custodian. * * *

B.Child Support

The pretrial pleadings do not include a claim for child support. Our determination, therefore, again must be whether the issue was litigated by implied consent. For two reasons we find that it was.

First, and most germane, we believe that the resolution of child support inheres in a custody battle where the best interests of the child are the focal concern. * * * The trial judge recognized this relationship when she opined that a grant of support was required by the court’s duty to afford complete relief. Second, our conclusion is bolstered by appellee’s introduction of evidence of the financial needs of the child. As appellee points out, this evidence was not contested on relevance grounds; it served to put appellant on notice. * * *

C.Visitation Rights and Bond

Appellant does not dispute that visitation rights are a proper subject for determination as part of the overall custody question. In her Rule 15(b) motion, appellee did not request imposition of a bond covering her husband’s visits with Jessica. However, because trial courts are given broad discretion in resolving custody cases, * * * and ought to fashion relief to foster and safeguard a child’s best interests, * * * we find no fault with the imposition of a bond upon a parent whose history reflected a capacity for absconding with the child. * * *

D.Attorneys’ Fees

This court has determined that even though there is no specific statutory authorization for attorneys’ fees awards in child custody cases, courts are empowered to award them to a parent who has enlisted legal assistance to protect the interests of the child. * * *

694

E.Separate Maintenance

The grant of spousal support is a different matter. The initial pleadings did not mention a claim for separate maintenance, which is not customarily a part of a child custody suit between parents whose marital relationship had not been—and was not being—litigated. While evidence of Mrs. Moore’s financial needs was admitted without objection relatively late in the proceedings, we cannot conclude that this evidence was so uniquely pertinent to her support alone, in contrast with the custody or the child support issues, that it justifies our concluding that appellant had adequate, timely notice of, and an opportunity to contest, a claim by his wife for her own support. We find no other indication of record that appellant impliedly consented to try his wife’s support claim, Rule 15(b), nor can we conclude that the award was a proper, supportable element of full relief in the child custody action. * * * We therefore find an abuse of trial court discretion in permitting amendment of the pleadings to include separate maintenance and, thereafter, in making such an award.

* * *

391 A.2d at 768–70.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

What were plaintiff’s tactical options in Moore in deciding whether to introduce evidence at trial on an issue that clearly was not within the pleadings? The litigant may object and keep the evidence out, but this will induce the other side to request leave to amend, perhaps even to add an issue of which the party seeking amendment previously was not aware. On the other hand, a failure to object may be taken as implied consent to try the issue, thus permitting an amendment to conform to the proof. Whenever a party fails to object in this situation a second dilemma must be faced: whether or not to produce evidence on the point in question. Should the implied consent rule ever be applied in a case like Moore when relief is sought by a defendant who failed to file a counterclaim asking for any relief whatsoever? How important was it that the action involved child custody?

NOTE ON THE RELATION BACK DOCTRINE

Federal Rule 15(c) allows amendments that add a new claim or defense to “relate back” to the date of the original pleading, and thus avoid being barred by a statute of limitations. An amendment may relate back under Rule 15(c)(1)(A) (which was added to the rule in 1991) whenever an applicable state statute of limitations would permit relation back. Before Rule 15(c) was amended the circuit courts disagreed whether to characterize relation back as “substantive” or “procedural.” In SCHIAVONE v. FORTUNE, 477 U.S. 21, 106 S.Ct. 2379, 91 L.Ed.2d 18 (1986), a diversity case, plaintiffs mistakenly failed to name the correct defendant in the original complaint. Plaintiffs meant to sue the owners of Fortune magazine; however, instead of naming “Time, Incorporated,” they named “Fortune,” which is not a legal entity. Plaintiffs were unable to serve “Fortune,” so they amended their complaint to name “Time, Incorporated.” Both the amendment and service of process on “Time, Incorporated” took place after the statute of limitations had run. The Supreme Court applied Rule 15(c) instead of New Jersey’s more liberal relation-back rule and dismissed the claims as time-barred. The revision to Rule 15(c) makes clear that a pleader gets the benefit of a state limitations rule that is less restrictive than the federal.

695

Relation back is permitted under Federal Rule 15(c)(1)(B) when the claim or defense that is added arises out of the same conduct, transaction, or occurrence as does the original pleading. In addition, relation back is authorized if the pleader “attempted” to allege the claim or defense, but, for example, amendment is required to cure a deficiency.

Federal Rule 15(c)(1)(C) addresses amendments that seek to change a party after the statute of limitations has expired. Three conditions must be met. The first condition is that the claim that the amendment seeks to assert against the changed party must be transactionally related to the claims in the original pleading, so that Rule 15(c)(1)(B) is met. The second condition is that the changed party must have received notice of the action within the time for serving the summons and complaint under Rule 4(m) (since 2015, 90 days). The notice can be formal or informal, provided the new party “will not be prejudiced” in defending on the merits. The third condition is that the changed party “knew or should have known” that the claim would have been asserted against it, “but for a mistake concerning the proper party’s identity.” Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii).

In KRUPSKI v. COSTA CROCIERE S.P.A., 560 U.S. 538, 130 S.Ct. 2485, 177 L.Ed.2d 48 (2010), a cruise passenger sued Costa Cruise, the company that had issued her ticket, for injuries sustained during the cruise. After the limitations period had run, Costa Cruise filed its answer, asserting that it was not the proper defendant and that it was only the agent for Costa Crociere, an Italian company that was the actual carrier and vessel operator. Costa Cruise then moved for summary judgment, stating that Costa Crociere was the proper defendant. The district court dismissed Costa Cruise from the action and granted plaintiff leave to amend the complaint to name Costa Crociere as defendant. Costa Crociere, represented by the same counsel as the original defendant, moved to dismiss, arguing that the amended complaint did not relate back. The district court dismissed the amended complaint as out of time. The Eleventh Circuit affirmed, but the Supreme Court reversed:

696

The Court of Appeals first decided that Krupski either knew or should have known of the proper party’s identity and thus determined that she had made a deliberate choice instead of a mistake in not naming Costa Crociere as a party in her original pleading. * * * By focusing on Krupski’s knowledge, the Court of Appeals chose the wrong starting point. The question under Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) is not whether Krupski knew or should have known the identity of Costa Crociere as the proper defendant, but whether Costa Crociere knew or should have known that it would have been named as a defendant but for an error. Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) asks what the prospective defendant knew or should have known during the Rule 4(m) period, not what the plaintiff knew or should have known at the time of filing her original complaint. * * *

Information in the plaintiff’s possession is relevant only if it bears on the defendant’s understanding of whether the plaintiff made a mistake regarding the * * * proper party’s identity. * * *

Respondent urges that the key issue under Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) is whether the plaintiff made a deliberate choice to sue one party over another. * * * We agree that making a deliberate choice to sue one party instead of another while fully understanding the factual and legal differences between the two parties is the antithesis of making a mistake concerning the proper party’s identity. We disagree, however, with respondent’s position that any time a plaintiff is aware of the existence of two parties and chooses to sue the wrong one, the proper defendant could reasonably believe that the plaintiff made no mistake. The reasonableness of the mistake is not itself at issue. * * * [A] deliberate but mistaken choice does not foreclose a finding that Rule 15(c)(1)(C)(ii) has been satisfied.

This reading is consistent with the purpose of relation back: to balance the interests of the defendant protected by the statute of limitations with the preference * * * for resolving disputes on their merits. * * * A prospective defendant who legitimately believed that the limitations period had passed without any attempt to sue him has a strong interest in repose. But repose would be a windfall for a prospective defendant who understood, or who should have understood, that he escaped suit during the limitations period only because the plaintiff misunderstood a crucial fact about his identity. Because a plaintiff’s knowledge of the existence of a party does not foreclose the possibility that she has made a mistake of identity about which that party should have been aware, such knowledge does not support that party’s interest in repose.

697

Our reading is also consistent with the history of Rule 15(c)(1)(C). That provision was added in 1966 to respond to a recurring problem in suits against the Federal Government, particularly in the Social Security context. * * * Individuals who had filed timely lawsuits challenging the administrative denial of benefits often failed to name the party identified in the statute as the proper defendant—the current Secretary of what was then the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare—and named instead the United States; the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare itself; the nonexistent “Federal Security Administration”; or a Secretary who had recently retired from office. * * * By the time the plaintiffs discovered their mistakes, the statute of limitations in many cases had expired, and the district courts denied the plaintiffs leave to amend on the ground that the amended complaints would not relate back. Rule 15(c) was therefore “amplified to provide a general solution” to this problem. * * * It is conceivable that the Social Security litigants knew or reasonably should have known the identity of the proper defendant either because of documents in their administrative cases or by dint of the statute setting forth the filing requirements. * * * Nonetheless, the Advisory Committee clearly meant their filings to qualify as mistakes under the Rule.

560 U.S. at 548, 130 S.Ct. at 2493, 177 L.Ed.2d at 57. The Supreme Court also rejected the argument that plaintiff’s delay in filing an amended complaint was grounds for denying relation back, explaining that Rule 15(c) “plainly sets forth an exclusive list of requirements for relation back, and the amending party’s diligence is not among them.” Plaintiff’s conduct is relevant only to the extent it “informs the prospective defendant’s understanding of whether the plaintiff initially made a ‘mistake concerning the proper party’s identity.’ ” Id. at 540, 130 S.Ct. at 2488, 177 L.Ed.2d at 52.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Assume that during the course of an arrest two police officers handcuff the detainee and he suffers broken bones. The detainee is later released without being charged. Two years after the event, the detainee sues the Police Department and “two unknown named police officers.” After the statute of limitations has run, plaintiff amends his complaint and specifically names the two officers who arrested him, but includes no claim against the police department. The newly named defendants, represented by the same attorney who represents the police department, move to dismiss the amended complaint on the ground that the statute of limitations has run. The record indicates that the police officers did not know of the lawsuit before the limitations period expired, but they were aware of its pendency within the 90 days for serving the summons and complaint under Federal Rule 4(m).

698

Does the amendment relate back to the original date of the complaint? Did plaintiff make a “mistake” about the identity of the arresting officers or did he simply not know their identity? Would it be relevant if the officers concealed their identity, and that under state law fraudulent concealment tolls the statute of limitations? See Worthington v. Wilson, 8 F.3d 1253 (7th Cir. 1993).

2.Assume all of the facts set out in Note 1, except that plaintiff, not knowing the identity of the arresting officers, named in his original complaint the police department and two police officers named as “John Doe” and “Jane Doe” defendants. Would these claims relate back under Krupski? See Sherman, Amending Complaints to Sue Previously Misnamed or Unidentified Defendants after the Statute of Limitations Has Run: Questions Remaining from the Krupski Decision, 15 Nev.L.J. 1329 (2015). Would it matter to the analysis if relation back is timely under state law? See Hogan v. Fischer, 738 F.3d 509 (2d Cir. 2013).

F. SUPPLEMENTAL PLEADINGS

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 13(e) and 15(d) in the Supplement.

Federal Rule 15(d) provides that the court may allow the filing of a supplemental pleading based on facts not existing when the original complaint was filed. A supplemental pleading can be used to cure defects in the original pleading, to add new claims, or to provide additional facts that update the complaint. The rule’s purpose is to promote “as complete an adjudication of the dispute between the parties as possible,” William Inglis & Sons Baking Co. v. ITT Continental Baking Co., 668 F.2d 1014, 1057 (9th Cir. 1981), and “permits the bringing of new claims * * * to permit the economical and speedy disposition of the controversy,” Keith v. Volpe, 858 F.2d 467, 473 (9th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 813, 110 S.Ct. 61, 107 L.Ed.2d 28 (1989). However, there are limits to this practice, and supplementation may be denied when the pleading introduces a “separate, distinct and new cause of action.” Planned Parenthood of S. Ariz. v. Neely, 130 F.3d 400, 402 (9th Cir. 1997).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Federal Rule 13(e) permits defendants to use a supplemental pleading to assert counterclaims that arise after serving an answer. As with

699

Rule 15(d), the decision to allow a party to file a supplemental pleading asserting a counterclaim is within the discretion of the district court. See generally 6 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1428 (3d ed.).

2.Are supplemental pleadings governed by the same relation back analysis as amended pleadings? Rule 15(d) makes no mention of relation back, and courts take divergent approaches. In DAVIS v. PIPER AIRCRAFT CORP., 615 F.2d 606, 609 n.3 (4th Cir. 1980), plaintiff moved to amend his complaint pursuant to Rule 15(a)(1) to reflect his new capacity as ancillary administrator of an estate, which allowed him to go forward with a wrongful death action filed nine months earlier. According to the Court of Appeals, if “the test of Fed.R.Civ.P. 15(c) is met, a supplemental pleading should ordinarily be given the same relation back effect as an amended pleading.” Would relation back be appropriate when the supplementation attempts to allege an entirely different transaction by amendment?

G. PROVISIONS TO DETER FRIVOLOUS PLEADINGS

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 11 and 23.1 and related materials in the Supplement.

SUROWITZ v. HILTON HOTELS CORP.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1966.
383 U.S. 363, 86 S.Ct. 845, 15 L.Ed.2d 807.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Petitioner, Dora Surowitz, a stockholder in Hilton Hotels Corporation, filed a derivative action on behalf of herself and other stockholders charging that the officers and directors of the corporation had defrauded it of several million dollars in violation of the Securities Act of 1933, the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, and the Delaware General Corporation Law. The complaint was 60 printed pages and signed by petitioner’s counsel in compliance with the then-existing language of Federal Rule 11. Petitioner also verified the complaint pursuant to Rule 23(b) (now Rule 23.1), stating that some of the allegations in the complaint were true and that she “on information and belief” thought that all the other allegations were true. The district court, before requiring defendants to answer, granted their motion to depose petitioner.]

700

* * *

* * * In this examination Mrs. Surowitz showed in her answers to questions that she did not understand the complaint at all, that she could not explain the statements made in the complaint, that she had a very small degree of knowledge as to what the lawsuit was about, that she did not know any of the defendants by name, that she did not know the nature of their alleged misconduct, and in fact that in signing the verification she had merely relied on what her son-in-law had explained to her about the facts in the case. On the basis of this examination, defendants moved to dismiss the complaint, alleging that “1. It is a sham pleading, and 2. Plaintiff, Dora Surowitz, is not a proper party plaintiff. * * *” In response, Mrs. Surowitz’s lawyer, in an effort to cure whatever infirmity the court might possibly find in Mrs. Surowitz’s verification in light of her deposition, filed two affidavits which shed much additional light on an extensive investigation which had preceded the filing of the complaint. Despite these affidavits the District Judge dismissed the case holding that Mrs. Surowitz’s affidavit was “false,” that being wholly false it was a nullity, that being a nullity it was as though no affidavit had been made in compliance with Rule 23, that being false the affidavit was a “sham” and Rule 23(b) required that he dismiss her case, and he did so, “with prejudice.”

The Court of Appeals affirmed the District Court’s dismissal * * * despite the fact that the charges made against the defendants were viewed as very serious and grave charges of fraud and that “many of the material allegations of the complaint are obviously true and cannot be refuted.” 342 F.2d, at 607. We cannot agree with either of the courts below and reverse their judgments. * * *

Mrs. Surowitz, the plaintiff and petitioner here, is a Polish immigrant with a very limited English vocabulary and practically no formal education. For many years she has worked as a seamstress in New York where by reason of frugality she saved enough money to buy some thousands of dollars worth of stocks. She was of course not able to select stocks for herself with any degree of assurance of their value. Under these circumstances she had to receive advice and counsel and quite naturally she went to her son-in-law, Irving Brilliant. Mr. Brilliant had graduated from the Harvard Law School, possessed a master’s degree in economics from Columbia University, was a professional investment advisor, and in addition to his degrees and his financial acumen, he wore a Phi Beta Kappa key. In 1957, six years before this litigation began, he bought some stock for his mother-in-law in the Hilton Hotels Corporation, paying a little more than $2,000 of her own money for it. * * *

About December 1962, Mrs. Surowitz received through the mails a notice from the Hilton Hotels Corporation announcing its plan to purchase a large amount of its own stock. Because she wanted it explained to her, she took the notice to Mr. Brilliant. Apparently disturbed by it, he straightway set out to make an investigation. Shortly thereafter he went to Chicago, Illinois, where Hilton Hotels has its home office and talked the matter over with Mr. Rockler. Mr. Brilliant and Mr. Rockler had been friends for many years. * * * The two decided to investigate further, and for a number of months both pursued whatever avenues of information that were open to them. By August of 1963 on the basis of their investigation, both of them had reached the conclusion [that defendants were engaged in a fraudulent scheme, and Mr. Brilliant explained this to Mrs. Surowitz]. * * *

701

* * * When, on the basis of this conversation, Mrs. Surowitz stated that she agreed that suit be filed in her name, Mr. Rockler prepared a formal complaint which he mailed to Mr. Brilliant. Mr. Brilliant then, according to both his affidavit and Mrs. Surowitz’s testimony, read and explained the complaint to his mother-in-law before she verified it. Her limited education and her small knowledge about any of the English language, except the most ordinarily used words, probably is sufficient guarantee that the courts below were right in finding that she did not understand any of the legal relationships or comprehend any of the business transactions described in the complaint. She did know, however, that she had put over $2,000 of her hard-earned money into Hilton Hotels stock, that she was not getting her dividends, and that her son-in-law who had looked into the matter thought that something was wrong. She also knew that her son-in-law was qualified to help her and she trusted him. It is difficult to believe that anyone could be shocked or harmed in any way when, in the light of all these circumstances, Mrs. Surowitz verified the complaint, not on the basis of her own knowledge and understanding, but in the faith that her son-in-law had correctly advised her either that the statements in the complaint were true or to the best of his knowledge he believed them to be true.

* * * Rule 23(b) was not written in order to bar derivative suits. Unquestionably it was originally adopted and has served since in part as a means to discourage “strike suits” by people who might be interested in getting quick dollars by making charges without regard to their truth so as to coerce corporate managers to settle worthless claims in order to get rid of them. * * *

When the record of this case is reviewed in the light of the purpose of Rule 23(b)’s verification requirement, there emerges the plain, inescapable fact that this is not a strike suit or anything akin to it. Mrs. Surowitz was not interested in anything but her own investment made with her own money. Moreover, there is not one iota of evidence that Mr. Brilliant, her son-in-law and counselor, sought to do the corporation any injury in this litigation. In fact his purchases for the benefit of his family of more than $50,000 of securities in the corporation, including a $10,000 debenture, all made years before this suit was brought, manifest confidence in the corporation, not a desire to harm it in any way. The Court of Appeals in affirming the District Court’s dismissal, however, indicated that whether Mrs. Surowitz and her counselors acted in good faith and whether the charges they made were truthful were irrelevant once Mrs. Surowitz demonstrated in her oral testimony that she knew nothing about the content of the suit. * * *

702

We cannot construe Rule 23 or any other one of the Federal Rules as compelling courts to summarily dismiss, without any answer or argument at all, cases like this where grave charges of fraud are shown by the record to be based on reasonable beliefs growing out of careful investigation. The basic purpose of the Federal Rules is to administer justice through fair trials, not through summary dismissals as necessary as they may be on occasion. These rules were designed in large part to get away from some of the old procedural booby traps which common-law pleaders could set to prevent unsophisticated litigants from ever having their day in court. If rules of procedure work as they should in an honest and fair judicial system, they not only permit, but should as nearly as possible guarantee that bona fide complaints be carried to an adjudication on the merits. Rule 23(b), like the other civil rules, was written to further, not defeat the ends of justice. The serious fraud charged here, which of course has not been proven, is clearly in that class of deceitful conduct which the federal securities laws were largely passed to prohibit and protect against. There is, moreover, not one word or one line of actual evidence in this record indicating that there has been any collusive conduct or trickery by those who filed this suit except through intimations and insinuations without any support from anything any witness has said. The dismissal of this case was error. It has now been practically three years since the complaint was filed and as yet none of the defendants have even been compelled to admit or deny the wrongdoings charged. They should be. The cause is reversed and remanded to the District Court for trial on the merits.

Reversed and remanded.

JUSTICE HARLAN, concurring.

Rule 23(b) directs that in a derivative suit “the complaint shall be verified by oath” but nothing dictates that the verification be that of the plaintiff shareholder. * * * In the present circumstances, it seems to me the affidavit of Walter J. Rockler, counsel for Mrs. Surowitz, amounts to an adequate verification by counsel, which I think is permitted by a reasonable interpretation of the Rule at least in cases such as this. On this premise, I agree with the decision of the Court.

703

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Given the complexity of contemporary finance, is it realistic to condition the ability to bring suit under Rule 23.1 on the investor’s personal knowledge of the transactions that give rise to her injury? Is Justice Harlan’s endorsement of third-party verification an appropriate solution to the potential problem of strike suits? See Comment, Verification of Complaint in Stockholders’ Derivative Suits under Rule 23(b), 114 U.Pa.L.Rev. 614 (1966).
2. In those state courts in which pleadings generally do not have to be verified, there are certain exceptions. Some of the typical ones found in state practice are: petitions for divorce; petitions brought by the state to enjoin a nuisance; and complaints to obtain support of a child born out of wedlock. What makes these actions sufficiently distinctive to require verification?

NOTE ON FEDERAL RULE 11

Rule 11 was adopted as part of the 1938 Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and has been amended a number of times since. In its original version, Rule 11 imposed a signature requirement as a certification that good grounds existed to support a pleading and that the pleading was not interposed for delay. The sanction for violation of the rule was the striking of the pleadings, but the violation had to be willful and the sanction was imposed as a matter of discretion based on a subjective standard of bad faith. Given the severity of the potential sanction, judges appeared disinclined to impose discipline under the rule and the rule was infrequently invoked; as one commentator put it, the original version of Rule 11 was “a paper tiger without any bite.” Cavanagh, Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure: The Case Against Turning Back the Clock, 162 F.R.D. 383, 388 (1995). Indeed, between 1938 and 1976, there were only 23 reported cases in which a party moved under Rule 11 to strike a pleading and only nine cases in which violations of the rule were found. See Risinger, Honesty in Pleading and its Enforcement: Some “Striking” Problems with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11, 61 Minn.L.Rev. 1 (1976).

Rule 11 was amended in 1983 to cure some of its perceived deficiencies. First, the amendments replaced the subjective bad faith standard with an objective standard that required the attorney to “stop and think” before filing suit and to certify that a pre-filing investigation of both the facts and law had been conducted; this requirement applied not only to the pleadings but also to all court papers (other than discovery, which are covered by Rule 37). Second, the amendments eliminated judicial discretion about whether to impose a sanction and instead made sanctions mandatory. Third, the amendments gave the court discretion to design an appropriate sanction. In practice the amended rule proved to be controversial, and courts, commentators, and practitioners disagreed about the rule’s effectiveness, goals, and fairness. See Sanner & Tobias, Rule 11 and Rule Revision, 37 Loy.L.A.L.Rev. 573 (2004).

By 1990, amended Rule 11 had generated more than 3,000 proceedings addressing sanctions, and the reported decisions were assumed to comprise only a “fraction” of the sanctions imposed. Zaldivar v. City of Los Angeles, 780

704

F.2d 823, 829 (9th Cir. 1986). Some commentators expressed concern that sanctions were imposed disproportionately on civil rights litigants and that the rule was having a chilling effect on constitutional enforcement. See Tobias, The 1993 Revision to Federal Rule 11, 70 Ind.L.J. 171, 171 (1994). However, the rule also achieved positive effects; lawyers surveyed reported making more rigorous inquiries before filing suit. See Kritzer, Marshall & Zemans, Rule 11: Moving Beyond the Cosmic Anecdote, 75 Judicature 269 (1992).

During this period, the Supreme Court decided a number of cases involving different aspects of Rule 11. In PAVELIC & LEFLORE v. MARVEL ENTERTAINMENT GROUP, 493 U.S. 120, 110 S.Ct. 456, 107 L.Ed.2d 438 (1989), the Court held that a law firm could not be sanctioned under the rule for a frivolous pleading signed by a member of the firm, generating a vigorous dissent by Justice Marshall, who argued that the Court had effectively created “an immunity” for law firms under the Rule. In COOTER & GELL v. HARTMARX CORP., 496 U.S. 384, 110 S.Ct. 2447, 110 L.Ed.2d 359 (1990), the Court held that sanctions could be imposed upon a party even after the party had taken a voluntary dismissal of the suit, stating that the standard for determining whether sanctions were appropriate was “whether, at the time the attorney filed the pleading or other paper, his legal argument would have appeared plausible.” Id. at 403–04, 110 S.Ct. at 2459–60, 110 L.Ed.2d at 380–81.

In BUSINESS GUIDES, INC. v. CHROMATIC COMMUNICATIONS ENTERPRISES, INC., 498 U.S. 533, 111 S.Ct. 922, 112 L.Ed.2d 1140 (1991), the Court held that Rule 11 imposed an objective standard of reasonable inquiry on a represented party who signed papers, whether the signatures were required or voluntary. Business Guides, Inc. sought a temporary restraining order through its law firm against the publication of a directory by Chromatic Communications Enterprises, Inc., on the ground that Chromatic had copied phone listings from the Business Guides, Inc. guide. Business Guides claimed to know of the copying because Chromatic had “reprinted” ten seeded listings, i.e., listings that Business Guides had deliberately printed incorrectly in order to be able to prove the copying. When the judge’s law clerk asked to check the listings, however, Business Guides retracted its claim that three of the ten listings were seeds. The clerk, after calling the numbers, discovered that nine of the ten supposedly incorrect listings were actually valid numbers and thus were not valid proof of copying. Although Chromatic did not in the end pursue sanctions against the law firm because the firm had become insolvent, a magistrate recommended that both Business Guides and the law firm be sanctioned (the firm for not investigating further when the first three listings were retracted by Business Guides), and the Supreme Court upheld the sanctions imposed against Business Guides. The Court equated the standards applicable to attorneys with those of represented parties. Justice Kennedy dissented, arguing that it is an abuse of discretion to sanction a represented party “who acts in good faith but errs as to the facts.” Id. at 555, 111 S.Ct. at 935, 112 L.Ed.2d at 1101.

705

In 1993, Rule 11 again was amended and this version remains in effect. The 1993 amendment aimed at curbing some of the abuses associated with the 1983 rule and abrogated Supreme Court decisions that were regarded as wrong:

- (a) The amendment eliminated mandatory sanctions and restored a regime of discretionary sanctions. Rule 11(c)(1).
- (b) The amendment introduced a “safe harbor provision,” requiring a separate motion for sanctions that may not be filed for at least 21 days after service of the challenged paper. Rule 11(c)(2).
- (c) The amendment clarified that sanctions are for deterrence, not compensation, and may include non-monetary sanctions. Rule 11(c)(4).
- (d) The amendment provided that “[a]bsent exceptional circumstances,” a law firm “must be held jointly responsible” for a violation of the rule committed by a partner, associate, or employee. Rule 11(c)(1).
- (e) The amendment allowed the court, on its own initiative, to order a party or attorney to show cause that Rule 11 has not been violated. Rule 11(c)(3).

The 1993 amendment preserved the signature requirement not just for pleadings but also for any written motion and “other paper” (except discovery), and requires the court to strike an unsigned paper “unless the omission is promptly corrected after being called to the attorney’s or party’s attention.” Rule 11(a). The rule also applies to “later advocating” of a position to the court based on the offending paper. Rule 11(b).

Justice Scalia dissented from the adoption of the 1993 amendment:

The proposed revision would render the Rule toothless, by allowing judges to dispense with sanction, by disfavoring compensation for litigation expenses, and by providing a 21-day “safe harbor”. * * * The Rules should be solicitous of the abused (the courts and the opposing party), and not of the abuser. Under the revised Rule, parties will be able to file thoughtless, reckless, and harassing pleadings, secure in the knowledge that they have nothing to lose: If objection is raised, they can retreat without penalty. The proposed revision contradicts what this court said only three years ago: “Baseless filing puts the machinery of justice in motion, burdening courts and individuals alike with needless expense and delay.” Cooter & Gell [p. 704, supra].

Order of the Supreme Court Amending the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (April 22, 1993), reprinted in 146 F.R.D. 404, 507 (1993) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

As you read the opinion that follows, determine which version of Rule 11 applied to the proceedings, and how the result might have been affected by one or another of the amendments.

HADGES V. YONKERS RACING CORP.
United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1995.
48 F.3d 1320, 30 Fed.R.Serv.3d 1165.

FEINBERG, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

[Hedges, a harness racehorse driver, trainer, and owner, had been licensed by the New York State Racing Board in 1972. The license was suspended and revoked in 1974, reissued in 1976, and suspended for a six-month period in 1989.

Hedges was denied the ability to work at a number of racetracks following the 1989 reinstatement of his license. He sued Yonkers Racing Corporation (“YRC”) in both state and federal court for barring him from working at Yonkers Raceway. The federal claim, based on a denial of due process, was dismissed because the court found no state action; the court noted however, that had other tracks (including the Meadowlands in New Jersey) “followed YRC’s decision” state action could have been established. (Based partially on an affidavit that so asserted, it was the court’s understanding that Hedges could work at other tracks in the region.) In his state case, which alleged that he had been blackballed by New York State tracks, the state court ruled against Hedges on all claims.

In 1992 Hedges brought suit in federal district court against the Meadowlands Raceway (a state agency) based on the same claim as in the YRC case. The case settled; before the settlement, however, the Meadowlands’ General Manager submitted an affidavit that, pursuant to a 1992 resolution, the YRC ban would provide a basis for a Meadowlands ban.

Hedges appealed the New York state court decision, and filed a Rule 60(b) motion in the New York federal action requesting that the original decision against him be vacated because the affidavit which had claimed he could work at other tracks was fraudulent. With the Rule 60(b) motion, Hedges and his attorney, William Kunstler, signed statements saying that Hedges had not worked in over four years; neither mentioned the state appeal.

In reply to the Rule 60(b) motion, YRC presented evidence that showed Hedges had raced at Monticello five times in 1991 and seven times in 1993. YRC moved for dismissal and requested that the court impose sanctions on Hedges and possibly Kunstler “for misrepresentation and for failing to disclose the state court action to the district court.” Hedges admitted that he had raced at Monticello but offered the excuse that he had only made a total of $100 from the 12 races together. Hedges also submitted a “scratch” sheet that he claimed documented the fact that the New York State Racing Board scratched him (barred him) from a race in 1989 following the re-issuance of his license. YRC later demonstrated, however, that the sheet was from a November 1987 race.

The District Court denied the Rule 60(b) motion, but found that it was “not so frivolous as to warrant Rule 11 sanctions.” The court did ask, however, that Hedges and Kunstler submit papers arguing against the imposition of sanctions for misrepresentation of Hedges’s racing history. Hedges claimed that the erroneous submission of the sheet was a mistake, and that the 1989 scratching incident was a separate one for which he submitted proof in the form of an affidavit. Kunstler claimed that he did not know that the sheet was from 1987, but that the date was irrelevant because the sheet was useful as evidence anyway.]

* * *

Thereafter, in the second ruling on appeal to us, the judge imposed a Rule 11 sanction of $2,000 on Hedges as an appropriate sanction for his misrepresentations. The judge also censured Kunstler under Rule 11 for failing to make adequate inquiry as to the truth of Hedges’s affidavits and for failing to inform the court of the pending state court litigation. In the course of his opinion, the judge stated:

Mr. Kunstler is apparently one of those attorneys who believes that his sole obligation is to his client and that he has no obligations to the court or to the processes of justice. Unfortunately, he is not alone in this approach to the practice of law, which may be one reason why the legal profession is held in such low esteem by the public at this time.

Kunstler responded in a letter to the court, in which he argued that the court erred in sanctioning his client $2,000 and in censuring him. In particular, he objected to the court’s characterization of him as an attorney “who believes that his sole obligation is to his client,” and he objected to the court’s charge that his approach to law practice was in part responsible for the low public esteem for the legal profession. Kunstler went on to state his opinion that the court’s comment was “generated by an animus toward activist practitioners who, like myself, have, over the years, vigorously represented clients wholly disfavored by the establishment.”

The court treated the letter as an application to reargue the sanction issues. Its order denying the application is the third ruling on appeal to us. In that order, the court quoted at length from a recent New York state court opinion criticizing Kunstler’s law partner, Ronald L. Kuby in an entirely unrelated case. * * * The judge’s order further reprimanded Kunstler stating:

708

Finally, Mr. Kunstler claims that he is entitled to “consideration” because of his representation of unpopular clients. Undoubtedly an attorney who assumes or is assigned the defense of an unpopular case or client and does so at risk to his practice or standing in the community (such as the fictional attorney Atticus Finch in Harper Lee’s “To Kill a Mockingbird”) is entitled to some consideration. However, an attorney who aggressively and repeatedly seeks to represent unpopular causes or questionable clients for personal reasons of his own is not deserving of any particular consideration. And an attorney who places himself and his causes above the interests of justice is entitled to none.

This appeal from the judgment for YRC in the Rule 60(b) action and from the two April 1994 rulings on sanctions followed.

II. Discussion

* * *

[In Part A, the court upheld the district court’s denial of Rule 60(b) relief.]

* * *

B. Rule 11 sanctions

As we have already noted, not only did the district court rule against Hades regarding his claims of fraud on the court in Hades I, but it went on to impose Rule 11 sanctions on both Hades and Kunstler for their own misrepresentations and omissions. This determination was based on two principal grounds: (1) misstatement of the date of the alleged “scratching” incident and (2) misstatement regarding Hades’s lack of work in the years since the YRC ban. In addition, the court based Kunstler’s censure on his failure to inform the court of the state court action. * * *

1. Hades’s sanction

Hades argues that the district court abused its discretion in imposing sanctions on him. YRC argues that the sanctions were justified. We believe that Hades is correct.

In imposing sanctions, the district court apparently did not take into account YRC’s failure to comply with the revised procedural requirements of Rule 11. In this case, YRC did not submit the sanction request separately from all other requests, and there is no evidence in the record indicating that YRC served Hades with the request for sanctions 21 days before presenting it to the court. Thus, YRC denied Hades the “safe-harbor” period that the current version of the Rule specifically mandates. * * *

If Hades had received the benefit of the safe-harbor period, the record indicates that he would have “withdrawn or appropriately corrected” his misstatements, thus avoiding sanctions altogether. Hades did in fact correct one of his misstatements by admitting in an affidavit, sworn to on December 28, 1993, just 12 days after YRC asked for sanctions, that he had raced at Monticello in 1991 and 1993. Thus, this misstatement is not sanctionable.

709

Hades also explained and corrected his misstatement about the 1989 date of the first scratching incident and described another scratching incident in 1989 involving another horse (Dazzling GT). This correction was supported by his own affidavit sworn to on March 17, 1994, and the affidavit of Erik Schulman, sworn to on March 16, 1994. Both were filed with the district court on March 21, 1994, just one week after the court issued its order stating that it was considering imposition of sanctions. Apparently, YRC had not previously requested sanctions on the basis of the scratching incident. Although YRC subsequently questioned whether the Dazzling GT incident described by Hades and Schulman had taken place, the district court did not rely on this as a basis for imposing sanctions. We note that Kunstler also filed an affidavit making similar retractions.

* * *

Rule 11 also provides that a court may impose sanctions on its own initiative. * * * If a court wishes to exercise its discretion to impose sanctions sua sponte, it must “enter an order describing the specific conduct that appears to violate subdivision (b) and directing an attorney, law firm, or party to show cause why it has not violated subdivision (b) with respect thereto.”^k * * * In this case, the court indicated that it was imposing sanctions in response to YRC’s request and did not state that it was imposing sanctions on Hades sua sponte. We doubt that sua sponte sanctions would have been justified here. The advisory committee note on the 1993 amendment specifically states that such sanctions “will ordinarily be [imposed] only in situations that are akin to a contempt of court.” Hades’s conduct did not rise to that level.

Thus, under all the circumstances, particularly the failure to afford Hades the 21-day safe-harbor period provided by revised Rule 11, we believe that the sanction of Hades should be reversed.

2. Kunstler's censure

Like Hades, Kunstler did not receive the benefit of the safe-harbor period. The district court imposed sanctions on Kunstler for failing to adequately investigate the truth of Hades's representations prior to submitting them to the court and for failing to disclose that Hades had brought an action against YRC in New York state court. Kunstler argues that the court's censure of him was an abuse of discretion because the court was motivated by a personal or political animus against him and because his conduct was not sufficiently egregious to justify imposition of sanctions.

710

In our decisions concerning the former version of Rule 11 we have had occasion to address the reasonableness of an attorney's reliance on information provided by a client. In Kamen v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 791 F.2d 1006 (2d Cir. 1986), the plaintiff brought suit against her employer and supervisors under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and state law. Employers are not liable under the Rehabilitation Act unless they receive "[f]ederal financial assistance." 29 U.S.C. § 794. The employer sent letters to the plaintiff's attorney asserting that it did not receive federal financial assistance, but her attorney persisted in prosecuting the Rehabilitation Act suit. The district court agreed with the employer and dismissed the claims. Although plaintiff's attorney had submitted an affirmation stating that his client had advised him that the employer received federal grants, the district court imposed sanctions. We found that the district court abused its discretion because the attorney's reliance on his client's statements was reasonable. * * *

A few years later, we relied on Kamen in holding that "[a]n attorney is entitled to rely on his or her client's statements as to factual claims when those statements are objectively reasonable." Calloway v. Marvel Entertainment Group, 854 F.2d 1452, 1470 (2d Cir. 1988), rev'd in part on other grounds sub nom. Pavelic & Leflore v. Marvel Entertainment Group, 493 U.S. 120, 110 S.Ct. 456, 107 L.Ed.2d 438 (1989). This interpretation is in keeping with the advisory committee notes on former Rule 11, which indicates that the reasonableness of an inquiry depends upon the surrounding circumstances, including such factors as how much time for investigation was available to the signer; whether he had to rely on a client for information as to the facts underlying the pleading . . . ; or whether he depended on forwarding counsel or another member of the bar.

Advisory committee note on 1983 amendment to Fed.R.Civ.P. 11.

In Calloway, at least one of the plaintiff's claims "was never supported by any evidence at any stage of the proceeding," and we affirmed the district court's imposition of sanctions. * * * However, we went on to set forth a procedure for district courts to follow in analyzing whether an attorney has conducted a reasonable inquiry into the facts underlying a party's position.

In considering sanctions regarding a factual claim, the initial focus of the district court should be on whether an objectively reasonable evidentiary basis for the claim was demonstrated in pretrial proceedings or at trial. Where such a basis was shown, no inquiry into the adequacy of the attorney's pre-filing investigation is necessary.

711

* * *

The new version of Rule 11 makes it even clearer that an attorney is entitled to rely on the objectively reasonable representations of the client. No longer are attorneys required to certify that their representations are "well grounded in fact." * * * The current version of the Rule requires only that an attorney conduct "an inquiry reasonable under the circumstances" into whether "factual contentions have evidentiary support." * * * Thus, the new version of Rule 11 is in keeping with the emphasis in Calloway on looking to the record before imposing sanctions.

In its first sanction decision in April 1994, the district court here stated:

With respect to plaintiff's counsel, William M. Kunstler, the situation is not quite as clear. There is nothing to indicate that, on the serious factual misrepresentations made in plaintiff's papers, Mr. Kunstler had independent knowledge of their falsity. However, it is equally clear that he made no attempt to verify the truth of the plaintiff's representations prior to submitting them to the court.

Apparently, the district court did not focus, as Rule 11 now requires, on whether the pretrial proceedings provided "evidentiary support" for the factual misrepresentations with which the court was concerned.

It is clear that the record before the district court contained evidentiary support for Kunstler's incorrect statements. As to the scratching incident, the record included a sworn statement by Hades describing an October 1989 incident in which he claimed to have been scratched from driving the horse "Me Gotta Bret." A scratch sheet, which did not reveal the year in which it was made out, was also part of the record. Kunstler later submitted an affidavit admitting the error and stating that he had no idea that the 1989 date was wrong. He further maintained that regardless of its date, the scratch sheet was relevant to show collaboration between the Racing Board and YRC in 1987, which would subject the latter to § 1983 liability. Moreover, it appears to be undisputed that most of the evidence YRC produced to persuade the court that the event had taken place in 1987 was within its possession, not Hades's. See Kamen, 791 F.2d at 1012 (noting reasonableness of relying on client representations where “the relevant information [is] largely in the control of the defendants”).

We also believe that the record contained evidentiary support for the claim that Hedges had not worked for four years. At the time the district court granted YRC summary judgment in Hedges’s Rule 60(b) action, it had before it Hedges’s affidavit asserting that he had written to racetrack General Managers asking for driving privileges and had not received any replies. The record also contained attorney Faraldo’s affidavit asserting that Hedges had followed his advice in writing these letters. Moreover, Kunstler represented Hedges in the Meadowlands suit in which Meadowlands admitted banning Hedges based upon the YRC ban. We believe that in light of his familiarity with the Meadowlands litigation and the sworn statements of his client and another attorney, Kunstler had sufficient evidence to support a belief that Hedges had not participated in harness horseracing in New York since the YRC ban. * * *

712

The district court also believed that censure of Kunstler was justified because “he had to be aware of the recent state court litigation, still on appeal, but made no mention of it in his initial papers.” Kunstler concedes that he was aware of this litigation but maintains that he did not believe that it was necessary to bring the proceedings to the court’s attention because the New York Supreme Court had not ruled on the merits of the state law blackballing claim. As noted above, we agree with the view that the state court opinion was not a decision on the merits of that issue. Even if it were, there would be no tactical advantage in not mentioning the state court ruling to the district court since YRC was a party to both actions (indeed, it was represented by the same law firm and the same attorney in both actions) and could be expected to inform the district court of the state court action if it were helpful.

Moreover, the portion of the court’s opinion in the Rule 60(b) action that listed the possible bases for imposition of sanctions omitted any reference to Kunstler’s nondisclosure of the state court action. Rule 11 specifically requires that those facing sanctions receive adequate notice and the opportunity to respond. * * * Although YRC had requested sanctions on this ground, as discussed above, that request was procedurally improper. Thus, although Kunstler would have been wiser to alert the court to the state court proceedings, the nondisclosure was not a proper ground for sanctioning him.

* * *

Finally, the remarks of the district court, which we have quoted in substantial part above, contribute to our conclusion that the sanction of Kunstler was unjustified. These remarks have the appearance of a personal attack against Kunstler, and perhaps more broadly, against activist attorneys who represent unpopular clients or causes. We find the court’s criticism of Kunstler’s law partner, Ronald L. Kuby, for his activities in another case, especially unwarranted. For all these reasons, we reverse the imposition of the sanction of censure on Kunstler.

* * *

713

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What constitutes a “reasonable” inquiry under Rule 11(b)(2)? In GOLDEN EAGLE DISTRIBUTING CORP. v. BURROUGHS CORP., 801 F.2d 1531 (9th Cir. 1986), rehearing denied with a dissenting opinion, 809 F.2d 584 (9th Cir. 1987), plaintiff’s counsel cited a 1965 California Supreme Court case supporting its argument but did not cite a 1979 California Supreme Court opinion that was inconsistent with the 1965 case. Counsel distinguished the later case in its reply brief after it had been cited by the opposition, arguing that the 1965 case had not been overruled. Counsel did not address two intermediate court opinions that discussed the effect of the 1979 opinion on the 1965 opinion. The district court held that Rule 11 sanctions were appropriate for counsel’s failing to cite adverse authority, on the view that “[t]here would be little point to Rule 11 if it tolerated counsel making an argument for the extension of existing law disguised as one based on existing law.” 103 F.R.D. 124, at 127 (1984). The Ninth Circuit reversed.

The text of the Rule, however, does not require that counsel differentiate between a position which is supported by existing law and one that would extend it. The Rule on its face requires that the motion be either one or the other. Moreover, there is nothing in any of the statements of the proponents of the amended Rule or in the authorities we have surveyed since its adoption which suggests such a requirement.

801 F.2d at 1539–40. Does the 1993 amendment change the result?

2.Does the standard of plausible pleading affect Rule 11? The consensus is that under the 1993 version of Rule 11, sanctions are not warranted simply because a complaint does not survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. However, one commentator reports that post-Iqbal, “there has been a veritable explosion of threatened sanctions,” observing that “one district judge has been citing Rule 11 alongside Twombly and Iqbal [p. 617 and p. 628, supra] as the standard governing the sufficiency of a plaintiff’s complaint.” Cooper, Iqbal’s Retro Revolution, 46 Wake Forest L.Rev. 937, 964 (2011). In addition, questions have been raised whether the plausibility standard forecloses the kind of complaints that were assumed to be permissible under Rule 11(b)(3)—when plaintiff alleges that specifically identified factual contentions “will likely have evidentiary support.” See Spencer, Plausibility Pleading, 49 B.C.L.Rev. 431, 471 (2008). Does this mean that plausibility under Rule 8 is linked “to the likelihood of discovery producing evidentiary support”? See Hartnett, Taming Twombly, Even After Iqbal, 158 U.Pa.L.Rev. 473, 506 (2010).

3.Congress has authorized claim-specific sanctions in particular statutes. Sanctions under the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, see p. 654, supra, closely resemble those available under the 1983 version of Rule 11 and are mandatory once a violation of the sanction provision is found.

Congress also has authorized courts to award attorney’s fees to a prevailing defendant in a civil rights case if plaintiff’s claim is found to be frivolous, unreasonable, or groundless. See § 706(k) of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e–5(k) (1988) (employment discrimination actions).

4. Courts have statutory authority under 28 U.S.C. § 1927 to impose excess costs on an attorney “who so multiplies the proceedings in any case unreasonably and vexatiously.” Courts also have inherent power to sanction parties, and this power is neither constrained nor supplanted by Rule 11 or 28 U.S.C. § 1927. In CHAMBERS v. NASCO, INC., 501 U.S. 32, 111 S.Ct. 2123, 115 L.Ed.2d 27 (1991), the Supreme Court held, five-to-four, in an opinion authored by Justice White, that the district court properly imposed sanctions as a matter of inherent power when the offending party engaged in bad faith activity that abused the judicial process. Justice Kennedy dissented and criticized the use of inherent authority in this situation: “By inviting district courts to rely on inherent authority as a substitute for attention to the careful distinctions contained in the rules and statutes, today’s decision will render these sources of authority superfluous in many instances.” Id. at 67, 111 S.Ct. at 2144, 115 L.Ed.2d at 59.

Although Rule 11 sanctions have declined since 1993, there appears to be an uptick in sanctions imposed either as a matter of inherent authority or under 28 U.S.C. § 1927 in situations in which the procedural protections of Rule 11 “have not been or could not be met.” Hart, And the Chill Goes On—Federal Civil Rights Plaintiffs Beware: Rule 11 vis-à-vis 28 U.S.C. § 1927 and the Court’s Inherent Power, 37 Loy.L.A.L.Rev. 645, 647–48 (2004). Moreover, although there is circuit disagreement as to whether sanctions may be imposed on pro se litigants under 28 U.S.C. § 1927, some courts elide the statutory barrier by relying on their inherent authority. See Whitt, The Split on Sanctioning Pro Se Litigants Under 28 U.S.C. § 1927: Choose Wisely When Picking a Side, Eighth Circuit, 73 Mo.L.Rev. 1365 (2008).

5. Does a court have inherent authority to award attorney’s fees as a sanction absent a showing of bad faith? In WILSON v. CITIGROUP, 702 F.3d 720 (2d Cir. 2012), the Second Circuit reversed an order of attorney’s fees imposed on counsel for filing opposition papers four days after the court-ordered deadline but consistent with a schedule to which all parties had consented. The appeals court found that the party had done “nothing to warrant a sanction,” underscoring that he had “disobeyed no order of the district court and caused no prejudice to opposing counsel.” Moreover, the appeals court underscored that it was an abuse of discretion to impose sanctions without first making a finding of bad faith and giving counsel notice:

Our case law is clear that a district court may not impose attorney’s fees as a sanction without first making an explicit finding that the sanctioned party, whether a party or a party’s counsel, acted in bad faith in engaging in the sanctionable conduct. * * * Here, it is undisputed that the district court made no “explicit finding” that * * * [the] untimely submission of its opposition papers * * * was in bad faith. * * *

Id. at 724.

6. In KING v. WHITMER, 556 F.Supp.3d 680 (E.D.Mich. 2021), plaintiffs filed an unsuccessful suit against the Michigan Governor and Secretary of State—among others—alleging violations of federal and state law in connection with the 2020 presidential election. After the case was dismissed voluntarily, the district court imposed sanctions on nine of the plaintiffs’ attorneys under 28 U.S.C. § 1927, Rule 11, and the court’s inherent authority. The court’s 110-page opinion began by observing:

This lawsuit represents a historic and profound abuse of the judicial process. * * * Individuals may have a right (within certain bounds) to disseminate allegations of fraud unsupported by law or fact in the public sphere. But attorneys cannot exploit their privilege and access to the judicial process to do the same. And when an attorney has done so, sanctions are in order. * * * The attorneys who filed the instant lawsuit abused the well-established rules applicable to the litigation process by proffering claims not backed by law; proffering claims not backed by evidence (but instead, speculation, conjecture, and unwarranted suspicion); proffering factual allegations and claims without engaging in the required prefiling inquiry; and dragging out these proceedings even after they acknowledged that it was too late to attain the relief sought.”

The sanctions ordered by the district court included: (1) an obligation to complete 12 hours of continuing legal education—six hours on pleading standards and six hours on election law; (2) a referral for investigation and possible suspension or disbarment to the appropriate authorities in Michigan and the states in which they were admitted to practice; and (3) an award of attorney’s fees and costs, which the court ultimately calculated to be over $175,000. See King v. Whitmer, 2021 WL 5711102 (E.D.Mich. 2021). As of this writing, the sanctions ruling is on appeal to the Sixth Circuit.

7. Rule 11 remains hotly debated. Some commentators see a social value in “meritless” litigation as a spur to legal innovation. See Reinert, Screening Out Innovation: The Merits of Meritless Litigation, 89 Ind.L.J. 1191 (2014). Indeed, some economists have argued that even frivolous lawsuits may have a positive effect on deterrence. See Stone & Miceli, The Impact of Frivolous Lawsuits on Deterrence: Do They Have Some Redeeming Value?, 10 J.L.Econ. & Pol’y 301 (2014). Still other commentators question whether litigation abuse is a widespread problem, and emphasize the democratic value of keeping the courts open for redress. See Miller, Are the Federal Courthouse Doors Closing? What’s Happened to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure?, 43 Tex.Tech.L.Rev. 587 (2011). On the other hand, some lawmakers have urged a return to mandatory sanctions as a way to curb excessive litigation costs and to retain competitive markets. See Lawsuit Abuse Reduction Act of 2017, S. 237, 115th Cong. (proposing to withdraw Rule 11’s 21-day safe harbor provision and mandate sanctions).

^aAs in original.

^bAlteration in original.

^cAlteration in original.

^dAlteration in original.

³ The dissent greatly oversimplifies matters by suggesting that the Federal Rules somehow dispensed with the pleading of facts altogether. * * * While, for most types of cases, the Federal Rules eliminated the cumbersome requirement that a claimant “set out in detail the facts upon which he bases his claim,” Conley v. Gibson * * * (emphasis added), Rule 8(a)(2) still requires a “showing,” rather than a blanket assertion, of entitlement to relief. Without some factual allegation in the complaint, it is hard to see how a claimant could satisfy the requirement of providing not only “fair notice” of the nature of the claim, but also “grounds” on which the claim rests. See 5 Wright & Miller § 1202, at 94, 95 (Rule 8(a) “contemplate[s] the statement of circumstances, occurrences, and events in support of the claim presented” and does not authorize a pleader’s “bare averment that he wants relief and is entitled to it”).

^eAlteration in original.

^fThe dissent takes heart in the reassurances of plaintiffs’ counsel that discovery would be “ ‘phased’ ” and “limited to the existence of the alleged conspiracy and class certification.” * * * But determining whether some illegal agreement may have taken place between unspecified persons at different ILECs (each a multibillion dollar corporation with legions of management level employees) at some point over seven years is a sprawling, costly, and hugely time-consuming undertaking not easily susceptible to the kind of line drawing and case management that the dissent envisions. Perhaps the best answer to the dissent’s optimism that antitrust discovery is open to effective judicial control is a more extensive quotation of the authority just cited, a judge with a background in antitrust law. Given the system that we have, the hope of effective judicial supervision is slim: “The timing is all wrong. The plaintiff files a sketchy complaint (the Rules of Civil Procedure discourage fulsome documents), and discovery is launched. A judicial officer does not know the details of the case the parties will present and in theory cannot know the details. Discovery is used to find the details. The judicial officer always knows less than the parties, and the parties themselves may not know very well where they are going or what they expect to find. A magistrate supervising discovery does not—cannot—know the expected productivity of a given request, because the nature of the requester’s claim and the contents of the files (or head) of the adverse party are unknown. Judicial officers cannot measure the costs and benefits to the requester and so cannot isolate impositional requests. Requesters have no reason to disclose their own estimates because they gain from imposing costs on rivals (and may lose from an improvement in accuracy). The portions of the Rules of Civil Procedure calling on judges to trim back excessive demands, therefore, have been, and are doomed to be, hollow. We cannot prevent what we cannot detect; we cannot detect what we cannot define; we cannot define ‘abusive’ discovery except in theory, because in practice we lack essential information.” Easterbrook, Discovery as Abuse, 69 B.U.L.Rev. 635, 638–639 (1989).

^fAlteration in original.

^gForm 9 was renumbered as Form 11. All of the forms were abrogated in 2015, see p. 639, Note 3, infra.

^hAlteration in original.

ⁱAlteration in original.

^jAlteration in original.

⁴Defendants are correct in characterizing the majority of the allegations as conclusions of law as most of them apply law to the facts of Plaintiff’s case. See James v. City of Wilkes-Barre, 700 F.3d 675, 681 (3d Cir. 2012). We give one example. Paragraph 128 of the third amended complaint alleges: “Defendants violated Plaintiff’s right of Due Process by terminating Plaintiff without written notice of alleged misconduct and failing to provide a fair and impartial adjudication hearing.”

⁵For example, among many other abstract allegations of law, Plaintiff alleges:

121. In order to demonstrate a procedural due process violation, “a plaintiff must show that (1) she was deprived of an individual interest encompassed within the Fourteenth Amendment’s protection of life, liberty, or property, and that (2) the procedures available to her did not provide due process of the law.” Mayo v. Bangor Area School Dist., 2013 WL 3716533 (E.D. Pa. 2013) (internal citations omitted).

(Doc. 39, Third Am. Compl. ¶ 121).

^kThe language of this provision has been altered without any change in substance.

CHAPTER 9

JOINDER OF CLAIMS AND PARTIES:
EXPANDING THE SCOPE OF THE CIVIL ACTION

This chapter examines procedures that allow multiple claims and parties to be combined in one lawsuit. Common law procedure stayed close to a bilateral model in which one plaintiff sued one defendant on one cause of action. See Sunderland, Joinder of Actions, 18 Mich.L.Rev. 571 (1920). As social and commercial relations became increasingly complex, the inability to resolve intricate disputes in one proceeding generated piecemeal litigation marred by delay, cost, and unfairness. Broadly speaking, joinder rules today fall into one of two categories: permissive rules, which give a litigant the option of joining parties and claims in a single lawsuit; and mandatory rules, which require a litigant to do so. It is important to remember that the question of joinder is separate from whether the court may exercise jurisdiction over the claim or party to be added. See Federal Rule 82.

A. IDENTIFYING PARTIES WHO MAY SUE AND BE SUED

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 17 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

ELLIS CANNING CO. v. INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.
Supreme Court of Kansas, 1953.
174 Kan. 357, 255 P.2d 658.

PARKER, JUSTICE. * * *

In its petition plaintiff alleged that in furnishing service on its tractor defendant negligently started a fire in that vehicle resulting in damage amounting to $479.79; that plaintiff was insured in The Potomac Insurance Company against the loss, under a policy containing a subrogation clause; that it had been paid in full for the amount of its loss; and that it had commenced and was maintaining the action to recover such amount in its own name for the use and benefit of the insurance company.

718

Defendant’s amended answer denied seriatim all acts of negligence * * *; admitted all allegations of that pleading respecting insurance, the amount of the loss, and the fact such loss had been fully paid by the insurance company; and then, in the third paragraph thereof, * * * alleged and charged, that since plaintiff was seeking to recover the amount paid to it by the insurer as full compensation for the loss of the tractor, the insurance company was the real party in interest and plaintiff had no legal right to maintain the action.

Plaintiff’s motion to strike paragraph three of the answer and its demurrer to the same paragraph of that pleading * * * were overruled by the trial court. This appeal followed.

The appellant insists, the appellee concedes, and we agree, the sole question involved is whether the insured (appellant), after having been paid the full amount of its loss, is a real party in interest and legally entitled to maintain this action, for the use and benefit of the insurer, to recover such loss from the party (appellee), whose negligence is alleged to be responsible therefore. The question thus raised is not new in this jurisdiction and we frankly concede is one on which there is apparent conflict in our decisions.

Subject to certain exceptions, not here involved, our statute, G.S.1949, 60–401, requires that “Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest.” Given its common and accepted meaning, particularly where—as here—it must be conceded the appellant is no longer directly interested in the subject matter of the litigation, it would seem that, in and of itself, language of the statute would compel a negative answer to the question now under consideration. * * *

Notwithstanding, earlier decisions * * * holding that in the situation disclosed by the pleadings in the case at bar, the insurer is the real and only party in interest and must undertake the maintenance of the action for his reimbursement, it must and should be frankly admitted that in * * * [two decisions], as appellant contends, we held the insured might maintain the action in his own name for the use and benefit of the insurer. Be that as it may it must be conceded, that fully aware of the rule announced in those cases, we have repudiated what was there said and held with respect to such rule and now recognize and adhere to the doctrine that under the facts and circumstances disclosed by such pleadings an insured who has been fully paid for his loss is not the real party in interest * * * and hence cannot maintain an action to recover the amount of such loss in his own name for the use and benefit of the insurer. Conversely stated, the rule now recognized and applied is, that under the confronting conditions and circumstances the right of action against the alleged wrongdoer vests wholly in the insurer who * * * may, and indeed must, bring the action as the real and only party in interest if one is to be maintained. * * *

719

The judgment is affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The real-party-in-interest rule is justified by the need to foreclose duplicative lawsuits, to assert all defenses in one action, and to avoid prejudice. See The Ezra Charitable Trust v. Rent-Way, Inc., 136 F.Supp.2d 435, 443 (W.D. Pa. 2001). How does Rule 17 achieve these goals? Is the rule redundant of the governing applicable substantive law? Some courts and commentators see no need for the rule and have argued for its elimination. See Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 485 F.2d 78, 83 (4th Cir. 1973) (“ ‘Rule 17(a) is a barnacle on the federal practice ship. It ought to be scraped away.’ ”) (quoting Kennedy, Federal Rule 17(a): Will the Real Party in Interest Please Stand?, 51 Minn.L.Rev. 675, 724 (1967)); Entman, More Reasons for Abolishing Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 17(a): The Problem of the Proper Plaintiff and Insurance Subrogation, 68 N.C.L.Rev. 893 (1990).

2.If the party designated in the original complaint is not the real party in interest, should a substitution of the proper party be given retroactive effect to the date of the original complaint for statute-of-limitations purposes? Federal Rule 17(a) was amended in 1966 to add the provision that no action shall be dismissed because it was not prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest until a reasonable time has been allowed for substitution. The Advisory Committee’s Notes to Rule 17, which appear in the Supplement, specifically limit the application of this passage to cases in which the proper party to sue is difficult to ascertain or when an excusable mistake has been made. What is the relation between this rule and Rule 15? See Section E, p. 688, supra.

3.Apart from Rule 17, two other concepts are relevant to determining who may sue or be sued—“capacity” and “standing.”

Capacity refers to the ability of a party to enforce rights or to be sued by others. Capacity rules are designed to protect a party by ensuring that the party’s interests are adequately represented. Real-party-in-interest rules serve to protect the opposing party’s interests by ensuring that only the litigant who has a true stake in the outcome can sue or be sued. This prevents situations in which a person first might be sued by the person who holds the nominal title to a claim, and after successfully defending that claim, is subjected to a second action by the real party in interest. The federal system and many states have special rules to deal with suits by or against minors and incompetent persons. See Rules 17(b) and 17(c).

Standing is a constitutional requirement under Article III of the United States Constitution for actions in federal court and focuses on who may invoke the power of the Court to redress an injury. State judicial systems have similar requirements derived from state law. See Hershkoff, State Courts and the “Passive Virtues”: Rethinking the Judicial Function, 114 Harv.L.Rev. 1833 (2001). Federal doctrine requires plaintiff to allege a “personal injury fairly traceable to the defendant’s allegedly unlawful conduct and likely to be redressed by the requested relief.” Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751, 104 S.Ct. 3315, 3324, 82 L.Ed.2d 556, 569 (1984). The requirement of standing reflects limits on judicial power and the need for a party with an actual interest in the dispute to ensure adversarial presentation.

It is possible to have a case in which a real party in interest (the beneficiary of a will, for example) lacks capacity to sue (perhaps because the party is a minor). Moreover, even if this hypothetical beneficiary had capacity to sue, standing to raise particular claims might be lacking. So, for example, the beneficiary of the will might not be able to bring an action against the government on the ground that a tax imposed on the estate is used for illegal purposes; any alleged injury is of a general nature, not particular to the litigant, and hence the beneficiary lacks standing to sue.

4. SPRINT COMMUNICATIONS CO. v. APCC SERVICES, INC., 554 U.S. 269, 128 S.Ct. 2531, 171 L.Ed.2d 424 (2008), involved the requirement that long-distance phone carriers, in the days before mobile phones became ubiquitous, compensate pay phone companies when consumers dial 1-800 numbers or use charge cards. The pay phone companies, to save costs, assigned their claims to firms called aggregators who, as assignees, filed and litigated the suit for a fee. The Supreme Court divided, five-to-four, on whether the assignee, who held legal title to the aggregated claims, could be treated as the real party in interest for purposes of Article III standing even though the assignee was required to remit all of the recovery, less a flat fee, to the assignor. The dissent, finding that the assignee lacked standing, argued that the majority impermissibly treated the right to sue as “a marketable commodity,” rather than as a “personal claim.” The dissent went on to explain: “The absence of any right to the substantive recovery means that respondents cannot benefit from the judgment they seek and thus lack Article III standing. ‘When you got nothing, you got nothing to lose.’ Bob Dylan, Like A Rolling Stone, on Highway 61 Revisited (Columbia Records 1965).” Id. at 301, 128 S.Ct. at 2550, 171 L.Ed.2d at 447. Do you agree that the assignee had “nothing to lose”?

B. JOINDER OF CLAIMS

1.HISTORICAL LIMITATIONS ON THE PERMISSIVE JOINDER OF CLAIMS

HARRIS v. AVERY

Supreme Court of Kansas, 1869.
5 Kan. 146.

VALENTINE, JUSTICE. This action was brought in the court below by Avery * * *. The petition states two causes of action,—false imprisonment and slander,—and alleges that both arose out of the same transaction.

Harris demurred to this petition, on the ground “that it appears on the face of the petition that several causes of action are improperly joined.” The district court overruled the demurrer, and this ruling is assigned as error. The petition shows that the two causes of action are founded upon the following facts: Harris met Avery in the city of Fort Scott, and, in the presence of several other persons, called Avery a thief; said he had a stolen horse; took the horse from Avery, and kept the horse for four or five days; arrested Avery, and confined him in the county jail with felons four or five days. We think these facts, as detailed in the petition, constitute only one transaction, * * * and whether they constitute more than one cause of action, under our Code practice, may be questionable. * * * But as we have not been asked to decide the latter question, we will pass it over and treat the case as though the facts stated constitute two causes of action.

Section 89 of the Code (Comp.Laws, 138,) provides “that the plaintiff may unite several causes of action in the same petition, whether they be such as have heretofore been denominated legal or equitable, or both, when they are included in either one of the following classes: First, the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action.” This differs in many respects from the common-law rule. At common law, “where the same form of action may be adopted for several distinct injuries, the plaintiff may, in general, proceed for all in one action, though the several rights affected were derived from different titles,” (1 Chit.Pl. 201; Tidd, Pr. 11;) and different forms of action may be united, “where the same plea may be pleaded and the same judgment given on all the counts of the declaration, or whenever the counts are of the same nature, and the same judgment is to be given on them, although the pleas be different.” 1 Chit.Pl. 200.

In the action at bar, if Harris had arrested Avery on a warrant, which Harris had maliciously and without probable cause obtained from a court of competent jurisdiction, and had also converted the horse to his own use, then at common law Avery would have had three distinct causes of action, which he could unite in one suit: First, an action for the false imprisonment or malicious prosecution; second, an action of slander for the words spoken; and, third, an action of trover for the conversion of the horse. These may all be united in an action on the case, * * * trover being a species of case. Avery might, also, at common law unite with these causes of action as many other causes of action as he might have, for malicious prosecution, slander, trover, criminal conversation, nuisance, and other causes of action which may be sued in an action on the case, and although they each may have arisen out of a different transaction, and at a different time, and in a different place. But if Harris arrested Avery without any process—which was the fact in this case—and in an entirely irregular manner, then the two causes of action for false imprisonment and slander could not at common law be united, as the first would have to be sued in an action of trespass and the second in an action on the case, and it would make no difference whether they both arose out of the same transaction or not. Our Code has abolished all the common-law forms of action * * *. It follows the rules of equity more closely than it does those of the common law, one object seeming to be to avoid the multiplicity of suits, and to settle in one action, as equity did, as far as practicable, the whole subject-matter of a controversy. * * * It is probably true that the two causes of action for false imprisonment and slander cannot, under our Code, be united, unless both arise out of the same transaction, one being an injury to the person and the other being an injury to the character; but we do not know of any reason why they should not be united when both do arise out of the same transaction. * * *

The order of the district court overruling the demurrer to the petition is affirmed.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

At common law, a plaintiff generally could join claims in a single lawsuit only if they were a part of the same writ and so belonged to the same form of action. The typical code provision authorized joinder of claims when they fell within one of several statutory classes, which ordinarily included the following:

- (a)Contracts, express or implied;
- (b)Injuries to the person;
- (c)Injuries to character;
- (d)Injuries to property;
- (e)Actions to recover real property, with or without damages;
- (f)Actions to recover chattels, with or without damages; and
- (g)Actions arising out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of the action.

In what ways do these categories differ from the forms of action as guidelines for the joinder of claims? What is the logic of each of these classes? Is the code approach to joinder of claims as described in Harris any less formalistic than at common law? See Blume, A Rational Theory for Joinder of Causes of Action and Defences, and for the Use of Counterclaims, 26 Mich.L.Rev. 1 (1927).

2.JOINDER OF CLAIMS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 18 in the Supplement.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.Federal Rule 18 removes all obstacles to the joinder of claims and permits the joinder of both legal and equitable matters. The only restriction on the claims that may be joined is imposed by jurisdictional requirements. What are the advantages of permitting the liberal joinder of claims? Are there any disadvantages? How much credence should we give to the efficiency rationale? If each claim is different, are there material efficiency gains?
2. Rule 18 describes the claims that a party is allowed to assert in a single action against an opposing party, but it does not compel joinder. Compare this approach with Michigan’s joinder provision, which is in the Supplement following Rule 18. What are the arguments for a rule of compulsory joinder of all related claims existing between a plaintiff and a defendant? See Friedenthal, Joinder of Claims, Counterclaims and Cross-Complaints: Suggested Revision of the California Provisions, 23 Stan.L.Rev. 1, 11–17 (1970); Greenbaum, Jacks or Better to Open: Procedural Limitations on Co-Party and Third-Party Claims, 74 Minn.L.Rev. 507, 535–37 (1990). Do you see any disadvantages to the Michigan approach?
3. Rule 18 generally applies at the pleading stage of the lawsuit and is subject to the rules that govern pleadings. At the pleading stage, there is no doctrine of misjoinder of claims. However, Rule 42(b) allows the court to sever claims and to authorize separate trials of claims or issues. Does the availability of severance of claims eliminate all of the objections to permitting unrestricted joinder of claims as an initial matter? To what extent does the court’s power to sever claims prevent the system from achieving the objectives of a liberal joinder rule?
- 4.The doctrine of claim preclusion, addressed in Chapter 17, infra, may create incentives for the joinder of claims even in the absence of a rule of compulsory joinder. See Blume, Required Joinder of Claims, 45 Mich.L.Rev. 797 (1947). Thus, for example, if A and B are involved in an automobile accident in which A suffers both bodily injury and damage to her automobile, the risk of claim preclusion in a system that defines the claim in terms of transactional relation may lead A to join both claims in one action, even though Federal Rule 18 does not require this result.
- 5.In SPORN v. HUDSON TRANSIT LINES, 265 A.D. 360, 38 N.Y.S.2d 512 (1st Dep’t 1942), the court had before it an attempt to join five causes of action for negligence resulting in personal injuries with one cause of action for malicious prosecution. It stated:

The causes of action for negligence and for malicious prosecution are essentially different in nature; each type involves different rules of law; each requires different testimony to establish a case and each carries a different measure of damages. If a single jury were to try both types of action at the one time, there is a strong likelihood that confusion would exist in the minds of the jurors as to the rules of law to be applied to the respective actions and they would undoubtedly entertain much difficulty in applying the various parts of testimony introduced to the appropriate cause of action.

724

Id. at 361, 38 N.Y.S.2d at 514. Would the result in Sporn have been different if the action had been brought in a federal court?

C. ADDITION OF CLAIMS

1. COUNTERCLAIMS

The counterclaim in its present form did not exist at common law, although it has well-recognized precursors in set-off and recoupment and in equity practice. The philosophy underlying set-off and recoupment was the common sense view that someone should not be compelled to pay one moment what he will be entitled to recover back the next. Judge Clark outlined the development and theory of set-off and recoupment as follows:

 At first  [recoupment] was limited to a showing of payment, or of former recovery. Later, recoupment was developed so as to allow a defendant to show for the purpose of reducing the plaintiff’s recovery any facts arising out of the transaction sued upon or connected with the subject thereof, which facts might have founded an independent action in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff.  It was not necessary that the opposing claims be liquidated, or that they be of the same character; i.e., a claim in “tort” could be set off against one in “contract.” It was essential, however, that the claims of both plaintiff and defendant involve the same “subject-matter,” or arise out of the “same transaction” ***.

But where the defendant’s claims arose out of a transaction different from that sued upon, the common-law recoupment was unavailable. The defendant, therefore, was compelled to bring a separate suit in order to satisfy his claim against the plaintiff. Equity, at an early date, relieved the defendant of this hardship by allowing a set-off of claims [growing out of a transaction different from the plaintiff’s claim] ***.

Under the set-off , it was necessary that the demands either be liquidated, or arise out of contract or judgment. It was necessary, also, that the demands be due the defendant in his own right against the plaintiff, or his assignor, and be not already barred by the statute of limitations ***.

Clark, Code Pleading § 100 (2d ed. 1947). The utility of recoupment was limited because defendant was not permitted to recover affirmative relief; the claim could be used only to reduce or “net out” plaintiff’s recovery. Set-off likewise was limited because the claim had to be for a liquidated amount.

725

The movement for procedural reform in the mid-nineteenth century gave passing attention to the problem of defendant’s claims against plaintiff; the original New York Field Code of 1848 made no provision for counterclaims. Amendments in 1852 corrected this omission and permitted as a counterclaim:

- 1.A cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint, as the foundation of the plaintiff’s claim, or connected with the subject of the action; and
- 2.In an action arising on contract, any other cause of action arising on contract, and existing at the commencement of the action.

See Blume, A Rational Theory for Joinder of Causes of Action and Defences, and for the Use of Counterclaims, 26 Mich.L.Rev. 1, 48 (1927). The English Judicature Act of 1873 eliminated the historic limitations on defendant’s ability to assert claims against plaintiff. Then, at the beginning of the twentieth century, a number of states amended their codes to adopt the English practice.

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 13(a)–(e) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

UNITED STATES V. HEYWARD-ROBINSON CO.
United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1970.
430 F.2d 1077.

BRYAN, DISTRICT JUDGE.*

This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff entered in the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut ***.

The action involves two subcontracts for excavation work between D’Agostino Excavators, Inc. (D’Agostino) and The Heyward-Robinson Company, Inc. (Heyward) as prime contractor on two construction jobs in Connecticut. One of the prime contracts, for the construction of barracks at the Naval Submarine Base in New London, Groton, was with the federal government (the Navy job). The other, a non-federal job, was for the construction of a plant for Stelma, Inc. at Stamford (the Stelma job).

D’Agostino brought this action against Heyward and its surety, Maryland Casualty Company (Maryland) under the Miller Act * * * to recover payments alleged to be due on the Navy job. Heyward answered, denying liability on the Navy job and counterclaiming for alleged overpayments and extra costs of completing both the Navy job and the Stelma job. In reply, D’Agostino denied liability on the Heyward counterclaims and interposed a reply counterclaim to recover from Heyward monies alleged to be due on the Stelma job.

726

At the trial, the two subcontracts in suit were treated together. D’Agostino claimed that Heyward had breached both subcontracts by failing to make progress payments as required and that substantial sums were owing to it from Heyward on both jobs. Heyward claimed that D’Agostino had breached both subcontracts by permitting its compensation and employee liability insurance to lapse; that, as a result, Heyward on October 19, 1965 had terminated both; and that D’Agostino was liable for overpayments and costs of completion on both.

The issue as to whether Heyward had breached the subcontracts prior to October 19, 1965, when Heyward claimed to have terminated them, was submitted to the jury as a special question. The jury found that Heyward had breached the subcontracts prior to that date.

After amendment of the complaint by D’Agostino to allege a claim in quantum meruit for the work performed on both jobs, special questions then were submitted to the jury as to the reasonable value of the work performed by D’Agostino on each project and the net amount owed by Heyward to D’Agostino on both. The jury found, in answer to these questions, that the net amount owed by Heyward to D’Agostino on both jobs was $63,988.36. Judgment against Heyward was rendered accordingly. Under a formula agreed to by the parties, it was determined that the amount due to D’Agostino on the Navy job was $40,771.46 and judgment was entered against Maryland in that sum.

* * *

I.

Appellants’ initial contention is that the District Court had no jurisdiction over the counterclaims on the Stelma job. They therefore contend that the Stelma claims must be dismissed and that since D’Agostino’s claims on the Navy and Stelma jobs were presented to the jury as inseparable, the judgment below must be reversed.

Appellants urge that the Stelma counterclaims are not compulsory counterclaims over which the federal court acquired jurisdiction ancillary to the jurisdiction which it had over D’Agostino’s Miller Act claim stated in the complaint. They say that these are permissive counterclaims over which the court had no ancillary jurisdiction and which lacked the required independent basis of federal jurisdiction.

This jurisdictional issue is raised for the first time in this Court. In the Court below appellants affirmatively urged that the Stelma counterclaims were compulsory. Nevertheless, it is well settled that lack of federal jurisdiction may be raised for the first time on appeal, even by a party who originally asserted that jurisdiction existed or by the court sua sponte. * * *

727

It is apparent from the record that there is no independent basis of federal jurisdiction over the Stelma counterclaims. Both D’Agostino and Heyward are New York corporations with offices in New York. There is thus no diversity jurisdiction. Clearly there is no jurisdiction under the Miller Act over these counterclaims since the Stelma contract did not involve public work for the federal government.

The question is whether the Stelma counterclaims are compulsory or are permissive. Under the rule in this circuit, if they are permissive there is no Federal jurisdiction over them unless they rest on independent jurisdictional grounds. * * * On the other hand, if they are compulsory counterclaims, they are ancillary to the claim asserted in the complaint and no independent basis of Federal jurisdiction is required * * *.

* * * In United Artists Corp. v. Masterpiece Productions, Inc., 221 F.2d 213 (2d Cir. 1955) * * *, Chief Judge Clark said:

In practice this criterion has been broadly interpreted to require not an absolute identity of factual backgrounds for the two claims, but only a logical relationship between them. Lesnik v. Public Industrials Corp., 2 Cir., 144 F.2d 968, 975, citing and quoting, inter alia, Moore v. New York Cotton Exchange, 270 U.S. 593, 610, 46 S.Ct. 367, 371, 70 L.Ed. 750, thus: “ ‘Transaction’ is a word of flexible meaning. It may comprehend a series of many occurrences, depending not so much upon the immediateness of their connection as upon their logical relationship.”

* * *

In the case at bar the counterclaims were compulsory within the meaning of Rule 13(a). There was such a close and logical relationship between the claims on the Navy and Stelma jobs that the Stelma counterclaims arose out of the same “transaction or occurrence” as those terms are now broadly defined. Both subcontracts were entered into by the same parties for the same type of work and carried on during substantially the same period. Heyward had the right to terminate both subcontracts in the event of a breach by D’Agostino of either. Heyward also had the right to withhold monies due on one to apply against any damages suffered on the other. Progress payments made by Heyward were not allocated as between jobs and were made on a lump sum basis for both as though for a single account.

A single insurance policy covered both jobs. The letters of Heyward to D’Agostino of October 8 and 19, 1965 threatening termination and terminating both jobs, allegedly because of the cancellation by D’Agostino of this joint insurance coverage and failure to properly man both projects, treated both jobs together. These letters formed the basis of one of Heyward’s major claims at the trial.

728

The controversy between the parties which gave rise to this litigation was with respect to both jobs and arose from occurrences affecting both. Indeed, it would seem to have been impossible for Heyward to have fully litigated the claims against it on the Navy job without including the Stelma job, because the payments it made to D’Agostino could not be allocated between the two jobs.

As the appellants themselves point out in their brief, the “Stelma and Navy claims were so interwoven at the trial that they are now absolutely incapable of separation.” The proof as to payments and alleged defaults in payments was made without any differentiation between the two claims and neither of the parties was able to offer any evidence of apportionment. Finally, the evidence as to the breaches of contract claimed by the respective parties related in the main to both contracts rather than to one or the other.

The jurisdictional question so belatedly raised by the appellants must be viewed in light of the record as a whole. So viewed, it is plain that the Stelma counterclaims bare [sic] a logical and immediate relationship to the claims on the Navy job. Thus they arose out of the “transaction or occurrence which is the subject matter” of the suit instituted by D’Agostino on the Navy job and are compulsory counterclaims under Rule 13(a). The Stelma counterclaims were thus ancillary to the claims asserted in the complaint over which the Federal Court had acquired jurisdiction under the Miller Act, and there is jurisdiction over them. * * * To require that the closely related Navy and Stelma claims must be litigated separately would result in fragmentation of litigation and multiplicity of suits contrary to one of the major purposes of Rule 13(a). * * *

The judgment below is affirmed.

FRIENDLY, CIRCUIT JUDGE (concurring).

I cannot agree that, as maintained in Part I of the majority opinion, the counterclaim relating to the Stelma job was compulsory * * *. Of course, it is tempting to stretch a point when a jurisdictional objection is so belatedly raised by the very party who clamored for the exercise of jurisdiction until the decision went against it. But we must consider the question as if Heyward had not pleaded the Stelma counterclaim and proceeded to sue D’Agostino in some other court for failure to perform that subcontract, and D’Agostino then claimed that Heyward’s failure to bring the Stelma transaction into this Miller Act suit barred the later action. Despite the desirability of requiring that all claims which in fact arise “out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject of the opposing party’s claim” be litigated in a single action, courts must be wary of extending these words in a way that could cause unexpectedly harsh results.

729

Even on a liberal notion of “logical relation,” * * * I am unable to perceive how Heyward’s claim for breach of the Stelma subcontract arose “out of the transaction or occurrence” to wit, the Navy subcontract, that was the subject matter of D’Agostino’s Miller Act claim. Whatever historical interest there may be in the circumstances that the two subcontracts were entered into between the same parties for the same type of work and were carried on during substantially the same period, these facts seem to me to be lacking in legal significance. So likewise do D’Agostino’s having furnished a single insurance policy to cover both jobs and Heyward’s having cancelled the subcontracts in one letter rather than two. The boiler-plate in each subcontract, whereby “if one or more other contracts, now or hereafter, exist between the parties,” a breach of any such contract by D’Agostino might, at Heyward’s option be considered a breach of the contract at issue and Heyward might terminate any or all contracts so breached and withhold moneys due on any contract and apply these to damages on any other, might meet the test if Heyward had availed itself of these rights, but it did not.

All that is left is that, as the trial proceeded, it turned out that some of Heyward’s payments were not earmarked as between the two subcontracts. However, the determination whether a counterclaim is compulsory must be made at the pleading stage. The complaint was specific on how much Heyward owed on the Navy subcontract, and the counterclaims were equally so on how much D’Agostino owed for failure to complete this and how much it owed for failure to complete the Stelma subcontract. To say that the failure to earmark some payments made it impossible to try the claims separately ignores the law on application of payments. If Heyward did not specify the application of its payments, as it could, and D’Agostino had not made an application of them, as it could in default of specification by Heyward, the court would do this. * * *

* * *

Against all this appellee relied heavily on Southern Construction Co. v. Pickard, 371 U.S. 57, 83 S.Ct. 108, 9 L.Ed.2d 31 (1962). Since the counterclaim there at issue was held not compulsory, the decision can scarcely be authority that a claim like Heyward’s on the Stelma subcontract was. I think it not only is not such authority but points just the other way. * * *

Nevertheless I think the court below had jurisdiction of the Stelma counterclaim. I would now reject the conventional learning * * * that the permissive counterclaim “needs independent jurisdictional grounds to support it, with one exception,” to wit, set-off * * *. The Supreme Court left this question open in Moore v. New York Cotton Exchange, 270 U.S. 593, 609, 46 S.Ct. 367, 70 L.Ed. 750 (1926). * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Federal Rule 13(a) goes beyond the common law and code practice by requiring a party to assert certain counterclaims. Is this rule unduly harsh? See Wright, Estoppel by Rule: The Compulsory Counterclaim Under Modern Pleading, 38 Minn.L.Rev. 423, 465 (1954), arguing that the rule is “an important part of the movement to end a multiplicity of litigation.” On the other hand, Professor Millar has argued that a rule of compulsory counterclaim may be justified only “when the counterclaim operates by way of defense to the principal claim.” Millar, Civil Procedure of the Trial Court in Historical Perspective 138 (1952).

2.The critical question in applying Rule 13(a) is: What constitutes a transaction or occurrence? The classic test is found in MOORE v. NEW YORK COTTON EXCHANGE, cited in Judge Friendly’s concurring opinion in the principal case. In Moore, plaintiff sought to compel defendant to install a price quotation ticker in plaintiff’s place of business. Defendant counterclaimed for damages, alleging that although plaintiff had been denied permission to use quotations from defendant’s exchange, plaintiff “was purloining them and giving them out.” In the course of holding defendant’s counterclaim compulsory under former Equity Rule 30, the Court said:

* * * “Transaction” is a word of flexible meaning. It may comprehend a series of many occurrences, depending not so much upon the immediateness of their connection as upon their logical relationship. The refusal to furnish the quotations is one of the links in the chain which constitutes the transaction upon which appellant here bases its cause of action. It is an important part of the transaction constituting the subject-matter of the counterclaim. It is the one circumstance without which neither party would have found it necessary to seek relief. Essential facts alleged by appellant enter into and constitute in part the cause of action set forth in the counterclaim. That they are not precisely identical, or that the counterclaim embraces additional allegations, as, for example, that appellant is unlawfully getting the quotations, does not matter. To hold otherwise would be to rob this branch of the rule of all serviceable meaning, since the facts relied upon by the plaintiff rarely, if ever, are, in all particulars, the same as those constituting the defendant’s counterclaim. * * *

Id. at 610, 46 S.Ct. at 371, 70 L.Ed. at 757. How similar is this test to the Gibbs approach for determining whether pendent claim jurisdiction may be asserted, p. 353, supra?

3.Judicial decisions suggest four inter-related but different tests for determining whether a claim arises out of the same “transaction or occurrence”:

(a)Are the issues of fact and law raised by the claim and counterclaim largely the same?

(b)Would res judicata bar a subsequent suit on defendant’s claim absent the compulsory counterclaim rule?

(c)Will substantially the same evidence support or refute plaintiff’s claim as well as defendant’s counterclaim?

(d)Is there any logical relation between the claim and the counterclaim?

See Kane, Original Sin and the Transaction in Federal Civil Procedure, 76 Tex.L.Rev. 1723 (1998). How do these approaches differ from the Moore test? What are the strengths and weaknesses of each of these tests?

4.Before the enactment of 28 U.S.C. § 1367, a compulsory counterclaim fell within the ancillary jurisdiction of the federal court and so did not require an independent basis of subject-matter jurisdiction; by contrast a permissive counterclaim did require an independent basis of jurisdiction. In GREAT LAKES RUBBER CORP. v. HERBERT COOPER CO., 286 F.2d 631, 633–34 (3d Cir. 1961), the appellate court explained that the test for whether ancillary jurisdiction exists and whether a counterclaim is compulsory were designed to abolish the same evil:

* * * [T]he issue of the existence of ancillary jurisdiction and the issue as to whether a counterclaim is compulsory are to be answered by the same test. It is not a coincidence that the same considerations that determine whether a counterclaim is compulsory decide also whether the court has ancillary jurisdiction to adjudicate it. The tests are the same because Rule 13(a) and the doctrine of ancillary jurisdiction are designed to abolish the same evil, viz., piecemeal litigation in the federal courts.

We have indicated that a counterclaim is compulsory if it bears a “logical relationship” to an opposing party’s claim. * * * The phrase “logical relationship” is given meaning by the purpose of the rule which it was designed to implement. Thus, a counterclaim is logically related to the opposing party’s claim where separate trials on each of their respective claims would involve a substantial duplication of effort and time by the parties and the courts. Where multiple claims involve many of the same factual issues, or the same factual and legal issues, or where they are offshoots of the same basic controversy between the parties, fairness and considerations of convenience and of economy require that the counterclaimant be permitted to maintain his cause of action. Indeed the doctrine of res judicata compels the counterclaimant to assert his claim in the same suit for it would be barred if asserted separately, subsequently.

With the enactment of 28 U.S.C. § 1367, some circuits have held that supplemental jurisdiction may be exercised over any counterclaim, whether permissive or compulsory, that logically is “so related” to the claim over which original jurisdiction exists as to form one case or controversy. See p. 364, Note 2, supra.

732

5.Does the value of a compulsory counterclaim count in determining the amount-in-controversy requirement for diversity jurisdiction? In Spectacor Management Group v. Brown, 131 F.3d 120, 121 (3d Cir. 1997), cert. denied, 523 U.S. 1120, 118 S.Ct. 1799, 140 L Ed.2d 939 (1998), defendant elected not to file a motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, but instead asserted a compulsory counterclaim in response to the complaint. The Third Circuit held that the amount of that counterclaim should be considered in determining whether the amount-in-controversy threshold had been met. The Supreme Court has not yet addressed this question. Should the joinder of a compulsory counterclaim alleging the amount in controversy for federal diversity jurisdiction make removable an otherwise insufficient state action? The majority of courts have held to the contrary. See Central Associated Carriers v. Nickelberry, 995 F.Supp. 1031 (W.D. Mo. 1998).

The Consequences of Failing to Plead a Counterclaim

1. Does Federal Rule 13(a) address the effect of failing to plead a compulsory counterclaim? It seems clear that an unasserted compulsory counterclaim cannot be raised in a subsequent suit in a federal court, see, e.g., Twin Disc, Inc. v. Lowell, 69 F.R.D. 64 (E.D.Wis. 1975), although courts differ on whether this conclusion follows from principles of preclusion, waiver, or estoppel. See Scott, Collateral Estoppel by Judgment, 56 Harv.L.Rev. 1 (1942) (preclusion); Wright, Estoppel by Rule: The Compulsory Counterclaim Under Modern Pleading, 38 Minn.L.Rev. 423 (1954) (estoppel). Should a defendant who defaults in a federal action and fails to file an answer be barred from later filing what would have been the compulsory counterclaim as a separate federal action? See Peterson, The Misguided Law of Compulsory Counterclaims in Default Cases, 50 Ariz.L.Rev. 1107 (2008).

Does the failure to bring the claim in federal court prevent defendant from raising it in a subsequent state court action? What if defendant brings suit on the unasserted claim in a state court before the federal action is terminated? Should the state court hearing the alleged counterclaim grant a motion to dismiss based on the assertion that Federal Rule 13(a) bars the state action? Should the federal court hearing plaintiff’s suit restrain further proceedings in the state court? The answer to these questions is not clear from the language of Rule 13 and implicates the federal court’s power to enjoin state court proceedings, see 28 U.S.C. § 2283.

2.Under what circumstances should a defendant be permitted to assert a compulsory counterclaim after the applicable statute of limitations has run? Formerly Rule 13(f) allowed a pleader to obtain leave of the court to assert a counterclaim that was omitted “through oversight, inadvertence, or excusable neglect or if justice so requires.” In 2009, subsection (f) was abrogated, with the aim of making clear that the decision to allow an omitted counterclaim after the statute of limitations has lapsed is governed exclusively by Rule 15 and, like other pleading amendments, may benefit from relation back. See p. 694, supra.

733

3.Several exceptions to the compulsory counterclaim rule are set out in the text of Rule 13(a) itself. Consider their relevance to the following situations:

(a)In UNION PAVING CO. v. DOWNER CORP., 276 F.2d 468, 470 (9th Cir. 1960), the court discussed the passage in Rule 13(a) providing that waiver will not result from the failure to assert a compulsory counterclaim that already is the subject of litigation pending in another court:

 The purpose of this exception is seemingly to prevent one party from compelling another to try his cause of action in a court not of the latter’s choosing when the same cause of action is already the subject of pending litigation in another forum, one which was probably chosen by the owner of the cause of action concerned.  It does not preclude him from electing instead to counterclaim his cause of action ***.

What if defendant has failed to plead a permissive counterclaim? By definition, a permissive counterclaim is not compulsory. However, would it be fair to permit a subsequent pleading of even a permissive counterclaim if its effect is to nullify a judgment that plaintiff won in the initial lawsuit? See Clermont, Common-Law Compulsory Counterclaim Rule: Creating Effective and Elegant Res Judicata Doctrine, 79 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1745 (2004).

(b)If defendant has a claim that arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as plaintiff’s claim but it can be brought only against plaintiff and a third person who is required within the meaning of Rule 19 and over whom defendant cannot obtain jurisdiction, is assertion of the claim mandatory? See Rule 13(a)(1)(B).

(c)If, five days after defendant has served her answer, defendant is assigned a claim that arises out of the same transaction or occurrence as plaintiff’s claim against defendant, must defendant amend the answer to allege a counterclaim? See Rule 13(e).

4. In SOUTHERN CONSTRUCTION CO. v. PICKARD, discussed in Judge Friendly’s concurring opinion in the principal case, the Southern Construction Company was the prime contractor on contracts with the United States for the rehabilitation of certain barracks at Fort Campbell, Tennessee, and Fort Benning, Georgia. The plumbing and heating subcontractor on both projects was the respondent Samuel J. Pickard, doing business as Pickard Engineering Company. Pickard’s primary supplier on both projects was the Atlas Supply Company.

Pickard filed suit against Southern in district courts in both Georgia and Tennessee under the Miller Act for amounts due on the contracts. Defendant elected to assert its counterclaim for the amount paid in settlement to Atlas in the Tennessee suit, the second of the two suits commenced. Pickard answered that the counterclaim was barred for failure to raise it in the first suit as a compulsory counterclaim.

734

The Supreme Court accepted the district court’s ruling that the $35,000 settlement had not been allocated as between the Tennessee and Georgia projects and that it therefore could have been asserted in either action. It stated, however, that Rule 13(a) does not operate to prohibit its use in the later Tennessee action. The Court found the policy of preventing multiplicity of actions and achieving resolution in a single lawsuit of all disputes arising out of common matters to be inapplicable in these circumstances:

* * * The Rule was particularly directed against one who failed to assert a counterclaim in one action and then instituted a second action in which that counterclaim became the basis of the complaint. * * *

It is readily apparent that this policy has no application here. In this instance, the plaintiff-respondent, who originally sought to combine all his claims in a single suit, correctly concluded that he was required by statute to split those claims and to bring two separate actions in two different districts. The fragmentation of these claims, therefore, was compelled by federal law, and the primary defendant in both actions was thus for the first time confronted with the choice of which of the two pending suits should be resorted to for the assertion of a counterclaim common to both. Under these circumstances, we hold that Rule 13(a) did not compel this counterclaim to be made in whichever of the two suits the first responsive pleading was filed. Its assertion in the later suit, to which Southern, not without reason, considered it more appurtenant * * * by no means involved the circuity of action that Rule 13(a) was aimed at preventing. * * *

Id. at 60–61, 83 S.Ct. at 110, 9 L.Ed.2d at 34–35. Should the Pickard exception to Rule 13(a) be limited to the situation in which the governing substantive law requires that related claims be pled as separate actions in separate districts?

5.If defendant’s answer contains a counterclaim, must plaintiff assert a compulsory counterclaim to defendant’s counterclaim? Does it matter whether defendant’s counterclaim is compulsory or permissive? Is a counterclaim to a counterclaim likely to be so confusing that it will prevent the orderly disposition of the case? Would it make any difference if plaintiff amended the complaint to include the claim rather than asserting it as a counterclaim? See Millar, Counterclaim Against Counterclaim, 48 Nw.U.L.Rev. 671, 690 (1954).

2.CROSSCLAIMS

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 13(g) and (h) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

LASA PER L’INDUSTRIA DEL MARMO SOCIETA PER AZIONI V. ALEXANDER

United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 1969.
414 F.2d 143.

PHILLIPS, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

[The controversy arose out of the construction of the Memphis, Tennessee, City Hall. Southern Builders, a Tennessee corporation, was retained by the City as the principal contractor. Southern Builders’ performance was secured by a bond, with Continental Casualty as surety. Southern Builders subcontracted with Alexander Marble and Tile Co., a partnership comprised of Tennessee residents, and Marble International, Inc., a Texas corporation, to supply and install some marble in the new City Hall. Alexander then contracted with LASA, an Italian corporation, to supply it with marble.

LASA alleged that it had fully performed its contract with Alexander and that Alexander owed it $127,240.80 out of the $468,641.26 contract price. It sued Alexander, Marble International, Southern Builders, Continental Casualty, and the City for the balance due.

Alexander filed an answer and counterclaim in which it alleged that LASA had breached the contract by not shipping the marble on time, by shipping marble of the wrong type, by shipping damaged marble, and by failing to ship all the marble it was obligated to ship. Alexander further alleged that the contract price was only $265,050.00. It sought restitution of the amount it overpaid LASA plus damages resulting from LASA’s breach of contract.

Southern Builders filed an answer and counterclaim. In its counterclaim, Southern Builders alleged that LASA failed to ship marble as agreed to Alexander, and claimed damages resulting from that breach by LASA.

Alexander filed a crossclaim against Southern Builders, Continental Casualty, and the City for money alleged to be due on its contract with Southern Builders. Southern Builders and Continental Casualty filed answers and Southern Builders filed a crossclaim against Alexander for breach of contract.

Alexander filed third-party complaints against A.L. Aydelott and Associates, Inc. and against Aydelott individually, alleging that they, as architects on the project, negligently supervised the project, wrongfully required Alexander to install marble in inclement weather, wrongfully directed Southern Builders to terminate its contract with Alexander, willfully refused to approve Alexander’s estimates for work done, and wrongfully and maliciously injured Alexander’s business reputation. Alexander sought unliquidated actual and punitive damages as well as treble damages, under a Tennessee statute, for inducing Southern Builders to breach the subcontract.

Alexander also sued Southern Builders for actual and punitive damages resulting from the wrongful termination of its contract and for injury to the business reputation of Alexander.]

* * * The confusion in pleadings that can arise out of cross-claims, counterclaims and a third-party complaint, all involving the same construction project, is demonstrated by the present appeal.

* * *

Among the pleadings were a cross-claim filed by the defendant subcontractor, Alexander, against the prime contractor, its surety and the City of Memphis; a counterclaim filed by the prime contractor against Alexander; and a third-party complaint filed by Alexander against the architect. The third-party complaint was treated by the District Court as a cross-claim against the architect as was the counterclaim of the prime contractor against Alexander.

Construing Rules 13(g) and 13(h) * * *, the District Court dismissed the two cross-claims and the third-party complaint, holding that they do not arise out of the same transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the original action or of a counterclaim therein.

We reverse.

* * *

Under the Federal Rules * * * the rights of all parties generally should be adjudicated in one action. Rules 13 and 14 are remedial and are construed liberally. Both Rules 13 and 14 are “intended to avoid circuity of action and to dispose of the entire subject matter arising from one set of facts in one action, thus administering complete and evenhanded justice expeditiously and economically.” Blair v. Cleveland Twist Drill Co., 197 F.2d 842, 845 (7th Cir.). The aim of these rules “is facilitation not frustration of decisions on the merits.” Frommeyer v. L. & R. Construction Co., 139 F.Supp. 579, 585 (D.N.J.).

* * *

The District Court held that no part of Alexander’s cross-claim against the prime contractor, his third-party complaint against the architect or of the prime contractor’s cross-claim against Alexander for breach of contract arose out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the original action or the two counterclaims. With deference to the well-written opinion of the District Judge, we disagree.

* * *

The words “transaction or occurrence” are given a broad and liberal interpretation in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits. * * *

Our reading of the pleadings in this case convinces us that there is a “logical relationship” between the cross-claims (including the third party complaint against the architect) and the “transaction or occurrence” that is the subject matter of the complaint and the two pending counterclaims. Although different subcontracts are involved, along with the prime contract and specifications, all relate to the same project and to problems arising out of the marble used in the erection of the Memphis City Hall. The recurring question presented by the various pleadings is directed to the principal issue of who is responsible for the marble problems which arose on this job. Blame is sought to be placed upon plaintiff as furnisher of the marble, upon Alexander as subcontractor, upon the prime contractor and upon the architect. Many of the same or closely related factual and legal issues necessarily will be presented under the complaint, counterclaims and cross-claims in the resolution of these issues. It seems apparent that some of the same evidence will be required in the hearing on the cross-claims and in the hearing or hearings with respect to the complaint and the two pending counterclaims.

We understand it to be the purpose of Rule 13 and the related rules that all such matters may be tried and determined in one action and to make it possible for the parties to avoid multiplicity of litigation. The intent of the rules is that all issues be resolved in one action, with all parties before one court, complex though the action may be.

In support of the decision of the District Court it is argued that, since a jury trial has been demanded, the complications and confusions of the cross-claims are such that it would be impossible to try the numerous issues before the jury in an orderly manner. The short answer to this contention is that the District Judge is authorized by Rule 42(b) to order separate trials on any cross-claim, counterclaim, other claim or issues. If on the trial of this case the District Court concludes that separate trials on one or more of the counterclaims, cross-claims or issues would be conducive to expedition and economy, Rule 42(b) provides a practical solution to this problem.

Reversed and remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

McALLISTER, SENIOR CIRCUIT JUDGE, dissenting.

* * *

The questions of fact or law involved in the original suit filed by LASA, and the counterclaim for overpayment filed by Alexander, are totally different from Alexander’s claim against Southern Builders, claiming damages on the ground that Southern Builders wrongfully prevented and obstructed Alexander from performing its duties; wrongfully forced Alexander off the job; wrongfully brought in an outside subcontractor to complete the job at a highly inflated price, all of which was wrongfully and illegally charged to the account of Alexander—as well as Alexander’s allegation in its same cross-claim against Southern Builders charging that Southern Builders and Aydelott entered upon a course of action wrongfully injuring the business reputation of Alexander for which it claimed $250,000 in punitive damages.

Alexander’s cross-claim against Aydelott for treble damages in the amount of $750,000 for wrongfully and maliciously damaging Alexander’s business reputation by abuse, harassment and public blame, and wrongfully and illegally inducing and procuring by inducement, persuasion or insistence, the breach and violation of Alexander’s contract with Southern Builders, was an action in tort.

* * *

* * * Alexander’s cross-claim against Aydelott does not arise out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the original action—it does not arise out of the transaction or occurrence upon which LASA’s suit is based. Nor does it arise out of “a counter-claim therein”—that is, out of a counterclaim in LASA’s suit.

* * *

* * * [W]e are of the opinion that the cross-claims are not related to the original claim and the counterclaims, and that there is no identity of the many factual issues involved in the original claim and counterclaims, and in the cross-claims.

The proofs in LASA’s suit and in Alexander’s and Southern Builders’ counterclaims against LASA would be entirely different from the proofs in Alexander’s cross-claim against Southern Builders and its cross-claim against Aydelott.

* * *

The only claims in this case that arise out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the original action for balance due on a contract are the counterclaims filed against LASA by Alexander and Southern Builders, claiming breach of that contract—not Alexander’s two cross-claims against Southern Builders and Aydelott for their claimed deliberately malicious, tortious, and damaging conduct, for which Alexander claimed damages of several hundred thousand dollars.

In accordance with the foregoing, in my opinion, the judgments of the District Court should be affirmed in accordance with the opinion of Chief Judge Bailey Brown.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Is the reasoning of the majority or dissent more persuasive? Should the fact that different subcontracts were involved, which arguably meant that different transactions were before the court, be determinative? Other than by dismissal, how could the court deal with the complexity of the litigation or avoid confusion?
2. Generally, a crossclaim is permissive so that the failure to raise it does not bar suit in a subsequent action. Why should this be so? Doesn't this lead to a multiplicity of suits? Should the rule be different if the crossclaim is transactionally related to plaintiff's original claim? Isn't judicial economy fostered by hearing all transactionally related claims in one suit? Or, is it unfair to force defendants to file crossclaims in a forum not of their own choosing? How would the concept of a compulsory crossclaim have changed the reasoning of both the majority and the dissent in LASA?
3. Do the Federal Rules define "coparty" for purposes of a crossclaim? In EARLE M. JORGENSEN CO. v. T.I. UNITED STATES, LTD., 133 F.R.D. 472 (E.D. Pa. 1991), plaintiff filed suit to recover cleanup costs and other damages arising from environmental contamination of real property. T.I. United States, one of seven defendants, impleaded a third-party defendant, Tosti. Another one of the original defendants, Reed, then crossclaimed against Tosti for indemnity and contribution. Tosti moved to dismiss, arguing that he as a third-party defendant and Reed as an original defendant were not "coparties." The court found that Reed and Tosti were coparties, not opposing parties, defining "opposing parties" as "parties that formally oppose each other on a pleaded claim, such as plaintiffs and original defendants, or third-party plaintiffs and the third-party defendants they have joined," and on this ground held that the original defendant could crossclaim against Tosti. Id. at 475. Whether an original defendant and a third-party defendant are coparties for purposes of Rule 13 remains unsettled, but Jorgenson's approach comports with the structure of the Federal Rules.
4. Can a plaintiff crossclaim against a co-plaintiff? In DANNER v. ANSKIS, 256 F.2d 123 (3d Cir. 1958), the driver and passenger of one car sued the driver of a second car for damages arising out of a two-car collision. The passenger-plaintiff also attempted to crossclaim for her injuries against the driver-plaintiff. The Third Circuit upheld dismissal of the crossclaim, on the view that "Rule 13(g) does not authorize a plaintiff to state as a crossclaim against a co-plaintiff a claim arising out of the transaction or occurrence which also is the subject matter of their common complaint against the defendant." The court added that a contrary reading of the rule "could have the effect of extending the jurisdiction of the district court to controversies not within the federal judicial power." Id. at 124. Is the court's reasoning consistent with the language of Rule 13(g)? If the concern is that plaintiffs are engaged in jurisdictional collusion, couldn't the crossclaim be dismissed under 28 U.S.C. § 1359? How does supplemental jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367 affect the analysis?
5. When does Rule 13(h) authorize joinder of a party? Can the rule be used to assert a crossclaim against a person who is not already a party to the original action? Can a person who already is a party to the action be made an additional party under Rule 13(h)? Should the rule be read liberally as to encourage judicial economy? In LASA, Alexander's claim against the architect, Aydelott, originally was pleaded as a Rule 14 claim. The district court and the Sixth Circuit treated it as if it were a motion to bring in an additional cross-defendant under Rule 13(h); the courts thus viewed Aydelott as a codefendant on the crossclaims against Southern Builders and the others. Is there a problem with conflating party-joinder under Rule 13(h) with joinder under Rule 14? May a federal court exercise supplemental jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367 over parties joined under Rule 13(h) to a compulsory counterclaim?

D. CLAIMS INVOLVING MULTIPLE PARTIES

1.PERMISSIVE JOINDER OF PARTIES

a.Historical Limitations on Permissive Joinder of Parties

At common law, the forms of action—not convenience or economy—controlled whether parties could be joined in a lawsuit. Plaintiffs asserting joint rights were compelled to join their claims in a single action, but a notion of permissive joinder of claims that were not joint did not exist. The rules for joinder of defendants were somewhat more liberal: joint tortfeasors and defendants whose contract obligations were both joint and several could be joined at plaintiff’s option. The equity courts adopted a more flexible approach to the permissive joinder of parties by allowing all persons having an interest in the subject matter of the action or in the relief demanded to join in a single proceeding. The early state codes adopted the equity rule as a general provision, but many state courts read it as imposing a two-part conjunctive test requiring an interest in both the subject matter and the relief requested. See Bone, Mapping the Boundaries of the Dispute: Conceptions of Ideal Lawsuit Structure from the Field Code to the Federal Rules, 89 Colum.L.Rev. 1 (1989). Code provisions relating to the joinder of causes of action, which typically required all parties to be interested in each of the causes, further limited joinder of defendants. For a history of the development of American joinder rules, see Blume, Free Joinder of Parties, Claims, and Counterclaims, 2 F.R.D. 250 (1943); Legislation: Recent Trends in Joinder of Parties, Causes, and Counterclaims, 37 Colum.L.Rev. 462 (1937). For an early comparative view, see Millar, The Joinder of Actions in Continental Civil Procedure, 28 Ill.L.Rev. 26, 177 (1933).

741

RYDER V. JEFFERSON HOTEL CO.
Supreme Court of South Carolina, 1922.
121 S.C. 72, 113 S.E. 474.

MARION, JUSTICE. The complaint in this action * * * alleges in substance that the plaintiff Charles A. Ryder and the plaintiff Edith C. Ryder are husband and wife; that [they] * * * became guests of the defendant Jefferson Hotel Company * * *; that thereafter, during the night * * *, the defendant S.J. Bickley, acting as the servant and agent of the defendant Jefferson Hotel Company, roused the plaintiffs by rapping upon their room door, and in a rude and angry manner insulted the plaintiff Edith C. Ryder; that as a result of the insults * * * the plaintiffs were compelled to give up the accommodations due them and leave the said hotel, and were forced at midnight and at great inconvenience and uncertainty to seek another lodging place; that by reason of such high-handed, malicious, and willful conduct, on the part of the said hotel and its servant and agent, the plaintiffs were greatly injured in their reputations, credit, and business, and that the plaintiff Charles A. Ryder has suffered great loss of custom and has been deprived of great gains and profits * * *; and that * * * the plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $10,000.

Defendants separately demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it appeared upon the face thereof that several causes of action had been improperly united therein, for the reason that the several causes of action united do not affect all the parties to the action. From an order overruling the demurrer, defendants appeal.

The sole question for determination is: Does the complaint contain two causes of action which may be joined in the same complaint? It is apparent, as appellants suggest, that the complaint alleges a cause of action by Charles A. Ryder against the defendants for a personal tort—that is, for a breach of duty growing out of the relationship existing between the parties, to wit, innkeeper and guest—and also a cause of action by Edith C. Ryder against the defendants for a tortious breach of duty growing out of the same relationship. It is also apparent that both of these alleged causes of action arose out of the same transaction, in the sense that the injury to each of the plaintiffs was caused by the same delict. But appellants contend that it is equally apparent from the allegations of the complaint that the rights invaded and the injuries sustained are necessarily several, and that plaintiffs cannot maintain a joint action and recover joint damages therefor. We think that contention must be sustained.

Section 218 of the Code of Procedure (1912), classifying the various causes of action which may be united in the same complaint, contains this proviso:

But the causes of action, so united, must all belong to one of these classes, and, except in actions for the foreclosure of mortgages, must affect all the parties to the action, and not require different places of trial, and must be separately stated.

742

The rule applicable is thus stated by Judge Pomeroy in his work on Code Remedies (4th Ed.) p. 215:

When a tort of a personal nature * * * is committed upon two or more, the right of action must, except in a very few special cases, be several. In order that a joint action may be possible, there must be some prior bond of legal union between the persons injured—such as partnership relation—of such a nature that the tort interferes with it, and by virtue of that very interference produces a wrong and consequent damage common to all. It is not every prior existing legal relation between the parties that will impress a joint character upon the injury and damage. Thus, if a husband and wife be libeled, or slandered, or beaten, although there is a close legal relation between the parties, it is not one which can be affected by such a wrong, and no joint cause of action will arise. * * *

That the rights infringed and the injuries suffered by the two plaintiffs in the case at bar are several, and not joint, would not seem open to question. To illustrate: If the two plaintiffs, husband and wife, occupying the same berth in a sleeping car, had both been physically injured in a wreck of the train, it would scarcely be contended that they could properly bring a joint action for the damages sustained by each on account of the carrier's delict. The complaint here does not state a cause of action for injuries to the wife alone * * *. Neither is the husband's alleged cause of action based upon loss of consortium and expenses incurred on behalf of the wife. The wife's cause of action as alleged does not "affect" the husband, and the husband's cause of action does not "affect" the wife, in the sense that the Code of Procedure (section 218) requires that the causes of action joined in the same complaint "must affect all parties to the action." Neither has a legal interest in the pecuniary recovery of the other, and in contemplation of law there can be no joint and common damage to both resulting from a wrong which gives rise to separate and distinct rights personal to each. * * *

At common law it seems that even the husband's cause of action for the loss of the wife's services and companionship and expenses incurred by him on account of injury to the wife could not be joined with the cause of action for injuries personal to the wife. * * * In the case at bar not only are the parties plaintiff different, and the potential elements of damage recoverable by the parties different, but neither party has the right to sue for the benefit of the other * * *.

The order of the circuit court is reversed.

GARY, CHIEF JUSTICE, and COTHMAN, JUSTICE, concurring.

743

FRASER, J. (dissenting). * * * The plaintiffs * * * were expelled from the hotel, under the allegation that they were not husband and wife. It was a denial of the joint relationship that caused the trouble.

It seems to me that the illustrations used are not appropriate to the case. When a husband and wife are injured in one railroad accident, the injuries are individual, and not joint. It seems to me that the case is somewhat like an injury to a copartnership. I do not think that it will be doubted that the copartnership can bring an action for injury to the copartnership, although the injury to the two copartners may not be the same. * * * In the joint action the other copartner may not be able to recover for the injury peculiar to himself; but the injury to the copartnership is a joint injury, and for this injury it may recover. Here the offense was against the husband and wife and affected their relation as husband and wife. This is manifestly a joint injury. * * *

For these reasons I dissent.

QUESTIONS

Does Ryder make ineffective the concept of permissive joinder by allowing joinder only when the parties are "united in interest"? If the parties are united in interest, should they be compelled to join in the action? In this connection consider the court's reliance on Pomeroy's statement that "although there is a close legal relation between the parties, it is not one which can be affected by such a wrong, and no joint cause of action will arise." (Emphasis added.) If the injury affected a relationship, should the parties be required to join in the action?

b. Permissive Joinder Under Rule 20

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 20, 21, and 42(a) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

MOSLEY v. GENERAL MOTORS CORP.

United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 1974.
497 F.2d 1330.

ROSS, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

Nathaniel Mosley and nine other persons joined in bringing this action individually and as class representatives alleging that their rights guaranteed under 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq. and 42 U.S.C. § 1981 were denied by General Motors and Local 25, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agriculture Implement Workers of America (Union) by reason of their color and race. * * *

In each of the first eight counts of the twelve-count complaint, eight of the ten plaintiffs alleged that General Motors, Chevrolet Division, had engaged in unlawful employment practices by: “discriminating against Negroes as regards promotions, terms and conditions of employment”; “retaliating against Negro employees who protested actions made unlawful by Title VII of the Act and by discharging some because they protested said unlawful acts”; “failing to hire Negro employees as a class on the basis of race”; “failing to hire females as a class on the basis of sex”; “discharging Negro employees on the basis of race”; and “discriminating against Negroes and females in the granting of relief time.” Each additionally charged that the defendant Union had engaged in unlawful employment practices “with respect to the granting of relief time to Negro and female employees” and “by failing to pursue 6a grievances.”^a The remaining two plaintiffs made similar allegations against General Motors, Fisher Body Division. All of the individual plaintiffs requested injunctive relief, back pay, attorneys fees and costs. Counts XI and XII of the complaint were class action counts against the two individual divisions of General Motors. They also sought declaratory and injunctive relief, back pay, attorneys fees and costs.

General Motors moved to strike portions of each count of the twelve-count complaint, * * * The district court ordered that “insofar as the first ten counts are concerned, those ten counts shall be severed into ten separate causes of action,” and each plaintiff was directed to bring a separate action based upon his complaint, duly and separately filed. The court also ordered that the class action would not be dismissed, but rather would be left open “to each of the plaintiffs herein, individually or collectively . . . to allege a separate cause of action on behalf of any class of persons which such plaintiff or plaintiffs may separately or individually represent.”

In reaching this conclusion on joinder, the district court followed the reasoning of Smith v. North American Rockwell Corp., 50 F.R.D. 515 (N.D.Okla.1970), which, in a somewhat analogous situation, found there was no right to relief arising out of the same transaction, occurrence or series of transactions or occurrences, and that there was no question of law or fact common to all plaintiffs sufficient to sustain joinder under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 20(a). Similarly, the district court here felt that the plaintiffs’ joint actions against General Motors and the Union presented a variety of issues having little relationship to one another; that they had only one common problem, i.e. the defendant; and that as pleaded the joint actions were completely unmanageable. * * *

745

* * * [Under Federal Rules 20(b) and 42(b)] the scope of the civil action is made a matter for the discretion of the district court, and a determination on the question of joinder of parties will be reversed on appeal only upon a showing of abuse of that discretion. * * * To determine whether the district court’s order was proper herein, we must look to the policy and law that have developed around the operation of Rule 20.

The purpose of the rule is to promote trial convenience and expedite the final determination of disputes, thereby preventing multiple lawsuits. * * * Single trials generally tend to lessen the delay, expense and inconvenience to all concerned. * * *

Permissive joinder is not, however, applicable in all cases. The rule imposes two specific requisites to the joinder of parties: (1) a right to relief must be asserted by, or against, each plaintiff or defendant relating to or arising out of the same transaction or occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences; and (2) some question of law or fact common to all the parties must arise in the action.

In ascertaining whether a particular factual situation constitutes a single transaction or occurrence for purposes of Rule 20, a case by case approach is generally pursued. * * * No hard and fast rules have been established under the rule. However, construction of the terms “transaction or occurrence” as used in the context of Rule 13(a) counterclaims offers some guide to the application of this test. * * * [A]ll “logically related” events entitling a person to institute a legal action against another generally are regarded as comprising a transaction or occurrence. * * *. The analogous interpretation of the terms as used in Rule 20 would permit all reasonably related claims for relief by or against different parties to be tried in a single proceeding. Absolute identity of all events is unnecessary.

This construction accords with the result reached in United States v. Mississippi, 380 U.S. 128 (1965), a suit brought by the United States against the State of Mississippi, the election commissioners, and six voting registrars of the State, charging them with engaging in acts and practices hampering and destroying the right of black citizens of Mississippi to vote. The district court concluded that the complaint improperly attempted to hold the six county registrars jointly liable for what amounted to nothing more than individual torts committed by them separately against separate applicants. In reversing, the Supreme Court said

But the complaint charged that the registrars had acted and were continuing to act as part of a state-wide system designed to enforce the registration laws in a way that would inevitably deprive colored people of the right to vote solely because of their color. On such an allegation the joinder of all the registrars as defendants in a single suit is authorized by Rule 20(a) * * *. These registrars were alleged to be carrying on activities which were part of a series of transactions or occurrences the validity of which depended to a large extent upon “question(s) of law or fact common to all of them.”

746

Id. at 142–143.

Here too, then, the plaintiffs have asserted a right to relief arising out of the same transactions or occurrences. Each of the ten plaintiffs alleged that he had been injured by the same general policy of discrimination on the part of General Motors and the Union. Since a “state-wide system designed to enforce the registration laws in a way that would inevitably deprive colored people of the right to vote” was determined to arise out of the same series of transactions or occurrences, we conclude that a company-wide policy purportedly designed to discriminate against blacks in employment similarly arises out of the same series of transactions or occurrences. Thus the plaintiffs meet the first requisite for joinder under Rule 20(a).

The second requisite necessary to sustain a permissive joinder under the rule is that a question of law or fact common to all the parties will arise in the action. The rule does not require that all questions of law and fact raised by the dispute be common. Yet, neither does it establish any qualitative or quantitative test of commonality. * * *

The right to relief here depends on the ability to demonstrate that each of the plaintiffs was wronged by racially discriminatory policies on the part of the defendants General Motors and the Union. The discriminatory character of the defendants’ conduct is thus basic to each plaintiff’s recovery. The fact that each plaintiff may have suffered different effects from the alleged discrimination is immaterial for the purposes of determining the common question of law or fact. Thus, we conclude that the second requisite for joinder under Rule 20(a) is also [met] by the complaint.

For the reasons set forth above, we conclude that the district court abused its discretion in severing the joined actions. The difficulties in ultimately adjudicating damages to the various plaintiffs are not so overwhelming as to require such severance. If appropriate, separate trials may be granted as to any particular issue after the determination of common questions.

The judgment of the district court disallowing joinder of the plaintiffs’ individual actions is reversed and remanded with directions to permit the plaintiffs to proceed jointly. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Mosley, although decided in 1974, remains a leading case and sets forth a liberal approach to the permissive joinder of parties under Federal Rule

747

20. How would Ryder, p. 741, supra, be decided under Rule 20? Is it significant that Rule 20(b) and Rule 42(b) authorize protective measures to avoid prejudice from plaintiff’s joinder decisions? In addition, Rule 21, which speaks to misjoinder, permits the judge to authorize severance “at any time, on just terms,” and courts have done so even when parties are properly joined.

2.What are the tactical factors that must be considered before attempting to join multiple defendants? See Friedenthal, Whom to Sue—Multiple Defendants, 5 Am. Jur. Trials 1 (1966). Why would plaintiffs in Mosley have wanted to litigate together?

3.New Jersey adopted, but then abandoned, a rule that required joinder “of all persons who have a material interest in the controversy.” Erichson, Of Horror Stories and Happy Endings: The Rise and Fall of Preclusion-Based Compulsory Party Joinder Under the New Jersey Entire Controversy Doctrine, 9 Seton Hall Const.L.J. 757 (1999). How did the quoted language of the New Jersey rule differ from that of Rule 20? What problems do you foresee with this approach? Any advantages?

2.MANDATORY JOINDER OF PERSONS

a.The Traditional Concept of “Indispensable” Parties

BANK OF CALIFORNIA NATIONAL ASS’N V. SUPERIOR COURT

Supreme Court of California, 1940.
16 Cal.2d 516, 106 P.2d 879.

GIBSON, CHIEF JUSTICE. * * *

Sara M. Boyd * * * died testate in June, 1937, leaving an estate valued at about $225,000. On July 8, 1937, * * * her will was admitted to probate, and petitioner, Bank of California, was appointed executor. The will left individual legacies and bequests amounting to $60,000 to a large number of legatees, * * * some residing in other states and in foreign countries. Petitioner, St. Luke’s Hospital, was named residuary legatee and devisee, and thereby received the bulk of the estate.

On October 14, 1937, Bertha M. Smedley, a niece and legatee, brought an action to enforce the provisions of an alleged contract by which decedent agreed to leave her entire estate to the plaintiff. The complaint named as parties defendant the executor and all of the beneficiaries under the will, and prayed for a decree adjudging that plaintiff is, by virtue of the agreement, the owner of the entire estate of the decedent after payment of debts and expenses. It was further prayed that plaintiff’s title to the property be quieted * * *.

Summons was served only upon petitioners, the executor and the residuary legatee. No other defendants were served, and none appeared.

748

* * * [At trial] petitioners made a motion * * * for an order to bring in the other defendants, and to have summons issued and served upon them. The motion was made on the ground that all of the other defendants were “necessary and indispensable parties” to the action, and that the court could not proceed without them. The motion was denied by respondent court. Petitioners then applied for a writ of prohibition to restrain the trial until these other parties should be brought in.

In support of their application, petitioners point out that the complaint challenges the right of every legatee and devisee to share in the estate, and prays for an award of the entire property to plaintiff. It is contended that a trial and judgment without the absent defendants would adversely affect the rights of such parties, would result in a multiplicity of suits, and would subject the petitioning executor to inconvenience, expense and the burden of future litigation.

* * * [T]he precise issue is * * * whether the absent defendants are not only proper parties but “indispensable parties” in the sense that service upon them or their appearance is essential to the jurisdiction of the court to proceed in the action. * * *

At common law, joinder of plaintiffs was compulsory where the parties under the substantive law, were possessed of joint rights. * * * Equity courts developed another theory of compulsory joinder, to carry out the policy of avoiding piecemeal litigation and multiplicity of suits. Those persons necessary to a complete settlement of the controversy were usually required to be joined, in order that the entire matter might be concluded by a single suit. Obviously, this theory of joinder covered many situations where the substantive rights were not joint, and accordingly joinder would not have been required in an action at law. * * * Generally speaking, the modern rule under the codes carries out the established equity doctrine. Thus, section 389 of the Code of Civil Procedure states: “The court may determine any controversy between parties before it, when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must then order them to be brought in * * *.” * * *

But the equity doctrine as developed by the courts is loose and ambiguous in its expression and uncertain in its application. Sometimes it is stated as a mandatory rule, and at other times as a matter of discretion, designed to reach an equitable result if it is practicable to do so. * * * Bearing in mind the fundamental purpose of the doctrine, we should, in dealing with “necessary” and “indispensable” parties, be careful to avoid converting a discretionary power or a rule of fairness in procedure into an arbitrary and burdensome requirement which may thwart rather than accomplish justice. These two terms have frequently been coupled together as if they have the same meaning; but there appears to be a sound distinction, both in theory and practice, between parties deemed “indispensable” and those considered merely “necessary”. * * * “While necessary parties are so interested in the controversy that they should normally be made parties in order to enable the court to do complete justice, yet if their interests are separable from the rest and particularly where their presence in the suit cannot be obtained, they are not indispensable parties. The latter are those without whom the court cannot proceed.” Clark[,] Code Pleading, p. 245 * * *. * * *

749

First, then, what parties are indispensable? There may be some persons whose interests, rights, or duties will inevitably be affected by any decree which can be rendered in the action. Typical are the situations where a number of persons have undetermined interests in the same property, or in a particular trust fund, and one of them seeks, in an action, to recover the whole, to fix his share, or to recover a portion claimed by him. The other persons with similar interests are indispensable parties. The reason is that a judgment in favor of one claimant for part of the property or fund would necessarily determine the amount or extent which remains available to the others. Hence, any judgment in the action would inevitably affect their rights. Thus, in an action by one creditor against assignees for the benefit of creditors, seeking an accounting and payment of his share of the assets, the other creditors were held indispensable * * *. * * * Where, also, the plaintiff seeks some other type of affirmative relief which, if granted, would injure or affect the interests of a third person not joined that third person is an indispensable party. Thus, in an action by a lessor against a sublessee to forfeit a parent lease because of acts of the sublessee, the sublessors (original lessees) were indispensable parties, since a decree of forfeiture would deprive them of their lease. * * *

All of these persons are, of course, “necessary” parties, but the decisions show that they come within a special classification of necessary parties, to which the term “indispensable” seems appropriate. An attempt to adjudicate their rights without joinder is futile. Many cases go so far as to say that the court would have no jurisdiction to proceed without them, and that its purported judgment would be void and subject to collateral attack. The objection being so fundamental, it need not be raised by the parties themselves; the court may, of its own motion, dismiss the proceedings, or refuse to proceed, until these indispensable parties are brought in. * * *

The other classification includes persons who are interested in the sense that they might possibly be affected by the decision, or whose interests in the subject matter or transaction are such that it cannot be finally and completely settled without them; but nevertheless their interests are so separable that a decree may be rendered between the parties before the court without affecting those others. These latter may perhaps be “necessary” parties to a complete settlement of the entire controversy or transaction, but are not “indispensable” to any valid judgment in the particular case. They should normally be joined, and the court, following the equity rule, will usually require them to be joined, in order to carry out the policy of complete determination and avoidance of multiplicity of suits. But, since the rule itself is one of equity, it is limited and qualified by considerations of fairness, convenience, and practicability. Where, for example, it is impossible to find these other persons or impracticable to bring them in, the action may proceed as to those parties who are present.

750

* * *

The action in these cases is against the distributee personally, and not against the estate; and it is independent of the will and the probate proceeding. Each distributee is individually held as a constructive trustee solely of the property which came to him, and none is interested in the granting or denial of similar relief as to any other. Where there are a number of legatees and devisees, they would all appear to be “necessary” parties in the sense that the main issue, the validity of the testamentary disposition of the property of decedent, affects their property interests, and the entire matter, the disposition of all of the decedent’s property, cannot be finally settled without a binding adjudication for or against every legatee or devisee. Hence, the court will usually order them served and brought in unless there is some good reason for not doing so. But the absent defendants in such a case are not indispensable parties. Unlike the situations discussed above, in which any judgment would necessarily affect the rights of the absent persons, the case here is one where plaintiff may litigate her claim against the appearing defendants alone and obtain a decree which binds them alone. The absent defendants, not being before the court, will not be bound by the judgment, whether favorable or unfavorable, and their property interests will not be affected.

* * *

Only brief mention need be made of the contention that the prosecution of the action against less than all of the distributees will cause inconvenience and multiplicity of suits to the injury of the executor. These are all matters within the discretion of the court to consider in connection with its policy to settle the entire controversy in one proceeding, if possible. * * *

We have refrained from discussing the question whether the lower court’s denial of the motion to bring in the absent defendants was, under the circumstances, an abuse of discretion. If they were readily available and could have been brought in without serious difficulty, it may well be that the motion should have been granted. On the other hand, if, as is asserted by respondents, many reside outside the state or the country, great difficulty might be encountered in any attempt to bring them in, and the trial might be indefinitely delayed, to the detriment of the present parties. The fact that the interests of the absent defendants are trivial as compared with that of the residuary legatee, which received over 71 percent of the estate, is perhaps some indication of the reason why plaintiff chose to go to trial against the latter alone. All these considerations, however, were for the trial court in the first instance, and its determination, though reviewable in the proper manner, cannot be attacked on an application for writ of prohibition.

751

The alternative writ, heretofore issued, is discharged, and the peremptory writ is denied.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Before the adoption of Federal Rule 19, the principle of mandatory joinder was a judicially created doctrine. SHIELDS v. BARROW, 58 U.S. (17 How.) 130, 15 L.Ed. 158 (1854), established that parties could be classified as necessary or indispensable depending on the nature of their substantive rights (“joint” or “severable”). The consequences of this classification were extremely important. If an absent party who was not subject to the jurisdiction of the court or whose joinder would destroy the pre-existing diversity of citizenship was labeled indispensable, the entire action had to be dismissed. On the other hand, if the absentee merely was necessary, the court might exercise its discretion in determining whether or not to continue without that person. Because a plaintiff might have been deprived of any remedy if a party was found to be indispensable, courts often strained to avoid that conclusion. As might be suspected, this method had a debilitating effect on the standard for classification. See Comment, The Litigant and the Absentee in Federal Multiparty Practice, 116 U.Pa.L.Rev. 531 (1968).

2. WARNER v. PACIFIC TEL. & TEL. CO., 121 Cal.App.2d 497, 263 P.2d 465 (2d Dist. 1953), involved the following three successive telephone book listings: (1) Warner, Caryl atty, 639 S Spring—TUKr 9171 Woodland Hills Office, 21042 Rios—DIamnd 85761; (2) Warner, Caryl Mrs. 1600 Westrly Ter—NORmndy 22011; and (3) Warner, Caryl Mrs. Warner Caryl atty 21042 Rios WdlnD Hills—DIamnd 85761. The “Mrs. Caryl Warner” in the second listing was the first wife of Caryl Warner; the “Mrs. Caryl Warner” in the third listing was Caryl Warner’s wife at the time of the lawsuit. After the telephone company refused to delete or change the second listing, the present Mrs. Warner brought suit against the company for damages on the ground that the existing listings injured her reputation in the community and caused her “emotional distress, humiliation, fear, vexation, annoyance, scorn and ridicule as to her marital status, rendering her sick, with recurrent asthma attacks, to her damage.” Plaintiff also asserted that she owned the title “Mrs. Caryl Warner,” that the name had acquired a secondary meaning by reason of the professional and social standing of Caryl Warner, that her prestige and dignity were being depreciated, that the telephone listings constituted an invasion of privacy because they depicted plaintiff as a party to a bigamous marriage, and that the telephone company knew or should have known that its maintenance of the listings would cause damage to plaintiff. The telephone company demurred to plaintiff’s third amended and supplemental complaint on the ground, inter alia, that plaintiff had failed to join an indispensable party—the first Mrs. Caryl Warner. In light of the Bank of California case, should the California Court of Appeals affirm or reverse the lower court’s grant of the demurrer? Why?

752

3. Are prejudice to defendant and the possibility of inconsistent adjudications only factors to be weighed as part of a balancing of competing interests or should the threat of multiple liability be elevated to a constitutional level? What would the constitutional problem be? Is the failure to join an indispensable party really a jurisdictional defect, as the Bank of California case suggests? See Hazard, Indispensable Party: The Historical Origin of a Procedural Phantom, 61 Colum.L.Rev. 1254, 1255–56 (1961).

b. Joinder of Required Parties Under Rule 19

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

PROVIDENT TRADESMENS BANK & TRUST CO. v. PATTERSON

Supreme Court of the United States, 1968.
390 U.S. 102, 88 S.Ct. 733, 19 L.Ed.2d 936.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

JUSTICE HARLAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This controversy, involving in its present posture the dismissal of a declaratory judgment action for nonjoinder of an “indispensable” party, began nearly 10 years ago with a traffic accident. An automobile owned by Edward Dutcher, who was not present when the accident occurred, was being driven by Donald Cionci, to whom Dutcher had given the keys. John Lynch and John Harris were passengers. The automobile crossed the median strip of the highway and collided with a truck being driven by Thomas Smith. Cionci, Lynch, and Smith were killed and Harris was severely injured.

Three tort actions were brought. Provident Tradesmens Bank, the administrator of the estate of passenger Lynch and petitioner here, sued the estate of the driver, Cionci, in a diversity action. Smith’s administratrix, and Harris in person, each brought a state-court action against the estate of Cionci, Dutcher, the owner, and the estate of Lynch. These Smith and Harris actions, for unknown reasons, have never gone to trial and are still pending. The Lynch action against Cionci’s estate was settled for $50,000, which the estate of Cionci, being penniless, has never paid.

753

Dutcher, the owner of the automobile and a defendant in the as yet untried tort actions, had an automobile liability insurance policy with Lumbermens Mutual Casualty Company, a respondent here. That policy had an upper limit of $100,000 for all claims arising out of a single accident. This fund was potentially subject to two different sorts of claims by the tort plaintiffs. First, Dutcher himself might be held vicariously liable as Cionci’s “principal”; the likelihood of such a judgment against Dutcher is a matter of considerable doubt and dispute. Second, the policy by its terms covered the direct liability of any person driving Dutcher’s car with Dutcher’s “permission.”

The insurance company had declined, after notice, to defend in the tort action brought by Lynch’s estate against the estate of Cionci, believing that Cionci had not had permission and hence was not covered by the policy. The facts allegedly were that Dutcher had entrusted his car to Cionci, but that Cionci had made a detour from the errand for which Dutcher allowed his car to be taken. The estate of Lynch, armed with its $50,000 liquidated claim against the estate of Cionci, brought the present diversity action for a declaration that Cionci’s use of the car had been “with permission” of Dutcher. The only named defendants were the company and the estate of Cionci. The other two tort plaintiffs were joined as plaintiffs. Dutcher, a resident of the State of Pennsylvania as were all the plaintiffs, was not joined either as plaintiff or defendant. The failure to join him was not adverted to at the trial level.

The major question of law contested at trial was a state-law question. * * * The District Court * * * directed verdicts in favor of the two estates. * * * The jury * * * found that Cionci had had permission, and hence awarded a verdict to Harris also.

Lumbermens appealed the judgment to the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, raising various state-law questions. * * * The Court of Appeals did not reach any of these issues. Instead, after reargument en banc, it decided, 5–2, to reverse on two alternative grounds neither of which had been raised in the District Court or by the appellant.

The first of these grounds was that Dutcher was an indispensable party. The court held that the “adverse interests” that had rendered Dutcher incompetent to testify under the Pennsylvania Dead Man Rule also required him to be made a party. The court did not consider whether the fact that a verdict had already been rendered, without objection to the nonjoinder of Dutcher, affected the matter. Nor did it follow the provision of Rule 19 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that findings of “indispensability” must be based on stated pragmatic considerations. It held, to the contrary, that the right of a person who “may be affected” by the judgment to be joined is a “substantive” right, unaffected by the federal rules; that a trial court “may not proceed” in the absence of such a person; and that since Dutcher could not be joined as a defendant without destroying diversity jurisdiction the action had to be dismissed.

754

* * * Concluding that the inflexible approach adopted by the Court of Appeals in this case exemplifies the kind of reasoning that the Rule was designed to avoid, we reverse.

I.

* * *

We may assume, at the outset, that Dutcher falls within the category of persons who, under [Rule 19] (a), should be “joined if feasible.” The action was for an adjudication of the validity of certain claims against a fund. Dutcher, faced with the possibility of judgments against him, had an interest in having the fund preserved to cover that potential liability. Hence there existed, when this case went to trial, at least the possibility that a judgment might impede Dutcher’s ability to protect his interest, or lead to later relitigation by him.

The optimum solution, an adjudication of the permission question that would be binding on all interested persons, was not “feasible,” however, for Dutcher could not be made a defendant without destroying diversity. Hence the problem was the one to which Rule 19(b) appears to address itself: in the absence of a person who “should be joined if feasible,” should the court dismiss the action or proceed without him? Since this problem emerged for the first time in the Court of Appeals, there were also two subsidiary questions. First, what was the effect, if any, of the failure of the defendants to raise the matter in the District Court? Second, what was the importance, if any, of the fact that a judgment, binding on the parties although not binding on Dutcher, had already been reached after extensive litigation? The three questions prove, on examination, to be interwoven.

We conclude, upon consideration of the record and applying the “equity and good conscience” test of Rule 19(b), that the Court of Appeals erred in not allowing the judgment to stand.

Rule 19(b) suggests four “interests” that must be examined in each case to determine whether, in equity and good conscience, the court should proceed without a party whose absence from the litigation is compelled. Each of these interests must, in this case, be viewed entirely from an appellate perspective since the matter of joinder was not considered in the trial court. First, the plaintiff has an interest in having a forum. Before the trial, the strength of this interest obviously depends upon whether a satisfactory alternative forum exists. On appeal, if the plaintiff has won, he has a strong additional interest in preserving his judgment. Second, the defendant may properly wish to avoid multiple litigation, or inconsistent relief, or sole responsibility for a liability he shares with another. After trial, however, if the defendant has failed to assert this interest, it is quite proper to consider it foreclosed.

755

Third, there is the interest of the outsider whom it would have been desirable to join. Of course, since the outsider is not before the court, he cannot be bound by the judgment rendered. This means, however, only that a judgment is not res judicata as to, or legally enforceable against, a nonparty. It obviously does not mean either (a) that a court may never issue a judgment that, in practice, affects a nonparty or (b) that (to the contrary) a court may always proceed without considering the potential effect on nonparties simply because they are not “bound” in the technical sense. Instead, as Rule 19(a) expresses it, the court must consider the extent to which the judgment may “as a practical matter impair or impede his ability to protect” his interest in the subject matter [this provision is now Rule 19(a)(1)(B)(i) and the language has been altered]. When a case has reached the appeal stage the matter is more complex. The judgment appealed from may not in fact affect the interest of any outsider even though there existed, before trial, a possibility that a judgment affecting his interest would be rendered. When necessary, however, a court of appeals should, on its own initiative, take steps to protect the absent party, who of course had no opportunity to plead and prove his interest below.

Fourth, there remains the interest of the courts and the public in complete, consistent, and efficient settlement of controversies. We read the Rule’s third criterion, whether the judgment issued in the absence of the nonjoined person will be “adequate,” to refer to this public stake in settling disputes by wholes, whenever possible, for clearly the plaintiff, who himself chose both the forum and the parties defendant, will not be heard to complain about the sufficiency of the relief obtainable against them. After trial, considerations of efficiency of course include the fact that the time and expense of a trial have already been spent.

Rule 19(b) also directs a district court to consider the possibility of shaping relief to accommodate these four interests. Commentators had argued that greater attention should be paid to this potential solution to a joinder stymie, and the Rule now makes it explicit that a court should consider modification of a judgment as an alternative to dismissal. Needless to say, a court of appeals may also properly require suitable modification as a condition of affirmance.

Had the Court of Appeals applied Rule 19’s criteria to the facts of the present case, it could hardly have reached the conclusion it did. We begin with the plaintiffs’ viewpoint. It is difficult to decide at this stage whether they would have had an “adequate” remedy had the action been dismissed before trial for nonjoinder: we cannot here determine whether the plaintiffs could have brought the same action, against the same parties plus Dutcher, in a state court. After trial, however, the “adequacy” of this hypothetical alternative, from the plaintiffs’ point of view, was obviously greatly diminished. Their interest in preserving a fully litigated judgment should be overborne only by rather greater opposing considerations than would be required at an earlier stage when the plaintiffs’ only concern was for a federal rather than a state forum.

756

Opposing considerations in this case are hard to find. The defendants had no stake, either asserted or real, in the joinder of Dutcher. They showed no interest in joinder until the Court of Appeals took the matter into its own hands. This properly forecloses any interest of theirs, but for purposes of clarity we note that the insurance company, whose liability was limited to $100,000, had or will have full opportunity to litigate each claim on that fund against the claimant involved. Its only concern with the absence of Dutcher was and is to obtain a windfall escape from its defeat at trial.

The interest of the outsider, Dutcher, is more difficult to reckon. The Court of Appeals, concluding that it should not follow Rule 19’s command to determine whether, as a practical matter, the judgment impaired the nonparty’s ability to protect his rights, simply quoted the District Court’s reasoning on the Dead Man issue as proof that Dutcher had a “right” to be joined:

The subject matter of this suit is the coverage of Lumbermens’ policy issued to Dutcher. Depending upon the outcome of this trial, Dutcher may have the policy all to himself or he may have to share its coverage with the Cionci Estate, thereby extending the availability of the proceeds of the policy to satisfy verdicts and judgments in favor of the two Estate plaintiffs. Sharing the coverage of a policy of insurance with finite limits with another, and thereby making that policy available to claimants against that other person is immediately worth less than having the coverage of such policy available to Dutcher alone. By the outcome in the instant case, to the extent that the two Estate plaintiffs will have the proceeds of the policy available to them in their claims against Cionci’s estate, Dutcher will lose a measure of protection. Conversely, to the extent that the proceeds of this policy are not available to the two Estate plaintiffs Dutcher will gain. * * * It is sufficient for the purpose of determining adversity [of interest] that it appears clearly that the measure of Dutcher’s protection under this policy of insurance is dependent upon the outcome of this suit. That being so, Dutcher’s interest in these proceedings is adverse to the interest of the two Estate plaintiffs, the parties who represent, on this record, the interests of the deceased persons in the matter in controversy.¹¹

757

There is a logical error in the Court of Appeals’ appropriation of this reasoning for its own quite different purposes: Dutcher had an “adverse” interest * * * because he would have been benefited by a ruling in favor of the insurance company; the question before the Court of Appeals, however, was whether Dutcher was harmed by the judgment against the insurance company.

The two questions are not the same. If the three plaintiffs had lost to the insurance company on the permission issue, that loss would have ended the matter favorably to Dutcher. If, as has happened, the three plaintiffs obtain a judgment against the insurance company on the permission issue, Dutcher may still claim that as a nonparty he is not estopped by that judgment from relitigating the issue. At that point it might be argued that Dutcher should be bound by the previous decision because, although technically a nonparty, he had purposely bypassed an adequate opportunity to intervene. We do not now decide whether such an argument would be correct under the circumstances of this case. If, however, Dutcher is properly foreclosed by his failure to intervene in the present litigation, then the joinder issue considered in the Court of Appeals vanishes, for any rights of Dutcher’s have been lost by his own inaction.

If Dutcher is not foreclosed by his failure to intervene below, then he is not “bound” by the judgment in favor of the insurance company and, in theory, he has not been harmed. There remains, however, the practical question whether Dutcher is likely to have any need, and if so will have any opportunity, to relitigate. The only possible threat to him is that if the fund is used to pay judgments against Cionci the money may in fact have disappeared before Dutcher has an opportunity to assert his interest. Upon examination, we find this supposed threat neither large nor unavoidable.

The state-court actions against Dutcher had lain dormant for years at the pleading stage by the time the Court of Appeals acted. Petitioner asserts here that under the applicable Pennsylvania vicarious liability law there is virtually no chance of recovery against Dutcher. We do not accept this assertion as fact, but the matter could have been explored below. Furthermore, even in the event of tort judgments against Dutcher, it is unlikely that he will be prejudiced by the outcome here. The potential claimants against Dutcher himself are identical with the potential claimants against Cionci’s estate. Should the claimants seek to collect from Dutcher personally, he may be able to raise the permission issue defensively, making it irrelevant that the actual monies paid from the fund may have disappeared: Dutcher can assert that Cionci did not have his permission and that therefore the payments made on Cionci’s behalf out of Dutcher’s insurance policy should properly be credited against Dutcher’s own liability. Of course, when Dutcher raises this defense he may lose, either on the merits of the permission issue or on the ground that the issue is foreclosed by Dutcher’s failure to intervene in the present case, but Dutcher will not have been prejudiced by the failure of the District Court here to order him joined.

758

If the Court of Appeals was unconvinced that the threat to Dutcher was trivial, it could nevertheless have avoided all difficulties by proper phrasing of the decree. The District Court, for unspecified reasons, had refused to order immediate payment on the Cionci judgment. Payment could have been withheld pending the suits against Dutcher and relitigation (if that became necessary) by him. In this Court, furthermore, counsel for petitioners represented orally that they, the tort plaintiffs, would accept a limitation of all claims to the amount of the insurance policy. Obviously such a compromise could have been reached below had the Court of Appeals been willing to abandon its rigid approach and seek ways to preserve what was, as to the parties, subject to the appellants’ other contentions, a perfectly valid judgment.

The suggestion of potential relitigation of the question of “permission” raises the fourth “interest” at stake in joinder cases—efficiency. It might have been preferable, at the trial level, if there were a forum available in which both the company and Dutcher could have been made defendants, to dismiss the action and force the plaintiffs to go elsewhere. Even this preference would have been highly problematical, however, for the actual threat of relitigation by Dutcher depended on there being judgments against him and on the amount of the fund, which was not revealed to the District Court. By the time the case reached the Court of Appeals, however, the problematical preference on efficiency grounds had entirely disappeared: there was no reason then to throw away a valid judgment just because it did not theoretically settle the whole controversy.

II.

Application of Rule 19(b)’s “equity and good conscience” test for determining whether to proceed or dismiss would doubtless have led to a contrary result below. The Court of Appeals’ reasons for disregarding the Rule remain to be examined. The majority of the court concluded that the Rule was inapplicable because “substantive” rights are involved, and substantive rights are not affected by the Federal Rules. Although the court did not articulate exactly what the substantive rights are, or what law determines them, we take it to have been making the following argument: (1) there is a category of persons called “indispensable parties”; (2) that category is defined by substantive law and the definition cannot be modified by rule; (3) the right of a person falling within that category to participate in the lawsuit in question is also a substantive matter, and is absolute.

759

With this we may contrast the position that is reflected in Rule 19. Whether a person is “indispensable,” that is, whether a particular lawsuit must be dismissed in the absence of that person, can only be determined in the context of particular litigation. There is a large category, whose limits are not presently in question, of persons who, in the Rule’s terminology, should be “joined if feasible,” and who, in the older terminology, were called either necessary or indispensable parties. Assuming the existence of a person who should be joined if feasible, the only further question arises when joinder is not possible and the court must decide whether to dismiss or to proceed without him. To use the familiar but confusing terminology, the decision to proceed is a decision that the absent person is merely “necessary” while the decision to dismiss is a decision that he is “indispensable.” The decision whether to dismiss (i.e., the decision whether the person missing is “indispensable”) must be based on factors varying with the different cases, some such factors being substantive, some procedural, some compelling by themselves, and some subject to balancing against opposing interests. Rule 19 does not prevent the assertion of compelling substantive interests; it merely commands the courts to examine each controversy to make certain that the interests really exist. To say that a court “must” dismiss in the absence of an indispensable party and that it “cannot proceed” without him puts the matter the wrong way around: a court does not know whether a particular person is “indispensable” until it has examined the situation to determine whether it can proceed without him.

The Court of Appeals concluded, although it was the first court to hold, that the 19th century joinder cases in this Court created a federal, common-law, substantive right in a certain class of persons to be joined in the corresponding lawsuits. At the least, that was not the way the matter started. The joinder problem first arose in equity and in the earliest case giving rise to extended discussion of the problem was the relatively simple one of the inefficiency of litigation involving only some of the interested persons. [Elmendorf v. Taylor, 23 U.S. (10 Wheat.) 152, 6 L.Ed. 289 (1825).] * * *

Following this case there arose three cases, also in equity, that the Court of Appeals here held to have declared a “substantive” right to be joined. It is true that these cases involved what would now be called “substantive” rights. This substantive involvement of the absent person with the controversy before the Court was, however, in each case simply an inescapable fact of the situation presented to the Court for adjudication. The Court in each case left the outsider with no more “rights” than it had already found belonged to him. The question in each case was simply whether, given the substantive involvement of the outsider, it was proper to proceed to adjudicate as between the parties.

760

* * *

The most influential of the cases in which this Court considered the question whether to proceed or dismiss in the absence of an interested but not joinable outsider is Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. 130, 15 L.Ed. 158, referred to in the opinion below. There the Court attempted, perhaps unfortunately, to stage general definitions of those persons without whom litigation could or could not proceed. In the former category were placed Persons having an interest in the controversy, and who ought to be made parties, in order that the court may act on that rule which requires it to decide on, and finally determine the entire controversy, and do complete justice, by adjusting all the rights involved in it. These persons are commonly termed necessary parties; but if their interests are separable from those of the parties before the court, so that the court can proceed to a decree, and do complete and final justice, without affecting other persons not before the court, the latter are not indispensable parties.

The persons in the latter category were

Persons who not only have an interest in the controversy, but an interest of such a nature that a final decree cannot be made without either affecting that interest, or leaving the controversy in such a condition that its final termination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience.

These generalizations are still valid today, and they are consistent with the requirements of Rule 19, but they are not a substitute for the analysis required by that Rule. Indeed, the second Shields definition states, in rather different fashion, the criteria for decision announced in Rule 19(b). One basis for dismissal is prejudice to the rights of an absent party that “cannot” be avoided in issuance of a final decree. Alternatively, if the decree can be so written that it protects the interests of the absent persons, but as so written it leaves the controversy so situated that the outcome may be inconsistent with “equity and good conscience,” the suit should be dismissed.

The majority of the Court of Appeals read Shields v. Barrow to say that a person whose interests “may be affected” by the decree of the court is an indispensable party, and that all indispensable parties have a “substantive right” to have suits dismissed in their absence. We are unable to read Shields as saying either. It dealt only with persons whose interests must, unavoidably, be affected by a decree and it said nothing about substantive rights. Rule 19(b), which the Court of Appeals dismissed as an ineffective attempt to change the substantive rights stated in Shields, is, on the contrary, a valid statement of the criteria for determining whether to proceed or dismiss in the forced absence of an interested person. It takes, for aught that now appears, adequate account of the very real, very substantive claims to fairness on the part of outsiders that may arise in some cases. This, however, simply is not such a case.

* * *

The judgment is vacated and the case is remanded to the Court of Appeals * * *.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Provident Tradesmens interpreted the 1966 version of Federal Rule 19. Examine the Advisory Committee’s Note to Rule 19, which is set out in the Supplement. What impact did the 1966 amendment have on the distinction between “persons required to be joined if feasible,” of Rule 19(a), and “a person who is required to be joined if feasible cannot be joined,” of Rule 19(b)? Given the amendment, what is the purpose of Rule 12(b)(7)? of Rule 12(h)?

2. Consider the following comments in an article written shortly after the Third Circuit’s decision dismissing the action:

* * * How has Dutcher been affected? The judgment declaring that Cionci was driving with permission does not bind Dutcher legally, since he was not a party. Dutcher is free to contest the point with all, including the insurer. Be it noted that although he testified in the action, Dutcher made no attempt to intervene; as the minority suggests, he might have reasonably preferred to stay out of the action. Whereas a judgment declaring Cionci to be an insured did not bind Dutcher, a judgment the other way would very likely have inured to Dutcher’s benefit * * *.

Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (I), 81 Harv.L.Rev. 356, 373 (1967).

3. In what ways might the court shape relief in order to lessen any prejudice under Rule 19(b)? Is the court free simply to grant a remedy other than the one originally requested—for example, by awarding money damages when specific performance might have a detrimental impact on the absentee? Of what importance is the availability of another forum in determining whether the action must be dismissed in the absence of someone whose joinder is not feasible?

4. What weight should be given to the various factors listed in Rule 19? Because there is no precise formula for determining whether a particular nonparty must be joined under Rule 19(a), the decision has to be made in light of the general policies of the rule. Can you articulate what those policies are? For example, what is the difference between the Rule 19(a)(1)(A) standard that in the absence of the nonparty “the court cannot accord complete relief among existing parties,” and the factor listed in Rule 19(b)(3), “whether a judgment rendered in the person’s absence would be adequate”? How do these factors differ from the focus in Rule 19(a)(1)(B) on the prejudicial effect of not joining the absentee?

5. REPUBLIC OF THE PHILIPPINES v. PIMENTEL, 553 U.S. 851, 128 S.Ct. 2180, 11 L.Ed.2d 131 (2008), concerned the intersection of Rule 19(b), statutory interpleader, and sovereign immunity. See p. 783, infra.

E. IMPLADER

1.THE HISTORICAL USE OF IMPLADER

Impleader has its roots in “vouching to warranty,” a common law procedure “whereby a person whose title to land had been attacked could notify his vendor of the attack if the latter had warranted the title. The vendor, whether or not he chose to participate, would then be bound by the prior determination in a subsequent suit by his vendee”:

When A sues B, there is often a third party, C, who may ultimately be liable to B for all or some part of the damages which A might recover. This liability over may be based on such legal relationships as those which arise from a contract of indemnity for loss or liability or a right to contribution from a joint tortfeasor. If it were necessary for B to institute a separate action to recover reimbursement from C, the issue of B’s liability to A would often have to be relitigated between B and C, since C, not a party to the original litigation, would generally not be bound by the prior determination. * * * Even if B could obtain a wholly consistent result against C, the courts would have been burdened by two trials and B might have been seriously handicapped by having to satisfy A’s judgment long before his recovery over from C. * * *

Developments in the Law—Multiparty Litigation in the Federal Courts, 71 Harv.L.Rev. 877, 907 (1958). See Neiderman & Reed, Vouching In Under the U.C.C.: Its History, Modern Use, and Questions About Its Continued Viability, 23 J.L. & Com. 1, 1 (2003); Degnan & Barton, Vouching to Quality Warranty: Case Law and Commercial Code, 51 Calif.L.Rev. 471 (1963).

2.THIRD-PARTY PRACTICE UNDER RULE 14

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 14 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

JEUB v. B/G FOODS, INC.
United States District Court, District of Minnesota, 1942.
2 F.R.D. 238.

NORDBYE, DISTRICT JUDGE. The facts are briefly these: The complainants seek to recover damages from the defendant, B/G Foods, Inc., on the grounds that, in one of the restaurants operated by this defendant, they were served with certain ham which was contaminated, unwholesome, and deleterious to the health, causing complainants to become sick and distressed to their damage. * * * Prior to the service of the answer, on application of the defendant, an ex parte order was obtained, making Swift and Company a third-party defendant. The third-party complaint set forth that the ham served was canned “Swift Premium Ham”, a product of Swift and Company, and purchased in a sealed can by B/G Foods the day preceding the serving of the ham to the complainants. It is asserted that B/G Foods was entirely free from any blame or negligence in connection therewith. It is further alleged in the third-party complaint that “if any of said ham was unwholesome, poisonous, deleterious or otherwise in any way unfit for human consumption, such condition was caused solely and entirely by negligence and carelessness and unlawful conduct on the part of Swift and Company.” Further, that “Swift and Company is liable to indemnify and reimburse B/G Foods, Inc., for the whole amount of any recovery made by plaintiff, * * * against B/G Foods, Inc., on account of said ham being served to her in its food shop. * * * ” Judgment is prayed that any recovery be against Swift and Company and not B/G Foods, Inc., and that B/G Foods, Inc., have judgment against Swift and Company for any and all sums which may be adjudged against B/G Foods, Inc., in favor of the plaintiff.

The motion to vacate the order is based on the showing that plaintiffs have not amended, and have refused to amend, their complaints to state any cause of action against Swift and Company. It is therefore the position of the third-party defendant that no relief can be granted against it in this proceeding; that [Federal] Rule 14 * * * is merely procedural and does not create any substantive rights; that no right of contribution or indemnity exists under the Minnesota law merely because a suit has been commenced; and that the party must have suffered some loss or paid more than his share of the loss before any rights will inure. It is pointed out that, as yet, the B/G Foods has suffered no loss and has made no payment growing out of the incident in question.

That the rights over and against Swift and Company, which B/G Foods may have by reason of any loss sustained by it, must be governed by the substantive laws of this State is entirely clear. The invoking of the third-party procedural practice must not do violence to the substantive rights of the parties. However, an acceleration or an expedition of the presentation of such rights does not conflict with any Minnesota law. Rule 14 * * * permits the impleader of a party “who is or may be liable.”^b The fact that an independent action for money recovery could not be brought at this time does not militate against B/G Foods’ right to invoke a procedure which will determine rights of the parties concurrently with that of the basic proceeding, and if and when any loss has been sustained as to which Swift and Company is liable over, the laws of this State in regard thereto may be made effective. * * * Rule 14 is not restricted to the rights of indemnity or contribution which are presently * * * [enforceable] * * *.

The apparent purpose of Rule 14 is to provide suitable machinery whereby the rights of all parties may be determined in one proceeding. Manifestly if Swift and Company is liable over to B/G Foods, Inc., for any or all damages sustained by reason of the tortious act alleged, no cogent reason is suggested why the original defendant should not avail itself of this rule. Otherwise, B/G Foods, Inc., would be required to await the outcome of the present suit, and then if plaintiffs recover, to institute an independent action for contribution or indemnity. The rule under consideration was promulgated to avoid this very circuitry of proceeding. Neither is any good reason suggested why the determination of the entire controversy in one proceeding will prejudice the rights of any of the parties. Certainly, plaintiffs cannot complain. They have not availed themselves of the opportunity to join Swift and Company as a party defendant. To require the same jury to determine the controversy between the third-party plaintiff and third-party defendant will not harm or jeopardize their rights or position before these triers of fact. The rights of Swift and Company are likewise not prejudiced by being made a third-party defendant. If it is liable over, it is concerned with the payment by B/G Foods, Inc., of any loss or damage obtained by these plaintiffs. However, the recognition or preservation of that right presents no particular difficulty. Any judgment against it by way of contribution or indemnity may be stayed until the judgment in the original proceeding against the B/G Foods, Inc., is paid or satisfied. One jury impaneled to determine the entire controversy may not only save time and expense, but it is fair to assume that the ends of justice will be served by disposition of the entire matter through the facilities of one jury. * * *

The motion, therefore, to vacate the order making Swift and Company a third-party defendant in each of the above-entitled cases, is denied. * * *

1. Federal Rule 14 avoids circuity of actions by permitting a defending party to add a party who is or may be liable for all or part of the claim against it. See 6 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1443 (3d ed.). Rule 14 does not authorize the joinder of a party who is liable on a separate or independent claim; rather, the liability must be derivative of the original claim. The original version of Rule 14 limited the availability of third-party practice:

765

Permission to the defendant to implead a person, not originally a party, asserted to be liable to the defendant for all or part of the plaintiff’s claim against the defendant, was something of an innovation when it was brought into the civil practice on a general basis in 1938. Perhaps by reason of its novelty, this “third-party practice” of Rule 14 was closely guarded. The defendant seeking impleader had always to apply to the court for leave: he might move ex parte if he had not yet served his answer; after answer, the more common case, he was obliged to give notice to the plaintiff.

Kaplan, Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 1961–1963 (II), 77 Harv.L.Rev. 801, 801 (1964). Amendments in 1963 permitted the third party to be impleaded without court permission if the impleader complaint is filed shortly after defendant’s answer in the original suit is served. What are the advantages of the current approach?

2.In Jeub the applicable state law recognized a substantive right of action but failed to provide a procedure for the acceleration or concurrent determination of the liability as part of the principal lawsuit. In a diversity case in a state that adheres to the common law rule prohibiting contribution among joint tortfeasors, must a federal court deny impleader of a joint tortfeasor? How might the court shape the relief on an accelerated or contingent claim to reflect the limitations of substantive state law?

3. Rule 14 does not allow a defendant to implead an existing defendant. See Horton v. Continental Can Co., 19 F.R.D. 429 (D. Neb. 1956). But there are at least two other possible procedures for a defendant to assert its claims against an existing defendant. What are they? What difference does it make if a defendant’s claim is brought under Rule 14 or some “other appropriate procedure”? What is the logic of Rules 13(a), (b), and (g) permitting or requiring counterclaims and crossclaims to be asserted against persons who already are parties and Rule 14(a) denying impleader in that context?

4.Will diversity jurisdiction be defeated if defendant seeks to implead a third-party defendant who is a citizen of the same state as plaintiff? See p. 360, Note 2, supra. Can the original plaintiff assert a claim against a nondiverse third-party defendant? What if plaintiff’s claim is a compulsory counterclaim? See Oakley, Kroger Redux, 51 Duke L.J. 663, 665 (2001).

5.Courts have held that the statutory venue limitations have no application to Rule 14 claims even if they would require the third-party proceeding to be heard in another district had it been brought as an independent action. May plaintiff object to venue if the third-party defendant asserts a claim against that party under Rule 14(a)(2)(D)?

6.Third-party procedure developed in some states in the early twentieth century, influenced by the English Rules of 1875, which permitted a defendant to assert contribution, indemnification, or liability over with respect to a third party. As late as 1937, the procedure did not have a fixed name, but sometimes was referred to as impleader. See Millar, Notabilia of American Civil Procedure 1887–1937, 50 Harv.L.Rev. 1017, 1023 (1937). For a discussion of the development of state third-party practice, see Friedenthal, The Expansion of Joinder in Cross-Complaints by the Erroneous Interpretation of Section 442 of the California Code of Civil Procedure, 51 Calif.L.Rev. 494 (1963).

766

F. INTERPLEADER

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 22 and 28 U.S.C. §§ 1335, 1397, and 2361, and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

Interpleader is a device designed to enable a party who might be exposed to multiple claims to money or property under the party’s control to settle the controversy in a single proceeding. For example, if two people claim that each is the sole beneficiary of a life insurance policy, the insurance company, in the absence of a joinder device such as interpleader, would be required to defend against both in two actions. Not only would the company be forced to incur the expense of additional litigation, but it would be faced with the possibility that, in separate lawsuits, both claimants might win. See 7 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1702 (3d ed.).

1.HISTORICAL LIMITATIONS ON THE USE OF INTERPLEADER

HANCOCK OIL CO. v. INDEPENDENT DISTRIBUTING CO.
Supreme Court of California, 1944.
24 Cal.2d 497, 150 P.2d 463.

EDMONDS, JUSTICE. * * *

According to the complaint [filed by two corporate lessees of certain real property], in 1936 W.L. Hopkins and Gertrude Ann Hopkins, his wife, leased certain real property to Hancock Oil Company of California and R.R. Bush Oil Company. Landowner's royalties of approximately $1,500 have accrued. It is also alleged that in 1941, Independent Distributing Co., a copartnership composed of Merritt Bloxom, Eugene E. Olwell and Murray M. Olwell, brought an action asserting that W.L. Hopkins, Gertrude Ann Hopkins, and two persons sued by fictitious names, hold the real property described in the lease in trust for them. The relief sought in the suit of Independent Distributing Co. was an accounting of the rents of the land.

767

The copartnership and the copartners, together with W.L. Hopkins and Gertrude Ann Hopkins, H. James Hopkins and W.L. Hopkins, trustees of Wilbur T. Hopkins Trust, and H. James Hopkins and W.L. Hopkins, trustees of the H. James Hopkins Trust, are named as the defendants in the present suit, the charge of the complaint being that the copartnership and the copartners claim to be the owners of the land described in the lease and entitled to all of the landowner's royalties accrued and to accrue under that agreement. A further assertion of the complaint is that the defendants other than the copartnership and the copartners also claim the same royalties and by reason of these conflicting claims the lessees cannot safely determine to whom the rent should be paid. * * *

To this complaint Merritt Bloxom, Eugene E. Olwell, Murray M. Olwell and Independent Distributing Co. filed an answer alleging that they are the owners of the property and entitled to all of the rents and profits from it. They also assert that the defendants named Hopkins are holding title to the property in trust for them. The defendants other than the copartners and the copartnership interposed a general demurrer and a special demurrer upon the ground of uncertainty. Each demurrer was sustained without leave to amend and the corporations' appeal is from the judgment which followed that order.

From an opinion of the trial judge, it appears that the demurrers were sustained upon the sole ground that a tenant may not question the title of his landlord at the date of the lease; accordingly, a suit by a tenant to interplead his landlord and one who claims the rent agreed to be paid in accordance with the terms of the lease by which he holds possession of the real property is in violation of this fundamental principle. The appellants assert that a suit in interpleader does not constitute a denial of the landlord's title but is simply a means by which the tenant may discharge his obligation to pay rent under the lease without becoming involved in the conflict between different claimants to the amount due and unpaid. * * *

The common law bill of interpleader had four essential elements: (1) The same thing, debt, or duty must be claimed by both or all the parties against whom the relief is demanded; (2) all of the adverse titles or claims must be dependent, or be derived from a common source; (3) the one seeking the relief must not have nor claim any interest in the subject matter; and (4) he must have incurred no independent liability to either of the claimants. See 4 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 5th Ed.1941, § 1322, p. 906.

These requirements have been termed historical limitations upon this otherwise expeditious equitable proceeding * * *, and in 1881 section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended to broaden the remedy. The statute * * * declares * * *: "And whenever conflicting claims are or may be made upon a person for or relating to personal property, or the performance of an obligation, or any portion thereof, such person may bring an action against the conflicting claimants to compel them to interplead and litigate their several claims among themselves. The order of substitution may be made and the action of interpleader may be maintained, and the applicant or plaintiff be discharged from liability to all or any of the conflicting claimants, although their titles or claims have not a common origin, or are not identical, but are adverse to and independent of one another." The provision of this enactment, that interpleader lies "although their titles or claims have not a common origin * * * but are adverse to and independent of one another," directly abrogates the common law requirement that all the adverse titles or claims must be dependent or be derived from a common source, and it is therefore clear that privity between the conflicting claimants need not be shown to invoke the remedy under the code. * * *

768

Early in the history of interpleader, it was held that one who sought to maintain such a suit must show outstanding claims, identical in every respect and without the slightest degree of variation, to the same thing, debt or duty. In the case of conflicting claims to specific personal property, this rigid formalism did not seriously interfere with the effectiveness of the proceeding. But where, as is generally the situation modernly, the subject matter of the conflicting claims was an obligation, a debt or a duty, the requirement as to the identity of the defendant's demands very often prevented a stakeholder from using interpleader where he was doubly vexed with respect to one liability. For example, under the narrow rule of the common law, if one person claimed all of the fund held by a bank and another person asserted the right to only a portion of that fund, the bank could not secure a determination of its liability by means of the equitable proceeding. The Legislature has removed this restriction, yet the very rationale of interpleader compels the conclusion that the amendment does not allow the remedy where each of the claimants asserts the right to a different debt, claim or duty. If the conflicting claims are mutually exclusive, interpleader cannot be maintained, but the fact that an identical right is not asserted by each of the claimants does not preclude the use of the remedy. * * *

In the present case, the plaintiffs have alleged that each of the two groups against whom interpleader is sought claims the right to receive the rents and royalties reserved in the lease. If Independent Distributing Co. and the members of that copartnership should assert that they are entitled to the reasonable value of the use and occupation of the land leased to the plaintiffs, together with the mesne profits or damages for waste, the trial court would be required to deny the plaintiffs the right to interplead those parties with their lessors. Under such circumstances the claims of the parties would not relate to the same obligation. But as the appellants' complaint pleads that there are conflicting claims concerning their obligation to pay the rents and royalties reserved by the lease, the lessors and the third parties must answer and, if each of them agrees that his claim concerns the right to those rents and royalties, the lessees should be discharged from liability upon payment of their obligations under the lease.

769

As to the remaining common law principles governing a suit of interpleader, the appellants' complaint conforms with the requirement that the plaintiff in such a proceeding must stand in the position of a disinterested stakeholder. However, much of the present controversy centers about the last element which is specified as essential. Although the complaint discloses no obligation of the appellants other than under the lease, the respondents assert that the obligation to pay rent constitutes an independent liability and bars the remedy of interpleader.

* * * The rule concerning independent liability is stated in Corpus Juris as follows: "Interpleader will not lie if the stakeholder has incurred some personal obligation to either of the claimants, independent of the title or the right to possession, because such claimant would in that event have a claim against him which could not be settled in a litigation with the other claimant." 33 C.J. 439. * * * The Supreme Court of Maine put the matter most convincingly when it said: "The mere fact that a contractual relation exists between plaintiff and one of the defendants, under which the fund is required to be paid to such claimant, does not of itself defeat the right of interpleader. * * * If such were the law, it would be difficult to conceive of any set of facts which would enable a bank, a trustee, or other custodian of funds, or even a bailee, to maintain interpleader. The obligation referred to in the rule must be independent of the title or right of possession of the fund or property in question. * * *" First National Bank v. Reynolds, 127 Me. 340, 143 A. 266, 268, 60 A.L.R. 712. * * *

* * *

From what has been said, then, it is clear that, in the present case, as according to the facts alleged in the complaint, the relations inter se of the respondents and the copartners are such that the decision will determine the liability of the lessees to each of them, there is no independent liability which will bar the remedy of interpleader; accordingly the appellants' complaint is sufficient with respect to those of the four common law requirements for interpleader not abolished or modified by the amendment in 1881 to section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure. * * *

[The court went on to consider the effect of the common law rule that a tenant may not dispute the title of his landlord at the time of the commencement of the relation.]

Notwithstanding the strict common law limitation on interpleader in landlord-tenant cases which is justified by an ancient rule of real property, the code provision concerning the remedy must be liberally construed. A remedial statute, its purpose is to avoid a multiplicity of suits and prevent vexatious litigation. * * *

770

* * * [I]n the absence of the right to interplead the landlord and the adverse claimant to the rent, the tenant is faced with the unfortunate alternative of forfeiting his lease or possibly paying twice. * * * And there is no action at law adequate to shield him from vexation by multiple litigation over the obligation for rent, against the risk of double liability upon the same obligation, and against insecurity of tenancy.

Furthermore, interpleader is not only of importance to the tenant; it is also of advantage to the third party claimant. If the tenant may not interplead his landlord and another under the common law rule, the third party must establish his right to rent in a separate action. During the progress of this litigation the tenant would pay the rents to the landlord. It is entirely conceivable that before judgment was rendered the tenant might become insolvent, leaving the third party without recourse, or because of financial difficulties overtaking the landlord, the tenant would be required to pay his obligation twice.

Unquestionably the landlord may suffer some disadvantage in being forced to defend a suit in interpleader. While the litigation continues the rent is withheld from him without interest. But the tenant may not maintain such a suit upon the mere pretext or suspicion of double vexation; he must allege facts showing a reasonable probability of double vexation. Without accurately appraising the rationale of interpleader, by some decisions this court has mentioned as an additional requirement that the plaintiff must allege facts showing a doubt as to which claimant he can safely pay. * * * However, to demand from a plaintiff that he express a doubt as to which adverse claimant he is liable is an admission that the basis upon which the right to interpleader rests is the avoidance of double liability. "The right to the remedy by interpleader is founded, however, not on the consideration that a man may be subjected to double liability, but on the fact that he is threatened with double vexation in respect to one liability." Pfister v. Wade, * * * 56 Cal. at page 47 * * *.

* * *

The judgment is reversed.
[The dissenting opinion of JUSTICE CARTER has been omitted.]

1. The California Supreme Court stated in Hancock that interpleader would have been denied if Independent Oil Company had asserted a claim for profits and damages. In such a situation, the court reasoned, “the claims of the parties [Independent and Hopkins] would not relate to the same obligation.” What does the court mean by “the same obligation”? Consider the probable content of the allegations if Independent had asserted a claim for profits and damages and Hopkins had asserted a claim for the rents; would the claims have been mutually exclusive?

771

2. Historically, the typical interpleader suit had two stages. The first determined whether interpleader was proper; in it, the controversy was between the stakeholder on one side and all the claimants on the other. If interpleader was granted, the first stage ended with a decree allowing the stakeholder to withdraw from the case and enjoining the claimants from taking any further proceedings against the stakeholder. Before retiring, however, the stakeholder was required to deposit the money or property involved in the dispute with the court, generally less court costs and attorney’s fees. In the second stage, the contest was among the claimants to determine their respective rights to the property or fund deposited in court. See McClintock, Equity § 188 (2d ed. 1948); 4 Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence § 1320 (5th ed. 1941).

3. The third requirement for interpleader mentioned in Hancock is that the party seeking interpleader must not have or claim any interest in the subject matter. The first case in which the requirement appeared, Mitchell v. Hayne, 2 Simons & Stuart 63, 57 Eng. Rep. 268 (Ch.1824), cited no authority and gave no reasons for its adoption. For this requirement’s early history, see Hazard & Moskowitz, An Historical and Critical Analysis of Interpleader, 52 Calif.L.Rev. 706, 744–47 (1964). At the time Hancock was decided, this requirement was still in full force in California. However, in 1951, Section 386 of California’s Code of Civil Procedure was amended to permit a defendant to interpose a claim to a portion of the property or money in dispute. For a sharp attack on the no-interest-in-the-subject-matter requirement, see Chafee, Modernizing Interpleader, 30 Yale L.J. 814, 840–42 (1921).

4. The fourth historical requirement—that the stakeholder must not have incurred any independent liability with regard to the stake of either of the claimants—derived from the principle that the stakeholder should retire from the case once interpleader was allowed. By way of illustration, assume that a bailee who is subject to conflicting claims to the bailed article has expressly acknowledged the title of one of the claimants to it. Interpleader could not be granted because a decision awarding ownership to the other claimant might not terminate the controversy concerning the bailed item; the losing claimant still might have a cause of action against the stakeholder based on the latter’s acknowledgment of title, and the stakeholder could not withdraw from the litigation at the end of the first stage of the suit. What underlies the principle that the stakeholder must be neutral, disinterested, and withdraw permanently from the suit when interpleader is allowed?

2.JURISDICTIONAL LIMITATIONS PRIOR TO PASSAGE OF THE FEDERAL INTERPLEADER ACT

The territorial approach to in personam jurisdiction, see p. 79, supra, raised a number of peculiar problems in the interpleader context. Occasionally, the stakeholder was not able to obtain jurisdiction over all of the claimants in any one state because of the limitations imposed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. To overcome this difficulty, courts often characterized interpleader as an in rem or quasi in rem proceeding and predicated jurisdiction on the presence of the stake within the territorial reach of the court. In NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO. v. DUNLEVY, 241 U.S. 518, 36 S.Ct. 613, 60 L.Ed. 1140 (1916), the Supreme Court was faced with the question whether to treat a debt as an in rem or quasi in rem basis for interpleader, and held that the interpleader was an in personam proceeding requiring personal service on the claimants before they could be bound by the judgment. As commentary explains:

772

The Dunlevy decision had the effect of rendering interpleader unavailable in the federal courts in most cases in which the claimants were of diverse citizenship. In the absence of a federal statute extending the jurisdictional reach of the district courts in interpleader actions, the prevailing territorial limitations on personal jurisdiction effectively barred the courts from offering relief when one of the claimants was from a state other than the forum. As a result, businesses engaged in interstate commerce that were confronted by conflicting claims to a particular fund often found themselves unavoidably defending several suits in different states. The situation was particularly troublesome for insurance companies due to the frequency with which multiple claims to the proceeds of an insurance policy arose.

7 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1701 (3d ed.). Congress responded to the problem in 1917 with the enactment of the first federal interpleader statute.

3.INTERPLEADER IN THE FEDERAL COURTS

Reread 28 U.S.C. §§ 1335, 1397, and 2361 and Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 22 in the Supplement.

The 1917 Federal Interpleader Act was successively broadened in 1926 and 1936 and was reconstituted in 1948 as part of the United States Judicial Code. The present Interpleader Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1335, 1397, and 2361, manifests a congressional intent to avoid a repetition of the Dunlevy decision in a federal court. Section 1397 permits venue to be laid in any judicial district in which at least one of the claimants resides and Section 2361 permits nationwide service of process in order to reach all of the claimants. Further recognition of the interstate quality of interpleader and the need for the exercise of federal judicial power in this context is the provision in 28 U.S.C.

§ 1335 permitting the federal courts to assert jurisdiction when the stake is worth as little as $500 (the property is deposited into the court registry) and there is diversity of citizenship between or among “[t]wo or more adverse claimants.” The federal statutes on interpleader are analyzed in a series of articles by their principal proponent, Professor Chafee: Interstate Interpleader, 33 Yale L.J. 685 (1924); Interpleader in the United States Courts, 41 Yale L.J. 1134 (1932), 42 Yale L.J. 41 (1932); The Federal Interpleader Act of 1936, 45 Yale L.J. 963, 1161 (1936); Federal Interpleader Since the Act of 1936, 49 Yale L.J. 377 (1940).

Interpleader under the Federal Interpleader Act is referred to as “statutory interpleader.” Interpleader also is available under Federal Rule 22, and is known as “rule interpleader.” Both provisions are designed to protect stakeholders from multiple liability as well as multiple lawsuits when there are competing claimants to a single fund. However, rule interpleader must satisfy the ordinary requirements of jurisdiction and venue. See Doernberg, What’s Wrong with this Picture?: Rule Interpleader, the Anti-Injunction Act, In Personam Jurisdiction, and M.C. Escher, 67 U.Colo.L.Rev. 551 (1996).

PAN AMERICAN FIRE & CASUALTY CO. v. REVERE

United States District Court, Eastern District of Louisiana, 1960.

188 F.Supp. 474.

WRIGHT, DISTRICT JUDGE. On February 3, 1960, a * * * large tractor and trailer collided head-on with a bus carrying school children. The bus driver and three of the children were killed and 23 others were injured, some very seriously. A few moments later, compounding the disaster, another collision occurred between two cars following the bus. * * *

Alleging that three suits against it have already been filed and that numerous other claims have been made, the tractor’s liability insurer has instituted this interpleader action, citing all potential claimants. It asks that they be enjoined from initiating legal proceedings elsewhere or further prosecuting the actions already filed and that they be directed to assert their claims in the present suit. Plaintiff has deposited a bond in the full amount of its policy limits, $100,000, and avers that “it has no interest” in these insurance proceeds, being merely “a disinterested stakeholder.” On the other hand, the Company denies liability toward any and all claimants. This apparently contradictory position is explained by the statement of its counsel, incorporated in the record as an amendment to the complaint, that plaintiff “has no further claim” on the sum deposited with the court, but cannot technically admit “liability” since that would amount to a concession that its assured was negligent and expose him to a deficiency judgment.

The only question presented at this stage of the proceeding is whether, under the circumstances outlined, the remedy of interpleader is available to the insurer. * * *

1. Jurisdiction. * * *

[The court concluded that the jurisdictional amount and citizenship requirements of the Interpleader Act and Federal Rule 22 had been satisfied.]

2. Strict Interpleader or Bill in the Nature of Interpleader. Apparently of the opinion that the answer may affect the availability of the remedy sought here, the parties have debated the question whether this is a case for “true,” “strict,” or “pure” interpleader or whether the present facts support only an action “in the nature of interpleader.” The difference between the two is that in strict interpleader the plaintiff is a disinterested stakeholder while in the action in the nature of interpleader he is himself a claimant, whether directly or by denying the validity of some or all of the other claims. * * * Thus, if the casualty insurer had brought in the claimants and said to them: “Gentlemen, I put before you the full amount of the policy which those of you who prove your claims must divide between you, but I deny that any of you is entitled to any portion of the fund and pray that all your demands be rejected and that the deposit be returned to me in due course,” clearly this would not be a true interpleader but an action in the nature of interpleader. The problem here is whether the allegation of disinterestedness already noted changes the character of the action to one of strict interpleader. * * *

But does it matter how the action is characterized? It would seem to make no difference since both Rule 22 and the Interpleader Act expressly provide for actions in the nature of interpleader as well as strict bills, the drafters in each case voicing their intent to erase the distinction. But before so concluding, we must dispose of an old rule of equity that gave importance to the difference between “pure” and “impure” bills of interpleader.

3. Special Equitable Ground for Bill in the Nature of Interpleader. Though apparently known to the early common law, modern interpleader developed in the chancery courts and is today considered an equitable remedy. Hence, in theory at least, the resort to equity must be justified by the absence of an adequate remedy at law.

* * *

The present law * * * is that the only equitable ground necessary for interpleader, whether the plaintiff is a disinterested stakeholder or not, is exposure to double or multiple vexation. But, of course, this does not mean that every person threatened with a multiplicity of suits is entitled to interplead. The function of interpleader is to rescue a debtor from undue harassment when there are several claims made against the same fund. It is because the aggregate demands exceed the insurer’s contractual obligation that the condition is here satisfied.

775

4. Exposure to Multiple Liability. Though the Interpleader Act makes no such requirement, Rule 22 apparently permits interpleader only if the claims “may expose a plaintiff to double or multiple liability.” (Emphasis added.) In theory at least, this is not necessarily the same thing as exposure to double or multiple vexation on a single obligation. There may be situations in which the debtor, though harassed by many suits on account of one transaction, is never in danger of being compelled to pay the same debt twice. Indeed, here, the argument is advanced that because it has fixed the limits of its liability in its policy, the insurer is not exposed to multiple liability no matter how many claims are filed, and, therefore, is not entitled to maintain interpleader, at least under the Rule.

But the requirement is not a strict one. * * * The key to the clause requiring exposure to “double or multiple liability” is in the word “may.” The danger need not be immediate; any possibility of having to pay more than is justly due, no matter how improbable or remote, will suffice. At least, it is settled that an insurer with limited contractual liability who faces claims in excess of his policy limits is “exposed” within the intendment of Rule 22, and we need go no further to find the requirement satisfied here.

5. Adversity of Claimants. In a somewhat overlapping objection, it is said that the present claims are not characterized by that “adversity” to one another which is a prerequisite of interpleader. It is of course true that they are identical neither in origin nor in amount and that they are, in some degree at least, independent demands. But, despite the objection of purists who would retain the old doctrine of complete “mutual exclusiveness,” both Rule 22 and the Interpleader Act now expressly provide that this is no bar to the remedy. On the other hand, there remains a requirement that the claimants be “adverse” in some way. The question is whether that requirement is met when, as here, the claimants, though in theory indifferent toward each other, are in fact competing for a fund which is not large enough to satisfy them all. The answer is clear * * * : “In that situation it is to the interest of its claimant to reduce or defeat altogether the claim of every other claimant. * * * ”

6. Fault of Plaintiff. * * *

[The court held that plaintiff was not guilty of “unclean hands,” which would have barred equitable relief.]

7. Unliquidated Tort Claims as Justifying Interpleader. Over and above the technical objections already disposed of, the argument is advanced that interpleader is not an appropriate method of adjudicating unliquidated tort claims. Such a bald proposition might be rejected summarily were it not for the startling fact that there appears to be no precedent in the federal courts for granting interpleader in the present situation. * * *

776

At the outset, it seems clear that interpleader will lie when there are several tort claimants who have obtained judgments which aggregate more than the amount of the policy. Indeed, in that case it can make no difference whether the claims originated in tort or contract. Moreover, it is settled that interpleader is available to an insurer whose policy is insufficient to satisfy contract claims, though they have not been reduced to judgment. Why, then, should the remedy be denied to a blameless insurer faced with excessive tort claims? Three reasons have been suggested: (1) As to quantum, at least, tort claims are more conjectural than contract claims; (2) since it is not directly liable to the claimants, the insurer’s exposure as to tort claims is “remote” until they have been reduced to judgment; and (3) tort claims “are peculiarly appropriate for jury trial,” which would have to be denied under the equitable practice of interpleader.

The effect of the first objection is only this: that it is more difficult in the case of tort claims to determine whether the aggregate will exceed the policy limits so as to render the claimants “adverse” and expose the insurer to “multiple liability.” It may be that there are few cases in which this result can be reasonably anticipated, but, clearly, this is one of them.

The second objection, though it forms the basis of the only reported decision denying interpleader to an automobile liability insurer,³⁶ is no better. Indeed, under the “may expose” clause of Rule 22 and the “may claim” clause of the Interpleader Act, it would not seem to matter how remote the danger might be. But, in any event, prematurity is no defense under the peculiar Louisiana law which allows a direct action against the automobile liability insurer.

8. Jury Trial. On the theory that the resort to equity defeats the right of trial by jury, it has been said that once interpleader is granted all issues in the case must be tried to the judge alone. There is, however, eminent authority to the contrary, including Judge Learned Hand, Professor Chafee, and Professor Moore, who hold that legal issues arising in an interpleader action can be tried before a jury. Whatever may be the right solution in another case, here it seems clear that the questions of liability and damages ought to be put to a jury. * * *

9. Enjoining of Other Proceedings. Usually interpleader will not be really effective unless all claimants are brought before the same court in one proceeding and restricted to that single forum in the assertion of their claims. * * * Immediately, the question arises whether Section 2283 of Title 28 of the Code presents an obstacle to enjoining state court proceedings.

As amended in 1948, that section prohibits a federal court from interfering with a pending state court action except in three situations: (1) Where such a course is “expressly authorized by Act of Congress”; (2) where the issuance of an injunction by the federal court is “necessary in aid of its jurisdiction”; and (3) where the court’s action is required “to protect or effectuate its judgments.” Clearly, the first exception is applicable to a suit brought under the Interpleader Act since that statute expressly empowers the court to enjoin the claimants “from instituting or prosecuting any proceeding in any State or United States court affecting the property, instrument or obligation involved in the interpleader action * * *.” But the exception does not apply to an action under Rule 22, for the quoted provision authorizing stay orders is restricted to statutory interpleader. If state court proceedings can be enjoined when interpleader is brought under the Rule it must be by virtue of the second exception in Section 2283.

777

The question whether the court entertaining a non-statutory interpleader suit may enjoin state court proceedings on the same issues on the theory that it is “necessary in aid of its jurisdiction” is not free from doubt. * * * But * * * every indication is that, regardless of the Interpleader Act, the power of a federal court to enjoin pending state court proceedings in a case like this one will be sustained. Certainly that result is desirable, if not indispensable. * * *

10. Venue and Service of Process. * * * [T]here are two procedural limitations on actions under the Rule which become important whenever the claimants are not all within the territorial jurisdiction of the district court. [The court concluded that the then-existing venue statute and territorial limitations on personal jurisdiction precluded interpleader in the Eastern District of Louisiana.] * * *

But the situation is different when jurisdiction exists under the statute, for the Interpleader Act specially provides that the action may be commenced in any district where one defendant resides and that process will run throughout the United States. Unfortunately, these exceptional rules apply only to statutory interpleader. The present suit, then, is maintainable only under the Interpleader Act unless the Wisconsin defendant waives venue and voluntarily appears or is found in Louisiana.

11. Conclusion. * * * [T]he prayer for interpleader will be granted, without, however, discharging the plaintiff who is contractually bound to resist the demands. Injunctions will issue restraining all parties from further prosecuting any pending suits against plaintiff or its assured on account of the accident described, or from instituting like proceedings before this or any other court. All defendants will be required to enter their claims by way of answer in this action within thirty days from notice of this judgment. Thereafter, upon timely demand by any one of the parties, the court will order a joint jury trial of all the claims upon the issues of liability and damages. In the event the aggregate of the verdicts should exceed the amount of plaintiff’s liability, the court reserves unto itself the task of apportioning the insurance proceeds in such manner as it deems just.

The motion to dismiss will be denied.

QUESTIONS

If an insurance company in the Pan American situation pays the full amount of the policy to certain claimants, either by way of settlement or in satisfaction of a judgment, can it defend later actions by unpaid claimants by arguing that it has already exhausted the policy? To what extent is the answer to this question relevant in determining whether interpleader should be granted?

STATE FARM FIRE & CASUALTY CO. v. TASHIRE
Supreme Court of the United States, 1967.
386 U.S. 523, 87 S.Ct. 1199, 18 L.Ed.2d 270.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

JUSTICE FORTAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

[This case arose out of a collision between a Greyhound bus and a pickup truck in Shasta County, California, in September 1964. Two of the bus passengers were killed and 33 others were injured, as were the bus driver, the driver of the truck, and its passenger. One of the dead and ten of the injured passengers were Canadians; the rest of the individuals were citizens of five American states.

Four of the injured passengers filed suit in California state courts seeking damages in excess of $1,000,000 and naming as defendants: Greyhound Lines, Inc.; Nauta, the bus driver; Clark, the driver of the truck; and Glasgow, the truck passenger who apparently was its owner. Each of the individual defendants was a citizen of Oregon; Greyhound was a California corporation. Before the California cases came to trial and before any other suits were filed, petitioner, State Farm Fire & Casualty Company, an Illinois corporation, brought this action in the nature of interpleader in the United States District Court for the District of Oregon.

State Farm asserted that at the time of the collision it had in force an insurance policy covering Clark, the driver of the truck, for bodily injury liability up to $10,000 per person and $20,000 per occurrence. State Farm further asserted that the aggregate damages sought in actions already filed in California and other anticipated actions far exceeded the amount of its maximum liability under the policy. Accordingly, it paid into court the sum of $20,000 and asked the court (1) to require all claimants to establish their claims against Clark and his insurer in the Oregon proceeding and in no other action, and (2) to discharge State Farm from all further obligations under its policy. Alternatively, State Farm requested a decree that the insurer owed no duty to Clark and was not liable on the policy, and asked the court to refund the $20,000 deposit. State Farm joined as defendants

Clark, Glasgow, Nauta, Greyhound, and each of the prospective claimants. Jurisdiction was predicated both upon the Federal Interpleader Act and general diversity of citizenship. Personal service was effected on each of the American defendants and registered mail was employed to give notice to the 11 Canadian claimants.

The Oregon District Court issued an order requiring each of the defendants to show cause why he should not be restrained from filing or prosecuting any proceeding affecting the property or obligation involved in the interpleader action. In response, several of the defendants contended that the policy did cover the accident and advanced various arguments for the position that interpleader was inappropriate.

When a temporary injunction along the lines sought by State Farm issued, the respondents moved to dismiss and, in the alternative, sought a change of venue to the district in which the collision had occurred. After a hearing, the District Court declined to dissolve the temporary injunction but continued the motion for a change of venue. Later, the temporary injunction was broadened so that all suits against Clark, State Farm, Greyhound, and Nauta had to be prosecuted in the interpleader proceeding.

On interlocutory appeal, the Ninth Circuit reversed on the ground that in states, such as Oregon, that do not permit a “direct action” against an insurance company until a judgment is obtained against the insured, State Farm could not invoke federal interpleader until the claims against the insured had been reduced to judgment. The Court of Appeals held that prior to that time claimants with unliquidated tort claims are not “claimants” within the meaning of Section 1335 of Title 28 and are not “persons having claims against the plaintiff” within the meaning of Federal Rule 22.⁶ The Ninth Circuit directed that the temporary injunction be dissolved and the action be dismissed. The Supreme Court granted certiorari.]

* * *

I.

Before considering the issues presented by the petition for certiorari, we find it necessary to dispose of a question neither raised by the parties nor passed upon by the courts below. Since the matter concerns our jurisdiction, we raise it on our own motion. * * * The interpleader statute * * * has been uniformly construed to require only “minimal diversity,” that is, diversity of citizenship between two or more claimants, without regard to the circumstance that other rival claimants may be co-citizens. The language of the statute, the legislative purpose broadly to remedy the problems posed by multiple claimants to a single fund, and the consistent judicial interpretation tacitly accepted by Congress, persuade us that the statute requires no more. There remains, however, the question whether such a statutory construction is consistent with Article III of our Constitution * * *. In Strawbridge v. Curtiss * * * [p. 305, supra], this Court held that the diversity of citizenship statute required “complete diversity”: where co-citizens appeared on both sides of a dispute, jurisdiction was lost. But Chief Justice Marshall there purported to construe only “The words of the act of Congress,” not the Constitution itself. And in a variety of contexts this Court and the lower courts have concluded that Article III poses no obstacle to the legislative extension of federal jurisdiction, founded on diversity, so long as any two adverse parties are not co-citizens. Accordingly, we conclude that the present case is properly in the federal courts.

780

II.

We do not agree with the Court of Appeals that, in the absence of a state law or contractual provision for “direct action” suits against the insurance company, the company must wait until persons asserting claims against its insured have reduced those claims to judgment before seeking to invoke the benefits of federal interpleader. That may have been a tenable position under the 1926 * * * and 1936 interpleader statutes. * * * These statutes did not carry forward the language in the 1917 Act authorizing interpleader where adverse claimants “may claim” benefits as well as where they “are claiming” them. * * * In 1948, however, in the revision of the Judicial Code, the “may claim” language was restored. * * * Until the decision below, every court confronted by the question has concluded that the 1948 revision removed whatever requirement there might previously have been that the insurance company wait until at least two claimants reduced their claims to judgments. The commentators are in accord.

Considerations of judicial administration demonstrate the soundness of this view which, in any event, seems compelled by the language of the present statute, which is remedial and to be liberally construed. Were an insurance company required to await reduction of claims to judgment, the first claimant to obtain such a judgment or to negotiate a settlement might appropriate all or a disproportionate slice of the fund before his fellow claimants were able to establish their claims. The difficulties such a race to judgment pose for the insurer, and the unfairness which may result to some claimants, were among the principal evils the interpleader device was intended to remedy.

III.

The fact that State Farm had properly invoked the interpleader jurisdiction under § 1335 did not, however, entitle it to an order both enjoining prosecution of suits against it outside the confines of the interpleader proceeding and also extending such protection to its insured, the alleged tortfeasor. Still less was Greyhound Lines entitled to have that order expanded so as to protect itself and its driver, also alleged to be tortfeasors, from suits brought by its passengers in various state or federal courts. Here, the scope of the litigation, in terms of parties and claims, was vastly more extensive than the confines of the “fund,” the deposited proceeds of the insurance policy. In these circumstances, the mere existence of such a fund cannot, by use of interpleader, be employed to accomplish purposes that exceed the needs of orderly contest with respect to the fund.

781

There are situations, of a type not present here, where the effect of interpleader is to confine the total litigation to a single forum and proceeding. One such case is where a stakeholder, faced with rival claims to the fund itself, acknowledges—or denies—his liability to one or the other of the claimants. In this situation, the fund itself is the target of the claimants. It marks the outer limits of the controversy. It is, therefore, reasonable and sensible that interpleader, in discharge of its office to protect the fund, should also protect the stakeholder from vexatious and multiple litigation. In this context, the suits sought to be enjoined are squarely within the language of 28 U.S.C. § 2361 * * *.

But the present case is another matter. Here, an accident has happened. Thirty-five passengers or their representatives have claims which they wish to press against a variety of defendants: the bus company, its driver, the owner of the truck, and the truck driver. The circumstance that one of the prospective defendants happens to have an insurance policy is a fortuitous event which should not of itself shape the nature of the ensuing litigation. * * * [A]n insurance company whose maximum interest in the case cannot exceed $20,000 and who in fact asserts that it has no interest at all, should not be allowed to determine that dozens of tort plaintiffs must be compelled to press their claims—even those claims which are not against the insured and which in no event could be satisfied out of the meager insurance fund—in a single forum of the insurance company’s choosing. There is nothing in the statutory scheme, and very little in the judicial and academic commentary upon that scheme, which requires that the tail be allowed to wag the dog in this fashion.

State Farm’s interest in this case * * * receives full vindication when the court restrains claimants from seeking to enforce against the insurance company any judgment obtained against its insured, except in the interpleader proceeding itself. To the extent that the District Court sought to control claimants’ lawsuits against the insured and other alleged tortfeasors, it exceeded the powers granted to it by the statutory scheme.

We recognize, of course, that our view of interpleader means that it cannot be used to solve all the vexing problems of multiparty litigation arising out of a mass tort. But interpleader was never intended to perform such a function, to be an all-purpose “bill of peace.” Had it been so intended, careful provision would necessarily have been made to insure that a party with little or no interest in the outcome of a complex controversy should not strip truly interested parties of substantial rights—such as the right to choose the forum in which to establish their claims, subject to generally applicable rules of jurisdiction, venue, service of process, removal, and change of venue. None of the legislative and academic sponsors of a modern federal interpleader device viewed their accomplishment as a “bill of peace,” capable of sweeping dozens of lawsuits out of the various state and federal courts in which they were brought and into a single interpleader proceeding. And only in two reported instances has a federal interpleader court sought to control the underlying litigation against alleged tortfeasors as opposed to the allocation of a fund among successful tort plaintiffs. See Commercial Union Ins. Co. of New York v. Adams, 231 F.Supp. 860 (D.C.S.D.Ind.1964) (where there was virtually no objection and where all of the basic tort suits would in any event have been prosecuted in the forum state), and Pan American Fire & Cas. Co. v. Revere * * *.

782

* * *

IV.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed * * *.

[JUSTICE DOUGLAS dissented on the ground that the litigants were not “claimants” to the fund as required by the Federal Interpleader Act. He pointed out that the insurance policy specifically provided that no action could be brought against the company until the insured’s obligation was determined. Furthermore, both California and Oregon law did not permit a direct action against the insurer until after final judgment against the insured. The dissent also took issue with the majority’s construction of the words “may claim” in the Interpleader Act.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In TREINIES v. SUNSHINE MINING CO., 308 U.S. 66, 60 S.Ct. 44, 84 L.Ed. 85 (1939), the Supreme Court held that a federal court could constitutionally assert jurisdiction under the Federal Interpleader Act despite the cocitizenship of the stakeholder and one of the claimants. In arriving at this conclusion, the Court said that the stakeholder’s “disinterestedness as between the claimants and as to the property in dispute” was demonstrated by his deposit of the fund in the court, and his discharge, which left the dispute to be ironed out between the “adverse claimants.” Id. at 72, 60 S.Ct. at 48, 84 L.Ed. at 90. Was it realistic for the Court to treat the stakeholder as a nominal party for diversity purposes?
2. In Tashire, on what basis did the Supreme Court decide that cocitizenship between adverse claimants does not destroy diversity jurisdiction? Would the result have been different had there been a lack of - diversity between State Farm and the named defendants and an absence of “complete diversity” among all of the claimants?

783

3. In Tashire, the Court concluded that an insurer may invoke statutory interpleader before claimants have reduced their insurance claims to judgment. However, the existence of the interpleader action was not a sufficient basis to stay all other actions involving claims of liability. According to the Court, what kinds of litigation would be appropriate for the interpleader-court to enjoin under 28 U.S.C. § 2361? Is this approach consistent with the Court’s view that interpleader is not “an all-purpose ‘bill of peace’ ”? Is Revere, p. 773, supra, at the margins of the court’s discretion to enjoin other actions? Do you agree that a stay would be appropriate when the fund is “the target of entire litigation”? See Buckeye State Mut. Ins. Co. v. Moens, 944 F.Supp.2d 678, 695 (N.D. Iowa 2013).

4.In GRIFFIN v. McCOACH, 313 U.S. 498, 61 S.Ct. 1023, 85 L.Ed. 1481 (1941), the Supreme Court held that in a statutory interpleader suit based on diversity jurisdiction a federal court is bound by the Erie doctrine to apply the conflicts rules of the state in which it sits. The case was decided on the same day as Klaxon, p. 517, supra. Yet, in certain statutory interpleader actions, the courts of the forum state might never have been able to hear a comparable case due to Fourteenth Amendment limitations on their personal jurisdiction. Should federal courts be able to develop their own conflicts rules when a federal act extends service of process beyond what is permitted a state by the Constitution? See Developments in the Law—Multiparty Litigation in the Federal Courts, 71 Harv.L.Rev. 877, 924–26 (1958). Are there any other arguments to suggest the inapplicability of Erie and Klaxon in statutory interpleader cases? Relatedly, can a federal court grant interpleader under Rule 22 when the state courts would deny interpleader because the stakeholder alleges a personal interest in the outcome of the case?

5.Consider the statement in Tashire that “our view of interpleader means that it cannot be used to solve all the vexing problems of multiparty litigation arising out of a mass tort.” 386 U.S. at 535, 87 S.Ct. at 1206, 18 L.Ed.2d at 278. How far does this limitation extend? Should it prohibit crossclaims between interpleader claimants, the assertion of an unrelated claim by a disinterested stakeholder against a claimant, and a counterclaim by a claimant against the stakeholder? In the case that follows, what are the barriers that impede the utility of the interpleader proceeding?

REPUBLIC OF THE PHILIPPINES v. PIMENTEL, 553 U.S. 851, 128 S.Ct. 2180, 171 L.Ed.2d 131 (2008). Merrill Lynch, the brokerage firm, held $35 million in a New York brokerage account owned by a Panamanian company, Arelma, that was controlled by Ferdinand Marcos, the former President of the Republic of the Philippines. Merrill Lynch brought a statutory interpleader action in federal court to determine ownership of the Arelma assets. Claimants included the Republic of the Philippines

784

(“Republic”); the Philippine Presidential Commission on Good Governance (“Commission”); a class of persons who had suffered human rights abuses during the Marcos regime (known as the “Pimentel class”) seeking to enforce a $2 billion judgment entered by a federal court in the United States; and other judgment creditors. On a parallel track in the Philippines, the Republic and the Commission sought a declaration from the Sandiganbayan, a court of special jurisdiction over corruption cases, that any assets Marcos had obtained through misuse of office were forfeited to the Republic.

The Republic and the Commission moved to dismiss the interpleader action, asserting that they were entitled to sovereign immunity and that under Rule 19 the action could not go forward in their absence because they were required parties. After complicated proceedings, the District Court awarded the assets to the Pimentel class, and the Ninth Circuit affirmed. The Supreme Court granted certiorari and held that the Republic and the Commission were required parties and that the interpleader action could not proceed without them, ordering that the action be dismissed.

No party contested that Rule 19(a) applied to the case. The Republic and the Commission were considered required because “their interests in the subject matter” were not protected if they were not present as parties. Id. at 864, 128 S.Ct. at 2189, 171 L.Ed.2d at 144 (internal citation omitted). The harder question was whether the case could go forward in their absence under Rule 19(b). On this point, the Supreme Court held that the Court of Appeals committed reversible error by giving insufficient weight to the absentees’ assertion of sovereign immunity. The absentees would suffer prejudice to their sovereign status, which gave them, among other things, a “unique interest” in resolving ownership of the contested assets “and in determining if, and how, the assets should be used to compensate those persons who suffered grievous injury.” Id. at 866, 128 S.Ct. at 2190, 171 L.Ed.2d at 145. In the Court’s view, the absentees’ comity interest in using Philippine courts to resolve the disputed claims offset any interest of the Pimentel class in recovering damages or any international concerns in combating public corruption. Moreover, the use of an alternative remedy could not lessen the prejudice to the absentees under Rule 19(b)(2)—no alternative remedies had “been proposed * * * or appear[ed] to be available.” Id. at 870, 128 Sup.Ct. at 2192, 171 L.Ed.2d at 148. Nor would the judgment be adequate without the absentees under Rule 19(b)(3). On this factor, the Court explained, the Ninth Circuit erred by equating adequacy with “satisfaction of the Pimentel class’ claims.” To the contrary, adequacy referred to the “ ‘public stake in settling disputes by wholes, whenever possible,’ ” and in this case the judgment would not be adequate because it would not bind the absentees. Finally, it was also error to focus on the Pimentel class claimants, and not Merrill Lynch, in determining “whether the plaintiff would have an adequate remedy if the [interpleader] action were dismissed for nonjoinder,” because Merrill Lynch as stakeholder was plaintiff in the interpleader action. See Rule 19(b)(4). In the Supreme Court’s view, dismissing the interpleader action would protect the stakeholder-bank by providing “an effective defense against piecemeal litigation and inconsistent, conflicting judgments”; moreover, any prejudice to the stakeholder was “outweighed by prejudice to the absent entities invoking sovereign immunity.” Id. at 872, 128 S.Ct. at 2193–94, 171 L.Ed.2d at 149 (internal citation omitted).

785

The Court concluded:
The Court of Appeals’ failure to give sufficient weight to the likely prejudice to the Republic and the Commission should the interpleader proceed in their absence would, in the usual course, warrant reversal and remand for further proceedings. In this case, however, that error and our further analysis under the additional provisions of Rule 19(b) lead us to conclude the action must be dismissed. This leaves the Pimentel class, which has waited for years now to be compensated for grievous wrongs, with no immediate way to recover on its judgment against Marcos. And it leaves * * * [the stakeholder] without a judgment.

The balance of equities may change in due course. One relevant change may occur if it appears that the Sandiganbayan [the Philippine court hearing the absentees' claim] cannot or will not issue its ruling within a reasonable period of time. Other changes could result when and if there is a ruling. * * * We do note that if [the stakeholder or other parties] * * * elect to commence further litigation in light of changed circumstances, it would not be necessary to file the new action in the District Court where this action arose, provided venue and jurisdictional requirements are satisfied elsewhere. The present action, however, may not proceed.

Id. at 872–73, 128 S.Ct. at 2194, 171 L.Ed.2d at 149–50. Justice Stevens dissented in part. He criticized the Court for taking “a more ‘inflexible approach’ ” to the question of mandatory parties than required by Rule 19 and for ignoring the parties’ interest “in the prompt resolution” of their claims. Id. at 879, 128 S.Ct. at 2197, 171 L.Ed.2d at 153.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Sovereign immunity is a doctrine that insulates the government from suit unless it gives it consent. The immunity of a foreign government to suit in courts in the United States is governed by the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, codified at 28 U.S.C. §§ 1330, 1332, 1391(f), 1441(d), and 1602–11. A course in Constitutional Law or Federal Courts typically covers the doctrine in detail.
2. The Court’s decision in Pimentel has been singled out as an “obvious” example of “dismal reasoning.” Ides, Foreword: A Critical Appraisal of the Supreme Court’s Decision in J. McIntyre Machinery, Ltd. v. Nicastro, 45 Loy.L.A.L.Rev. 341, 386 n.175 (2012). What is the basis for that criticism? Did the Pimentel Court misapprehend the requirements of interpleader and, in particular, of the “required” party condition under Rule 19? Was it appropriate for the interpleader device and its policy of litigation “by wholes” to defeat the human rights victims’ right to relief? Or was the problem that the substantive law of sovereign immunity impeded the utility of the procedure? See Issacharoff, Private Claims, Aggregate Rights, 2008 Sup.Ct.Rev. 183.
3. Commentators note that a “near-categorical” rule has developed that an entire case is to be dismissed under Rule 19 when a party considered necessary cannot be joined because of sovereign immunity. For example, in WICHITA & AFFILIATED TRIBES OF OKLAHOMA v. HODEL, 788 F.2d 765, 776 (D.C. Cir. 1986), the court determined that it was impossible to shape the relief as to avoid prejudice to absent parties, in this case, Indian tribes invoking sovereign immunity. See Fletcher, The Comparative Rights of Indispensable Sovereigns, 40 Gonz.L.Rev. 1 (2005). Should dismissal ever be appropriate when no alternative forum exists to provide adequate relief? See Florey, Making Sovereigns Indispensable: Pimentel and the Evolution of Rule 19, 58 UCLA L.Rev. 667 (2011); Andre, Compulsory (Mis)joinder: The Untenable Intersection of Sovereign Immunity and Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19, 60 Emory L.J. 1157 (2011). Should the public importance of the litigation be a factor in determining whether the suit ought to be dismissed? See Tobias, Rule 19 and the Public Rights Exception to Party Joinder, 65 N.C.L.Rev. 745 (1987).

G. INTERVENTION

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 24 in the Supplement.

Federal Rule 24, which governs intervention, differs from the joinder rules so far studied in an important respect: The rule allows a stranger to a lawsuit to interject itself into the action. A noted commentator has explained:

A civil action, in the Anglo-American tradition, has usually been thought of as a private controversy between plaintiff and defendant. Although outsiders were sometimes permitted to take part in order to protect their interests, they were more often regarded by the court and the parties as undesired intermeddlers who would be required to protect themselves—if they could—by bringing a lawsuit of their own. Indeed after courts of admiralty, and later of equity, recognized intervention as a proper means of asserting an interest in property in the custody of the court, there remained considerable uncertainty for many years about whether, and to what extent, intervention could be permitted in a routine action at law.

But in recent decades the increased complexity of litigation and the growing number of cases involving the public interest or a wide variety of private interests have been accompanied by a steady change in the attitude toward intervention. Both intervention of right and permissive intervention were given new vitality in the federal system by adoption of [R]ule 24 of the Federal Rules * * * in 1938, and subsequent amendments have broadened their scope.

Shapiro, Some Thoughts on Intervention Before Courts, Agencies, and Arbitrators, 81 Harv.L.Rev. 721, 721–22 (1968) (footnotes omitted); see 7C Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1901 (3d ed.).

SMUCK v. HOBSON

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, 1969.
132 U.S.App.D.C. 372, 408 F.2d 175.

BAZELON, CHIEF JUDGE.

[In Hobson v. Hansen, 269 F.Supp. 401 (D.D.C.1967), a class action brought on behalf of Black and poor children, the court found that plaintiffs were being denied their constitutional rights to equal educational opportunities because the District of Columbia schools were being operated on a basis that was racially and economically discriminatory. The Board of Education voted not to appeal and ordered Dr. Carl Hansen, the Superintendent of Schools, not to appeal. Nonetheless, Dr. Hansen and Carl Smuck, one of the dissenting Board members, filed notices of appeal. In addition, motions to intervene were made in the district court and in the court of appeals by Dr. Hansen and twenty parents who said they “dissent from” the court’s decision. The court of appeals decided to hold the direct appeals in abeyance and remanded the intervention motions for a hearing. The district court granted the motions to intervene, even though neither Hansen nor the parents had shown a substantial interest that could be protected only through intervention, “in order to give the Court of Appeals an opportunity to pass on the intervention questions raised here, and the questions to be raised by the appeal on the merits * * *.” Hobson v. Hansen, 44 F.R.D. 18, 33 (D.D.C.1968). The court of appeals then considered the matter en banc.]

* * * These appeals challenge the findings of the trial court that the Board of Education has in a variety of ways violated the Constitution in administering the District of Columbia schools. Among the facts that distinguish this case from the normal grist of appellate courts is the absence of the Board of Education as an appellant. Instead, the would-be appellants are Dr. Carl F. Hansen, the resigned superintendent of District schools, who appeals in his former official capacity and as an individual; Carl C. Smuck, a member of the Board of Education, who appeals in that capacity; and the parents of certain school children who have attempted to intervene in order to register on appeal their “dissent” from the order below.

788

* * * Whatever standing he might have possessed to appeal as a named defendant in the original suit * * * disappeared when Dr. Hansen left his official position. Presumably because he was aware of this, he subsequently moved to intervene under [Federal] Rule 24(a) * * * in order to appeal as an individual. * * * He does not claim that a reversal or modification of the order by this Court would make his return to office likely. Consequently, the supposed impact of the decision upon his tenure is irrelevant insofar as an appeal is concerned, since a reversal would have no effect. Dr. Hansen thus has no “interest relating to the property or transaction which is the subject of the action” sufficient for Rule 24(a), and intervention is therefore unwarranted.

We also find that Mr. Smuck has no appealable interest as a member of the Board of Education. While he was in that capacity a named defendant, the Board of Education was undeniably the principal figure and could have been sued alone as a collective entity. Appellant Smuck had a fair opportunity to participate in its defense, and in the decision not to appeal. Having done so, he has no separate interest as an individual in the litigation. The order directs the board to take certain actions. But since its decisions are made by vote as a collective whole, there is no apparent way in which Smuck as an individual could violate the decree and thereby become subject to enforcement proceedings.

The motion to intervene by the parents presents a more difficult problem requiring a correspondingly more detailed examination of the requirements for intervention of right.

* * *

The phrasing of Rule 24(a)(2) as amended parallels that of Rule 19(a)(2)^d concerning joinder. But the fact that the two rules are entwined does not imply that an “interest” for the purpose of one is precisely the same as for the other. The occasions upon which a petitioner should be allowed to intervene under Rule 24 are not necessarily limited to those situations when the trial court should compel him to become a party under Rule 19. And while the division of Rule 24(a) and (b) into “Intervention of Right” and “Permissible Intervention” might superficially suggest that only the latter involves an exercise of discretion by the court, the contrary is clearly the case.

789

The effort to extract substance from the conclusory phrase “interest” or “legally protectable interest” is of limited promise. Parents unquestionably have a sufficient “interest” in the education of their children to justify the initiation of a lawsuit in appropriate circumstances, as indeed was the case for the plaintiff-appellee parents here. But in the context of intervention the question is not whether a lawsuit should be begun, but whether already initiated litigation should be extended to include additional parties. The 1966 amendments to Rule 24(a) have facilitated this, the true inquiry, by eliminating the temptation or need for tangential expeditions in search of “property” or someone “bound by a judgment.” It would be unfortunate to allow the inquiry to be led once again astray by a myopic fixation upon “interest.” Rather, as Judge Leventhal recently concluded for this Court, “[A] more instructive approach is to let our construction be guided by the policies behind the ‘interest’ requirement. * * * [T]he ‘interest’ test is primarily a practical guide to disposing of lawsuits by involving as many apparently concerned persons as is compatible with efficiency and due process.”¹²

The decision whether intervention of right is warranted thus involves an accommodation between two potentially conflicting goals: to achieve judicial economies of scale by resolving related issues in a single lawsuit, and to prevent the single lawsuit from becoming fruitlessly complex or unending. Since this task will depend upon the contours of the particular controversy, general rules and past decisions cannot provide uniformly dependable guides. The Supreme Court, in its only full-dress examination of Rule 24(a) since the 1966 amendments, found that a gas distributor was entitled to intervention of right although its only “interest” was the economic harm it claimed would follow from an allegedly inadequate plan for divestiture approved by the Government in an antitrust proceeding.¹⁴ While conceding that the Court’s opinion granting intervention in Cascade Natural Gas Corp. v. El Paso Natural Gas Co. “is certainly susceptible of a very broad reading,” the trial judge here would distinguish the decision on the ground that the petitioner “did show a strong direct economic interest, for the new company [to be created by divestiture] would be its sole supplier.” Yet while it is undoubtedly true that “Cascade should not be read as a carte blanche for intervention by anyone at any time,” there is no apparent reason why an “economic interest” should always be necessary to justify intervention. The goal of “disposing of lawsuits by involving as many apparently concerned persons as is compatible with efficiency and due process” may in certain circumstances be met by allowing parents whose only “interest” is the education of their children to intervene. In determining whether such circumstances are present, the first requirement of Rule 24(a)(2), that of an “interest” in the transaction, may be a less useful point of departure than the second and third requirements, that the applicant may be impeded in protecting his interest by the action and that his interest is not adequately represented by others.

790

This does not imply that the need for an “interest” in the controversy should or can be read out of the rule. But the requirement should be viewed as a prerequisite rather than relied upon as a determinative criterion for intervention. If barriers are needed to limit extension of the right to intervene, the criteria of practical harm to the applicant and the adequacy of representation by others are better suited to the task. If those requirements are met, the nature of his “interest” may play a role in determining the sort of intervention which should be allowed—whether, for example, he should be permitted to contest all issues, and whether he should enjoy all the prerogatives of a party litigant.

Both courts and legislatures have recognized as appropriate the concern for their children’s welfare which the parents here seek to protect by intervention. While the artificiality of an appeal without the Board of Education cannot be ignored, neither can the importance of the constitutional issues decided below. The relevance of substantial and unsettled questions of law has been recognized in allowing intervention to perfect an appeal. And this Court has noted repeatedly, “obviously tailored to fit ordinary civil litigation, [the provisions of Rule 24] require other than literal application in atypical cases.”²⁰ We conclude that the interests asserted by the intervenors are sufficient to justify an examination of whether the two remaining requirements for intervention are met.

* * *

[The court then determined that the disposition of the action might impair the applicants’ ability to protect their interests if they were not allowed to intervene.]

The remaining requirement for intervention is that the applicant not be adequately represented by others. No question is raised here but that the Board of Education adequately represented the intervenors at the trial below; the issue rather is whether the parents were adequately represented by the school board’s decision not to appeal. The presumed good faith of the board in reaching this decision is not conclusive. * * * As the conditional wording of Rule 24(a)(2) suggests in permitting intervention “unless the applicant’s interest is adequately represented by existing parties,” “the burden [is] on those opposing intervention to show the adequacy of the existing representation.” In this case, the interests of the parents who wish to intervene in order to appeal do not coincide with those of the Board of Education. The school board represents all parents within the District. The intervening appellants may have more parochial interests centering upon the education of their own children. While they cannot of course ask the Board to favor their children unconstitutionally at the expense of others, they like other parents can seek the adoption of policies beneficial to their own children. Moreover, considerations of publicity, cost, and delay may not have the same weight for the parents as for the school board in the context of a decision to appeal. And the Board of Education, buffeted as it like other school boards is by conflicting public demands, may possibly have less interest in preserving its own untrammelled discretion than do the parents. It is not necessary to accuse the board of bad faith in deciding not to appeal or of a lack of vigor in defending the suit below in order to recognize that a restrictive court order may be a not wholly unwelcome haven.

791

* * *

Our holding that the appellants would be practically disadvantaged by a decision without appeal in this case and that they are not otherwise adequately represented necessitates a closer scrutiny of the precise nature of their interest and the scope of intervention that should accordingly be granted. The parents who seek to appeal do not come before this court to protect the good name of the Board of Education. Their interest is not to protect the board, or Dr. Hansen, from an unfair finding. Their asserted interest is rather the freedom of the school board—and particularly the new school board recently elected—to exercise the broadest discretion constitutionally permissible in deciding upon educational policies. Since this is so, their interest extends only to those parts of the order which can fairly be said to impose restraints upon the Board of Education. And because the school board is not a party to this appeal, review should be limited to those features of the order which limit the discretion of the old or new board.

* * *

[A partial concurring opinion by JUDGE MCGOWAN and dissenting opinions by JUDGES DANAHER and BURGER are omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Inadequate representation has been found when the applicant’s interests are not represented at all, see Purnell v. City of Akron, 925 F.2d 941 (6th Cir. 1991); when the interests of the applicant are antagonistic to those of the attorney who supposedly represents the interests of the applicant, see United States v. C.M. Lane Lifeboat Co., 25 F.Supp. 410 (E.D.N.Y. 1938), but see Stadin v. Union Elec. Co., 309 F.2d 912 (8th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 373 U.S. 915, 83 S.Ct. 1298, 10 L.Ed.2d 415 (1963) (minority stockholder was not entitled to intervention as of right when there was a showing of difference of opinion as to how the litigation should be conducted but no showing of plaintiff’s failure in its duty to its shareholders); and when there is collusion between the representative and the adverse parties, see Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 542 F.2d 214 (4th Cir. 1976).

792

In NATURAL RESOURCES DEFENSE COUNCIL, INC. v. NEW YORK STATE DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENTAL CONSERVATION, 834 F.2d 60 (2d Cir. 1987), the American Petroleum Institute (API) appealed a district court order denying its motion to intervene in a “citizen suit” brought by the Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc. and other groups concerned with air pollution against the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation, the United States Environmental Protection Agency, and the administrators of both agencies. The Court of Appeals affirmed:

* * * API contends that in this suit it too has an interest different from that of New York. API’s interest, it urges, is economic, whereas the State’s interest is governmental.

We think API misperceives the concept of an interest “adequately represented” within the meaning of Rule 24. A putative intervenor does not have an interest not adequately represented by a party to a lawsuit simply because it has a motive to litigate that is different from the motive of an existing party. So long as the party has demonstrated sufficient motivation to litigate vigorously and to present all colorable contentions, a district judge does not exceed the bounds of discretion by concluding that the interests of the intervenor are adequately represented.

Id. at 61–62. Is the decision consistent with Smuck? See Vreeland, Public Interest Groups, Public Law Litigation, and Federal Rule 24(a), 57 U.Chi.L.Rev. 279 (1990).

2. In TRBOVICH v. UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA, 404 U.S. 528, 928 S.Ct. 630, 30 L.Ed.2d 686 (1972), a union member who filed an initial complaint with the Secretary of Labor wished to intervene in a suit brought by the Secretary under the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 to set aside the election of officers of the union. The Act made suit by the Secretary the exclusive post-election remedy for violation of the statute, and the Court held that it did not bar intervention by a union member, provided the intervenor was limited to the claims of illegality presented by the Secretary’s complaint. Moreover, the Court held that Rule 24(a)(2) is satisfied “if the applicant shows that representation of his interest ‘may be’ inadequate, and the burden of making that showing should be treated as minimal.” Id. at 538 n.10, 928 S.Ct. at 636 n.10, 30 L.Ed.2d at 694 n.10. The applicant met this burden by showing that “[e]ven if the Secretary is performing his duties, broadly conceived, as well as can be expected, the union member may have a valid complaint about the performance of ‘his lawyer.’ ” Id. at 539, 928 S.Ct. at 637, 30 L.Ed.2d at 695.

793

3. Are there circumstances when intervention by a private litigant might undermine regulatory goals or create unnecessary expense? See Black, Trashing the Presumption: Intervention on the Side of the Government, 39 Env’tl.L. 481 (2009). Could this concern explain why some courts, despite the “minimal burden standard,” require the proposed intervenor to make a “strong showing” of inadequate representation by the government? See United States v. Hooker Chemicals & Plastics Corp., 749 F.2d 968 (2d Cir. 1984) (Friendly, J.). Even if intervention is granted, isn’t there the possibility that the interests of private litigants will be sidelined in the government’s suit? See Holley, Narrative Highground: The Failure of Intervention as a Procedural Device in Affirmative Action Litigation, 54 Case W.Res.L.Rev. 103 (2003).

4. The United States has an unconditional right to intervene in any federal court action challenging the constitutionality of an act of Congress. See 28 U.S.C. § 2403(a). Section 2403(b) extends the intervention right to states in actions involving the constitutionality of state statutes. In addition, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000h–2, provides the federal government an unconditional right to intervene in a suit seeking relief against a denial of equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment on account of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. How might the intervention of the United States affect the interests of the original litigants?

5. Both Rule 24(a) and Rule 24(b) require that an application to intervene be “timely.” As the court noted in Smuck, intervention after judgment will be allowed only in unique situations. The assumption is that allowing intervention after judgment “will either (1) prejudice the rights of the existing parties to the litigation or (2) substantially interfere with the orderly processes of the court.” McDonald v. E.J. Lavino Co., 430 F.2d 1065, 1072 (5th Cir. 1970). What factors might demonstrate exceptional circumstances justifying a delay in moving to intervene? Should a different standard be used for deciding the timeliness of motions to intervene permissively as opposed to motions to intervene as of right? Sullivan, Enforcement of Government Antitrust Decrees by Private Parties: Third Party Beneficiary Rights and Intervenor Status, 123 U.Pa.L.Rev. 822, 873–92 (1975), explores the possibility of post-judgment intervention in government antitrust suits in order to enforce the judgment.

6.Does intervention require an independent basis for subject-matter jurisdiction? Before Congress enacted 28 U.S.C. § 1367, an independent jurisdictional basis generally was not required for intervention as of right, but was required for permissive actions. Compare Lenz v. Wagner, 240 F.2d 666 (5th Cir. 1957), with Reedsburg Bank v. Apollo, 508 F.2d 995 (7th Cir. 1975). How does the codification of supplemental jurisdiction affect the analysis? May supplemental jurisdiction be exercised under 28 U.S.C. § 1367(b) over a non-diverse applicant? See 7C Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1917 (3d ed.). Relatedly, in TOWN OF CHESTER, N.Y. v. LAROE

794

ESTATES, INC., 137 S.Ct. 1645, 1651, 198 L.Ed.2d 64, 71 (2017), the Supreme Court held that a party seeking to intervene as of right must have standing “when it seeks additional relief beyond that which the plaintiff requests.”

7.Rule 24 treats intervention as a permissive joinder device, so that the “outsider” to the litigation has the option of joining the lawsuit or not. Are there circumstances under which intervention ought to be compulsory? The Supreme Court answered no in MARTIN v. WILKS, 490 U.S. 755, 109 S.Ct. 2180, 104 L.Ed.2d 835 (1989). The case involved a challenge by white firefighters to hiring decisions taken by the City of Birmingham pursuant to consent decrees that had been entered in federal civil rights suits on behalf of Black individuals who allegedly had been denied employment or promotion on the basis of their race. The district court dismissed the white firefighters’ lawsuit on the ground, among others, that plaintiffs had not intervened in the prior cases and therefore could not collaterally challenge the consent decrees. The Supreme Court, five-to-four, held that “[k]nowledge of a lawsuit” does not obligate a party to intervene in a lawsuit; “a party seeking a judgment binding on another cannot obligate that person to intervene; he must be joined.” Id. at 763–65, 109 S.Ct. at 2185–86, 104 L.Ed.2d at 846–47. Justice Stevens, in a dissent, underscored that “in complex litigation this Court has squarely held that a sideline-sitter may be bound as firmly as an actual party if he had adequate notice and a fair opportunity to intervene and if the judicial interest in finality is sufficiently strong.” Id. at 793, 109 S.Ct. at 2200–01, 104 L.Ed.2d at 863. Why did Rule 19 not require the joinder of the white firefighters in the earlier discrimination suits? Are you persuaded that permissive party-initiated joinder is a better approach than a rule of mandatory intervention? See Brunet, The Triumph of Efficiency and Discretion Over Competing Complex Litigation Policies, 10 Rev.Litig. 273 (1991).

H. JOINDER, CONSOLIDATION, AND “AGGREGATE” LITIGATION

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 42 and 28 U.S.C. § 1407 in the Supplement.

The Federal Rules eliminated many of the historical limitations on the joinder of parties and claims. Today, hundreds and even thousands of parties and claims can be bundled together in a single lawsuit. Rule 42 encourages this trend toward aggregation and complexity by allowing for the consolidation of actions. Rule 42(a) permits a district judge to consolidate actions pending before the court when they involve common questions of law or fact. The court may consolidate the actions for all purposes, or limited pretrial proceedings; consolidation turns on the law and facts that the lawsuits share, and does not require an identity of parties.

795

Generally, actions consolidated under Rule 42 retain their separate identity. In a decision that predates the adoption of Rule 42, the Supreme Court stated that consolidation “does not merge the suits into a single cause or change the rights of the parties, or make those who are parties in one suit parties in another,” but rather is “permitted as a matter of convenience and economy in administration.” JOHNSON v. MANHATTAN RY. CO., 289 U.S. 479, 496–97, 53 S.Ct. 721, 727, 77 L.Ed. 1331, 1345 (1932). In HALL v. HALL, 138 S.Ct. 1118, 200 L.Ed.2d 399 (2018), the Court held that consolidated cases retain their independence for purposes of finality and appealability. The court retains authority to order a separate trial of one or more separate issues. See Rule 42(b).

Consolidation under Rule 42 is limited to actions pending in the same district. However, cases that are pending in different districts that share common questions of fact may be consolidated by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation (“MDL”) and transferred to a single district, as provided for under 28 U.S.C. § 1407, see p. 417, supra. As the Supreme Court has explained:

 Enacted in 1968 in response to a growing number of complex but related cases filed in multiple districts, § 1407 authorizes the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation (JPML) to transfer civil actions  in order to “promote the just and efficient conduct of such actions.” § 1407(a); see H.R.Rep. No. 1130, 90th Cong., 2d Sess., 2 (1968) (§ 1407 codified procedures used in the early 1960’s to resolve more than 1,800 separate actions filed against electrical equipment manufacturers in 33 District Courts, all of the actions seeking damages for antitrust law violations).

Transfer under § 1407 aims to “eliminate duplication in discovery, avoid conflicting rulings and schedules, reduce litigation cost, and save the time and effort of the parties, the attorneys, the witnesses, and the courts.” Manual for Complex Litigation § 20.131, p. 220 (4th ed. 2004). “Each action” transferred pursuant to § 1407, the provision instructs, “shall be remanded by the panel at or before the conclusion of . . . pretrial proceedings to the district from which it was transferred unless it shall have been previously terminated.” § 1407(a).

GELBOIM v. BANK OF AMERICA CORP., 574 U.S. 405, 410, 135 S.Ct. 897, 903, 190 L.Ed.2d 789, 795 (2015). In practice, only about three percent of MDL cases are remanded to the transferor court; the overwhelming majority are resolved by settlement or summary judgment. See Burch, Remanding Multidistrict Litigation, 75 La.L.Rev. 399, 399–402 (2014). MDL suits now command a great deal of federal judicial attention—since 1968, the Panel has decided millions of individual claims, see Redish & Karaba, One Size Doesn’t Fit All: Multidistrict Litigation, Due Process, and the Dangers of Procedural Collectivism, 95 B.U.L.Rev. 109 (2015), and by one count MDL cases comprise 39 percent of open cases on the federal docket, see Burch, Monopolies in Multidistrict Litigation, 70 Vand.L.Rev. 67, 72 (2017).

796

The extensive use of Section 1407 consolidation for pretrial proceedings has led to profound changes in federal court practice that have been called a “revolution in civil procedure.” Gluck & Burch, MDL Revolution, 96 N.Y.U. L.Rev. 1, 3 (2021). MDL judges are said to have “an outsized role” given the scope of their law-making discretion and authority to create rules of practice for transferred cases. Gluck, Unorthodox Civil Procedure: Modern Multidistrict Litigation’s Place in the Textbook Understandings of Procedure, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1669 (2017). This discretion extends to the appointment of lead counsel for the MDL-consolidated suit and has led to the emergence of a specialized bar for actions before the Panel and transferee courts. See Coleman, One Percent Procedure, 91 Wash.L.Rev. 1005 (2016). Is there a danger, as Professor Miller has suggested, of “mega-cases” involving “so much money on the table that professional judgment and client loyalty are sometimes compromised”? See Miller, What Are Courts For? Have We Forsaken the Procedural Gold Standard?, 78 La.L.Rev. 739, 742–43 (2018).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In 1994, the American Law Institute completed and published its Complex Litigation Project, which contains a study and recommendations for handling large-scale cases in the federal system. Fifteen years later, the ALI adopted the Principles of the Law of Aggregate Litigation, which covers procedures for resolving multiparty disputes that “combine claims or defenses held by many persons for unified resolution.” See American Law Institute, Principles of the Law of Aggregate Litig. § 1.02, cmt. a (2010). Adoption of the ALI Principles signaled what one commentator called “the normalization of aggregation” and further erosion of the day-in-court ideal. See Resnik, Compared to What?: ALI Aggregation and the Shifting Contours of Due Process and of Lawyers’ Powers, 79 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 628, 633 (2011).

2. As civil actions become ever larger and more complex, some courts have found it important to streamline litigation into “smaller pieces” through procedures like putting cases on “fast tracks” or trying “bellwether” cases, and then having the decision in one or two cases drive the settlement of the others. See Cavanagh, Issue Preclusion in Complex Litigation, 29 Rev.Litig. 859 (2010). At least one commentator predicts that “disaggregation” will be the driver of procedural innovation. See Dodge, Disaggregative Mechanisms: Mass Claims Resolution Without Class Actions, 63 Emory L.J. 1253 (2014).

797

3. State courts have joinder and consolidation rules that are similar to those of the federal system. However, cases pending in different states cannot be consolidated in the court of one state. A case may be removed to federal court and then undergo transfer and consolidation, but only if subject-matter jurisdiction is available. See Glover, Mass Litigation Governance in the Post-Class Action Era: The Problems and Promise of Non-Removable State Actions in Multi-District Litigation, 6 J. Tort L. 3 (2014).

4. The increasing tendency to bundle claims and parties together in a single lawsuit is not unique to the United States. European and English judicial systems likewise now utilize forms of aggregate litigation that range from the English group litigation orders, to the Dutch collective settlement action, to the German model case in securities litigation. For a catalogue of aggregate procedures used abroad, see Chase, Hershkoff, Silberman, Sorabji, Stürner, Taniguchi & Varano, Civil Litigation in Comparative Context 504–62 (Chase & Hershkoff, eds., 2d ed. 2017).

* Of the Southern District of New York, sitting by designation.

^aA grievance under a collective bargaining agreement claiming discrimination is referred to as a “6a grievance.”

¹¹218 F.Supp. 802, 805–806, quoted at 365 F.2d, at 805.

^bIn 2007, this provision was renumbered as Rule 14(a)(1).

³⁶*American Indemnity Co. v. Hale*, D.C.W.D.Mo., 71 F.Supp. 529, 533–534.

^cThe language of Rule 22 has been altered without any substantive change.

^dThe rule has been renumbered as Rule 19(a)(1)(B).

¹²*Nuesse v. Camp*, 128 U.S.App.D.C. 172, 385 F.2d 694, 700 (1967).

¹⁴*Cascade Natural Gas Corp. v. El Paso Natural Gas Co.*, 386 U.S. 129, 132–136, 87 S.Ct. 932, 17 L.Ed.2d 814 (1967).

²⁰*Textile Workers Union, etc. v. Allendale Co.*, 96 U.S.App.D.C. 401, 403, 226 F.2d 765, 767 (1955) (en banc), cert. denied, Allendale Co. v. Mitchell, 351 U.S. 909, 76 S.Ct. 699, 100 L.Ed. 1444 (1956) * * *.

CHAPTER 10

CLASS ACTIONS

This chapter introduces the complex yet fascinating topic of the class action, probably the most innovative but controversial feature of United States civil procedure. The materials examine the history and justification for the class action, the operation of Federal Rule 23, the emergence of the settlement class, and the policy questions that the practice raises. For many years the class action was viewed as a uniquely American device, unlikely to take root abroad. However, forms of collective action increasingly are being adopted outside the United States, influenced by, but not fully embracing, the American form. As you read these materials, consider whether the class action enhances access to justice given the scope of mass harms in contemporary life, or whether the practice cuts too deeply into the individualistic values of the adversarial system.

A. OVERVIEW AND THEMES

The class action allows a named plaintiff to litigate claims and defenses of similarly situated persons in a single lawsuit, and the resulting judgment binds all of the “unnamed” parties who are members of the class. In some sense, the class action is simply another form of joinder device; the procedure aggregates claims and defenses that the named representative and class members share in common, but which any individual litigant alone might not be able to pursue because of the expense and inconvenience of litigation. However, unlike other joinder devices, all of the parties in a class action do not appear in person before the court. Rather, the named “representative” acts as a proxy for strangers who do not initially know that a lawsuit has been filed, yet may be barred by the class action judgment from further litigation on their claims. The legitimacy of the class action turns on whether the named party will fully and fairly represent the interests of the absentee class members in the proceedings before the court. See Hutchinson, Class Actions: Joinder or Representational Device?, 1983 Sup. Ct. Rev. 459. The class action differs from other joinder devices in another important respect, as well: The use of the procedure gives rise to a new entity—the “class”—which did not exist prior to the litigation and which imposes new practical and ethical burdens on the parties, lawyers, and court. See Shapiro, Class Actions: The Class as Party and Client, 73 Notre Dame L.Rev. 913 (1998). Whether the class action is best viewed as a joinder or a representative device implicates all of the doctrines so far covered in this course, including subject-matter jurisdiction, personal jurisdiction, and venue, and material still to be studied—in particular, claim and issue preclusion. See Chapter 17, infra. The joinder and representative models of the class action often are in tension, and shifts in the Supreme Court’s interpretation of Federal Rule 23—and restrictions imposed on the rule’s operation—may reflect greater emphasis on one model rather than the other.

800

Rule 23 was substantially revised in 1966 and became a critical vehicle by which the victims of constitutional violations challenged racial and other forms of discrimination. Use of the rule, as Professor Miller has chronicled, quickly extended “to other constitutional and public policy contexts. These included the reapportionment of legislative bodies, free speech, prisoner rights, the environment, various governmental programs and benefits, due process and equal protection issues, even the legality of the Vietnam War.” Miller, Keynote Address: The American Class Action: From Birth to Maturity, 19 Theoretical Inq. in Law 1 (2018). In addition, lawyers enlisted the class action to redress injuries caused by mass torts—particularly, large-scale accidents and product liability suits. In some of these actions, individuals claimed significant monetary damages. But in others, the stakes for each absentee were small and given the costs of individual litigation, the injuries likely would have gone unremedied. In these cases, classwide relief was important because “[a]lthough each individual who [was] harmed [won] only a small amount, the public benefit [was] substantial. The costs of the large public harm [were] borne by the person or firm responsible for it, and incentives to commit future transgressions [were] removed.” Bronsteen & Fiss, The Class Action Rule, 78 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1419, 1419 (2003).

The class action has come to serve a public role by providing a private means for redressing broad-scale problems that Congress or the states may be unwilling or unable to address, or when the costs of private lawsuits are less than that of bureaucratic enforcement. In the process, the procedure has expanded democratic access, influenced policymaking, and secured compensation for injured parties. Rule 23 also has generated controversy about its legitimacy, scope, and effectiveness.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The class action can be traced to the English “bill of peace” utilized by the Courts of Chancery in the seventeenth century. The “bill” allowed an action to be brought by or against representative parties when (1) the number of persons involved was too large to permit joinder, (2) all the members of the group possessed a joint interest in the question being adjudicated, and (3) the named parties adequately represented the interests of those who were not present. If these three conditions were met, the judgment that ultimately was entered was binding on all the members of the represented group. See Yeazell, From Medieval Group Litigation to the Modern Class Action (1987).

2.The various state codes and Federal Equity Rules provided for class actions based upon the English procedure. Federal Rule 23, as adopted in 1938, made the class action available in both legal and equitable actions in the federal courts. The justification for the class action was associated with the increasing complexity yet routinization of social and market relations. As an early commentary explained:

Modern society seems increasingly to expose men [and all persons] to * * * group injuries for which individually they are in a poor position to seek legal redress, either because they do not know enough or because such redress is disproportionately expensive. If each is left to assert his rights alone if and when he can, there will at best be a random and fragmentary enforcement, if there is any at all. This result is not only unfortunate in the particular case, but it will operate seriously to impair the deterrent effect of the sanctions which underlie much contemporary law. The problem of fashioning an effective and inclusive group remedy is thus a major one.

Kalven & Rosenfield, The Contemporary Function of a Class Suit, 8 U.Chi.L.Rev. 684, 686 (1941).

3.The original Rule 23 attempted to describe when a class action was proper in a highly conceptualized way. Briefly, the categories were as follows: A “true” class action was involved when the class members possessed joint and common interests in the subject matter of the action; a “hybrid” class action was present when several claims to the same property were being litigated; and what was described as a “spurious” class action existed when persons possessing independent interests joined together in the suit. This structure proved to be confusing to apply and made the procedure less effective than was desirable.

4.In 1966, a completely rewritten Rule 23 was amended to substitute functional tests for the conceptual categories and to provide procedural guidance for the courts about handling class actions. The amendments made clear that a judgment in a class action is binding on all class members, except in those cases in which the right to opt-out of the lawsuit applies and has been exercised. The 1966 amendments generated increased use of the class action, particularly in public law cases seeking injunctive relief. They also spurred debates about the utility of the practice, especially in cases involving mass torts when the remedy sought was money damages. The extremes of that debate, summarized by Professor Miller about a decade after the 1966 amendments, persist today:

* * * Opinions regarding the effect of the revision range over an amazing gamut. Class action adherents would have us believe it is a panacea for a myriad of social ills, which deters unlawful conduct and compensates those injured by it. Catch phrases such as “therapeutic” or “prophylactic” and “[taking] care of the smaller guy” are frequently trumpeted. Its opponents have rallied around characterizations of the procedure as a form of “legalized blackmail” or a “Frankenstein Monster.” They also have charged widespread abuse of the rule by lawyers and litigants on both sides of the “v.,” including unprofessional practices relating to attorneys’ fees, “sweetheart” settlement deals, dilatory motion practice, harassing discovery, and misrepresentations to judges. Finally, some have questioned the wisdom of imposing the burdens of class actions on an already overtaxed federal judiciary. They assert that many Rule 23 cases are unmanageable and inordinately protracted by opposing counsel, creating a certain millstone or dinosaur character that diverts federal judges from matters more worthy of their energies.

802

* * *

Yet despite the attention that has been riveted on Rule 23, we have precious little empiric evidence as to how it actually has been functioning, in terms of either its alleged benefits or supposed blasphemies. Even if the negative effects of class actions were assumed, they would have to be balanced against the societal benefits derived from deterring socially proscribed conduct and providing small claim rectification—considerations that thus far have escaped measurement and perhaps always will.

Miller, Of Frankenstein Monsters and Shining Knights: Myth, Reality, and the “Class Action Problem,” 92 Harv.L.Rev. 664, 665 (1979).

5.Eight years after he wrote his Harvard Law Review article, Professor Miller served as the Reporter for a study of complex litigation for the American Law Institute. In it, he wrote:

Class actions have proven to be the most effective legal technique for avoiding piecemeal litigation and preserving legal resources. Nevertheless, the class action suit continues to be eyed with suspicion by many courts. In complex cases, the goals of the class action device have been frustrated by strict adherence to the requirements of Rule 23. Often, complex multiparty, multiforum cases are denied class action treatment. Certification of large scale tort action classes is rare. Courts deny certification based on decisions that the commonality of interest requirement is not satisfied and based on fear that the size of the class would make the litigation unwieldy and inefficient.

* * *

The usefulness of the class action device for future complex litigation raises two issues concerning the suitability of class actions to modern litigation needs. The first issue is whether the scope of the class action should be broadened to include more types of litigation. The second is whether courts should increase the frequency with which they certify mandatory classes. Presently, class actions are used relatively infrequently in many multiparty, multiforum litigation contexts. With some adjustments the class action device could be made a valuable litigation tool.

803

Am. Law Inst., Preliminary Study of Complex Litigation, Report, 61–70 (1987). The Preliminary Study was followed by a comprehensive exploration of the subject, which led to the American Law Institute’s formal approval of Complex Litigation: Statutory Recommendations and Analysis (1994).

6.In 1996, the Research Division of the Federal Judicial Center conducted an empirical study of Rule 23 proceedings in four federal districts. See Willging, Hooper & Niemic, An Empirical Analysis of Rule 23 to Address the Rulemaking Challenges, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 74 (1996). It was a surprise to some that the study found that not all applications of Rule 23 are difficult; indeed, there were a significant number of “routine” class actions, particularly in the securities and civil rights contexts. The study also seemed to demonstrate that attorney’s fees were not disproportionate to class recoveries. As with most civil litigation, class actions followed the general pattern of settlement in lieu of trial.

7.Since 1966, defendant groups have issued unabated calls for a radical revision of the rule. See Burbank & Farhang, Class Actions and the Counterrevolution Against Federal Litigation, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1495 (2017). Although Rule 23 underwent amendment in 1998, 2003, 2007, and 2009, it still retains the basic “architecture” of the 1966 version. However, the universe of class-action practice has become much more complicated since 1966. Parallel to Rule 23, Congress has created special rules for discrete kinds of claims, most notably the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, see p. 653, supra. In addition, Congress has carved out certain claims from the operation of Rule 23 (for example, those filed by a lawyer funded through the Legal Services Corporation) and shifted state law class actions into federal court relying on a concept of minimal diversity. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d). Moreover, the Supreme Court and a number of court of appeals decisions have restricted the application of Rule 23. See Klonoff, Class Actions Part II: A Respite from the Decline, 92 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 971, 972, 996 (2017). During this period, other forms of group actions, in particular, multidistrict litigation under 28 U.S.C. § 1407, see p. 417 and p. 794, supra, have emerged as complementary procedural devices to redress harms that involve multiple parties.

8.Significantly, 50 years after the 1966 amendments brought modern class action practice into being, the legal community continues to lack the “empiric” information that Professor Miller called for—or a consensus on the role of the class action in a society where harms are mass produced, litigation is expensive, and small claimants are pushed out of court and into arbitration:

More than three decades onwards from Professor Arthur Miller’s attempt to demolish the dueling depictions of Rule 23 class actions as “Frankenstein monsters” and “shining knights,” we still do not have sufficient data to know what the 1966 revision of Rule 23 effected. As I discuss further, assessing the character of class actions—are they monsters or knights?—presents challenging empirical problems. But the monster appellation connotes something large and out of control, which in turn suggests that the sheer number of class action filings should disturb us, regardless of their character. It seems odd, therefore, that we have gone so long without knowing how many class action filings there are.

Hensler, Happy 50th Anniversary, Rule 23! Shouldn’t We Know You Better After All This Time?, 165 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1599, 1604 (2017).

B. DUE PROCESS CONSIDERATIONS

HANSBERRY V. LEE
Supreme Court of the United States, 1940.
311 U.S. 32, 61 S.Ct. 115, 85 L.Ed. 22.

Certiorari to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois.

JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court.

[This suit was brought in an Illinois state court in 1937 on behalf of a class of landowners to enforce a racially restrictive covenant that covered properties on approximately 27 blocks in the Washington Park neighborhood of the City of Chicago. The covenant provided that it would not go into effect unless signed by the “owners of 95 per centum of the frontage” and filed with the office of the Recorder of Deeds of Cook County, Illinois, by December 31, 1928. Plaintiffs sought an injunction to block the sale of a restricted property to Hansberry, a Black man, as a breach of the covenant by an owner who had signed the agreement. Plaintiffs alleged that the validity of the covenant had been established in an earlier Illinois state court action holding that owners of 95 percent of the area’s street frontage had signed the agreement. In response, defendants pleaded that they were not bound by the earlier judgment because they had not been joined as parties to that suit and were not successors in interest or in privity with any of the parties to that action. Thus they argued it would be a denial of due process to hold them to the first decree.

The Illinois Circuit Court found that owners representing only about 54 percent of the frontage actually had signed the agreement and that the previous judgment rested on a “false and fraudulent” stipulation of the parties. Nevertheless, the court held that defendants were bound by the prior judgment on the issue of the covenant’s validity. The Supreme Court of Illinois affirmed. It found that although the stipulation was untrue it was not fraudulent or collusive. That court then went on to conclude that the first action had been a “class” or “representative” suit, that it was therefore binding on all the class members unless reversed or set aside on direct proceedings, that Hansberry and the persons who had sold the land to him were members of the class represented in the first action, and that consequently the defendants were bound by the decree in the prior suit.]

The question is whether the Supreme Court of Illinois, by its adjudication that petitioners in this case are bound by a judgment rendered in an earlier litigation to which they were not parties, has deprived them of the due process of law guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

* * *

* * * [W]hen the judgment of a state court, ascribing to the judgment of another court the binding force and effect of res judicata, is challenged for want of due process it becomes the duty of this Court to examine the course of procedure in both litigations to ascertain whether the litigant whose rights have thus been adjudicated has been afforded such notice and opportunity to be heard as are requisite to the due process which the Constitution prescribes. * * *

It is a principle of general application in Anglo-American jurisprudence that one is not bound by a judgment in personam in a litigation in which he is not designated as a party or to which he has not been made a party by service of process. Pennoyer v. Neff * * * [p. 79, supra]. A judgment rendered in such circumstances is not entitled to the full faith and credit which the Constitution and statute of the United States * * * prescribe * * * and judicial action enforcing it against the person or property of the absent party is not that due process which the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments requires. * * *

To these general rules there is a recognized exception that, to an extent not precisely defined by judicial opinion, the judgment in a “class” or “representative” suit, to which some members of the class are parties, may bind members of the class or those represented who were not made parties to it. * * *

The class suit was an invention of equity to enable it to proceed to a decree in suits where the number of those interested in the subject of the litigation is so great that their joinder as parties in conformity to the usual rules of procedure is impracticable. Courts are not infrequently called upon to proceed with causes in which the number of those interested in the litigation is so great as to make difficult or impossible the joinder of all because some are not within the jurisdiction or because their whereabouts is unknown or where if all were made parties to the suit its continued abatement by the death of some would prevent or unduly delay a decree. In such cases where the interests of those not joined are of the same class as the interests of those who are, and where it is considered that the latter fairly represent the former in the prosecution of the litigation of the issues in which all have a common interest, the court will proceed to a decree. * * *

806

It is evident that the considerations which may induce a court thus to proceed, despite a technical defect of parties, may differ from those which must be taken into account in determining whether the absent parties are bound by the decree or, if it is adjudged that they are, in ascertaining whether such an adjudication satisfies the requirements of due process and of full faith and credit. Nevertheless there is scope within the framework of the Constitution for holding in appropriate cases that a judgment rendered in a class suit is res judicata as to members of the class who are not formal parties to the suit. Here, as elsewhere, the Fourteenth Amendment does not compel state courts or legislatures to adopt any particular rule for establishing the conclusiveness of judgments in class suits; * * * nor does it compel the adoption of the particular rules thought by this court to be appropriate for the federal courts. With a proper regard for divergent local institutions and interests * * *, this Court is justified in saying that there has been a failure of due process only in those cases where it cannot be said that the procedure adopted, fairly insures the protection of the interests of absent parties who are to be bound by it. * * *

It is familiar doctrine of the federal courts that members of a class not present as parties to the litigation may be bound by the judgment where they are in fact adequately represented by parties who are present, or where they actually participate in the conduct of the litigation in which members of the class are present as parties * * * or where the interest of the members of the class, some of whom are present as parties, is joint, or where for any other reason the relationship between the parties present and those who are absent is such as legally to entitle the former to stand in judgment for the latter. * * *

In all such cases, * * * we may assume for present purposes that such procedure affords a protection to the parties who are represented though absent, which would satisfy the requirements of due process and full faith and credit. * * * Nor do we find it necessary for the decision of this case to say that, when the only circumstance defining the class is that the determination of the rights of its members turns upon a single issue of fact or law, a state could not constitutionally adopt a procedure whereby some of the members of the class could stand in judgment for all, provided that the procedure were so devised and applied as to insure that those present are of the same class as those absent and that the litigation is so conducted as to insure the full and fair consideration of the common issue. * * * We decide only that the procedure and the course of litigation sustained here by the plea of res judicata do not satisfy these requirements.

The restrictive agreement did not purport to create a joint obligation or liability. If valid and effective its promises were the several obligations of the signers and those claiming under them. The promises ran severally to every other signer. It is plain that in such circumstances all those alleged to be bound by the agreement would not constitute a single class in any litigation brought to enforce it. Those who sought to secure its benefits by enforcing it could not be said to be in the same class with or represent those whose interest was in resisting performance, for the agreement by its terms imposes obligations and confers rights on the owner of each plot of land who signs it. If those who thus seek to secure the benefits of the agreement were rightly regarded by the state Supreme Court as constituting a class, it is evident that those signers or their successors who are interested in challenging the validity of the agreement and resisting its performance are not of the same class in the sense that their interests are identical so that any group who had elected to enforce rights conferred by the agreement could be said to be acting in the interest of any others who were free to deny its obligation.

807

Because of the dual and potentially conflicting interests of those who are putative parties to the agreement in compelling or resisting its performance, it is impossible to say, solely because they are parties to it, that any two of them are of the same class. Nor without more, and with the due regard for the protection of the rights of absent parties which due process exacts, can some be permitted to stand in judgment for all.

It is one thing to say that some members of a class may represent other members in a litigation where the sole and common interest of the class in the litigation, is either to assert a common right or to challenge an asserted obligation. * * * It is quite another to hold that all those who are free alternatively either to assert rights or to challenge them are of a single class, so that any group, merely because it is of the class so constituted, may be deemed adequately to represent any others of the class in litigating their interests in either alternative. Such a selection of representatives for purposes of litigation, whose substantial interests are not necessarily or even probably the same as those whom they are deemed to represent, does not afford that protection to absent parties which due process requires. The doctrine of representation of absent parties in a class suit has not hitherto been thought to go so far. * * * Apart from the opportunities it would afford for the fraudulent and collusive sacrifice of the rights of absent parties, we think that the representation in this case no more satisfies the requirements of due process than a trial by a judicial officer who is in such situation that he may have an interest in the outcome of the litigation in conflict with that of the litigants. * * *

The plaintiffs in the [first] case sought to compel performance of the agreement in behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated. They did not designate the defendants in the suit as a class or seek any injunction or other relief against others than the named defendants, and the decree which was entered did not purport to bind others. In seeking to enforce the agreement the plaintiffs in that suit were not representing the petitioners here whose substantial interest is in resisting performance. The defendants in the first suit were not treated by the pleadings or decree as representing others or as foreclosing by their defense the rights of others, and even though nominal defendants, it does not appear that their interest in defeating the contract outweighed their interest in establishing its validity. For a court in this situation to ascribe to either the plaintiffs or defendants the performance of such functions on behalf of petitioners here, is to attribute to them a power that it cannot be said that they had assumed to exercise, and a responsibility which, in view of their dual interests it does not appear that they could rightly discharge.

808

Reversed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Hansberry is an important decision about due process and the legitimacy of the class action. The case is equally important for its substantive contribution to civil rights and racial equality. The use of racially restrictive covenants became widespread after the Supreme Court’s decision in Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60, 38 S.Ct. 16, 62 L.Ed. 149 (1917), which struck down a city’s racially restrictive zoning ordinance as a violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. White property owners then turned to covenants—considered a form of private ordering free of constitutional limitations, unlike public zoning laws—to circumvent Buchanan. The lawfulness of racially restrictive covenants, however, continued to be challenged in the lower courts. Although ultimately decided on procedural grounds, Hansberry also presented to the Supreme Court the question whether judicial enforcement of a racially restrictive covenant violated the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court finally reached that question several years later and held that enforcement of those covenants was indeed unconstitutional. See Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 68 S.Ct. 836, 92 L.Ed. 1161 (1948). For background on racially restrictive covenants and the legal challenges to them, see Brooks & Rose, Saving the Neighborhood: Racially Restrictive Covenants, Law, and Social Norms (2013), and Long & Johnson, People v. Property: Race Restrictive Covenants in Housing (1947).

Beyond its legal significance, Hansberry is a remarkable personal story. Lorraine Hansberry, author of A Raisin in the Sun, was the daughter of Carl A. Hansberry, the named party in the case. The family was evicted from their home when the Cook County Circuit Court in July 1937 entered a preliminary injunction to enforce the ugly covenant that was said to bar her father from purchasing property in a Chicago neighborhood. That covenant stated, “[N]o part of said premises shall be sold, given, conveyed or leased to any negro or negroes, and no permission or license to use or occupy any part thereof shall be given to any negro except house servants or janitors or chauffeurs employed thereon.” See Tidmarsh, The Story of Hansberry: The Rise of Modern Class Actions, in Civil Procedure Stories 217, 222 (Clermont ed., 2d ed. 2008). See also Kamp, The History Behind Hansberry v. Lee, 20 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 481 (1987).

809

2. Was the problem in Hansberry a lack of consent by the seller and purchaser of the restricted property to the covenant or their absence from the earlier lawsuit? In Mullane, p. 237, supra, the Supreme Court held that before absent parties could be bound by a judgment, due process required that individual notice be given to those parties whose names and addresses were known, and constructive notice if that information was not reasonably available. See Leubsdorf, Unmasking Mullane: Due Process, Common Trust Funds, and the Class Action Wars, 66 Hastings L.J. 1693 (2015). Did Hansberry rely on notice and consent to justify the preclusive effect of the prior judgment? If not, what was the Court’s rationale?

3. Hansberry acknowledged that the Due Process Clause does not require states to adopt federal procedures for class actions adjudicated in state courts. Why was the Illinois procedure nevertheless constitutionally defective? What did the Court mean when it said that because of the “dual and potentially conflicting interests” of those who signed the covenant, the signators could not “be deemed adequately to represent any others of the class”?

4.Does Hansberry require that as a constitutional matter all members of the class must agree with the actions of the named plaintiffs if the class is to be deemed adequately represented and a resulting judgment treated as binding upon the absentees? Is it reasonable to assume complete agreement on all issues by members of the class? Which types of intra-class conflicts ought to have constitutional significance?

5.Did Hansberry treat the named class plaintiff as an agent of the unnamed class members? Of what relevance is the fact that the named plaintiff was a self-selected representative and not appointed by the seller or purchaser of the restricted property? Consider this analysis:

The class action is in fact a representative lawsuit * * * but it employs a peculiar concept of representation: self-appointment. Contrary to the situation where I appoint someone as my agent, in the class action the named plaintiff appoints himself or herself as the representative of the class. Self-appointment is not unheard of in the world of politics and other social domains. * * * Yet there is no denying that self-appointment is as anomalous form of representation, only justified, if at all, by the most exceptional circumstances.

Fiss, The Political Theory of the Class Action, 53 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 21, 25 (1996). According to Hansberry, what “exceptional circumstances” allow one party to represent the interests of another? Why were those circumstances absent in the principal case?

C. OPERATION OF THE CLASS ACTION DEVICE

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 in the Supplement.

Rule 23 authorizes the class action in federal court and has influenced state judicial practice. Although there are defendant class actions, they are rather unusual, and these materials use the far more common plaintiff class action as the model for discussion. A class action, like all lawsuits, is commenced by the filing of a complaint and the service of a summons. The caption specifies the name of the representative plaintiff and also indicates that the lawsuit is being filed on behalf of a class. The complaint alleges the claims of the named plaintiff and sets forth classwide allegations of the unnamed class members. Special rules pertaining to subject-matter jurisdiction, personal jurisdiction, and venue apply to the class action. See p. 869, infra.

1.RULE 23(a): PREREQUISITES OF CERTIFICATION

Rule 23(a) sets forth four conditions that an action must meet to be certified as a class action. These prerequisites to bringing a class action apply to all actions certified under Rule 23, and the party seeking to invoke the rule has the burden of showing by a preponderance of the evidence that the requirements are met. See 7A Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1759 (4th ed.).

WAL-MART STORES, INC. v. DUKES
Supreme Court of the United States, 2011.
564 U.S. 338, 131 S.Ct. 2541, 180 L.Ed.2d 374.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

JUSTICE SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court, in which THE CHIEF JUSTICE, JUSTICE KENNEDY, JUSTICE THOMAS, and JUSTICE ALITO joined, and, with respect to Parts I and III, in which JUSTICE GINSBURG, JUSTICE BREYER, JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR, and JUSTICE KAGAN joined.

We are presented with one of the most expansive class actions ever. The District Court and the Court of Appeals approved the certification of a class comprising about one and a half million plaintiffs, current and former female employees of petitioner Wal-Mart who allege that the discretion exercised by their local supervisors over pay and promotion matters violates Title VII by discriminating against women. In addition to injunctive and declaratory relief, the plaintiffs seek an award of backpay. * * *

A

Petitioner Wal-Mart is the Nation’s largest private employer. * * * In all, Wal-Mart operates approximately 3,400 stores and employs more than one million people.

Pay and promotion decisions at Wal-Mart are generally committed to local managers’ broad discretion, which is exercised “in a largely subjective manner.” * * * Local store managers may increase the wages of hourly employees (within limits) with only limited corporate oversight. As for salaried employees, such as store managers and their deputies, higher corporate authorities have discretion to set their pay within preestablished ranges.

Promotions work in a similar fashion. Wal-Mart permits store managers to apply their own subjective criteria when selecting candidates as [managers]. * * * [E]xcept for [limited] requirements, regional and district managers have discretion to use their own judgment when selecting candidates for management training. Promotion to higher office * * * is similarly at the discretion of the employee’s superiors after prescribed objective factors are satisfied.

B

* * *

Betty Dukes began working * * * as a cashier, but later sought and received a promotion to customer service manager. After a series of disciplinary violations, however, Dukes was demoted back to cashier and then to greeter. Dukes concedes she violated company policy, but contends that the disciplinary actions were in fact retaliation for invoking internal complaint procedures and that male employees have not been disciplined for similar infractions. Dukes also claims two male greeters in the Pittsburgh store are paid more than she is.

Christine Kwapnoski * * * has held a number of positions, including a supervisory position. She claims that a male manager yelled at her frequently and screamed at female employees, but not at men. The manager in question “told her to ‘doll up,’ to wear some makeup, and to dress a little better.” * * *

* * * Edith Arana * * * approached the store manager on more than one occasion about management training, but was brushed off. Arana concluded she was being denied opportunity for advancement because of her sex. She initiated internal complaint procedures, whereupon she was told to apply directly to the district manager if she thought her store manager was being unfair. Arana, however, decided against that and never applied for management training again. * * * [S]he was fired for failure to comply with Wal-Mart’s timekeeping policy.

* * *

* * * [Respondents] do not allege that Wal-Mart has any express corporate policy against the advancement of women. Rather, they claim that their local managers’ discretion over pay and promotions is exercised disproportionately in favor of men, leading to an unlawful disparate impact on female employees. * * * And, respondents say, because Wal-Mart is aware of this effect, its refusal to cabin its managers’ authority amounts to disparate treatment. * * *

Importantly for our purposes, respondents claim that the discrimination to which they have been subjected is common to all Wal-Mart’s female employees. The basic theory of their case is that a strong and uniform “corporate culture” permits bias against women to infect, perhaps subconsciously, the discretionary decisionmaking of each one of Wal-Mart’s thousands of managers—thereby making every woman at the company the victim of one common discriminatory practice. Respondents therefore wish to litigate the Title VII claims of all female employees at Wal-Mart’s stores in a nationwide class action.

C

* * *

* * * [R]espondents moved the District Court to certify a plaintiff class consisting of “ ‘[a]ll women employed at any Wal-Mart domestic retail store at any time since December 26, 1998, who have been or may be subjected to Wal-Mart’s challenged pay and management track promotions policies and practices.’ ” * * * As evidence that there were indeed “questions of law or fact common to” all the women of Wal-Mart, as Rule 23(a)(2) requires, respondents relied chiefly on three forms of proof: statistical evidence about pay and promotion disparities between men and women at the company, anecdotal reports of discrimination from about 120 of Wal-Mart’s female employees, and the testimony of a sociologist, Dr. William Bielby, who conducted a “social framework analysis” of Wal-Mart’s “culture” and personnel practices, and concluded that the company was “vulnerable” to gender discrimination. * * *

Wal-Mart unsuccessfully moved to strike much of this evidence. * * *

D

A divided en banc Court of Appeals substantially affirmed the District Court’s certification order. * * * The majority concluded that respondents’ evidence of commonality was sufficient to “raise the common question whether Wal-Mart’s female employees nationwide were subjected to a single set of corporate policies (not merely a number of independent discriminatory acts) that may have worked to unlawfully discriminate against them in violation of Title VII.” * * *

II

* * * The Rule’s four requirements—numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequate representation—“effectively ‘limit the class claims to those fairly encompassed by the named plaintiff’s claims.’ ” General

Telephone Co. of Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 156, 102 S.Ct. 2364, 72 L.Ed.2d 740 (1982). * * *

A

The crux of this case is commonality—the rule requiring a plaintiff to show that “there are questions of law or fact common to the class.” Rule 23(a)(2).⁵ That language is easy to misread, since “[a]ny competently crafted class complaint literally raises common ‘questions.’ ” Nagareda, Class Certification in the Age of Aggregate Proof, 84 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 97, 131–132 (2009). For example: Do all of us plaintiffs indeed work for Wal-Mart? Do our managers have discretion over pay? Is that an unlawful employment practice? What remedies should we get? Reciting these questions is not sufficient to obtain class certification. Commonality requires the plaintiff to demonstrate that the class members “have suffered the same injury,” Falcon, supra, at 157, 102 S.Ct. 2364. This does not mean merely that they have all suffered a violation of the same provision of law. Title VII, for example, can be violated in many ways—by intentional discrimination, or by hiring and promotion criteria that result in disparate impact, and by the use of these practices on the part of many different superiors in a single company. Quite obviously, the mere claim by employees of the same company that they have suffered a Title VII injury, or even a disparate-impact Title VII injury, gives no cause to believe that all their claims can productively be litigated at once. Their claims must depend upon a common contention—for example, the assertion of discriminatory bias on the part of the same supervisor. That common contention, moreover, must be of such a nature that it is capable of classwide resolution—which means that determination of its truth or falsity will resolve an issue that is central to the validity of each one of the claims in one stroke.

“What matters to class certification . . . is not the raising of common ‘questions’—even in droves—but, rather the capacity of a classwide proceeding to generate common answers apt to drive the resolution of the litigation. Dissimilarities within the proposed class are what have the potential to impede the generation of common answers.” Nagareda, supra, at 132.

814

Rule 23 does not set forth a mere pleading standard. A party seeking class certification must affirmatively demonstrate his compliance with the Rule—that is, he must be prepared to prove that there are in fact sufficiently numerous parties, common questions of law or fact, etc. We recognized in Falcon that “sometimes it may be necessary for the court to probe behind the pleadings before coming to rest on the certification question,” 457 U.S., at 160, 102 S.Ct. 2364, and that certification is proper only if “the trial court is satisfied, after a rigorous analysis, that the prerequisites of Rule 23(a) have been satisfied,” [id., at 161, 102 S.Ct. 2364]. * * * Frequently that “rigorous analysis” will entail some overlap with the merits of the plaintiff’s underlying claim. That cannot be helped. * * *.⁶ Nor is there anything unusual about that consequence: The necessity of touching aspects of the merits in order to resolve preliminary matters, e.g., jurisdiction and venue, is a familiar feature of litigation. * * *

In this case, proof of commonality necessarily overlaps with respondents’ merits contention that Wal-Mart engages in a pattern or practice of discrimination.⁷ That is so because, in resolving an individual’s Title VII claim, the crux of the inquiry is “the reason for a particular employment decision,” Cooper v. Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, 467 U.S. 867, 876, 104 S.Ct. 2794, 81 L.Ed.2d 718 (1984). Here respondents wish to sue about literally millions of employment decisions at once. Without some glue holding the alleged reasons for all those decisions together, it will be impossible to say that examination of all the class members’ claims for relief will produce a common answer to the crucial question why was I disfavored.

B

This Court’s opinion in Falcon describes how the commonality issue must be approached. There an employee who claimed that he was deliberately denied a promotion on account of race obtained certification of a class comprising all employees wrongfully denied promotions and all applicants wrongfully denied jobs. * * * We rejected that composite class for lack of commonality and typicality, explaining:

815

“Conceptually, there is a wide gap between (a) an individual’s claim that he has been denied a promotion [or higher pay] on discriminatory grounds, and his otherwise unsupported allegation that the company has a policy of discrimination, and (b) the existence of a class of persons who have suffered the same injury as that individual, such that the individual’s claim and the class claim will share common questions of law or fact and that the individual’s claim will be typical of the class claims.” Id., at 157–158, 102 S.Ct. 2364.

Falcon suggested two ways in which that conceptual gap might be bridged. First, if the employer “used a biased testing procedure to evaluate both applicants for employment and incumbent employees, a class action on behalf of every applicant or employee who might have been prejudiced by the test clearly would satisfy the commonality and typicality requirements of Rule 23(a).” Id., at 159, n. 15, 102 S.Ct. 2364. Second, “[s]ignificant proof that an employer operated under a general policy of discrimination conceivably could justify a class of both applicants and employees if the discrimination manifested itself in hiring and promotion practices in the same general fashion, such as through entirely subjective decisionmaking processes.” Ibid. We think that statement precisely describes respondents’ burden in this case. The first manner of bridging the gap obviously has no application here; Wal-Mart has no testing procedure or other companywide evaluation method that can be charged with bias. * * *

The second manner of bridging the gap requires “significant proof” that Wal-Mart “operated under a general policy of discrimination.” That is entirely absent here. Wal-Mart’s announced policy forbids sex discrimination, * * * and as the District Court recognized the company imposes penalties for denials of equal employment opportunity. * * * The only evidence of a “general policy of discrimination” respondents produced was the testimony of Dr. William Bielby, their sociological expert. Relying on “social framework” analysis, Bielby testified that Wal-Mart has a “strong corporate culture,” that makes it “ ‘vulnerable’ ” to “gender bias.” * * * He could not, however, “determine with any specificity how regularly stereotypes play a meaningful role in employment decisions at Wal-Mart. At his deposition . . . Dr. Bielby conceded that he could not calculate whether 0.5 percent or 95 percent of the employment decisions at Wal-Mart might be determined by stereotyped thinking.” * * * Bielby’s testimony does nothing to advance respondents’ case. “[W]hether

0.5 percent or 95 percent of the employment decisions at Wal-Mart might be determined by stereotyped thinking” is the essential question on which respondents’ theory of commonality depends. If Bielby admittedly has no answer to that question, we can safely disregard what he has to say. It is worlds away from “significant proof” that Wal-Mart “operated under a general policy of discrimination.”

816

C

The only corporate policy that the plaintiffs’ evidence convincingly establishes is Wal-Mart’s “policy” of allowing discretion by local supervisors over employment matters. On its face, of course, that is just the opposite of a uniform employment practice that would provide the commonality needed for a class action; it is a policy against having uniform employment practices. * * *

To be sure, we have recognized that, “in appropriate cases,” giving discretion to lower-level supervisors can be the basis of Title VII liability under a disparate-impact theory—since “an employer’s undisciplined system of subjective decisionmaking [can have] precisely the same effects as a system pervaded by impermissible intentional discrimination.” * * * But the recognition that this type of Title VII claim “can” exist does not lead to the conclusion that every employee in a company using a system of discretion has such a claim in common. To the contrary, left to their own devices most managers in any corporation—and surely most managers in a corporation that forbids sex discrimination—would select sex-neutral, performance-based criteria for hiring and promotion that produce no actionable disparity at all. Others may choose to reward various attributes that produce disparate impact—such as scores on general aptitude tests or educational achievements. * * * And still other managers may be guilty of intentional discrimination that produces a sex-based disparity. In such a company, demonstrating the invalidity of one manager’s use of discretion will do nothing to demonstrate the invalidity of another’s. A party seeking to certify a nationwide class will be unable to show that all the employees’ Title VII claims will in fact depend on the answers to common questions.

Respondents have not identified a common mode of exercising discretion that pervades the entire company—aside from their reliance on Dr. Bielby’s social frameworks analysis that we have rejected. * * * Respondents attempt to make that showing by means of statistical and anecdotal evidence, but their evidence falls well short.

The statistical evidence consists primarily of regression analyses performed by Dr. Richard Drogin, a statistician, and Dr. Marc Bendick, a labor economist. * * * After considering regional and national data, Drogin concluded that “there are statistically significant disparities between men and women at Wal-Mart . . . [and] these disparities . . . can be explained only by gender discrimination.” * * * Bendick compared work-force data from Wal-Mart and competitive retailers and concluded that Wal-Mart “promotes a lower percentage of women than its competitors.” * * *

Even if they are taken at face value, these studies are insufficient to establish that respondents’ theory can be proved on a classwide basis. * * *

817

As Judge Ikuta observed in her dissent, “[i]nformation about disparities at the regional and national level does not establish the existence of disparities at individual stores, let alone raise the inference that a company-wide policy of discrimination is implemented by discretionary decisions at the store and district level.” * * * A regional pay disparity, for example, may be attributable to only a small set of Wal-Mart stores, and cannot by itself establish the uniform, store-by-store disparity upon which the plaintiffs’ theory of commonality depends.

There is another, more fundamental, respect in which respondents’ statistical proof fails. Even if it established (as it does not) a pay or promotion pattern that differs from the nationwide figures or the regional figures in all of Wal-Mart’s 3,400 stores, that would still not demonstrate that commonality of issue exists. Some managers will claim that the availability of women, or qualified women, or interested women, in their stores’ area does not mirror the national or regional statistics. And almost all of them will claim to have been applying some sex-neutral, performance-based criteria—whose nature and effects will differ from store to store. In the landmark case of ours which held that giving discretion to lower-level supervisors can be the basis of Title VII liability under a disparate-impact theory, the plurality opinion conditioned that holding on the corollary that merely proving that the discretionary system has produced a racial or sexual disparity is not enough. “[T]he plaintiff must begin by identifying the specific employment practice that is challenged.” * * * That is all the more necessary when a class of plaintiffs is sought to be certified. Other than the bare existence of delegated discretion, respondents have identified no “specific employment practice”—much less one that ties all their 1.5 million claims together. Merely showing that Wal-Mart’s policy of discretion has produced an overall sex-based disparity does not suffice.

Respondents’ anecdotal evidence suffers from the same defects, and in addition is too weak to raise any inference that all the individual, discretionary personnel decisions are discriminatory. In Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 97 S.Ct. 1843, 52 L.Ed.2d 396 (1977) * * * the [plaintiff] produced about 40 specific accounts of racial discrimination * * *. * * * That number was significant because * * * [t]he 40 anecdotes * * * represented roughly one account for every eight members of the class. Moreover, * * * the anecdotes came from individuals “spread throughout” the company who “for the most part” worked at the company’s operational centers that employed the largest numbers of the class members. * * * Here, by contrast, respondents filed some 120 affidavits reporting experiences of discrimination—about 1 for every 12,500 class members—relating to only some 235 out of Wal-Mart’s 3,400 stores. * * * More than half of these reports are concentrated in only six States * * *; half of all States have only one or two anecdotes; and 14 States have no anecdotes about Wal-Mart’s operations at all. * * * Even if every single one of these accounts is true, that would not demonstrate that the entire company “operate[s] under a general policy of discrimination,” * * * which is what respondents must show to certify a companywide class.

The dissent misunderstands the nature of the foregoing analysis. It criticizes our focus on the dissimilarities between the putative class members on the ground that we have “blend[ed]” Rule 23(a)(2)’s commonality requirement with Rule 23(b)(3)’s inquiry into whether common questions “predominate” over individual ones. * * * That is not so. We quite agree that for purposes of Rule 23(a)(2) “ ‘[e]ven a single [common] question’ ” will do. * * * We consider dissimilarities not in order to determine (as Rule 23(b)(3) requires) whether common questions predominate, but in order to determine (as Rule 23(a)(2) requires) whether there is “[e]ven a single [common] question.” And there is not here. Because respondents provide no convincing proof of a companywide discriminatory pay and promotion policy, we have concluded that they have not established the existence of any common question. * * *

In sum, we agree with Chief Judge Kozinski that the members of the class: “held a multitude of different jobs, at different levels of Wal-Mart’s hierarchy, for variable lengths of time, in 3,400 stores, sprinkled across 50 states, with a kaleidoscope of supervisors (male and female), subject to a variety of regional policies that all differed Some thrived while others did poorly. They have little in common but their sex and this lawsuit.” 603 F.3d, at 652 (dissenting opinion).

* * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is Reversed.

JUSTICE GINSBURG, with whom JUSTICE BREYER, JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR, and JUSTICE KAGAN join, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

* * *

* * * [T]he Court * * * disqualifies the class at the starting gate, holding that the plaintiffs cannot cross the “commonality” line set by Rule 23(a)(2). In so ruling, the Court imports into the Rule 23(a) determination concerns properly addressed in a Rule 23(b)(3) assessment.

I

A

* * *

A “question” is ordinarily understood to be “[a] subject or point open to controversy.” American Heritage Dictionary 1483 (3d ed.1992). * * * Thus, a “question” “common to the class” must be a dispute, either of fact or of law, the resolution of which will advance the determination of the class members’ claims.³

B

The District Court, recognizing that “one significant issue common to the class may be sufficient to warrant certification,” * * * found that the plaintiffs easily met that test. * * *

* * * The named plaintiffs * * * propose to litigate, on behalf of the class, allegations that Wal-Mart discriminates on the basis of gender in pay and promotions. * * * Wal-Mart permits those prejudices to infect personnel decisions, the plaintiffs contend, by leaving pay and promotions in the hands of “a nearly all male managerial workforce” using “arbitrary and subjective criteria.” * * * Further alleged barriers to the advancement of female employees include the company’s requirement, “as a condition of promotion to management jobs, that employees be willing to relocate.” * * * Absent instruction otherwise, there is a risk that managers will act on the familiar assumption that women, because of their services to husband and children, are less mobile than men. * * *

Women fill 70 percent of the hourly jobs in the retailer’s stores but make up only “33 percent of management employees.” * * * “[T]he higher one looks in the organization the lower the percentage of women.” * * * The plaintiffs’ ” largely uncontested descriptive statistics” also show that women working in the company’s stores “are paid less than men in every region” and “that the salary gap widens over time even for men and women hired into the same jobs at the same time.” * * *

The District Court identified “systems for . . . promoting in-store employees” that were “sufficiently similar across regions and stores” to conclude that “the manner in which these systems affect the class raises issues that are common to all class members.” * * * The selection of employees for promotion to in-store management “is fairly characterized as a ‘tap on the shoulder’ process,” in which managers have discretion about whose shoulders to tap. * * * Vacancies are not regularly posted; from among those employees satisfying minimum qualifications, managers choose whom to promote on the basis of their own subjective impressions. * * *

Wal-Mart’s compensation policies also operate uniformly across stores, the District Court found. The retailer leaves open a $2 band for every position’s hourly pay rate. Wal-Mart provides no standards or criteria for setting wages within that band, and thus does nothing to counter unconscious bias on the part of supervisors. * * *

Wal-Mart’s supervisors do not make their discretionary decisions in a vacuum. The District Court reviewed means Wal-Mart used to maintain a “carefully constructed . . . corporate culture,” such as frequent meetings to reinforce the common way of thinking, regular transfers of managers between stores to ensure uniformity throughout the company, monitoring of stores “on a close and constant basis,” and “Wal-Mart TV,” “broadcas[t] . . . into all stores.” * * *

The plaintiffs’ evidence, including class members’ tales of their own experiences,⁴ suggests that gender bias suffused Wal-Mart’s company culture. Among illustrations, senior management often refer to female associates as “little Janie Qs.” * * * One manager told an employee that “[m]en are here to make a career and women aren’t.” * * * A committee of female Wal-Mart executives concluded that “[s]tereotypes limit the opportunities offered to women.” * * *

Finally, the plaintiffs presented an expert’s appraisal to show that the pay and promotions disparities at Wal-Mart “can be explained only by gender discrimination and not by . . . neutral variables.” * * * Using regression analyses, their expert, Richard Drogin, controlled for factors including, inter alia, job performance, length of time with the company, and the store where an employee worked. * * *.⁵ * * *

C

The District Court’s identification of a common question, whether Wal-Mart’s pay and promotions policies gave rise to unlawful discrimination, was hardly infirm. The practice of delegating to supervisors large discretion to make personnel decisions, uncontrolled by formal standards, has long been known to have the potential to produce disparate effects. Managers, like all humankind, may be prey to biases of which they are unaware. The risk of discrimination is heightened when those managers are predominantly of one sex, and are steeped in a corporate culture that perpetuates gender stereotypes.

821

* * *

We have held that “discretionary employment practices” can give rise to Title VII claims, not only when such practices are motivated by discriminatory intent but also when they produce discriminatory results. See Watson v. Fort Worth Bank & Trust, 487 U.S. 977, 988, 991, 108 S.Ct. 2777, 101 L.Ed.2d 827 (1988). * * *

Aware of “the problem of subconscious stereotypes and prejudices,” we held that the employer’s “undisciplined system of subjective decisionmaking” was an “employment practic[e]” that “may be analyzed under the disparate impact approach.” Id., at 990–991, 108 S.Ct. 2777. * * *

The plaintiffs’ allegations state claims of gender discrimination in the form of biased decisionmaking in both pay and promotions. The evidence reviewed by the District Court adequately demonstrated that resolving those claims would necessitate examination of particular policies and practices alleged to affect, adversely and globally, women employed at Wal-Mart’s stores. Rule 23(a)(2), setting a necessary but not a sufficient criterion for class-action certification, demands nothing further.

II

A

The Court gives no credence to the key dispute common to the class: whether Wal-Mart’s discretionary pay and promotion policies are discriminatory. * * *

The Court blends Rule 23(a)(2)’s threshold criterion with the more demanding criteria of Rule 23(b)(3), and thereby elevates the (a)(2) inquiry so that it is no longer “easily satisfied,” 5 J. Moore et al., Moore’s Federal Practice § 23.23[2], p. 23–72 (3d ed.2011).² Rule 23(b)(3) certification requires * * * determinations that “questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members” and that “a class action is superior to other available methods for . . . adjudicating the controversy.”

The Court’s emphasis on differences between class members mimics the Rule 23(b)(3) inquiry into whether common questions “predominate” over individual issues. And by asking whether the individual differences “impede” common adjudication, * * * the Court duplicates 23(b)(3)’s question whether “a class action is superior” to other modes of adjudication. * * * “The Rule 23(b)(3) predominance inquiry” is meant to “tes[t] whether proposed classes are sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation.” * * * If courts must conduct a “dissimilarities” analysis at the Rule 23(a)(2) stage, no mission remains for Rule 23(b)(3).

822

Because Rule 23(a) is also a prerequisite for Rule 23(b)(1) and Rule 23(b)(2) classes, the Court’s “dissimilarities” position is far reaching. Individual differences should not bar a Rule 23(b)(1) or Rule 23(b)(2) class, so long as the Rule 23(a) threshold is met. * * *

B

The “dissimilarities” approach leads the Court to train its attention on what distinguishes individual class members, rather than on what unites them. * * *

Wal-Mart’s delegation of discretion over pay and promotions is a policy uniform throughout all stores. The very nature of discretion is that people will exercise it in various ways. A system of delegated discretion * * * is a practice actionable under Title VII when it produces discriminatory outcomes. * * * A finding that Wal-Mart’s pay and promotions practices in fact violate the law would be the first step in the usual order of proof for plaintiffs seeking individual remedies for company-wide discrimination. * * * That each individual employee’s unique circumstances will ultimately determine whether she is entitled to backpay or damages * * * should not factor into the Rule 23(a)(2) determination.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Wal-Mart, the large number of class members clearly made joinder impracticable for purposes of satisfying Rule 23(a)(1), but the Court raised other concerns about the appropriateness of Rule 23 certification. Generally, the test for numerosity has both a quantitative and a qualitative aspect. A class of 20 members is likely to be too small; a class of 40 is likely to be sufficient. Moreover, joinder does not have to be “impossible—only that the difficulty or inconvenience of joining all members of the class make use of the class action appropriate.” Novella v. Westchester County, 661 F.3d 128, 144 (2d Cir. 2011). Was the sheer size of the class significant to the decision in Wal-Mart, given that, as one commentator observed, “[t]he class consisted of a million and a half members, working at 3,400 stores”? Sherry, Hogs Get Slaughtered at the Supreme Court, 2011 Sup.Ct.Rev. 1, 22.

2. Prior to Wal-Mart, courts tended to give Rule 23(a)(2)—the “commonality” requirement—a “permissive application.” 7A Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1763 (4th ed.). Even in a mass tort action, the threshold for commonality was “not high” and “relatively easy to satisfy.” In re Teletronics Pacing Sys, Inc., 164 F.R.D. 222, 228 (S.D.Ohio 1995) (the class was later decertified and then recertified). The majority in Wal-Mart toughened the commonality standard to require a showing and proof of a “common contention” that is “capable of classwide resolution.” Under this standard should it be sufficient for the class complaint to allege that defendant has engaged in a systemic violation of the law that harms the absentees? In Wallace B. Roderick Revocable Living Tr. v. XTO Energy, Inc., 725 F.3d 1213 (10th Cir. 2013), royalty owners of natural gas wells brought a class action against the lessee, challenging the adequacy of their royalty payments. The Tenth Circuit held that commonality was not established by the lessee’s use of a uniform methodology for determining payments to the royalty owners. What additional showing does Wal-Mart require?

823

3. In deciding whether “commonality” was shown, the majority in Wal-Mart examined the merits of plaintiffs’ claims on the ground that doing so was necessary to probe whether the requirements of Rule 23(a) had been satisfied. Before Wal-Mart, the Court had limited a district court’s authority to weigh the merits as part of the class certification calculus. Justice Powell, in a unanimous opinion in Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 94 S.Ct. 2140, 40 L.Ed.2d 732 (1974), explained: “We find nothing in either the language or history of Rule 23 that gives a court any authority to conduct a preliminary inquiry into the merits of a suit in order to determine whether it may be maintained as a class action.” Id. at 177, 94 S.Ct. at 2152, 40 L.Ed.2d at 748–49. Because the district court in Eisen had sought expressly to encourage certification (on the ground that the class was likely to prevail on its claims), the Wal-Mart majority read that statement in Justice Powell’s opinion narrowly. After Wal-Mart, the Court in Comcast Corp. v. Behrend, 569 U.S. 27, 34, 133 S.Ct. 1426, 1433, 185 L.Ed.2d 515, 522 (2013), reaffirmed that consideration of the merits may be “pertinent” to the Rule 23(a) inquiry and that it would be an abuse of discretion for the district court not to take them into consideration to the extent that merits questions overlapped with the Rule 23(a) inquiry. However, in AMGEN v. CONNECTICUT RETIREMENT PLANS AND TR. FUNDS, 568 U.S. 455, 133 S.Ct. 1184, 184 L.Ed.2d 308 (2013), the Court, six-to-three, clarified the relationship between a review of the merits and the certification inquiry. In Amgen, the question was whether proof of materiality—an essential element of plaintiff’s fraud-on-the-market securities case—was a prerequisite to class certification, and the Court answered that it was not:

Although we have cautioned that a court’s class-certification analysis must be “rigorous” and may “entail some overlap with the merits of the plaintiff’s underlying claim,” [Wal-Mart, p. 810, supra], Rule 23 grants courts no license to engage in free-ranging merits inquiries at the certification stage. Merits questions may be considered to the extent—but only to the extent—that they are relevant to determining whether the Rule 23 prerequisites for class certification are satisfied. * * *

824

Id. at 465–66, 133 S.Ct. at 1194–95, 184 L.Ed.2d at 320–21. Requiring plaintiffs to prove materiality before the certification decision, the Court stated, “put[s] the cart before the horse”; a “certification ruling is not to adjudicate the case; rather it is to select the ‘metho[d]’ best suited to adjudication of the controversy ‘fairly and efficiently.’ ” Id. at 460, 133 S.Ct. at 1191, 184 L.Ed.2d at 316 (alteration in original).

4. The Court in Wal-Mart noted in dicta a relationship between the typicality requirement of Rule 23(a)(3) and that of commonality, calling them “guideposts” for whether a class suit would be “economical” and adequate representation could be ensured. As the Third Circuit has explained, the typicality inquiry looks to whether “the class representatives are sufficiently similar to the rest of the class—in terms of their legal claims, factual circumstances, and stake in the litigation—so that certifying those individuals to represent the class will be fair to the rest of the proposed class.” In re Schering Plough Corp. ERISA Litig., 589 F.3d 585, 597 (3d Cir. 2009).

5. Will typicality be defeated if the claims of the named representative are not identical to those of the absentees? In GENERAL TELEPHONE CO. OF SOUTHWEST v. FALCON, 457 U.S. 147, 156, 102 S.Ct. 2364, 72 L.Ed.2d 740 (1982), relied upon in Wal-Mart, the Court stated that a named representative must have the same interest and suffer the same injury as the class. The Court then found that the named plaintiff, who alleged that defendant had discriminated against him in its employment promotion practices, could not represent the interests of absent class members alleging discrimination in employment hiring:

* * * Conceptually, there is a wide gap between (a) an individual’s claim that he has been denied a promotion on discriminatory grounds, and his otherwise unsupported allegation that the company has a policy of discrimination, and (b) the existence of a class of persons who have suffered the same injury as that individual, such that the individual’s claim and the class claims will share common questions of law or fact and that the individual’s claim will be typical of the class claims. * * *

* * * Respondent’s complaint provided an insufficient basis for concluding that the adjudication of his claim of discrimination in promotion would require the decision of any common question concerning the failure of petitioner to hire more Mexican-Americans.

Id. at 157–58, 102 S.Ct. at 2370–71, 72 L.Ed.2d at 750–51. However, in GRATZ v. BOLLINGER, 539 U.S. 244, 123 S.Ct. 2411, 156 L.Ed.2d 257 (2003), a challenge to a public university’s use of racial criteria in the selection of students for undergraduate admission, the Court held that the named plaintiff, a transfer student, could represent students who had applied in the regular admission process; their difference in application status was irrelevant because the university used the same criteria to select entry and transfer students. As the Seventh Circuit has explained, “The lesson we take from that is that there must be enough congruence between the named representative’s claim and that of the unnamed members of the class to justify allowing the named party to litigate on behalf of the group.” Spano v. Boeing Co., 633 F.3d 574, 586 (7th Cir. 2011). Why was this congruence not present in Falcon?

825

6. Rule 23(a)(4) requires that the named plaintiff “fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.” In AMCHEM PRODS., INC. v. WINDSOR, 521 U.S. 591, 117 S.Ct. 2231, 138 L.Ed.2d 689 (1997), a proposed global settlement of “hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions” of claims arising from exposure to asbestos, the Court explained that the purpose of the adequacy requirement is “to uncover conflicts of interest between named parties and the class they seek to represent.” Id. at 625, 117 S.Ct. at 2250, 138 L.Ed.2d at 714. Finding that common claims did not predominate, the Court did not discuss adequacy issues “discretely,” but observed that the class members had diverse medical conditions, were exposed to different asbestos-containing products, had different prospects for physical injury and death, and had different preferences for immediate or long-term payment. As the Court concluded,

The settling parties, in sum, achieved a global compromise with no structural assurance of fair and adequate representation for the diverse groups and individuals affected. Although the named parties alleged a range of complaints, each served generally as representative for the whole, not for a separate constituency.

Id. at 609, 626–27, 117 S.Ct. at 2243, 2251, 138 L.Ed.2d at 704, 714–15. Amchem makes clear that potentially conflicting interests do not inevitably doom class certification; however, they do require the district court to take steps early in the lawsuit to protect absentees (for example, by ordering provisional certification of subclasses with independent counsel for groups with different interests). See Ratner, Class Conflicts, 92 Wash.L.Rev. 785 (2017).

7. In addition to monitoring intra-class conflict, the adequacy inquiry examines the “zeal and competence” of the named party and the party’s lawyer, as well as “the willingness and ability of the representative to take an active role in and control the litigation and to protect the interests of absentees.” Jones v. Singing River Health Serv. Found., 865 F.3d 285, 294 (5th Cir. 2017) (citation omitted), cert. denied, 138 S.Ct. 1000 (2018). For example, in Monroe v. City of Charlottesville, 579 F.3d 380 (4th Cir. 2009), cert. denied, 559 U.S. 992, 130 S.Ct. 1740, 176 L.Ed.2d 213 (2010), the court found the class representative to be inadequate when the party could not recognize the complaint and was unaware that the lawsuit had been filed in his name until reading about it in a newspaper.

NOTE ON SELECTION OF THE “LEAD PLAINTIFF” IN SECURITIES-FRAUD CASES

The Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, p. 653, supra, requires the court to appoint a “lead plaintiff” in securities class actions; a presumption in favor of the party with the largest financial stake in the class relief sought. See 7A Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1767

826

(4th ed.). The requirement seeks to give shareholders with large financial interests incentives to monitor class counsel’s behavior to avoid conflict and collusion. See Silver & Dinkin, Incentivizing Institutional Investors to Serve as Lead Plaintiffs in Securities Fraud Class Actions, 57 DePaul L.Rev. 471 (2008).

The circuits are divided on what the lead-plaintiff designation requires. The Fifth Circuit has held that the Act “raises the standard adequacy threshold” under Rule 23(a)(4) by directing district courts to appoint as lead plaintiff “the most sophisticated investor available * * *.” Berger v. Compaq Comput. Corp., 257 F.3d 475 (5th Cir. 2001), rehearing denied, 279 F.3d 313 (5th Cir. 2002). The Ninth Circuit has taken a different approach, requiring the district court to determine which plaintiff has the biggest stake in the lawsuit, and to appoint that plaintiff as lead unless the designee does not satisfy the adequacy and typicality requirements. Three steps are contemplated:

The first step consists of publicizing the pendency of the action, the claims made and the purported class period. * * *

In step two, the district court must * * * compare the financial stakes of the various plaintiffs and determine which one has the most to gain from the lawsuit. * * * It must then focus its attention on that plaintiff and determine * * * whether he satisfies the requirements of Rule 23(a), in particular those of “typicality” and “adequacy.” * * * If the plaintiff with the largest financial stake in the controversy provides information that satisfies these requirements, he becomes the presumptively most adequate plaintiff. If the plaintiff with the greatest financial stake does not satisfy the Rule 23(a) criteria, the court must repeat the inquiry, this time considering the plaintiff with the next-largest financial stake, until it finds a plaintiff who is both willing to serve and satisfies the requirements of Rule 23.

The third step of the process is to give other plaintiffs an opportunity to rebut the presumptive lead plaintiff’s showing that it satisfies Rule 23’s typicality and adequacy requirements. * * *

In re Cavanaugh, 306 F.3d 726, 729–32 (9th Cir. 2002).

Is it fair to presume that the investor with the largest financial stake will adequately represent the interests of investors with smaller stakes? Are the interests of institutional investors consistently aligned with those of individual investors? Might it be preferable to appoint individual and institutional investors as co-lead plaintiffs in securities class actions? See Burch, Optimal Lead Plaintiffs, 64 Vand.L.Rev. 1109 (2011); Webber, The Plight of the Individual Investor in Securities Class Actions, 106 Nw.U.L.Rev. 157 (2012). For a study of whether the “lead plaintiff” provisions have resulted in more effective monitoring, see Cox & Thomas, Does the Lead Plaintiff Matter? An Empirical Analysis of Lead Plaintiffs in Securities Class Actions, 106 Colum.L.Rev. 1587 (2006).

2.RULE 23(b): THE TYPES OF CLASS ACTIONS

The party seeking class certification must show that the case falls within one of the three types of actions set forth in Rule 23(b). Certification of the case as one type rather than another imposes specific and different duties on counsel and the court, and affects the ability of the unnamed class members to disassociate themselves from the binding effect of a resulting class judgment. Two critical differences among the types of class actions are whether the absentee class members must be given an opportunity to “opt-out” of the class; and whether individual notice must be given to each absentee at the certification stage about claims, defenses, exit rights, and other matters. Rule 23(b)(1) and (b)(2) generally do not require notice at the certification stage and do not provide opt-out rights to absentees. For this reason they are sometimes referred to as “mandatory” class actions. Rule 23(b)(3) requires notice and opt-out rights in all cases.

As you read the descriptions that follow, consider which type of class action best fits this fact pattern:

Pacemakers containing allegedly defective wires and leads to the heart were implanted into more than 10,000 patients in 48 states throughout the United States. Because of the defect, the pacemakers were prone to break in some instances and cause injury to the heart or blood vessels. Approximately 8,500 of the patients are still alive. Implantees filed suit in the Eastern District of California alleging negligence, products liability, breach of warranty, intentional misrepresentation, and infliction of emotional distress. As relief, they sought (a) notice to all implantees of the potential danger from continued use of the pacemaker; (b) creation of a medical monitoring program for the purpose of providing ongoing diagnosis and treatment to implantees; (c) creation of a medical monitoring fund to pay all other future medical expenses in any way related to the defective product, with the amount of the fund limited to defendant’s profits from its manufacturer and distribution of the defective product; (d) creation of a medical research fund to investigate innovative treatment for implantees; (e) classwide punitive damages for deceit; and (f) compensatory damages for intentional infliction of emotional distress.

a. “Prejudice” Class Actions: Rule 23(b)(1) authorizes a class from which members cannot exit in order to avoid prejudice that could result from the pursuit of individual lawsuits. The rule has two subparts:

Subdivision (A) focuses on potential prejudice to defendant; Subdivision (B) focuses on potential prejudice to the absentees.

Rule 23(b)(1)(A) deals with the risk that individual actions would create “incompatible standards of conduct” for the party opposing the class. Certification under Subdivision (A) is not appropriate when plaintiffs primarily seek monetary damages; a defendant does not face incompatible standards of conduct simply because damages are to be paid to one claimant and not to another. Rather, certification would be appropriate only when the class primarily seeks relief that typically acts as an injunction or declaration, and a series of individual lawsuits would place defendant in a position of uncertainty, not knowing how to treat other members of the class. Thus, for example, certification under Rule 23(b)(1)(A) was appropriate in a suit by football players against the National Football League for violations of antitrust laws; “[t]he need to revise or to eliminate past rules and practices of professional football” embraced the possibility “that adjudications of separate actions could set incompatible standards of conduct.” Reynolds v. National Football League, 584 F.2d 280, 284 (8th Cir. 1978). If defendant is willing to risk incompatible adjudications, should the court refuse to certify the class? See Gallagher, Vetoing Class Actions, 24 Rev. Litig. 527 (2005).

Rule 23(b)(1)(B) focuses on the potential for prejudice to the absentees and authorizes certification when individual actions “would be dispositive of the interests” or “substantially impair or impede” the ability of nonparties to protect their interests. The classic example involves multiple claimants to a limited fund, such as insurance proceeds. Individual lawsuits by those with competing claims would create the risk that those who sue first will deplete the fund and leave nothing for the latecomers, subjecting them to practical prejudice.

The Court has emphasized that the fund must have “definitely, ascertained limits, all of which would be distributed to satisfy all those with liquidated claims”; “the shared character of rights claimed or relief awarded entails that any individual adjudication by a class member disposes of, or substantially affects, the interests of absent class members.” Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., 527 U.S. 815, 834, 841, 119 S.Ct. 2295, 2309, 2312, 144 L.Ed.2d 715, 733, 737 (1999).

b.Injunctive and Declaratory Relief: Class actions under Rule 23(b)(2) seek injunctive or declaratory relief to change defendant’s conduct prospectively rather than to provide individual compensation to the class members for past harms. For an action to fall within Rule 23(b)(2), defendant’s conduct need apply generally to the class; perfect harmony among the class members is not required. See Gilles & Friedman, The Radical Majoritarianism of Rule 23(b)(2), 65 U. Kan.L.Rev. 989 (2017). As the Supreme Court has explained:

829

Rule 23(b)(2) applies only when a single injunction or declaratory judgment would provide relief to each member of the class. It does not authorize class certification when each individual class member would be entitled to a different injunction or declaratory judgment against the defendant. Similarly, it does not authorize class certification when each class member would be entitled to an individualized award of monetary damages.

Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 564 U.S. 338, 360–61, 131 S.Ct. 2541, 2557–58, 180 L.Ed.2d 374, 396 (2011). The 1966 amendment that created Rule 23(b)(2) had in mind school desegregation cases, but the injunctive class action has been used in a broad range of substantive areas. See Marcus, Flawed But Noble: Desegregation Litigation and Its Implications for the Modern Class Action, 6 Fla.L.Rev. 657 (2011).

c.Damages Class Actions: Class suits seeking damages for injuries caused by the same defendant are candidates for certification under Rule 23(b)(3). The rule requires the claims of the class members to share questions of law or fact that predominate over any questions affecting only individual members; moreover, class treatment must be shown to be a superior mode of adjudication. Rule 23(b)(3) sets forth four factors pertinent to finding predominance and superiority. Rule 23(b)(3)(A)–(D). Members of a class certified under this provision are permitted to opt-out of the action. These conditions are intended to insure that the proposed class is “sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation.” Amchem Products, Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 623, 117 S.Ct. 2231, 2249, 138 L.Ed.2d 689, 712 (1997). As the Court has explained, the Rule 23(b)(3) inquiry:

 calls upon courts to give careful scrutiny to the relation between common and individual questions in a case. An individual question is one where “members of a proposed class will need to present evidence that varies from member to member,” while a common question is one where “the same evidence will suffice for each member to make a prima facie showing [or] the issue is susceptible to generalized, class-wide proof.”  The predominance inquiry “asks whether the common, aggregation-enabling, issues in the case are more prevalent or important than the non-common, aggregation-defeating, individual issues.”  When “one or more of the central issues in the action are common to the class and can be said to predominate, the action may be considered proper under Rule 23(b)(3) even though other important matters will have to be tried separately, such as damages or some affirmative defenses peculiar to some individual class members.” ***

830

Tyson Foods, Inc. v. Bouaphakeo, 577 U.S. 442, 453, 136 S.Ct. 1036, 1045, 194 L.Ed.2d 124, 134 (2016) (internal citations omitted).

In CASTANO v. AMERICAN TOBACCO CO., 84 F.3d 734 (5th Cir. 1996), the appeals court decertified a Rule 23(b)(3) class defined as:

- (a)All nicotine-dependent persons in the United States . . . who have purchased and smoked cigarettes manufactured by the defendants;
- (b)The estates, representatives, and administrators of these nicotine-dependent cigarette smokers; and
- (c)The spouses, children, relatives and “significant others” of these nicotine-dependent cigarette smokers as their heirs or survivors.

Id. at 737 (alteration in original). In the appellate court’s view, certification was not appropriate because the claims were governed by the laws of different states and the theories of liability were considered “novel and wholly untested.” Id. The Court of Appeals explained:

 [H]istorically, certification of mass tort litigation classes has been disfavored. The traditional concern over the rights of defendants in mass tort class actions is magnified in the instant case.  This is because certification of an immature tort results in a higher than normal risk that the class action may not be superior to individual adjudication.

Id. at 746–47. See McGovern, Resolving Mature Mass Tort Litigation, 69 B.U.L.Rev. 659 (1989). After the Castano class failed and legislative reform of the tobacco industry proved unlikely, over 40 states filed lawsuits against tobacco companies to recover expenditures made for tobacco-related illnesses. The companies negotiated a settlement with the Attorneys General of these states, and in November 1998, the settlement was accepted by 46 states, the District of Columbia, and five territories. This settlement included payments to the states totaling $206 billion to be paid over the next 25 years. Why was this approach to claims-resolution superior to a class action by the consumers themselves? See Lemos, Aggregate Litigation Goes Public: Representative Suits by State Attorneys General, 126 Harv.L.Rev. 486 (2012).

The Supreme Court’s decision in Erie R.R. v. Tompkins, p. 445, supra, complicates certification decisions in Rule 23(b)(3) cases because numerous state laws often must be applied in multi-state and national class actions, making satisfaction of the Rule’s predominance requirement more difficult. In Klay v. Humana, Inc., 382 F.3d 1241, 1261 (11th Cir. 2004), cert. denied, 543 U.S. 1081, 125 S.Ct. 172, 160 L.Ed.2d 825 (2004), the Court stated: “It goes without saying that class certification is impossible where the fifty states truly establish a large number of different legal standards governing a particular claim.” See also In the Matter of Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1300–02 (7th Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 516 U.S. 867, 116 S.Ct. 184, 133 L.Ed.2d 122 (1995).

NOTE ON “HYBRID” CLASS ACTIONS

In some class actions, the representative parties may wish to pursue classwide injunctive relief as well as money damages. What type of class action should be certified? In Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, p. 810, supra, the Court held that claims for monetary relief may not be certified under Federal Rule 23(b)(2) when the “the monetary relief is not incidental to the injunctive or declaratory relief”:

* * * One possible reading of * * * [Rule 23(b)(2)] is that it applies only to requests for such injunctive or declaratory relief and does not authorize the class certification of monetary claims at all. We need not reach that broader question in this case, because we think that, at a minimum, claims for individualized relief (like the backpay at issue here) do not satisfy the Rule. * * * Rule 23(b)(2) applies only when a single injunction or declaratory judgment would provide relief to each member of the class. It does not authorize class certification when each individual class member would be entitled to a different injunction or declaratory judgment against the defendant. Similarly, it does not authorize class certification when each class member would be entitled to an individualized award of monetary damages.

* * *

Permitting the combination of individualized and classwide relief in a (b)(2) class is * * * inconsistent with the structure of Rule 23(b). Classes certified under (b)(1) and (b)(2) share the most traditional justifications for class treatment—that individual adjudications would be impossible or unworkable, as in (b)(1) class, or that the relief sought must perforce affect the entire class at once, as in a (b)(2) class. For that reason these are also mandatory classes: The Rule provides no opportunity for (b)(1) or (b)(2) class members to opt out, and does not even oblige the District Court to afford them notice of the action. Rule 23(b)(3), by contrast, is an “adventuresome innovation” of the 1966 amendments * * * [and] allows class certification in a much wider set of circumstances but with greater procedural protections. * * * And unlike (b)(1) and (b)(2) classes, the (b)(3) class is not mandatory; class members are entitled to receive “the best notice that is practicable under the circumstances” and to withdraw from the class at their option. * * *

Given that structure, we think it clear that individualized monetary claims belong in Rule 23(b)(3). The procedural protections attending the (b)(3) class—predominance, superiority, mandatory notice, and the right to opt out—are missing from (b)(2) not because the Rule considers them unnecessary, but because it considers them unnecessary to a (b)(2) class. When a class seeks an indivisible injunction benefitting all its members at once, there is no reason to undertake a case-specific inquiry into whether class issues predominate or whether class action is a superior method of adjudicating the dispute. * * * But with respect to each class member’s individualized claim for money, that is not so—which is precisely why (b)(3) requires the judge to make findings about predominance and superiority before allowing the class. Similarly, (b)(2) does not require that class members be given notice and opt-out rights, presumably because it is thought (rightly or wrongly) that notice has no purpose when the class is mandatory, and that depriving people of their right to sue in this manner complies with the Due Process Clause. In the context of a class action predominantly for money damages we have held that absence of notice and opt-out violates due process. * * * While we have never held that to be so where the monetary claims do not predominate, the serious possibility that it may be so provides an additional reason not to read Rule 23(b)(2) to include the monetary claims here.

* * *

Against that conclusion, respondents argue that their claims for backpay were appropriately certified as part of a class under Rule 23(b)(2) because those claims do not “predominate” over their requests for injunctive and declaratory relief. They rely upon the Advisory Committee’s statement that Rule 23(b)(2) “does not extend to cases in which the appropriate final relief relates exclusively or predominantly to money damages.” * * * (emphasis added). * * * [I]t is the Rule itself, not the Advisory Committee’s description of it, that governs. * * * We fail to see why the Rule should be read to nullify these protections whenever a plaintiff class, at its option, combines its monetary claims with a request—even a “predominating request”—for an injunction.

Respondents’ predominance test, moreover, creates perverse incentives for class representatives to place at risk potentially valid claims for monetary relief. In this case, for example, the named plaintiffs declined to include employees’ claims for compensatory damages in their complaint. That strategy of including only backpay claims made it more likely that monetary relief would not “predominate.” But it also created the possibility * * * that individual class members’ compensatory-damages claims would be precluded by litigation they had no power to hold themselves apart from. * * * That possibility underscores the need for plaintiffs with individual monetary claims to decide for themselves whether to tie their fates to the class representatives’ or go it alone—a choice Rule 23(b)(2) does not ensure that they have.

* * * We need not decide in this case whether there are any forms of “incidental” monetary relief that are consistent with the interpretation of Rule 23(b)(2) we have announced and that comply with the Due Process Clause. Respondents do not argue that they can satisfy this standard, and in any event they cannot.

Id. at 360–66, 131 S.Ct. at 2557–60, 180 L.Ed.2d at 396–400.

Are you persuaded by the Court’s statement that a single injunction would not benefit all class members? What forms of monetary relief might be treated as “incidental” under Rule 23(b)(2)? In Allison v. Citgo Petro. Corp., 151 F.3d 402, 415 (5th Cir. 1998), the Fifth Circuit defined incidental monetary relief as “damages that flow directly from liability to the class as a whole on the claims forming the basis of the injunctive or declaratory relief.” In that situation, “incidental damage should not require additional hearings to resolve the disparate merits of each individual’s case; it should neither introduce new substantial legal or factual issues, nor entail complex individualized determinations.” Id. See Malveaux, Class Actions at the Crossroads: An Answer to Wal-Mart v. Dukes, 5 Harv.L. & Pol’y Rev. 375 (2011).

3.RULE 23(c): CERTIFICATION DECISIONS

“At an early practicable time” the district court must issue an order granting or denying certification and defining the class. The scope of the class may change as discovery goes forward; the court retains authority to amend the order “before final judgment.” Rule 23(c)(1)(A), (C). Under Rule 23(c)(4), the court also may choose to certify an “issue class”—that is, it may permit the case to be “maintained as a class action with respect to particular issues.” See Burch, Constructing Issue Classes, 10 Va.L.Rev. 1855 (2015). For example, although a controversial approach, a judge in a products liability suit could certify for class treatment solely the issue of whether the manufacturer knew of the product’s adverse effects before taking it to market. Finally, the certification order addresses the notice that is to be given to the absent class members and appoints class counsel under Rule 23(g). These requirements are discussed in the materials that follow.

a.Defining the Class

As amended in 2003, Rule 23(c)(1)(B) states that the order certifying the class “must define the class and the class claims, issues, or defenses.” The original Rule 23 did not specify this condition, and prior to the amendment there was no hard-and-fast rule governing class definition. Generally, courts required the definition to “be precise, objective, and presently ascertainable,” and “not depend on subjective criteria or the merits of the case or require extensive factual inquiry to determine who is a class member.” In re Copper Antitrust Litig., 196 F.R.D. 348, 353

(W.D.Wis. 2000) (citations omitted). Under this standard, class definitions failed if they were too broad (e.g., “all learning disabled children in the state of Texas”); too specific (e.g., “all people with Spanish surnames having Spanish, Mexican, or Indian ancestry who spoke Spanish as a primary or secondary language”); too vague (e.g., “all users of drug X who suffered medical problems”); or too amorphous (e.g., “all recipients of unsolicited spam messages”). Having a clear class definition protects absentees by identifying the recipients of notice when required; it protects the parties and the court by facilitating claim preclusion; and it saves judicial resources by making the definition easy to administer. See Marcus v. BMW of N. Am., LLC, 687 F.3d 583, 593 (3d Cir. 2012). However, requiring too rigid a definition may impede the class action’s utility.

BRISENO v. CONAGRA FOODS, INC.
United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 2017.
844 F.3d 1121, cert. denied, 138 S.Ct. 313, 199 L.Ed.2d 206.

FRIEDLAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

Plaintiffs are consumers who purchased Wesson-brand cooking oil products labeled “100% Natural.” The “100% Natural” label appeared on every bottle of Wesson-brand oil throughout the putative class periods (and continues to appear on those products). Plaintiffs argue that the “100% Natural” label is false or misleading because Wesson oils are made from bioengineered ingredients (genetically modified organisms, or GMOs) that Plaintiffs contend are “not natural.” ConAgra manufactures, markets, distributes, and sells Wesson products.

Plaintiffs filed putative class actions asserting state-law claims against ConAgra in eleven states, and those cases were consolidated in this action. Plaintiffs moved to certify eleven classes defined as follows: * * *

All persons who reside in the States of California, Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, Oregon, South Dakota, or Texas who have purchased Wesson Oils within the applicable statute of limitations periods established by the laws of their state of residence (the “Class Period”) through the final disposition of this and any and all related actions.

As relevant here, ConAgra opposed class certification on the ground that there would be no administratively feasible way to identify members of the proposed classes because consumers would not be able to reliably identify themselves as class members. * * *³

835

The district court acknowledged that the Third Circuit and some district courts have refused certification in similar circumstances, but it declined to join in their reasoning. Instead, the district court held that, at the certification stage, it was sufficient that the class was defined by an objective criterion: whether class members purchased Wesson oil during the class period.

* * *

II

A

* * *

Beginning then with the plain language, Rule 23(a) * * * identifies the prerequisites to maintaining a class action in federal court. It does not mention “administrative feasibility.”

Traditional canons of statutory construction suggest that this omission was meaningful. Because the drafters specifically enumerated “[p]rerequisites,” we may conclude that Rule 23(a) constitutes an exhaustive list. * * * If the Rules Advisory Committee had intended to create a non-exhaustive list in Rule 23(a), it would have used similar language [to that used in Rule 23(b)]. * * * Moreover, Rule 23(b)(3) requires a court certifying a class under that section to consider “the likely difficulties in managing a class action.” * * * Imposing a separate administrative feasibility requirement would render that manageability criterion largely superfluous * * *.

Supreme Court precedent also counsels in favor of hewing closely to the text of Rule 23. In [Amchem, p. 853, supra], the Court considered whether a settlement-only class could be certified without satisfying the requirements of Rule 23. In holding that it could not, * * * the Court * * * admonished that “[c]ourts are not free to amend a rule outside the process Congress ordered.” * * * The lesson of Amchem Products is plain: “Federal courts . . . lack authority to substitute for Rule 23’s certification criteria a standard never adopted.” * * *

B

We recognize that the Third Circuit does require putative class representatives to demonstrate “administrative feasibility” as a prerequisite to class certification.⁶ * * * The Third Circuit justifies its administrative feasibility requirement not through the text of Rule 23 but rather as a necessary tool to ensure that the “class will actually function as a class.” * * *

836

1

One rationale the Third Circuit has given for imposing an administrative feasibility requirement is the need to mitigate the administrative burdens of trying a Rule 23(b)(3) class action. Courts adjudicating such actions must provide notice that a class has been certified and an opportunity for absent class members to withdraw from the class. * * * The Third Circuit largely justifies its administrative feasibility prerequisite as necessary to ensure that compliance with this procedural requirement does not compromise the efficiencies Rule 23(b)(3) was designed to achieve. * * *

But Rule 23(b)(3) already contains a specific, enumerated mechanism to achieve that goal: the manageability criterion of the superiority requirement. * * *

Moreover, as the Seventh Circuit has observed, requiring class proponents to satisfy an administrative feasibility prerequisite “conflicts with the well-settled presumption that courts should not refuse to certify a class merely on the basis of manageability concerns.” * * * This presumption makes ample sense given the variety of procedural tools courts can use to manage the administrative burdens of class litigation. For example, Rule 23(c) enables district courts to divide classes into subclasses or certify a class as to only particular issues. * * *

Adopting a freestanding administrative feasibility requirement instead of assessing manageability as one component of the superiority inquiry would * * * have practical consequences inconsistent with the policies embodied in Rule 23. * * * Class actions involving inexpensive consumer goods in particular would likely fail at the outset if administrative feasibility were a freestanding prerequisite to certification.

The authors of Rule 23 opted not to make the potential administrative burdens of a class action dispositive and instead directed courts to balance the benefits of class adjudication against its costs. We lack authority to substitute our judgment for theirs. * * *

2

* * *

A

With respect to absent class members, the Third Circuit has expressed concern about whether courts would be able to ensure individual notice without a method for reliably identifying class members. * * * We believe that concern is unfounded, because neither Rule 23 nor the Due Process Clause requires actual notice to each individual class member.

Rule 23 requires only the “best notice that is practicable under the circumstances, including individual notice to all members who can be identified through reasonable effort.” FED. R. CIV. P. 23(c)(2)(B) (emphasis added). * * * And courts have long employed cy pres remedies when some or even all potential claimants cannot be identified. * * * The notion that an inability to identify all class members precludes class certification cannot be reconciled with our court’s longstanding cy pres jurisprudence. * * *

Likewise, the Due Process Clause does not require actual, individual notice in all cases. * * * Courts have routinely held that notice by publication in a periodical, on a website, or even at an appropriate physical location is sufficient to satisfy due process. * * *

Moreover, the lack-of-notice concern presumes that some harm will inure to absent class members who do not receive actual notice. In theory, inadequate notice might deny an absent class member the opportunity to opt out and pursue individual litigation. But in reality that risk is virtually nonexistent in the very cases in which satisfying an administrative feasibility requirement would prove most difficult—low-value consumer class actions. Such cases typically involve low-cost products and, as a result, recoveries too small to incentivize individual litigation. At the same time, an administrative feasibility requirement like that imposed by the Third Circuit would likely bar such actions because consumers generally do not keep receipts or other records of low-cost purchases. Practically speaking, a separate administrative feasibility requirement would protect a purely theoretical interest of absent class members at the expense of any possible recovery for all class members—in precisely those cases that depend most on the class mechanism. * * *

B

The Third Circuit has also expressed concern that without an administrative feasibility requirement, individuals will submit illegitimate claims and thereby dilute the recovery of legitimate claimants. * * *

The fraud concern may be valid in theory, but “in practice, the risk of dilution based on fraudulent or mistaken claims seems low, perhaps to the point of being negligible.” * * * This is especially true in class actions involving low-cost consumer goods. Why would a consumer risk perjury charges and spend the time and effort to submit a false claim for a de minimis monetary recovery? And even if consumers might do so, courts “can rely, as they have for decades, on claim administrators, various auditing processes, sampling for fraud detection, follow-up notices to explain the claims process, and other techniques tailored by the parties and the court” to avoid or minimize fraudulent claims. * * *

As to the dilution concern specifically, consistently low participation rates in consumer class actions make it very unlikely that non-deserving claimants would diminish the recovery of participating, bona fide class members. * * * Moreover, if certification is denied to prevent dilution, deserving class members “will receive nothing, for they would not have brought suit individually in the first place.” * * *

3

Finally, the Third Circuit has characterized its administrative feasibility requirement as necessary to protect the due process rights of defendants “to raise individual challenges and defenses to claims.” * * * The gravamen of this due process concern seems to be that defendants must have an opportunity to dispute whether class members really bought the product or used the service at issue. * * *

* * * Defendants can oppose the class representatives’ showings at every stage. Indeed, in litigating class certification, ConAgra took discovery of the class representatives, challenged whether they bought Wesson oil products, attacked their credibility, and disputed whether they relied on the label at issue. As the case proceeds, ConAgra will have further opportunities to contest every aspect of Plaintiffs’ case.

Defendants will have similar opportunities to individually challenge the claims of absent class members if and when they file claims for damages. * * *

* * * ConAgra may prefer to terminate this litigation in one fell swoop at class certification rather than later challenging each individual class member’s claim to recovery, but there is no due process right to “a cost-effective procedure for challenging every individual claim to class membership.” * * *

* * *

C

In summary, the language of Rule 23 neither provides nor implies that demonstrating an administratively feasible way to identify class members is a prerequisite to class certification, and the policy concerns that have motivated the Third Circuit to adopt a separately articulated requirement are already addressed by the Rule. We therefore join the Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits in declining to adopt an administrative feasibility requirement. * * *

III

For the forgoing reasons, the district court did not err in declining to condition class certification on Plaintiffs’ proffer of an administratively feasible way to identify putative class members.

* * *

NOTE AND QUESTION

The Seventh Circuit decision, relied upon in the principal case, likewise rejected the imposition of a heightened ascertainability requirement at the certification stage as inconsistent with the text and policy of Rule 23:

Nothing in Rule 23 mentions or implies this heightened requirement under Rule 23(b)(3), which has the effect of skewing the balance that district courts must strike when deciding whether to certify classes. The policy concerns motivating the heightened ascertainability requirement are better addressed by applying carefully the explicit requirements of Rule 23(a) and especially (b)(3). * * *

The heightened ascertainability requirement upsets this balance. In effect, it gives one factor in the balance absolute priority, with the effect of barring class actions where class treatment is often most needed: in cases involving relatively low-cost goods or services, where consumers are unlikely to have documentary proof of purchase.

Mullins v. Dir. Dig., LLC, 795 F.3d 654, 657–58 (7th Cir. 2015). See Moore, The Heightened Standard of Ascertainability: An Unnecessary Hurdle to Class Action Certification, 122 Penn. St.L.Rev. 247 (2017). Are there advantages to giving close scrutiny to the class definition at an early stage in the lawsuit?

b. Notice in Different Types of Classes

i. The Court’s Role and the Timing of Notice

Rule 23 authorizes notice to class members at the time of certification, see Rule 23(c)(2); during the conduct of the action, see Rule 23(d)(1)(B); and at the time of “settlement, voluntary dismissal, or compromise.” Rule 23(e). The question of notice to absent class members has tremendous theoretical and practical importance. As a matter of due process, the absence of, or a defect in, notice may open a classwide judgment to a collateral challenge. As a practical matter, the costs of notice can be high and are borne by plaintiffs.

Rule 23 sets out two different requirements for notice at the certification stage. Notice is discretionary in so-called “mandatory” class actions under Rule 23(b)(1) and (b)(2) from which absentees may not opt-out. The assumption in these types of classes is that the suits are sufficiently cohesive to ensure the adequacy of representation needed to meet due process and day-in-court values. However, notice is required in Rule 23(b)(3) classes, from which absentees may opt-out. The notice provided must be “the best notice that is practicable under the circumstances, including individual notice to all members who can be identified through reasonable effort.” Rule 23(c)(2).

Rule 23 does not specifically address notice when the suit is a “hybrid” class action, combining, for example, equitable claims for apportionment of a limited fund and individual claims to damages. In the context of a state class action, the Court has held that due process requires notice and an opportunity for exit if the claims involve “money damages or similar relief at law.” Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, p. 873, infra; see also Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp., p. 860, infra. See Klonoff, Class Actions for Monetary Relief Under Rule 23(b)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(B): Does Due Process Require Notice and Opt-out Rights?, 82 Geo. Wash.L.Rev. 798 (2014).

The notice requirements at the back-end of the lawsuit—at the time of settlement or dismissal—apply to all types of class actions but are less demanding than at the front-end when certification is ordered. See Rule 23(e).

ii. The Content and Delivery of Notice

If notice is to serve its function, the information that it provides must be intelligible to the person who receives it. See Wheatman & LeClercq, Majority of Class Action Publication Notices Fail to Satisfy Rule 23 Requirements, 30 Rev. Litig. 53 (2010). Over the years questions have been raised whether the class notice adequately informs absentees of their rights or whether class members understand their options. Professor Rhode illustrated the nature of the problem with these class members’ responses to notice provided about opt-out rights in an antitrust suit on behalf of antibiotic purchasers:

Dear Sir:

I received your pamphlet on drugs, which I think will be of great value to me in the future.

Due to circumstances beyond my control I will not be able to attend this class at the time prescribed on your letter due to the fact that my working hours are from 7:00 until 4:30.

Dear Sir:

Our son is in the Navy, stationed in the Caribbean some place. Please let us know exactly what kind of drugs he is accused of taking.

From a mother who will help if properly informed.

A worried mother,

841

Jane Doe

Dear Attorney General:

* * * I received a card from you and I don't understand it, and my husband can't read his. Most of the time all I buy is olive oil for healing oil after praying over it, it is anointed with God's power and ain't nothing like dope.

Rhode, Class Conflicts in Class Actions, 34 Stan.L.Rev. 1183, 1235 (1982).

Rule 23 was amended in 2003 to address some of the problems that had been uncovered in practice. The rule now specifies the categories of information that must be discussed in the class notice, as well as the form of the information—the notice must be clear, concise, and written in plain language that is “easily understood.” Rule 23(c)(2)(B).

What constitutes the best notice practicable in the Internet era? E-mail and websites have become common means of providing notice to class members, particularly in consumer class actions. See Klonoff, Making Class Actions Work: The Untapped Potential of the Internet, 69 U.Pitt. L.Rev. 727 (2008). How might the increasing accessibility and popularity of the Internet affect the due process analysis? See Mirfasihi v. Fleet Mortg. Corp., 356 F.3d 781, 786 (2004) (“[I]n this age of electronic communications, newspaper notice alone is not always an adequate alternative to individual notice.”). In Noll v. eBay, Inc., 309 F.R.D. 593 (N.D. Cal.2015), a suit by sellers on the auction website called eBay, 1,192,947 class members were identified through their “unique user IDs” (each ID associated with an eBay selling account). The court approved a settlement notice sent to class members in these ways:

(i) by email to each Class Member, which shall include a hypertext link to the Settlement website; (ii) by Internet Posting, i.e., a Settlement website created to provide information about the Settlement, including the Full Notice; (iii) by Mail Notice for those Class Members whose email notices are returned as undeliverable; and (iv) by press release, in order to reach Class Members for whom eBay does not have a current email or postal address. * * * Beginning on about February 27, 2015, the Claims Administrator also provided toll-free telephone support and assistance for Class Members with questions about the Settlement.

Id. at 601. Should an Internet-only notice be sufficient? Is there a concern that spam messages might cause some emails to go unread? On the other hand, could it be that technological advances have enhanced the class action's legitimacy by making it easier for class members who receive notice to monitor class counsel and to communicate concerns through social media? See Cabraser & Issacharoff, The Participatory Class Action, 92 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 846 (2017).

842

Back-end notice—when the lawsuit is settled, dismissed, or otherwise resolved—differs from front-end notice in two important ways: first, notice must be given to all class members, and second, the notice must be directed “in a reasonable manner”—not the “best notice that is practicable,” as required under Rule 23(c)(2). See Rule 23(e). When parties seek simultaneously to certify a settlement class and to settle the class action, see p. 853, infra, courts typically combine the elements of Rule 23(c) notice with that of Rule 23(e). Notice must be complete and accurate, but courts have held that due process does not require the notice to advise absentees of every ground upon which an objection might be mounted to the settlement. Rather, the notice must provide enough information—or opportunities to access information—so that the unnamed class members “may come to their own conclusions about whether the settlement serves their interests.” Grunin v. Int'l House of Pancakes, 513 F.2d 114, 122 (8th Cir. 1975). On this basis, the Sixth Circuit held that “the due-process baseline” was met when the notice provided an address, phone number, and website to obtain more information about a proposed class settlement. See Gooch v. Life Inv'rs Ins. Co. of Am., 62 F.3d 402 (6th Cir. 2012).

iii. The Cost of Notice

The Court has held that the costs of providing certification notice must be borne by the party seeking class treatment. EISEN v. CARLISLE & JACQUELIN, 417 U.S. 156, 94 S.Ct. 2140, 40 L.Ed.2d 732 (1974). Eisen involved antitrust and securities law claims by “odd-lot” stock traders on the New York Stock Exchange. The proposed class was said to include six million individuals, institutions, and intermediaries, and with “reasonable effort” it was thought possible to identify two million investors by name and address. After conducting a preliminary inquiry into the merits and finding that plaintiff was “more than likely” to prevail, the district court allocated a share of the cost of notice to defendants. The Supreme Court reversed, finding that individual notice had to be provided to class members who could be identified with reasonable effort, and that Rule 23 did not authorize shifting the cost of such notice from plaintiff to defendant:

In the absence of any support under Rule 23, petitioner's effort to impose the cost of notice on respondents must fail. The usual rule is that a plaintiff must initially bear the cost of notice to the class. * * * Where, as here, the relationship between the parties is truly adversary, the plaintiff must pay for the cost of notice as part of the ordinary burden of financing his own suit.

Id. at 178–79, 94 S.Ct. at 2153, 40 L.Ed.2d at 749. The named plaintiff's claim in Eisen involved an individual stake of $70; the cost of notice was estimated to exceed $20,000. The Court acknowledged that “[e]conomic reality dictates that petitioner’s suit proceed as a class action or not at all.” Id. at 161, 94 S.Ct. at 2144, 40 L.Ed.2d at 739.

In OPPENHEIMER FUND, INC. v. SANDERS, 437 U.S. 340, 98 S.Ct. 2380, 57 L.Ed.2d 253 (1978), the Court held that Rule 23 authorized a district court “to order one of the parties to perform the tasks necessary to send notice,” and that Eisen did not foreclose apportioning some of the costs of those tasks to defendant as part of the court’s order. The Court admonished that “courts must not stray too far from the principle underlying [Eisen] that the representative plaintiff should bear all costs relating to the sending of notice because it is he who seeks to maintain the suit as a class action.” Id. at 359, 98 S.Ct. at 2393, 57 L.Ed.2d at 270. However, the Court made clear that in some circumstances, the cost of carrying out the task will be so insubstantial as to make it administratively inconvenient to shift the charge to plaintiff; moreover, some tasks are carried out by defendant “in any event in the ordinary course of its business” and the expense should not be shifted to plaintiff. In Oppenheimer Fund, the information requested was contained in documents in the hands of a third-party transfer agent, and the representative party was required to pay the costs of extracting the information from the documents.

Relying on Oppenheimer Fund, the Third Circuit in Larson v. AT&T Mobility LLC, 687 F.3d 109 (3d Cir. 2012), held it was an abuse of discretion for the district court to refuse to order defendant-Sprint to run a computer search of its billing records to help identify class members:

* * * Sprint has acknowledged here that the database search * * * “could result in the identification of millions of Settlement Class Members.” * * * The cost of identifying those “millions” of class members is approximately $100,000. If only two million people were identified through that billing records search, the search would have cost approximately 5 cents per class member identified in 2009. Including the expense of mailing the individual notice, the cost would have been approximately 43 cents per class member. Given the size of the class and the due process rights at stake, these are not troublingly high sums.

* * *

* * * [W]e fail to see why running those search inquiries is unreasonable, and no explanation for that conclusion was provided by the District Court. In fact, the effort that would be required here seems less significant than the efforts required in Oppenheimer Fund, * * * (requiring transfer agent’s employees to “sort manually through a considerable volume of paper records, keypunch between 150,000 and 300,000 computer cards, and create eight new computer programs for use with records kept on computer tapes that either [were] in existence or would have to be created from the paper records.”) * * *.

Id. at 128–29 (alteration in original).

The cost question is different at the settlement stage of the class suit, when liability has been established. At this point, defendant typically reimburses the cost of notice. As the Ninth Circuit explained in 2009:

So far as we are aware, no appellate court has addressed in a published opinion whether a district court’s determination that a class action defendant is liable on the merits entitles the district court to shift notice costs to that defendant. This absence of authority is not surprising. Because the losing party in a class action typically is responsible for class notice costs, there is no need for an appellate court reviewing a final merits judgment also to review a notice cost order that is based on a party’s liability.

Hunt v. Imperial Merch. Servs., Inc., 560 F.3d 1137, 1142 (9th Cir. 2009). In some cases, courts have shifted notice costs to defendant if the representative party has shown some success on the merits, for example, through a preliminary injunction or partial summary judgment. Id. at 1143.

c.Appointing Class Counsel

The 1966 version of Rule 23 did not discuss the appointment of class counsel. The rule was amended in 2003 to require that the court’s certification order make such an appointment. See Rule 23(g). The court also has authority to designate interim counsel before determining whether to certify the action. The amendment responded to concerns about costs of class counsel and conflicts between class counsel and the class. Compare Coffee, Jr., Class Action Accountability: Reconciling Exit, Voice, and Loyalty in Representative Litigation, 100 Colum.L.Rev. 370 (2000), with Gilles & Friedman, Exploding the Class Action Agency Costs Myth: The Social Utility of Entrepreneurial Lawyers, 155 U.Pa.L.Rev. 103 (2006).

At the core of the concern is the uneasy fit between the traditional conception of the attorney-client relationship and the class action. In an individual lawsuit, it is assumed that (1) the attorney gives advice to the client and the client makes final decisions about litigation strategy, and (2) the attorney acts with virtually unmitigated loyalty to the client and in the client’s best interest. Class action litigation strains both of these notions. Class action attorneys exercise unusually significant control over decisions made on behalf of the class, and have authority—subject to court approval—to settle an action. But what is “loyalty to the client” when it is not clear who the “client” is? Should the attorney give complete loyalty to the interests and wishes of the class representative? To those of each member of the class? To the attorney’s conception of the best interests of the class as a whole? Another complication is that class actions may involve a large number of independent lawyers or legal teams representing interests that might be in tension with each other even if they do not raise a conflict sufficient to defeat class certification. See Kane, Of Carrots and Sticks: Evaluating the Role of the Class Action Lawyer, 66 Tex.L.Rev. 385, 390 (1987).

The rule sets out factors that must be considered in making the appointment, and essentially codifies practice as it had developed under the 1966 rule. See Manesh, The New Class Action Rule: Procedural Reforms in an Ethical Vacuum, 18 Geo.J.Legal Ethics 923, 929–31 (2005). The 2003 amendment to Rule 23(g) does not replace methods for class-counsel selection to the extent they exist under other federal statutes. One such statute is the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, see p. 653, supra, under which courts occasionally have used an “auction” to select lead counsel. See Harel & Stein, Auctioning for Loyalty: Selection and Monitoring of Class Counsel, 22 Yale L. & Pol’y Rev. 69 (2004).

What is the relationship between the appointment of counsel and the court’s assessment of adequacy of representation under Rule 23(a)(4)? As one district court has explained:

Rule 23(a)(4) requires that the class representative adequately represent the putative class. In the past, courts evaluating that requirement routinely examined both the adequacy of the named plaintiff and the adequacy of class counsel. * * * In the Second Circuit, class counsel was considered adequate if she was “qualified, experienced and generally able” to conduct the litigation. See In re Drexel Burnham Lambert Group, Inc., 960 F.2d 285, 291 (2d Cir. 1992) * * *.

The 2003 Amendments to Rule 23 changed this framework somewhat, shifting the court’s examination of the adequacy of counsel to coincide with its new duty to appoint class counsel under Rule 23(g). * * * The Advisory Committee nonetheless observed how Rule 23(g) was only intended to build upon judicial experience in evaluating counsel, “rather than introduc[e] an entirely new element into the class certification process.” See Fed.R.Civ.P. 23 Advisory Committee’s Notes to the 2003 Amendments. Thus, while there may be confusion about which part of Rule 23 requires an examination of the adequacy of counsel, * * * it is clear that the court’s analysis remains largely the same.

Kalish v. Karp & Kalamotousakis, LLP, 246 F.R.D. 461, 463 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).

4.RULE 23(f): INTERLOCUTORY APPEALS FROM CERTIFICATION ORDERS

Certification is among the most critical stages in the life of a class action. In particular, most class actions are settled before they go to trial, and certification determines the relative leverage that the parties bring to the negotiation table. For the party opposing the class, a certification order also threatens unfavorable publicity and other adverse reputational effects. Rule 23(f) was added in 1998 to allow interlocutory appeal from an order granting or denying class certification. The decision to grant the appeal rests with the court of appeals. The Advisory Committee Note accompanying Rule 23(f) explains:

* * * [M]any suits with class-action allegations present familiar and almost routine issues that are not more worthy of immediate appeal than many other interlocutory rulings. Yet several concerns justify expansion of present opportunities to appeal. An order denying certification may confront the plaintiff with a situation in which the only sure path to appellate review is by proceeding to final judgment on the merits of an individual claim that, standing alone, is far smaller than the costs of litigation. An order granting certification, on the other hand, may force a defendant to settle rather than incur the costs of defending a class action and run the risk of potentially ruinous liability.

See Solimine & Hines, Deciding To Decide: Class Action Certification and Interlocutory Review by the United States Courts of Appeals under Rule 23(f), 41 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 1531, 1599 (2000).

Courts typically consider three factors in deciding whether to grant or deny an appeal. As the First Circuit has explained:

* * * First, an appeal ordinarily should be permitted when a denial of class status effectively ends the case (because, say, the named plaintiff’s claim is not of a sufficient magnitude to warrant the costs of stand-alone litigation). Second, an appeal ordinarily should be permitted when the grant of class status raises the stakes of the litigation so substantially that the defendant likely will feel irresistible pressure to settle. Third, an appeal ordinarily should be permitted when it will lead to clarification of a fundamental issue of law.

Waste Mgmt. Holdings, Inc. v. Mowbray, 208 F.3d 288, 293 (1st Cir. 2000). Other circuits have expressed “caution against routinely granting appellate review” under Rule 23(f), out of concern that the district court “may feel constrained from revisiting the issue and thereby potentially triggering a new round of appellate proceedings with the inevitable delay and effort of such proceedings.” Prado-Steiman v. Bush, 221 F.3d 1266, 1272–73 (11th Cir. 2000).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Rule 23(f) requires that a petition to appeal be filed within 14 days after the order granting or denying certification is entered (under the original rule, the time period was ten days). In NUTRACEUTICAL CORP. v. LAMBERT, 586 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct. 710, 203 L.Ed.2d 43 (2019), the Supreme Court held that this time-period is not jurisdictional, but rather is a claim-processing rule (because it is found in a rule of procedure promulgated by the Supreme Court and not enacted by Congress). The Court also held, however, that the 14-day appeal period cannot be equitably tolled. The Court relied primarily on Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 26(b), which generally allows for extensions of time limits for good cause but specifically prohibits an extension of time to file for permission to appeal. The Court distinguished cases allowing appeals when a motion for reconsideration had been filed within 14 days of the decertification decision on the ground that until such a motion was decided, there was no final order by the trial court to trigger the start of the 14-day appeal period.

2.In MICROSOFT v. BAKER, 137 S.Ct. 1702, 198 L.Ed.2d 132 (2017), plaintiffs chose to stipulate to a dismissal of their individual claims after the denial of their Rule 23 certification motion and of their request to appeal. Final judgment in hand, plaintiffs then appealed from the denial of class certification. The Ninth Circuit heard the appeal, and reversed the district court’s denial of class certification. The Supreme Court held that the Ninth Circuit lacked appellate jurisdiction, finding that the use of a voluntary dismissal worked an impermissible end-run around Rule 23(f). However, in Brown v. Cinemark USA, Inc., 876 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 2017), the Ninth Circuit held that Microsoft v. Baker did not bar it from considering an appeal of a case in which the district court denied class certification and dismissed some individual claims, and the parties then settled the remaining individual claims. The settlement explicitly reserved the representative’s right to appeal the district court’s judgment denying certification and dismissing individual claims. Finding no evidence of “sham tactics to achieve an appealable final judgment,” the Ninth Circuit distinguished a “mutual settlement” from the kind of “unilateral dismissal” that attempted “to sidestep Rule 23(f).” Id. at 1201.

5.RULE 23(d): ORDERS REGULATING THE CONDUCT OF PRETRIAL AND TRIAL PROCEEDINGS

Rule 23(d) authorizes the district court to issue orders regulating the conduct of class action proceedings. To illustrate, the court may create a timetable for discovery and for the presentation of issues at trial; set time limits on oral presentations made by counsel; establish a committee of counsel (consisting of the attorneys representing various members of the class) to make decisions about the prosecution of the class case; and regulate the substantive aspects of discovery (for example, by determining the parties from whom discovery may be sought and the items which may be requested).

848

Frequently, courts will issue the management orders after they have held a pretrial conference. In this regard, consider how the timing of the court’s certification order under Rule 23(c) affects its later management of the lawsuit. The 2003 amendment to Rule 23(c) requires the court to order a denial or grant of certification “at an early practicable time,” replacing the prior requirement that certification be made “as soon as practicable.” Postponing the timing of certification affords the court an opportunity, as needed, to examine the merits and even to order discovery prior to an early dispositive motion.

As part of their orders conducting the action, courts in some cases have developed supplementary proceedings to “individualize” aspects of a class suit that vary with the relief sought. See Garth, Conflict and Dissent in Class Actions: A Suggested Perspective, 77 Nw.U.L.Rev. 492, 518–20 (1982). For example, class suits for damages inevitably create problems that are not present in traditional binary litigation. The court in these damages class actions must complete three analytically separate tasks: it must determine if defendant is liable; it must calculate the amount of damages to the class; and, it must distribute the proper share of the award to individual class members. One or more of these tasks may demand fragmentation or “individualization” of the class. See Edelman, Nagareda & Silver, The Allocation Problem in Multiple-Claimant Representations, 14 Sup.Ct.Econ.Rev. 95 (2006); Rosenberg, Individual Justice and Collectivizing Risk-Based Claims in Mass-Exposure Cases, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 210 (1996).

Courts have approached the task of individualization in different ways and are continuing to develop judicial techniques to assure efficiency and fairness. One approach is to use a single trial to determine defendant’s liability (if any) and the amount of damages. These determinations are based on the representative’s individual claims, which in some cases are supplemented by statistics and expert testimony. When liability and the amount of damages are set, the court determines how to distribute the class award among individual class members. A related approach is that of the “single issue” class action under Rule 23(c)(4), although the question remains whether the provision is an independent basis for certification. See Hines, Codifying the Issue of Class Action, 16 Nev.L.J. 625 (2016).

Another approach is that of the bifurcated trial. The first trial considers only the issue of liability, using the same evidence techniques as would be used in an ordinary proceeding. The second trial, which occurs only if defendant is found liable, addresses the amount of damages. This second proceeding may be a highly individualized one (involving, for example, mini-trials on individual damages claims, or administrative proceedings on individual claims), or it may be a general proceeding designed to calculate the damages to the class as a whole.

849

A third approach, known as “sampling,” involves the judge selecting some individual cases at random to adjudicate and then combining the outcomes of these sample cases to yield results for the larger class population. The sample cases receive their actual awards, but the others all receive the statistically determined sum. The Supreme Court disapproved a variation of the “sampling” approach in Wal-Mart, p. 810, supra, because it was said to deprive defendant of its right to employ statutory defenses to defeat individual claims, thereby violating the Rules Enabling Act.

Courts sometimes use a fourth approach—the “fluid class recovery”—in cases in which the costs of identifying and distributing the award exceed the award due each class member, or when the amount of money that can be distributed to class members does not exhaust the amount of defendant’s liability as determined at trial. In such cases, the class award is used to provide a general benefit to class members spread evenly, rather than individual compensation. For example, in Daar v. Yellow Cab Co., 67 Cal.2d 695, 63 Cal.Rptr. 724, 433 P.2d 732 (1967), a class action was brought against a taxi company to recover alleged overcharges to passengers. Since it was impossible to identify each person who had been overcharged, the court ordered defendant to lower its prices to all riders for a certain period of time.

Some courts have incorporated cy pres distributions into the class action. See Chasin, Modernizing Class Action Cy Pres Through Democratic Inputs: A Return to Cy Pres Comme Possible, 163 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1463 (2015). This approach was undertaken in Shaw v. Toshiba Am. Info. Sys., Inc., 91 F.Supp.2d 942 (E.D.Tex. 2000), a class action alleging the manufacture of faulty computer disks. The court approved a settlement valued at $2.1 billion and the settlement agreement provided:

If the cash fund is not exhausted by claims from class members, the remaining funds will be distributed to a charity which will use the funds to purchase Toshiba laptop and desktop computers and distribute them in the United States to schools, churches, non-profit organizations, libraries, hospitals, and the poor. No portion will revert to Toshiba.

Id. at 981. Unclaimed funds of about $350 million were used to establish a charity for the establishment of technology centers in schools and community-based organizations. In its first ten years of operation, the foundation distributed $100 million dollars to about 5,000 groups. See Beaumont Foundation of America, 2011 Annual Report. See also In re

850

Pharm. Indus. Average Wholesale Price Litig., 588 F.3d 24 (1st Cir. 2009) (affirming approval of $24 million settlement out of which an estimated $6.8 million was to be distributed to charities). However, in Nachshin v. AOL, LLC, 663 F.3d 1034 (9th Cir. 2011), a challenge to promotional messages illegally inserted into AOL’s emails to subscribers, the Ninth Circuit disapproved a cy pres distribution on the ground that it failed to address the objectives of the underlying statutes, to target the class, or to provide reasonable certainty that class members would benefit. The court emphasized that although the class was nationwide, distributions were made to “geographically isolated and substantively unrelated charities.” See Bone, Justifying Class Action Limits: Parsing the Debates Over Ascertainability and Cy Pres, 65 U.Kan.L.Rev. 913 (2017). The American Law Institute has proposed that unclaimed funds should be used for further distributions to participating class members unless the amounts are too small for individual distributions to be administered economically. Only then would a cy pres distribution be used, with approval of the court. American Law Institute, Principles of the Law of Aggregate Litigation § 3.07 (2010).

For discussions of different judicial techniques, see Bone, Statistical Adjudication: Rights, Justice, and Utility in a World of Process Scarcity, 46 Va.L.Rev. 561 (1993); Cheng, When 10 Trials Are Better than 1000: An Evidentiary Perspective on Trial Sampling, 160 U.Pa.L.Rev. 955 (2012); Fallon, Grabill & Wynne, Bellwether Trials in Multidistrict Litigation, 82 Tul.L.Rev. 2323 (2008).

6.RULE 23(e): SETTLEMENT OR COMPROMISE OF A CLASS SUIT

Rule 23(e) imposes a virtually unique obligation on the district court to approve any decision to settle, dismiss, or compromise a class action. Rule 23(e) reflects the same philosophical concerns that already have been discussed in connection with adequacy of representation. First, due process demands that the absent class members be protected from an unfair settlement made because the representative parties have lost their enthusiasm for the litigation or are themselves receiving a substantial benefit at the expense of the absentees. In addition, the efficiency and economy objectives of Rule 23 would be subverted if the judgment produced by the settlement proves to be vulnerable to collateral attack, a situation that might arise if the settlement does not take proper account of the rights of the absent class members. Because notice is required at this stage, the absentees have an opportunity to assess the terms of the proposed judgment before they are bound by it, and the court must hold a hearing and make findings before making a final disposition. The settlement of class actions remains one of the most controversial features of Rule 23 practice. See Rubenstein, The Fairness Hearing: Adversarial and

851

Regulatory Approaches, 53 UCLA L.Rev. 1435 (2006); Rutherglen, Better Late Than Never: Notice and Opt Out at the Settlement Stage of Class Actions, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 258 (1996).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Proponents of a settlement have the burden of satisfying Rule 23(e)(2). Generally, in assessing whether a proposed settlement is fair, reasonable, and adequate, the district court assesses a variety of factors, which include: the merits of the case weighed against the terms of the settlement; defendant’s financial condition; the expense and complexity of continuing to litigate the suit; and opposition to the settlement. See Marshall v. National Football League, 787 F.3d 502 (8th Cir. 2015). Additional factors may include the experience and views of counsel; the extent of discovery; and the presence of a government participant. Hanlon v. Chrysler Corp., 150 F.3d 1011 (9th Cir. 1998).

2. Whether the class as a whole favors the proposed settlement is an extremely important consideration in the court’s assessment. The preference of any particular class member, however, is not dispositive. Settlements can be approved over the objections of the class representatives, as well as those of absent class members who have received and responded to the settlement notice. Objecting class members are free to appeal the court’s decision approving the settlement when a judgment based on it is entered. See Issacharoff & Nagareda, Class Settlements Under Attack, 156 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1649 (2008); Leslie, The Significance of Silence: Collective Action Problems and Class Action Settlements, 59 Fla.L.Rev. 71 (2007).

3.What weight ought a court give to bonus payments—known as “incentive awards”—made to the representative party as part of a proposed settlement? Such awards are a fairly typical feature of a class settlement, and are ordered because of the party’s vigilance in securing compensation for the class; contribution to the public interest in redressing legal violations that might otherwise have gone unredressed; or assumption of reputational risk associated with the action. See Eisenberg & Miller, Incentive Awards to Class Action Plaintiffs: An Empirical Study, 53 UCLA L.Rev. 1303 (2006). Should the court scrutinize such awards to ensure against intra-class conflict and self-serving representation? In Staton v. Boeing Co., 327 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2003), the Ninth Circuit disapproved a settlement agreement when the bonus payments suggested that the representatives were “more concerned with maximizing [their own] incentives than with judging the adequacy of the settlement as it applies to class members at large.” Id. at 977–78. The Eleventh Circuit has gone further to hold that incentive payments to class representatives—notwithstanding their ubiquity—are prohibited. See Johnson v. NPAS Solutions, LLC, 975 F.3d 1244, 1255–61 (11th Cir. 2020).

4.The Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA) imposes special requirements on settlements that rely on “coupons.” See 28 U.S.C. § 1712. Coupons typically permit the class members to purchase goods at a discount from defendant. See

852

Leslie, The Need to Study Coupon Settlements in Class Action Litigation, 18 Geo.J. Legal Ethics 1395 (2005). Although CAFA does not prohibit coupon settlements, the statute limits the award of attorney’s fees to class counsel with respect to the portion of a settlement that will be distributed as a coupon payment. See 28 U.S.C. § 1712(a)–(c). What concerns do coupon settlements raise? See Klonoff & Herman, The Class Action Fairness Act: An Ill-Conceived Approach to Class Settlements, 80 Tul.L.Rev. 1695 (2006).

7.RULE 23(h): ATTORNEY’S FEES

Federal Rule 23(h), adopted in 2003, authorizes the court to award a reasonable attorney’s fee in any action certified as a class action. Long before the amendment made this power explicit, courts routinely awarded fees to the attorney of the prevailing representative party. Fees also are available under specific statutes. See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 1988(b); 42 U.S.C. § 2000e–5(k). In other contexts, courts have awarded attorney’s fees out of the “common fund” created for the benefit of class members by the recovery from defendant due to class counsel’s efforts. The Supreme Court has rejected the argument that fee awards under a common fund theory are impermissible. Boeing Co. v. Van Gemert, 444 U.S. 472, 100 S.Ct. 745, 62 L.Ed.2d 676 (1980).

Courts use different approaches to set the amount of the fee. See Resnik, Curtis & Hensler, Individuals Within the Aggregate: Relationships, Representation, and Fees, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 296 (1996). In a case that produces a common fund recovery, the court may apply a percentage to the fund to determine the amount that should be awarded, an approach generally endorsed by the American Law Institute. See Masters v. Wilhelmina Model Agency, Inc., 473 F.3d 423 (2d Cir. 2007); American Law Institute, Principles of the Law of Aggregate Litigation § 3.13. An alternative approach, referred to as the “lodestar,” looks to the number of hours expended by each lawyer on the case, multiplied by a “normal billing rate,” and adjusts the result, up or down, for discretionary factors such as the riskiness of the lawsuit and the quality of the attorney’s performance. The Supreme Court has discouraged the use of risk multipliers in lawsuits involving statutory fee provisions. See Perdue v. Kenny A. ex rel. Winn, 559 U.S. 542, 130 S.Ct. 1662, 176 L.Ed.2d 494 (2010).

Fee awards may generate media attention, especially when the attorney’s fee exceeds the monetary benefit accorded any individual class member. However, empirical studies suggest that large fees are awarded only when the case presented a high risk and produced a large recovery for the class. See Eisenberg, Miller & Germano, Attorneys’ Fees in Class Actions: 2009–2013, 92 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 937 (2017); see also Eisenberg & Miller, Attorney Fees in Class Action Settlements: An Empirical Study, 1 J. Empirical Legal Stud. 27 (2004); Willging, Hooper & Niemic, An Empirical Analysis of Rule 23 To Address the Rulemaking Challenges, 71

853

N.Y.U.L.Rev. 74 (1996). Indeed, some commentators suggest that fee awards in small-stakes class actions are too low. See Fitzpatrick, Do Class Action Lawyers Make Too Little?, 158 U.Pa.L.Rev. 2043 (2010). In some cases the appeals court has overturned a settlement because of concerns that the ratio of attorney’s fees to the class recovery suggests self-dealing or inadequacy of representation. See Redman v. RadioShack Corp., 768 F.3d 622 (7th Cir. 2014), cert. denied, 574 U.S. 1156, 135 S.Ct. 1429, 191 L.Ed.2d 366 (2015).

D. SETTLEMENT CLASSES

A class action based on a mass tort or statutory violation potentially involves hundreds of thousands of individual injuries. As such, a defendant faces exposure for a large number of claims. At the same time, plaintiffs suffer the cost of injuries that may involve loss of income, medical bills, and emotional distress. If the class suit is litigated to judgment, both parties are exposed to large and unpredictable transaction costs but achieve finality that results from the preclusive effect of the judgment. Under these circumstances, it may be economically rational for the parties to use the filing of a class action as the occasion to negotiate a global settlement of claims in order to reduce costs and uncertainty.

In AMCHEM PRODS., INC. v. WINDSOR, 521 U.S. 591, 117 S.Ct. 2231, 138 L.Ed.2d 689 (1997), the Court considered whether a diversity class action filed for the purpose of securing a “global settlement” of all current and future asbestos-related claims by millions of individuals was appropriately certified under Rule 23. The complaint was accompanied by a stipulation of settlement intended to bar all class members, whether or not represented by class counsel, from litigating claims not filed before a specified date for all “for present and future asbestos-related personal injury or death.” Id. at 603, 117 S.Ct. at 2240, 138 L.Ed.2d at 701. The stipulation contemplated establishment of an administrative mechanism for carrying out and monitoring relief, and set out a schedule of payments for qualifying injuries; the amounts were not adjustable for inflation and could not be revised even if state law recognized the claim. Under the terms of the settlement, class members were to be precluded by the decree “in perpetuity,” but defendants could withdraw from the settlement after ten years. Id. at 605, 117 S.Ct. at 2241, 138 L.Ed.2d at 701. Although claimants had a right to opt-out, this option was limited, and those who chose to litigate were barred from seeking punitive damages or asserting any claim for increased risk of cancer. The settlement also provided for monitoring and for attorney’s fees. The district court approved the settlement, rejecting all objections and declining to create subclasses for claimants with different injuries. The Third Circuit reversed and decertified the class settlement, and the Supreme Court affirmed. First, the Supreme Court made clear that “[s]ettlement is relevant to a class certification,” id. at 619, 117 S.Ct. at 2248, 138 L.Ed.2d at 710, and that when faced with a settlement-only class certification motion, the district court was required to consider the provisions of Rule 23(a) and (b); it could not confine its review to a fairness inquiry under Rule 23(e). Justice Ginsburg explained:

854

Confronted with a request for settlement-only class certification, a district court need not inquire whether the case, if tried, would present intractable management problems, * * * for the proposal is that there be no trial. But other specifications of the Rule—those designed to protect absentees by blocking unwarranted or overbroad class definitions—demand undiluted, even heightened, attention in the settlement context. Such attention is of vital importance, for a court asked to certify a settlement class will lack the opportunity, present when a case is litigated, to adjust the class, informed by the proceedings as they unfold.

* * *

Id. at 620, 117 S.Ct. at 2248, 138 L.Ed.2d at 710–11.

Turning next to the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3), the Court considered and rejected the district court’s conclusion that commonality was satisfied by the class members’ “shared experience of asbestos exposure” and their common interest in receiving prompt compensation. Id. at 622, 117 S.Ct. at 2248, 138 L.Ed.2d at 710–11. The Court also declined to find commonality based on whether the settlement itself was fair:

The benefits asbestos-exposed persons might gain from the establishment of a grand-scale compensation scheme is a matter fit for legislative consideration, * * * but it is not pertinent to the predominance inquiry. That inquiry trains on the legal or factual questions that qualify each class member’s case as a genuine controversy, questions that preexist any settlement. * * *

The Rule 23(b)(3) predominance inquiry tests whether proposed classes are sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation. See 7A Wright, Miller, & Kane 518–519. * * * The inquiry appropriate under Rule 23(e), on the other hand, protects unnamed class members “from unjust or unfair settlements affecting their rights when the representatives become fainthearted before the action is adjudicated or are able to secure satisfaction of their individual claims by a compromise.” See 7B Wright, Miller, & Kane § 1797, at 340–341. But it is not the mission of Rule 23(e) to assure the class cohesion that legitimizes representative action in the first place. If a common interest in a fair compromise could satisfy the predominance requirement of Rule 23(b)(3), that vital prescription would be stripped of any meaning in the settlement context.

855

Id. at 623, 117 S.Ct. at 2249–50, 138 L.Ed.2d at 712–13. The members of the class, in the Court’s view, were separated by “disparate questions”; differences in state law governing the class members’ claims compounded these disparities. Id. at 624, 117 S.Ct. at 2250, 138 L.Ed.2d at 713–14. Exposure-only claimants, for example, lacked commonality with claimants who had present injuries and faced current medical expenses. The Court made clear, however, that in some situations, a settlement class could meet the commonality test:

* * * Predominance is a test readily met in certain cases alleging consumer or securities fraud or violations of the antitrust laws. * * * Even mass tort cases arising from a common cause or disaster may, depending upon the circumstances, satisfy the predominance requirement. The Advisory Committee for the 1966 revision of Rule 23, it is true, noted that “mass accident” cases are likely to present “significant questions, not only of damages but of liability and defenses of liability, . . . affecting the individuals in different ways.” * * * And the Committee advised that such cases are “ordinarily not appropriate” for class treatment. * * * But the text of the Rule does not categorically exclude mass tort cases from class certification, and District Courts, since the late 1970’s, have been certifying such cases in increasing number. * * * The Committee’s warning, however, continues to call for caution when individual stakes are high and disparities among class members great. As the Third Circuit’s opinion makes plain, the certification in this case does not follow the counsel of caution. That certification cannot be upheld, for it rests on a conception of Rule 23(b)(3)’s predominance requirement irreconcilable with the Rule’s design.

Id. at 624–25, 117 S.Ct. at 2250, 138 L.Ed.2d at 713–14.

The Court also found that the class did not meet the adequacy requirement of Rule 23(a)(4):

As the Third Circuit pointed out, named parties with diverse medical conditions sought to act on behalf of a single giant class rather than on behalf of discrete subclasses. In significant respects, the interests of those within the single class are not aligned. Most saliently, for the currently injured, the critical goal is generous immediate payments. That goal tugs against the interest of exposure-only plaintiffs in ensuring an ample, inflation-protected fund for the future. * * *

856

The disparity between the currently injured and exposure-only categories of plaintiffs, and the diversity within each category are not made insignificant by the District Court’s finding that petitioners’ assets suffice to pay claims under the settlement. * * * Although this is not a “limited fund” case certified under Rule 23(b)(1)(B), the terms of the settlement reflect essential allocation decisions designed to confine compensation and to limit defendants’ liability. For example, as earlier described, * * * the settlement includes no adjustment for inflation; only a few claimants per year can opt out at the back end; and loss-of-consortium claims are extinguished with no compensation.

The settling parties, in sum, achieved a global compromise with no structural assurance of fair and adequate representation for the diverse groups and individuals affected. Although the named parties alleged a range of complaints, each served generally as representative for the whole, not for a separate constituency. * * *

Id. at 627, 117 S.Ct. at 2251, 138 L.Ed.2d at 715. Finally, although the Court recognized the need for a nationwide administrative solution to the difficult problem of asbestos-exposure injuries, in its view Rule 23 did not support the parties’ global solution:

The argument is sensibly made that a nationwide administrative claims processing regime would provide the most secure, fair, and efficient means of compensating victims of asbestos [exposure] * * *. Congress, however, has not adopted such a solution. And Rule 23, which must be interpreted with fidelity to the Rules Enabling Act and applied with the interests of absent class members in close view, cannot carry the large load * * * heaped upon it. As this case exemplifies, the rulemakers’ prescriptions for class actions may be endangered by “those who embrace [Rule 23] * * * too enthusiastically just as [they are by] those who approach [the Rule] * * * with distaste.” C. Wright, Law of Federal Courts 508 (5th ed.1994) * * *.

Id. at 628, 117 S.Ct. at 2252, 138 L.Ed.2d at 716.

Justice Breyer, joined by Justice Stevens, concurred in part and dissented in part.

Although I agree with the Court’s basic holding that “[s]ettlement is relevant to a class certification,” * * * I find several problems in its approach that lead me to a different conclusion. First, I believe that the need for settlement in this mass tort case, with hundreds of thousands of lawsuits, is greater than the Court’s opinion suggests. Second, I would give more weight than would the majority to settlement-related issues for purposes of determining whether common issues predominate. Third, I am uncertain about the Court’s determination of adequacy of representation, and do not believe it appropriate for this Court to second-guess the District Court on the matter without first having the Court of Appeals consider it. Fourth, I am uncertain about the tenor of an opinion that seems to suggest the settlement is unfair. And fifth, in the absence of further review by the Court of Appeals, I cannot accept the majority’s suggestions that “notice” is inadequate.

857

These difficulties flow from the majority’s review of what are highly fact-based, complex, and difficult matters, matters that are inappropriate for initial review before this Court. The law gives broad leeway to district courts in making class certification decisions, and their judgments are to be reviewed by the court of appeals only for abuse of discretion. * * * Indeed, the District Court’s certification decision rests upon more than 300 findings of fact reached after five weeks of comprehensive hearings. Accordingly, I do not believe that we should in effect set aside the findings of the District Court. That court is far more familiar with the issues and litigants than is a court of appeals or are we * * *. * * *

I do not believe that we can rely upon the Court of Appeals’ review of the District Court record, for that review, and its ultimate conclusions, are infected by a legal error. * * * There is no evidence that the Court of Appeals at any point considered the settlement as something that would help the class meet Rule 23. I find, moreover, the fact-related issues presented here sufficiently close to warrant further detailed appellate court review under the correct legal standard. * * *

I

First, I believe the majority understates the importance of settlement in this case. Between 13 and 21 million workers have been exposed to asbestos in the workplace—over the past 40 or 50 years—but the most severe instances of such exposure probably occurred three or four decades ago. * * * This exposure has led to several hundred thousand lawsuits, about 15% of which involved claims for cancer and about 30% for asbestosis. * * * About half of the suits have involved claims for pleural thickening and plaques—the harmfulness of which is apparently controversial. * * * Some of those who suffer from the most serious injuries, however, have received little or no compensation. * * * These lawsuits have taken up more than 6% of all federal civil filings in one recent year, and are subject to a delay that is twice that of other civil suits. * * *

The District Court, when approving the settlement, concluded that it improved the plaintiffs’ chances of compensation and reduced total legal fees and other transaction costs by a significant amount. * * * The court believed the settlement would create a compensation system that would make more money available for plaintiffs who later develop serious illnesses.

I mention this matter because it suggests that the settlement before us is unusual in terms of its importance, both to many potential plaintiffs and to defendants, and with respect to the time, effort, and expenditure that it reflects. All of which leads me to be reluctant to set aside the District Court’s findings without more assurance than I have that they are wrong. * * *

Second, the majority, in reviewing the District Court’s determination that common “issues of fact and law predominate,” says that the predominance “inquiry trains on the legal or factual questions that qualify each class member’s case as a genuine controversy, questions that preexist any settlement.” * * * I find it difficult to interpret this sentence in a way that could lead me to the majority’s conclusion. * * *

The settlement is relevant because it means that these common features and interests are likely to be important in the proceeding that would ensue—a proceeding that would focus primarily upon whether or not the proposed settlement fairly and properly satisfied the interests class members had in common. That is to say, the settlement underscored the importance of (a) the common fact of exposure, (b) the common interest in receiving some compensation for certain rather than running a strong risk of no compensation, and (c) the common interest in avoiding large legal fees, other transaction costs, and delays. * * *

Of course, as the majority points out, there are also important differences among class members. * * * The relevant question, however, is how much these differences matter in respect to the legal proceedings that lie ahead. Many, if not all, toxic tort class actions involve plaintiffs with such differences. And the differences in state law are of diminished importance in respect to a proposed settlement in which the defendants have waived all defenses and agreed to compensate all those who were injured. * * *

These differences might warrant subclasses * * *. Or these differences may be too serious to permit an effort at group settlement. This kind of determination, as I have said, is one that the law commits to the discretion of the district court—reviewable for abuse of discretion by a court of appeals. I believe that we are far too distant from the litigation itself to reweigh the fact-specific Rule 23 determinations and to find them erroneous without the benefit of the Court of Appeals first having restudied the matter with today’s legal standard in mind.

Third, the majority concludes that the “representative parties” will not “fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.” Rule 23(a)(4). It finds a serious conflict between plaintiffs who are now injured and those who may be injured in the future because “for the currently injured, the critical goal is generous immediate payments,” a goal that “tugs against the interest of exposure-only plaintiffs in ensuring an ample, inflation-protected fund for the future.” * * *

I agree that there is a serious problem, but it is a problem that often exists in toxic tort cases. * * * And it is a problem that potentially exists whenever a single defendant injures several plaintiffs, for a settling plaintiff leaves fewer assets available for the others. With class actions, at least, plaintiffs have the consolation that a district court, thoroughly familiar with the facts, is charged with the responsibility of ensuring that the interests of no class members are sacrificed.

But this Court cannot easily safeguard such interests through review of a cold record. “What constitutes adequate representation is a question of fact that depends on the circumstances of each case.” 7A Wright, Miller, & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1765, at 271. * * * The majority’s use of the lack of an inflation adjustment as evidence of inadequacy of representation for future plaintiffs * * * is one example of this difficulty. An inflation adjustment might not be as valuable as the majority assumes if most plaintiffs are old and not worried about receiving compensation decades from now. There are, of course, strong arguments as to its value. But that disagreement is one that this Court is poorly situated to resolve.

* * *

Fourth, I am more agnostic than is the majority about the basic fairness of the settlement. * * * The District Court’s conclusions rested upon complicated factual findings that are not easily cast aside. It is helpful to consider some of them, such as its determination that the settlement provided “fair compensation . . . while reducing the delays and transaction costs endemic to the asbestos litigation process” and that “the proposed class action settlement is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient resolution of the asbestos-related personal injury claims of class members.” * * * Indeed, the settlement has been endorsed as fair and reasonable by the AFL-CIO (and its Building and Construction Trades Department), which represents a “ ‘substantial percentage’ ” of class members, * * * and which has a role in monitoring implementation of the settlement * * *. I do not intend to pass judgment upon the settlement’s fairness, but I do believe that these matters would have to be explored in far greater depth before I could reach a conclusion about fairness. And that task, as I have said, is one for the Court of Appeals.

Id. at 629–640, 117 S.Ct. at 2252–58, 138 L.Ed.2d at 716–23.

In ORTIZ v. FIBREBOARD CORP., 527 U.S. 815, 119 S.Ct. 2295, 144 L.Ed.2d 715 (1999), the Supreme Court again faced the question of the propriety of a settlement class and again decertified the class. Fibreboard was the subject of many personal injury lawsuits arising from exposure to its asbestos products. It already had settled some 45,000 claims, when it decided, together with its insurers and a group of plaintiffs’ lawyers, on a “Global Settlement” of the majority of its remaining liability. Under the plan, Fibreboard and its insurers would put up $1.535 billion for asbestos claimants who would file a Rule 23(b)(1)(B) class action, based on the notion that there was a “limited fund” to pay members of the class.

At the time of the settlement talks, litigation was pending in California state court concerning Fibreboard’s insurance coverage. As a condition of the Global Settlement, plaintiffs’ counsel insisted that Fibreboard and two of its insurers settle the coverage dispute by separate agreement. The resulting “Trilateral Settlement Agreement” required the insurers to create a $2 billion fund for damage payments to plaintiffs should the Global Settlement not receive judicial approval. Plaintiffs then filed a class action lawsuit in federal court in the Eastern District of Texas.

The Global Settlement required Fibreboard and its insurers to place the agreed upon amount in a trust. Individual claimants were provided with a process for settling their claims with the trust. If no settlement could be reached, claimants were required to engage in mediation, arbitration, and a mandatory settlement conference. After exhausting that process a claimant could bring a court proceeding against the trust, but there would be a $500,000 limit on recovery, and punitive damages and prejudgment interest would be barred. The class did not cover all claimants. Some 45,000 individuals who had settled their claims were excluded, along with some 53,000 individuals with pending lawsuits. The trial court, after extensive hearings, found that the class action met the requirements of Rule 23(a) and that it fell within the “limited fund” provision of Rule 23(b)(1)(B). It determined that the plan provided a “fair, reasonable, and adequate” settlement under Rule 23(e). On appeal the Fifth Circuit affirmed both the certification of the class and the adequacy of the settlement.

861

The Court reversed, in an opinion by Justice Souter:

The inherent tension between representative suits and the day-in-court ideal is only magnified if applied to damage claims gathered in a mandatory class. Unlike Rule 23(b)(3) class members, objectors to the collectivism of a mandatory subdivision (b)(1)(B) action have no inherent right to abstain. The legal rights of absent class members (which in a class like this one would include claimants who by definition may be unidentifiable when the class is certified) are resolved regardless either of their consent, or, in a class with objectors, their express wish to the contrary. * * * And in settlement-only class actions the procedural protections built into the Rule to protect the rights of absent class members during litigation are never invoked in an adversarial setting * * *.

* * *

The defect of certification going to the most characteristic feature of a limited fund action was the uncritical adoption by both the District Court and the Court of Appeals of figures agreed upon by the parties in defining the limits of the fund and demonstrating its inadequacy. * * * [I]n an action such as this the settling parties must present not only their agreement, but evidence on which the district court may ascertain the limit and the insufficiency of the fund, with support in findings of fact following a proceeding in which the evidence is subject to challenge * * *.

* * * Although we might assume, arguendo, that prior judicial experience with asbestos claims would allow a court to make a sufficiently reliable determination of the probable total, the District Court here apparently thought otherwise, concluding that “there is no way to predict Fibreboard’s future asbestos liability with any certainty.” * * * Nothing turns on this conclusion, however, since there was no adequate demonstration of the second element required for limited fund treatment, the upper limit of the fund itself, without which no showing of insufficiency is possible.

The “fund” in this case comprised both the general assets of Fibreboard and the insurance assets provided by the two policies * * *. As to Fibreboard’s assets exclusive of the contested insurance, the District Court and the Fifth Circuit concluded that Fibreboard had a then-current sale value of $235 million that could be devoted to the limited fund. While that estimate may have been conservative, * * * at least the District Court heard evidence and made an independent finding at some point in the proceedings. The same, however, cannot be said for the value of the disputed insurance. * * *

862

We do not, of course, know exactly what an independent valuation of the limit of the insurance assets would have shown. * * * [O]bjecting and unidentified class members alike are entitled to have the issue settled by specific evidentiary findings independent of the agreement of defendants and conflicted class counsel.

* * *

The explanation of need for independent determination of the fund has necessarily anticipated our application of the requirement of equity among members of the class. There are two issues, the inclusiveness of the class and the fairness of distributions to those within it. * * *

The definition of the class excludes myriad claimants with causes of action, or foreseeable causes of action, arising from exposure to Fibreboard asbestos. While the class includes those with present claims never filed, present claims withdrawn without prejudice, and future claimants, it fails to include those who had previously settled with Fibreboard while retaining the right to sue again “upon development of an asbestos related malignancy,” plaintiffs with claims pending against Fibreboard at the time of the initial announcement of the Global Settlement Agreement, and the plaintiffs in the “inventory” claims settled as a supposedly necessary step in reaching the global settlement * * *. The number of those outside the class who settled with a reservation of rights may be uncertain, but there is no such uncertainty about the significance of the settlement’s exclusion of the 45,000 inventory plaintiffs and the plaintiffs in the unsettled present cases, estimated by the Guardian Ad Litem at more than 53,000 as of August 27, 1993 * * *. It is a fair question how far a natural class may be depleted by prior dispositions of claims and still qualify as a mandatory limited fund class, but there can be no question that such a mandatory settlement class will not qualify when in the very negotiations aimed at a class settlement, class counsel agree to exclude what could turn out to be as much as a third of the claimants that negotiators thought might eventually be involved, a substantial number of whom class counsel represent * * *.

Might such class exclusions be forgiven if it were shown that the class members with present claims and the outsiders ended up with comparable benefits? * * * [E]ven ostensible parity between settling nonclass plaintiffs and class members would be insufficient to overcome the failure to provide the structural protection of independent representation as for subclasses with conflicting interests.

863

On the second element of equity within the class, the fairness of the distribution of the fund among class members, the settlement certification is likewise deficient. Fair treatment in the older cases was characteristically assured by straightforward pro rata distribution of the limited fund. * * * While equity in such a simple sense is unattainable in a settlement covering present claims not specifically proven and claims not even due to arise, if at all, until some future time, at the least such a settlement must seek equity by providing for procedures to resolve the difficult issues of treating such differently situated claimants with fairness as among themselves.

First, it is obvious after Amchem that a class divided between holders of present and future claims (some of the latter involving no physical injury and to claimants not yet born) requires division into homogeneous subclasses under Rule 23(c)(4)(B)^a, with separate representation to eliminate conflicting interests of counsel. * * * No such procedure was employed here, and the conflict was as contrary to the equitable obligation entailed by the limited fund rationale as it was to the requirements of structural protection applicable to all class actions under Rule 23(a)(4).

Second, the class included those exposed to Fibreboard’s asbestos products both before and after 1959. The date is significant, for that year saw the expiration of Fibreboard’s insurance policy with Continental, the one which provided the bulk of the insurance funds for the settlement. Pre-1959 claimants accordingly had more valuable claims than post-1959 claimants * * *, the consequence being a second instance of disparate interests within the certified class. * * * [T]hese two instances of conflict are well within the requirement of structural protection recognized in Amchem.

* * *

A third contested feature of this settlement certification that departs markedly from the limited fund antecedents is the ultimate provision for a fund smaller than the assets understood by the Court of Appeals to be available for payment of the mandatory class members’ claims; most notably, Fibreboard was allowed to retain virtually its entire net worth. Given our treatment of the two preceding deficiencies of the certification, there is of course no need to decide whether this feature of the agreement would alone be fatal to the Global Settlement Agreement. To ignore it entirely, however, would be so misleading that we have decided simply to identify the issue it raises, without purporting to resolve it at this time.

864

Fibreboard listed its supposed entire net worth as a component of the total (and allegedly inadequate) assets available for claimants, but subsequently retained all but $500,000 of that equity for itself. * * * On the face of it, the arrangement seems irreconcilable with the justification of necessity in denying any opportunity for withdrawal of class members whose jury trial rights will be compromised, whose damages will be capped, and whose payments will be delayed. With Fibreboard retaining nearly all its net worth, it hardly appears that such a regime is the best that can be provided for class members. Given the nature of a limited fund and the need to apply its criteria at the certification stage, it is not enough for a District Court to say that it “need not ensure that a defendant designate a particular source of its assets to satisfy the class’ claims; [but only that] the amount recovered by the class [be] fair.” * * *

The District Court in this case seems to have had a further point in mind, however. One great advantage of class action treatment of mass tort cases is the opportunity to save the enormous transaction costs of piecemeal litigation, an advantage to which the settlement’s proponents have referred in this case. * * * Although the District Court made no specific finding about the transaction cost saving likely from this class settlement, estimating the amount in the “hundreds of millions” * * *, it did conclude that the amount would exceed Fibreboard’s net worth as the Court valued it * * * (Fibreboard’s net worth of $235 million “is considerably less than the likely savings in defense costs under the Global Settlement”). If a settlement thus saves transaction costs that would never have gone into a class member’s pocket in the absence of settlement, may a credit for some of the savings be recognized in a mandatory class action as an incentive to settlement? It is at least a legitimate question, which we leave for another day.

Id. at 846–61, 119 S.Ct. at 2315–22, 144 L.Ed.2d at 740–49.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Chief Justice Rehnquist concurred in Ortiz, stating that the problem of asbestos-exposure “cries out for a legislative solution.” Justice Ginsburg, writing for the Court in Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Ayers, 538 U.S. 135, 166, 123 S.Ct. 1210, 1229, 155 L.Ed.2d 261, 187 (2003), echoed this view, as she did in Amchem. See Stengel, The Asbestos End-Game, 62 N.Y.U. Ann. Surv. Am. L.

865

223 (2006). Does legislative inaction heighten the need for judicial intervention or undermine its democratic legitimacy? See Carrington, Asbestos Lessons: The Consequences of Asbestos Litigation, 26 Rev. Litig. 583, 611–12 (2007). For competing views, compare Barnes, In Defense of Asbestos Tort Litigation: Rethinking Legal Process Analysis in a World of Uncertainty, Second Bests, and Shared Policy-Making Responsibility, 34 L. & Soc. Inquiry 5 (2009), with Redish & Kastanek, Settlement Class Actions, The Case-or-Controversy Requirement, and the Nature of the Adjudicatory Process, 73 U. Chi. L. Rev. 545 (2006).

2. In decertifying the settlement class in Ortiz, the Supreme Court criticized Fibreboard’s “constructive bankruptcy” (defendant was still a solvent corporation) because it allowed defendant to circumvent the substantive and procedural requirements of federal bankruptcy law. Because the Bankruptcy Code did not actually apply, Fibreboard did not have to accord all its creditors equal treatment, and it was able to place its shareholders ahead of its tort creditors. Thus, Fibreboard was required only to contribute a small sum ($10 million) in comparison to the insurers’ contributions to the fund. The dramatic increase in the company’s stock price that followed the announcement of the settlement terms suggests that the gains conferred upon its stockholders were substantial.

A more common practice has been for corporations to use bankruptcy proceedings as a way of resolving extensive future liability. See, e.g., In re Johns-Manville Corp., 78 F.3d 764 (2d Cir. 1996). Under this approach, the corporation reorganizes its assets to create a trust for which all claimants compete on equal footing. In Johns-Manville, where the company used a bankruptcy proceeding to resolve asbestos-related mass tort claims, the trust was funded by a mix of cash, insurance proceeds, and shares in the reorganized debtor. (Although the company faced significant liability due to its past sales of asbestos products, the contemporary business enterprise remained profitable.) As a result, the tort creditors’ claims were to be satisfied by giving them an “evergreen” source of payments from an ownership stake in the company. However, this approach is not without its problems; settlement funds may be depleted by present claimants entirely, leaving future claimants without recovery. See McKenzie, Toward a Bankruptcy Model for Nonclass Aggregate Litigation, 87 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 960 (2012).

3. The decertification orders in Amchem and Ortiz raised a number of important questions about the future of class action practice. In particular, observers disagreed whether the Court indirectly had announced that class certification was not appropriate for certain mass tort claims, or whether the potential for intra-class conflict simply necessitated closer management of the mass tort class action through the provisional certification of subclasses and appointment of independent counsel for absentees with different interests. Compare Nagareda, Autonomy, Peace, and Put Options in the Mass Tort Class Action, 115 Harv. L. Rev. 747 (2002), with Rosenberg, Mandatory-Litigation Class Action: The Only Option for Mass Tort Cases, 115 Harv. L. Rev. 831 (2002). Amchem and Ortiz also generated conflicting views on how to characterize a mass tort class settlement. From one perspective, the primary actors in the class settlement were the class lawyers who effectively ran a “private administrative regime” that wielded legislative power free of electoral oversight. See Nagareda, Mass Torts in an Age of Settlement (2007). From another, Amchem and Ortiz spurred the district court judge to assume the robust role of case management associated with public law desegregation and environmental litigations. See Marcus, The Short Life and Long Afterlife of the Mass Tort Class Action, 165 U. Pa. L. Rev. 156 (2017). Although some commentators called for curbs on the use of settlement classes, the practice has persisted and adapted in response to the Court’s concerns. To borrow from Mark Twain, reports of the death of settlement class actions are highly exaggerated—to the contrary, “class actions and especially settlement classes, continue to thrive.” Cabraser & Issacharoff, The Participatory Class Action, 92 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 846, 848 (2017).

866

NOTE ON THE NFL CONCUSSION LITIGATION

Starting in 2002, researchers began uncovering evidence that repeated football concussions, and even repeated subconcussive hits, were linked to long term neurological problems. Researchers began diagnosing deceased players with Chronic Traumatic Encephalopathy (CTE), a degenerative brain disease that can only be diagnosed after death. The NFL initially discredited the research, telling players that the evidence of the long term effects of repeated concussions was inconclusive. By 2009, the NFL was forced to acknowledge the link between repeated head injuries and long term neurological problems. The NFL issued new rules to reduce head injuries, including stricter return-to-play guidelines, stating that any player that exhibits symptoms of a concussion should not return to play the same day.

In 2011 former Atlanta Falcons safety Ray Easterling filed the first “concussion lawsuit” against the NFL. He committed suicide the next year, and after his death was diagnosed with CTE. Eventually, more than 4,500 other former players also filed actions in state courts alleging that the NFL had failed to inform them of, and protect them from, the risks of football head injuries. The NFL removed the lawsuits to federal court, and they were consolidated for pretrial purposes under 28 U.S.C. § 1407 in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. In 2013, the NFL began requiring that an independent neurologist be available on the sidelines at every game. These new rules did not satisfy retired players, who faced an unusually high number of neurological problems.

The transferee court ordered mediation before a retired federal judge, and after the terms of a settlement framework were developed, the court appointed a Special Master to assist in assessing the financial terms of settlement. In 2014, plaintiffs filed a class action complaint, and the parties applied to the court for class certification and approval of the settlement. The proposed class included all living NFL football players who retired before July 7, 2014, as well as their representative claimants (those authorized by law to assert the claims of deceased or incapacitated players) and derivative claimants (those who have a legal right to the income of retired players). The class was divided into two subclasses, which were each represented by their own counsel: one class was composed of retired players who had already received a qualifying medical diagnosis under the proposed settlement, and the second was composed of retired players who had not yet received a qualifying diagnosis. The proposed settlement was composed of three parts: $75 million for neurological assessments of retired NFL players, $675 million to compensate retired players with qualifying diagnoses, and a $10 million education fund to educate players about the dangers of head injuries.

867

In January 2014, the district court denied preliminary approval of the settlement. In re Nat'l Football League Players Concussion Injury Litig., 961 F.Supp.2d 708 (E.D.Pa.2014). The court's key concern was that not all retired NFL players with qualifying diagnoses would be compensated before the $ 675 monetary fund was exhausted:

* * * More specifically, the Settlement contemplates a $675 million Monetary Award Fund with a 65-year lifespan for a Settlement Class of approximately 20,000 people. Retired NFL Football Players with a Qualifying Diagnosis of Parkinson's Disease, for example, are eligible for a maximum award of $3.5 million; those with a Qualifying Diagnosis of [Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis] may receive up to $5 million. Even if only 10 percent of Retired NFL Football Players eventually receive a Qualifying Diagnosis, it is difficult to see how the Monetary Award Fund would have the funds available over its lifespan to pay all claimants at these significant award levels.

Id. at 715.

Five months later, the parties reached a revised settlement agreement with an uncapped monetary award fund, which the court approved as a Rule 23(b)(3) class. In re Nat'l Football League Players Concussion Injury Litig., 307 F.R.D. 351 (E.D.Pa.2015). The revised, uncapped monetary award fund provided varying levels of compensation to players who are required to submit proof of certain diagnoses. Awards were to be adjusted for the age of the player when diagnosed, and the number of seasons the player played in the NFL. The fund would remain in place for 65 years, and every class member who registered and qualified during the lifetime of the fund would receive an award.

Two hundred and two class members opted out of the settlement (out of a proposed class of about 22,000) and 205 class members joined objections, which were consolidated before the Third Circuit, which affirmed the district court's decision to certify the class and approve the classwide settlement. In re Nat'l Football League Players Concussion Injury Litig., 821 F.3d 410, 425 (3d Cir. 2016), cert. denied, 137 S.Ct. 607, 196 L.Ed.2d 473 (2016).

In reviewing the district court's decision to certify the class, the appeals court responded to objections about commonality and the adequacy of representation. Objectors argued that the commonality requirement was not met because different players had played different numbers of seasons (which would affect their monetary award) and had played under different conditions. The court distinguished Wal-Mart because the NFL allegedly caused injury to all class members through the same course of conduct, failing to provide players with information about the effects of head injuries or create rules in a timely manner to reduce head injuries. Regarding the adequacy of representation, objectors argued that the class should be decertified on the same grounds as in Amchem—there was a fundamental conflict between those who already had a qualifying diagnosis and those who might receive one in the future. The court distinguished the analysis in Amchem, finding that the subclass structure of the negotiations adequately balanced the interests of each group. The court also dismissed concerns that counsel for one of the subclasses represented plaintiffs from both subclasses, creating a conflict of interest.

868

Objectors also raised fairness concerns about the approval of the settlement. The court found that the settlement was reasonable in light of several factors, including the preceding negotiations and the risks of further litigation. On the issue of discovery, objectors argued that the settlement was not entitled to a presumption of fairness because there had been no formal discovery—the Third Circuit rejected this argument, noting that avoiding the expense of formal discovery was an important bargaining chip for plaintiffs that the court would not do away with.

The final issue reviewed was attorney's fees. The district court deferred that issue until the class was certified and the settlement approved. Objectors argued that this deprived class members of due process. The court found that deferring the fee decision did not violate class members' due process rights, but that the best practice was for the notice to class members to include information about attorney's fees. Objectors also raised concerns about the settlement's "clear sailing provision," a stipulation by the NFL that they would not object to an attorney's fee up to $112.5 million. Objectors argued that this raised concerns about collusion between plaintiffs' attorneys and the NFL. The court found that the clear sailing provisions did not per se prevent approval, although they did warrant close scrutiny.

The Third Circuit found that the subclasses in this case adequately dealt with the type of class conflicts that prevented certification in Amchem.

This was true even though the appointment of subclass counsel was made after negotiations had begun, and that counsel for one subclass represented plaintiffs from both classes. Significantly, the NFL litigation responded to the concerns expressed in Amchem and Ortiz about class conflicts by establishing judicially monitored, structural solutions designed to ensure representational legitimacy and substantive fairness. For example, the district court denied approval to the initial proposed settlement because it capped monetary award funds, and the court was concerned that the cap would unfairly impact players who had not yet received a qualifying diagnosis but might in the future. Some authors have highlighted the importance of electronic communication in the litigation, emphasizing the role that the absentees played as informal monitors in the suit, and the unusually high number of benefits claims that were filed, even before the appeals process concluded. See Cabraser & Issacharoff, The Participatory Class Action, 92 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 846 (2017). Others have focused on the court’s role in managing a process that encouraged the parties’ disclosure of information and the monitoring of intra-group conflicts. See Bradt & Rave, The Information-Forcing Role of the Judge in Multidistrict Litigation, 106 Calif.L.Rev. 1259 (2017). What is clear is that the court, subclass counsel, and parties actively engaged with each other to balance and account for the interests of the different players affected by the NFL’s conduct. See Deubert, Cohen & Lynch, Protecting and Promoting the Health of NFL Players: Legal and Ethical Analysis and Recommendations, 7 Harv. J.Sports & Ent.L. 1 (2016).

E. JURISDICTION AND VENUE

1.SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION

Some of the more difficult questions about subject-matter jurisdiction affecting the class action reflect uncertainty whether Rule 23 is a joinder device or a representative procedure. Within the joinder model, each absentee class member must satisfy jurisdictional and venue requirements; within the representative model, only the named party is significant. As you study these questions, consider whether the Court’s approach to the topic has changed over the years.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. A class action based upon a federal question usually does not raise any special problems of subject-matter jurisdiction. A class action based upon diversity, however, does raise two special questions: first, to which class members should the court look in determining whether there is diversity of citizenship and, second, to which class members should the court look in calculating the jurisdictional amount?

2. In SUPREME TRIBE OF BEN-HUR v. CAUBLE, 255 U.S. 356, 41 S.Ct. 338, 65 L.Ed. 673 (1921), the Court held that determinations of diversity of citizenship in class actions should be based on the citizenship of the named parties only. How does this rule apply to a class action brought by a corporation or an unincorporated association?

3.In SNYDER v. HARRIS, 394 U.S. 332, 89 S.Ct. 1053, 22 L.Ed.2d 319 (1969), Snyder, a shareholder of Missouri Fidelity Union Trust Life Insurance Co., brought suit in federal court against members of the company’s board of directors. Since the petitioner’s allegations showed that she sought for herself only $8,740 in damages, the respondent moved to dismiss on the ground that the matter in controversy did not exceed $10,000 (the requisite jurisdictional amount at the time). Petitioner contended that her claim should be aggregated with those of the other members of her class, approximately 4,000 shareholders of the company stock. If all 4,000 potential claims were aggregated, the amount-in-controversy would be approximately $1,200,000. The Supreme Court held that separate and distinct claims could not be aggregated. It noted that “[a]ggregation has been permitted only (1) in cases in which a single plaintiff seeks to aggregate two or more of his claims against a single defendant and (2) in cases where two or more plaintiffs unite to enforce a single title or right in which they have a common or undivided interest.” Id. at 335, 89 S.Ct. at 1056, 22 L.Ed.2d at 323.

In ZAHN v. INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO., 414 U.S. 291, 94 S.Ct. 505, 38 L.Ed.2d 511 (1973), owners of property fronting on Lake Champlain in Orwell, Vermont, brought a diversity action seeking damages from International Paper Co., a New York corporation, for allegedly polluting the waters of the lake and damaging the value and utility of the surrounding properties. The claims of each of the named plaintiffs were found to satisfy the then-required $10,000 jurisdictional amount, but the district court was convinced “to a legal certainty” that not every individual owner in the class had suffered pollution damages in excess of $10,000. The Court held that each plaintiff in a Rule 23(b)(3) class action must satisfy the jurisdictional-amount requirement. Again, the majority opinion rested on the traditional rules that courts had used for aggregating claims.

However, in EXXON MOBIL CORP. v. ALLAPATTAH SERVICES, INC., p. 365, supra, the Court held, five-to-four, that the 1990 enactment of the supplemental jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1367, effectively overruled Zahn. The Court explained that when the complaint includes “at least one claim that satisfies the amount-in-controversy requirement, and there are no other relevant jurisdictional defects, the district court, beyond all question, has original jurisdiction over that claim,” and that the court then “can turn to the question whether it has a constitutional and statutory basis for exercising supplemental jurisdiction over the other claims in the action.” The Court found “[n]othing in the text of § 1367(b)” that could be read to withhold “supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of plaintiffs certified as class-action members pursuant to Rule 23.” 545 U.S. at 559–60, 125 S.Ct. at 2620–21, 162 L.Ed.2d at 521–22. Does Allapattah affect the result in Snyder v. Harris?

4.In 2005, Congress enacted the Class Action Fairness Act, and special subject-matter jurisdiction rules apply to classes certified under that statute and to what are called “mass actions,” which are defined as actions seeking to try jointly monetary relief claims involving common questions of law or fact for 100 or more persons.

Amount-in-Controversy Requirement: CAFA authorizes federal jurisdiction over class actions in which the amount in controversy exceeds the sum of $5 million. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(2). Importantly, CAFA allows for the aggregation of individual claims to meet the amount-in-controversy requirement. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(6). What if a named plaintiff files a class action in state court and signs a binding stipulation limiting the damages sought to less than $5 million? Will such a stipulation defeat removal under CAFA? The Supreme Court has held that a stipulation of this sort is not binding on absent class members and therefore will not preclude federal jurisdiction under CAFA. See Standard Fire Ins. Co. v. Knowles, 568 U.S. 558, 133 S.Ct. 1345, 185 L.Ed.2d 439 (2013).

871

Diversity of Citizenship: CAFA authorizes federal jurisdiction upon a showing that any class member’s state of citizenship is different from the state of citizenship of any defendant. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(2)(A). The statute also confers federal jurisdiction over class actions in which a citizen of a foreign state and a citizen of a United States state are on opposing sides. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(2)(B); 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(2)(C).

Mandatory Denial of Federal Jurisdiction: CAFA excludes various categories of class actions from the statute’s scope. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(4)(A) establishes what has been dubbed the “local controversy” exception: It bars federal jurisdiction when, among other requirements, greater than two-thirds of class plaintiffs are citizens of the state in which the action was originally filed; at least one of the primary defendants is a citizen of that state; and the “principal injuries” resulting from the alleged conduct of each defendant occurred in that state. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(4)(B), setting out the so-called “home state” exception, prohibits federal jurisdiction when two-thirds or more of the proposed class plaintiffs, in addition to the “primary defendants,” are citizens of the state in which the action was filed. Other mandatory exceptions to federal jurisdiction are set forth in 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(5)(A) (primary defendants are states, state officials, or other governmental entities); 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(5)(B) (the class contains “less than 100” members); and 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(9)(A)–(B) (the action “solely involves a claim” regarding certain securities and corporate governance issues).

Discretionary Denial of Federal Jurisdiction: CAFA gives district courts discretion to decline jurisdiction based on an assessment of six enumerated factors. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(3)(A)–(F). In Sorrentino v. ASN Roosevelt Ctr., LLC, 588 F.Supp.2d 350, 359 (E.D.N.Y. 2008), the court held that a discretionary remand under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(3) turned on the totality of circumstances and did not require satisfying all of the enumerated factors.

Removal: One of CAFA’s major changes to the default rules of diversity jurisdiction is to expand the ability to remove a class action from state court to federal court. Under the statute, any defendant may remove the case, regardless of the consent of the other defendants. 28 U.S.C. § 1453(b). Moreover, CAFA permits a defendant to remove even if the party is a citizen of the state in which the action was brought. Id. The statute also eliminates the one-year limitation that usually applies to removal, id., and provides for discretionary review of a district court’s decision to grant or deny a motion to remand to state court. 28 U.S.C. § 1453(c)(1). In DART CHEROKEE BASIN OPERATING CO., LLC v. OWENS, 574 U.S. 81, 135 S.Ct. 547, 190 L.Ed.2d 495 (2014), the Court held that a defendant’s notice of removal needs to include only a plausible allegation that the amount-in-controversy exceeds the $5,000,000 jurisdictional threshold. If that assertion is challenged, both sides must submit proof and the court is to decide, by a preponderance of the evidence standard, whether the amount-in-controversy requirement is met. See p. 385, supra.

872

What is the rationale for the unusual treatment of class actions under CAFA?

5. Standing under Article III is a jurisdictional limitation on the power of federal courts to adjudicate a dispute. See p. 719, Note 3, supra. In TRANSUNION LLC v. RAMIREZ, 594 U.S. ___, 141 S.Ct. 2190, 210 L.Ed.2d 568 (2021), the Supreme Court held that each member of a class seeking damages must satisfy Article III’s standing requirement. The class consisted of 8,185 consumers who sued TransUnion, a consumer credit reporting company, in federal court for preparing credit reports with inaccurate personal information. The complaint alleged that TransUnion had added a misleading notice that the class members were on the list of “specially designated nationals” compiled by the United States Treasury Department’s Office of Foreign Assets Control. That list included terrorists, drug traffickers, and others deemed to pose a threat to national security. The class brought claims under state law and under the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA), which regulates entities that provide consumer credit reports. The FCRA includes a cause of action for consumers to recover actual damages, statutory damages, and punitive damages against “[a]ny person who willfully fails to comply” with the statutory requirements. 15 U.S.C. § 1681n(a). The complaint asserted that TransUnion had violated the FCRA by failing to use reasonable procedures to ensure the accuracy of the class members’ credit reports and by failing to provide class members with a summary of rights under the statute and appropriate disclosures about their credit reports.

The district court certified the class over TransUnion’s objections. Before trial, the parties stipulated that TransUnion had disseminated the credit reports of only 1,853 members of the class to potential creditors during the relevant time period. The jury awarded statutory and punitive damages totaling $60 million. A divided panel of the Ninth Circuit reduced the punitive award but held that all members of the class had Article III standing to recover damages. The court also concluded that the class representative’s claims were typical of the class’s claims for purposes of Rule 23.

The Supreme Court reversed as to standing and remanded for the Ninth Circuit to reconsider whether class certification was appropriate. Justice Kavanaugh, joined by four justices, concluded that only the class members whose credit reports had been disseminated to potential creditors “demonstrated concrete reputational harm” sufficient to establish Article III standing to sue in federal court. By contrast, the remaining 6,332 class members whose credit files had not been provided to third parties during the relevant time period had not suffered a concrete harm and thus lacked Article III standing. The majority explained:

As the party invoking federal jurisdiction, the plaintiffs bear the burden of demonstrating that they have standing. Every class member must have Article III standing in order to recover individual damages. “Article III does not give federal courts the power to order relief to any uninjured plaintiff, class action or not.” Tyson Foods, Inc. v. Bouaphakeo, 577 U.S. 442, 466 (2016) (Roberts, C.J., concurring).

594 U.S. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 2207–08, 210 L.Ed.2d at 587. The Court noted, however, that its decision did not “address the distinct question whether every class member must demonstrate standing before a court certifies a class.” Id. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 2208 n.4, 210 L.Ed.2d at 588 n.4. Justice Thomas, joined by three other justices, dissented on the ground that all class members had suffered a violation of private rights granted by Congress to each consumer under the FCRA, and so had standing under Article III to assert their claims.

2.PERSONAL JURISDICTION

PHILLIPS PETROLEUM CO. v. SHUTTS

Supreme Court of the United States, 1985.
472 U.S. 797, 105 S.Ct. 2965, 86 L.Ed.2d 628.

Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Kansas.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

[During the 1970s, Phillips Petroleum produced or purchased natural gas from leased land located in eleven states. Shutts and several other royalty owners possessing rights to leases from which Phillips Petroleum produced the gas brought a class action against the company in a Kansas state court, seeking to recover interest on royalty payments that had been delayed. The trial court certified a class consisting of 33,000 royalty owners. The class representative provided each class member with a notice by first-class mail describing the action and informing each member that he could appear in person or by counsel, that otherwise he would be represented by the named royalty owners, and that class members would be included in the class and bound by the judgment unless they “opted out” of the action by returning a “request for exclusion.” The final class consisted of more than 28,000 members, who resided in all 50 states, the District of Columbia, and several foreign countries. Notwithstanding that over 99 percent of the gas leases in question and some 97 percent of the plaintiff class members had no apparent connection to Kansas except for the lawsuit, the trial court applied Kansas contract and equity law to every claim and found Phillips Petroleum liable for interest on the suspended royalties to all class members. The Kansas Supreme Court affirmed despite the company’s contentions that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prevented Kansas from adjudicating the claims of all the class members, and that the Due Process Clause and the Full Faith and Credit Clause prohibited application of Kansas law to all of the transactions between it and the class members.]

* * *

I

* * *

* * * As a class-action defendant petitioner is in a unique predicament. If Kansas does not possess jurisdiction over this plaintiff class, petitioner will be bound to 28,100 judgment holders scattered across the globe, but none of these will be bound by the Kansas decree. Petitioner could be subject to numerous later individual suits by these class members because a judgment issued without proper personal jurisdiction over an absent party is not entitled to full faith and credit elsewhere and thus has no res judicata effect as to that party. Whether it wins or loses on the merits, petitioner has a distinct and personal interest in seeing the entire plaintiff class bound by res judicata just as petitioner is bound. The only way a class action defendant like petitioner can assure itself of this binding effect of the judgment is to ascertain that the forum court has jurisdiction over every plaintiff whose claim it seeks to adjudicate, sufficient to support a defense of res judicata in a later suit for damages by class members.

While it is true that a court adjudicating a dispute may not be able to predetermine the res judicata effect of its own judgment, petitioner has alleged that it would be obviously and immediately injured if this class-action judgment against it became final without binding the plaintiff class. We think that such an injury is sufficient to give petitioner standing on its own right to raise the jurisdiction claim in this Court.

* * *

II

Reduced to its essentials, petitioner’s argument is that unless out-of-state plaintiffs affirmatively consent, the Kansas courts may not exert jurisdiction over their claims. Petitioner claims that failure to execute and return the “request for exclusion” provided with the class notice cannot constitute consent of the out-of-state plaintiffs; thus Kansas courts may exercise jurisdiction over these plaintiffs only if the plaintiffs possess the sufficient “minimum contacts” with Kansas as that term is used in cases involving personal jurisdiction over out-of-state defendants. E.g., International Shoe Co. v. Washington * * * [p. 95, supra]. Since Kansas had no prelitigation contact with many of the plaintiffs and leases involved, petitioner claims that Kansas has exceeded its jurisdictional reach and thereby violated the due process rights of the absent plaintiffs.

In International Shoe we were faced with an out-of-state corporation which sought to avoid the exercise of personal jurisdiction over it as a defendant by a Washington state court. We held that the extent of the defendant's due process protection would depend "upon the quality and nature of the activity in relation to the fair and orderly administration of the laws * * *." We noted that the Due Process Clause did not permit a

875

State to make a binding judgment against a person with whom the State had no contacts, ties, or relations. * * * If the defendant possessed certain minimum contacts with the State, so that it was "reasonable and just, according to our traditional conception of fair play and substantial justice" for a State to exercise personal jurisdiction, the State could force the defendant to defend himself in the forum, upon pain of default, and could bind him to a judgment. * * *

The purpose of this test, of course, is to protect a defendant from the travail of defending in a distant forum, unless the defendant's contacts with the forum make it just to force him to defend there. As we explained in Woodson * * * [p. 114, supra] the defendant's contacts should be such that "he should reasonably anticipate being haled" into the forum. * * * In Insurance Corp. of Ireland v. Compagnie des Bauxites de Guinee * * * [p. 194, supra] we explained that the requirement that a court have personal jurisdiction comes from the Due Process Clause's protection of the defendant's personal liberty interest, and said that the requirement "represents a restriction on judicial power not as a matter of sovereignty, but as a matter of individual liberty." * * *

Although the cases like Shaffer [v. Heitner, p. 210, supra,] and Woodson which petitioner relies on for a minimum contacts requirement all dealt with out-of-state defendants or parties in the procedural posture of a defendant, * * * petitioner claims that the same analysis must apply to absent class-action plaintiffs. In this regard petitioner correctly points out that a chose in action is a constitutionally recognized property interest possessed by each of the plaintiffs. * * * An adverse judgment by Kansas courts in this case may extinguish the chose in action forever through res judicata. Such an adverse judgment, petitioner claims, would be every bit as onerous to an absent plaintiff as an adverse judgment on the merits would be to a defendant. Thus, the same due process protections should apply to absent plaintiffs: Kansas should not be able to exert jurisdiction over the plaintiffs' claims unless the plaintiffs have sufficient minimum contacts with Kansas.

We think petitioner's premise is in error. The burdens placed by a State upon an absent class-action plaintiff are not of the same order or magnitude as those it places upon an absent defendant. An out-of-state defendant summoned by a plaintiff is faced with the full powers of the forum State to render judgment against it. The defendant must generally hire counsel and travel to the forum to defend itself from the plaintiff's claim, or suffer a default judgment. The defendant may be forced to participate in extended and often costly discovery, and will be forced to respond in damages or to comply with some other form of remedy imposed by the court should it lose the suit. The defendant may also face liability for court costs and attorney's fees. These burdens are substantial, and the minimum contacts requirement of the Due Process Clause prevents the forum State from unfairly imposing them upon the defendant.

876

A class-action plaintiff, however, is in quite a different posture. The Court noted this difference in Hansberry v. Lee * * * [p. 804, supra] which explained that a "class" or "representative" suit was an exception to the rule that one could not be bound by judgment in personam unless one was made fully a party in the traditional sense. * * * As the Court pointed out in Hansberry, the class action was an invention of equity to enable it to proceed to a decree in suits where the number of those interested in the litigation was too great to permit joinder. The absent parties would be bound by the decree so long as the named parties adequately represented the absent class and the prosecution of the litigation was within the common interest. * * *

Modern plaintiff class actions follow the same goals, permitting litigation of a suit involving common questions when there are too many plaintiffs for proper joinder. Class actions also may permit the plaintiffs to pool claims which would be uneconomical to litigate individually. For example, this lawsuit involves claims averaging about $100 per plaintiff; most of the plaintiffs would have no realistic day in court if a class action were not available.

In sharp contrast to the predicament of a defendant haled into an out-of-state forum, the plaintiffs in this suit were not haled anywhere to defend themselves upon pain of a default judgment. As commentators have noted, from the plaintiffs' point of view a class action resembles a "quasi-administrative proceeding, conducted by the judge." * * *

A plaintiff class in Kansas and numerous other jurisdictions cannot first be certified unless the judge, with the aid of the named plaintiffs and defendant, conducts an inquiry into the common nature of the named plaintiffs' and the absent plaintiffs' claims, the adequacy of representation, the jurisdiction possessed over the class, and any other matters that will bear upon proper representation of the absent plaintiffs' interest. * * * Unlike a defendant in a civil suit, a class-action plaintiff is not required to fend for himself. * * * The court and named plaintiffs protect his interests. Indeed, the class-action defendant itself has a great interest in ensuring that the absent plaintiffs' claims are properly before the forum. In this case, for example, the defendant sought to avoid class certification by alleging that the absent plaintiffs would not be adequately represented and were not amenable to jurisdiction. * * *

The concern of the typical class-action rules for the absent plaintiffs is manifested in other ways. Most jurisdictions, including Kansas, require that a class action, once certified, may not be dismissed or compromised without the approval of the court. In many jurisdictions such as Kansas the court may amend the pleadings to ensure that all sections of the class are represented adequately. * * *

Besides this continuing solicitude for their rights, absent plaintiff class members are not subject to other burdens imposed upon defendants. They need not hire counsel or appear. They are almost never subject to counterclaims or cross-claims, or liability for fees or costs. Absent plaintiff class members are not subject to coercive or punitive remedies. Nor will an adverse judgment typically bind an absent plaintiff for any damages, although a valid adverse judgment may extinguish any of the plaintiff's claims which were litigated.

Unlike a defendant in a normal civil suit, an absent class-action plaintiff is not required to do anything. He may sit back and allow the litigation to run its course, content in knowing that there are safeguards provided for his protection. In most class actions an absent plaintiff is provided at least with an opportunity to "opt out" of the class, and if he takes advantage of that opportunity he is removed from the litigation entirely. This was true of the Kansas proceedings in this case. The Kansas procedure provided for the mailing of a notice to each class member by first-class mail. The notice, as we have previously indicated, described the action and informed the class member that he could appear in person or by counsel, in default of which he would be represented by the named plaintiffs and their attorneys. The notice further stated that class members would be included in the class and bound by the judgment unless they "opted out" by executing and returning a "request for exclusion" that was included in the notice.

Petitioner contends, however, that the "opt out" procedure provided by Kansas is not good enough, and that an "opt in" procedure is required to satisfy the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Insofar as plaintiffs who have no minimum contacts with the forum State are concerned, an "opt in" provision would require that each class member affirmatively consent to his inclusion within the class.

Because States place fewer burdens upon absent class plaintiffs than they do upon absent defendants in nonclass suits, the Due Process Clause need not and does not afford the former as much protection from state-court jurisdiction as it does the latter. The Fourteenth Amendment does protect "persons," not "defendants," however, so absent plaintiffs as well as absent defendants are entitled to some protection from the jurisdiction of a forum State which seeks to adjudicate their claims. In this case we hold that a forum State may exercise jurisdiction over the claim of an absent class-action plaintiff, even though that plaintiff may not possess the minimum contacts with the forum which would support personal jurisdiction over a defendant. If the forum State wishes to bind an absent plaintiff concerning a claim for money damages or similar relief at law,³ it must provide minimal procedural due process protection. The plaintiff must receive notice plus an opportunity to be heard and participate in the litigation, whether in person or through counsel. The notice must be the best practicable, "reasonably calculated, under all the circumstances, to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action and afford them an opportunity to present their objections." * * * The notice should describe the action and the plaintiffs' rights in it. Additionally, we hold that due process requires at a minimum that an absent plaintiff be provided with an opportunity to remove himself from the class by executing and returning an "opt out" or "request for exclusion" form to the court. Finally, the Due Process Clause of course requires that the named plaintiff at all times adequately represent the interests of the absent class members. * * *

We reject petitioner's contention that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires that absent plaintiffs affirmatively "opt in" to the class, rather than be deemed members of the class if they do not "opt out." We think that such a contention is supported by little, if any precedent, and that it ignores the differences between class action plaintiffs, on the one hand, and defendants in non-class civil suits on the other. Any plaintiff may consent to jurisdiction. * * * The essential question, then, is how stringent the requirement for a showing of consent will be.

We think that the procedure followed by Kansas, where a fully descriptive notice is sent first-class mail to each class member, with an explanation of the right to "opt out," satisfies due process. Requiring a plaintiff to affirmatively request inclusion would probably impede the prosecution of those class actions involving an aggregation of small individual claims, where a large number of claims are required to make it economical to bring suit. * * * The plaintiff's claim may be so small, or the plaintiff so unfamiliar with the law, that he would not file suit individually, nor would he affirmatively request inclusion in the class if such a request were required by the Constitution. * * * If, on the other hand, the plaintiff's claim is sufficiently large or important that he wishes to litigate it on his own, he will likely have retained an attorney or have thought about filing suit, and should be fully capable of exercising his right to "opt out."

In this case over 3,400 members of the potential class did "opt out," which belies the contention that "opt out" procedures result in guaranteed jurisdiction by inertia. Another 1,500 were excluded because the notice and "opt out" form was undeliverable. We think that such results show that the

"opt out" procedure provided by Kansas is by no means pro forma, and that the Constitution does not require more to protect what must be the somewhat rare species of class member who is unwilling to execute an "opt out" form, but whose claim is nonetheless so important that he cannot be presumed to consent to being a member of the class by his failure to do so. Petitioner's "opt in" requirement would require the invalidation of scores of state statutes and of the class-action provision of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, * * * and for the reasons stated we do not think that the Constitution requires the State to sacrifice the obvious advantages in judicial efficiency resulting from the “opt out” approach for the protection of the rara avis portrayed by petitioner.

We therefore hold that the protection afforded the plaintiff class members by the Kansas statute satisfies the Due Process Clause. The interests of the absent plaintiffs are sufficiently protected by the forum State when those plaintiffs are provided with a request for exclusion that can be returned within a reasonable time to the court. * * * Both the Kansas trial court and the Supreme Court of Kansas held that the class received adequate representation, and no party disputes that conclusion here. We conclude that the Kansas court properly asserted personal jurisdiction over the absent plaintiffs and their claims against petitioner.

III

The Kansas courts applied Kansas contract and Kansas equity law to every claim in this case, notwithstanding that over 99% of the gas leases and some 97% of the plaintiffs in the case had no apparent connection to the State of Kansas except for this lawsuit. * * * Petitioner protested that the Kansas courts should apply the laws of the States where the leases were located, or at least apply Texas and Oklahoma law because so many of the leases came from those States. The Kansas courts disregarded this contention and found petitioner liable for interest on the suspended royalties as a matter of Kansas law, and set the interest rates under Kansas equity principles.

Petitioner contends that total application of Kansas substantive law violated the constitutional limitations on choice of law mandated by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and the Full Faith and Credit Clause of Article IV, § 1. We must first determine whether Kansas law conflicts in any material way with any other law which could apply. There can be no injury in applying Kansas law if it is not in conflict with that of any other jurisdiction connected to this suit.

Petitioner claims that Kansas law conflicts with that of a number of States connected to this litigation, especially Texas and Oklahoma. These putative conflicts range from the direct to the tangential, and may be addressed by the Supreme Court of Kansas on remand under the correct constitutional standard. * * *

880

The conflicts on the applicable interest rates, alone—which we do not think can be labeled “false conflicts” without a more thorough-going treatment than was accorded them by the Supreme Court of Kansas—certainly amounted to millions of dollars in liability. We think that the Supreme Court of Kansas erred in deciding on the basis that it did that the application of its laws to all claims would be constitutional.

Four Terms ago we addressed a similar situation in Allstate Ins. Co. v. Hague * * * [p. 106, supra]. In that case we were confronted with two conflicting rules of state insurance law. Minnesota permitted the “stacking” of separate uninsured motorist policies while Wisconsin did not. Although the decedent lived in Wisconsin, took out insurance policies and was killed there, he was employed in Minnesota and after his death his widow moved to Minnesota for reasons unrelated to the litigation, and was appointed personal representative of his estate. She filed suit in Minnesota courts, which applied the Minnesota stacking rule.

The plurality in Allstate noted that a particular set of facts giving rise to litigation could justify, constitutionally, the application of more than one jurisdiction’s laws. The plurality recognized, however, that the Due Process Clause and the Full Faith and Credit Clause provided modest restrictions on the application of forum law. These restrictions required “that for a State’s substantive law to be selected in a constitutionally permissible manner, that State must have a significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts, creating state interests, such that choice of its law is neither arbitrary nor fundamentally unfair.” * * * The dissenting Justices were in substantial agreement with this principle. * * *

The plurality in Allstate affirmed the application of Minnesota law because of the forum’s significant contacts to the litigation which supported the State’s interest in applying its law. * * * Kansas’ contacts to this litigation, as explained by the Kansas Supreme Court, can be gleaned from the opinion below.

Petitioner owns property and conducts substantial business in the State, so Kansas certainly has an interest in regulating petitioner’s conduct in Kansas. * * * Moreover, oil and gas extraction is an important business to Kansas, and although only a few leases in issue are located in Kansas, hundreds of Kansas plaintiffs were affected by petitioner’s suspension of royalties; thus the court held that the State has a real interest in protecting “the rights of these royalty owners both as individual residents of [Kansas] and as members of this particular class of plaintiffs.” * * *

Kansas must have a “significant contact or significant aggregation of contacts” to the claims asserted by each member of the plaintiff class, contacts “creating state interests” in order to ensure that the choice of Kansas law is not arbitrary or unfair. * * * Given Kansas’ lack of “interest” in claims unrelated to that State, and the substantive conflict with jurisdictions such as Texas, we conclude that application of Kansas law to every claim in this case is sufficiently arbitrary and unfair as to exceed constitutional limits. * * *

881

When considering fairness in this context, an important element is the expectation of the parties. There is no indication that when the leases involving land and royalty owners outside of Kansas were executed, the parties had any idea that Kansas law would control. Neither the Due Process Clause nor the Full Faith and Credit Clause requires Kansas “to substitute for its own [laws], applicable to persons and events within it, the conflicting statute of another state,” * * * but Kansas “may not abrogate the rights of parties beyond its borders having no relation to anything done or to be done within them.” * * *

Here the Supreme Court of Kansas took the view that in a nationwide class action where procedural due process guarantees of notice and adequate representation were met, “the law of the forum should be applied unless compelling reasons exist for applying a different law.” * * * Whatever practical reasons may have commended this rule to the Supreme Court of Kansas, for the reasons already stated we do not believe that it is consistent with the decisions of this Court. We make no effort to determine for ourselves which law must apply to the various transactions involved in this lawsuit, and we reaffirm our observation in Allstate that in many situations a state court may be free to apply one of several choices of law. But the constitutional limitations laid down in cases such as Allstate * * * must be respected even in a nationwide class action.

We therefore affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court of Kansas insofar as it upheld the jurisdiction of the Kansas courts over the plaintiff class members in this case, and reverse its judgment insofar as it held that Kansas law was applicable to all of the transactions which it sought to adjudicate. We remand the case to that court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE POWELL took no part in the decision of this case.

[JUSTICE STEVENS wrote an opinion concurring in Parts I and II of the Court’s opinion and dissenting from Part III.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. On remand to the Kansas courts after the Supreme Court’s decision in Shutts, Phillips Petroleum continued to press the argument that the laws of five states (Louisiana, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas, and Wyoming) differed in important respects from the law of Kansas—in particular on the issue of liability for interest on suspended royalties and on the issue of the applicable interest rate where liability is found. These two issues constituted the heart of the legal controversy in the case, and the five identified states embraced 97 percent of the leases involved. In addressing this argument, the Kansas Supreme Court first analyzed the Supreme Court’s decision in Shutts:

882

* * * As to the choice of law question, however, it was ruled the application of Kansas law to all of the investors’ claims for interest violated the due process and full faith and credit clauses. In its analysis, the Court first noted that if the law of Kansas was not in conflict with any of the other jurisdictions connected to the suit, then there would be no injury in applying the law of Kansas. * * * The Court then cited differences in the laws of Kansas, Texas, and Oklahoma which Phillips contended existed. It appears, however, no analysis was made by the Court to determine whether these differences existed in fact. * * *

Shutts v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 240 Kan. 764, 767, 732 P.2d 1286, 1291 (1987), cert. denied, 487 U.S. 1223, 108 S.Ct. 2883, 101 L.Ed.2d 918 (1988) (emphasis in original).

The Kansas court then examined the laws of the five states—only to conclude that none of the five was in conflict with the law of Kansas. It therefore entered a new judgment reflecting no change in the original outcome of the case regarding liability and the applicable prejudgment interest rate. See Miller & Crump, Jurisdiction and Choice of Law in Multistate Class Actions After Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 96 Yale L.J. 1 (1986).

2. In Shaffer v. Heitner, p. 210, supra, the Court stated that “all assertions of state-court jurisdiction must be evaluated according to the standards set forth in International Shoe and its progeny.” Does Shutts mean that class plaintiffs are not entitled to this protection? Or is Shutts based upon the inference of consent from a class member’s failure to opt-out of the class? If so, is that inference accurate or appropriate? Compare Wolff, Federal Jurisdiction and Due Process in the Era of the Nationwide Class Action, 156 U.Pa.L.Rev. 2035, 2086–89 (2008), with Kahan & Silberman, Matsushita and Beyond: The Role of State Courts in Class Actions Involving Exclusive Federal Claims, 1996 Sup.Ct.Rev. 219, 263–64. What are the implications of Shutts for class actions in which class members reside abroad? Should such cases require an affirmative opt-in? See Bassett, Implied “Consent” to Personal Jurisdiction in Transnational Class Litigation, 2004 Mich. St.L.Rev. 619. Do you agree?

3. In Castano, p. 830, supra, differences in state law were a ground for decertification of the class. Would it be unfair to apply the law of a single state, such as defendant’s principal place of business, to a class action that involves a multistate transaction with unnamed class members from multiple states? See Kramer, Choice of Law in Complex Litigation, 71 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 547 (1996). Should federal courts hearing actions under the Class Action Fairness Act have authority to develop their own choice-of-law rules? See p. 517, Note 4, supra.

4. Consider the requirement of personal jurisdiction in its conventional context—the power of the court to enter a judgment against a defendant.

883

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., p. 173, supra, held that the California court could not exercise specific jurisdiction over claims by non-Californians whose injuries did not arise out of defendant’s in-state activity. Bristol-Myers involved complex joinder; it was not a class action. Does the decision foreclose a nationwide class filed anywhere other than defendant’s home state of incorporation or principal place of business? The Supreme Court has yet to address the issue, but the lower courts have begun to do so.

In MUSSAT v. IQVIA, INC., 953 F. 3d 441 (7th Cir. 2020), plaintiff, an Illinois resident, sued defendant, a Delaware corporation with its principal place of business in Pennsylvania, for violations of the Telephone Consumer Protection Act, 47 U.S.C. § 227. Plaintiff filed the case in the Northern District of Illinois and sought to represent a nationwide class of similarly situated persons. Because it was not subject to general personal jurisdiction in Illinois, defendant moved to strike the class allegations on the ground that the district court did not have personal jurisdiction over the claims of the non-Illinois class members. The district court agreed with defendant and held, based on Bristol-Myers, that each class member had to show minimum contacts between defendant and Illinois with respect to that class member’s claim. The Seventh Circuit granted an interlocutory appeal under Rule 23(f) and reversed because “the principles announced in Bristol-Myers do not apply to the case of a nationwide class action filed in federal court under a federal statute.” 953 F. 3d at 443. The court explained why the class action context was different from the mass joinder involved in Bristol-Myers:

Although Bristol-Myers arose in the context of consolidated individual suits, the district court in our case thought that the Bristol-Myers approach to personal jurisdiction should be extended to certified class actions. It held that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment precludes the exercise of personal jurisdiction over a defendant where “nonresident, absent members [of a class] seek to aggregate their claims with an in-forum resident, even though the defendant allegedly injured the nonresidents outside of the forum.” * * * This meant, the court realized, that nationwide class actions will, as a practical matter, be impossible any time the defendant is not subject to general jurisdiction. This would have been far from the routine application of personal-jurisdiction rules that Bristol-Myers said it was performing. * * *

Procedural formalities matter, however, as the Supreme Court emphasized in Taylor v. Sturgell, 553 U.S. 880, 128 S.Ct. 2161, 171 L.Ed.2d 155 (2008), where it stressed the importance of class certification as a pre-requisite for binding a nonparty (including an unnamed class member) to the outcome of a suit. * * * With that in mind, it rejected the notion of “virtual representation” as an end-run around the careful procedural protections outlined in Rule 23. * * * Class actions, in short, are different from many other types of aggregate litigation, and that difference matters in numerous ways for the unnamed members of the class.

884

Bristol-Myers neither reached nor resolved the question whether, in a Rule 23 class action, each unnamed member of the class must separately establish specific personal jurisdiction over a defendant. In holding otherwise, the district court failed to recognize the critical distinction between this case and Bristol-Myers. The Bristol-Myers plaintiffs brought a coordinated mass action, which * * * does not involve any absentee litigants. * * * [A]ll of the plaintiffs are named parties to the case. * * * In a Rule 23 class action, by contrast, the lead plaintiffs earn the right to represent the interests of absent class members by satisfying all four criteria of Rule 23(a) and one branch of Rule 23(b). The absent class members are not full parties to the case for many purposes.

The proper characterization of the status of absent class members depends on the issue. As the Supreme Court [has] recognized * * * “[n]onnamed class members . . . may be parties for some purposes and not for others. The label ‘party’ does not indicate an absolute characteristic, but rather a conclusion about the applicability of various procedural rules that may differ based on context.” * * * For example, absent class members are not considered parties for assessing whether the requirement of diverse citizenship under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 has been met. * * * As long as the named representative meets the amount-in-controversy requirement, jurisdiction exists over the claims of the unnamed members. * * * Nor are absent class members considered when a court decides whether it is the proper venue. * * * We see no reason why personal jurisdiction should be treated any differently from subject-matter jurisdiction and venue: the named representatives must be able to demonstrate either general or specific personal jurisdiction, but the unnamed class members are not required to do so.

* * *

The rules for class certification support a focus on the named representative for purposes of personal jurisdiction. Rule 23(b)(3), for example, governs damages class actions. Among the factors it lists is “the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum.” The Committee Note to this provision mentions that a court should consider the desirability of the forum “in contrast to allowing the claims to be litigated separately in forums to which they would ordinarily be brought.” * * * These provisions recognize that a class action may extend beyond the boundaries of the state where the lead plaintiff brings the case. And nothing in the Rules frowns on nationwide class actions, even in a forum where the defendant is not subject to general jurisdiction.

Finally, it is worth recalling that the Supreme Court in Bristol-Myers expressly reserved the question whether its holding extended to the federal courts at all. 137 S. Ct. at 1784 (“[S]ince our decision concerns the due process limits on the exercise of specific jurisdiction by a State, we leave open the question whether the Fifth Amendment imposes the same restrictions on the exercise of personal jurisdiction by a federal court.”). In addition, the opinion does not reach the question whether its holding would apply to a class action. Id. at 1789 n.4 (Sotomayor, J., dissenting) (“The Court today does not confront the question whether its opinion here would also apply to a class action.”). Fitting this problem into the broader edifice of class-action law, we are convinced that * * * the absentees are more like nonparties, and thus there is no need to locate each and every one of them and conduct a separate personal-jurisdiction analysis of their claims.

885

953 F. 3d at 445–48.

As the Mussat opinion explains, absent class members are taken into consideration for some procedural requirements but not others. Is there a coherent explanation for when a court does or does not look beyond the named representatives in a class action? Is it sensible that each class member must have Article III standing (a jurisdictional requirement in federal court), see TransUnion, p. 872, supra, but that absent class members are not considered when a court determines if it has diversity jurisdiction or if venue is proper? Does the role of absent class members in these threshold procedural determinations depend on whether the class action is best viewed as a joinder or a representative device?

3.VENUE

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. When venue is based on residence, 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b)(1), does it make sense to look only at the residence of the named representative and not that of the absent class members? See 7A Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1757 (4th ed.).
2. Where to locate venue was a significant threshold question in Wal-Mart, p. 810, supra, involving employment discrimination claims under the Title VII statute, which has a special venue provision. Plaintiffs filed their suit in the Northern District of California, and defendant countered by moving to dismiss for improper venue or, alternatively, for transfer to the Western District of Arkansas, where its headquarters is located. The district court denied the motion. Although four of the six named plaintiffs did not satisfy Title VII’s venue requirements, the court cured the defect by dismissing them from the action. Dukes v. Wal-Mart, Inc., 2001 WL 1902806, *9–10 (N.D.Cal. 2001). Could the improperly venued plaintiffs rejoin the class as absent class members? Could the court have relied on a theory of pendent venue to fill the venue gap? See p. 408, Note 5, supra. In a nationwide class action, would a geographically diverse set of named plaintiffs better represent the interests of absent class members? See Hoffman, How Many Plaintiffs Are Enough? Venue in Title VII Class Actions, 42 U.Mich.J.L. Reform 843 (2009).

886

3. Should the named plaintiff’s choice of venue be given deference when defendant moves to transfer under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a)? Why not? See *Roling v. E*Trade Sec., LLC*, 756 F.Supp.2d 1179, 1185 (N.D.Cal.2010); Glass v. S & M NuTec, LLC, 456 F.Supp.2d 498, 504 (S.D.N.Y.2006).

F. THE PRECLUSIVE EFFECT OF A CLASS ACTION JUDGMENT

COOPER V. FEDERAL RESERVE BANK OF RICHMOND
Supreme Court of the United States, 1984.
467 U.S. 867, 104 S.Ct. 2794, 81 L.Ed.2d 718.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

JUSTICE STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question to be decided is whether a judgment in a class action determining that an employer did not engage in a general pattern or practice of racial discrimination against the certified class of employees precludes a class member from maintaining a subsequent civil action alleging an individual claim of racial discrimination against the employer.

I

On March 22, 1977, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission commenced a civil action against respondent, the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond. * * * Respondent operates a branch in Charlotte, N.C. (the Bank), where during the years 1974–1978 it employed about 350–450 employees in several departments. The EEOC complaint alleged that the Bank was violating § 703(a) of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by engaging in “policies and practices” that included “failing and refusing to promote blacks because of race.” * * *

Six months after the EEOC filed its complaint, four individual employees * * * were allowed to intervene as plaintiffs. * * * In due course, the District Court entered an order conditionally certifying the following class pursuant to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 23(b)(2) and (3):

“All black persons who have been employed by the defendant at its Charlotte Branch Office at any time since January 3, 1974 * * * who have been discriminated against in promotion, wages, job assignments and terms and conditions of employment because of their race.” * * *

After certifying the class, the District Court ordered that notice be published in the Charlotte newspapers and mailed to each individual member of the class. The notice described the status of the litigation, and plainly stated that members of the class “will be bound by the judgment or other determination” if they did not exclude themselves by sending a written notice to the Clerk. * * * Among the recipients of the notice were Phyllis Baxter and five other individuals employed by the Bank. * * * It is undisputed that these individuals—the Baxter petitioners—are members of the class represented by the intervening plaintiffs and that they made no attempt to exclude themselves from the class.

887

At the trial the intervening plaintiffs, as well as the Baxter petitioners, testified. The District Court found that the Bank had engaged in a pattern and practice of discrimination from 1974 through 1978 by failing to afford black employees opportunities for advancement and assignment equal to opportunities afforded white employees in pay grades 4 and 5. Except as so specified, however, the District Court found that “there does not appear to be a pattern and practice of discrimination pervasive enough for the court to order relief.” * * * Finally, the court somewhat cryptically stated that although it had an opinion about “the entitlement to relief of some of the class members who testified at trial,” it would defer decision of such matters to a further proceeding. * * *

Thereafter, on March 24, 1981, the Baxter petitioners moved to intervene, alleging that each had been denied a promotion for discriminatory reasons. * * * The District Court stated: “The court has found no proof of any classwide discrimination above grade 5 and, therefore, they are not entitled to participate in any Stage II proceedings in this case.” * * * The court added that it could “see no reason why, if any of the would be intervenors are actively interested in pursuing their claims, they cannot file a Section 1981 suit next week. . .” * * *.

A few days later the Baxter petitioners filed a separate action against the Bank alleging that each of them had been denied a promotion because of their race in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1981. The Bank moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground that each of them was a member of the class that had been certified in the Cooper litigation, that each was employed in a grade other than 4 or 5, and that they were bound by the determination that there was no proof of any classwide discrimination above grade 5. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss, but certified its order for interlocutory appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). The Bank’s interlocutory appeal from the order was then consolidated with the Bank’s pending appeal in the Cooper litigation.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit reversed the District Court’s judgment on the merits in the Cooper litigation, concluding that (1) there was insufficient evidence to establish a pattern or practice of racial discrimination in grades 4 and 5, and (2) two of the intervening plaintiffs had not been discriminated against on account of race. EEOC v. Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, 698 F.2d 633 (4th Cir.

888

1983). The court further held that under the doctrine of res judicata, the judgment in the Cooper class action precluded the Baxter petitioners from maintaining their individual race discrimination claims against the Bank. The court thus reversed the order denying the Bank’s motion to dismiss in the Baxter action, and remanded for dismissal of the Baxter complaint. We granted certiorari to review that judgment * * *, and we now reverse.

II

Claims of two types were adjudicated in the Cooper litigation. First, the individual claims of each of the four intervening plaintiffs have been finally decided in the Bank’s favor. * * * Those individual decisions do not, of course, foreclose any other individual claims. Second, the class claim that the Bank followed “policies and practices” of discriminating against its employees has also been decided. * * * It is that decision on which the Court of Appeals based its res judicata analysis.

There is of course no dispute that under elementary principles of prior adjudication a judgment in a properly entertained class action is binding on class members in any subsequent litigation. * * * Basic principles of res judicata (merger and bar or claim preclusion) and collateral estoppel (issue preclusion) apply. A judgment in favor of the plaintiff class extinguishes their claim, which merges into the judgment granting relief. A judgment in favor of the defendant extinguishes the claim, barring a subsequent action on that claim. A judgment in favor of either side is conclusive in a subsequent action between them on any issue actually litigated and determined, if its determination was essential to that judgment.

III

* * *

The crucial difference between an individual’s claim of discrimination and a class action alleging a general pattern or practice of discrimination is manifest. The inquiry regarding an individual’s claim is the reason for a particular employment decision, while “at the liability stage of a pattern-or-practice trial the focus often will not be on individual hiring decisions, but on a pattern of discriminatory decisionmaking.” * * *

This distinction was critical to our holding in General Telephone Co. of Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 102 S.Ct. 2364, 72 L.Ed.3d 740 (1982), that an individual employee’s claim that he was denied a promotion on racial grounds did not necessarily make him an adequate representative of a class composed of persons who had allegedly been refused employment for discriminatory reasons.

* * *

Falcon thus holds that the existence of a valid individual claim does not necessarily warrant the conclusion that the individual plaintiff may successfully maintain a class action. It is equally clear that a class plaintiff’s attempt to prove the existence of a companywide policy, or even a consistent practice within a given department, may fail even though discrimination against one or two individuals has been proved. The facts of this case illustrate the point.

889

The District Court found that two of the intervening plaintiffs, Cooper and Russell, had both established that they were the victims of racial discrimination but, as the Court of Appeals noted, they were employed in grades higher than grade 5 and therefore their testimony provided no support for the conclusion that there was a practice of discrimination in grades 4 and 5. * * * Given the burden of establishing a prima facie case of a pattern or practice of discrimination, it was entirely consistent for the District Court simultaneously to conclude that Cooper and Russell had valid individual claims even though it had expressly found no proof of any classwide discrimination above grade 5. It could not be more plain that the rejection of a claim of classwide discrimination does not warrant the conclusion that no member of the class could have a valid individual claim. “A racially balanced work force cannot immunize an employer from liability for specific acts of discrimination.” Furnco Construction Corp. v. Waters, 438 U.S., at 579, 98 S.Ct., at 2950–2951.

* * *

The Court of Appeals was correct in generally concluding that the Baxter petitioners, as members of the class represented by the intervening plaintiffs in the Cooper litigation, are bound by the adverse judgment in that case. The court erred, however, in the preclusive effect it attached to that prior adjudication. That judgment (1) bars the class members from bringing another class action against the Bank alleging a pattern or practice of discrimination for the relevant time period and (2) precludes the class members in any other litigation with the Bank from relitigating the question whether the Bank engaged in a pattern and practice of discrimination against black employees during the relevant time period. The judgment is not, however, dispositive of the individual claims the Baxter petitioners have alleged in their separate action. Assuming they establish a prima facie case of discrimination * * *, the Bank will be required to articulate a legitimate reason for each of the challenged decisions, and if it meets that burden, the ultimate questions regarding motivation in their individual cases will be resolved by the District Court. Moreover, the prior adjudication may well prove beneficial to the Bank in the Baxter action: the determination in the Cooper action that the Bank had not engaged in a general pattern or practice of discrimination would be relevant on the issue of pretext. * * *

The Bank argues that permitting the Baxter petitioners to bring separate actions would frustrate the purposes of Rule 23. We think the converse is true. The class-action device was intended to establish a procedure for the adjudication of common questions of law or fact. If the Bank’s theory were adopted, it would be tantamount to requiring that every member of the class be permitted to intervene to litigate the merits of his individual claim.

890

* * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.
It is so ordered.

JUSTICE MARSHALL concurs in the judgment.
JUSTICE POWELL took no part in the decision of this case.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1. Conceptually, why should a class action judgment ever bind an absent member whose interests were not adequately represented in the lawsuit?
- 2.S hould a class action judgment be given collateral estoppel effect in favor of a plaintiff who elected to opt-out of the class action and filed an individual lawsuit? If allowed, wouldn’t this practice enable plaintiffs to benefit from a favorable judgment but not be barred by an unfavorable judgment—even as to the very matter determined in the class action itself? Would this undermine the opt-out procedure? See Wolff, Preclusion in Class Action Litigation, 105 Colum.L.Rev. 717 (2005).

G. CLASS ACTION WAIVERS

In AT&T MOBILITY LLC v. CONCEPCION, 563 U.S. 333, 131 S.Ct. 1740, 179 L.Ed.2d 742 (2011), a California telephone customer sued a telephone company for advertising free phone service when in fact sales tax of about $30 was charged. The contract provided for arbitration of all disputes between the customer and the company and mandated that any claims be brought in an “individual capacity, and not as a plaintiff or class member in any purported class or representative proceeding.” Id. at 336, 131 S.Ct. at 1744, 179 L.Ed.2d at 749. The company moved to compel arbitration, but under a California rule the ban on class treatment was nonenforceable as an unconscionable term. The Supreme Court, five-to-four, held that the Federal Arbitration Act (“FAA”) preempted the state rule:

Although we have had little occasion to examine classwide arbitration, our decision in Stolt-Nielson [S.A. v. Animalfeeds International Corp., 559 U.S. 662, 130 S.Ct. 1758, 176 L.Ed.2d 605 (2010)] is instructive. In that case we held that an arbitration panel exceeded its power * * * by imposing class procedures based on policy judgments rather than the arbitration agreement itself * * *. * * * We then held that the agreement at issue, which was silent on the question of class procedures, could not be interpreted to allow them because the “changes brought about by the shift from bilateral arbitration to class-action arbitration” are “fundamental.” * * * [Id. at 686, 130 S.Ct. at 1776, 176 L.Ed.2d at 625]. This is obvious as a structural matter: Classwide arbitration includes absent parties, necessitating additional and different procedures and involving higher stakes. Confidentiality becomes more difficult. And while it is theoretically possible to select an arbitrator with some expertise relevant to the class-certification question, arbitrators are not generally knowledgeable in the often-dominant procedural aspects of certification, such as the protection of absent parties. * * * [C]lass arbitration, to the extent it is * * * [not] consensual, is inconsistent with the FAA.

891

First, the switch from bilateral to class arbitration sacrifices the principal advantage of arbitration—its informality—and makes the process slower, more costly, and more likely to generate procedural morass than final judgment. “In bilateral arbitration, parties forgo the procedural rigor and appellate review of the courts in order to realize the benefits of private dispute resolution: lower costs, greater efficiency and speed, and the ability to choose expert adjudicators to resolve specialized disputes.” * * * But before an arbitrator may decide the merits of a claim in classwide procedures, he must first decide, for example, whether the class itself may be certified, whether the named parties are sufficiently representative and typical, and how discovery for the class should be conducted. * * *

Second, class arbitration requires procedural formality. * * * If procedures are too informal, absent class members would not be bound by the arbitration. For a class-action money judgment to bind absentees in litigation, class representatives must at all times adequately represent absent class members, and absent members must be afforded notice, an opportunity to be heard, and a right to opt out of the class. * * * At least this amount of process would presumably be required for absent parties to be bound by the results of arbitration.

We find it unlikely that in passing the FAA Congress meant to leave the disposition of these procedural requirements to an arbitrator. Indeed, class arbitration was not even envisioned by Congress when it passed the FAA in 1925 * * *. * * * And it is at the very least odd to think that an arbitrator would be entrusted with ensuring that third parties’ due process rights are satisfied.

892

Third, class arbitration greatly increases risks to defendants. Informal procedures do of course have a cost: The absence of multilayered review makes it more likely that errors will go uncorrected. Defendants are willing to accept the costs of these errors in arbitration, since their impact is limited to the size of individual disputes, and presumably outweighed by savings from avoiding the courts. But when damages allegedly owed to tens of thousands of potential claimants are aggregated and decided at once, the risk of an error will often become unacceptable. Faced with even a small chance of a devastating loss, defendants will be pressured into settling questionable claims. * * * Other courts have noted the risk of “in terrorem” settlements that class actions entail, * * * and class arbitration would be no different.

Arbitration is poorly suited to the higher stakes of class litigation. * * * [Section 10 of the FAA] allows a court to vacate an arbitral award only where [there was evidence of fraud, partiality, or misconduct on the part of the arbitrators]. The AAA rules do authorize judicial review of certification decisions, but this review is unlikely to have much effect given these limitations; review under § 10 focuses on misconduct rather than mistake. * * * We find it hard to believe that defendants would bet the company with no effective means of review, and even harder to believe that Congress would have intended to allow state courts to force such a decision. * * *

The Concepcions contend that because parties may and sometimes do agree to aggregation, class procedures are not necessarily incompatible with arbitration. But the same could be said about procedures that the Concepcions admit States may not superimpose on arbitration: Parties could agree to arbitrate pursuant to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or pursuant to a discovery process rivaling that in litigation. Arbitration is a matter of contract, and the FAA requires courts to honor parties’ expectations. * * * But what the parties in the aforementioned examples would have agreed to is not arbitration as envisioned by the FAA, lacks its benefits, and therefore may not be required by state law.

The dissent claims that class proceedings are necessary to prosecute small-dollar claims that might otherwise slip through the legal system. * * * But States cannot require a procedure that is inconsistent with the FAA, even if it is desirable for unrelated reasons. * * *

Id. at 347–51, 131 S.Ct. at 1751–53, 179 L.Ed.2d at 756–58.

893

Justice Breyer, joined by Justice Ginsburg, Justice Sotomayor, and Justice Kagan, dissented:

* * * [T]he majority highlights the disadvantages of class arbitrations, as it sees them. * * * But class proceedings have countervailing advantages. In general agreements that forbid the consolidation of claims can lead small-dollar claimants to abandon their claims rather than to litigate. * * *

What rational lawyer would have signed on to represent the Concepcions in litigation for the possibility of fees stemming from a $30.22 claim? * * * In California’s perfectly rational view, nonclass arbitration over such sums will also sometimes have the effect of depriving claimants of their claims (say, for example, where claiming the $30.22 were to involve filling out many forms that require technical legal knowledge or waiting at great length while a call is placed on hold). Discover Bank [v. Superior Court, 36 Cal. 4th 148, 30 Cal.Rptr.3d 76, 113 P.3d 1100 (2005),] sets forth circumstances in which the California courts believe that the terms of consumer contracts can be manipulated to insulate an agreement’s author from liability for its own frauds by “deliberately cheat[ing] large numbers of consumers out of individually small sums of money.” * * * Why is this kind of decision—weighing the pros and cons of all class proceedings alike—not California’s to make?

Id. at 365, 131 S.Ct. at 1760–61, 179 L.Ed.2d at 767.

1. One commentary has called Concepcion a “coup de grace” signaling the effective death of consumer class actions; indeed, the authors predicted that commercial counsel face malpractice liability if they fail to include boilerplate class action waivers in consumer contracts. See Gilles & Friedman, After Class: Aggregate Litigation in the Wake of AT&T Mobility v. Concepcion, 79 U.Chi.L.Rev. 623, 627, 632 (2012). Do you agree with that assessment? Are there situations when a company would prefer classwide resolution of claims? See Nagareda, The Litigation-Arbitration Dichotomy Meets the Class Action, 86 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1069 (2011).

2.Does Concepcion leave open the possibility of voiding class action waivers based on generally applicable contract defenses that do not discriminate against arbitration? On this basis, some courts have continued to invalidate waivers on individualized findings of unconscionability. See Wolff, Is There Life After Concepcion? State Courts, State Law, and the Mandate of Arbitration, 56 St. Louis U.L.J. 1269 (2012).

However, in AMERICAN EXPRESS CO. v. ITALIAN COLORS RESTAURANT, 570 U.S. 228, 133 S.Ct. 2304, 186 L.Ed.2d 417 (2013), an antitrust suit by merchants who use American Express cards, the Court held that a California court could not treat as unconscionable an arbitration clause that barred class proceedings. The Court rejected the argument that the clause effectively blocked plaintiffs from pursuing federal relief because the costs of individually arbitrating the claim exceeded the potential recovery.

894

3.Should Concepcion’s rationale apply to agreements that bar class actions under Rule 23? Professor Miller has commented:
This decision effectively replaces judges and juries with one-by-one arbitrators in many contexts better served by class actions or other forms of claim aggregation. As a result, powerful economic entities can impose no-class-action-arbitration clauses on people with little or no bargaining position—through adhesion contracts involving securities accounts, credit cards, mobile phones, car rentals, and many other social amenities and necessities. * * * The effect, of course, is that the vast majority of people who would comprise a judicial or arbitration class and possibly secure legal relief are not in a position to invoke their contractual “right” to arbitrate. As a result, these people remain remediless, leaving the challenged conduct undeterred.

Miller, Simplified Pleading, Meaningful Days in Court, and Trials on the Merits: Reflections on the Deformation of Federal Procedure, 88 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 286, 322–23 (2013).

NOTE ON CLASS ACTIONS ABROAD

The class action traditionally has been regarded as “a uniquely American procedural device.” See Sherman, Group Litigation Under Foreign Legal Systems: Variations and Alternatives to American Class Actions, 52 DePaul L.Rev. 401, 401 (2002). Civil law systems were presumed to be resistant to the class action. Even in common law systems, mass joinder rules, such as the English group litigation order, did not embrace representative litigation. See Rowe, Debates over Group Litigation in Comparative Perspective: What Can We Learn from Each Other?, 11 Duke J.Comp. & Int’l L. 157 (2001). Legal systems abroad, however, have begun to show “greater receptiveness” toward aggregate litigation, although many countries still stop short of adopting United States-style class actions:

Looking across the European landscape, one can situate within the broad rubric of “aggregate litigation” such differing procedures as Dutch collective settlement actions, English group litigation orders, German model cases in securities litigation, and Italian class actions, among other procedures. Additional moves in the offing suggest a similar openness to possible reforms in the direction of more rather than less aggregate litigation. These include major studies by the European Commission of new measures for aggregate redress in antitrust and consumer litigation and by the Civil Justice Council of England and Wales on reform of collective redress.

895

Nagareda, Aggregate Litigation Across the Atlantic and the Future of American Exceptionalism, 62 Vand.L.Rev. 1, 4–5 (2009). In 2009, the European Union issued a directive that permits injunctions in consumer class actions. See Directive 2009/22/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 23 April 2009 on injunctions for the protection of consumers’ interests. Earlier, Italy had introduced a new damages class action for consumers, also permitting certain consumer associations to bring injunctive claims. See Consumer code of 2005, art. 139 and 140-bis, as amended by the laws n. 99 of July 23, 2009. Israel’s class action regime became effective in 2008, and it now has a higher rate of class action filings per capita than the United States. See Hensler, From Sea to Shining Sea: How and Why Class Actions Are Spreading Globally, 65 U.Kan.L.Rev. 965, 986 (2017). For other nation-specific examples, see Chase, Hershkoff, Silberman, Sorabji, Stürner, Taniguchi, & Varano, Civil Litigation in Comparative Context, ch. 8 (Chase & Hershkoff, eds., 2d ed. 2017).

⁵We have previously stated in this context that “[t]he commonality and typicality requirements of Rule 23(a) tend to merge. Both serve as guideposts for determining whether under the particular circumstances maintenance of a class action is economical and whether the named plaintiff’s claim and the class claims are so interrelated that the interests of the class members will be fairly and adequately protected in their absence. Those requirements therefore also tend to merge with the adequacy-of-representation requirement, although the latter requirement also raises concerns about the competency of class counsel and conflicts of interest.” General Telephone Co. of Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 157–158, n. 13, 102 S.Ct. 2364, 72 L.Ed.2d 740 (1982). In light of our disposition of the commonality question, however, it is unnecessary to resolve whether respondents have satisfied the typicality and adequate-representation requirements of Rule 23(a).

⁶A statement in one of our prior cases, Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 177, 94 S.Ct. 2140, 40 L.Ed.2d 732 (1974), is sometimes mistakenly cited to the contrary: “We find nothing in either the language or history of Rule 23 that gives a court any authority to conduct a preliminary inquiry into the merits of a suit in order to determine whether it may be maintained as a class action.” But in that case, the judge had conducted a preliminary inquiry into the merits of a suit * * * in order to shift the cost of notice required by Rule 23(c)(2) from the plaintiff to the defendants. To the extent the quoted statement goes beyond the permissibility of a merits inquiry for any other pretrial purpose, it is the purest dictum and is contradicted by our other cases. * * *

⁷In a pattern-or-practice case, the plaintiff tries to “establish by a preponderance of the evidence that . . . discrimination was the company’s standard operating procedure[,] the regular rather than the unusual practice.” Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 358, 97 S.Ct. 1843, 52 L.Ed.2d 396 (1977). * * * If he succeeds, that showing will support a rebuttable inference that all class members were victims of the discriminatory practice * * *.

³ The Court suggests Rule 23(a)(2) must mean more than it says. * * * If the word “questions” were taken literally, the majority asserts, plaintiffs could pass the Rule 23(a)(2) bar by “[r]eciting . . . questions” like “Do all of us plaintiffs indeed work for Wal-Mart?” * * * Sensibly read, however, the word “questions” means disputed issues, not any utterance crafted in the grammatical form of a question.

⁴ The majority purports to derive from Teamsters v. United States * * * a rule that a discrimination claim, if accompanied by anecdotes, must supply them in numbers proportionate to the size of the class. * * * Teamsters * * * instructs that statistical evidence alone may suffice * * *; that decision can hardly be said to establish a numerical floor before anecdotal evidence can be taken into account.

⁵ The Court asserts that Drogin showed only average differences at the “regional and national level” between male and female employees. * * * In fact, his regression analysis showed there were disparities within stores. The majority’s contention to the contrary reflects only an arcane disagreement about statistical method—which the District Court resolved in the plaintiffs’ favor. * * * Appellate review is no occasion to disturb a trial court’s handling of factual disputes of this order.

⁷ The Court places considerable weight on General Telephone Co. of Southwest v. Falcon * * *. That case has little relevance to the question before the Court today. There were “no common questions of law or fact” between the claims of the lead plaintiff and the applicant class. 457 U.S., at 162, 102 S.Ct. 2364 (Burger, C. J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (emphasis added). The plaintiff-employee alleged that the defendant-employer had discriminated against him intentionally. The applicant class claims, by contrast, were “advanced under the ‘adverse impact’ theory,” ibid., appropriate for facially neutral practices. * * * Here the same practices touch and concern all members of the class.

⁸ ConAgra called this a failure of “ascertainability.” We refrain from referring to “ascertainability” in this opinion because courts ascribe widely varied meanings to that term. For example, some courts use the word “ascertainability” to deny certification of classes that are not clearly or objectively defined. * * * Our court does not have its own definition. * * *

⁹ The First, Second, and Fourth Circuits have cited the Third Circuit’s administrative feasibility standard but have not actually imposed the standard in the same manner as has the Third Circuit. * * * Even the Third Circuit has cabined its administrative feasibility rule in recent cases. * * *

¹⁰ The rule is now Rule 23(c)(5).

¹¹ Our holding today is limited to those class actions which seek to bind known plaintiffs concerning claims wholly or predominately for money judgments. We intimate no view concerning other types of class action lawsuits, such as those seeking equitable relief. Nor, of course, does our discussion of personal jurisdiction address class actions where the jurisdiction is asserted against a defendant class.

CHAPTER 11

PRETRIAL DEVICES FOR OBTAINING INFORMATION: DEPOSITIONS AND DISCOVERY

■ ■ ■

This chapter examines how parties obtain information to pursue lawsuits and to defend against them. The original Federal Rules made information broadly discoverable provided it was not privileged and was relevant to the subject matter of the dispute. Moreover, in keeping with the spirit of an adversary system that values party autonomy, the Federal Rules placed the discovery process in the litigants’ hands with little judicial oversight. As Professor Miller has commented, “Discovery was designed to let each side have access to * * * information so that the litigation playing field would be level to promote more informed settlements and trials.” Miller, Are the Federal Courthouse Doors Closing? What’s Happened to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure?, 43 Tex.Tech.L.Rev. 587, 596 (2011). Amendments to the Federal Rules have subjected the discovery process to greater judicial control; now mandate the disclosure of certain types of information without a party’s request or court order; and make discoverable only information relevant to the claims and defenses—not the subject matter—when disclosure is proportional to the needs of the case. Commentators disagree whether these changes legitimately rein in discovery practices that have become exorbitant, expensive, and burdensome, or whether they needlessly impede efforts to prove meritorious claims. The rules also have been amended to account for electronic forms of information that are now a standard part of personal communication and business practice.

A. INTRODUCTION

Facts are essential to a common law system based on adversarial values:

Our adversary system for the resolution of disputes rests on the unshakable foundation that truth is the object of the system’s process which is designed for the purpose of dispensing justice. However, because no one has an exclusive insight into truth, the process depends on the adversarial presentation of evidence, precedent and custom, and argument to reasoned conclusions—all directed with unwavering effort to what, in good faith, is believed to be true on matters material to the disposition.

U.S. v. Shaffer Equipment Co., 11 F.3d 450, 457 (4th Cir. 1993). As the Supreme Court stated almost a decade after adoption of the Federal Rules, “Mutual knowledge of all the relevant facts gathered by both parties is essential to proper litigation. To that end, either party may compel the other to disgorge whatever facts he has in his possession.” Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 507, 67 S.Ct. 385, 392, 91 L.Ed. 451, 460 (1947). The original Federal Rules saw an important connection between discovery and the truth-function of litigation—in particular, the need to avoid “trial by ambush.” Klonoski v. Mahlab, 156 F.3d 255, 271 (1st Cir. 1998). Commentators also emphasize that discovery produces indirect public benefits by enabling lawsuits that encourage regulatory compliance and deter future wrongdoing. See Burbank, Proportionality and the Social Benefits of Discovery: Out of Sight and Out of Mind?, 34 Rev.Litig. 647 (2015).

During the 1970s discovery practice began to come under attack as critics raised concerns about the costs and burdens of litigation. See Reda, The Cost-and-Delay Narrative in Civil Justice Reform: Its Fallacies and Functions, 90 Or.L.Rev. 1085 (2012). For the most part, empirical studies showed that discovery “operate[d] effectively in most lawsuits.” Tobias, The 2000 Federal Civil Rules Revisions, 38 San Diego L.Rev. 875, 884 (2001). To the extent discovery abuse did exist, it appeared confined to complex cases that involved high stakes damage awards. See Mullenix, The Pervasive Myth of Pervasive Discovery Abuse: The Sequel, 39 B.C.L.Rev. 683, 684 (1998). Nevertheless, the perception of discovery practice as a “fishing expedition”—aimed at extorting unfair settlements—has persisted and has influenced changes in the Court’s approach to pleading, motions to dismiss, and summary judgment. See Thornburg, Just Say “No Fishing”: The Lure of Metaphor, 40 U.Mich.J.L. Reform 1 (2006).

B. FACT-GATHERING PRIOR TO FILING SUIT

The Federal Rules impose a duty on the parties and their counsel to investigate the facts before filing a lawsuit or presenting factual contentions to the court. See p. 703, Note on Federal Rule 11, supra. For the most part, presuit investigation takes place outside the formal discovery rules—the only exception is the limited opportunity under Federal Rule 27 to perpetuate testimony. See p. 900, infra.

Even in a simple case a litigant may face obstacles to obtaining critical information needed for a complaint to survive an early dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6). The problems are compounded when the claim is based on defendant’s concealment of the truth—as in a securities fraud case—or rests on an intent or purpose that only defendant knows—as in an employment discrimination case. As Professor Miller has explained:

899

Think about employment discrimination cases as an example. The plaintiff has been fired. One of the first rules of discharging someone is don’t tell the employee why he or she is being fired. If facts must be pleaded to state a claim for discriminatory discharge or failure to promote or some other nefarious practice, how can the plaintiff surmount the newly minted pleading requirement? How does the plaintiff show discriminatory conduct let alone a pattern of discrimination—whether it’s race, gender, age, or disability—without access to the history of the employer’s conduct regarding other employees? A look at the statistics of employment discrimination cases shows that in some parts of the nation they are not being instituted anymore. In a different context, how does a pleader challenge illegal or unconstitutional official action—whether by a municipal, state, or federal government employee—without deposing members of the department in which that challenged conduct took place?

Cases such as these, even when they may well have merit, are basically unmaintainable and will not be brought because the risks of loss without compensation for contingent fee lawyers are just too great.

Miller, Are the Federal Courthouse Doors Closing? What’s Happened to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure?, 43 Tex.Tech.L.Rev. 587, 596–97 (2011).

Fact-gathering prior to filing suit requires creativity, resources, and diligence. Increasingly, a prospective litigant will attempt to probe publicly available sources of information—such as government data bases or agency websites—as part of a presuit investigation. See Reardon, Note, Pleading in the Information Age, 85 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 2170 (2010). In addition, lawyers may hire private investigators to ferret out hidden facts. See Schaller, Secrets of the Trade: Tactical and Legal Considerations from the Trade Secret Plaintiff’s Perspective, 29 Rev.Litig. 729 (2010). Efforts to interview key witnesses might produce a “whistleblower,” although in some situations the source will insist upon confidentiality and other evidence will be needed for corroboration. See, e.g., Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd. v. Tellabs, Inc., 513 F.3d 702 (7th Cir. 2008). Court filings and consent decrees in other cases may be a source of information or lead to information that can be alleged. See, e.g., In re National Ass’n of Music Merchants, Musical Instruments and Equipment Antitrust Litigation, 2011 WL 3702453 (S.D.Cal. 2011); see also Garrett, The Public Interest in Corporate Settlements, 58 B.C.L.Rev. 1483 (2017). Counsel can file requests under the Freedom of Information Act or under state Public Records Acts. For an example of this strategy, see Carpenter, Family Farm Advocacy and

900

Rebellious Lawyering, 24 Clinical L.Rev. 79 (2017). Finally, advocates increasingly are turning to social media to access hundreds and even thousands of strangers and “friends” who may be sources of relevant information or lead to information. See Robertson, The Facebook Disruption: How Social Media May Transform Civil Litigation and Facilitate Access to Justice, 65 Ark.L.Rev. 75 (2012).

Whether these forms of presuit investigation will be sufficient to allow meritorious claims to withstand a challenge under Rule 12(b)(6) remains to be seen; no study has yet fully assessed the overall effects of tightened pleading rules and reduced access to discovery. See Gelbach & Kobayashi, The Law and Economics of Proportionality in Discovery, 50 Ga.L.Rev. 1093 (2016). Moreover, the availability of information through presuit investigation may also depend on the effect of restrictions that bar the sharing of pertinent information, such as non-disclosure agreements contained in settlements or other contracts.

A request under Federal Rule 27 does not substitute for discovery and cannot be treated as a first step in a litigant’s presuit investigation. To the contrary, the requestor must be able to file a verified petition that sets forth specific information, as listed in Rule 27(a)(1)(A)–(E), and is filed in the district court for the district where an expected adverse party resides. What must a requestor for presuit discovery show as a condition of invoking Federal 27? Is it sufficient that evidence will be lost? Or must the requestor show that without discovery a lawsuit cannot be filed? Will a delay in bringing a lawsuit tilt in favor of a Rule 27 request?

IN RE PETITION OF SHEILA ROBERTS FORD
United States District Court, Middle District of Alabama, 1997.
170 F.R.D. 504.

THOMPSON, CHIEF JUDGE.

* * *

On November 15, 1996, Ford filed, through counsel, her petition pursuant to [Federal] Rule 27. In the petition, Ford asks “for leave to proceed with the deposition of Elmore County Sheriff Bill Franklin.” She alleges that she “expects to be a party to an action in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Alabama, Northern Division, but is presently unable to bring said action”; that the “anticipated action surrounds the shooting death of Fred William Roberts by law-enforcement officers of Elmore County on November 8, 1996”; that she “is the Administratrix of the Estate of Fred William Roberts”; that she “intends to establish who the appropriate party defendants to the anticipated action are through the testimony of Elmore County Sheriff Bill Franklin”; that she “is unable to determine the appropriate party defendants and the basic facts surrounding the death of Fred William Roberts without the testimony of Sheriff Franklin” and “needs to establish an accurate account of the events that took place . . . before the memories of those involved fade or become dist[or]ted by publicity”; and that she is “requesting the deposition of . . . Franklin” because he “was the commanding officer of the Elmore County deputies believed to be involved in the shooting of . . . Roberts” and he “is expected to identify the facts involved in Mr. Roberts’ shooting death as well as the identity of the law enforcement officers involved.” Ford also gave the names, addresses, and descriptions of the persons she expected to be adverse parties.

901

* * *

A hearing was held on the petition on December 13. At the hearing, Sheriff Franklin appeared through counsel and stated that he opposed the petition because it was not authorized by Rule 27. Ford responded by reaffirming that she needed to take Sheriff Franklin’s deposition in order “to determine . . . the basic facts surrounding the death of Fred William Roberts.” Without this information, she said, she could not determine whom to sue. She did not know whether Sheriff Franklin or one of his deputies shot Roberts and whether the shooting was justified.

* * *

Admittedly, Ford * * * asserts in her petition a desire to preserve testimony; she states that she “needs to establish an accurate account of the events that took place . . . before the memories of those involved fade or become dist[or]ted by publicity.” This reason is not credible, however. Ford can do this by simply filing suit today. She presented no evidence that Sheriff Franklin’s testimony is in imminent danger of being lost because he is gravely ill or about to leave the country. Ford therefore wishes only to discover or uncover what happened on November 8. The simple question for the court is whether Rule 27 authorizes such relief.

* * * [T]he first and obvious place to look to determine whether Rule 27 authorizes pre-complaint discovery is the language of the rule itself. If the language of the rule is unambiguous and dispositive and is reasonable within its context, then the court should go no further and simply should enforce the language. Here, Rule 27 meets this straightforward test.

902

Subsection (a)(1) of Rule 27 provides, as stated, that “A person who desires to perpetuate testimony regarding any matter that may be cognizable in any court of the United States may file a verified petition.” (Emphasis added.) Subsection (a)(3) then provides that an order allowing examination may be entered only “If the court is satisfied that the perpetuation of the testimony may prevent a failure or delay of justice.” (Emphasis added.)^a Rule 27’s coverage therefore extends only to the “perpetuation” of testimony. The term “perpetuate” is defined as “to make perpetual,” “preserve from extinction,” or “cause to last indefinitely.” Webster’s Third International Dictionary, unabridged 1685 (1976); see also Black’s Law Dictionary 1027 (5th ed. 1979) (“perpetuating testimony” is a “means . . . for preserving the testimony of witness, which might otherwise be lost before the trial in which it is intended to be used”) (emphasis added). Here, Ford seeks to discover or uncover testimony, not to perpetuate it. She seeks pre-complaint discovery of evidence, not pre-complaint perpetuation of it. There is nothing before the court to indicate that Sheriff Franklin’s testimony is in imminent danger of being lost. Rather, Ford simply wants to know who shot Roberts and why. Rule 27 simply does not provide for such discovery.

* * *

Ford also argues that Rule 27 should be read in conjunction with Rule 11 * * *. The problem, however, is that Rule 27 is not a vehicle for compliance with Rule 11. As stated, the language in Rule 27 is clear that the rule authorizes the perpetuation of evidence, not the discovery or uncovering of it. * * *

The court is not without sympathy for Ford. She is understandingly deeply troubled by and concerned about the shooting death of her father. If a law enforcement officer was at fault she desires to have him or her held accountable in a court of law. But, under Rule 11, she cannot file suit against any one without first having uncovered some “evidentiary support” for holding the person liable or having obtained some preliminary evidence that there is likely to be some “evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery.”^b Similarly, the defense of qualified immunity protects law enforcement officials from federal suit in the absence of detailed factual allegations of a violation of a clearly established federal right. * * * However, without the discovery incident to litigation, Ford is without the means to uncover whether her father was a victim of foul play in violation of a clearly established federal right. Her predicament is a “Catch 22.” Indeed, she must feel that, under the rules established by our civil justice system, a law enforcement officer can get away with murder. This court has no answer for her, however, other than that Rule 27 does not offer an avenue of relief.

903

* * *

It is further ORDERED that costs are taxed against petitioner Ford, for which execution may issue.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Southern District of New York has put forward a three-part test for invoking Rule 27 discovery:
In order to prevail on their Rule 27 petition, the petitioners must satisfy three elements. First, they must furnish a focused explanation of what they anticipate any testimony would demonstrate. Such testimony cannot be used to discover evidence for the purpose of filing a complaint. Second, they must establish in good faith that they expect to bring an action cognizable in federal court, but are presently unable to bring it or cause it to be brought. Third, petitioners must make an objective showing that without a Rule 27 hearing, known testimony would otherwise be lost, concealed or destroyed.
In re Petition of Allegretti, 229 F.R.D. 93, 96 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). In Penn Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. U.S., 68 F.3d 1371 (D.C.Cir. 1995), the appellate court found that presuit discovery was warranted when a potential witness’s advanced age presented a significant risk that he would be unavailable to testify at a trial. However, the court denied discovery when the potential witness simply had retired from his job and might forget information.
2. Presuit discovery is available in some states either by rule or through an equitable action for a bill of discovery. See Dodson, Federal Pleading and State Presuit Discovery, 14 Lewis & Clark L.Rev. 43 (2010) (collecting examples). Is it significant that some states condition the filing of a medical malpractice claim on presuit discovery, anticipating that early fact gathering will deter the filing of meritless claims? See Florida Hosp. Waterman v. Stoll, 855 So.2d 271 (Fla.App. 2003).
3. Should Rule 27 be amended to allow presuit discovery when facts are needed to frame a complaint? Some studies suggest that even meritorious claims may be cut off at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage and not make it to discovery. See Reinert, The Costs of Heightened Pleading, 86 Ind.L.J. 119 (2011). In response, presuit discovery has been proposed as a way to overcome information deficits. Dodson, New Pleading, New Discovery, 109 Mich.L.Rev. 53, 74 (2010). To avoid abuse, what kind of showing ought to be required? See Hoffman, Using Presuit Discovery to Overcome Barriers to the Courthouse, 34 Litigation 31 (2008). A potential model is the Texas presuit discovery rule which permits a presuit deposition in order to “investigate a potential claim or suit.” Tex.R.Civ.P. 202.1(a)–(b); see In re Reed, 2016 WL 5660421 (S.D.Tex. 2016).

904

C. THE SCOPE OF DISCOVERY: RELEVANCE AND PROPORTIONALITY

Discovery helps to preserve relevant information that might not be available at trial. The earliest discovery procedures in the federal courts were designed primarily for this purpose. See Developments in the Law—Discovery, 74 Harv.L.Rev. 940, 949 (1961). Discovery also helps to isolate those issues that actually are in controversy between the parties. In addition, discovery serves important public purposes. Discovery promotes transparency by uncovering information about government and business practices that may be illegal, and potentially makes that information available to a broader set of individuals than just the parties to the suit. See City of Greenville, Ill. v. Syngenta Crop Protection, LLC, 764 F.3d 695 (7th Cir. 2014). Discovery also promotes the work of “private attorneys general” who, through private litigation, help to enforce the law and deter wrongdoing. See Carrington, Renovating Discovery, 49 Ala.L.Rev. 51, 54 (1997).

Once a lawsuit has commenced, the Federal Rules enable the parties to obtain information from each other and from third parties, but generally discovery cannot begin until the parties have conferred and devised a discovery plan. See Rule 26(f). Drafting a discovery plan requires cooperation, strategic thinking, and attention to the multi-faceted aspects of the discovery process, each of which is discussed in this chapter:

- (1) The permissible scope of discovery in terms of the governing concepts of relevance and proportionality;
- (2) The discovery schedule, the possibility of expedition, the timing of automatic disclosure, and the duty of

- supplementation;
- (3)The availability and utility of different discovery devices, including the use of experts, and the limits that the Rules place on discovery requests that are cumulative or redundant and that may involve thousands of items of electronically stored information;
- (4)The role of evidentiary privileges that protect information from disclosure, even if relevant and proportional to the needs of the case;
- (5)The procedures for objecting to discovery requests or compelling discovery responses, and the power of the court to regulate the discovery process and to sanction parties who do not cooperate, do not provide required supplementation, or cause undue burden or expense; and

905

- (6)The scope of the parties’ autonomy to disclose, and retain, information under seal or otherwise to keep information revealed during the litigation from public view.

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(1) in the Supplement.

FASSETT V. SEARS HOLDINGS CORP.
United States District Court, Middle District of Pennsylvania, 2017.
319 F.R.D. 143.

BRANN, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

Some personal injury cases spring from highly questionable circumstances, and others from undeniably life-altering events. Setting aside ultimate questions of liability and damages, this litigation is tragically one of the latter. When Plaintiff Daniel Fassett heard sputtering sounds emitting from his lawnmower, he attempted to relieve the pressure in its fuel tank by loosening the cap. As he did so, gasoline sprayed from the machine onto his body, igniting in flames. Mr. Fassett sustained serious injuries and shortly thereafter initiated this products liability action.

Although the litigation has progressed in a timely fashion since its inception in May 2015, the parties have recently reached a rather technical impasse. That quandary involves, among other questions, the extent to which material about alternative fuel cap designs and distinct lawnmower layouts may be discoverable. In other words, the parties have struggled to define the outer bounds of discovery in this case: what, if anything, can be discovered about parts or mowers not involved in the subject fire? By presenting such a question, this dispute necessarily calls upon the Court to apply the proportionality provision of recently amended Federal Rule * * * 26 to the case’s technologically nuanced facts.

* * * I hold that in a products liability suit such as this one * * * material corresponding to alternative designs or components that exhibit significant similarities to the design or component at issue should be discoverable in the greatest quantities and for the most varied purposes; however, material corresponding to alternative designs or components that share less in common with the contested design or component should be incrementally less discoverable—and for more limited purposes—as those similarities diminish.

* * *

“To determine the scope of discoverable information under Rule 26(b)(1), the Court looks initially to the pleadings.” * * *

906

* * *

* * * From the outset, I note that the Court is mindful of Defendants’ concerns about the mounting expense of unbridled discovery. Nevertheless, I cannot agree with the threshold assertion that what is discoverable is strictly limited to material that is ultimately relevant or otherwise admissible. As the parties well know, Rule 26(b)(1) envisions a broader universe of discoverable material than that. It makes clear, for instance, that “[i]nformation within this scope of discovery need not be admissible in evidence to be discoverable.”

At the same time, however, “[t]his concept of relevance is tempered . . . by principles of proportionality.” * * *

* * *

Considering the factors set forth at Rule 26(b)(1), the parties’ access to relevant information is undeniably lop-sided in this case: Defendants are repeat players in this genre of litigation, and they consequently enjoy the benefits of sweeping protective orders. * * * On the other hand, the Plaintiffs lack nearly all avenues other than judicially-sanctioned ones to obtain the requisite records that rest in Defendants’ possession.

Moreover, the importance of the issues at stake in the litigation militates slightly in Plaintiffs’ favor. Although this is not a case involving, for instance, constitutional rights or matters of national significance, to these particular litigants, it is a matter of grave import.

Further, its outcome may impact the marketability of a widely sold piece of home machinery or some of its components.

Just as important, I believe that the utility of the proposed discovery outweighs its attendant expenses. Certainly, the Defendants can readily produce electronically stored records relevant to the aforementioned models and can engage in a good faith effort to gather whatever data might not have been documented electronically. In the same vein, I am confident that production of the requested material will bear directly upon resolution of the [core] issues in this case. It may also clarify any lingering issues as to the most appropriate defendants.

Turning now to Rule 26(b)(1)’s application in product liability cases, the Plaintiffs here allege negligence and strict liability claims, two theories whose proof necessarily entails such questions as: what the Defendants knew or foresaw * * *; what safety tests they conducted * * *; and what designs they considered. * * *

The touchstone used to distinguish discoverable inputs from others in products liability cases was set forth in Fine v. Facet Aerospace Prods. Co., 133 F.R.D. 439 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) * * *. The Fine decision outlined the following test:

907

In product liability actions it is frequently difficult to judge which of a manufacturer’s products are sufficiently similar to the allegedly defective product to be subject to discovery. Generally, different models of a product will be relevant if they share with the accident-causing model those characteristics pertinent to the legal issues raised in the litigation. For example, where a plaintiff alleged that three-wheel all-terrain vehicles are inherently unstable, he was entitled to discovery with respect to each of the manufacturer’s models. * * * Similarly, an injured party who contended that the redesigned motor mounts that had failed in his vehicle had not eliminated the defects of earlier models was granted discovery concerning the predecessor versions. * * * Finally, a plaintiff arguing that the left front spring main leaf on his vehicle failed could obtain discovery regarding all types of vehicles with that component, not merely the identical model. * * *

Id. at 441.

Moreover, the Fine court explained that “a plaintiff who raises a design defect claim is entitled to broader discovery than, for example, if the claim were solely one of negligent manufacture,” so long as the requested materials “are truly alternatives and that they are potentially safer.” * * * This does not require the moving party to prove its case on the merits at the discovery stage. * * * Instead, this threshold showing might be satisfied by, for example, the affidavit of an expert in engineering. * * *

* * *

* * * Although the hallmark factor in my analysis is the extent to which the sought-after discovery shared those relevant characteristics with the accident-causing component, I also weighed several additional factors in arriving at what I determined was the appropriate scope of discovery. * * *¹

The first factor—the extent to which the contested discovery can achieve the same functionality as the accident-causing part—speaks, in many ways, directly to the core issue here. In particular, [defendant] contends that the only type of gas cap design about which the Plaintiffs may discover information is the open design, because that is the cap design used on Mr. Fassett’s lawnmower. Although not outlandish, that suggestion is likely overly restrictive. “[A] party should not be limited by its opponent’s theory of the case in determining what is discoverable.” * * *

Of great weight is the deposition testimony of Michael J. Holtz, a corporate designee and the gas cap’s product design and engineering manager. * * * In addition to the open style vent cap, Mr. Holtz identified three other variations: the screw vent cap, the duckbill cap, and the covered vent cap. * * * Although the three variations are distinguishable from an open vent cap in that they possess different structural designs, all of these caps could function at a partly open setting. * * * In fact, Mr. Holtz testified that each cap was designed to be placed on an open setting while the lawnmower was activated, but closed while it was shut off and being transported. * * *

908

The second factor that I considered was the extent to which the contested discovery could be safety tested using the same procedures and standards as would be used for the accident-causing part. That was true here, and in my view, that fact goes a long way in making the test results as to all of those design caps discoverable. As the reasoning goes, testing using the same protocol makes the results comparable and therefore relevant to such issues as the existence of a safer alternative design and the Defendants’ prior knowledge. * * * This protocol could be applied to all free venting caps, including screw, closed, and duckbill designs.

The third factor I considered was whether, compared with the accident-causing part, the contested discovery was an interchangeable component or a distinct system. As to the discovery sought from [defendant], the requested discovery materials are components that could be easily interchanged with the accident-causing parts. Their use on the accident-causing model would not require, for instance, wholesale refurbishing of the entire lawnmower or total replacement of its fuel unit. Barring some surface-level adjustments, distinct fuel cap designs can easily be substituted. This factor is highly relevant in cases such as these: if the various components are readily interchangeable, then the cost of exchanging dangerous parts with safer ones is comparatively low.

The final factor that I evaluated was the extent to which the moving party supported its technical assertions with testimony by a witness who possesses adequate knowledge of the design, development, and functionality of the contested components. Again, as to [these] * * * requests, the considerations underlying that factor have been satisfied as by Plaintiffs’ citations to the deposition testimony of Michael J. Holtz, a corporate designee and the gas cap’s product design and engineering manager.

* * *

Because application of all of the aforementioned factors reveals that warranty information, testing data, and any other materials evidencing over-pressurization or geysering corresponding to each of the enumerated free venting caps designs (open, screw, covered, and duckbill) are relevant to a number of Plaintiffs’ theories, those materials are discoverable so long as they are not work product. * * *

909

My conclusion is different, however insofar as Plaintiffs’ requests for claims and other litigation material in all cases involving every variety of the free venting cap. “In products liability cases evidence of prior accidents involving the same product under similar circumstances is admissible to show notice to the defendant of the danger, to show existence of the danger, and to show the cause of the accident.” * * * That being said, “[t]he almost universal requirement, however, is that the prior occurrence must involve facts and circumstances which are substantially similar to those involved in the case under consideration or they will be excluded.” * * *

At a superficial level, it appears that all of the contested cap designs could be characterized generally as “free venting caps” because they contain a specified orifice that allows air to permeate them in some fashion or another. * * * Nevertheless, based upon Mr. Holtz’s characterization of the different cap designs, the screw and covered vent caps appear most like the open vent cap in design and operation, with the duckbill being the most distinct as a consequence of its unique shaping. The notion that information relating to all prior free venting claims is discoverable because all of those accidents involved failed venting is much too high a level of abstraction.

As for screw, covered, and duckbill caps, the differences in design and what tend to be the distinct factual circumstances render them beyond the scope of discovery. Specifically, each prior claim is capable of differing on a number of grounds: the age and prior history of the lawnmower; whether the lawnmower was a riding or push unit; the period of time for which [the] lawnmower had been running on the date of the accident; the atmospheric conditions at the site of the accident; and the varied actions of the accident victims. * * *

* * * Plaintiffs have not met their burden of showing substantial similarity as to the accidents involving these other designs. * * *

I consider this outcome to be an amenable compromise between the two overbroad and underinclusive proposals that have been presented. So often, discovery is not properly construed as an all-or-nothing game. Rather, it is a means for uncovering truth—the strengths and weaknesses of one’s case—rationally bounded by efficiency and cost concerns. It is that dynamic that makes discovery a trade-off between knowledge and expenditure. The district court’s role under Rule 26, then, is to discern that middle ground between two countervailing pressures, the optimal solution to the information-cost equations. * * *

* * *

Another issue central to this discussion is the proper temporal scope of discovery. In particular, Plaintiffs’ proposed order seeking discovery from [defendant] requests discovery from as early as 1970. Mr. Fassett purchased the subject lawnmower on or around March 2, 2007, * * * and the Defendants approximate that this particular mower was manufactured between February 16, 2005 and June 29, 2005. * * * As such, requiring the production of documents dating back to the 1970s would appear excessive in comparison with the needs of the case.

910

* * * Though the appropriate bounds will vary depending on the specific circumstances of each case, courts in this Circuit have often taken the default position of limiting discovery to no earlier than five years from the date on which the allegedly tortious conduct occurred. * * *

I find this tendency to follow the so-called “five-year rule” instructive, though I would modify it slightly for its application in the products liability setting. In regard to such lawsuits where a defendant is alleged to have knowingly designed, manufactured, or sold a defective product when safer, feasible alternatives existed, I hold that the temporal bounds of discoveries should be set not from the date of the accident but from the time period during which the product was manufactured and sold.

* * * [T]he tortious conduct is more properly construed as having occurred at the point of defective manufacture, design, or sale than at the point of injury. Further, a plaintiff should be able to gather information regarding a defendant’s decision-making process, as the propriety of that risk-utility analysis occupies the core of such disputes. * * *

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.The Federal Rules do not define “relevance,” and courts tend to look to Federal Rule of Evidence 401 for guidance: “Evidence is relevant if: (a) it has any tendency to make a fact more or less probable than it would be without the evidence; and (b) the fact is of consequence in determining the action.” Mora v. Zeta Interactive Corp., 2017 WL 118771, *3 (E.D.N.Y. 2017). Relevant information is discoverable under Rule 26(b)(1) even if it would not be admissible in evidence at trial. An amendment to the rule in 2015 underscores that inadmissible evidence is discoverable, provided it is relevant, proportional, and not privileged. See In re Bard IVC Filters Products Liability Litigation, 317 F.R.D. 562, 563–64 (D.Ariz. 2016).

For example, in Eramo v. Rolling Stone LLC, 314 F.R.D. 205, 210 (W.D.Va. 2016), a university official brought a defamation action against a student who was the subject of a highly publicized magazine article discussing gang rape at a fraternity house. Plaintiff sought to discover information about the student’s communications with the magazine and various other university officials. The district court rejected the argument that the information sought was not discoverable because Evidence Rule 412 limits the admissibility of evidence about sexual behavior by a victim of alleged sexual misconduct:

[Plaintiff] asserts that Rule 412 is not implicated because the evidence sought will not be offered to prove that [the student] engaged in other sexual behavior or her sexual predisposition. Instead, [plaintiff] contends that the documents in [the student’s] possession concern the alleged sexual assault that was the focus of the Article.

911

* * * [T]he court agrees that Rule 412 governs the admissibility of evidence at trial, and that relevance is not equivalent to admissibility. In fact, the Advisory Committee Notes to the 1994 amendments to Rule 412 are quite explicit in this respect. * * * [T]he proper inquiry at this juncture is whether the information sought from [the student] is discoverable, keeping in mind relevance, proportionality, and [the student’s] interests in assuring confidentiality and preventing unwarranted inquiries into her sexual conduct.

2. Prior to 2015, Rule 26(b)(1) set forth a two-tier approach to the discoverability of relevant information. The first tier defined relevance with respect to any claim or defense of a party, and information was discoverable without a court order. The second tier defined relevance with respect to the subject matter of the dispute, and disclosure required a court order upon a showing of good cause. The two-tier approach, adopted in 2000, replaced earlier language that had allowed discovery, without a court order, of information relevant to the subject matter of the dispute. The 2015 amendment eliminated any reference to subject-matter discovery and the court no longer has discretion to order disclosure of such information. However, the Advisory Committee Note to the 2015 amendment states that the rule change does not foreclose discovery of information “not directly pertinent to the incident” as the Advisory Committee had explained when it adopted the two-tier approach in 2000.

Thus, for example, O’GARA v. EQUIFAX INFORMATION SERVICES, LLC, 2018 WL 51335, *9 (S.D.IND. 2018), INVOLVED CLAIMS UNDER THE FAIR CREDIT REPORTING ACT. PLAINTIFF ALLEGED THAT DEFENDANT USED A MATCHING SYSTEM THAT WRONGLY ATTRIBUTED HIS FATHER’S TAX ARREARS TO HIM, AND THAT AS A RESULT HE WAS DENIED CREDIT. BY INTERROGATORY, PLAINTIFF SOUGHT INFORMATION ABOUT THE NUMBER OF CREDIT DISPUTES DEFENDANT HAD INVESTIGATED AS A RESULT OF “MIXED” FILES. THE DISTRICT COURT REJECTED DEFENDANT’S OBJECTION THAT THE INFORMATION WAS NOT RELEVANT TO THE CLAIMS AND DEFENSES; TO THE CONTRARY, RELEVANCE WAS ESTABLISHED BECAUSE THE INFORMATION SOUGHT WAS ABOUT “INCIDENTS OF THE SAME TYPE.” DID THE DISTRICT COURT IN FASSETT, P. 905, SUPRA, ADOPT A SIMILAR APPROACH?

3. Some district courts have held that under the 2015 version of Rule 26(b)(1), “[r]elevance is still to be ‘construed broadly to encompass any matter that bears on, or that reasonably could lead to other matter that could bear on’ any party’s claim or defense.” State Farm Mutual Auto. Ins. Co. v. Fayda, 2015 WL 871037, *2 (S.D.N.Y. 2015), quoting Oppenheimer Fund, Inc. v. Sanders, 437 U.S. 340, 351, 98 S.Ct. 2380, 2389, 57 L.Ed.2d 253, 265 (1978). Other district courts have rejected this reading, arguing that it mistakenly equates relevance with subject-matter discovery. See Cole’s Wexford Hotel, Inc. v.

912

Highmark Inc., 209 F.Supp.3d 810 (W.D.Pa. 2016). Given these conflicting interpretations, would the information requested in the following fact patterns be discoverable as relevant to the subject matter?

(a) The complaint alleges a hostile work environment, constructive discharge, and retaliation. Defendant, plaintiff’s employer, seeks plaintiff’s prior employment records. See Queen v. City of Bowling Green, 2017 WL 4355689 (W.D.Ky. 2017).

(b) The complaint alleges an insurance company’s failure to pay long-term disability benefits under a pension plan regulated by the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974. Plaintiff seeks information about the insurer’s policy and methods used to determine compensation for the claims specialists who handled plaintiff’s claim and the procedures used to monitor claims payments. See Curtis v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 2016 WL 687164 (N.D.Tex. 2016).

(c) The complaint alleges that the city and a city police officer violated Fourth Amendment rights by using excessive force when arresting plaintiff. Defendants seek records of paramedic care provided to the arrestee on the day of the arrest. See Booth v. City of Dallas, 312 F.R.D. 427 (N.D.Tex. 2015).

4. Even if information is relevant, it is discoverable only if disclosure is proportional to the needs of the case in light of the factors set forth in Rule 26(b)(1). The proportionality factors trace back to the 1983 amendments to the Federal Rules, which, at the time, were regarded by the Reporter to the Advisory Committee that recommended the change as a “180-degree shift” in discovery philosophy. See Miller, The August 1983 Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 33 (Federal Judicial Center 1984). Amendments adopted in 2006 extended the principle of proportionality to electronic discovery. See Judicial Conference Committee of the United States, Summary Report of the Judicial Conference Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure 30–31 (2005). The 2015 amendment essentially moved the proportionality factors from a separate provision in Rule 26(b) to its current place.

The Advisory Committee Notes to the 2015 amendment emphasize that the relocation of the proportionality factors to Rule 26(b)(1) “does not change the existing responsibilities of the court and the parties to consider proportionality, and the change does not place on the party seeking discovery the burden of addressing all proportionality considerations.” However, an empirical analysis of the courts’ application of proportionality factors during the period prior to and after the 2015 amendment found that the relocation of the requirement “may have fostered real change”; the study reports that “parties and courts are applying proportionality more than four times more frequently than before the amendment, and that courts are narrowing discovery on proportionality grounds more than four times more frequently post-amendment.” Baicker-McKee, Mountain or Molehill?, 55 Duq.L.Rev. 307, 313 (2017).

5. In MARRESE v. AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ORTHOPAEDIC SURGEONS, 726 F.2d 1150 (7th Cir. 1984), reversed on other grounds, 470 U.S. 373, 105 S.Ct. 1327, 84 L.Ed.2d 274 (1985), two orthopedic surgeons initially sued in state court alleging that they were refused membership in the Academy without a hearing. Although membership in the Academy is not necessary to practice as an orthopedic surgeon, it was alleged to confer some degree of professional advantage. Finding membership in the Academy was not an “economic necessity,” the state court dismissed the complaint on the ground that no valid state law claim was stated. Plaintiffs then sued in federal court, alleging violations of the antitrust laws. In the course of discovery, plaintiffs demanded that the Academy produce correspondence and other documents relating to denials of membership applications between 1970 and 1980. The court ordered the Academy to produce the documents pursuant to an order protecting their confidentiality. The Academy refused to comply with the order, was held in criminal contempt, and was fined $10,000. It appealed, and the Seventh Circuit reversed with directions to dismiss the contempt proceedings. Among other things, the appellate court held that the protective order did not adequately protect the privacy interests of the Academy’s members, and that the court could have fashioned discovery in a way that “prevented the plaintiffs from abusing the discovery process, without denying them any information essential to developing their case.” Id. at 1162.

* * * [T]here were various devices that the district judge could have used to reconcile the parties’ competing needs. For example, he could have examined the membership files himself in camera, a procedure described by the Supreme Court in a related context as “a relatively costless and eminently worthwhile method to insure that the balance between petitioners’ claims of irrelevance and privilege and plaintiffs’ asserted need for the documents is correctly struck.” Kerr v. United States District Court, 426 U.S. 394, 405, 96 S.Ct. 2119, 2125, 48 L.Ed.2d 725 (1976). We are told the membership files may be voluminous. No doubt the files in all cases between 1970 and 1980 where applications for membership in the Academy were refused are voluminous, but the place to start an in camera examination would be with the files on Drs. Marrese and Treister. If the judge found no evidence in those files of any anticompetitive purpose attributable to the Academy, he would not have to look at any other files. This is not a class action; the plaintiffs are not suing as the representatives of other orthopedic surgeons who have been denied membership in the Academy.

Better yet, the judge might have followed the procedure discussed in this court’s recent decision in EEOC v. University of Notre Dame Du Lac, 715 F.2d 331, 338–39 (7th Cir. 1983). There we ordered the files of faculty tenure deliberations edited (“redacted”) to remove the names of the deliberating faculty members and any other information that might enable them to be identified, and we directed that on remand the redaction be reviewed in camera by the district judge, who would have the originals before him to compare with (and thereby assure the accuracy of) the redactions. Had the same procedure been followed here, the plaintiffs’ counsel would have been able to read the files personally. If the files had turned out to contain evidence or leads to evidence of anticompetitive conduct, the plaintiffs’ counsel could then have requested the judge to order names revealed to counsel so that the relevant individuals could be deposed.

Id. at 1160. How would the discovery dispute be decided under the proportionality factors in the 2015 version of Rule 26(b)(1)?

D. PLANNING FOR DISCOVERY

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(f) in the Supplement.

1.THE DUTY TO CONFER AND PLAN DISCOVERY

The Federal Rules have been amended a number of times to encourage party cooperation and to impose judicial oversight on the discovery process. Currently the parties are obliged “to confer as soon as practicable” after the commencement of the suit—and at least 21 days before a Rule 16(b) scheduling conference—to devise a discovery plan. Rule 26(f)(1). The discovery plan is to include the “views and proposals” of the parties concerning the range of proposed discovery requests, including issues of automatic disclosure, privilege, electronic information, and the schedule for production. The plan must be in writing and submitted to the court within 14 days of the discovery conference. Rule 26(f)(3).

The discovery conference was introduced in 1980, but at the time was not considered a routine procedure. Three years later, Rule 16 was amended to encourage district courts to schedule early pretrial conferences and to issue scheduling orders to control discovery. In 1993, Rule 26(f) was amended to require the parties to meet to arrange for automatic disclosures and to develop a discovery plan to be presented to the court prior to the Rule 16 scheduling order. Courts were given discretion to issue standing orders that exempted all, or certain types of cases, from the Rule 26(f) requirements. In 2000, Rule 26(f) again was amended. First, the amendment eliminated the need for the parties to “meet,” instead allowing them to “confer” to avoid logistical problems that sometimes sent litigants to court for relief. While conferring, the parties are expected to explore settlement and other possibilities for expeditious resolution. Second, the amendment eliminated standing exemption orders but retained judicial discretion to exempt or alter requirements on a case-by-case basis.

As one district court has observed, “[T]he cooperation that is necessary * * * enhances the legitimate goals of the adversary system, by facilitating discovery of the facts needed to support the claims and defenses that have been raised, at a lesser cost, and expediting the time when the case may be resolved on its merits, or settled.” Mancia v. Mayflower Textile Servs. Co., 253 F.R.D. 354, 365 (D.Md. 2008). The Mancia court, like some other district courts, urged the parties to be cooperative and drew attention to the Sedona Conference’s “Cooperation Proclamation.” The Sedona Conference, a non-profit, educational research institute, “propose[d] to develop ‘a detailed understanding and full articulation of the issues and changes needed to obtain cooperative fact-finding,’ as well as ‘[d]evelop[] and distribut[e] practical “toolkits” to train and support lawyers, judges, other professionals, and students in techniques of discovery cooperation, collaboration, and transparency.’ ” Id. at 363. For a discussion of the “Cooperation Proclamation” by an experienced Magistrate Judge, see Waxse, Cooperation—What Is It and Why Do It?, 18 Richmond J.L. & Tech. 8 (2012). Courts also look to Rule 1, which was amended in 2015 to emphasize the role of parties, as a basis for the duty to cooperate. See Hyatt v. Rock, 2016 WL 6820378, *2 (N.D.N.Y. 2016).

2.EXPEDITED DISCOVERY BEFORE THE DISCOVERY PLAN

STRIKE 3 HOLDINGS, LLC v. DOE, SUBSCRIBER ASSIGNED IP ADDRESS 108.51.209.163

United States District Court, District of Columbia, 2018.
2018 WL 385418.

KELLY, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

* * *

I.FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Plaintiff Strike 3 Holdings, LLC owns the rights to certain adult entertainment films. * * * Plaintiff alleges that Defendant, currently identified as John Doe subscriber assigned IP address 108.51.209.163, has been downloading and distributing these films * * * in violation of the Copyright Act * * *. Plaintiff further alleges that it used geolocation technology to trace the IP address used by Defendant to a physical address in the District of Columbia. * * *

Plaintiff has moved for leave to file a third-party subpoena on Defendant’s internet service provider (“ISP”) to “learn Defendant’s identity, investigate Defendant’s role in the infringement, and effectuate service.” * * * Plaintiff asserts that the subpoena “will only demand the true name and address of Defendant” and that the information will only be used to prosecute claims in its complaint. * * *

II.LEGAL STANDARD

A party ordinarily “may not seek discovery from any source” prior to a conference under Rule 26(f) unless “authorized . . . by court order.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(d)(1). “To determine whether to authorize discovery prior to a Rule 26(f) conference in a particular case, this district has applied a ‘good cause’ standard. * * * “Good cause to take discovery prior to the Rule 26(f) conference exists where the discovery is necessary ‘before th[e] suit can progress further.’ ” * * *

A plaintiff also “must ‘have at least a good faith belief that such discovery will enable it to show that the court has personal jurisdiction over the defendant[s].’ ” * * *

III.ANALYSIS

Plaintiff has satisfied the good cause standard to serve discovery prior to a Rule 26(f) conference. As an initial matter, “this suit cannot move forward without Plaintiff first being able to identify Defendant so that service can be effected.” * * * According to a declaration provided by Plaintiff, Defendant’s internet service provider is the only entity that can identify Defendant by correlating the IP address that has been linked to the alleged infringement with its subscriber. * * *

Plaintiff has also established a good faith belief that this Court has personal jurisdiction over Defendant. Plaintiff used geolocation technology to trace Defendant’s IP address to a physical location within the District of Columbia. * * * The D.C. Circuit “has suggested that reliance on ‘geolocation services’ of this sort is sufficient to justify a ‘good faith belief’ that a district court has personal jurisdiction over unknown defendants.” * * * Thus, in its “broad discretion to . . . dictate the sequence of discovery,” * * * the Court authorizes Plaintiff to serve limited discovery on Defendant’s ISP.

IV.PROTECTIVE ORDER

* * * The Court finds that a protective order is warranted here. “The fact that a copyrighted work was illegally downloaded from a certain IP address does not necessarily mean that the owner of that IP address was the infringer.” * * * “Indeed, the true infringer could just as easily be a third party who had access to the internet connection, such as a son or daughter, houseguest, neighbor, or customer of a business offering an internet connection,” and “[t]here is a real risk that defendants might be falsely identified and forced to defend themselves against unwarranted allegations.” * * * There is also a risk that “the innocent defendant may be coerced into an unjust settlement with the plaintiff to prevent the dissemination of publicity surrounding unfounded allegations.” * * *

917

* * *Plaintiff shall be allowed to serve early discovery by serving a Rule 45 subpoena on the identified ISP that seeks information sufficient to identify John Doe subscriber assigned IP address 108.51.209.163. However, if and when the ISP is served with a subpoena, Plaintiff shall provide the ISP with a copy of this Memorandum Opinion and the accompanying Order with its subpoena. The ISP shall give written notice, which may include e-mail notice, and shall include a copy of the subpoena, this Memorandum Opinion, and the accompanying Order, to the subscriber in question at least twenty (20) business days prior to releasing the subscriber’s identifying information to Plaintiff. Any motion to quash the subpoena shall be filed before the return date of the subpoena, which shall be no earlier than forty-five (45) calendar days from the date of service. * * * Any information disclosed to Plaintiff in response to a Rule 45 subpoena may be used by Plaintiff solely for the purpose of protecting Plaintiff’s rights as set forth in the Complaint. * * *

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.The parties may stipulate to discovery earlier than the Rule 26(f) conference, but if all parties do not agree, the court’s permission will be needed to expedite the process. Can you explain why expedited discovery was permitted under Rule 26 to uncover the name of a “John Doe” defendant, but denied under Rule 27 in Ford, p. 900, supra?
- 2.Expedited discovery most typically is granted to resolve threshold issues such as subject-matter jurisdiction, personal jurisdiction, and qualified immunity. Would it be appropriate for a district court to expedite discovery on issues pertaining to the merits prior to the filing of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion? Could “plausibility” discovery be incorporated into a Rule 26(f) discovery plan and discussed at a Rule 16 conference? See Malveaux, Front Loading and Heavy Lifting: How Pre-Dismissal Discovery Can Address the Detrimental Effect of Iqbal on Civil Rights Cases, 14 Lewis & Clark L.Rev. 65 (2010). For a critical view, see Zwisler & Reeves, The Search for Clarity in Federal Pleading Standards: Are We Close to Limiting the Intended (and Unintended) Consequences of Twombly and Iqbal?, 13 Sedona Conf.J. 135, 145–46 (2012).
- 3.The Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995 (“PSLRA”), p. 653, supra, bars discovery during the pendency of a motion to dismiss in suits for securities fraud in violation of the 1933 and 1934 federal securities law. Congress later amended the statute to permit the federal district court to stay discovery in related state court actions. See 15 U.S.C. § 78u–4(b)(3)(D). The statute does, however, give the district court authority to lift the stay “upon the motion of any party that particularized discovery is necessary to preserve evidence or to prevent undue prejudice to that party.” Id. at § 78u–4(b)(3)(B).

918

The Ninth Circuit has held that it was an abuse of discretion to order limited discovery in a PSLRA suit to enable plaintiffs—who alleged claims based upon “the disclosure of specific inside information by a specific person on a specific date and the subsequent ‘dumping’ of Rational stock on the same date”—to identify the traders of the stock on the listed date. That discovery, in the appellate court’s view, was barred because it was needed to sustain the sufficiency of the complaint, and the statute “requires the trial court to dismiss the complaint if it fails to satisfy the Act’s heightened pleading standards.” The fact that the information was within defendant’s exclusive custody was, according to the court, beside the point. SG Cowen Securities Corp. v. U.S. Dist. Court for Northern Dist. of CA., 189 F.3d 909, 912 (9th Cir. 1999). By contrast, the Southern District of New York has lifted the discovery stay upon a finding that its operation would cause undue prejudice. See Vacold LLC v. Cerami, 2001 WL 167704, *2 (S.D.N.Y. 2001). When faced with a motion to lift a discovery stay, should the court weigh only the parties’ private interest, or also consider the public interest in enforcement of the securities laws? See Erickson, Heightened Procedure, 102 Iowa L.Rev. 61 (2016).

3.AUTOMATIC DISCLOSURE

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(a) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

The 1993 amendments to Rule 26(a)(1), requiring automatic disclosure of specified categories of information, were controversial when promulgated. Justice Scalia filed a dissenting statement, joined by Justice Thomas and in part by Justice Souter, on the ground that the proposal introduced “into the trial process an element that is contrary to the nature of our adversary system.” Amendments to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 146 F.R.D. 401, 507 (1993). See Bell, Varner & Gottschalk, Automatic Disclosure in Discovery—The Rush to Reform, 27 Ga.L.Rev. 1 (1992). Concerns also were expressed that the rule would increase cost and delay and decrease incentives to settle. See Issacharoff & Loewenstein, Unintended Consequences of Mandatory Disclosure, 73 Tex.L.Rev. 753 (1995). In 2000, the duty of automatic disclosure was limited to information that the party intends to use. See Huang, Mandatory Disclosure: A Controversial Device with No Effects, 21 Pace L.Rev. 203 (2000).

In CUMMINGS v. GENERAL MOTORS CORP., 365 F.3d 944, 953–54 (10th Cir. 2004), abrogated on other grounds by Unitherm Food Systems, Inc. v. Swift-Eckrich, Inc., 546 U.S. 394, 126 S.Ct. 980, 163 L.Ed.2d 974 (2006), plaintiffs were car owners who had been severely injured in a car accident. They sued the manufacturer of their car’s seat belt, alleging that it was defective and had been improperly designed. After a jury verdict for defendant, plaintiffs learned that defendant had videos of safety seat acceleration tests that it had conducted and failed to disclose under Rule 26(a), but had produced in an unrelated trial. On appeal, they argued that defendant violated its discovery obligation. The Tenth Circuit disagreed:

919

The magistrate ruled the newest version of Rule 26 would govern in this case, including the 2000 amendments, * * * and the Cummings did not object to this holding. Under the 2000 amendments, a party’s “initial disclosure obligation . . . has been narrowed.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 advisory committee’s note, 2000 amends. Rule 26(a)(1) only requires automatic disclosure of “the name and, if known, the address and telephone number of each individual likely to have discoverable information that the disclosing party may use to support its claims or defenses” * * *. Under this rule, a party is not obligated “to disclose witnesses or documents, whether favorable or unfavorable, that it does not intend to use.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 advisory committee’s note, 2000 amends.; see Gluck v. Ansett Austl. Ltd., 204 F.R.D. 217, 221–22 (D.D.C. 2001) (holding under the new version of Rule 26 that the opposing party was not required to produce information with regard to potential witnesses because “the essential inquiry is whether the disclosing party intends to use the witness.”).

As you read more about the mechanics of discovery, p. 921, infra, consider how a party should follow-up an adversary’s automatic disclosures with information requests under the Rules.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In COMAS v. UNITED TELEPHONE CO. OF KANSAS, 1995 WL 476691, *2 (D. Kan. 1995) the court explained:

Initial disclosures may be made by describing or categorizing potentially relevant materials so that the opposing party may “make an informed decision regarding which documents might need to be examined.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(1) advisory committee’s notes (1993 Am.). The rule does not require that either party produce documents at this initial stage. If only a description or categorization is provided, “the other part[y] [is] expected to obtain the documents desired by proceeding under Rule 34 or through informal requests.”

2. Automatic disclosure is required of the computation of each category of damages claimed by the disclosing party, who also must disclose documents “on which each computation is based.” Rule 26(a)(1)(A)(iii). In City and County of San Francisco v. Tutor-Saliba Corp., 218 F.R.D. 219 (N.D.Cal. 2003), plaintiffs provided damage estimates and identified supporting documents, but defendants moved to compel further supplementation. The district court said that the standard for adequacy “must be gleaned from Rule 26(a)’s purpose: to ‘accelerate the exchange of basic information’ that is ‘needed in most cases to prepare for trial or make an informed decision about settlement,’ ” quoting from the 1993 advisory committee notes. An additional factor in the court’s view was the role of early disclosure “to assist the parties in focusing and prioritizing their organization of discovery.” Given these purposes, plaintiff was required to provide “some analysis and not just a “lump sum statement of the damages allegedly sustained” to enable defendants to understand the scope of their exposure to liability “and make informed decisions as to settlement and discovery.” Id. at 220–22.

920

3. Until 1970, insurance agreements were not discoverable under Rule 26. The rule was amended in favor of disclosure to “enable counsel for both sides to make the same realistic appraisal of the case, so that settlement and litigation strategy are based on knowledge and not speculation.” Proposed Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure Relating to Discovery, reprinted at 48 F.R.D. 487, 499 (1969–70). How does Rule 26(a)(1)(A)(iv) currently treat disclosure of insurance policies?

4. Which cases are exempt from the requirement of automatic disclosure? Does the court have discretion to mandate disclosure in these cases? See Subrin, Uniformity in Procedural Rules and the Attributes of a Sound Procedural System: The Case for Presumptive Limits, 49 Ala.L.Rev. 79 (1997).

5. From 2017 to 2020, the Northern District of Illinois and the District of Arizona participated in a pilot project that altered the ground rules for Rule 26(a) automatic disclosure. The goal of the pilot project was to determine whether mandating automatic early disclosure “reduces the cost and delay of civil litigation.” Federal Judicial Center, Mandatory Initial Discovery Pilot Project: Overview. See Northern District of Illinois Mandatory Initial Discovery Pilot Project Standing Order (May 12, 2017); District of Arizona General Order 17–08 (April 14, 2017). Unlike automatic disclosure under Rule 26(a), the parties could not opt out of the requirement, and their duty included disclosure of unfavorable as well as favorable information in the prescribed categories, whether or not they planned to use the information in presenting their claims and defenses. The Federal Judicial Center planned to study the results of the pilot project and evaluate its effects on the resolution of cases.

6. Some state discovery rules require automatic disclosure of categories of information. See Allen, Price & Donison, Federal Discovery Under the 2000 Amendments to Rule 26, 3 Sedona Conf.J. 211 (2002) (Arizona); Moskowitz, Rediscovering Discovery: State Procedural Rules and the Level Playing Field, 54 Rutgers L.Rev. 595 (2002) (Arizona, Colorado, Illinois, and Texas). West Virginia, although it models its discovery rules on those of the federal system, elected not to require automatic disclosure. See Olds, Give It to Me Uniformly: West Virginia Wants Initial Disclosure, 115 W.Va.L.Rev. 363 (2012).

4.CERTIFICATION AND THE DUTY TO SUPPLEMENT

The parties’ duty to cooperate throughout the discovery process is enforced through the signature requirement of Federal Rule 26(g). Specifically, “Rule 26(g) imposes an affirmative duty to engage in pretrial discovery in a responsible manner that is consistent with the spirit and purposes of rules 26 through 37.” Heller v. City of Dallas, 303 F.R.D. 466, 476 (N.D.Tex. 2014), quoting Advisory Committee’s note to Rule 26(g) (1983). Rule 26(g) operates as the discovery analogue to Rule 11, p. 703, supra. Every automatic disclosure, every party-initiated request for discovery, every response to discovery, and every objection must be signed by at least one counsel of record or by the party if not represented by counsel. The signature certifies that to the best of the signer’s knowledge, information, and belief, the document presented is accurate and complete and is being served for a proper purpose. Moreover, the proponent is certifying that a reasonable inquiry has been made before submitting the document. Unsigned discovery documents are to be stricken unless the proponent provides substantial justification for the omission. Moreover, the court has authority to impose a sanction on a party that violates the requirement, including dismissal of the action. See p. 968, infra.

Finally, Rule 26(e) imposes a self-executing duty to supplement automatic disclosures and discovery responses. The duty is triggered even if the original disclosure or response was accurate when made; the duty is to provide information or documents that are obtained later and is a “continuing obligation.” Robbins & Myers, Inc. v. J.M. Huber Corp., 274 F.R.D. 63, 79 (W.D.N.Y. 2011). A failure to supplement is subject to sanctions, see p. 979, Note 7, infra.

E. THE MECHANICS OF REQUESTED DISCOVERY

1.DEPOSITIONS

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 26(d), 30, and 31 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

An oral deposition allows a party to question any person (the “deponent”), whether a party or not, under oath. The Federal Rules spell out in detail when, how, before whom, and on what notice as to time and place a deposition may be taken. See Rules 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32(d). Invariably, the parties designate as officer the reporter who records the questions, the answers, and any objections made by the parties or by the witness. See Rule 30(b)(5). Under Rule 30(d)(1), “a deposition is limited to 1 day of 7 hours,” but the court may authorize additional time “if needed to fairly examine the deponent or if the deponent, another person, or any other circumstance impedes or delays the examination.” When the deposition is concluded, the reporter prepares a transcript, which the deponent then is called upon to sign. Federal Rule 30(a)(2)(A)(i) currently sets a presumptive limit of ten depositions for each party.

An attorney schedules a deposition by serving a notice on the opposing attorney. The notice must include the name and address of the deponent, if known, and the date, time, and place of the deposition. If the deponent is a party, the notice is sufficient to require the party’s appearance, and a subpoena is unnecessary. The notice may include a demand that the party produce documents and other items of evidence at the deposition, in which case the procedure of Rule 34 applies.

Under Federal Rule 30(b)(6) a party may seek, by notice or subpoena, the deposition of a corporation or association and require it to produce a person or persons who will testify on behalf of the organization. Of course, the party seeking the information must, with “reasonable particularity,” detail the issues that are to be explored in order for the organization to ascertain which witness or witnesses have the relevant knowledge. Witnesses who do not already have knowledge of the topics that will be the subject of the deposition must be educated with documents and other “information known or reasonably available to the organization.” This form of corporate deposition is especially useful when the party taking the deposition is unaware of which individual or individuals within a large organization have the information that is needed. Amendments to Rule 30(b)(6) in 2020 direct the parties to confer “in good faith about the matters for examination” either “[b]efore or promptly after” the notice of deposition or subpoena is served.

If the deponent is not a party, the notice of deposition will not be sufficient to compel the nonparty’s appearance. There is no requirement that a nonparty be subpoenaed to a deposition. However, a nonparty who is not subpoenaed and does not appear, or if does appear but fails to bring requested documents or other items, is not subject to sanction. A person who fails to respond to a subpoena will be subject to a citation for contempt of court. In addition, if a party notices a deposition but does not subpoena the witness and the witness fails to appear, that party may be ordered to pay the reasonable expenses, including attorney’s fees, of any other party for wasted time appearing at the place where the deposition was to be taken. Thus, unless full cooperation of the nonparty witness is certain, the use of a subpoena is advisable.

The usual expectation is that a deposition will proceed without court involvement. The deponent usually will answer even those questions to which counsel object, unless the deponent’s counsel instructs the deponent not to answer. Objections are interposed at depositions to preserve a right to object to another party’s use of the deposition’s transcript at trial. Counsel must object at the deposition if the ground for the objection is one that might be corrected at the time. Under Rule 30(c)(2), a deponent may be instructed not to answer only when necessary “to preserve a privilege, to enforce a limitation ordered by the court, or to present a motion under Rule 30(d)(3)” to terminate or limit an examination that is oppressive or conducted in bad faith. Moreover, Rule 30(d)(2) authorizes the imposition of costs and attorney’s fees to sanction any culpable individual who “impedes, delays, or frustrates the fair examination of the deponent.”

POLYCAST TECHNOLOGY CORP. V. UNIROYAL, INC.
United States District Court, Southern District of New York, 1990.
1990 WL 138968.

JAMES C. FRANCIS IV, UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE.

In October, 1986, Uniroyal, Inc. (“Uniroyal”) sold its wholly-owned subsidiary, Uniroyal Plastics Company, Inc. (“Plastics”) to Polycast Technology Corporation (“Polycast”). In this action, Polycast alleges that it entered into this transaction on the basis of misleading financial information that Uniroyal provided about Plastics. * * *

The parties to this action have taken substantial discovery from a non-party, Deloitte & Touche (“Deloitte”). In its incarnation as Deloitte Haskins & Sells, Deloitte had performed auditing services for both Uniroyal and Polycast prior to the sale of Plastics. After the transaction was completed, Deloitte continued as Polycast’s independent auditors, reviewing Plastics’ operations.

* * *

The second pending discovery issue concerns the proposed deposition of Gregory Durant, a Deloitte employee who was the on-site manager of an audit of Plastics that commenced immediately after the acquisition of that entity by Uniroyal on October 31, 1986. Deloitte now seeks a protective order barring Mr. Durant’s deposition on the grounds that the information obtained would not be relevant and that it would, in any event, be duplicative of the deposition testimony of Michael Bowman, Deloitte’s engagement partner on the audit.

Orders barring the taking of * * * depositions altogether are both unusual and disfavored. * * * On the other hand, non-party witnesses may be subject to somewhat greater protection against costly but marginally relevant discovery than are the parties. * * *

However, even if some heightened consideration should be paid to Deloitte as a non-party witness, it would still be inappropriate to foreclose the deposition of Mr. Durant. Polycast alleges that it bought Plastics in reliance on a representation in October, 1986, that the year-end earnings of Plastics would be approximately $13.3 million. According to Polycast, the actual 1986 earnings for Plastics were $5.25 million, and Polycast therefore contends that it paid an inflated price for Plastics based on Uniroyal’s misrepresentations. Uniroyal argues, however, that Polycast has understated the actual earnings of Plastics for 1986. Since the $5.5 million figure is derived at least in part from the audit conducted by Deloitte for the first ten months of that year, that audit is an entirely proper subject of inquiry. Moreover, the fact that Mr. Bowman has provided substantial deposition testimony about the audit does not relieve Deloitte of the obligation of producing Mr. Durant for examination. There were some gaps in Mr. Bowman’s testimony, attributable to a quite understandable inability to recall every detail of the audit process. More significantly, Mr. Durant was present at the location where the audit was conducted and is in a better position to describe the workings of the audit team and its interactions with Plastics’ employees. His deposition will therefore go forward.

At the same time, Uniroyal has already obtained from other Deloitte witnesses as well as from discovery of the parties substantial evidence concerning the audit. Mr. Durant’s role will largely be to fill in the interstices in a picture that should otherwise be substantially complete. Accordingly, the parties’ examination of him shall be limited to one full day of deposition.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The oral deposition has been called “[t]he most important of the discovery devices”:

It is the only significant discovery device that may be directed against any person and is not confined to parties to the action. It is the only discovery device that permits examination and cross-examination of a live witness by counsel, where there is no opportunity to reflect and carefully shape the information given. Thus, despite its expense, it is the most valuable device if the deponent has important information.

Wright & Kane, Law of Federal Courts § 84 (8th ed.). Under the original version of Federal Rule 30, the parties competed to take the first deposition, in an attempt to pin down an opponent before submitting himself or his own witnesses to the discovery process. How has deposition strategy changed under the amended discovery rules?

2. When the Federal Rules were first adopted, depositions typically were recorded by court reporters using stenography. In 1970, the Rules were amended to allow for the taking of videotaped depositions by stipulation of the parties or by court order. The 1993 amendment gives the party noticing the deposition a right to choose how the deposition will be memorialized. Numerous advantages are attached to videotaped depositions: “Video depositions can markedly increase accuracy and trustworthiness. In addition, to the extent that a video deposition reduces tedium, the fact-finder’s concentration and attention will be enhanced, again to the benefit of the decision process.” Rice’s Toyota World, Inc. v. Southeast Toyota Distributors, Inc., 114 F.R.D. 647, 649 (M.D. N.C. 1987). Why might a written transcript be useful? See Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 296 F.R.D. 231 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) (discussing confidentiality concerns).

2.DEPOSITION BY WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Rule 31 authorizes the taking of depositions by written questions from parties and nonparties. The answers are given orally after the “officer” puts the questions to the deponent. In practice, written depositions are rarely used. Rule 31 saves the expense of travel, but the procedure is said to be “cumbersome” relative to an oral deposition. Wright & Kane, Law of Federal Courts § 85 (8th ed.). Unlike interrogatories to parties under Rule 33, which are also written, depositions by written questions may be propounded to “any person,” including a nonparty.

A deposition upon written questions was used in WATSON v. LOWCOUNTRY RED CROSS, 974 F.2d 482 (4th Cir. 1992), a wrongful death action on behalf of an infant who died from HIV following a blood transfusion. The suit alleged that the Red Cross had negligently screened the blood donor, and sought discovery from the donor. To preserve confidentiality, the court permitted plaintiff to submit written questions to the donor’s lawyer, to which the Red Cross could object. Questions included:

- 1.On how many occasions in your life have you donated blood?
* * *
5. When you gave blood on February 26 or 27, 1985, were you asked about any diseases or behaviors or experiences that put you at risk for these diseases? * * *
9. On February 26 or 27, 1985, in the course of your preparing to give blood, did the Red Cross staff or volunteers give you any written or verbal information about AIDS risks? * * *
- 13.On February 26 & 27, 1985 could you read? * * *

Id. at 490. Why might defendant’s counsel have preferred a Rule 31 deposition rather than an oral one? Why was this approach used rather than Rule 33 interrogatories? See Schmertz, Written Depositions Under the Federal and State Rules as Cost-Effective Discovery at Home and Abroad, 16 Vill.L.Rev. 7 (1970).

3.INTERROGATORIES TO PARTIES

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 33 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

Written interrogatories allow one party to send to another a series of questions to be answered under oath within a specific time. The procedure is extremely simple. No court order is required and no officers need be appointed; the entire exchange is accomplished by mail. If a question is thought to be improper, the responding party may say so rather than answering. The interrogating party then has the option of seeking a court order requiring an answer. An important advantage of interrogatories exists to the extent that a party has a duty to respond to interrogatories not only on the basis of her own knowledge but also with regard to the knowledge of other persons, including her lawyers, employees, and other agents, that reasonably can be obtained through investigation. Under Rule 33(b)(1)(B) such an obligation clearly exists for a party who is a public or private corporation, an association, or a government entity. What is the obligation of an individual under Rule 33(b)(1)(A)?

Interrogatories had been cited as the most abused of the available discovery devices and the Federal Rules have been amended a number of times to police the process. In 1980, then Rule 33(c) (now Rule 33(d)), was amended to require a party exercising the option to produce its business records to specify the records from which the answer can be found in sufficient detail to permit the interrogating party to locate and to identify them as readily as can the party served. The clarification sought to prevent the party served with interrogatories from directing the party who propounded them to a mass of business records or by offering to make all their records available.

In 1993, Rule 33(a) was amended to impose a presumptive limit on the number of interrogatories, including discrete parts, that a party can serve. Although the requirement cannot be evaded through use of subparts, the Notes of the Advisory Committee indicate that “a question asking about communications of a particular type should be treated as a single interrogatory” even though it asks for a number of specific details regarding the particular communication.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. How extensive is the Rule 33 duty to investigate? Should a corporate party be charged with finding out what is known by each of its employees regardless of the size and nature of the business? Should the duty extend to information known to employees of subsidiary corporations that are not parties? To what extent should the duty include former employees?

927

2. Until the 1970 amendments to the Federal Rules, it was assumed that a party could not use an interrogatory to probe an adversary's legal theories or questions of law. Rule 30(a) now authorizes the use of "contention" interrogatories, and as with other discovery devices their scope and timing can be limited by the court.

CABLE & COMPUTER TECHNOLOGY, INC. v. LOCKHEED SAUNDERS, INC.

United States District Court, Central District of California, 1997.
175 F.R.D. 646.

CHAPMAN, UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE.

[The complaint alleged breach of contract, fraud, and other claims in connection with loss of a contract to provide radar simulators to the Air Force in favor of defendant's affiliated entities.]

* * *

The defendants seek to compel responses to defendant Lockheed Martin Corp.'s (hereafter defendant Lockheed) First Set of Special Interrogatories, interrogatory nos. 1, 5 through 11, and 14 through 16.³ The plaintiff has objected to all of these interrogatories on the grounds they are "contention interrogatories" and, therefore, improper, citing In re Convergent Technologies Securities Litigation, 108 F.R.D. 328, 345–49 (N.D.Cal.1985).

[T]he phrase 'contention interrogatory' is used imprecisely to refer to many different kinds of questions. Some people would classify as a contention interrogatory any question that asks another party to indicate what it contends. Some people would define contention interrogatories as embracing only questions that ask another party whether it makes some specified contention. . . . Another kind of question . . . asks an opposing party to state all the facts on which it bases some specified contention. Yet another form of this category of interrogatory asks an opponent to state all the evidence on which it bases some specified contention. Some contention interrogatories ask the responding party to take a position, and then to explain or defend that position, with respect to how the law applies to facts. A variation on this theme involves interrogatories that ask parties to spell out the legal basis for, or theory behind, some specified contention.

928

Id. at 332.

The Advisory Committee Notes to the 1970 amendment of Rule 33(b) (now Rule 33(c)), explain succinctly the reason for Rule 33(c), as it now reads:

There are numerous and conflicting decisions on the question whether and to what extent interrogatories are limited to matters 'of fact,' or may elicit opinions, contentions, and legal conclusions. [¶] Rule 33 is amended to provide that an interrogatory is not objectionable merely because it calls for an opinion or contention that relates to fact or the application of law to fact. Efforts to draw sharp lines between facts and opinions have been invariably unsuccessful, and the clear trend of the cases is to permit 'factual' opinions. . . .

* * * Further, if the concern in answering a contention interrogatory before discovery has been completed, or even substantially done, is that the answer to the interrogatory may limit the party's proof at trial, that concern is misplaced in that, among other things, the trial court may permit the withdrawal or amendment of an answer to an interrogatory. Wright, Miller & Marcus, Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil § 2181 at 344 (2d ed.1994) * * *.

* * *

In Convergent Technologies, Judge Wayne D. Brazil, in a very thoughtful opinion, held that the 1983 amendments to Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(b) compelled his conclusion that the "wisest course is not to preclude entirely the early use of contention interrogatories, but to place a burden of justification on the party who seeks answers to these kinds of questions before substantial documentary or testimonial discovery has been completed" * * *. " More recently, however, Judge Brazil has modified his position, noting that contention interrogatories may in certain cases be the most reliable and cost-effective discovery device, which would be less burdensome than depositions at which contention questions are propounded. * * *

Applying the foregoing principles, this Court prefers to consider contention interrogatories in the same manner it would consider any interrogatory, placing the burden on the party opposing discovery rather than shifting the burden to the proponent of the contention interrogatories to justify their propoundment. Thus, although it is too early for plaintiff to provide expert opinions on the subject of damages, plaintiff may, at this time, answer interrogatory no. 1 based on the information it has to date.

929

Of course, plaintiff may later amend its answer with leave of Court or supplement it, as it has an obligation to do under Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(e). The other disputed interrogatories, interrogatory nos. 5 through 11 and 14 through 16, are straightforward “factual” contention interrogatories which plaintiff should also be able to answer now. Requiring the answer to these “factual” contention interrogatories is * * * [consistent with Rule 11].”

NOTE AND QUESTION

Rule 33 interrogatories have several advantages relative to depositions. Typically their use is less expensive, and they can help narrow and frame issues in the dispute. Moreover, they are effective when requesting technical, statistical, or logistical information. Nevertheless, interrogatories often are the target of criticism and are said to be “tailor-made for abuse”; “[e]ven where interrogatories are narrowly targeted to legitimate areas of discovery, responses rarely consist of more than evasive legal gibberish.” Rennie, The End of Interrogatories: Why Twombly and Iqbal Should Finally Stop Rule 33 Abuse, 15 Lewis & Clark L.Rev. 191, 263 (2011). One particular problem has been the use of boilerplate objections that delay rather than advance the proceeding. How might greater judicial oversight reduce abusive interrogatory practice? See Jarvey, Boilerplate Discovery Objections: How They Are Used, Why They Are Wrong, and What We Can Do About Them, 61 Duke L.Rev. 913 (2013).

4.DISCOVERY AND PRODUCTION OF PROPERTY

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 34 and 45 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

Rule 34 allows a party to request other parties to produce documents, electronically stored information, and tangible things in their possession or control. The Rule also allows a party entry to the other parties’ land or property for such activities as inspection, survey, or measurement. A request must describe the items to be discovered “with reasonable particularity,” a standard that varies with circumstances. Rule 34(b)(1)(D) and (E) address the production of electronically stored information.

Most courts allow discovery of general categories of items if the description is easily understood (e.g., all written communications between plaintiff and defendant from July 1 to September 1, 2015). Many attorneys combine Rule 33 interrogatories that ask the opposing party to identify documents with a Rule 34 request that the party produce “all documents identified” in the opposing party’s answers to the interrogatories. Although the standard for requesting documents is a flexible one, the writing of a request calls for a great deal of precision.

930

A request must specify a reasonable time, place, and manner for the inspection. The time usually is set at least 30 days after service of the request because the opposing party generally has at least 30 days to respond. The place typically designated for production of documents is the office of the requesting party’s attorney, unless it is more convenient to examine the documents where they are kept or to have them copied at some other place. Since 1980, Rule 34 has required that the producer of documents for inspection “shall produce them in the usual course of business or shall organize and label them to correspond with the categories of the request.” As one district court explained, the amendment was intended “to prevent the juvenile practice whereby the producing party purposely rearranged the documents prior to production in order to prevent the requesting party’s efficient use of them.” United States v. O’Keefe, 537 F.Supp.2d 14, 19 (D.D.C. 2008).

The party that receives a request serves a written response on the requesting party, as well as any other parties to the lawsuit, within the time specified by Rule 34. The response states the responding party’s objections, if any, to part or all of the requested production or inspection. Absent objection, the responding party must produce the documents as requested, or admit counsel to its premises for the scheduled inspection. Amendments adopted in 2015 make clear that objections to document production must be stated with particularity. See Shackmurove, Policing Boilerplate: Reckoning and Reforming Rule 34’s Popular—Yet Problematic—Construction, 37 N.Ill.U.L.Rev. 23 (2017).

Although Rule 34 is limited to parties, amendments to Rule 45 (adopted in 1991) set forth a similar procedure to obtain material from nonparties. If the request for production of documents or inspection of premises is addressed to a nonparty, the litigant must serve a subpoena pursuant to Rule 45. Rule 45 now provides that an attorney may issue a subpoena commanding any person to give testimony, to produce and permit inspection and copying of designated records or other tangible objects, or to permit inspection of premises. See Breaux, Analysis of the Proposed Amendments to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 45 Pertaining to Nonparty Subpoenas for Documents, 50 Hous.L.Rev. 191 (2012).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Rule 34 originally was limited to the production of documents and things “material to any matter involved in the action” and only on a showing of “good cause,” but currently is governed by the relevance and proportionality factors of Rule 26(b). 8B Wright, Miller & Marcus, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2201 (3d ed.).

2. Rule 34 allows discovery of documents and things in the “possession, custody, or control” of a party. Does a client control information that is in the counsel’s hands? Courts have held that because a client has the right “to obtain copies of documents gathered or created by its attorneys pursuant to their representation of that client, such documents are clearly within the client’s control.” Am. Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals v. Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus, 233 F.R.D. 209, 212 (D.D.C. 2006). Would a party be considered to control documents in the following circumstances?

931

- (a) The party has given the documents to the party’s insurance carrier;
- (b) The documents are in the custody of the party’s wholly-owned subsidiary;
- (c) The documents are in the custody of the party’s former corporate employee; or
- (d) The documents are in the custody of a foreign-based subsidiary.

Should the touchstone be legal control over the custodian of the documents or some other factor?

3. How might a party sequence its use of discovery to ensure that document requests are made with the requisite specificity? Amendments adopted in 2015 allow the parties to serve early Rule 34 document requests before the Rule 26(f) conference, but responses are not due until 30 days after the conference has taken place. How might the early service of a document request aid the parties in devising their discovery plan?

4. The Federal Rules were adopted before personal computers and other electronic devices came into existence. The rules, however, have been adapted and amended to deal with technological change. In 1970, Federal Rule 34 was amended to include “data compilations from which information can be obtained” as among the documents that can be requested under the rule. Rule 34 was amended in 2006 to make clear that under Rule 34(a) electronically stored information is discoverable when “stored in any medium” from which it can be obtained, “translated, if necessary” into a “reasonably usable form.” Allman, Conducting E-Discovery After the Amendments: The Second Wave, 10 Sedona Conf.J. 215, 216 (2009). Electronic information is discoverable even when it is transitory or temporary. Rule 34 allows a party to avoid production of information in separate forms; a party need not provide duplicate physical and electronic copies of a document.

5. Rule 26(b)(2)(B) limits the burden of electronic discovery by identifying a category of information that is “not reasonably accessible.” The Advisory Committee’s Note to the 2006 amendments explains:

The decision whether to require a responding party to search for and produce information that is not reasonably accessible depends not only on the burdens and costs of doing so, but also on whether those burdens and costs can be justified in the circumstances of the case. Appropriate considerations may include: (1) the specificity of the discovery request; (2) the quantity of information available from other and more easily accessed sources; (3) the failure to produce relevant information that seems likely to have existed but is no longer available on more easily accessed sources; (4) the likelihood of finding relevant, responsive information that cannot be obtained from other, more easily accessed sources; (5) predictions as to the importance and usefulness of the further information; (6) the importance of the issues at stake in the litigation; and (7) the parties’ resources.

932

The Advisory Committee drew guidance from the district court’s decision in ZUBULAKE v. UBS WARBURG LLC, 217 F.R.D. 309 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), an employment discrimination suit. Plaintiff sought discovery of emails exchanged by defendants’ employees that were stored on backup tapes and optical disks. Each employee received about 200 emails a day, and, under federal securities law, defendant was required to preserve all communications for a fixed number of years. Defendant resisted producing the materials, arguing that “restoring those e-mails would cost approximately $175,000.00, exclusive of attorney time in reviewing the e-mails.” Id. at 312. The district court identified seven factors to consider in assessing whether to require disclosure but to shift the costs of discovery:

- 1. The extent to which the request is specifically tailored to discover relevant information;
- 2. The availability of such information from other sources;
- 3. The total cost of production, compared to the amount in controversy;
- 4. The total cost of production, compared to the resources available to each party;
- 5. The relative ability of each party to control costs and its incentive to do so;
- 6. The importance of the issues at stake in the litigation; and
- 7. The relative benefits to the parties of obtaining the information.

Id. at 322. Are any other factors relevant to the analysis?

6. Complicated discovery issues have arisen with respect to metadata, which essentially are data that describe other data. Metadata range from useful to absolutely necessary in the interpretation of original data. Before computers, metadata were included in library cards describing books, naming the author, publishing company and date, length of the book, and so on. In digital data, metadata might be descriptive; for an image file, it might include the resolution of the picture, the date and location and type of camera on which it was taken, while metadata of a text file might include a word count and the name of the author. This can be particularly important in looking at database files—without metadata, a database could look like hundreds of thousands of entries of seemingly random numbers, but with metadata, those numbers could be interpreted as dates, times, employee ID numbers, dollar amounts, ISBNs, or other meaningful information. As new technologies are developed and adopted, additional problems in discovery arise. For example, Microsoft Outlook, the email software used by many companies, formats emails and other data into .pst files when they are archived. Searching through .pst files is not only difficult and costly; it can alter the files’ timestamps, which fails to preserve evidence as required by the discovery rules.

7. “Predictive coding,” sometimes referred to as “technology assisted review” (“TAR”), is a computerized process by which a random sampling of documents is reviewed manually and determined to be responsive or unresponsive to the discovery request. See Yablon & Landsman-Roos, Predictive Coding: Emerging Questions and Concerns, 64 S.C.L.Rev. 633 (2013). Predictive coding algorithms and heuristics are applied to analyze the sample set, and the data are used to create a programming protocol that can be applied to the rest of the discovery materials. Using that protocol, a computer program combs through the remaining materials and labels documents responsive or unresponsive based on the sample data. An influential example of this method is reported in Moore v. Publicis Groupe SA, 2012 WL 2574742 (S.D.N.Y. 2012). For an empirical analysis of the costs of discovery responses in cases involving digital information, see Pace & Zakaras, Where the Money Goes: Understanding Litigant Expenditures for Producing Electronic Discovery, RAND Institute for Civil Justice (2012). For an example of how courts resolve disputes between parties about the use of particular methods of TAR, see Livingston v. City of Chicago, 2020 WL 5253848 (N.D.Ill. 2020).

8. The explosion in the volume of electronically stored information has meant that parties in litigation often confer on search terms to narrow the range of items, such as emails, that must be reviewed for responsiveness to a document request. This approach to document requests involving electronic documents is consistent with Rule 26(f)(3)(C), which requires a discovery plan to address “issues about disclosure, discovery, or preservation of electronically stored information,” but the rules do not directly require it. Nonetheless, courts can react harshly when litigants do not cooperate in formulating search terms for electronic discovery.

In PYLE v. SELECTIVE INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA, 2016 WL 5661749 (W.D.Pa. 2016) , AN EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION CASE, PLAINTIFF SERVED DEFENDANT WITH A DOCUMENT REQUEST FOR “ALL EMAILS, CORRESPONDENCE, MEMORANDUM, AND/OR OTHER DOCUMENTS” RELATING TO HER EMPLOYMENT AND RECEIPT OF DISABILITY BENEFITS, AND TO THE TERMINATION OF HER EMPLOYMENT. DEFENDANT’S COUNSEL ASKED PLAINTIFF’S COUNSEL FOR A “SUGGESTED LIST OF SEARCH TERMS . . . SO THAT WE CAN AGREE ON A COMMON SET OF TERMS SO THAT THE ELECTRONIC RECORDS [DEFENDANT] HAS GATHERED CAN BE SEARCHED FOR RELEVANCE.” ID. AT *1. PLAINTIFF’S COUNSEL WOULD NOT OFFER SEARCH TERMS TO DEFENDANT AND ARGUED THAT THERE WAS NO AUTHORITY TO SUPPORT THE REQUEST. THE DISTRICT COURT GRANTED DEFENDANT’S MOTION TO COMPEL:

Plaintiff’s argument totally misses the mark; in fact, it borders on being incomprehensible. Far from being baseless, Defendant’s request is entirely consistent with both the letter and spirit of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure regarding the discovery of electronically stored information and this Court’s Local Rules. It is well settled by now that “electronic discovery should be a party-driven process.” Romero v. Allstate Ins. Co., 271 F.R.D. 96, 109 (E.D. Pa. 2010) (internal citation omitted). The Federal Rules expressly require counsel to meet and confer on “any issues about disclosure, discovery, or preservation of electronically stored information, including the form or forms in which it should be produced[.]” Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f)(3)(C). “Among the items about which the court expects counsel to ‘reach practical agreement’ without the court having to micro-manage e-discovery are ‘search terms, date ranges, key players and the like.’ ” Romero, 271 F.R.D. at 109 * * *. Indeed, this principle is incorporated into this Court’s Local Rules, which direct counsel to “meet and confer, and attempt to agree, on the discovery of ESI, including . . . an ESI search protocol, including methods to filter data, such as application of search terms or date ranges.” LCvR 26.2(C). Accordingly, Defendant’s motion is GRANTED insofar as it seeks to compel Plaintiff to confer and come to an agreement on the search terms Defendant will use to cull through the additional email archives that Defendant has identified as having been retrieved. * * *

Id. at *2.

5. PHYSICAL AND MENTAL EXAMINATIONS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 35 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

In many lawsuits, a party will need to have its own medical professionals physically examine an adverse party whose condition is in controversy. However, a compelled medical examination involves an intrusion on a person’s privacy, and some medical tests can entail discomfort and pain. Rule 35 requires a court order for an examination and imposes strict standards. A court can force a party to submit to examination or to make persons under their legal custody or control available for examination. But the person’s physical or mental condition must be in controversy, and the movant must show “good cause” to compel the examination. The determination of good cause involves weighing the pain, danger, or intrusiveness of the examination against the need for, or usefulness of, the information to be gained.

In practice, most physical and mental examinations occur as a result of agreements between attorneys. The primary effect of Rule 35 is to encourage parties to stipulate to examinations. Examinations are routine in personal injury actions, as well as in litigation involving issues of paternity, incompetence, and undue influence. Of course, the Rule is available in those cases in which the parties cannot agree. Stipulations typically address questions concerning the time and place of the examination, and the procedures to be used. Rule 35 gives the examined party the right to a copy of the examiner’s report, even if he or she submitted to an examination without the compulsion of a court order.

SCHLAGENHAUF V. HOLDER
Supreme Court of the United States, 1964.
379 U.S. 104, 85 S.Ct. 234, 13 L.Ed.2d 152.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.
JUSTICE GOLDBERG delivered the opinion of the Court.
This case involves the validity and construction of Rule 35(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as applied to the examination of a defendant in a negligence action. * * *

An action based on diversity of citizenship was brought in the District Court seeking damages arising from personal injuries suffered by passengers of a bus which collided with the rear of a tractor-trailer. The named defendants were The Greyhound Corporation, owner of the bus; petitioner, Robert L. Schlagenhauf, the bus driver; Contract Carriers, Inc., owner of the tractor; Joseph L. McCorkhill, driver of the tractor; * * * and National Lead Company, owner of the trailer. Answers were filed by each of the defendants denying negligence.
Greyhound then cross-claimed against Contract Carriers and National Lead for damage to Greyhound’s bus, alleging that the collision was due solely to their negligence in that the tractor-trailer was driven at an unreasonably low speed, had not remained in its lane, and was not equipped with proper rear lights. Contract Carriers filed an answer to this cross-claim denying its negligence and asserting “[t]hat the negligence of the driver of the * * * bus [petitioner Schlagenhauf] proximately caused and contributed to * * * Greyhound’s damages.”

* * *

Contract Carriers and National Lead then petitioned the District Court for an order directing petitioner Schlagenhauf to submit to both mental and physical examinations by one specialist in each of the following fields:
(1)Internal medicine;
(2)Ophthalmology;
(3)Neurology; and

(4)Psychiatry.
For the purpose of offering a choice to the District Court of one specialist in each field, the petition recommended two specialists in internal medicine, ophthalmology, and psychiatry, respectively, and three specialists in neurology—a total of nine physicians. The petition alleged that the mental and physical condition of Schlagenhauf was “in controversy” as it had been raised by Contract Carriers’ answer to Greyhound’s cross-claim. This was supported by a brief of legal authorities and an affidavit of Contract Carriers’ attorney stating that Schlagenhauf had seen red lights 10 to 15 seconds before the accident, that another witness had seen the rear lights of the trailer from a distance of three-quarters to one-half mile, and that Schlagenhauf had been involved in a prior accident.

* * *

While disposition of this petition was pending, National Lead filed its answer to Greyhound’s cross-claim and itself “cross-claimed” against Greyhound and Schlagenhauf for damage to its trailer. * * *
The District Court, on the basis of the petition filed by Contract Carriers, and without any hearing, ordered Schlagenhauf to submit to nine examinations—one by each of the recommended specialists—despite the fact that the petition clearly requested a total of only four examinations.
Petitioner applied for a writ of mandamus in the Court of Appeals against the respondent, the District Court Judge, seeking to have set aside the order requiring his mental and physical examinations. The Court of Appeals denied mandamus, one judge dissenting * * *.
We granted certiorari to review undecided questions concerning the validity and construction of Rule 35. * * *

Rule 35 on its face applies to all “parties,” which under any normal reading would include a defendant. Petitioner contends, however, that the application of the Rule to a defendant would be an unconstitutional invasion of his privacy, or, at the least, be a modification of substantive rights existing prior to the adoption of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and thus beyond the congressional mandate of the Rules Enabling Act.

These same contentions were raised [and rejected] in Sibbach v. Wilson & Co. * * * [p. 477, supra] by a plaintiff in a negligence action who asserted a physical injury as a basis for recovery. * * * Petitioner does not challenge the holding in Sibbach as applied to plaintiffs. He contends, however, that it should not be extended to defendants. We can see no basis * * * for such a distinction. * * * Issues cannot be resolved by a doctrine of favoring one class of litigants over another.

937

We recognize that, insofar as reported cases show, this type of discovery in federal courts has been applied solely to plaintiffs, and that some early state cases seem to have proceeded on a theory that a plaintiff who seeks redress for injuries in a court of law thereby “waives” his right to claim the inviolability of his person. * * *

[The Court then rejected the “waiver” theory on the basis of language in the Sibbach case.] The chain of events leading to an ultimate determination on the merits begins with the injury of the plaintiff, an involuntary act on his part. Seeking court redress is just one step in this chain. If the plaintiff is prevented or deterred from this redress, the loss is thereby forced on him to the same extent as if the defendant were prevented or deterred from defending against the action.

* * *

Petitioner contends that even if Rule 35 is to be applied to defendants, which we have determined it must, nevertheless it should not be applied to him as he was not a party in relation to Contract Carriers and National Lead—the movants for the mental and physical examinations—at the time the examinations were sought. * * * While it is clear that the person to be examined must be a party to the case,¹² we are of the view that * * * Rule 35 only requires that the person to be examined be a party to the “action,” not that he be an opposing party vis-à-vis the movant. There is no doubt that Schlagenhauf was a “party” to this “action” by virtue of the original complaint. * * * Insistence that the movant have filed a pleading against the person to be examined would have the undesirable result of an unnecessary proliferation of cross-claims and counterclaims and would not be in keeping with the aims of a liberal, nontechnical application of the Federal Rules. * * *

While the Court of Appeals held that petitioner was not a party vis-à-vis National Lead or Contract Carriers at the time the examinations were first sought, it went on to hold that he had become a party vis-à-vis National Lead by the time of a second order entered by the District Court and thus was a party within its rule. This second order, identical in all material respects with the first, was entered on the basis of supplementary petitions filed by National Lead and Contract Carriers. These petitions gave no new basis for the examinations, except for the allegation that petitioner’s mental and physical condition had been additionally put in controversy by the National Lead answer and cross-claim, which had been filed subsequent to the first petition for examinations. Although the filing of the petition for mandamus intervened between these two orders, we accept, for purposes of this opinion, the determination of the Court of Appeals that this second order was the one before it and agree that petitioner was clearly a party at this juncture under any test.

938

Petitioner next contends that his mental or physical condition was not “in controversy” and “good cause” was not shown for the examinations, both as required by the express terms of Rule 35.

* * *

It is notable * * * that in none of the other discovery provisions is there a restriction that the matter be “in controversy,” and only in Rule 34 is there Rule 35’s requirement that the movant affirmatively demonstrate “good cause.”¹³

This additional requirement of “good cause” was reviewed by Chief Judge Sobeloff in Guilford National Bank v. Southern R. Co., 297 F. 2d 921, 924 (C. A. 4th Cir.), in the following words:

“* * * The specific requirement of good cause would be meaningless if good cause could be sufficiently established by merely showing that the desired materials are relevant, for the relevancy standard has already been imposed by Rule 26(b). Thus, by adding the words “* * * good cause * * *,” the Rules indicate that there must be greater showing of need under Rules 34 and 35 than under the other discovery rules.”

The courts of appeals in other cases * * * have also recognized that Rule 34’s good-cause requirement is not a mere formality, but is a plainly expressed limitation on the use of that Rule. This is obviously true as to the “in controversy” and “good cause” requirements of Rule 35. They are not met by mere conclusory allegations of the pleadings—nor by mere relevance to the case—but require an affirmative showing by the movant that each condition as to which the examination is sought is really and genuinely in controversy and that good cause exists for ordering each particular examination. Obviously, what may be good cause for one type of examination may not be so for another. The ability of the movant to obtain the desired information by other means is also relevant.

Rule 35, therefore, requires discriminating application by the trial judge, who must decide, as an initial matter in every case, whether the party requesting a mental or physical examination or examinations has adequately demonstrated the existence of the Rule’s requirements of “in controversy” and “good cause,” which requirements, as the Court of Appeals in this case itself recognized, are necessarily related. 321 F.2d, at 51.* * *

Of course, there are situations where the pleadings alone are sufficient to meet these requirements. A plaintiff in a negligence action mental or physical injury * * * places that mental or physical injury clearly in controversy and provides the defendant with good cause for an examination to determine the existence and extent of such asserted injury. This * * * applies equally to a defendant who asserts his mental or physical condition as a defense to a claim, such as, for example, where insanity is asserted as a defense to a divorce action. * * *

who asserts

Here, however, Schlagenhauf did not assert his mental or physical condition either in support of or in defense of a claim. His condition was sought to be placed in issue by other parties. Thus, under the principles discussed above, Rule 35 required that these parties make an affirmative showing that petitioner’s mental or physical condition was in controversy and that there was good cause for the examinations requested. This, the record plainly shows, they failed to do.

The only allegations in the pleadings relating to this subject were the general conclusory statement in Contract Carriers’ answer to the cross-claim that “Schlagenhauf was not mentally or physically capable of operating” the bus at the time of the accident and the limited allegation in National Lead’s cross-claim that, at the time of the accident, “the eyes and vision of * * * Schlagenhauf was [sic] impaired and deficient.”

The attorney’s affidavit attached to the petition for the examinations provided:

“That * * * Schlagenhauf, in his deposition * * * admitted that he saw red lights for 10 to 15 seconds prior to a collision with a semi-tractor trailer unit and yet drove his vehicle on without reducing speed and without altering the course thereof.

The only eye-witness to this accident known to this affiant * * * testified that immediately prior to the impact between the bus and truck that he had also been approaching the truck from the rear and that he had clearly seen the lights of the truck for a distance of three-quarters to one-half mile to the rear thereof.

* * * Schlagenhauf has admitted in his deposition * * * that he was involved in a [prior] similar type rear end collision. * * *

This record cannot support even the corrected order which required one examination in each of the four specialties of internal medicine, ophthalmology, neurology, and psychiatry. * * * Nothing in the pleadings or affidavit would afford a basis for a belief that Schlagenhauf was suffering from a mental or neurological illness warranting wide-ranging psychiatric or neurological examinations. Nor is there anything stated justifying the broad internal medicine examination. * * *

The only specific allegation made in support of the four examinations ordered was that the “eyes and vision” of Schlagenhauf were impaired. Considering this in conjunction with the affidavit, we would be hesitant to set aside a visual examination if it had been the only one ordered. * * * However, as the case must be remanded to the District Court because of the other examinations ordered, it would be appropriate for the District Judge to reconsider also this order in light of the guidelines set forth in this opinion.

* * *

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated and the case remanded to the District Court to reconsider the examination order in light of the guidelines herein formulated and for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Vacated and remanded.

JUSTICE BLACK, with whom JUSTICE CLARK joins, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

* * *

In a collision case like this one, evidence concerning very bad eyesight or impaired mental or physical health which may affect the ability to drive is obviously of the highest relevance. It is equally obvious, I think, that when a vehicle continues down an open road and smashes into a truck in front of it although the truck is in plain sight and there is ample time and room to avoid collision, the chances are good that the driver has some physical, mental or moral defect. When such a thing happens twice, one is even more likely to ask, “What is the matter with that driver? Is he blind or crazy?” Plainly the allegations of the other parties were relevant and put the question of Schlagenhauf’s health and vision “in controversy.” * * *

JUSTICE DOUGLAS, dissenting in part.

* * * When the defendant’s doctors examine plaintiff, they are normally interested only in answering a single question: did plaintiff in fact sustain the specific injuries claimed? But plaintiff’s doctors will naturally be inclined to go on a fishing expedition in search of anything which will tend to prove that the defendant was unfit to perform the acts which resulted in the plaintiff’s injury. And a doctor for a fee can easily discover something wrong with any patient—a condition that in prejudiced medical eyes might have caused the accident. Once defendants are turned over to medical or psychiatric clinics for an analysis of their physical well-being and the condition of their psyche, the effective trial will be held there and not before the jury. There are no lawyers in those clinics to stop the doctor from probing this organ or that one, to halt a further inquiry, to object to a line of questioning. And there is no judge to sit as arbiter. The doctor or the psychiatrist has a holiday in the privacy of his office. The defendant is at the doctor’s (or psychiatrist’s) mercy; and his report may either overawe or confuse the jury and prevent a fair trial.

941

* * *

Neither the Court nor Congress up to today has determined that any person whose physical or mental condition is brought into question during some lawsuit must surrender his right to keep his person inviolate. Congress did, according to Sibbach, require a plaintiff to choose between his privacy and his purse; but before today it has not been thought that any other “party” had lost this historic immunity. Congress and this Court can authorize such a rule. But a rule suited to purposes of discovery against defendants must be carefully drawn in light of the great potential of blackmail.

* * *

[JUSTICE HARLAN’s dissenting opinion is omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Should the following examinations be available under Rule 35?
 - (a)The vocational assessment of a plaintiff alleging personal injury. See Storms v. Lowe’s Home Centers, Inc., 211 F.R.D. 296 (W.D.Va. 2002).
 - (b)The physical and mental examination of a Christian Scientist alleging injury from forced medication during a period of involuntary hospitalization. See Winters v. Travia, 495 F.2d 839 (2d Cir. 1974).
 - (c)The psychiatric examination of a plaintiff seeking damages for negligent infliction of emotional distress resulting from seeing her child die in a subway train accident. See Abdulwali v. Washington Metro Area Transit Auth., 193 F.R.D. 10 (D.D.C.2000).
- 2.In Torres v. Time Manufacturing Company, 2012 WL 13006155, *3 (E.D.Mich. 2012), the district court ordered that an independent medical examination take place and rejected a request to have a third party present or a recording taken, not finding special need or a good reason for either condition. The court underscored that “Rule 35(a) is silent on the question of whether a recording of the examination or observers should be allowed.” Should the court permit counsel to be present at all Rule 35 examinations? A friend? A personal physician? See Wyatt & Bales, The Presence of Third Parties at Rule 35 Examinations, 71 Temp.L.Rev. 103 (1998).

6.REQUESTS TO ADMIT

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 36 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

942

Rule 36 authorizes a party to serve on another party written requests to admit the truth of certain matters of fact or of the application of law to fact, or the genuineness of a document or other evidence that may be used at trial. Rule 36 is not a true discovery device since it does not require the responding party to disclose information. Requests for admissions are used to shape information already known into statements that expedite the trial by limiting the issues in dispute and by obviating some of the formalities that control the introduction of evidence at trial. Although responses to other discovery devices are not conclusive proof and may be contradicted at trial, responses to Rule 36 requests constitute conclusive evidence, unless withdrawn, and cannot be contradicted at trial. However, requests for admissions may function as a discovery device if a party uses them early enough in the litigation to help identify the issues not in dispute and to target the remaining issues for discovery.

A request for admission may be served without the necessity of a court order at any time after the parties have conferred in accordance with Rule 26(d), although usually not later than thirty days before a fixed trial date. Rule 36 provides that each matter of admission must be set forth separately, but says nothing else about the format for requests. However, the now-abrogated Form 51 appended to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which is reproduced in the Supplement, provides an illustration of a request for admissions.

The party who receives a request to admit must respond under oath and in timely fashion, admitting or denying each matter for which an admission is requested, or providing a detailed explanation why it cannot admit or deny the matter. The responding party also may object to a request because improperly phrased (as “vague,” “ambiguous,” “a compound sentence,” or otherwise defectively drafted), or because it seeks privileged or protected information. The responding party may request a court to extend its time to respond. Rule 29 provides that counsel may stipulate to extend the time limits set forth in Rule 36 unless the stipulation would “interfere with the time set for completing discovery, for hearing a motion, or for trial.”

If the party who receives a request to admit does nothing, the matter in the request is deemed admitted. The effects of Rule 36, unlike other discovery rules, are self-executing. Once the time to respond has passed, the requesting party can rely on the matters admitted and take no further discovery on those issues. If a party serves a late response, and the opponent refuses to accept it, a court may excuse the party’s failure to respond in a timely manner. Likewise, a court may permit a party to withdraw or modify an admission in a timely response. In either situation, the court’s decision turns on the degree of prejudice the requesting party will suffer because of its reliance on the admission. Because courts so frequently granted a responding party’s request for relief from its failure to respond, leaving requesting parties uncertain about the validity of the admission, and, hence, the necessity of developing evidence for trial, Rule 36(a) was amended in 1970 to permit a requesting party to move for an order deeming the matter to be admitted. Thus, a litigant takes a serious risk by failing to respond to Requests for Admissions. The court may well find that the failure was not justified, that the admissions have been made, and that, as a result, summary judgment is appropriate.

Although Rule 36 and its state counterparts can be enormously useful, in practice requests for admissions are the least used of the discovery devices.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Rule 36 formerly limited requests for admissions to matters of “fact.” The Rule was amended in 1970 and now permits requests for admissions to inquire into matters relating to facts, the application of law to fact, or opinions about either, and the genuineness of any described documents. A great deal of information can be learned about an opposing party through social media. Can a party use a request to admit in order to determine whether a party maintains a social media site, and then to secure authentication of the site for purposes of admissibility? See McCann, Tips for Authenticating Social Media Evidence, 100 Ill.B.J. 482 (2012).

2. What is a “reasonable inquiry” under Rule 36 and when is information not “readily obtainable” by an answering party? The district court in Kay v. Lamar Advertising of South Dakota, Inc., 2008 WL 5221083 (D.S.D. 2008), held that before a responding party “gives the answer ‘I don’t know,’ ” it is required under the rule “to state that it has made reasonable inquiry to attempt to find out the answer to the request to admit and that it still cannot admit or deny the question after having sought information readily available to it.” Id. at *6.

3. Armour v. Knowles, 512 F.3d 147 (5th Cir. 2007), involved a copyright infringement suit against the popular musician known as Beyoncé for her song “Baby Boy.” The district court granted summary judgment for defendant. The Fifth Circuit affirmed on an alternative ground that plaintiff had failed to show that defendant had access to the disputed song and so could not have copied it. The basis for the affirmance was plaintiff’s answer to defendant’s request for admission stating when he had sent a demo tape of the disputed song to Beyoncé.

F. SPECIAL PROBLEMS REGARDING THE SCOPE OF DISCOVERY

1.MATERIALS PREPARED IN ANTICIPATION OF TRIAL

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(3) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

HICKMAN V. TAYLOR

Supreme Court of the United States, 1947.
329 U.S. 495, 67 S.Ct. 385, 91 L.Ed. 451.

Certiorari to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

JUSTICE MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents an important problem under the Federal Rules * * * as to the extent to which a party may inquire into oral and written statements of witnesses, or other information, secured by an adverse party’s counsel in the course of preparation for possible litigation after a claim has arisen. Examination into a person’s files and records, including those resulting from the professional activities of an attorney, must be judged with care. It is not without reason that various safeguards have been established to preclude unwarranted excursions into the privacy of a man’s work. At the same time, public policy supports reasonable and necessary inquiries. Properly to balance these competing interests is a delicate and difficult task.

On February 7, 1943, the tug “J.M. Taylor” sank while engaged in helping to tow a car float of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad across the Delaware River at Philadelphia. The accident was apparently unusual in nature, the cause of it still being unknown. Five of the nine crew members were drowned. Three days later the tug owners and the underwriters employed a law firm, of which respondent Fortenbaugh is a member, to defend them against potential suits by representatives of the deceased crew members and to sue the railroad for damages to the tug.

A public hearing was held on March 4, 1943, before the United States Steamboat Inspectors, at which the four survivors were examined. This testimony was recorded and made available to all interested parties. Shortly thereafter, Fortenbaugh privately interviewed the survivors and took statements from them with an eye toward the anticipated litigation; the survivors signed these statements on March 29. Fortenbaugh also interviewed other persons believed to have some information relating to the accident and in some cases he made memoranda of what they told him. At the time when Fortenbaugh secured the statements of the survivors, representatives of two of the deceased crew members had been in communication with him. Ultimately claims were presented by representatives of all five of the deceased; four of the claims, however, were settled without litigation. The fifth claimant, petitioner herein, brought suit in a federal court under the Jones Act on November 26, 1943, naming as defendants the two tug owners, individually and as partners, and the railroad.

945

One year later, petitioner filed 39 interrogatories directed to the tug owners. The 38th interrogatory read: "State whether any statements of the members of the crews of the Tugs 'J.M. Taylor' and 'Philadelphia' or of any other vessel were taken in connection with the towing of the car float and the sinking of the Tug 'John M. Taylor'. Attach hereto exact copies of all such statements if in writing, and if oral, set forth in detail the exact provisions of any such oral statements or reports."

Supplemental interrogatories asked whether any oral or written statements, records, reports or other memoranda had been made concerning any matter relative to the towing operation, the sinking of the tug, the salvaging and repair of the tug, and the death of the deceased. If the answer was in the affirmative, the tug owners were then requested to set forth the nature of all such records, reports, statements or other memoranda.

The tug owners, through Fortenbaugh, answered all of the interrogatories except No. 38 and the supplemental ones just described. While admitting that statements of the survivors had been taken, they declined to summarize or set forth the contents. They did so on the ground that such requests called "for privileged matter obtained in preparation for litigation" and constituted "an attempt to obtain indirectly counsel's private files." It was claimed that answering these requests "would involve practically turning over not only the complete files, but also the telephone records and, almost, the thoughts of counsel."

In connection with the hearing on these objections, Fortenbaugh made a written statement and gave an informal oral deposition explaining the circumstances under which he had taken the statements. But he was not expressly asked in the deposition to produce the statements. The District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, sitting en banc, held that the requested matters were not privileged. 4 F.R.D. 479. The court then decreed that the tug owners and Fortenbaugh, as counsel and agent for the tug owners forthwith "Answer Plaintiff's 38th interrogatory and supplemental interrogatories; produce all written statements of witnesses obtained by Mr. Fortenbaugh, as counsel and agent for Defendants; state in substance any fact concerning this case which Defendants learned through oral statements made by witnesses to Mr. Fortenbaugh whether or not included in his private memoranda and produce Mr. Fortenbaugh's memoranda containing statements of fact by witnesses or to submit these memoranda to the Court for determination of those portions which should be revealed to Plaintiff." Upon their refusal, the court adjudged them in contempt and ordered them imprisoned until they complied.

946

The Third Circuit Court of Appeals, also sitting en banc, reversed the judgment of the District Court. 153 F.2d 212. It held that the information here sought was part of the "work product of the lawyer" and hence privileged from discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The importance of the problem, which has engendered a great divergence of views among district courts, led us to grant certiorari. * * *

There is an initial question as to which of the deposition-discovery rules is involved in this case. Petitioner, in filing his interrogatories, thought that he was proceeding under Rule 33.

* * * [I]t does not appear from the record that petitioner filed a motion under Rule 34 for a court order directing the production of the documents in question. Indeed, such an order could not have been entered as to Fortenbaugh since Rule 34, like Rule 33, is limited to parties to the proceeding, thereby excluding their counsel or agents.

Thus to the extent that petitioner was seeking the production of the memoranda and statements gathered by Fortenbaugh in the course of his activities as counsel, petitioner misconceived his remedy. Rule 33 did not permit him to obtain such memoranda and statements as adjuncts to the interrogatories addressed to the individual tug owners. A party clearly cannot refuse to answer interrogatories on the ground that the information sought is solely within the knowledge of his attorney. But that is not this case. Here production was sought of documents prepared by a party's attorney after the claim has arisen. Rule 33 does not make provision for such production, even when sought in connection with permissible interrogatories. Moreover, since petitioner was also foreclosed from securing them through an order under Rule 34, his only recourse was to take Fortenbaugh's deposition under Rule 26 and to attempt to force Fortenbaugh to produce the materials by use of a subpoena duces tecum in accordance with Rule 45. * * * But despite petitioner's faulty choice of action, the District Court entered an order, apparently under Rule 34, commanding the tug owners and Fortenbaugh, as their agent and counsel, to produce the materials in question. Their refusal led to the anomalous result of holding the tug owners in contempt for failure to produce that which was in the possession of their counsel and of holding Fortenbaugh in contempt for failure to produce that which he could not be compelled to produce under either Rule 33 or Rule 34.

947

But under the circumstances we deem it unnecessary and unwise to rest our decision upon this procedural irregularity, an irregularity which is not strongly urged upon us and which was disregarded in the two courts below. * * * [T]he basic question at stake is whether any of those devices may be used to inquire into materials collected by an adverse party's counsel in the course of preparation for possible litigation. The fact that the petitioner may have used the wrong method does not destroy the main thrust of his attempt. * * * [I]n the present circumstances, for the purposes of this decision, the procedural irregularity is not material. * * *

In urging that he has a right to inquire into the materials secured and prepared by Fortenbaugh, petitioner emphasizes that the deposition-discovery portions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are designed to enable the parties to discover the true facts and to compel their disclosure wherever they may be found. It is said that inquiry may be made under these rules, epitomized by Rule 26, as to any relevant matter which is not privileged; and since the discovery provisions are to be applied as broadly and liberally as possible, the privilege limitation must be restricted to its narrowest bounds. On the premise that the attorney-client privilege is the one involved in this case, petitioner argues that it must be strictly confined to confidential communications made by a client to his attorney. And since the materials here in issue were secured by Fortenbaugh from third persons rather than from his clients, the tug owners, the conclusion is reached that these materials are proper subjects for discovery under Rule 26.

As additional support for this result, petitioner claims that to prohibit discovery under these circumstances would give a corporate defendant a tremendous advantage in a suit by an individual plaintiff. Thus in a suit by an injured employee against a railroad or in a suit by an insured person against an insurance company the corporate defendant could pull a dark veil of secrecy over all the pertinent facts it can collect after the claim arises merely on the assertion that such facts were gathered by its large staff of attorneys and claim agents. At the same time, the individual plaintiff, who often has direct knowledge of the matter in issue and has no counsel until sometime after his claim arises could be compelled to disclose all the intimate details of his case. By endowing with immunity from disclosure all that a lawyer discovers in the course of his duties, it is said, the rights of individual litigants in such cases are drained of vitality and the lawsuit becomes more of a battle of deception than a search for truth.

But framing the problem in terms of assisting individual plaintiffs in their suits against corporate defendants is unsatisfactory. Discovery concededly may work to the disadvantage as well as to the advantage of individual plaintiffs. Discovery, in other words, is not a one-way proposition. It is available in all types of cases at the behest of any party, individual or corporate, plaintiff or defendant. The problem thus far transcends the situation confronting this petitioner. And we must view that problem in light of the limitless situations where the particular kind of discovery sought by petitioner might be used.

948

We agree, of course, that the deposition-discovery rules are to be accorded a broad and liberal treatment. No longer can the time-honored cry of "fishing expedition" serve to preclude a party from inquiring into the facts underlying his opponent's case. Mutual knowledge of all the relevant facts gathered by both parties is essential to proper litigation. To that end, either party may compel the other to disgorge whatever facts he has in his possession. The deposition-discovery procedure simply advances the stage at which the disclosure can be compelled from the time of trial to the period preceding it, thus reducing the possibility of surprise. But discovery, like all matters of procedure, has ultimate and necessary boundaries. As indicated by Rules 30(b) and (d) and 31(d), limitations inevitably arise when it can be shown that the examination is being conducted in bad faith or in such a manner as to annoy, embarrass or oppress the person subject to the inquiry.^d And as Rule 26(b) provides, further limitations come into existence when the inquiry touches upon the irrelevant or encroaches upon the recognized domains of privilege.

We also agree that the memoranda, statements and mental impressions in issue in this case fall outside the scope of the attorney-client privilege and hence are not protected from discovery on that basis. * * *

But the impropriety of invoking that privilege does not provide an answer to the problem before us. Petitioner has made more than an ordinary request for relevant, non-privileged facts in the possession of his adversaries or their counsel. He has sought discovery as of right of oral and written statements of witnesses whose identity is well known and whose availability to petitioner appears unimpaired. He has sought production of these matters after making the most searching inquiries of his opponents as to the circumstances surrounding the fatal accident, which inquiries were sworn to have been answered to the best of their information and belief. Interrogatories were directed toward all the events prior to, during and subsequent to the sinking of the tug. Full and honest answers to such broad inquiries would necessarily have included all pertinent information gleaned by Fortenbaugh through his interviews with the witnesses. Petitioner makes no suggestion, and we cannot assume, that the tug owners or Fortenbaugh were incomplete or dishonest in the framing of their answers. In addition, petitioner was free to examine the public testimony of the witnesses taken before the United States Steamboat Inspectors. We are thus dealing with an attempt to secure the production of written statements and mental impressions contained in the files and the mind of the attorney Fortenbaugh without any showing of necessity or any indication or claim that denial of such production would unduly prejudice the preparation of petitioner's case or cause him any hardship or injustice. For aught that appears, the essence of what petitioner seeks either has been revealed to him already through the interrogatories or is readily available to him direct from the witnesses for the asking.

949

* * *

In our opinion, neither Rule 26 nor any other rule dealing with discovery contemplates production under such circumstances. That is not because the subject matter is privileged or irrelevant, as those concepts are used in these rules. Here is simply an attempt, without purported necessity or justification, to secure written statements, private memoranda and personal recollections prepared or formed by an adverse party's counsel in the course of his legal duties. As such, it falls outside the arena of discovery and contravenes the public policy underlying the orderly prosecution and defense of legal claims. Not even the most liberal of discovery theories can justify unwarranted inquiries into the files and the mental impressions of an attorney.

Historically, a lawyer is an officer of the court and is bound to work for the advancement of justice while faithfully protecting the rightful interests of his clients. In performing his various duties, however, it is essential that a lawyer work with a certain degree of privacy, free from unnecessary intrusion by opposing parties and their counsel. Proper preparation of a client's case demands that he assemble information, sift what he considers to be the relevant from the irrelevant facts, prepare his legal theories and plan his strategy without undue and needless interference. That is the historical and the necessary way in which lawyers act within the framework of our system of jurisprudence to promote justice and to protect their clients' interests. This work is reflected, of course, in interviews, statements, memoranda, correspondence, briefs, mental impressions, personal beliefs, and countless other tangible and intangible ways—aptly though roughly termed by the Circuit Court of Appeals in this case (153 F.2d 212, 223) as the “work product of the lawyer.” Were such materials open to opposing counsel on mere demand, much of what is now put down in writing would remain unwritten. An attorney's thoughts, heretofore inviolate, would not be his own. Inefficiency, unfairness and sharp practices would inevitably develop in the giving of legal advice and in the preparation of cases for trial. The effect on the legal profession would be demoralizing. And the interests of the clients and the cause of justice would be poorly served.

We do not mean to say that all written materials obtained or prepared by an adversary's counsel with an eye toward litigation are necessarily free from discovery in all cases. Where relevant and non-privileged facts remain hidden in an attorney's file and where production of those facts is essential to the preparation of one's case, discovery may properly be had. Such written statements and documents might, under certain circumstances, be admissible in evidence or give clues as to the existence or location of relevant facts. Or they might be useful for purposes of impeachment or corroboration. And production might be justified where the witnesses are no longer available or can be reached only with difficulty. Were production of written statements and documents to be precluded under such circumstances, the liberal ideals of the deposition-discovery portions of the Federal Rules * * * would be stripped of much of their meaning. But the general policy against invading the privacy of an attorney's course of preparation is so well recognized and so essential to an orderly working of our system of legal procedure that a burden rests on the one who would invade that privacy to establish adequate reasons to justify production through a subpoena or court order. That burden, we believe, is necessarily implicit in the rules as now constituted.

950

Rule 30(b), as presently written, gives the trial judge the requisite discretion to make a judgment as to whether discovery should be allowed as to written statements secured from witnesses. But in the instant case there was no room for that discretion to operate in favor of the petitioner. No attempt was made to establish any reason why Fortenbaugh should be forced to produce the written statements. There was only a naked, general demand for these materials as of right and a finding by the District Court that no recognizable privilege was involved. That was insufficient to justify discovery under these circumstances and the court should have sustained the refusal of the tug owners and Fortenbaugh to produce.

But as to oral statements made by witnesses to Fortenbaugh, whether presently in the form of his mental impressions or memoranda, we do not believe that any showing of necessity can be made under the circumstances of this case so as to justify production. Under ordinary conditions, forcing an attorney to repeat or write out all that witnesses have told him and to deliver the account to his adversary gives rise to grave dangers of inaccuracy and untrustworthiness. No legitimate purpose is served by such production. The practice forces the attorney to testify as to what he remembers or what he saw fit to write down regarding witnesses' remarks. Such testimony could not qualify as evidence; and to use it for impeachment or corroborative purposes would make the attorney much less an officer of the court and much more an ordinary witness. The standards of the profession would thereby suffer.

Denial of production of this nature does not mean that any material, nonprivileged facts can be hidden from the petitioner in this case. He need not be unduly hindered in the preparation of his case, in the discovery of facts or in his anticipation of his opponents' position. Searching interrogatories directed to Fortenbaugh and the tug owners, production of written documents and statements upon a proper showing and direct interviews with the witnesses themselves all serve to reveal the facts in Fortenbaugh's possession to the fullest possible extent consistent with public policy. Petitioner's counsel frankly admits that he wants the oral statements only to help prepare himself to examine witnesses and to make sure that he has overlooked nothing. That is insufficient under the circumstances to permit him an exception to the policy underlying the privacy of Fortenbaugh's professional activities. If there should be a rare situation justifying production of these matters, petitioner's case is not of that type.

951

We fully appreciate the wide-spread controversy among the members of the legal profession over the problem raised by this case. * * * But until some rule or statute definitely prescribes otherwise, we are not justified in permitting discovery in a situation of this nature as a matter of unqualified right. When Rule 26 and the other discovery rules were adopted, this Court and the members of the bar in general certainly did not believe or contemplate that all the files and mental processes of lawyers were thereby opened to the free scrutiny of their adversaries. And we refuse to interpret the rules at this time so as to reach so harsh and unwarranted a result.

We therefore affirm the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals.

Affirmed.

JUSTICE JACKSON, concurring.

* * *

To consider first the most extreme aspect of the requirement in litigation here, we find it calls upon counsel, if he has had any conversations with any of the crews of the vessels in question or of any other, to “set forth in detail the exact provision of any such oral statements or reports.” Thus the demand is not for the production of a transcript in existence but calls for the creation of a written statement not in being. But the statement by counsel of what a witness told him is not evidence when written. Plaintiff could not introduce it to prove his case. What, then, is the purpose sought to be served by demanding this of adverse counsel?

Counsel for the petitioner candidly said on argument that he wanted this information to help prepare himself to examine witnesses, to make sure he overlooked nothing. He bases his claim to it in his brief on the view that the Rules were to do away with the old situation where a law suit developed into “a battle of wits between counsel.” But a common law trial is and always should be an adversary proceeding. Discovery was hardly intended to enable a learned profession to perform its functions either without wits or on wits borrowed from the adversary.

The real purpose and the probable effect of the practice ordered by the district court would be to put trials on a level even lower than a “battle of wits.” I can conceive of no practice more demoralizing to the Bar than to require a lawyer to write out and deliver to his adversary an account of what witnesses have told him. Even if his recollection were perfect, the statement would be his language permeated with his inferences. Every one who has tried it knows that it is almost impossible so fairly to record the expressions and emphasis of a witness that when he testifies in the environment of the court and under the influence of the leading question there will not be departures in some respects. Whenever the testimony of the witness would differ from the “exact” statement the lawyer had delivered, the lawyer’s statement would be whipped out to impeach the witness. Counsel producing his adversary’s “inexact” statement could lose nothing by saying, “Here is a contradiction, gentlemen of the jury. I do not know whether it is my adversary or his witness who is not telling the truth, but one is not.” of course, if this practice were adopted, that scene would be repeated over and over again. The lawyer who delivers such statements often would find himself branded a deceiver afraid to take the stand to support his own version of the witness’s conversation with him, or else he will have to go on the stand to defend his own credibility—perhaps against that of his chief witness, or possibly even his client.

Every lawyer dislikes to take the witness stand and will do so only for grave reasons. This is partly because it is not his role; he is almost invariably a poor witness. But he steps out of professional character to do it. He regrets it; the profession discourages it. But the practice advocated here is one which would force him to be a witness, not as to what he has seen or done but as to other witnesses’ stories, and not because he wants to do so but in self-defense.

And what is the lawyer to do who has interviewed one whom he believes to be a biased, lying or hostile witness to get his unfavorable statements and know what to meet? He must record and deliver such statements even though he would not vouch for the credibility of the witness by calling him. Perhaps the other side would not want to call him either, but the attorney is open to the charge of suppressing evidence at the trial if he fails to call such a hostile witness even though he never regarded him as reliable or truthful.

Having been supplied the names of the witnesses, petitioner’s lawyer gives no reason why he cannot interview them himself. If an employee-witness refuses to tell his story, he, too, may be examined under the Rules. He may be compelled on discovery as fully as on the trial to disclose his version of the facts. But that is his own disclosure—it can be used to impeach him if he contradicts it and such a deposition is not useful to promote an unseemly disagreement between the witness and the counsel in the case.

It is true that the literal language of the Rules would admit of an interpretation that would sustain the district court’s order. * * * But all such procedural measures have a background of custom and practice which was assumed by those who wrote and should be by those who apply them. * * * Certainly nothing in the tradition or practice of discovery up to the time of these Rules would have suggested that they would authorize such a practice as here proposed.

The question remains as to signed statements or those written by witnesses. Such statements are not evidence for the defendant. * * * Nor should I think they ordinarily could be evidence for the plaintiff. But such a statement might be useful for impeachment of the witness who signed it, if he is called and if he departs from the statement. There might be circumstances, too, where impossibility or difficulty of access to the witness or his refusal to respond to requests for information or other facts would show that the interests of justice require that such statements be made available. Production of such statements are governed by Rule 34 and on “Showing good cause therefore” the court may order their inspection, copying or photographing. No such application has here been made; the demand is made on the basis of right, not on showing of cause.

I agree to the affirmance of the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals which reversed the district court.

JUSTICE FRANKFURTER joins in this opinion.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Federal Rule 26(b)(3), adopted in 1970, provides limited protection of work product from discovery. How does the scope of the Rule differ from the doctrine set out in Hickman? Does Hickman survive adoption of the Rule? See Clermont, Surveying Work Product, 68 Cornell L.Rev. 755 (1983); see also McRobbie, Move Over Work Product—It’s Time for Some Real Discovery: A Call for a Cost-Allocating Amendment to Rule 26(b)(3), 54 Emory L.J. 1407 (2005).

2. Protection under Rule 26(b)(3) is relatively clear when the documents have a “single purpose” in the sense of having been prepared in anticipation of litigation or trial by or for another party or by that other party’s representative. See In re Grand Jury Subpoena (Mark Torf/Torf Environmental Management), 357 F.3d 900, 907 (9th Cir. 2004). Does protection attach if the documents have a “dual purpose,” for example, they also were prepared in response to regulatory or business requirements? Many circuits have adopted a “because of” standard:

The “because of” standard does not consider whether litigation was a primary or secondary motive behind the creation of a document. Rather, it considers the totality of the circumstances and affords protection when it can fairly be said that the “document was created because of anticipated litigation, and would not have been created in substantially similar form but for the prospect of that litigation[.]” * * *

954

The question of entitlement to work product protection cannot be decided simply by looking at one motive that contributed to a document’s preparation. The circumstances surrounding the document’s preparation must also be considered. In the “because of” Wright & Miller formulation, “the nature of the document and the factual situation of the particular case” are key to a determination of whether work product protection applies. Wright & Miller § 2024 (emphasis added). When there is a true independent purpose for creating a document, work product protection is less likely, but when two purposes are profoundly interconnected, the analysis is more complicated.

Id. at 908 (internal citations omitted).

3. Explain whether work-product protection should attach in the circumstances that follow:

- (a) A company prepares a memorandum about a contemplated transaction recognizing that the transaction may result in litigation;
- (b) A company is engaged in merger discussions with another company, which requests a candid assessment of the likelihood of success in pending litigations; or
- (c) A company prepares financial statements for its executives, including reserves for projected litigation.

Do you agree that the “because of” standard is appropriate? Would it be preferable to apply a “primary purpose” test? Or a narrower “for use in anticipation of litigation” test? Which test would Hickman v. Taylor support? See Behnke, Work-Product Immunity and Dual-Purpose Documents, 2011 Mich.St.L.Rev. 1569.

4. Is Rule 26(b)(3)(B), which protects “against disclosure of the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions or legal theories of a party’s attorney or other representative concerning litigation,” consistent with the availability of contention interrogatories and requests for admission? Consider these problems:

- (a) Should a party have to disclose the selection of documents made by counsel to prepare a witness for deposition?
- (b) Can a party depose the opposing party’s attorney to determine whether discovery production has been completed?

See Waltz, Opinion Work Product: A Critical Analysis of Current Law and a New Analytical Framework, 73 Or.L.Rev. 385 (1994).

5. Rule 26(b)(3)(C) does not protect a party’s own prior statement concerning the action. Why? The Rule also permits a nonparty witness to obtain a copy of his statement upon request. Are the reasons for allowing a witness to obtain his own statement the same for a nonparty as they are for a party? Might a court usefully postpone release of the statement of a witness until after she has been deposed?

955

6. Should audit work papers prepared by in-house tax attorneys be treated as work-product? Should the protection be limited to documents prepared “for use” in litigation? Compare United States v. Textron Inc. and Subsidiaries, 577 F.3d 21 (1st Cir. 2009), with United States v. Deloitte LLP, 610 F.3d 129 (D.C. 2010). See Jung, Note—Textron: The False Choice Between Financial Transparency and Litigant Confidentiality, 7 N.Y.U.J.L. & Bus. 393 (2010), arguing against a disclosure rule that would provide “litigating opponents with unfettered access to audit documents containing confidential company information,” while limiting shareholders and the general investing public “to the information contained in the financial statements.” Id. at 425.

2.PRIVILEGES AND WORK PRODUCT—THE EXTENT OF PROTECTION

Rule 26(b)(1) limits discovery to “any nonprivileged matter,” and the usual view has been that the same rules of privilege generally apply to discovery as apply at the trial. A privilege rule gives a person a right to refuse to disclose information that he otherwise would be required to provide. It also may give a person the right to prevent someone else from disclosing information, or it may give its possessor a right to refuse to become a witness. A rule of privilege is a counterweight to the general power of courts to compel testimony. Modern pretrial discovery involves an extension of the judicial power to compel disclosure and has been met by the expansion of old privileges and the creation of new ones that will check this power.

One rule of privilege that all American courts recognize is the attorney-client privilege. They also agree on its basic contours. For the privilege to attach to a communication, four elements must be present:

(1) [T]he asserted holder of the privilege is or sought to be a client; (2) the person to whom the communication was made (a) is a member of the bar of a court, or his subordinate and (b) in connection with this communication is acting as a lawyer; (3) the communication relates to a fact of which the attorney was informed (a) by his client (b) without the presence of strangers (c) for the purpose of securing primarily either (i) an opinion on law or (ii) legal services or (iii) assistance in some legal proceeding, and not (d) for the purpose of committing a crime or tort; and (4) the privilege has been (a) claimed and (b) not waived by the client.

956

UNITED STATES v. UNITED SHOE MACHINERY CORP., 89 F.Supp. 357, 358–59 (D.Mass. 1950).

Because the attorney-client privilege results in the suppression of relevant facts, courts tend to construe it narrowly and to resolve doubtful cases against a finding of privilege. One observer has said:

While often unexpressed, the crucial factor limiting the privilege’s availability is not the past law of the privilege but the developing rules of liberal discovery. * * * At least when precedent is not absolutely clear, whether a party can assert the privilege will often depend less on the jurisdiction’s law of privilege than on the particular judge’s attitude toward liberal discovery.

Bartell, The Attorney-Client Privilege and the Work-Product Doctrine, in ALI-ABA Civil Procedure and Litigation in Federal and State Courts, vol. I, at 507 (1987).

UPJOHN CO. v. UNITED STATES

Supreme Court of the United States, 1981.

449 U.S. 383, 101 S.Ct. 677, 66 L.Ed.2d 584.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

We granted certiorari in this case to address important questions concerning the scope of the attorney-client privilege in the corporate context and the applicability of the work-product doctrine in proceedings to enforce tax summonses. * * * With respect to the privilege question the parties and various amici have described our task as one of choosing between two “tests” which have gained adherents in the courts of appeals. We are acutely aware, however, that we sit to decide concrete cases and not abstract propositions of law. We decline to lay down a broad rule or series of rules to govern all conceivable future questions in this area, even were we able to do so. We can and do, however, conclude that the attorney-client privilege protects the communications involved in this case from compelled disclosure and that the work-product doctrine does apply in tax summons enforcement proceedings.

I

Petitioner Upjohn Co. manufactures and sells pharmaceuticals here and abroad. In January 1976 independent accountants conducting an audit of one of Upjohn’s foreign subsidiaries discovered that the subsidiary made payments to or for the benefit of foreign government officials in order to secure government business. The accountants so informed Mr. Gerard Thomas, Upjohn’s Vice President, Secretary, and General Counsel. * * * He consulted with outside counsel and R. T. Parfet, Jr., Upjohn’s Chairman of the Board. It was decided that the company would conduct an internal investigation of what were termed “questionable payments.” As part of this investigation the attorneys prepared a letter containing a questionnaire which was sent to “All Foreign General and Area Managers” over the Chairman’s signature. The letter began by noting recent disclosures that several American companies made “possibly illegal” payments to foreign government officials and emphasized that the management needed full information concerning any such payments made by Upjohn. The letter indicated that the Chairman had asked Thomas, identified as “the company’s General Counsel,” “to conduct an investigation for the purpose of determining the nature and magnitude of any payments made by the Upjohn Company or any of its subsidiaries to any employee or official of a foreign government.” The questionnaire sought detailed information concerning such payments. Managers were instructed to treat the investigation as “highly confidential” and not to discuss it with anyone other than Upjohn employees who might be helpful in providing the requested information. Responses were to be sent directly to Thomas. Thomas and outside counsel also interviewed the recipients of the questionnaire and some 33 other Upjohn officers or employees as part of the investigation.

957

On March 26, 1976, the company voluntarily submitted a preliminary report to the Securities and Exchange Commission on Form 8BK disclosing certain questionable payments. A copy of the report was simultaneously submitted to the Internal Revenue Service, which immediately began an investigation to determine the tax consequences of the payments. Special agents conducting the investigation were given lists by Upjohn of all those interviewed and all who had responded to the questionnaire. On November 23, 1976, the Service issued a summons pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 7602 demanding production of:

All files relative to the investigation conducted under the supervision of Gerard Thomas to identify payments to employees of foreign governments and any political contributions made by the Upjohn Company or any of its affiliates since January 1, 1971 and to determine whether any funds of the Upjohn Company had been improperly accounted for on the corporate books during the same period.

The records should include but not be limited to written questionnaires sent to managers of the Upjohn Company's foreign affiliates, and memoranda or notes of the interviews conducted in the United States and abroad with officers and employees of the Upjohn Company and its subsidiaries. * * *

The company declined to produce the documents specified in the second paragraph on the grounds that they were protected from disclosure by the attorney-client privilege and constituted the work product of attorneys prepared in anticipation of litigation. On August 31, 1977, the United States filed a petition seeking enforcement of the summons under 26 U.S.C. §§ 7402(b) and 7604(a) in the United States District Court for the Western District of Michigan. That court adopted the recommendation of a Magistrate who concluded that the summons should be enforced. Petitioners appealed to the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit which rejected the Magistrate's finding of a waiver of the attorney-client privilege, * * * but agreed that the privilege did not apply "[t]o the extent that the communications were made by officers and agents not responsible for directing Upjohn's actions in response to legal advice * * * for the simple reason that the communications were not the 'client's.' " * * * The court reasoned that accepting petitioner's claim for a broader application of the privilege would encourage upper-echelon management to ignore unpleasant facts and create too broad a "zone of silence." Noting that Upjohn's counsel had interviewed officials such as the Chairman and President, the Court of Appeals remanded to the District Court so that a determination of who was within the "control group" could be made. In a concluding footnote the court stated that the work-product doctrine "is not applicable to administrative summonses issued under 26 U.S.C. § 7602." * * *

958

II

Federal Rule of Evidence 501 provides that "the privilege of a witness * * * shall be governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in light of reason and experience." The attorney-client privilege is the oldest of the privileges for confidential communications known to the common law. 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 2290 (McNaughton rev. 1961). Its purpose is to encourage full and frank communication between attorneys and their clients and thereby promote broader public interests in the observance of law and administration of justice. The privilege recognizes that sound legal advice or advocacy serves public ends and that such advice or advocacy depends upon the lawyer's being fully informed by the client. * * * Admittedly complications in the application of the privilege arise when the client is a corporation, which in theory is an artificial creature of the law, and not an individual; but this Court has assumed that the privilege applies when the client is a corporation. * * *

The Court of Appeals, however, considered the application of the privilege in the corporate context to present a "different problem," since the client was an inanimate entity and "only the senior management, guiding and integrating the several operations, . . . f can be said to possess an identity analogous to the corporation as a whole." * * * Such a view, we think, overlooks the fact that the privilege exists to protect not only the giving of professional advice to those who can act on it but also the giving of information to the lawyer to enable him to give sound and informed advice. * * * The first step in the resolution of any legal problem is ascertaining the factual background and sifting through the facts with an eye to the legally relevant.* * *

959

In the case of the individual client the provider of information and the person who acts on the lawyer's advice are one and the same. In the corporate context, however, it will frequently be employees beyond the control group as defined by the court below—"officers and agents . . . [omission in original] responsible for directing [the company's] actions in response to legal advice"—who will possess the information needed by the corporation's lawyers. Middle-level—and indeed lower-level—employees can, by actions within the scope of their employment, embroil the corporation in serious legal difficulties, and it is only natural that these employees would have the relevant information needed by corporate counsel if he is adequately to advise the client with respect to such actual or potential difficulties. * * *

The control group test adopted by the court below thus frustrates the very purpose of the privilege by discouraging the communication of relevant information by employees of the client to attorneys seeking to render legal advice to the client corporation. The attorney's advice will also frequently be more significant to noncontrol group members than to those who officially sanction the advice, and the control group test makes it more difficult to convey full and frank legal advice to the employees who will put into effect the client corporation's policy. * * *

The narrow scope given the attorney-client privilege by the court below not only makes it difficult for corporate attorneys to formulate sound advice when their client is faced with a specific legal problem but also threatens to limit the valuable efforts of corporate counsel to ensure their client’s compliance with the law. In light of the vast and complicated array of regulatory legislation confronting the modern corporation, corporations, unlike most individuals, “constantly go to lawyers to find out how to obey the law[.]” * * * [I]f the purpose of the attorney-client privilege is to be served, the attorney and client must be able to predict with some degree of certainty whether particular discussions will be protected. An uncertain privilege, or one which purports to be certain but results in widely varying applications by the courts, is little better than no privilege at all. The very terms of the test adopted by the court below suggest the unpredictability of its application. The test restricts the availability of the privilege to those officers who play a “substantial role” in deciding and directing a corporation’s legal response. * * *

The communications at issue were made by Upjohn employees to counsel for Upjohn acting as such, at the direction of corporate superiors in order to secure legal advice from counsel. * * * Information, not available from upper-echelon management, was needed to supply a basis for legal advice concerning compliance with securities and tax laws, foreign laws, currency regulations, duties to shareholders, and potential litigation in each of these areas. The communications concerned matters within the scope of the employees’ corporate duties, and the employees themselves were sufficiently aware that they were being questioned in order that the corporation could obtain legal advice. The questionnaire identified Thomas as “the company’s General Counsel” and referred in its opening sentence to the possible illegality of payments such as the ones on which information was sought. * * * A statement of policy accompanying the questionnaire clearly indicated the legal implications of the investigation. The policy statement was issued “in order that there be no uncertainty in the future as to the policy with respect to the practices which are the subject of this investigation.” It began “Upjohn will comply with all laws and regulations,” and stated that commissions or payments “will not be used as a subterfuge for bribes or illegal payments” and that all payments must be “proper and legal.” Any future agreements with foreign distributors or agents were to be approved “by a company attorney” and any questions concerning the policy were to be referred “to the company’s General Counsel.” * * * This statement was issued to Upjohn employees worldwide, so that even those interviewees not receiving a questionnaire were aware of the legal implications of the interviews. Pursuant to explicit instructions from the Chairman of the Board, the communications were considered “highly confidential” when made, * * * and have been kept confidential by the company. Consistent with the underlying purposes of the attorney-client privilege, these communications must be protected against compelled disclosure.

The Court of Appeals declined to extend the attorney-client privilege beyond the limits of the control group test for fear that doing so would entail severe burdens on discovery and create a broad “zone of silence” over corporate affairs. Application of the attorney-client privilege to communications such as those involved here, however, puts the adversary in no worse position than if the communications had never taken place. The privilege only protects disclosure of communications; it does not protect disclosure of the underlying facts by those who communicated with the attorney * * *. Here the Government was free to question the employees who communicated with Thomas and outside counsel. Upjohn has provided the IRS with a list of such employees, and the IRS has already interviewed some 25 of them. While it would probably be more convenient for the Government to secure the results of petitioner’s internal investigation by simply subpoenaing the questionnaires and notes taken by petitioner’s attorneys, such considerations of convenience do not overcome the policies served by the attorney-client privilege. As Justice Jackson noted in his concurring opinion in Hickman v. Taylor * * *: “Discovery was hardly intended to enable a learned profession to perform its functions . . . on wits borrowed from the adversary.”^g

* * *

Our decision that the communications by Upjohn employees to counsel are covered by the attorney-client privilege disposes of the case so far as the responses to the questionnaires and any notes reflecting responses to interview questions are concerned. * * * To the extent that the material subject to the summons is not protected by the attorney-client privilege as disclosing communications between an employee and counsel, we must reach the ruling by the Court of Appeals that the work-product doctrine does not apply to summonses issued under 26 U.S.C. § 7602.^h

The Government concedes, wisely, that the Court of Appeals erred and that the work-product doctrine does apply to IRS summonses. * * * This doctrine was announced by the Court over 30 years ago in Hickman v. Taylor * * *. * * * The Court noted that “it is essential that a lawyer work with a certain degree of privacy” * * *. The “strong public policy” underlying the work-product doctrine * * * has been substantially incorporated in Federal Rule * * * 26(b)(3). * * * Nothing in the language of the IRS summons provisions or their legislative history suggests an intent on the part of Congress to preclude application of the work-product doctrine. Rule 26(b)(3) codifies the work-product doctrine, and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are made applicable to summons enforcement proceedings by Rule 81(a)(3).^h * * * While conceding the applicability of the work-product doctrine, the Government asserts that it has made a sufficient showing of necessity to overcome its protections. * * * The Government stresses that interviewees are scattered across the globe and that Upjohn has forbidden its employees to answer questions it considers irrelevant. The above-quoted language from Hickman, however, did not apply to “oral statements made by witnesses . . .ⁱ whether presently in the form of [the attorney’s] mental impressions or memoranda.” * * * As to such material the Court did “not believe that any showing of necessity can be made under the circumstances of this case so as to justify production * * *.” * * * Forcing an attorney to disclose notes and memoranda of witnesses’ oral statements is particularly disfavored because it tends to reveal the attorney’s mental processes * * *.

Rule 26 accords special protection to work product revealing the attorney’s mental processes. The Rule permits disclosure of documents and tangible things constituting attorney work product upon a showing of substantial need and inability to obtain the equivalent without undue hardship. * * * Rule 26 goes on, however, to state that “[i]n ordering discovery of such materials when the required showing has been made, the court shall protect against disclosure of the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions or legal theories of an attorney or other representative of a party concerning the litigation.” [This language has been altered but its substance has not been changed.] Although this language does not specifically refer to memoranda based on oral statements of witnesses, the Hickman court stressed the danger that compelled disclosure of such memoranda would reveal the attorney’s mental processes. It is clear that this is the sort of material the draftsmen of the Rule had in mind as deserving special protection. * * *

962

* * * It is clear that the Magistrate applied the wrong standard when he concluded that the Government had made a sufficient showing of necessity to overcome the protections of the work-product doctrine. The Magistrate applied the “substantial need” and “without undue hardship” standard articulated in the first part of Rule 26(b)(3). The notes and memoranda sought by the Government here, however, are work product based on oral statements. If they reveal communications, they are, in this case, protected by the attorney-client privilege. To the extent they do not reveal communications, they reveal the attorneys’ mental processes in evaluating the communications. As Rule 26 and Hickman make clear, such work product cannot be disclosed simply on a showing of substantial need and inability to obtain the equivalent without undue hardship.

While we are not prepared at this juncture to say that such material is always protected by the work-product rule, we think a far stronger showing of necessity and unavailability by other means * * * would be necessary to compel disclosure. * * *

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

[The concurring opinion of CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER is omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What is the scope of the attorney-client privilege after Upjohn? Although the Court declined to announce standards to govern the privilege, would you agree that the factors to be considered include: 1) the communication must be one that would not have been made but for the contemplation of legal services; 2) the content of the communication must relate to the legal services being rendered; 3) the information-giver must be an employee, agent, or independent contractor with a significant relationship to the corporation and the corporation’s involvement in the transaction that is the subject of legal services; 4) the communication must be made in confidence; and 5) the privilege may be asserted either by the corporation or by the information-giver. See Sexton, A Post-Upjohn Consideration of the Corporate Attorney-Client Privilege, 57 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 443, 487 (1982). See also Wonneman v. Stratford Secs. Co., 23 F.R.D. 281, 285 (S.D.N.Y. 1959) (“[W]here legal advice of any kind is sought from a professional legal advisor in his capacity as such, the communications relevant to that purpose, made in confidence by the client, are at his instance permanently protected from disclosure by himself or by the legal advisor except the protection be waived.”).

963

2.Explain whether the privilege would attach i n the following situations:

- (a)A former employee speaks to the corporation’s attorney in the course of an internal investigation concerning accounting practices and admits to embezzling funds.
- (b)An inventor speaks to a lawyer before filing an application for the patent and the statements are not entirely technical.
- (c)A client gives documents to his attorney that were created by and received from an unrelated third party.
- (d)A taxpayer gives canceled checks and bank statements to his attorney.
- (e)An insured sends a report to a liability insurer pertinent to a matter covered by the liability policy.

See 8 Wright, Miller & Marcus, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2017 (3d ed.).

3.Rule 26(b)(5) establishes a process for asserting the privilege, requiring that the claim be made expressly and that the nature of the withheld material be described in a way that enables the other parties to test the assertion of the privilege. Failure to comply can result not only in the loss of the privilege but also in sanctions under Rule 37. Filing a “privilege log” has become a standard way to assert the privilege. See Smith v. Café Asia, 256 F.R.D. 247, 250–51 (D.D.C. 2009). Assertion of the privilege also involves a timeliness requirement. In MOLONEY v. UNITED STATES, 204 F.R.D. 16 (D.Mass. 2001), defendant’s counsel blocked testimony during a deposition by asserting work product and attorney-client privilege. In response to plaintiff’s motion to compel, counsel raised and briefed protection under different privileges. The district court ordered production: “[I]t defies logic to permit counsel to assert one privilege so as to preclude testimony at a deposition, but thereafter research and claim an entirely different privilege in response to a motion to compel. Such conduct most assuredly circumvents both the letter and the spirit of Rules 26(b)(5) and 30(d)(1).” Id. at 21. (Rule 30(d)(1) is now numbered as Rule 30(c)(2).)

4.Rule 26(b)(5)(B) allows for the “clawback” of privileged information that is inadvertently disclosed. Traditionally, the privilege was waived by a party’s voluntary disclosure of the communication. Moreover, once waived, the party could be forced to disclose not only the specific communication but also all communications involving the same subject matter. See Duplan Corp. v. Deering Milliken, Inc., 397 F.Supp. 1146 (D.S.C. 1974). The danger of an inadvertent disclosure resulting in a waiver has increased exponentially in e-discovery cases that potentially involve millions of documents. See The Sedona Conference, Best Practices Commentary on the Use of Search and Information Retrieval Methods in E-Discovery, 8 Sedona Conf.J. 189 (2007). What are the steps that a party must take under the rule if he believes that privileged information has been inadvertently handed over to the opposing party? See Barnette, Ghost in the Machine: Zubulake Revisited and Other Emerging E-Discovery Issues Under the Amended Federal Rules, 18 Rich.J.L. & Tech. 11 (2012). The rule does not address whether retrieved information remains protected. However, Federal Rule of Evidence 502 has been amended to govern the substantive consequences of waiver, making clear that the waiver is only of the communication or information disclosed.

5.Does a party waive attorney-client privilege forever by disclosing privileged documents to the federal government in response to an agency subpoena? The circuits are divided on whether a rule of selective waiver ought to apply. Compare In re Pacific Pictures Corp., 679 F.3d 1121 (9th Cir. 2012), with Diversified Industries, Inc. v. Meredith, 572 F.2d 596 (8th Cir. 1978). What is the rationale for a rule of selective waiver? To encourage companies to hire outside consultants, or to cooperate voluntarily with the government? See Diversified, 572 F.2d at 611. Does a rule of selective waiver undermine the purpose of the privilege? See Pacific Pictures, 679 F.3d at 1127.

6.Evidentiary privileges other than that of the attorney-client also exist at common law. Among the most widely recognized is the spousal privilege that protects communications between parties to a marriage. The Constitution is the source of several privileges—for example, the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. Other privileges struggle for recognition—for example, a privilege for communications between accountants and their clients. See generally Developments in the Law—Privileged Communication, 98 Harv.L.Rev. 1450 (1985).

7.In state courts, privileges are a matter of state law, and state courts are not bound by the Upjohn approach to the attorney-client privilege. In federal courts, privilege is governed by federal law, except that Federal Rule of Evidence 501 directs a federal district court sitting in a diversity case to apply the privilege law of the state in which it sits. See Valente v. Pepsico, Inc., 68 F.R.D. 361, 366 n.10 (D.Del. 1975).

8.It has become commonplace in large cases for parties to stipulate to protective orders negotiated by opposing counsel. And judges generally assent to these agreements, in large part to move cases along and avoid controversy. The stipulations typically provide for “umbrella” protection for confidential information, which is defined as any information that is designated “confidential” by the producing party. The result of these orders is that virtually all nonpublic documents are designated confidential without any individualized review. See Moskowitz, Discovering Discovery: Non-Party

Access to Pretrial Information in the Federal Courts 1938–2006, 78 U.Colo.L.Rev. 817, 871 (2007). Why have these orders become so common? What is the strategic significance for a defendant of a confidentiality order? Does disclosure to third persons open the door to misuse of the court system for blackmail or extortion through the threat of suits involving sensitive issues? What does a plaintiff’s attorney gain by agreeing to a broad protective order? What standard should a court apply if asked to modify an existing protective order to permit the disclosure of discovered material to nonparties, including the public? Is it relevant that the matter shielded from public view by the protective order may have an impact on public health and safety? For a discussion of these issues, see Miller, Confidentiality, Protective Orders, and Public Access to the Courts, 105 Harv.L.Rev. 427 (1991). What is the “right amount of confidentiality” in discovery requests or settlement agreements? See Levmore & Fagan, Semi-Confidential Settlements in Civil, Criminal, and Sexual Assault Cases, 103 Cornell L.Rev. 311 (2018). On protective orders generally, see Friedenthal, Secrecy in Civil Litigation: Discovery and Party Agreements, 9 J.L. & Pol’y 61 (2000). For a range of views on the subject, see Symposium: Secrecy in Litigation, 81 Chi.-Kent L.Rev. 305 (2006).

3.EXPERT INFORMATION

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(a)(2)–(3) and 26(b)(4) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

Discovery of expert witnesses has undergone significant change over the last two decades. Until 1993, expert discovery was limited to using interrogatories, unless otherwise ordered by the court, and could be directed only at experts called to testify. Expert discovery now begins with mandatory disclosure under Rule 26(a). Without a discovery request the parties must identify any witness who “may” be used at trial to present expert evidence and produce an expert report. What must the report contain? See Rule 26(a)(2)(B)(i)–(vi). As to witnesses who are not “retained or specially employed to provide expert testimony,” the party must disclose the subject matter on which the witness is expected to present testimony and a summary of the facts and opinions to which the witness is expected to testify. See Rule 26(a)(2)(C). The court can set the timing of these disclosures; if there is no court order or stipulation, when must the disclosures be made? See Rule 26(d)(i). Mandatory disclosure of experts whose reports must be disclosed is subject to the duty of on-going supplementation, and this duty extends to an expert’s responses during a deposition. See Rule 26(e). Finally, Rule 26(a)(3) requires disclosure of all witnesses who may testify at trial.

Rule 26(b)(4) also regulates the timing and scope of party-initiated expert discovery. Depositions may be taken of experts identified as trial witnesses, but cannot take place until the mandatory report is received. Different rules apply to the discovery of non-testifying experts. In that context, the requestor must demonstrate exceptional circumstances. See Rule 26(b)(4)(D)(ii). Is any discovery permitted of experts who are not retained but simply informally consulted? The rule also allocates the cost of expert discovery by requiring the court to impose a fee on the party interposing a discovery request unless an injustice would result. See Rule 26(b)(4)(E).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1. Why doesn’t discovery under Rule 26(b)(4) pertain to experts who participated in the events that form the basis for their knowledge? Is it appropriate to subject these “experts” to full discovery and to withhold fees from their participation in discovery?
- 2. Are drafts of expert reports protected from disclosure? See Rule 26(b)(4). What is the rationale for this rule?
- 3. Are the communications between a lawyer and a retained expert protected as work-product? Is the protection absolute or qualified? See Rule 26(b)(4)(C). Prior to the 1993 amendment to the Federal Rules, such communications were judicially protected. See Bogosian v. Gulf Oil Corp., 738 F.2d 587 (3d Cir. 1984) (en banc). How did the 1993 amendment requiring automatic disclosure of expert reports alter the scope of the protection? See LAMONDS v. GENERAL MOTORS CORP., 180 F.R.D. 302 (W.D.Va. 1998), explaining:

A number of courts and commentators who have considered the effect of the 1993 amendments and advisory note * * * to Rule 26(a)(2)(B) have concluded that where a lawyer gives work product to an expert who considers it in forming opinions which he or she will be testifying to at trial, this information is no longer privileged and must be disclosed. * * * The Advisory Note does not distinguish between fact and opinion work product where that work product has been shared with an expert witness who considers the work product in formulating his opinions.

A construction of Rule 26 establishing a bright line rule that permits an opposing party to discover work product materials where an attorney provides work product to a retained expert who will consider that information in the development of her opinions is not only consistent with the 1993 amendment and Advisory Note, but is also consistent with the important policies underlying the work product doctrine and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Experts occupy a central role in modern civil litigation. They are, in a sense, privileged by the Federal Rules of Evidence to offer opinions on subjects about which the trier of fact usually has no knowledge. * * * Because experts are often less [than] helpful and sometimes misleading, effective cross examination by an opposing party is an essential tool for exposing any weaknesses in the expert’s opinions. One such potential weakness is the source of information the expert has considered in forming his opinions. * * * This information can only surface on cross examination where an opposing party has been able to discover the material provided to the expert by the lawyer who retained him. * * *

It is important to note that it is the lawyer who retained the expert who makes the decision to provide that expert with material that would, under different circumstances, be protected by the work product doctrine. This means that the work product can remain protected so long as it is not given to the expert to consider in the development of his opinions. An attorney wishing to maintain the protection afforded by the work product doctrine can choose to provide the expert with all relevant facts instead of directing the expert’s attention to certain facts and instead of including opinions and conclusions drawn by the attorney. This approach permits an attorney to know whether information provided to an expert will later become discoverable and in no way interferes with a lawyer’s development of his case in private consultation with his client. * * *

Id. at 305–06.

Does the “bright line rule” survive Rule 26(b)(4)(C), adopted in 2010? What protection is afforded to facts, data, and assumptions set forth in an expert’s draft report? A commentator raises these questions:

Under Rule 26(b)(4)(B), an expert’s draft report—“regardless of the form”—is protected from discovery. Under Rule 26(b)(4)(C) (ii–iii), however, attorney communications with the expert that identify “facts or data” or provide “assumptions . . . that the expert relied upon” are not protected from discovery. The advisory committee notes do not expressly address what should happen if counsel were to use the cloak of a draft report to furnish the “facts or data” or “assumptions” to the expert so as to shield the opposing party from discovering that counsel was the source of the “facts or data” or “assumptions.” In this situation, it would seem appropriate that Rule 26(b)(4)(C)(ii–iii) would trump Rule 26(b)(4)(B) and require disclosure of at least the drafts of the factual background section of the expert’s draft report.

Wright, Expert Discovery Returns to the Past, 58 Fed.Law. 32, 34 (Jan. 2011). Do you agree with this conclusion?

G. JUDICIAL SUPERVISION OF DISCOVERY AND SANCTIONS

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 26(e) and 37 and the accompanying Advisory Committee’s Notes in the Supplement.

Discovery disputes come to the court’s attention through a number of pathways.

The court on its own must limit discovery that is not relevant or proportional to the needs of the case or for other reasons, including excessive burden or expense. The court may impose expenses on a party or party’s counsel who does not cooperate in devising a discovery plan, but only after affording notice and an opportunity to be heard. Courts also have inherent authority to sanction discovery misconduct. See Roadway Express, Inc. V. Piper, 447 U.S. 752, 100 S.Ct. 2455, 65 L.Ed.2d 488 (1980).

In addition, the parties or a person from whom discovery is sought may request the court’s involvement. First, a party requesting information may move for an order compelling discovery when the potential respondent objects to answering an interrogatory or a question at a deposition, serving a response to a document request, or providing supplementation. Rule 37(c). If the court grants the motion, and enters an order under Rule 37 to compel discovery, it may impose attorney’s fees unless it finds that the respondent’s actions were substantially justified. If the respondent then fails to comply with the Rule 37(a) order, the court may impose a sanction. Rule 37(b).

Second, a party seeking information may immediately move for sanctions if there has been a complete failure to comply—for example, the respondent fails to attend its own deposition or respond to a request for inspection. Rule 37(d). If the court grants the motion to compel, sanctions immediately can be imposed; there is no requirement of noncompliance with the court order and the only limitation on the sanction is that it be “just.” Rule 37(b)(2). Rule 37(e) was amended significantly in 2015 to toughen the potential sanctions for a failure to preserve electronically stored information.

Finally, a party or a person from whom discovery is sought may move for a protective order. Rule 26(c); Rule 37. Special procedures govern when a respondent seeks to withhold information based on a claim of privilege or work product. In particular, the respondent must assert the reason for nondisclosure with particularity.

CINE FORTY-SECOND STREET THEATRE CORP. v. ALLIED ARTISTS PICTURES CORP.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1979.

602 F.2d 1062.

KAUFMAN, CHIEF JUDGE.

* * *

I

Appellee Cine * * * has operated a movie theater in New York City’s Times Square area since July 1974. It alleges that those owning neighboring theaters on West Forty-Second Street * * * entered into a conspiracy with certain motion picture distributors to cut off its access to first-run, quality films. Bringing suit on August 1, 1975, Cine claimed $3,000,000 in treble damages under the antitrust laws, and sought an injunction against the defendants’ alleged anticompetitive practices.

On November 6, 1975, the eleven defendants served plaintiff with a set of consolidated interrogatories. Cine thereupon secured its adversaries’ consent to defer discovery on the crucial issue of damages until it could retain an expert to review the rival exhibitors’ box office receipts. Not until four months after the deadline upon which the parties had agreed, however, did Cine file its first set of answers to the remaining interrogatories. Moreover, even casual scrutiny reveals the patent inadequacy of these responses. Many were bare, ambiguous cross-references to general answers elsewhere in the responses. Highly specific questions concerning the design of Cine’s theater were answered with architectural drawings that did not even purport to show the dimensions requested.

Although Cine now complains bitterly that these interrogatories amounted to pure harassment, it never moved to strike them as irrelevant or as harassing. Rather, it filed supplemental answers, which were similarly deficient, and then failed to obey two subsequent orders from Magistrate Gershon compelling discovery. At a hearing in October of 1977, the magistrate found Cine’s disobedience to have been willful, and assessed $500 in costs against it. Soon afterwards, she further warned plaintiff that any further noncompliance would result in dismissal.

By the summer of 1977, as this conflict was coming to a head, Cine had still not retained the expert it claimed was necessary to respond to the damages interrogatories. Magistrate Gershon quite reasonably and leniently ordered Cine merely to produce a plan to answer, but this yielded no result. The magistrate then directed Cine to answer the damages interrogatories, admonishing its counsel that future nonfeasance would be viewed in light of past derelictions. Cine did file two sets of answers, one over two months late and both seriously deficient.

* * *

At a formal hearing on October 19, 1978, * * * [a]fter noting plaintiff’s history of disobedience in the face of her own repeated warnings, the magistrate concluded that Cine’s present non-compliance was willful. “[T]he plaintiff,” she stated, “has decided when it will be cooperative and when it will not be cooperative, and that it does not have any right to do.” She thereupon recommended to the district court that Cine be precluded from introducing evidence with respect to damages. This sanction was, of course, tantamount to a dismissal of Cine’s damage claim, but left standing its claim for injunctive relief.

Judge Goettel, the district judge to whom Magistrate Gershon’s order was submitted for approval, reacted to Cine’s behavior as did Magistrate Gershon. He wrote, “[i]f there were ever a case in which drastic sanctions were justified, this is it.” But Judge Goettel could not fully accept the magistrate’s finding of willfulness. * * * [He] apparently believed it possible that Cine’s counsel, confused as to the precise terms of Magistrate Gershon’s oral orders, could have thought in good faith that the answers were not due. Action taken upon that baseless belief, however, was, at the very least, grossly negligent. The district court “regretfully” concluded that under Flaks v. Koegel, 504 F.2d 702 (2d Cir. 1974), it lacked the power, absent a finding of willfulness, to impose the extreme sanction recommended by the magistrate. Instead, the court merely assessed costs in the amount of $1,000.⁶ But, recognizing that he might have “misperceive[d] the controlling law of this circuit,” Judge Goettel certified this interlocutory appeal on his own motion under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b).

* * *

II

The question before us is whether a grossly negligent failure to obey an order compelling discovery may justify the severest disciplinary measures available under Fed.R.Civ.P. 37. This rule provides a spectrum of sanctions⁸ * * * [that] serve a threefold purpose. Preclusionary orders ensure that a party will not be able to profit from its own failure to comply. * * * Rule 37 strictures are also specific deterrents and, like civil contempt, they seek to secure compliance with the particular order at hand. * * * Finally, although the most drastic sanctions may not be imposed as “mere penalties,” Hammond Packing Co. v. Arkansas, 212 U.S. 322, 29 S.Ct. 370, 53 L.Ed. 530 (1909) * * *, courts are free to consider the general deterrent effect their orders may have on the instant case and on other litigation, provided that the party on whom they are imposed is, in some sense, at fault. National Hockey League v. Metropolitan Hockey Club, Inc., 427 U.S. 639, 96 S.Ct. 2778, 49 L.Ed.2d 747 (1976) (per curiam); Société Internationale pour Participations Industrielles et Commerciales v. Rogers, 357 U.S. 197, 78 S.Ct. 1087, 2 L.Ed.2d 1255 (1958).

971

Where the party makes good faith efforts to comply, and is thwarted by circumstances beyond his control—for example, a foreign criminal statute prohibiting disclosure of the documents at issue—an order dismissing the complaint would deprive the party of a property interest without due process of law. See Société Internationale, supra, 357 U.S. at 212, 78 S.Ct. 1087. It would, after all, be unfair and irrational to prevent a party from being heard solely because of a nonculpable failure to meet the terms of a discovery order. * * *

* * * Judge Goettel apparently believed that Cine’s counsel simply did not understand the exact requirements of the magistrate’s unwritten order compelling discovery. If so, Cine’s failure to answer the damages interrogatories might not rise to the level of “willfulness” or “bad faith” for both of these conditions imply a deliberate disregard of the lawful orders of the court. * * * The question, then, is whether gross negligence amounting to a “total dereliction of professional responsibility,” but not a conscious disregard of court orders, is properly embraced within the “fault” component of Société Internationale’s triple criterion.

Fault, of course, is a broad and amorphous concept, and the Courts of Appeals have had considerable difficulty construing it in this context. Indeed, one court defined “fault” by the apparent oxymoron “intentional negligence.” Bon Air Hotel, Inc. [v. Time, Inc.] 376 F.2d [118, 120 (5th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 859, 89 S.Ct. 131, 21 L.Ed.2d 127 (1968)]. Thus, commentators have opined that an element of willfulness or conscious disregard of the court’s orders is a prerequisite to the harsher categories of Rule 37 sanctions. * * * But the appellate cases commonly cited for this proposition hold only that dismissal is an abuse of discretion where failure to comply was not the result of the fault of any party. * * *

Unless we are to assume that the Court chose its words carelessly, we must accord the term “fault” a meaning of its own within the Société Internationale triad. And plainly, if “fault” has any meaning not subsumed by “willfulness” and “bad faith,” it must at least cover gross negligence of the type present in this case. The holding in Edgar v. Slaughter, 548 F.2d 770, 773 (8th Cir. 1977), which contains the apparent suggestion that dismissal is appropriate only for actions taken “deliberately or in bad faith,” does not conflict with this conclusion. Counsel’s action in that case at worst amounted to simple negligence and indeed may have been partially excusable, id. at 773 n.4. Flagrant negligence of the type involved in the case at bar was simply not at issue.

972

In the only case that actually presented the question now before us, Affanato v. Merrill Bros., 547 F.2d 138 (1st Cir. 1977), the First Circuit implicitly adopted the view we have expressed. There, the district court had entered a default judgment after what the appellate court characterized as “a series of episodes of nonfeasance which amounted, in sum, to a near total dereliction of professional responsibility” on the part of defendant’s counsel. Id. at 141. The Court of Appeals affirmed, noting that counsel’s failures “went well beyond ordinary negligence”—but without finding willfulness or bad faith. Id.

In the final analysis, however, this question cannot turn solely upon a definition of terms. We believe that our view advances the basic purposes of Rule 37, while respecting the demands of due process. The principal objective of the general deterrent policy of National Hockey is strict adherence to the “responsibilities counsel owe to the Court and to their opponents,” 427 U.S. at 640, 96 S.Ct. at 2780. Negligent, no less than intentional, wrongs are fit subjects for general deterrence * * *. And gross professional incompetence no less than deliberate tactical intransigence may be responsible for the interminable delays and costs that plague modern complex lawsuits. An undertaking on the scale of the large contemporary suit brooks none of the dilation, posturing, and harassment once expected in litigation. * * * The parties, and particularly their lawyers, must rise to the freedom granted by the Rules and cooperate in good faith both in question and response.

Considerations of fair play may dictate that courts eschew the harshest sanctions provided by Rule 37 where failure to comply is due to a mere oversight of counsel amounting to no more than simple negligence * * *. But where gross professional negligence has been found—that is, where counsel clearly should have understood his duty to the court—the full range of sanctions may be marshalled. Indeed, in this day of burgeoning, costly and protracted litigation courts should not shrink from imposing harsh sanctions where, as in this case, they are clearly warranted.

A litigant chooses counsel at his peril, Link v. Wabash Railroad Co., 370 U.S. 626, 82 S.Ct. 1386, 8 L.Ed.2d 734 (1962), and here, as in countless other contexts, counsel’s disregard of his professional responsibilities can lead to extinction of his client’s claim. * * *

Plaintiff urges that because it has at last filed answers to the damage interrogatories, it should be permitted to prove its losses at trial. But it forgets that sanctions must be weighed in light of the full record in the case * * *. Furthermore, “[i]f parties are allowed to flout their obligations, choosing to wait to make a response until a trial court has lost patience with them, the effect will be to embroil trial judges in day-to-day supervision of discovery, a result directly contrary to the overall scheme of the federal discovery rules,” Dellums v. Powell, 566 F.2d 231, 235–36 (D.C. Cir. 1977)]. Moreover, as we have indicated, compulsion of performance in the particular case at hand is not the sole function of Rule 37 sanctions. Under the deterrence principle of National Hockey, plaintiff’s hopelessly belated compliance should not be accorded great weight. Any other conclusion would encourage dilatory tactics, and compliance with discovery orders would come only when the backs of counsel and the litigants were against the wall.

973

In light of the fact that plaintiff, through its undeniable fault, has frozen this litigation in the discovery phase for nearly four years, we see no reason to burden the court below with extensive proceedings on remand. Judge Goettel’s opinion makes it abundantly clear that but for his misinterpretation of the governing law in this circuit, he would have wholeheartedly adopted Magistrate Gershon’s original recommendation. Accordingly, the judge’s order declining to adopt the magistrate’s recommendation that proof of damages be precluded is reversed.

OAKES, CIRCUIT JUDGE (concurring):

I concur in the result. It may be that the fault for the inexcusable delays in compliance with the discovery requests and orders lay with the client or with the complexity of the interrogatories and requests of opposing counsel. If the latter, remedy lay with an application under Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(c). If the former, then the magistrate’s recommendation of preclusion strikes at the proper party. It would be with the greatest reluctance, however, that I would visit upon the client the sins of counsel, absent client’s knowledge, condonation, compliance, or causation.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Under the original Federal Rules, courts rarely imposed sanctions for discovery abuse. A 1981 survey reported the following:

The typical pattern of sanctioning that emerges from the reported cases is one in which the delay, obfuscation, contumacy, and lame excuses on the part of litigants and their attorneys are tolerated without any measured remedial action until the court is provoked beyond endurance. At that point the court punishes one side or the other with a swift and final termination of the lawsuit by dismissal or default. This “all or nothing” approach to sanctions results in considerable laxity in the day-to-day application of the rules. Attorneys are well aware that sanctions will be imposed only in the most flagrant situations.

Rodes, Ripple & Mooney, Sanctions Imposable for Violations of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 85 (Fed.Jud. Center 1981).

974

In NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE v. METROPOLITAN HOCKEY CLUB, INC., 427 U.S. 639, 96 S.Ct. 2778, 49 L.Ed.2d 747 (1976), the Supreme Court found that there was no abuse of discretion in the district court’s dismissal of a complaint for plaintiff’s failure to comply with a discovery order. Reversing the court of appeals, the Supreme Court explained:

There is a natural tendency on the part of reviewing courts, properly employing the benefit of hindsight, to be heavily influenced by the severity of outright dismissal as a sanction for failure to comply with a discovery order. It is quite reasonable to conclude that a party who has been subjected to such an order will feel duly chastened, so that even though he succeeds in having the order reversed on appeal he will nonetheless comply promptly with future discovery orders of the district court.

But here, as in other areas of the law, the most severe in the spectrum of sanctions provided by statute or rule must be available to the district court in appropriate cases, not merely to penalize those whose conduct may be deemed to warrant such a sanction, but to deter those who might be tempted to such conduct in the absence of such a deterrent. If the decision of the Court of Appeals remained undisturbed in this case, it might well be that * * * respondents would faithfully comply with all future discovery orders entered by the District Court in this case. But other parties to other lawsuits would feel freer than we think Rule 37 contemplates they should feel to flout other discovery orders of other district courts. Under the circumstances of this case, we hold that the District Judge did not abuse his discretion in finding bad faith on the part of these respondents, and concluding that the extreme sanction of dismissal was appropriate in this case by reason of respondents’ “flagrant bad faith” and their counsel’s “callous disregard” of their responsibilities. * * *

Id. at 642, 96 S.Ct. at 2780–81, 49 L.Ed.2d 747.

In the wake of National Hockey, lower courts increasingly imposed sanctions in a much wider variety of discovery situations. See American Bar Association, Sanctions: Rule 11 and Other Powers 34–36, 46–48, 61–70, 79–82, 97–101, 115–16, 128–29, 138–42, 158–60, 170, 175–77, 182, 186–87 (2d ed. 1988) (surveying decisions); see also American Law Institute-American Bar Association, Sanctions in Civil Litigation: A Review of Sanctions by Rule, Statute, and Inherent Power (2007). A survey of decisions involving the discovery of electronic information before the 2006 amendments found that courts granted sanctions in about two-thirds of the cases, most often when a party had willfully destroyed documents in violation of a court order or caused prejudice to the opposing party. See Scheindlin & Wangkeo, Electronic Discovery Sanctions in the Twenty-First Century, 11 Mich.Telecomm. & Tech.L.Rev. 71, 73 (2004).

2.As National Hockey underscored, the district courts have broad discretion in devising discovery sanctions, with the most severe being dismissal of the complaint or ordering entry of judgment against defendant. See Chrysler Corp. v. Carey, 186 F.3d 1016, 1020–22 (8th Cir. 1999) (affirming entry of judgment of liability against defendants). Other possible sanctions include the imposition of costs, attorney’s fees, and expenses. In extreme cases, a special master can be appointed to oversee the discovery process. A lawsuit can be dismissed for discovery abuse, and evidence can be barred from use at trial or for summary judgment. However, even after the 2015 amendments, district courts have acknowledged that “the strong public policy favoring adjudication of cases on their merits often leads courts to favor lesser punishments” than dismissal of the action, unless there is “evidence of willfulness, bad faith, or some fault of a party other than inability to comply and where no evidence has been destroyed or suppressed.” Rivera v. Martin J. Donnelly Antique Tools, 2016 WL 1389984 (M.D.La. 2016).

3. “Spoliation” refers to the “destruction or alteration of evidence or to the failure to preserve property for another.” Silvestri v. General Motors Corp., 271 F.3d 583, 590 (4th Cir. 2001). The Federal Rules do not create the duty to preserve; that duty is based on the common law and statute and generally arises “when a party should have known that the evidence may be relevant to future litigation.” Kronisch v. United States, 150 F.3d 112, 126–27 (2d Cir. 1998). Courts have discretion to devise a sanction for spoliation; in the Second Circuit, the aim is to: “(1) deter parties from engaging in spoliation; (2) place the risk of an erroneous judgment on the party who wrongfully created the risk; and (3) restore ‘the prejudiced party to the same position he would have been in absent the wrongful destruction of evidence by the opposing party.’ ” West v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 167 F.3d 776, 779 (2d Cir. 1999), citation omitted.

In 2015 the Federal Rules were amended to add Rule 37(e) dealing with sanctions for the spoliation of electronically stored information (“ESI”). Sanctions may be imposed if the court finds a party was prejudiced by the loss of ESI and the respondent had a duty to preserve the ESI, the party failed to take reasonable steps to preserve the ESI and it was lost, and the ESI cannot be recovered or replaced. More severe sanctions may be imposed if the court finds that the respondent intentionally sought to deprive the opposing party of the ESI. Under the prior version of Rule 37, “absent exceptional circumstances,” sanctions were barred for the loss of ESI “resulting from the routine, good-faith operation of an electronic information system.” Advisory Committee Note to 2015 amendment.

Prior to the 2015 amendment, courts acknowledged authority in extreme circumstances to order an adverse-inference instruction against a party that lost ESI through “negligent and possibly reckless” conduct, upon a showing that the lost evidence was relevant to and would be favorable to the claim or defense of the requestor. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, 221 (S.D.N.Y. 2003). Negligence was considered sufficient because, as one respected magistrate judge explained:

It makes little difference to the party victimized by the destruction of evidence whether that act was done willfully or negligently. The adverse inference provides the necessary mechanism for restoring the evidentiary balance. The inference is adverse to the destroyer not because of any finding of moral culpability, but because the risk that the evidence would have been detrimental rather than favorable should fall on the party responsible for its loss.

Turner v. Hudson Transit Lines, Inc., 142 F.R.D. 68, 75 (S.D.N.Y.1991). Courts tended to rely on their inherent authority to devise a sanction, and even after the 2015 amendment, some district courts have emphasized that they retain “broad discretion” to do so: “Without limitation, litigation misconduct may also be otherwise sanctioned by the inherent power of the court.” DVComm, LLC v. Hotwire Communications, LLC, 2016 WL 6246824, *7 (E.D.Pa. 2016). Why should Rule 37(e) be limited to ESI and not to all discoverable information?

4.In GOODYEAR TIRE & RUBBER CO. v. HAEGER, 137 S.Ct. 1178, 197 L.Ed.2d 585 (2017), a unanimous eight-person Court held that a court can impose attorney’s fees on a party for bad faith discovery conduct under its inherent powers, but the award must be “limited to the fees the innocent party incurred solely because of the misconduct—or put another way, to the fees that party would not have incurred but for the bad faith.” The lower court did not apply that standard, and so the award of $2.7 million in fees to plaintiffs was reversed. Discovery sanctions under Rule 37 were not available because the suit already had settled. As the Court explained:

[The Haegers sued Goodyear] after the family’s motorhome swerved off the road and flipped over. The Haegers alleged that the failure of a Goodyear G159 tire on the vehicle caused the accident: Their theory was that the tire was not designed to withstand the level of heat it generated when used on a motorhome at highway speeds. Discovery in the case lasted several years—and itself generated considerable heat. The Haegers repeatedly asked Goodyear to turn over internal test results for the G159, but the company’s responses were both slow in coming and unrevealing in content. After making the District Court referee some of their more contentious discovery battles, the parties finally settled the case (for a still-undisclosed sum) on the eve of trial.

Some months later, the Haegers’ lawyer learned from a newspaper article that, in another lawsuit involving the G159, Goodyear had disclosed a set of test results he had never seen. That data indicated that the G159 got unusually hot at speeds of between 55 and 65 miles per hour. In ensuing correspondence, Goodyear conceded withholding the information from the Haegers even though they had requested (both early and often) “all testing data” related to the G159. * * * The Haegers accordingly sought sanctions for discovery fraud, claiming that “Goodyear knowingly concealed crucial ‘internal heat test’ records related to the [G159’s] defective design.” * * * That conduct, the Haegers urged, entitled them to attorney’s fees and costs expended in the litigation. * * *

977

The District Court agreed to make such an award in the exercise of its inherent power to sanction litigation misconduct. * * * The court’s assessment of Goodyear’s actions was harsh (and is not contested here). Goodyear, the court found, had engaged in a “years-long course” of bad-faith behavior. * * * By withholding the G159’s test results at every turn, the company and its lawyers had made “repeated and deliberate attempts to frustrate the resolution of this case on the merits.” * * * But because the case had already settled, the court had limited options. It could not take the measure it most wished: an “entry of default judgment” against Goodyear. * * * All it could do for the Haegers was to order Goodyear to reimburse them for attorney’s fees and costs paid during the suit.

But that award, in the District Court’s view, could be comprehensive, covering both expenses that could be causally tied to Goodyear’s misconduct and those that could not. The court calculated that the Haegers had spent $2.7 million in legal fees and costs since the moment, early in the litigation, when Goodyear made its first dishonest discovery response. And the court awarded the Haegers that entire sum. In the “usual[]” case, the court reasoned, “sanctions under a [c]ourt’s inherent power must be limited to the amount [of legal fees] caused by the misconduct.” * * * But this case was not the usual one: Here, “the sanctionable conduct r[ose] to a truly egregious level.” * * * And when a litigant behaves that badly, the court opined, “all of the attorneys’ fees incurred in the case [can] be awarded,” without any need to find a “causal link between [those expenses and] the sanctionable conduct.” * * * As further support for its decision, the court considered the chances that full and timely disclosure of the test results would have affected Goodyear’s settlement calculus. “While there is some uncertainty,” the court stated, “the case more likely than not would have settled much earlier.” * * *

Id. at 1184–85, 197 L.Ed.2d at 591–92. The Court explained that a civil sanction must be compensatory, not punitive, so that only those fees incurred because of the misconduct could be shifted to the sanctioned party. In this case, the Court found that plaintiffs had failed to show that Goodyear’s “non-disclosure so permeated the suit” as to make that misconduct a but-for cause of every subsequent legal expense; nor did they show that the litigation would have settled once the information was disclosed. Id. at 1189, 197 L.Ed.2d at 597. On remand, the district court found that Goodyear had waived objections to an alternative sanction award of $2 million and that it was vicariously liable for the acts of its attorneys. See Haeger v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 2018 WL 1182551 (D.Ariz. 2018).

978

5.In KLIPSCH GROUP, INC. v. EPRO E-COMMERCE LTD., 880 F.3d 620 (2d Cir. 2018), the Second Circuit affirmed the award of $2.7 million of discovery sanctions, including attorney’s fees, for misconduct that caused plaintiff to undertake corrective discovery action:

* * * [D]efendant engaged in persistent discovery misconduct: it failed to timely disclose the majority of the responsive documents in its possession, restricted a discovery vendor’s access to its electronic data, and failed to impose an adequate litigation hold even after the court directed it to do so, which omission allowed custodians of relevant electronic data to delete thousands of documents and significant quantities of data, sometimes permanently.

Id. at 623. In devising the award, the district court relied upon its inherent authority, not Rule 37. The court of appeals affirmed, stating:

[W]e emphasize that discovery sanctions should be commensurate with the costs unnecessarily created by the sanctionable behavior. A monetary sanction in the amount of the cost of discovery efforts that appeared to be reasonable to undertake ex ante does not become impermissibly punitive simply because those efforts did not ultimately uncover more significant spoliation and fraud, or increase the likely damages in the underlying case.

Id. The court of appeals rejected defendant’s contention that the sanction was punitive because it was out of proportion “to the likely ultimate value of the case.” Id. at 630. To the contrary, the costs were incurred because defendant had failed to comply with discovery obligations, and compliance is “not optional or negotiable; rather, the integrity of our civil litigation process requires that the parties before us, although adversarial to one another, carry out their duties to maintain and disclose the relevant information in their possession in good faith.” Id. at 630–31.

6.What if a corporate party whose deposition is noticed under Rule 30(b)(6) deliberately selects a person to testify who appears for the deposition but who lacks information sufficient to respond to the questions asked? The circuits are divided on when and whether sanctions should be imposed. In the First Circuit, sanctions generally are available only when the deponent “literally fails to show up for a deposition session.” Baker v. St. Paul Travelers Ins. Co., 670 F.3d 119 (1st Cir. 2012) (internal quotations omitted). By contrast, the Fifth Circuit has held that because a corporation controls whom to designate for a Rule 30(b)(6) deposition, the corporation should be subject to sanctions if it designates a deponent who is not knowledgeable about the relevant facts. See Resolution Trust Corp. v. Southern Union Co., Inc., 985 F.2d 196 (5th Cir. 1993). The Third Circuit likewise has rejected the no-show approach to sanctions. In Black Horse Lane Assoc., L.P. v. Dow Chem. Corp., 228 F.3d 275, 304 (3d Cir. 2000), the appellate court held that the deponent’s lack of knowledge was tantamount to a failure to appear and therefore sanctionable—the witness had done “nothing except show his face,” “refused to answer questions in an intelligent way,” “refused to prepare,” “and just literally thumbed his nose at the defendants and, frankly, at the Court.” Id. at 300.

7. Rule 26(e) authorizes the court to sanction a party’s failure to supplement a disclosure or response. The significant question in many disputes about supplementation is whether the duty was triggered. In Poitra v. School District No. 1 in the County of Denver, 311 F.R.D. 659 (D.Colo. 2015), plaintiff failed to include a witness in the initial Rule 26(a)(1) disclosures or in any written supplemental disclosure prior to the final pretrial conference. Two months before trial, defendant moved to strike the witness and for sanctions. Plaintiff defended by pointing to specific deposition testimony from the witness as satisfying the supplementation obligation.

Rule 26(e) must be construed and applied against the backdrop of the very specific requirements set forth in Rule 26(a)(1)(A)(i). Indeed, the elements of Rule 26(e) are quite clear. First, to trigger the duty to supplement, a party’s initial disclosures must, in some respect, be incomplete or incorrect. Here, that element is not in dispute * * *. Second, Rule 26(e)(1)(A) requires that supplemental disclosures occur “in a timely manner.” * * * And finally, a reasonable interpretation of Rule 26(e)(1)(A) and its reference to “incomplete or incorrect” disclosures presumes that the “additional or corrective information . . . otherwise made known . . . during the discovery process” will provide the functional equivalent of the information required under Rule 26(a)(1)(A). * * *

* * *

While discovery is, by necessity, an iterative process, Plaintiff’s interpretation of the “otherwise made known” phrase has the potential to convert the Rule 26(e) supplementation requirement into a “whack-a-mole” game. * * * Constrained by the numerical limit on depositions imposed under Rule 30(a)(2) and by proportionality factors expressly incorporated in Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(1), opposing counsel is confronted with a real dilemma if the mere mention of an individual’s name during a deposition discharges a party’s disclosure and supplementation obligations. A risk-averse party must either expend time and money taking a deposition that could prove worthless, or risk surprise at trial. * * *

* * *

* * * [I]t is the practical effect of counsel’s interpretation of Rule 26(e) that is most troubling. Rule 26(a)(1) and (e)(1) impose an affirmative obligation to provide disclosures that are complete and correct as of the time they are made. The importance of that disclosure obligation is reflected in the certification requirement imposed on counsel under Rule 26(g). A passing and perhaps oblique reference to an individual during a deposition should not presumptively equate to a Rule 26(a)(1)(A)(i) disclosure that reflects counsel’s “knowledge, information and belief formed after a reasonable inquiry.” Similarly, the phrase “otherwise made known to the other parties during the discovery process” should not be broadly applied to circumvent Rule 26(g) or give a party “license” to engage in ambush or supplement their disclosures almost by happenstance. * * *

Id. at 666–68. The court granted the motion to strike and for sanctions, finding that the nondisclosure, even if not willful, had caused prejudice to defendant and interfered with the court’s management of its trial calendar.

8. Rule 26(e) is broad but not all-encompassing. Would supplementation be required in the following situations?
- (a)After mandatory disclosure under Rule 26(a), a party learns that information regarding damage calculations was incomplete.
 - (b)After answering an interrogatory that the party does not intend to invoke the law of any state other than Colorado “at this time,” the party then decides to invoke the law of Idaho.
 - (c)After trial begins, documents are belatedly found that are responsive to an earlier Rule 34 request.

9.Although trial judges have broad discretion to manage discovery matters, excessive judicial limits on discovery constitute an abuse of discretion. In MILLER v. SAM HOUSTON STATE UNIVERSITY, 986 F.3d 880 (5th Cir. 2021), the Fifth Circuit reversed a grant of summary judgment in favor of defendants due, in part, to the trial judge’s discovery rulings against plaintiff. Plaintiff, who was denied tenure at a public university in Texas, brought related suits under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Pay Act against various defendants in the Texas public university systems. From the outset of the litigation, the district judge “effectively stifled [plaintiff’s] attempts at discovery” by issuing orders that “foreclosed the parties from propounding written discovery or noticing depositions ‘without court approval.’ ” Id. at 886. The district judge then ordered the parties to exchange certain information, including plaintiff’s “performance and personnel records, her pay records, names of relevant parties, and organizational charts.” The district judge also attended and participated in a key deposition in the case. The court of appeals concluded that the judge’s rulings denied plaintiff a full and fair opportunity to discover information essential to opposing defendants’ summary judgment motions:

* * * “[A]lthough the district court is customarily accorded wide discretion in handling discovery matters, we will not uphold a ruling which has failed to adhere to the liberal spirit of the Rules.” Coughlin v. Lee, 946 F.2d 1152, 1159 (5th Cir. 1991). * * * [T]he district judge here permitted only [plaintiff’s] deposition to be taken before summary judgment briefing and argument—and then actually participated in the deposition. By contrast, the court repeatedly denied [plaintiff] the opportunity to depose any witnesses, relenting

only after summary judgment briefing was complete to allow [plaintiff] one deposition * * *. And that deposition was limited to “two hours, at most.” To put it simply, the court’s discovery restrictions suffocated any chance for [plaintiff] fairly to present her claims. While the Universities offer that Miller was not prejudiced because she had already received voluminous documentation from a pre-suit Texas Public Information Act request, we are not persuaded given the district court’s inflexible denials of both her written discovery requests and her requests to take depositions. * * * Even given the deference afforded to district courts when deciding discovery matters, the restrictions here * * * were “arbitrary or clearly unreasonable.” * * * Although we are never quick to second-guess a district court’s management of discovery, we must do so here.

Id. at 891–92.

H. USE OF DISCOVERY AT TRIAL

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 32, 33(c), and 36(b) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

Attorneys can use the discovery devices simply to find out information, but commonly they anticipate using an adversary’s or a witness’s answers at trial: as admissions, to refresh a witness’s recollection, or to provide a basis for cross-examination or impeachment. And sometimes a response to discovery can be used in lieu of or in addition to live testimony. The use of discovery responses at trial is governed by two sets of rules: the rules of procedure, governing whether the discovery material can be used at all at trial; and the rules of evidence, governing whether the matters are admissible at trial.

TATMAN V. COLLINS

United States Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, 1991.
938 F.2d 509.

NIEMEYER, CIRCUIT JUDGE:

During the course of trial in this personal injury litigation, the district court excluded the deposition of a treating physician offered by the plaintiff because (1) it had been taken only for discovery purposes, and (2) the witness was within 100 miles of the borders of the district (although more than 100 miles from the courthouse). Because the plaintiff’s other critical expert testimony was dependent on the excluded deposition, the court struck that testimony and directed a verdict for the defendants. For the reasons that follow, we conclude that Fed.R.Civ.P. 32 was misapplied to exclude the deposition, and we reverse and remand the case for a new trial.

982

I

On April 15, 1986, near Winfield, West Virginia, Monte L. Tatman, while in an automobile, was struck from the rear by a tractor-trailer driven by Bobby Wayne Collins. Tatman was treated by Dr. Joseph Amico, a doctor located in Columbus, Ohio, for injuries to his neck, back, shoulder and head. Almost a year later, Tatman was hospitalized with a cerebral aneurysm. He died on March 12, 1987, when the aneurysm ruptured.

In March 1988, Rebecca Tatman, Monte’s wife, filed suit against Collins and his employer, H & T Trucking Services, Inc., in the Southern District of West Virginia, sitting in Charleston. The complaint alleges that Monte Tatman’s death was causally linked to the injuries sustained in the accident. It alleges that the accident caused an uncontrollable rise and fall in Monte Tatman’s blood pressure, which, in turn, caused the rupture of the aneurysm.

During discovery, the defendants took the deposition of Dr. Amico who testified to Tatman’s treatment and gave an opinion that there was a causal connection between the injuries sustained in the accident and the subsequent rupturing of the aneurysm. When a scheduling conflict prevented Dr. Amico from coming to the trial, the plaintiff sought to introduce the deposition of Dr. Amico, pointing out the conflict in his schedule and noting that he was more than 100 miles from the courthouse. The court excluded the deposition because it was taken early in the case as a discovery deposition and the defense counsel should not be “chargeable” with it. The court also concluded that the deposition could not be used because Columbus, Ohio, where Dr. Amico was located, was within 100 miles of the northern border of the Southern District of West Virginia, even though more than 100 miles from the courthouse. * * * Because the only other witness linking Tatman’s aneurysm with the accident, Dr. Cyril Wecht, relied on the testimony of Dr. Amico, the court struck Dr. Wecht’s testimony and granted defendant’s motion for a directed verdict on the wrongful death claim. The jury returned a verdict on the survivor’s claim, finding Collins negligent but finding that Tatman’s injury was not caused by the accident.

II

In refusing to admit the deposition of Dr. Amico because it was a “discovery” deposition rather than one taken for use at trial, the district court stated, “the deposition that’s involved here is a discovery deposition; it is one that was taken by the defense counsel at an early juncture in the case; it is one that the defense counsel should not be chargeable with at last minute—at the trial because plaintiff’s counsel did not produce the physician.” * * *

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure make no distinction for use of a deposition at trial between one taken for discovery purposes and one taken for use at trial (de bene esse). See Rule 32 (use of depositions in court proceedings). Moreover, we are unaware of any authority which makes that distinction. * * * United States v. IBM Corp., 90 F.R.D. 377 (S.D.N.Y.1981). In IBM Corp. the court provided a historical explanation of how any distinction between a “discovery” deposition and a “de bene esse” deposition was deliberately eliminated from the rule:

Prior to the revision of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in 1970, Rule 26(a) provided that depositions could be taken “for the purpose of discovery or for use as evidence in the action or for both purposes.” Rule 26(d), the predecessor of Rule 32(a), which governed the use of depositions at trial, did not, however, state any distinction between discovery and evidentiary depositions. Recognizing a possible ambiguity in the rule, courts nevertheless refused to recognize a distinction between “discovery” and “evidentiary” depositions with regard to admissibility at trial. When the subject matter of Rule 26(a) was transferred to Rule 30(a) in the 1970 revision of the rules, the language authorizing depositions “for the purpose of discovery or for use as evidence in the action or for both purposes” was omitted.

90 F.R.D. at 381 n. 7 (citations omitted).

Fed.R.Civ.P. 32 provides that a deposition may be offered at trial, subject to the rules of evidence, as though the witness were present and testifying, and no distinction is now made in the rule with respect to the purpose for which the deposition was taken. While the rule makes distinctions in the circumstances when depositions of parties and witnesses may be used, it provides in section (a)(3) that when a witness is unavailable as therein provided, the deposition of the witness may be used for any purpose. Parties cognizable of the rule can overcome limitations of the deposition format and its timing in the discovery process by appropriate cross-examination, objections, and motions as permitted by Rules 30 and 32 (both of which govern depositions), Rule 29 (regarding stipulations), and Rule 26 (governing discovery in general). When, as here, the witness’ deposition was duly noticed and all parties had the opportunity to attend (and did attend), it may be introduced at trial, subject to the rules of evidence, if the witness is unavailable as described in Rule 32(a)(3). It is irrelevant to the issue that one party or the other initiated the deposition, that it was initiated only for discovery purposes, or that it was taken before other discovery was completed.

The district court, of course, is afforded broad discretion to admit or exclude any deposition testimony by applying the rules of evidence. But it cannot exclude deposition testimony on the basis that the defendant intended that the deposition be taken for discovery purposes and did not expect that it would be used at trial.

III

The district court also excluded Dr. Amico’s deposition because Columbus, where Dr. Amico was located, is within 100 miles of the border of the Southern District of West Virginia, although more than 100 miles from the courthouse in Charleston where the trial was taking place. This interpretation of Rule 32 is also one with which we do not agree.

Rule 32(a)(3)(B) provides that a deposition may be admitted if the witness is “at a greater distance than 100 miles from the place of trial” (emphasis added). We hold that for purposes of applying the rule the place of trial is the courthouse where the trial takes place. It is apparent that the rule is intended to protect the convenience of the witness and the parties, and that the limit of convenience is measured by the 100-mile distance. To measure a distance from the borders of the district, as defendants argue, rather than from the courthouse, would provide a variable standard of convenience, depending on the size of the district, the location of the trial, and the location of the witness. Had the drafters of the rule intended that the calculation of the 100 miles be made from the borders of the district they could have so specified. It is noteworthy that the language defining the scope of the subpoena power under Rule 45(e) distinguishes itself from Rule 32(a)(3)(B) by permitting service within 100 miles of the place of trial or anywhere within the district (even if it is more than 100 miles). That distinction suggests that the “place of trial” as used in Rule 32(a)(3)(B) is a locus more definite than the entire district. * * *

Although few courts have specifically addressed the meaning of “place of trial,” several cases dealing with Rule 32 have interchanged “courthouse” for the “place of trial.” See, e.g., United States v. Vespe, 868 F.2d 1328, 1339 (3rd Cir. 1989) (Rule 32 “permits the deposition of a witness who is more than one hundred miles from the courthouse.”) (emphasis added) * * *.

Because Dr. Amico was beyond 100 miles of the courthouse and no showing was made that his absence was procured by a party (on the contrary, his professional commitment prevented his coming), his deposition was not properly excludable on the ground that he was within 100 miles of the borders of the district.

* * *

REVERSED AND REMANDED.

K.K. HALL, CIRCUIT JUDGE, dissenting:

I agree with the salient legal points of the majority opinion. The district court misstated the “100-mile” rule, and there is no categorical exclusion of “discovery” depositions at trial.

On the other hand, the district court has broad discretion on questions of admissibility of evidence and broad power over the management of litigation before it. In order to avoid disputes like this one, the district court required the parties to prepare an integrated pretrial order. Plaintiff disclosed that Dr. Amico would be a witness, but did not propose to offer his deposition. The defendants had no notice of plaintiff's intention to use the deposition; the deposition was taken at the earliest stages of the litigation. The rules of civil procedure permit the admission of Amico's deposition, but they do not require it. The district court concluded that it would be unfair to ambush the defendants with the deposition at the last moment. I do not believe that this ruling was an abuse of discretion.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1.What is the rationale for permitting the use of testimony by deposition at trial, rather than insisting on live testimony? Does the format of the deposition, whether videotaped or by written transcript, affect its use under Federal Rule 32?
- 2.How do the circumstances for use of deposition testimony under Rule 32(a)(2) differ from those of Rule 32(a)(3)?
- 3.Can a party use deposition testimony selectively, offering only portions of the transcript or videotape? See Rule 32(a)(6).
- 4.Why is there no longer a distinction drawn between “discovery” and other depositions? Strategically, what steps should a party take with respect to her discovery plan once she knows that the opposing party plans to use a deposition transcript at trial?
- 5.Why is the 100-mile rule calculated differently for purposes of a witness’s availability under Rule 32(a)(4) than for a subpoena under Rule 45? Is the 100-mile rule an appropriate proxy for unavailability given the different cost and convenience of different modes of travel? See Sloan & Gotfryd, Eliminating the 100 Mile Limit for Civil Trial Witnesses: A Proposal to Modernize Civil Trial Practice, 140 F.R.D. 33, 37 (1992).
- 6.Does absence from the jurisdiction because of military service count as being “unavailable” under Rule 32(a)(4)(C)? See generally Allred, Depositions and a Case Called Savard, 63 A.F.L.Rev. 1 (2009).

^aThe language of Rule 27 was altered by the 2007 restyling of the Federal Rules, but the changes were not substantive.

^bThe language as changed now appears in Rule 11(b)(3).

¹This Court’s use of the term “accident-causing” is in no way meant as an assignment of fault. Rather, it is merely the way I distinguish the unit or component used by the complainant at the time of the accident from other units or components under consideration.

³Interrogatory no. 1 asks plaintiff to describe “each component of damages YOU claim YOU have suffered as a result of the acts or omissions YOU allege in the Complaint, including, but not limited, stating the dollar amount of each, and how much was calculated.”

Interrogatory nos. 5, 6, 7, 10, 11, 14, 15 and 16 ask plaintiff to state all facts upon which a particular, specified allegation in the Complaint is based.

Interrogatory nos. 8 and 9 ask plaintiff to identify documents, statements or actions specifically and particularly alleged in the Complaint.

²¹² Although petitioner was an agent of Greyhound, he was himself a party to the action. He is to be distinguished from one who is not a party but is, for example, merely the agent of a party.

^cThe “good cause” requirement was eliminated from Rule 34 in 1970.

^dThese matters are now covered by Rule 26(c).

^eThe requirement of “good cause” was removed by the 1970 amendment to Rule 34.

^fAlteration in original.

^gAlteration in original.

⁶ The following discussion will also be relevant to counsels’ notes and memoranda of interviews with the seven former employees should it be determined that the attorney-client privilege does not apply to them. * * ***

^hThe rule is now numbered as Rule 81(a)(5).

ⁱAlteration in original.

⁶ Defendants estimate that their actual costs in seeking to compel discovery total at least $50,000.

⁸ Rule 37 was amended in 1970 to permit the imposition of a broader range of sanctions. By deleting the word “wilfully” from subsection (d) of the Rule, the drafters intended “that wilfulness [be] relevant only to the selection of sanctions, if any, to be imposed.” Advisory Committee Note * * *.

CHAPTER 12

CASE MANAGEMENT

■ ■ ■

This chapter examines the history, theory, and practice of judicial case management techniques. One of the hallmark features of the adversary system is its reliance on the parties to initiate the action and to move the proceeding toward its resolution. The increased importance of case management, including the centrality of Rule 16 pretrial conferences, in part reflects shifting attitudes about the burdens and benefits of civil litigation and concerns about rising dockets and increased costs. Disagreements about the efficacy of case management are at the center of procedural debates involving pleading, discovery, and summary judgment. As you read the materials that follow, consider the values that ought to inform the practice of case management and whether it might be reformed to improve its utility.

and fairness.

A. THE DEVELOPMENT OF CASE MANAGEMENT TECHNIQUES

MILLER, THE PRETRIAL RUSH TO JUDGMENT: ARE THE “LITIGATION EXPLOSION,” “LIABILITY CRISIS,” AND EFFICIENCY CLICHÉS ERODING OUR DAY IN COURT AND JURY TRIAL COMMITMENTS?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982, 1003 (2003) (footnotes omitted):

Federal district judges began utilizing management techniques on an ad hoc basis in the years following the Second World War. These experimental procedures were organized under the aegis of the Handbook of Recommended Procedure for the Trial of Protracted Cases and then the Manual on Complex Litigation, which first appeared in the 1960s. Their principles were given greater prominence and officially sanctioned in 1983, and then embellished further in 1993 by amendments to Rule 16; prior to these amendments the Rule described a discretionary and rather simple eve-of-trial conference. Given that by the early 1980s only an estimated six percent of cases actually reached trial and the lion’s share of resource expenditures occurred pretrial, the Rule was of little help in reducing the institution-to-termination litigation timeframe, let alone achieving any systemic economy. Recognizing that judicial intervention should occur shortly after commencement, Rule 16 was transformed in 1983 into a provision that encouraged—and in time effectively mandated—judicial management throughout the pretrial proceedings.

988

SHAPIRO, FEDERAL RULE 16: A LOOK AT THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF RULEMAKING, 137 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1969, 1981–84 (1989) (footnotes omitted):

* * * Rule [16 was] designed to substitute for formal pleadings the less formal processes of discussion and exchange as ways of narrowing issues for trial and of expediting proof. But because flexibility and discretion were the watchwords, judges were not instructed to do anything; they would only be encouraged to act. At the same time, they were not given express power to act coercively in any way not authorized by other, more formal procedures, and the comments of several important figures in the drafting of the rules left little doubt of their resistance to the coercive use of the conference.

* * *

* * * [A]n extraordinary range of practices * * * developed within the framework of the Rule [as promulgated in 1938]. While in some districts judges made relatively little use of the Rule, and seldom required pretrial conferences, other districts promulgated elaborate local rules that required pretrial conferences in most or all cases and/or imposed heavy burdens on counsel to confer in advance and to prepare detailed pretrial orders for the judge’s consideration. Some judges held pretrial conferences early and often, and were encouraged to do so in complex cases by the Manual for Complex Litigation. Some judges saw the pretrial conference as the chance to compel the parties to produce information that had not been (and perhaps could not be) sought in routine pretrial discovery; others saw the occasion as an opportunity to rid the case of frivolous or insubstantial issues of fact or law, whether or not requested to do so by one of the parties in an appropriate motion; still others saw the conference as a device to facilitate settlement, and saw the judge as a major player in that process.

* * *

At a more general level, the major development during this period was a sea-change in the attitude of many, perhaps most, judges toward their role in the pretrial period—a change that occurred with surprisingly little concern for the purposes and limitations of Rule 16. Judges began to see themselves less as neutral adjudicators—deciding what the parties brought to them for decision and proceeding at a pace to be determined by the parties—and more as managers of a costly and complicated process. Many district courts began to assign judges to a case from the beginning, and many judges, encouraged by this system and by the increased availability of magistrates and other support staff, began to manage their cases with a firm hand. Crowded dockets, costly discovery, and delay were seen as problems not just for the litigants but for the system, and even the litigants were thought of as frequent victims of their lawyers’ self-interest.

989

The role of the judge, then, was to keep cases moving at a reasonable pace, and to see that cases not be needlessly tried. Indeed, the concept of disposition without trial began to embrace a variety of inventive techniques other than simple mediation and settlement.

NOTE ON FEDERAL RULE 16

Federal Rule 16 was based on the experience of pretrial conferences in the Wayne County Circuit Court, in Michigan. The rationale for this innovation was explained by a leading commentator and member of the original Advisory Committee:

Every issue which can * * * be withdrawn from the trial agenda will result in a net gain for all parties concerned. It will save time for the court and jury, save expense for the parties to the action, save trouble for the witnesses, diminish the risk of error by simplifying the proceedings, and reduce the labor and cost of an appeal by curtailing the size of the record. If the admissions go far enough, or the evidence is clear enough, no trial at all may be necessary.

Sunderland, The Theory and Practice of Pre-Trial Procedure, 36 Mich.L.Rev. 215, 219 (1937). The rule was designed to be broad and flexible. As was emphasized, “This flexibility calls for discriminating between the cases that need the full treatment and those that do not warrant the full scope of the requirements.” Pollack, Pretrial Conferences, 50 F.R.D. 451, 465 (1970).

As the excerpt from Professor Miller’s article explains, developments in case management techniques were influenced by the emergence of the “big case” and the pressures that large scale discovery and multiple parties placed on the court. In the late 1960s a committee of federal judges, known as the Coordinating Committee for Multiple Litigation of the United States District Courts, together with legal scholars and representatives of the bar, drafted a manual of suggested procedures for dealing with “protracted cases.” The manual, which has been revised and updated from time to time, and is now the Manual for Complex Litigation (Fourth) (Federal Judicial Center 2004), traces its origins to the Handbook of Recommended Procedures for the Trial of Protracted Cases, 25 F.R.D. 351 (1960), and also to the Prettyman Report on Procedure in Anti-Trust and Other Protracted Cases, 13 F.R.D. 62 (1951). The Manual deals with many contemporary procedural devices that are now also used in less complex cases.

In 1983, Rule 16 was substantially revised. As the Advisory Committee Notes explain, the amendment was aimed at making “scheduling and case management an express goal of pretrial procedure,” shifting the emphasis of the pretrial conference from preparation for trial to a “process of judicial management that embraces the entire pretrial phase, especially motions and discovery.” In particular, amended Rule 16(b) made a scheduling order mandatory in every case, although it also authorized the district courts to promulgate local rules exempting certain categories of cases from the requirement. In cases not exempted, the assumption was that the judge or a magistrate would take “some action in every case within 120 days after the complaint is filed.” In addition, Rule 16(c) expanded the topics to be discussed at a pretrial conference; subdivision (7) included discussion of settlement and of using alternative dispute mechanisms to resolve the suit short of trial. Rule 16(f) specifically provided for the imposition of sanctions on parties and their counsel who failed to comply with a management order. Proponents defended judicial case management on efficiency grounds, contending that the adversary system had become “too costly and inefficient a device for resolving civil disputes.” Miller, The Adversary System: Dinosaur or Phoenix, 69 Minn.L.Rev. 1, 20 (1984).

990

Amendments in 1993 aimed at strengthening the judge’s managerial authority. The amended rule set deadlines for specific litigation activities, made explicit and expanded the topics to be discussed at the pretrial conference, provided for greater supervision of discovery, allowed for earlier consideration of pretrial dispositive motions (such as summary judgment), and confirmed that the judge has authority to facilitate settlement by ordering the parties to be present at pretrial conferences. The amendment also clarified the scope of trial court discretion to impose sanctions for such derelictions as failing to comply with a scheduling order or failing to attend or prepare for a pretrial conference. For discussion of Rule 16 by an experienced trial judge who urged greater use of case management techniques, see Richey, Rule 16 Revised, and Related Rules: Analysis of Recent Developments for the Benefit of Bench and Bar, 157 F.R.D. 69 (1994). See also Kelleher, The December 1993 Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure—A Critical Analysis, 12 Touro L. Rev. 7, 80 (1995).

The 2006 amendment to Rule 16(b) addressed a variety of discovery issues that may be discussed at a pretrial conference, including the discovery or disclosure of electronically stored information. Rule 26(f), which requires the parties to meet and confer to develop a discovery plan, was amended at the same time in order to dovetail with Rule 16(b).

The 2015 amendment required the scheduling conference to be held in person, by telephone, or by electronic means, thus ruling out conferring by mail. In addition, the rule reduced the time to issue the scheduling order (consistent with the shortening of time to effect service under Rule 4(m)), although the court retains discretion to extend the time. Further, the amendment again expanded the list of topics that may be included in the pretrial order, see Rule 16(b)(3)(B), largely concerning preservation of electronically stored information.

Early critics of case management emphasized its incompatibility with features of the adversary system, such as party autonomy, litigant initiative, and judicial neutrality. They also warned that judicial management would be less transparent than traditional judging, and that the practice would be susceptible to bias, yet evade appellate oversight. See Resnik, Managerial Judges, 96 Harv.L.Rev. 374, 376–78 (1982). Even some proponents of case management have voiced concern that its emphasis on expedition and flexibility cuts too far against court access, the civil jury right, and due process. See Schuh, Curbing Judicial Discretion in Pretrial Conferences, 20 Lewis & Clark L. Rev. 647 (2016). Other commentators have questioned whether the civil litigation system is as costly and slow as the conventional wisdom assumes. See Reda, The Cost-and-Delay Narrative in Civil Justice Reform: Its Fallacies and Functions, 90 Or.L.Rev. 1085 (2012).

991

The pressures of “big cases” resolved through multidistrict consolidation or class-wide settlement have served as accelerants in the acceptance of case management and the development of new techniques. It is not clear, however, that all or even the majority of cases are of a size or complexity to benefit from active case management. See Subrin, Reflections on the Twin Dreams of Simplified Procedure and Useful Empiricism, 35 W.St.U.L.Rev. 173 (2007). Nor can one safely quantify the negative effects of active judicial supervision, when used for expedition and settlement, on an adversarial system that values litigant autonomy and relies on judicial interpretation for the creation of democratic norms:

The important resource that the judiciary provides is a forum for the integration of law and fact. When the parties settle a case prior to trial or when a judge terminates a case prior to a trial, the process of integrating law and fact is truncated. When this process is abbreviated systematically, the mandate of substantive law is compromised; false negatives and, to a lesser extent, false positives, surely follow. Trials, in particular, are the paradigmatic integration of law and fact. Importantly, when trials vanish, the shadow of trials also vanish. The shadow of a trial is critical for parties engaged in settlement negotiations: if trial is not a realistic alternative to a negotiated settlement, the only realistic alternative is a motion terminating the case.

Main, Procedural Constants: How Delay Aversion Shapes Reform, 15 Nev.L.J. 1597, 1628 (2015) (footnotes omitted).

In recent years, a number of states have developed management practices modelled after those in the federal courts. E.g., Jokela & Herr, Special Masters in State Court Complex Litigation: An Available and Underused Case Management Tool, 31 Wm. Mitchell L.Rev. 1299 (2005). However, state practice varies a great deal. For a survey, see Oakley, A Fresh Look at the Federal Rules in State Courts, 3 Nev.L.J. 354 (2002/03).

The appropriate role of case management cannot be assessed in isolation. As one commentator has observed, “Case management is a part of the larger, interwoven fabric of our dispute-resolution system. It is inextricably bound up with policy debates about the role of judges and with fundamental questions about the proper design of pretrial procedure.” Gensler, Judicial Case Management: Caught in the Crossfire, 60 Duke L.J. 669, 672–73 (2010). Civil law systems, such as in Germany and France, have long relied on the judge to take an active role in superintending the disposition of a lawsuit. See Langbein, The German Advantage in Civil Procedure, 82 U.Chi.L.Rev. 823 (1985). It probably is significant that the training and selection of first-tier judges in continental Europe differs from that of judges in the United States. See Dodson & Klebba, Global Civil Procedure Trends in the Twenty-First Century, 34 B.C. Int’l & Comp.L.Rev. 1 (2011).

B. THE OPERATION OF RULE 16

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 16, the sample pretrial scheduling order, and the sample Standing Order set out in the Supplement.

1.CASE MANAGEMENT TECHNIQUES

NICK V. MORGAN’S FOODS, INC.
United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 2001.
270 F.3d 590.

McMILLIAN, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

[The district court imposed a monetary sanction on defendant and its counsel for failing to participate in good faith in court-ordered alternative dispute resolution in an effort to settle the lawsuit.]

* * *

* * * Nick filed suit against appellant on June 15, 1998, alleging sexual harassment and retaliation in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq. At that time, appellant was represented by outside counsel Robert Seibel, but all business decisions were made by appellant’s in-house counsel Barton Craig. Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(f),^a a pretrial scheduling conference was held on May 20, 1999. The parties consented to ADR with a court-appointed mediator pursuant to E.D. Mo. L.R. 6.01—6.05 (“the local rules”), and agreed to report back to the district court with the results of the ADR by September 30, 1999. On August 2, 1999, the district court issued an Order Referring Case to Alternate Dispute Resolution (“Referral Order”) mandating that the ADR process be conducted in compliance with the local rules and listing other specific requirements. * * * These requirements included, inter alia, that, at least seven days before the first ADR conference, each party shall supply the mediator with a memorandum presenting a summary of the disputed facts and its position on liability and damages; that all parties, counsel, corporate representatives and claims professionals with settlement authority shall attend all mediation conferences and participate in good faith; and that noncompliance with any court deadline could result in the imposition of sanctions against the appropriate party or parties.

On appellant’s request, the district court agreed to postpone the first ADR conference until October 18, 1999. Appellant did not file the memorandum that was required to be filed at least seven days before the first ADR conference. In attendance at the conference on October 18, 1999 was the court-appointed mediator; Nick; Nick’s counsel; appellant’s outside counsel, Seibel; and a corporate representative of appellant who had no independent knowledge of the facts of the case and had permission to settle only up to $500. Any settlement offer over $500 had to be relayed by telephone to Craig, who chose not to attend the ADR conference on the advice of outside counsel Seibel. During the ADR conference, Nick twice made offers of settlement that were rejected without a counteroffer by appellant. The ADR conference ended shortly thereafter without a settlement having been reached.

After the ADR conference, the mediator informed the district court of appellant’s minimal level of participation, and the district court issued an order directing appellant to show cause why it should not be sanctioned for its failure to participate in good faith in the court-ordered ADR process. In an October 29, 1999 response, appellant asserted that the Referral Order was only a set of nonbinding guidelines and admitted that it decided not to comply with the guidelines because doing otherwise would be a waste of time and money. On the same day, Nick moved to sanction appellant for failing to participate in good faith in the ADR process and requested attorneys’ fees and costs arising out of her participation in the mediation.

The district court held a hearing on its show cause order and Nick’s motion for sanctions on December 1, 1999, at which time Seibel confirmed that appellant’s corporate representative at the ADR conference had only $500 settlement authority; that any change in appellant’s position could only be made by Craig, who was not present but available by telephone; and that counsel had indeed failed to file the pre-ADR conference memorandum. After hearing argument by both parties, the district court concluded that appellant failed to participate in good faith in the court-ordered ADR process and sanctioned appellant $1,390.63 and appellant’s outside counsel $1,390.62. These sanctions were calculated to cover the cost of the ADR conference fees ($506.25) and Nick’s attorneys’ fees ($2,275.00). The court also ordered appellant to pay a $1,500.00 fine to the Clerk of the District Court as a sanction for failing to prepare the required memorandum and for its decision to send a corporate representative with limited authority to settle to the ADR conference. The district court ordered appellant and appellant’s outside counsel each to pay $30.00 to Nick for the costs she incurred attending the ADR conference.

994

On December 20, 1999, appellant filed a Motion for Reconsideration and Vacation of the Court’s Order Granting Plaintiff’s Motion for Sanctions (motion for reconsideration). The district court denied the motion for reconsideration and imposed additional sanctions against appellant and appellant’s counsel in the amount of $1,250.00 each to be paid to the Clerk of the District Court for vexatiously increasing the costs of litigation by filing a frivolous motion. This appeal followed. Appellant appeals the sanctions levied against it that are to be paid to the Clerk of the District Court; Appellant does not contest the sanctions levied against it that are to be paid to Nick and her counsel.

* * *

Appellant argues that, whereas Rule 11 * * * authorizes monetary fines payable to the court, Rule 16 does not. * * * Rule 16(f) expressly permits a judge to impose any other sanction the judge deems appropriate in addition to, or in lieu of, reasonable expenses. * * * Here, the district court judge acted well within his discretion by imposing a monetary fine payable to the Clerk * * * as a sanction for failing to prepare the required memorandum, deciding to send a corporate representative with limited authority to the ADR conference, and for vexatiously increasing the costs of litigation by filing a frivolous motion for reconsideration.

* * *

Appellant urges that the “uncontroverted facts on the record conclusively establish that all of the conduct which irritated the Trial Court was the exclusive product of Appellant’s trial lawyer and unknown to Appellant.” * * * Appellant argues that the affidavits of Craig and Seibel establish that it had no knowledge that its conduct was sanctionable and that its outside counsel was solely responsible for the noncompliance. * * * Appellant claims that Seibel did not pass along to Craig the necessity for a memorandum, and that, although Seibel advised Craig of the district court’s Referral Order and the relevant local rules, Craig read neither and relied instead on the advice of Seibel. * * * Appellant further claims that Seibel advised Craig that his attendance at the ADR conference was not necessary. * * * For this reason, appellant argues that the district court abused its discretion in imposing the sanctions against it and not solely against its outside counsel.

* * *4

995

It is a well-established principle in this Circuit that a party may be held responsible for the actions of its counsel. * * * While forcing parties to answer for their attorneys’ behavior may seem harsh, * * * litigants who are truly misled and victimized by their attorneys have recourse in malpractice actions. * * * [T]he sanction imposed by the district court need only be proportionate to the litigant’s transgression. * * *

* * *

In sum, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in imposing monetary sanctions against appellant for its lack of good faith participation in the ADR process, for its failure to comply with the district court’s August 2, 1999, Referral Order, and for vexatiously increasing the costs of litigation by filing a frivolous motion for reconsideration. The order of the district court is affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. As Nick illustrates, Rule 16 anticipates that the judge will play an energetic role in encouraging the parties to settle their dispute. See Glover, The Federal Rules of Civil Settlement, 87 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1713 (2012). That role often includes, as in Nick, facilitating settlement by directing the parties toward the use of alternative dispute resolution. See Chapter 18, infra. For practice prior to the 1993 amendment, see G. Heileman Brewing Co. v. Joseph Oat Corp., 871 F.2d 648 (7th Cir. 1989) (en banc). Does the court’s facilitation of settlement undermine its ability to decide the case on the merits? Does your answer depend on whether the trial is to a jury or to the bench? Would it be preferable to refer all settlement discussions to a third party? For suggestions on how to reform settlement conferences to protect against “unbounded, unbridled, and virtually unfettered” judicial discretion, see Parness, Improving Judicial Settlement Conferences, 39 U.C. Davis L.Rev. 1891, 1891–92 (2006).

2. Rule 16 provides the district courts with an arsenal of tools for managing a judicial proceeding. As one commentator puts it, the rule offers federal judges “more managerial arrows than can fit in an ordinary quiver.” See Rowe, Authorized Managerialism Under the Federal Rules—And the Extent of Convergence with Civil-Law Judging, 36 Sw.U.L.Rev. 191, 196 (2007). Rule 16 authority embraces such orders as the court’s dismissing a party from the lawsuit, blocking the presentation of testimony at trial, and enforcing the waiver of claims or defenses. But a court’s powers to manage each stage of litigation, including pretrial discovery, are not limitless and will exceed permissible bounds if used to impose undue restrictions on the process of fact gathering and adjudication. For an example of a judge’s use of managerial authority that was deemed an abuse of discretion, see Miller v. Sam Houston State University, 986 F.3d 880 (5th Cir. 2021), discussed on p. 980, supra.

3. Rule 16 permits the imposition of monetary sanctions on a party or the party’s counsel. Should these sanctions be compensatory—to reimburse the opposing party or the court for the added litigation costs—or a deterrent? How do Rule 16 sanctions differ from those imposed under Rule 11? See p. 703, Note on Rule 11, supra. Are monetary sanctions always preferable to the relatively drastic sanction of dismissal?

4. The liberal Rule 15 standard for amendment generally does not apply to modification of a pretrial scheduling order:
The pretrial scheduling order is designed to allow the district court to better manage its calendar and to facilitate the more efficient disposition of cases by settlement or by trial. See Johnson v. Mammoth Recreations, Inc., 975 F.2d 604, 607–08 (9th Cir. 1992). A scheduling order is not “a frivolous piece of paper, idly entered, which can be cavalierly disregarded by counsel without peril.” Id. at 610 (citation and quotation marks omitted). Rather, a scheduling order may be changed only with the court’s consent and for “good cause.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b)(4). But, the “good cause” standard requires less than the “manifest injustice” test used to modify a final pretrial order. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(e). See also Fed. R. Civ. P. 16, 1983 Advisory Committee Notes (“Since the scheduling order is entered early in the litigation, this standard seems more appropriate than a ‘manifest injustice’ or ‘substantial hardship’ test.”).

When litigants move to alter the schedule, the court’s inquiry focuses primarily on the diligence of the moving party * * *. Essentially, “[t]he district court may modify the pretrial schedule ‘if it cannot reasonably be met despite the diligence of the party seeking the extension’ . . . [i]f that party was not diligent, the inquiry should end.” Johnson, 975 F.2d at 609 (internal citation omitted). Ultimately, a district court has “broad discretion” to alter the schedule. United States v. Flynt, 756 F.2d 1352, 1358 (9th Cir. 1985).

Stoddart v. Express Services, 2017 WL 3333994, *1–2 (E.D. Cal. 2017).

To determine whether the party seeking modification was diligent, courts in the Ninth Circuit look primarily at three factors:
[T]he movant may be required to show the following: (1) that she was diligent in assisting the Court in creating a workable Rule 16 order * * *; (2) that her noncompliance with a Rule 16 deadline occurred or will occur, notwithstanding her diligent efforts to comply, because of the development of matters which could not have been reasonably foreseen or anticipated at the time of the Rule 16 scheduling conference * * *; and (3) that she was diligent in seeking amendment of the Rule 16 order, once it became apparent that she could not comply with the order * * *.

Jackson v. Laureate, Inc., 186 F.R.D. 605, 608 (E.D. Cal. 1999). The Sixth Circuit relies upon a four-factor test:

- (1) the explanation for the failure to timely move for leave to amend;
- (2) the importance of the amendment;
- (3) potential prejudice in allowing the amendment; and
- (4) the availability of a continuance to cure such prejudice.

Fahim v. Marriott Hotel Services, Inc., 551 F.3d 344, 348 (5th Cir. 2008). How do these standards differ, if at all?

5. In KASSNER v. 2nd AVENUE DELICATESSEN, INC., 496 F.3d 229 (2d Cir. 2007), an employment discrimination action, plaintiff moved to amend the complaint before defendant had filed an answer, but one month after the date specified in the Rule 16(b) scheduling order as the final date for the amendment of the pleadings. The court of appeals held that the more stringent “good cause” standard of Rule 16(b), and not Rule 15(a), applied:

* * * The advisory committee notes [to the 1983 amendments] provide that “[i]tem (1) assures that at some point both the parties and the pleadings will be fixed, by setting a time within which joinder of parties shall be completed and the pleadings amended.” * * * This objective would be frustrated by an interpretation of the first sentence of Rule 15(a) that precludes a district court from exercising any discretion to specify the time period during which a party may effect the first amendment of its complaint prior to the serving of a responsive pleading. Rule 16(b), in allowing modifications of scheduling orders only for good cause, provides the district courts discretion to ensure that limits on time to amend pleadings do not result in prejudice or hardship to either side. * * *

Id. at 243–44. Other circuits likewise have held that Rule 15 governs a timely motion to amend a complaint, but that Rule 16(b) governs a post-deadline motion. E.g., Public Health Equipment & Supply Co., Inc. v. Clarke Mosquito Control Systems, Inc., 410 Fed.Appx. 738 (5th Cir. 2010); Sosa v. Airprint Systems, Inc., 133 F.3d 1417, 1419 (11th Cir. 1998) (“If we considered only Rule 15(a) without regard to Rule 16(b), we would render scheduling orders meaningless and effectively would read Rule 16(b) and its good cause requirement out of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.”).

6. An appellate court will accord deference to the trial court’s managerial decisions, including whether to impose a sanction. See Freeman v. Astrue, 405 Fed.Appx. 148, 150–51 (9th Cir. 2010) (no abuse of discretion by excluding evidence filed 34 minutes after the court-imposed deadline).The First Circuit has warned that it is “folly” to treat case management orders as “polite suggestions rather than firm directives,” and that a party who ignores an order does so on peril of dismissal:

Administering a bustling docket is hard work. * * *

Of course, dismissal does not follow automatically from every failure to abide by a case-management order. When a party fails to obey such an order, the selection of an appropriate sanction is peculiarly within the province of the district court. In making this selection, a district judge “must work a complicated equation, balancing fairness to the parties with the need to manage crowded dockets.” Macaulay v. Anas, 321 F.3d 45, 51 (1st Cir. 2003). Given the trial court’s “intimate knowledge of the variables that enter into the equation, appellate review of sanctions orders is deferential.” Id. * * * “[W]e focus our review particularly on whether a material factor deserving significant weight was ignored, whether an improper factor was relied upon, or whether when all proper and no improper factors were assessed the court made a serious mistake in weighing them.” United States v. One 1987 BMW 325, 985 F.2d 655, 657–58 (1st Cir. 1993) * * *. Absent an error of law—and we discern none here—the party challenging a sanction faces an uphill climb in persuading a reviewing court that the trial court abused its discretion. Id. at 657.

998

Mulero-Abreu v. Puerto Rico Police Dept., 675 F.3d 88, 89, 91–92 (1st Cir. 2012).

7.Note that the sanctions imposed by the district court against the appellant in Nick stemmed in part from counsel’s failure to adhere to requirements set forth in the Eastern District of Missouri’s local rules. Those local rules governed the referral of cases to court-ordered alternative dispute resolution. In some district courts, local rules impose duties on litigants or counsel, in furtherance of case management, that are not found in the Federal Rules. These can include provisions that expand the Rule 16 concept of encouraging planning and consensual resolution, such as local rules requiring parties to meet and confer before filing motions. See, e.g., D. Minn. R. 7.1.

2.THE FINAL PRETRIAL ORDER

PAYNE V. S. S. NABOB

United States Court of Appeals, Third Circuit, 1962.
302 F.2d 803.

McLAUGHLIN, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

In this personal injury admiralty action libellant filed a pretrial memorandum stating that he was relying upon the condition of a winch to prove his cause of action. The judge’s pretrial report noted that. Sometime later the suit went to trial. Libellant’s attorney included in his opening the fact that the loading had been handled improperly as an important element of his proof of unseaworthiness. The impleaded stevedore employer objected as it was outside the scope of the pretrial memorandum and report. The trial court sustained the objection. Two witnesses on behalf of the libellant, not listed in his pretrial memorandum, were not allowed to testify. Libellant’s attorney moved for a continuance and this was denied.

* * *

999

Appellant * * * would have it that the Standing Order [local rule adopting Rule 16] did not furnish any ground for the court’s barring of the unseaworthy allegation and of the witnesses not mentioned in the appellant’s pretrial memorandum or the court’s pretrial report. This seems to be founded on the thought that a pretrial memorandum is merely preparatory to the conference and that the court’s pretrial order is the sole proof of the results of the pretrial procedure. In this instance, goes the contention, the function of appellant’s memorandum was exhausted at the conference and since no pretrial “order” was made there were no binding results of the pretrial steps. [Padovani v. Bruchhausen, 293 F.2d 546 (2d Cir. 1961)] * * * is cited for this, where it states:

“Nothing in the rule [16] affords basis for clubbing the parties into admissions they do not willingly make; but it is a way of advancing the trial ultimately to be had by setting forth points on which the parties are agreed after a conference directed by a trained judge.”

Appellant was not clubbed into admissions he did not willingly make. It was his own voluntary statement of the basis of his claim that was included in the pretrial report of the judge. The report was never objected to as incorrectly outlining appellant’s pretrial statement.

The position now taken that the pretrial report of the trial judge because it is not titled as an “order” does not comply with Rule 16 is without merit. Appellant’s pretrial memorandum was filed. In accordance with the Standing Order it contained a “brief summary statement of both the facts of this case and counsel’s contention as to the liability of defendant.” It also contained “The names and addresses of all witnesses (except rebuttal) whom the plaintiff expects to call to testify at the time of trial.” The pretrial conference was held in due course and attended by the attorneys for the parties. Based on the pretrial memoranda and the conference, the district judge drew and filed his report. There was no complaint concerning it or any part of it down to and including the trial until libellant’s attorney was stopped in his opening as he went beyond his pretrial outline of alleged liability. The pretrial “report”² drawn, signed and filed by the pretrial judge properly and fully (having the particular litigation and its requirements in mind) complies with the requirements of Rule 16. It, including its references to the pretrial memoranda, succinctly fulfilled the letter and spirit of pretrial. It reduced the action to essentials, eliminated surplusage, enabled the parties and the court to prepare for a trial of stated issues, named witnesses and contained no hidden charms. The argument to the contrary, depending as it does on a quibble over the word “report”, is rootless.

1000

It is asserted on behalf of the appellant that the Standing Order can only be construed as a request to stipulate, that counsel had no intention of stipulating and that no warning or notice was given by the Standing Order that failure to list the requirements ordered would constitute a stipulation or a waiver of all other theories. Rule 16 gives as the first purpose of pretrial “The simplification of issues”.^b Under the Standing Order counsel were asked to furnish “A brief summary of both the facts of the case and counsel’s contentions as to the liability of the defendant.” That was done. Libellant’s contentions as to the liability of the defendant were inserted into the Court’s Report with the note “See pre-trial memo”. The Report was filed September 28, 1959. The trial did not commence until March 14, 1960, a five and a half months interval during which no effort was made to change the signed and filed contentions of the libellant regarding the liability of the defendant or to add names of witnesses. The facts that the situation was plain on its face and that the practice was well settled by then, (the Standing Order having been in effect since October 23, 1958), set the tone for this contention on behalf of appellant. Krieger v. Ownership Corporation, 270 F.2d 265 (3 Cir. 1959), relied upon by appellant is inapposite. We there held that disputed issues of fact actually raised at the pretrial stage could not be resolved by the trial court on motion for summary judgment. It has long been the law that attorneys at the pretrial stage “owe a duty to the court and opposing counsel to make a full and fair disclosure of their views as to what the real issues at the trial will be.” Cherney v. Holmes, 185 F.2d 718, 721 (7th Cir. 1950) * * *. It is through such disclosure at pretrial that trial prejudice can be avoided. The awareness of appellant’s attorney to the trial situation is apparent in his request for a continuance when he told the court “I think under the circumstances I would move for a continuance of the case to give the other side ample time, because actually this is a question of surprise.” (Emphasis supplied.)^c

1001

It is argued also that the court abused its discretion by refusing to permit amendment of the pretrial memorandum. This was not an easy decision for the trial judge. His inclination clearly, as is habitual with judges, was to help. And help he would have if, in his opinion, he could have done so fairly. But he was confronted with the realization that if he granted the request or allowed a continuance of the trial he was repudiating the whole pretrial theory and system as understood and followed in the Eastern District at a crucial period of its existence. Pretrial was finally on a firm foundation there. The judges had all given it generous and complete attention. This, with the gradual realization of the bar that pretrial was here to stay as a vital element of litigation practice and its resultant full cooperation, had made pretrial procedure routine in the Eastern District. One consequence was that directly and indirectly enormous relief was given the badly clogged trial list. It was admittedly vitally important to make sure that pretrial procedure would continue to function properly. One necessary phase of attaining that objective was, as expressed by the trial judge, “We have come to the point of enforcing it very strictly.” In the circumstances he considered himself obliged to deny the motions to amend the pretrial memorandum with respect to liability allegations and witnesses. The refusal of appellant’s motion for a continuance is in the same category.

Beyond all doubt the judge acted entirely within his discretion. It was difficult for him, it took courage but it was what this sound, experienced judge had to do as he saw it, in accordance with his judicial obligation.

The decree of the district court will be affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The general rule makes the final pretrial order, together with all stipulations, agreements, and statements of counsel made at the final pretrial conference, binding for purposes of trial. See Kona Technology Corp. v. Southern Pacific Transportation Co., 225 F.3d 595, 604 (5th Cir. 2000). Certainly the benefits of case management depend on the court’s efficient resolution of each stage of the proceeding and development of a clear plan for final disposition.

2. The practical significance of the final pretrial order cannot be overstated. In HOWARD v. KERR GLASS MFG. CO., 699 F.2d 330 (6th Cir. 1983), the Sixth Circuit ruled that the final pretrial order prevailed over the original pleadings and that the trial judge had erred in refusing to admit evidence on issues included in the final pretrial order but not in the pleadings. Conversely, omission of an issue from a pretrial order in other cases has proved fatal. In McLEAN CONTRACTING CO. v. WATERMAN S.S. CORP., 277 F.3d 477 (4th Cir. 2002), plaintiff had made it clear that defendant’s liability depended upon the fact that a third company had acted as defendant’s agent. Defendant intended to dispute the agency but failed to have it included as an issue in the pretrial order. The appellate court held it was not an abuse of discretion to refuse defendant’s evidence on the issue; to the contrary, the court underscored that “[c]ounsel bear a substantial responsibility for assisting the court in identifying the factual issues worthy of trial. If counsel fails to identify an issue to the court, the right to have the issue tried is waived.” Id. at 480.

1002

C. NON-ARTICLE III JUDICIAL PERSONNEL

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 53, 72, and 73, and the materials accompanying Rule 53 in the Supplement.

The managerial authority of federal judges is bolstered by the assistance of non-Article III decision-makers such as magistrate judges and masters. The contribution of these judicial adjuncts, who serve for a fixed statutory term or by appointment, is quite significant. Magistrates can preside over civil trials with the parties’ consent and often serve as the initial adjudicator of a dispute. In 2016, magistrate judges disposed of 1,087,249 matters, and held 57,660 pretrial conferences in civil actions. See United States Courts, U.S. Magistrate Judges—Judicial Business 2016, available at: <http://www.uscourts.gov/statistics-reports/us-magistrate-judges-judicial-business-2016>. Masters also play a critical role as adjuncts in the federal courts, assigned such tasks as supervising discovery, overseeing disputes about attorney’s fees, and managing other aspects of complex cases. The selection of magistrates and masters falls within the authority of the district judges within guidelines that are general and differ among districts.

1.MAGISTRATE JUDGES

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The use of extra-judicial personnel is not a new phenomenon, but the practice in civil cases initially was disfavored. See Silberman, Masters and Magistrates, Part I: The English Model, 50 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1070 (1975); Silberman, Masters and Magistrates, Part II: The American Analogue, 50 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1297 (1975). The modern office of magistrate judge dates to the 1968 enactment of the Federal Magistrates Act, which replaced a system of commissioners who carried out ministerial tasks for the federal judges. See Foschio, A History of the Development of the Office of United States Commissioner and Magistrate Judge System, 1999 Fed.Cts.L.Rev. 4 (1999);

1003

Weinstein & Wiener, Of Sailing Ships and Seeking Facts: Brief Reflections on Magistrates and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 62 St. John’s L.Rev. 429 (1988).

2. Magistrate judges are judicial officers who serve as adjuncts to the district court. Unlike Article III judges who are appointed by the President after confirmation by the Senate and have the protection of life tenure, magistrate judges are appointed by the district judges of their court and serve for fixed terms. The work of a magistrate judge comports with the requirements of Article III under the theory that an assigned case “belongs to the district judge throughout,” Conetta v. National Hair Care Centers, 236 F.3d 67, 74 (1st Cir. 2001), and the “Article III courts firmly ‘control’ each magistrate.” Orsini v. Wallace, 913 F.2d 474, 477–79 (8th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1128, 111 S.Ct. 1093, 112 L.Ed.2d 1197 (1991). At bottom, the use of magistrate judges is justified on efficiency grounds:

A preference for magistrate judges can be explained by considering the comparative “prices” of a life-tenured judgeship and of a magistrate judgeship. Not only are Article III judges more expensive in dollar terms, they also create possibilities for party patronage and for conflicts between Congress and the Executive. Further, Article III judgeships typically require lag time from judicial request to congressional authorization and executive appointment. In contrast, magistrate judge lines can be created directly by the judiciary, which remains dependent on Congress for funding but not for appointing or allocating positions.

Resnik, Trial as Error, Jurisdiction as Injury: Transforming the Meaning of Article III, 113 Harv.L.Rev. 924, 990–91 (2000). See also Resnik, Judicial Selection and Democratic Theory: Demand, Supply, and Life Tenure, 26 Cardozo L.Rev. 579 (2005).

3.What kinds of determinations may be assigned to a magistrate judge under 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)? Can you identify the motions that are specially excepted under the statute? What is the scope of the magistrate’s authority regarding “dispositive” motions? What is the procedure for objecting to a magistrate judge’s recommendations and determinations? Would it be constitutional for a magistrate judge to terminate a case before trial without de novo review by an Article III judge? Likewise, should a magistrate judge’s imposition of sanctions be subject to de novo review? See Bell, The Power to Award Sanctions: Does It Belong in the Hands of Magistrate Judges, 61 Alb.L.Rev. 433 (1997).

4.The surge in pro se litigants has raised questions about the complexity of court procedure and the fairness of having parties navigate the litigation process without counsel. See Swank, The Pro Se Phenomenon, 19 BYU J.Pub.L. 373 (2005). The Eastern District of New York created a magistrate judge position to hear many categories of pro se matters. See Bloom & Hershkoff, Federal Courts, Magistrate Judges, and the Pro Se Plaintiff, 16 Notre Dame J.L. Ethics & Pub.Pol’y 475 (2002). Do you see any benefits to this approach? Disadvantages? See Stancil, Substitute Equality and Procedural Justice, 102 Iowa L.Rev. 1633 (2017).

1004

2.MASTERS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 53 and the accompanying materials in the supplement.

IN RE PETERSON

Supreme Court of the United States, 1920.
253 U.S. 300, 40 S.Ct. 543, 64 L.Ed. 919.

Petition for Writ of Mandamus and/or Writ of Prohibition to the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Petitioner challenged the authority of the district court to appoint an auditor to conduct a preliminary hearing to determine amounts due for coal sold and delivered, and to tax the auditor’s expenses as costs. Petitioner also claimed that the appointment of the auditor violated his jury trial right under the Seventh Amendment.]

* * *

The order expressly declared that the auditor should not “finally determine any of the issues in this action, the final determination of all issues of fact to be made by the jury at the trial”; but it did not provide affirmatively what use should be made of the report at the trial. It may be assumed that, if accepted by the court, the report would be admitted at the trial before the jury as prima facie evidence both of the evidentiary facts and of the conclusions of fact therein set forth. * * * A more intelligent consideration of the issues submitted to the jury for final determination would result.

* * * Prior to the adoption of the federal Constitution there did not exist in England, or so far as appears in any of the colonies, any officer, permanent or temporary, who, in connection with trials by jury, exercised the powers of an auditor above described. * * *

The office of auditor, with functions and powers like those here in question, was apparently invented in Massachusetts. It was introduced there by chapter 142 of the Acts of the Legislature of the year 1818, and as a part of the judicial machinery it has received the fullest development in that state. No act of Congress has specifically authorized the adoption of the practice in the federal courts. * * *

1005

* * * The command of the Seventh Amendment * * * does not prohibit the introduction of new methods for determining what facts are actually in issue, nor does it prohibit the introduction of new rules of evidence. * * * New devices may be used to adapt the ancient institution to present needs * * *.

In so far as the task of the auditor is to define and simplify the issues, his function is, in essence, the same as that of pleading. The object of each is to concentrate the controversy upon the questions which should control the result. * * * [I]t cannot be deemed an undue obstruction of the right to a jury trial to require a preliminary hearing before an auditor.

* * *

* * * There being no constitutional obstacle to the appointment of an auditor in aid of jury trials, it remains to consider whether Congress has conferred upon District Courts power to make the order. There is here, * * * no legislation of Congress which directly or by implication forbids the court to provide for such preliminary hearing and report. But, on the other hand, there is no statute which expressly authorizes it. The question presented is, therefore, whether the court possesses the inherent power to supply itself with this instrument for the administration of justice when deemed by it essential.

Courts have (at least in the absence of legislation to the contrary) inherent power to provide themselves with appropriate instruments required for the performance of their duties. * * * This power includes authority to appoint persons unconnected with the court to aid judges in the performance of specific judicial duties, as they may arise in the progress of a cause. * * * Whether such aid shall be sought is ordinarily within the discretion of the trial judge; but this court has indicated that where accounts are complex and intricate, or the documents and other evidence voluminous, or where extensive computations are to be made, it is the better practice to refer the matter to a special master or commissioner than for the judge to undertake to perform the task himself. * * *

* * * As Congress * * * has made no provision for paying from public funds either the fees of auditors or the expense of the stenographer, the power to make the appointment without consent of the parties is practically dependent upon the power to tax the expense as costs. May the compensation of auditor and stenographer be taxed as costs; and, if so, may the expense be imposed in the discretion of the trial court upon either party?

Federal trial courts have, sometimes by general rule, sometimes by decision upon the facts of a particular case, included in the taxable costs expenditures incident to the litigation which were ordered by the court because deemed essential to a proper consideration of the case by the court or the jury. * * *

1006

The allowance of costs in the federal courts rests, not upon express statutory enactment by Congress, but upon usage long continued and confirmed by implication from provisions in many statutes. * * *

* * * As there is no statute, federal or state, and no rule of court excluding auditors’ fees and the expense of his stenographer from the items taxable as costs, no reason appears why they may not be included, like other expenditures ordered by the court with a view to securing an intelligent consideration of a case.

Denied.

[JUSTICES McKENNA, PITNEY, and McREYNOLDS dissented.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1. Prior to the adoption of Federal Rule 53 in 1938, the Supreme Court recognized that in “exceptional circumstances” a court had authority to appoint a master “to aid judges in the performance of specific judicial duties, as they may arise in the progress of a cause.” La Buy v. Howes Leather Co., 352 U.S. 249, 256, 77 S.Ct. 309, 313, 1 L.Ed.2d 290, 297 (1957) (internal citations omitted). What circumstances ought to count as exceptional? Does Rule 53 incorporate that limitation? Does the appointment of a master depend on the parties’ consent?
- 2.What is the scope of a master’s role under Federal Rule 53? Would the accounting matter at issue in In re Peterson be exempt from the rule’s “exceptional condition” requirement? See Kaufman, Masters in the Federal Courts: Rule 53, 58 Colum.L.Rev. 452 (1958). Rule 53 was amended in 2003 making it easier to appoint a master in a jury case. See Fellows & Hardock, Federal Court Special Masters: A Vital Resource in the Era of Complex Litigation, 31 Wm. Mitchell L.Rev. 1269, 1272–73 (2005); Scheindlin & Redgrave, The Evolution and Impact of the New Federal Rule Governing Special Masters, 51 Fed.Law. 34 (Feb. 2004).
- 3.What are the key differences between a magistrate judge and a special master?
- 4. IN RE WORLD TRADE CENTER DISASTER SITE LITIG., 521 F.3d 169 (2d Cir. 2008), involved litigation by more than 9,000 plaintiffs, including New York City fire fighters, against 200 defendants for injuries allegedly caused by exposure to toxic chemicals during the clean-up effort that followed the destruction of the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001. The district judge appointed two special masters to oversee “bellwether” trials but settlements were reached before the trials took place. See Lahav, The Case for “Trial by Formula”, 90 Tex.L.Rev. 571, 610–12 (2012). The use of special masters in this litigation is to be distinguished from the special master who administered the September 11th Victim Compensation Fund, established under the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act, and who reported to the Attorney General of the United States.

1007

^aThe rule is now Rule 16(b)(1)(B).

⁴Appellant argues that its counsel, Seibel, failed to inform appellant that Craig was required to attend the mediation and instead erroneously assured appellant that sending its highest ranking manager in Missouri was sufficient. * * * This argument incorrectly frames the issue because the problem was not the rank of the corporate representative but the corporate representative’s ability to meaningfully participate in the ADR conference and to reconsider the company’s position on settlement at that conference.

² “Pre-Trial Report of Judge Van Dusen

Date Pre-Trial Held: 9/21/59 No. on Consolidated List: 2109 303 of 1958 in Admiralty

Case Title: Hosea Payne v. S.S. Nabob & North German Lloyd v. Lavino Shipping Co.

1.Trial Counsel: LC Philip Dorfman, Esq. & Saul C. Waldbaum, Esq.

R—Robert A. Hauslohner, Esq. (T. Mount will try)

IR—F. Hastings Griffin, Jr., Esq. (P. Price will try)

2.Amendments: If IR wishes to amend pre-trial memo, notice to be given to undersigned.

3.Discovery: Respondent will answer impleaded respondent’s interrogatories (unexecuted copies to be furnished counsel by September 23).

4.L’s Claim: Ship unseaworthy due to improper port winch on after side at #2 hatch. Brakes would not hold when set in neutral. Port winch on house-fall did not work from early hours of morning. See pre-trial memo.

5.R’s Claim: Sole cause of injuries was L’s negligence and that of his fellow workmen. Two men pushed draft into L and 2 other men said nothing was defective in winches. See pre-trial memo. IR’s position—see pre-trial memo.

6.Stipulations:

7.Issues:

8.Legal Issues:

9.Trial Time: 6 days

Francis L. Van Dusen, J.”

^bThis language has been altered without any substantive change.

^cAlteration in original.

1009

CHAPTER 13

ADJUDICATION WITHOUT TRIAL OR BY SPECIAL PROCEEDING

This chapter examines procedures that may dispose of a lawsuit without a trial. The main focus is Federal Rule 56, which allows a court to enter judgment as a matter of law if there are no material issues of fact in dispute. The materials also cover voluntary and involuntary dismissals and default judgments. Initially, courts used Rule 56 cautiously, only “to weed out frivolous and sham cases, and cases for which the law had a quick and definitive answer.” Wald, Summary Judgment at Sixty, 76 Tex.L.Rev. 1897, 1897 (1998). However, in 1986, the Supreme Court decided a trilogy of cases that encouraged greater use of summary judgment—Celotex v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 106 S.Ct. 2548, 91 L.Ed.2d 265; Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 91 L.Ed.2d 202; and Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 89 L.Ed.2d 538. See Langbein, The Disappearance of Civil Trial in the United States, 122 Yale L.J. 522 (2012). Unquestionably, summary disposition can save time and money. However, critics warn that a “hyperactive” use of Rule 56 and other short-cut procedures “threatens longstanding constitutional values.” Miller, The Pretrial Rush to Judgment: Are the “Litigation Explosion,” “Liability Crisis,” and Efficiency Clichés Eroding Our Day in Court and Jury Trial Commitments?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982, 983 (2003).

A. SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

1. SUMMARY JUDGMENT: A SHORT HISTORY

FRIEDENTHAL & GARDNER, JUDICIAL DISCRETION TO DENY SUMMARY JUDGMENT IN THE ERA OF MANAGERIAL JUDGING, 31 Hofstra L.Rev. 91, 96 (2002) (footnotes omitted):

1010

Modern summary judgment has its root in nineteenth century English law. Both the 1855 Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, more commonly known as Keating’s Act, and the Judicature Act of 1873 allowed plaintiffs summary adjudication in their collection of liquidated claims when they demonstrated no dispute as to the terms of an agreement to provide goods or services, the actual provision of those goods or services, and nonpayment. The purpose of these acts was to “reduce delay and expense resulting from frivolous defenses.” Although forms of summary proceedings existed in the United States as early as 1769, several states enacted summary judgment statutes based on the English model in the late 1800s. These American statutes were similar to the English Acts in that they were limited to use by plaintiffs and could only be used for claims appropriately resolved by documentary proof. Initially, judges expressed reluctance in granting summary judgment motions, viewing summary judgment as a drastic remedy. Yet by the mid-1920s, judges granted more than half of such motions before them.

MILLER, THE PRETRIAL RUSH TO JUDGMENT: ARE THE “LITIGATION EXPLOSION,” “LIABILITY CRISIS,” AND EFFICIENCY CLICHÉS ERODING OUR DAY IN COURT AND JURY TRIAL COMMITMENTS?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982, 1019–23 (2003) (footnotes omitted):

Since its promulgation, Rule 56 has been the subject of periodic debate, as first exemplified in the 1940s by the opinions of two extremely distinguished Second Circuit judges, Charles E. Clark and Jerome N. Frank, in Arnstein v. Porter, [154 F.2d 464 (2d Cir. 1946),] an action charging one of America’s greatest songwriters with the infringement of musical copyrights of an apparently litigious plaintiff. Judge Frank, writing for the majority, decided against summary judgment and in favor of trial, stating that the “[p]laintiff must not be deprived of the invaluable privilege of cross-examining the defendant—the ‘crucial test of credibility’—in the presence of the jury.” Although finding composer Ira Arnstein’s theory about Cole Porter’s plagiarism to be highly implausible, Judge Frank held that it raised a credibility question requiring a jury’s determination, and that summary judgment should not be granted when there was the “slightest doubt as to the facts.” He was concerned that liberal utilization of the motion would allow judges to usurp the role of juries, and would “favor unduly the party with the more ingenious and better paid lawyer.” * * * He also expressed the sentiment that use of summary procedures in the name of clearing crowded dockets unjustly deprived litigants of their day in court.

Conversely, Judge Clark argued that summary judgment was “more necessary in the system of simple pleading now enforced in the federal courts” to avoid useless and unnecessary trials. He disagreed with an across-the-board limitation on summary judgment that would prevent it from being granted whenever credibility issues were crucial, and he accused his colleague of judicially amending the Rules, stating that “the clear-cut provisions of F.R. 56 conspicuously do not contain either a restriction on the kinds of actions to which it is applicable (unlike most state summary procedures) or any presumption against its use.” He also mounted a vigorous assault on Judge Frank’s “slightest doubt” standard, commenting in a later writing that “a slight doubt can be developed as to practically all things human.” A narrow construction of the Rule, in his view, would encourage trials for the purpose of harassment and mean that the federal courts were endorsing the “obvious tendency to force settlement of the claim not because it is just, but because contesting it has become too costly or too inconvenient.”

1011

* * *

The Supreme Court seemed to adopt Judge Frank’s philosophy of discouraging summary judgment by urging courts to apply it cautiously, keeping in mind the importance of jury trial, and calling for even greater restraint in lawsuits involving state-of-mind questions and complex issues. The paradigm case, Poller v. CBS, Inc., involved a private antitrust action brought against CBS alleging conspiracy to restrain and monopolize trade in violation of the Sherman Act by canceling its affiliation with a UHF station to drive the plaintiff out of business.²²¹ The District of Columbia District Court granted the defendant’s summary judgment motion alleging lack of the illicit motive required to prove a Sherman Act violation. * * * The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia affirmed, * * * but the Supreme Court reversed, with Justice Clark writing that:

[S]ummary procedures should be used sparingly in complex antitrust litigation where motive and intent play leading roles, the proof is largely in the hands of the alleged conspirators, and hostile witnesses thicken the plot. It is only when the witnesses are present and subject to cross-examination that their credibility and the weight to be given their testimony can be appraised. Trial by affidavit is no substitute for trial by jury which so long has been the hallmark of “even handed justice.” * * *

* * * Poller had a decidedly dampening effect on summary judgment in the federal courts; indeed, the reported decisions reveal few cases of any complexity adjudicated under Rule 56 during the succeeding two decades.

1012

2.THE MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT UNDER FEDERAL RULE 56

The fact that a complaint survives a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim does not mean that plaintiff will prevail in the action. It means only that plaintiff has the opportunity to move to discovery and to trial. At trial plaintiff must produce evidence establishing the truth of the allegations set out in the complaint and persuade the decision-maker of an entitlement to relief. Thus, in order to win, plaintiff must meet the trial burden of production and burden of persuasion. The Rule 56 motion tests whether facts are in dispute and a trial is needed to resolve them. As the First Circuit has put it, summary judgment is “a means of avoiding full-dress trials in unwinnable cases, thereby freeing courts to utilize scarce judicial resources in more beneficial ways.” Mesnick v. Gen. Elec. Co., 950 F.2d 816, 822 (1st Cir. 1991).

Any party—plaintiff or defendant, claimant, crossclaimant, or counter-claimant—may move for summary judgment under Federal Rule 56. Judgment can be sought as to the entire claim or defense, or parts of a claim or defense. In either situation, the motion directs the court to evidence, drawn from the discovery record and affidavits, but it is not intended to replace the trial. Consistent with the Seventh Amendment, the court is expected to draw reasonable inferences in favor of the party opposing the motion, but is not permitted to weigh the evidence or assess its credibility.

NOTE ON FEDERAL RULE 56 BURDENS

The Rule 56 burden tracks the trial burden of production and persuasion, although the movant carries an initial burden of showing the absence of a genuine dispute about a material issue of fact. The Supreme Court has made clear that “the mere existence of some alleged factual dispute between the parties will not defeat an otherwise properly supported motion for summary judgment.” Rather, what is material is determined by the substantive law that governs the claim. “Only disputes over facts that might affect the outcome of the suit under the governing law will properly preclude the entry of summary judgment.” Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 247–48, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 2510, 91 L.Ed.2d 202, 211 (1986).

a.Burden of Production

In a civil action, the burden of production, sometimes called the burden of proof or of going forward, usually is placed on plaintiff in civil actions. This means that plaintiff is responsible for “producing” a certain threshold amount of evidence to raise a claim. However, defendant must normally meet the burden of production with respect to affirmative defenses. The threshold is defined as the minimum amount of evidence needed to satisfy the standard of proof and, thus, to win the case. Put another way, one has met the burden of production if the party has produced enough evidence for a reasonable jury to decide in its favor. Therefore, one can meet the burden of production even if all the evidence produced is refuted by the opposing party.

1013

Meeting the burden of production does not ensure victory—one must still “persuade” the factfinder—but failing to meet it will ensure defeat. If the party charged with the burden of production has failed to adduce enough evidence, a summary judgment motion (prior to trial) or a motion for judgment as a matter of law (at trial) will be granted. The burden of production must be met if the case is to be decided by the trier of fact.

b.Burden of Persuasion

If the burden of production is met, the case can move forward to the stage of persuasion. Once there is enough evidence for plaintiff to win, defendant will try to cast doubt on the credibility or reliability of that evidence, in addition to bringing forth evidence of its own. Each party will try to persuade the trier of fact that its evidence is more weighty than the other's. If plaintiff has the burden of persuasion, and does not convince the jury (or judge, in a bench trial) by the standard of proof required, the jury must rule for defendant. Even if plaintiff has satisfied the burden of production and defendant brings forth no evidence of his own, if the jury is not persuaded that plaintiff's evidence is sufficiently reliable or credible, defendant must prevail.

ADICKES v. S. H. KRESS & CO., 398 U.S. 144, 90 S.Ct. 1598, 26 L.Ed.2d 142 (1970), involved a civil rights claim filed by a white New York City school teacher who had volunteered to teach at a "Freedom School" in Hattiesburg, Mississippi during the summer of 1964. The district court found the following undisputed facts:

On August 14, 1964, plaintiff and six Negro students sought to integrate the Hattiesburg Public Library, but were refused the use of its facilities and shortly thereafter the library was closed by the Chief of Police of Hattiesburg. On leaving the library, plaintiff and the six students proceeded to a Woolworth store for the purposes of eating lunch and, on the way, plaintiff observed policemen following them. Since the Woolworth store was crowded, the plaintiff and her group went to defendant's store and sat down in two lunch booths and ordered lunch. The waitress took the orders of the six Negroes, but refused to take plaintiff's order. The six Negroes refused to eat unless plaintiff was served. They left the store and had proceeded only a short distance when a police officer, previously observed by plaintiff, arrested her for vagrancy.

1014

Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., 252 F.Supp. 140, 142 (S.D.N.Y. 1966). Plaintiff's complaint raised two claims: first, that the denial of restaurant service violated her civil rights; and second, that the refusal to serve and her subsequent arrest were the result of a conspiracy between defendant and the town police.

Kress moved for summary judgment, and supported its motion with affidavits from the store manager, the chief of police, and the arresting officers denying the existence of a pre-arranged scheme to arrest Adickes after she was denied service. The store manager's affidavit also stated that he had arranged for Adickes not to be served because he believed a riot would otherwise take place. In opposing the motion, Adickes responded by pressing her circumstantial case. She noted the allegation in the complaint that the policeman who arrested her had earlier been in the store, and pointed out that defendant had failed to dispute this allegation. She adduced her sworn deposition testimony that one of her students had seen a policeman come into the restaurant and she offered an unsworn statement by a Kress employee (given by Kress to Adickes in discovery) stating that the officer who arrested Adickes once she was outside the restaurant had been in the store before she was refused service. Adickes also submitted an affidavit disputing the store manager's statement that serving her would have created a riot.

The district court denied the motion with respect to the first count, but granted summary judgment on the second, finding that there was "no evidence in the complaint or in the affidavits and other papers from which a 'reasonably-minded person' might draw an inference of conspiracy." Id. at 144. The Second Circuit affirmed, 409 F.2d 121, 126-27 (2d Cir. 1968). The Supreme Court reversed, finding that the movant had not met its procedural burden of showing "the absence of any disputed material fact." 398 U.S. at 148, 90 S.Ct. at 1603, 26 L.Ed.2d at 149. The Court stated:

* * * [Kress] did not carry its burden because of its failure to foreclose the possibility that there was a policeman in the Kress store while petitioner was awaiting service, and that this policeman reached an understanding with some Kress employee that petitioner not be served.

It is true that * * * [the store manager] claimed in his deposition that he had not seen or communicated with a policeman prior to his tacit signal to * * * the supervisor of the food counter [not to serve Adickes]. But respondent did not submit any affidavits from * * * [the supervisor of the food counter], or from * * * the waitress who actually refused petitioner service, either of whom might well have seen and communicated with a policeman in the store. Further, we find it particularly noteworthy that the two officers involved in the arrest each failed in his affidavit to foreclose the possibility (1) that he was in the store while petitioner was there; and (2) that, upon seeing petitioner with Negroes, he communicated his disapproval to a Kress employee, thereby influencing the decision not to serve petitioner.

1015

Given these unexplained gaps in the materials submitted by respondent, we conclude that respondent failed to fulfill its initial burden of demonstrating what is a critical element in this aspect of the case—that there was no policeman in the store. If a policeman were present, we think it would be open to a jury, in light of the sequence that followed, to infer from the circumstances that the policeman and a Kress employee had a "meeting of the minds" and thus reached an understanding that petitioner should be refused service. Because "[o]n summary judgment the inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts contained in [the moving party's] materials must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion," * * * we think respondent's failure to show there was no policeman in the store requires reversal.

Id. at 158, 90 S.Ct. at 1609, 26 L.Ed.2d at 159.

The Court rejected Kress’s argument that because the form of plaintiff’s evidence did not satisfy Rule 56(e)^a—for example, the deposition was hearsay and the waitress’s statement was unsworn—plaintiff could not avoid summary judgment.

If respondent had met its initial burden by, for example, submitting affidavits from the policemen denying their presence in the store at the time in question, Rule 56(e) would then have required petitioner to have done more than simply rely on the contrary allegation in her complaint. To have avoided conceding this fact for purposes of summary judgment, petitioner would have had to come forward with either (1) the affidavit of someone who saw the policeman in the store or (2) an affidavit under Rule 56(f)^b explaining why at that time it was impractical to do so. Even though not essential here to defeat respondent’s motion, the submission of such an affidavit would have been the preferable course for petitioner’s counsel to have followed.

Id. at 159–60, 90 S.Ct. at 1609–10, 26 L.Ed.2d at 155–56.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Adickes what facts were material to the Rule 56 motion? Are these the same facts that plaintiff had to allege to survive a motion to dismiss? Are they the same facts that plaintiff would have to prove to win her case?

2.What burden did Adickes place on defendant moving for summary judgment? Was summary judgment denied because defendant failed to “foreclose the possibility” of a material fact? By imposing this burden on the movant did the court effectively shift the trial burden onto defendant by requiring that party to negate the existence of material issues? See Louis, Federal Summary Judgment Doctrine: A Critical Analysis, 83 Yale L.J. 745, 751–53 (1974).

3.After Adickes, district courts generally asked whether a movant who did not have the trial burden had “sufficiently established the non-existence of any material fact.” According to Professor Friedenthal:

The moving party had been obligated to come forward with some information, in most cases affidavits containing testimony that would be presented at trial. The responding party was then permitted to avoid summary judgment without showing that he or she could meet the burden of production at trial, merely by attacking the veracity of the moving party’s affiants or the form of the moving party’s supporting papers.

Friedenthal, Cases on Summary Judgment: Has There Been a Material Change in Standards?, 63 Notre Dame L.Rev. 770, 776 (1988). Why should even a minimal burden be placed on the Rule 56 movant who does not have the trial burden? Consider this explanation:

There would appear to be two reasons for placing some requirements on a moving party who does not have the burden of production at trial. First, there are many cases, undoubtedly the vast majority, in which the litigants are fully aware that the party with the burden of production is able to call witnesses on its behalf who will carry its burden of producing evidence. Any “automatic” rule requiring all such parties to make a showing would be extremely wasteful. If one party could, merely by filing an unsupported motion, force an opponent to make a substantial showing, there would be a strong incentive to make such a filing, if for no other reason than to harass the other party and raise its costs of litigation. The purpose of summary judgment is to save the courts and the litigants from the burdens of trying cases where no genuine dispute exists, not to raise the stakes by meaningless procedural devices. Second, there are a number of actions in which the party with the burden of proof can only establish its case through circumstantial evidence—a painstaking, item-by-item, process. It would be costly and unfair to require the responding party to go through that process at the pretrial stage, by taking numerous depositions of reluctant witnesses, obtaining affidavits from a large number of cooperating witnesses, and preparing documents for admission into evidence, unless there is some sound reason to doubt that the respondent will be able to establish such a case at trial.

Id. at 776–77. Does the language of the rule impose this burden? Is the requirement a matter of policy? Does it reflect the influence even if not the command of the Seventh Amendment?

4. Does the question of the existence of a conspiracy, which turns on the state of mind of the participants, inevitably depend on credibility issues that ought to be decided by the jury?

5.Did Adickes address the burden placed on the party opposing the motion for summary judgment? Of what significance is the Court’s dictum that defendant’s uncontroverted affidavit denying the officer’s presence in the store would have required summary judgment for defendant, unless plaintiff came forward with evidence to refute defendant’s showing? In the wake of Adickes, an important commentator urged that Rule 56 be amended “to make clear that a motion for summary judgment, without more, puts an opposing party with the burden of proof to the task of producing evidence sufficient to sustain a favorable verdict.” As he explained:

[T]he Adickes dictum that an uncontradicted affidavit asserting the policeman’s absence would have justified summary judgment seems correct in policy but not, as the Court intimated, because such an affidavit would have foreclosed a jury finding that a policeman was in the store. Rather, although a jury might have been entitled to disbelieve the arguably interested testimony of a policeman or of a store employee, its doing so would nevertheless have left the plaintiff subject to a directed verdict for failure to satisfy her burden of proof.

See Currie, Thoughts on Directed Verdicts and Summary Judgments, 45 U.Chi.L.Rev. 72, 78 (1977).

CELOTEX CORP. v. CATRETT
 Supreme Court of the United States, 1986.
477 U.S. 317, 106 S.Ct. 2548, 91 L.Ed.2d 265.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

[Respondent Myrtle Nell Catrett filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia in September 1980, alleging that the death in 1979 of her husband, Louis H. Catrett, resulted from his exposure to products containing asbestos manufactured or distributed by 15 named corporations, including Petitioner Celotex. Catrett’s complaint sounded in negligence, breach of warranty, and strict liability. In September 1981, Celotex moved for summary judgment on the ground that Catrett had “failed to produce evidence that any [Celotex] product * * * was the proximate cause of the injuries alleged within the jurisdictional limits of [the District] Court.” In support of its summary judgment motion, Celotex noted that Catrett had failed to identify, in answering interrogatories specifically requesting such information, any witnesses who could testify about Louis Catrett’s exposure to Celotex’s asbestos products.

1018

Catrett opposed the motion by producing three documents that she claimed would “demonstrate that there is a genuine material factual dispute” as to whether Louis Catrett had been exposed to Celotex’s asbestos products. The first document was a transcript of Louis Catrett’s testimony in a worker’s compensation proceeding in which he indicated his exposure to a product called “Firebar,” which was manufactured by a corporate predecessor of Celotex, when he worked for a company named Anning-Johnson. The second document was a letter from T.R. Hoff, the Assistant Secretary of Anning-Johnson, to an Aetna insurance agent reporting on Catrett’s employment with Anning-Johnson. The third document was a letter from the Aetna agent, O’Keefe, to Mrs. Catrett’s counsel essentially restating the contents of Hoff’s letter. Catrett argued that, because Celotex supplied the asbestos used by Anning-Johnson, all three documents tended to establish her husband’s exposure to Celotex’s product.

The district court granted Celotex’s motion because “there [was] no showing that the plaintiff was exposed to the defendant Celotex’s product in the District of Columbia or elsewhere within the statutory period.” On appeal, a divided panel of the D.C. Circuit reversed and held that Celotex’s summary judgment motion was rendered “fatally defective” by the fact that Celotex “made no effort to adduce any evidence, in the form of affidavits or otherwise, to support its motion.” The panel majority read Rule 56 and the Supreme Court’s decision in Adickes v. S.H. Kress & Co. to establish that “the party opposing the motion for summary judgment bears the burden of responding only after the moving party has met its burden of coming forward with proof of the absence of any genuine issues of material fact.” The majority therefore declined to consider Celotex’s argument that none of the evidence produced by Catrett in opposition to the motion for summary judgment would have been admissible at trial.]

* * *

We think that the position taken by the majority of the Court of Appeals is inconsistent with the standard for summary judgment set forth in Rule 56(c) * * *.^c In our view, the plain language of [the] Rule * * * mandates the entry of summary judgment, after adequate time for discovery and upon motion, against a party who fails to make a showing sufficient to establish the existence of an element essential to that party’s case, and on which that party will bear the burden of proof at trial. * * *

1019

Of course, a party seeking summary judgment always bears the initial responsibility of informing the district court of the basis for its motion, and identifying those portions of “the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any,” which it believes demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. But unlike the Court of Appeals, we find no express or implied requirement in Rule 56 that the moving party support its motion with affidavits or other similar materials negating the opponent’s claim. * * * [R]egardless of whether the moving party accompanies its summary judgment motion with affidavits, the motion may, and should, be granted so long as whatever is before the district court demonstrates that the standard for the entry of summary judgment * * * is satisfied. One of the principal purposes of the summary judgment rule is to isolate and dispose of factually unsupported claims or defenses, and we think it should be interpreted in a way that allows it to accomplish this purpose.

Respondent argues, however, that Rule 56 * * *, by its terms, places on the nonmoving party the burden of coming forward with rebuttal affidavits, or other specified kinds of materials, only in response to a motion for summary judgment “made and supported as provided in this rule.” According to respondent’s argument, since petitioner did not “support” its motion with affidavits, summary judgment was improper in this case. * * * In cases like the instant one, where the nonmoving party will bear the burden of proof at trial on a dispositive issue, a summary judgment motion may properly be made in reliance solely on the “pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file.” Such a motion, whether or not accompanied by affidavits, will be “made and supported as provided in this rule,” and Rule 56(e)^d therefore requires the nonmoving party to go beyond the pleadings and by her own affidavits, or by the “depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file,” designate “specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.”

* * *

The Court of Appeals in this case felt itself constrained, however, by language in our decision in Adickes * * *. In the course of its opinion, the Adickes Court said that “both the commentary on and the background of the 1963 Amendment conclusively show that it was not intended to modify the burden of the moving party . . . to show initially the absence of a genuine issue concerning any material fact.” * * * We think that this statement is accurate in a literal sense, since we fully agree with the Adickes Court that the 1963 Amendment to Rule 56 * * * was not designed to modify the burden of making [such a] * * * showing * * *. It also appears to us that, on the basis of the showing before the Court in Adickes, the motion for summary judgment in that case should have been denied. But we do not think the Adickes language quoted above should be construed to mean that the burden is on the party moving for summary judgment to produce evidence showing the absence of a genuine issue of material fact, even with respect to an issue on which the nonmoving party bears the burden of proof. Instead, as we have explained, the burden on the moving party may be discharged by “showing”—that is, pointing out to the District Court—that there is an absence of evidence to support the nonmoving party’s case.

1020

* * *

Respondent commenced this action in September 1980, and petitioner’s motion was filed in September 1981. The parties had conducted discovery, and no serious claim can be made that respondent was in any sense “railroaded” by a premature motion for summary judgment. Any potential problem with such premature motions can be adequately dealt with under Rule 56(f)⁶, which allows a summary judgment motion to be denied, or the hearing on the motion to be continued, if the nonmoving party has not had an opportunity to make full discovery.

In this Court, respondent’s brief and oral argument have been devoted as much to the proposition that an adequate showing of exposure to petitioner’s asbestos products was made as to the proposition that no such showing should have been required. But the Court of Appeals declined to address either the adequacy of the showing made by respondent in opposition to petitioner’s motion for summary judgment, or the question whether such a showing, if reduced to admissible evidence, would be sufficient to carry respondent’s burden of proof at trial. We think the Court of Appeals with its superior knowledge of local law is better suited than we are to make these determinations in the first instance.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have for more than 50 years authorized motions for summary judgment upon proper showings of the lack of a genuine, triable issue of material fact. Summary judgment procedure is properly regarded not as a disfavored procedural shortcut, but rather as an integral part of the Federal Rules as a whole, which are designed “to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action.” * * * Before the shift to “notice pleading” accomplished by the Federal Rules, motions to dismiss a complaint or to strike a defense were the principal tools by which factually insufficient claims or defenses could be isolated and prevented from going to trial with the attendant unwarranted consumption of public and private resources. But with the advent of “notice pleading,” the motion to dismiss seldom fulfills this function any more, and its place has been taken by the motion for summary judgment. Rule 56 must be construed with due regard not only for the rights of persons asserting claims and defenses that are adequately based in fact to have those claims and defenses tried to a jury, but also for the rights of persons opposing such claims and defenses to demonstrate in the manner provided by the Rule, prior to trial, that the claims and defenses have no factual basis.

1021

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is accordingly reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE WHITE, concurring.

I agree that the Court of Appeals was wrong in holding that the moving defendant must always support his motion with evidence or affidavits showing the absence of a genuine dispute about a material fact. I also agree that the movant may rely on depositions, answers to interrogatories and the like to demonstrate that the plaintiff has no evidence to prove his case and hence that there can be no factual dispute. But the movant must discharge the burden the rules place upon him: It is not enough to move for summary judgment without supporting the motion in any way or with a conclusory assertion that the plaintiff has no evidence to prove his case.

* * *

Petitioner Celotex does not dispute that if respondent has named a witness to support her claim, summary judgment should not be granted without Celotex somehow showing that the named witness’ possible testimony raises no genuine issue of material fact. * * * It asserts, however, that respondent has failed on request to produce any basis for her case. Respondent, on the other hand, does not contend that she was not obligated to reveal her witnesses and evidence but insists that she has revealed enough to defeat the motion for summary judgment. Because the Court of Appeals found it unnecessary to address this aspect of the case, I agree that the case should be remanded for further proceedings.

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, dissenting.

This case requires the Court to determine whether Celotex satisfied its initial burden of production in moving for summary judgment on the ground that the plaintiff lacked evidence to establish an essential element of her case at trial. I do not disagree with the Court’s legal analysis. The Court clearly rejects the ruling of the Court of Appeals that the defendant must provide affirmative evidence disproving the plaintiff’s case. Beyond this, however, the Court has not clearly explained what is required of a moving party seeking summary judgment on the ground that the non-moving party cannot prove its case. This lack of clarity is unfortunate: district courts must routinely decide summary judgment motions, and the Court’s opinion will very likely create confusion. For this reason, even if I agreed with the Court’s result, I would have written separately to explain more clearly the law in this area. However, because I believe that Celotex did not meet its burden of production under Federal Rule * * * 56, I respectfully dissent from the Court’s judgment.

1022

I

* * * The burden of establishing the nonexistence of a “genuine issue” is on the party moving for summary judgment. * * * This burden has two distinct components: an initial burden of production, which shifts to the nonmoving party if satisfied by the moving party; and an ultimate burden of persuasion, which always remains on the moving party. * * * The court need not decide whether the moving party has satisfied its ultimate burden of persuasion unless and until the court finds that the moving party has discharged its initial burden of production.

* * *

The manner in which this showing can be made depends upon which party will bear the burden of persuasion on the challenged claim at trial. If the moving party will bear the burden of persuasion at trial that party must support its motion with credible evidence—using any of the material specified in Rule 56(c)—that would entitle it to a directed verdict if not controverted at trial. * * * Such an affirmative showing shifts the burden of production to the party opposing the motion and requires that party either to produce evidentiary materials that demonstrate the existence of a “genuine issue” for trial or to submit an affidavit requesting additional time for discovery. * * *

If the burden of persuasion at trial would be on the non-moving party, the party moving for summary judgment may satisfy Rule 56’s burden of production in either of two ways. First, the moving party may submit affirmative evidence that negates an essential element of the nonmoving party’s claim. Second, the moving party may demonstrate to the Court that the nonmoving party’s evidence is insufficient to establish an essential element of the nonmoving party’s claim. * * * If the nonmoving party cannot muster sufficient evidence to make out its claim, a trial would be useless and the moving party is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law. * * *

Where the moving party adopts this second option and seeks summary judgment on the ground that the nonmoving party—who will bear the burden of persuasion at trial—has no evidence, the mechanics of discharging Rule 56’s burden of production are somewhat trickier. Plainly, a conclusory assertion that the nonmoving party has no evidence is insufficient. * * * Such a “burden” of production is no burden at all and would simply permit summary judgment procedure to be converted into a tool for harassment. * * * Rather, as the Court confirms, a party who moves for summary judgment on the ground that the nonmoving party has no evidence must affirmatively show the absence of evidence in the record. * * * This may require the moving party to depose the nonmoving party’s witnesses or to establish the inadequacy of documentary evidence. If there is literally no evidence in the record, the moving party may demonstrate this by reviewing for the court the admissions, interrogatories and other exchanges between the parties that are in the record. Either way, however, the moving party must affirmatively demonstrate that there is no evidence in the record to support a judgment for the nonmoving party.

1023

If the moving party has not fully discharged this initial burden of production, its motion for summary judgment must be denied, and the Court need not consider whether the moving party has met its ultimate burden of persuasion. Accordingly, the nonmoving party may defeat a motion for summary judgment that asserts that the nonmoving party has no evidence by calling the Court’s attention to supporting evidence already in the record that was overlooked or ignored by the moving party.

* * *

II

I do not read the Court’s opinion to say anything inconsistent with or different than the preceding discussion. My disagreement with the Court concerns the application of these principles to the facts of this case.

* * *

On these facts, there is simply no question that Celotex failed to discharge its initial burden of production. Having chosen to base its motion on the argument that there was no evidence in the record to support plaintiff’s claim, Celotex was not free to ignore supporting evidence that the record clearly contained. Rather, Celotex was required, as an initial matter, to attack the adequacy of this evidence. Celotex’ failure to fulfill this simple requirement constituted a failure to discharge its initial burden of production under Rule 56, and thereby rendered summary judgment improper.

* * *

[A dissenting opinion by JUSTICE STEVENS is omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. On remand to the court of appeals, a divided panel found that plaintiff had produced sufficient evidence of exposure and, therefore, that summary judgment was inappropriate. See Catrett v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 826 F.2d 33 \(D.C. Cir. 1987\), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1066, 108 S.Ct. 1028, 98 L.Ed.2d 992 (1988). Celotex argued that the three documents relied on by

1024

Mrs. Catrett—the transcript of Louis Catrett’s testimony in the worker’s compensation proceeding, the Hoff letter, and the O’Keefe letter—were inadmissible hearsay, out-of-court statements that are inadmissible at trial, and thus should not be considered on the Rule 56 motion. The panel majority rejected that argument with respect to the Hoff letter. Judge Starr, writing for the majority, stated:

In the circumstances of this case, we believe that the Hoff letter should be considered. The inadmissibility of the letter, despite Celotex’s contention to the contrary, is by no means obvious (although we need not and do not pass judgment on its admissibility). Mrs. Catrett argues that the * * * Hoff letter is admissible as falling within the business records exception to the hearsay rule. See Fed.R.Evid. 803(6). More importantly, Celotex never objected to the District Court’s consideration of the Hoff letter. To the contrary, in the hearing on Celotex’s two motions, counsel for Celotex discussed in detail the substance of the Hoff letter, and at one point the letter was handed in open court to the District Judge (at his request) for his examination. * * *

Since it is well established that “inadmissible documents may be considered by the court if not challenged,” * * * we are satisfied that the Hoff letter is properly (at this stage) to be considered in assessing whether a genuine issue of fact exists.

* * * [Moreover, i]n her supplemental interrogatory responses, Mrs. Catrett listed Hoff as a witness. There can, of course, be no doubt that this response is properly considered in ruling on a summary judgment motion. * * * Taking this response together with the Hoff letter, the record, dispassionately viewed, reflects the existence of a witness who can testify with respect to Mr. Catrett’s exposure to Firebar. Thus, even if the Hoff letter itself would not be admissible at trial, Mrs. Catrett has gone on to indicate that the substance of the letter is reducible to admissible evidence in the form of trial testimony. * * *

Id. at 37–38. Judge Bork, in dissent, wrote:

* * * [P]laintiff has not identified “specific facts” that would indicate such exposure occurred, and I certainly think that plaintiff has not made the kind of showing necessary to defeat a directed verdict motion. I would therefore grant defendant’s motion for summary judgment.

* * *

* * * [T]he mere listing of a potential witness, without more, does not constitute setting forth specific facts. Here plaintiff has never claimed that Mr. Hoff has any personal knowledge that her husband was exposed to asbestos during his year of work at this company, and indeed did not specify the grounds of his possible testimony at all, except to say that he would be able to testify about “facts relevant to the subject matter of this lawsuit.” * * * On the other hand, plaintiff has failed ever to answer interrogatories served by defendant that asked for a variety of specific items of information she might have about her husband’s possible exposure to asbestos on any occasion. * * *

1025

The majority concludes, however, that we should interpret plaintiff’s listing of Mr. Hoff as a witness in light of his letter to the insurance company, thereby finding enough evidence to stave off the equivalent of a motion for directed verdict on causation. This conclusion is incorrect for two reasons. First, the sum total of all this “evidence” falls far short of showing, or even suggesting, that anyone has been identified who can testify from personal knowledge about any asbestos exposure. That lack alone requires that defendant’s motion for summary judgment be granted.

In addition, and also dispositive, the letter itself is inadmissible as evidence and thus cannot be considered by this court in evaluating the summary judgment motion. * * * It is settled law that the judge may consider only these specific materials or other evidence that would be admissible at trial. Inadmissible evidence is not to be considered unless, like an affidavit, it is “otherwise provided for” in Rule 56.

Id. at 41.

2. According to the Celotex majority, a Rule 56 movant who does not have the burden of production at trial “bears the initial responsibility” of “informing” the court of the grounds for the motion and “identifying those portions” of the discovery record that show the absence of a material issue of fact. Why is this description of the movant’s burden consistent with Adickes? Consider the following analysis:

* * * [A] party may satisfy the standard for summary judgment by one or both of two methods. First, the movant may, by submitting affirmative evidence, negate an element essential to the opposing party’s claim or defense. Second, the movant may show that the opposing party lacks sufficient evidence to establish an essential element of its claim or defense. Celotex involved the second method exclusively; Adickes, arguably, involved a combination of the two methods. The defendant in Adickes offered affirmative evidence in the form of the deposition of the store manager and affidavits from the involved officers. In addition, the defendant pointed to statements in the plaintiff’s deposition that the plaintiff lacked any knowledge of communications between the police and Kress employees. The inadequacy of Kress’s motion was not its failure to offer affirmative evidence, but rather that the affirmative evidence it offered was insufficient to establish the absence of a genuine issue of a material fact. Adickes, therefore, should not be read as requiring the moving party to negate an essential element of the opposing party’s case by affirmative evidence in every instance. Rather, the decision may be viewed as stating the proposition that the moving party is required to sustain its burden of proving the absence of a genuine issue of a material fact by affirmative evidence only if it must utilize the first method, or a combination of the two methods, of obtaining summary judgment. If the moving party is able to use the second method exclusively, it is only required to show that the opposing party has failed to establish sufficient evidence of an essential element of its claim or defense. Celotex, viewed in this light, is therefore consistent with the Adickes decision. By failing to fully explain this distinction, however, Justice Rehnquist’s statements, while correct in the context of the Celotex decision, appear to eviscerate Adickes and may promote rather than resolve doctrinal confusion.

Foremaster, The Movant’s Burden in a Motion for Summary Judgment, 1987 Utah L.Rev. 731, 748–49.

3.Under Celotex, can a party who does not have the trial burden move for summary judgment and do no more than insist that the opposing party show it can meet its trial burden? Or does Celotex impose an initial burden on the movant to review the discovery record and identify deficiencies in plaintiff’s evidence? Notice that Justice White’s concurring opinion stated that the movant must do more than support the motion with “a conclusory assertion” that plaintiff lacks evidence. In 2010, Rule 56 was amended. How does the current version of Rule 56(c)(3) affect your answer? Note also that the current version of the rule expressly recognizes the court’s power to grant summary judgment sua sponte—independent of any motion by a party—after “giving notice and a reasonable time to respond.” See Rule 56(f).

4. Celotex focused primarily on what a Rule 56 movant must show in order to shift the burden to the opposing party. As the First Circuit has explained, the nonmovant can forestall summary judgment only by presenting “definite, competent evidence,” “sufficiently probative that, if it is credited, a factfinder could resolve the case in favor of the nonmovant.” Murray v. Kindred Nursing Centers West LLC, 789 F.3d 20, 25 (1st Cir. 2015) (internal quotation omitted).

5.Does a court have any discretion to deny a properly supported summary judgment motion? Before Rule 56 was restyled in 2007, its text provided that summary judgment “shall be rendered” when the rule’s requirements are satisfied. In the revised version of what is now Rule 56(a), the Advisory Committee replaced that phrase (in keeping with a style convention that sought to eliminate the word “shall” from the Federal Rules) with “should be rendered.” The choice of “should” rather than “must” reflected a line of cases recognizing a degree of discretion to deny summary judgment. See Friedenthal & Gardner, Judicial Discretion to Deny Summary Judgment in the Era of Managerial Judging, 31 Hofstra L.Rev. 91, 104–10 (2002). The Advisory Committee Note accompanying the restyled rule cautioned, however, that “courts will seldom exercise the discretion to deny summary judgment when there is no genuine issue as to any material fact.” In 2010, Rule 56(a) was amended to restore the use of “shall,” a decision that recognized a division in the case law on whether a district court has such discretion. The Advisory Committee explained that “shall” in Rule 56 had “acquired significance over many decades of use” and that eliminating it “created an unacceptable risk of changing the summary-judgment standard.” Would it be appropriate for a district court to deny summary judgment on the ground that resolution of a legal issue would benefit from the development of the record at trial? Would it matter if a court concludes that resolving the summary judgment motion will be as time-consuming as a trial? See 10A Wright & Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure § 2728 (4th ed.).

The Court’s decision in Celotex framed the moving party’s burden of production on the summary judgment motion in light of that party’s ultimate burden at trial. In a similar way, the second case in the Court’s summary judgment trilogy, Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 91 L.Ed.2d 202, instructed courts to view the summary judgment record through the lens of the applicable standard of proof at trial. The standard for meeting the burden of persuasion represents the quantity and quality of evidence a party must produce at trial to prevail. The three most common standards are (1) preponderance of the evidence, (2) clear and convincing evidence, and (3) beyond a reasonable doubt. These standards usually are not defined any more specifically than their plain meaning suggests, although a “preponderance” is considered to be “more than fifty percent,” and the clear and convincing standard lies somewhere between a preponderance and “beyond a reasonable doubt.” In most civil cases, the party bearing the burden of persuasion must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that she is entitled to the relief requested. On a Rule 56 motion, how should the court decide whether a genuine dispute exists if the trial standard would require clear and convincing evidence?

ANDERSON v. LIBERTY LOBBY, INC., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 91 L.Ed.2d 202 (1986). Liberty Lobby, a non-profit organization, and its founder filed a libel suit against The Investigator magazine, its publisher, and chief executive officer, alleging that defendants published false statements that portrayed plaintiffs as “neo-Nazi, anti-Semitic, racist, and Fascist.” Id. at 245, 106 S.Ct. at 2508, 91 L.Ed.2d at 210. Following discovery, defendants moved for summary judgment on the ground that plaintiffs could not prove by clear and convincing evidence that defendants had acted with knowledge that the statements were false or that they had been made with reckless disregard of whether they were true or false (this is known as the “actual malice” standard and is required in libel cases against public figures under New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 84 S.Ct. 710, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964)). In support of the motion, defendants submitted an affidavit from the author, stating that he had spent a substantial amount of time doing research and writing. His affidavit detailed sources for each of the statements alleged to be false, and affirmed that he believed the facts he reported to be true. Plaintiffs responded to the motion by pointing to numerous claimed inaccuracies in the articles. On the issue of malice, plaintiffs showed that one of the author’s sources was a 12-year-old article published in Time magazine that had been the subject of an earlier libel suit by plaintiff, which had resulted in a settlement by which Time published a favorable article about Liberty Lobby and paid money to its founder, and that one of the co-authors of the Time article was an editor of The Investigator. Plaintiffs also showed that another source was a freelance journalist whom the author had never met and who was not asked to, and never did, identify his sources. Finally, they showed that another editor of The Investigator had told the magazine’s president that the articles were “terrible” and “ridiculous.”

The district court granted the motion for summary judgment. The court of appeals reversed, ruling that it was irrelevant on a motion for summary judgment that the standard for proving actual malice was clear and convincing evidence, rather than a preponderance of evidence. In an opinion written by Justice White, the Court reversed:

* * * [I]n ruling on a motion for summary judgment, the judge must view the evidence presented through the prism of the substantive evidentiary burden. This conclusion is mandated by the nature of this determination. The question here is whether a jury could reasonably find either that the plaintiff proved his case by the quality and quantity of evidence required by the governing law or that he did not. Whether a jury could reasonably find for either party, however, cannot be defined except by the criteria governing what evidence would enable the jury to find for either the plaintiff or the defendant: It makes no sense to say that a jury could reasonably find for either party without some benchmark as to what standards govern its deliberations and within what boundaries its ultimate decision must fall, and these standards and boundaries are in fact provided by the applicable evidentiary standards.

Our holding that the clear-and-convincing standard of proof should be taken into account does not denigrate the role of the jury. It by no means authorizes trial on affidavits. Credibility determinations, the weighing of the evidence, and the drawing of legitimate inferences from the facts are jury functions, not those of a judge, whether he is ruling on a motion for summary judgment or for a directed verdict. The evidence of the non-movant is to be believed, and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor. * * * Neither do we suggest that the trial courts should act other than with caution in granting summary judgment or that the trial court may not deny summary judgment in a case where there is reason to believe that the better course would be to proceed to a full trial. * * *

Id. at 254–56, 106 S.Ct. at 2513–14, 91 L.Ed.2d at 215–16.

On a summary judgment motion, the court must view the record in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. The third decision in the trilogy, Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 89 L.Ed.2d 538, addressed the extent to which a court may draw particular inferences from the record. Consistent with Celotex and Anderson, the Supreme Court in Matsushita instructed lower courts to bear in mind the substantive law that would govern at trial when assessing the permissible inferences that can be drawn from a factual record. In doing so, the Court linked the role of a district court when deciding a pretrial motion for summary judgment under Rule 56 to the court’s role when deciding a motion for judgment as a matter of law at trial under Rule 50. See Chapter 14, infra.

MATSUSHITA ELECTRIC INDUSTRIAL CO. v. ZENITH RADIO CORP., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 89 L.Ed.2d 538 (1986). Plaintiffs, a group of American television manufacturers, alleged that a group of 21 Japanese manufacturers and distributors conspired to fix prices in an effort to monopolize the American market. The trial court granted defendant’s motion for summary judgment, but the Third Circuit reversed. The appeals court found that because there was direct evidence of concerted action, as well as circumstantial evidence that concerted action may have occurred, a factfinder reasonably could have found a conspiracy to engage in predatory pricing. The Supreme Court reversed, emphasizing that antitrust law limited the range of permissible inferences that could be drawn in favor of the nonmovant, and that when a claim is factually improbable, the nonmovant must come forward with more persuasive evidence than usual to defeat summary judgment:

To survive petitioners’ motion for summary judgment, respondents must establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether petitioners entered into an illegal conspiracy that caused respondents to suffer a cognizable injury. * * * This showing has two components. First, respondents must show more than a conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws; they must show an injury to them resulting from the illegal conduct. Respondents charge petitioners with a whole host of conspiracies in restraint of trade. * * * Except for the alleged conspiracy to monopolize the American market through predatory pricing, these alleged conspiracies could not have caused respondents to suffer an “antitrust injury,” * * * because they actually tended to benefit respondents. * * * Therefore, unless, in context, evidence of these “other” conspiracies raises a genuine issue concerning the existence of a predatory pricing conspiracy, that evidence cannot defeat petitioners’ summary judgment motion.

Second, the issue of fact must be “genuine.” * * * When the moving party has carried its burden * * *, its opponent must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. * * *

It follows from these settled principles that if the factual context renders respondents’ claim implausible—if the claim is one that simply makes no economic sense—respondents must come forward with more persuasive evidence to support their claim than would otherwise be necessary. * * *

Respondents correctly note that “[o]n summary judgment the inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts . . . must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion.” * * * But antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a § 1 case. * * * To survive a motion for summary judgment or for a directed verdict, a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of § 1 [of the Sherman Act] must present evidence “that tends to exclude the possibility” that the alleged conspirators acted independently.* * * Respondents in this case, in other words, must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed respondents. * * *

* * *

[T]he absence of any plausible motive to engage in the conduct charged is highly relevant to whether a “genuine issue for trial” exists * * *. Lack of motive bears on the range of permissible conclusions that might be drawn from ambiguous evidence: if petitioners had no rational economic motive to conspire, and if their conduct is consistent with other, equally plausible explanations, the conduct does not give rise to an inference of conspiracy. * * * In sum, in light of the absence of any rational motive to conspire, neither petitioner’s (respondent’s) pricing practices, nor their conduct in the Japanese market, nor their agreements respecting prices and distribution in the American market, suffice to create a “genuine issue for trial.” * * *

1031

Id. at 585–88, 596–97, 106 S.Ct. at 1355–57, 1361, 89 L.Ed.2d at 552–53, 558–59.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Would a rational decision-maker find that a genuine dispute exists if presented with the following evidence?

- (a)Two cars enter an intersection at right angles and strike one another, killing both drivers and all passengers. There are no eyewitnesses to the accident. The only evidence available is that there was a working traffic light; thus one of the drivers, but only one, had to go through a red light.
- (b)X must take a certain pill once a day to remain alive. The pill is highly toxic. To take two within twenty-four hours is fatal. X is found dead in his bedroom and the evidence is clear that he took two pills that day. If X died by accident, his estate will receive a large sum of insurance money; if he committed suicide, the amount will be substantially reduced. Several hours before his death, X made out a new will, substantially different from the one previously in force. It also shows that at about the same time, X made plans to accompany several friends on a fishing trip on the following day.

Problems adapted from: Friedenthal, Cases on Summary Judgment: Has There Been a Material Change in Standards?, 63 Notre Dame L.Rev. 770, 784–86 (1988).

2. In DYER v. MacDOUGALL, 201 F.2d 265, 268–69 (2d Cir. 1952), plaintiff brought suit for slander; defendant was granted summary judgment on the basis of the affidavits of all the persons present when the slanderous statements allegedly had been made. All of the affidavits denied plaintiff’s allegations. The appellate court affirmed:

* * * [A]lthough it is therefore true that in strict theory a party having the affirmative might succeed in convincing a jury of the truth of his allegations in spite of the fact that all the witnesses denied them, we think it plain that a verdict would nevertheless have to be directed against him. This is owing to the fact that otherwise in such cases there could not be an effective appeal from the judge’s disposition of a motion for a directed verdict. He, who has seen and heard the “demeanor” evidence, may have been right or wrong in thinking that it gave rational support to a verdict; yet, since that evidence has disappeared, it will be impossible for an appellate court to say which he was. Thus, he would become the final arbiter in all cases where the evidence of witnesses present in court might be determinative.

1032

SCOTT v. HARRIS, 550 U.S. 372, 127 S.Ct. 1769, 167 L.Ed.2d 686 (2007). Plaintiff Harris suffered severe personal injuries when his vehicle, engaged in a police chase, was forced off the road by defendant Scott, a deputy police officer. Plaintiff alleged that defendant used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Defendant moved for summary judgment raising the defense of qualified immunity, an issue on which he would bear the burden of proof at trial. The district court denied the motion and the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit affirmed.

The Supreme Court reversed as follows:

[Plaintiff's] * * * version of events (unsurprisingly) differs substantially from * * * [defendant's] version. When things are in such a posture courts are required to view the facts and draw reasonable inferences "in the light most favorable to the party opposing the [summary judgment] motion." * * * In qualified immunity cases, this usually means adopting (as the Court of Appeals did here) the plaintiff's version of the facts.

There is, however, an added wrinkle in this case: existence in the record of a videotape capturing the events in question. There are no allegations or indications that this videotape was doctored or altered in any way, nor any contention that what it depicts differs from what actually happened. The videotape quite clearly contradicts the version of the story told by * * * [plaintiff] and adopted by the Court of Appeals. * * * Indeed, reading the lower court's opinion, one gets the impression that * * * [plaintiff], rather than fleeing from police, was attempting to pass his driving test * * *.

The videotape tells quite a different story. * * * Far from [plaintiff] being the cautious and controlled driver the lower court depicts, what we see on the video more closely resembles a Hollywood-style car chase of the most frightening sort, placing police officers and innocent bystanders alike at great risk of serious injury.

At the summary judgment stage, facts must be viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party only if there is a "genuine" dispute as to those facts. * * * When opposing parties tell two different stories, one of which is blatantly contradicted by the record, so that no reasonable jury could believe it, a court should not adopt that version of the facts for purposes of ruling on a motion for summary judgment.

That was the case here with regard to the factual issue whether respondent was driving in such fashion as to endanger human life. Respondent's version of events is so utterly discredited by the record that no reasonable jury could have believed him. The Court of Appeals should not have relied on such visible fiction; it should have viewed the facts in the light depicted by the videotape.

1033

* * *

The car chase that * * * [plaintiff] initiated in this case posed a substantial and immediate risk of serious physical injury to others; no reasonable jury could conclude otherwise. Scott's attempt to terminate the chase by forcing respondent off the road was reasonable, and Scott is entitled to summary judgment.

Id. at 378–81, 127 S.Ct. at 1774–76, 1779, 167 L.Ed.2d at 692–95, 697. Justices Ginsburg and Breyer separately concurred. Justice Stevens, in a dissenting opinion, criticized the other members of the Court for usurping the jury's role:

Relying on a de novo review of a videotape of a portion of a nighttime chase on a lightly traveled road in Georgia where no pedestrians or other "bystanders" were present, buttressed by uninformed speculation about the possible consequences of discontinuing the chase, eight of the jurors on this Court reach a verdict that differs from the views of the judges on both the District Court and the Court of Appeals who are surely more familiar with the hazards of driving on Georgia roads than we are. The Court's justification for this unprecedented departure from our well-settled standard of review of factual determinations made by a district court and affirmed by a court of appeals is based on its mistaken view that the Court of Appeals' description of the facts was "blatantly contradicted by the record" and that respondent's version of the events was "so utterly discredited by the record that no reasonable jury could have believed him." * * *

Rather than supporting the conclusion that what we see on the video "resembles a Hollywood-style car chase of the most frightening sort," * * * the tape actually confirms, rather than contradicts, the lower courts' appraisal of the factual questions at issue. More importantly, * * * it surely does not provide a principled basis for depriving the respondent of his right to have a jury evaluate the question whether the police officers' decision to use deadly force to bring the chase to an end was reasonable.

Id. at 389–90, 127 S.Ct. at 1781–82, 167 L.Ed.2d at 700.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The video at issue in Scott is available on the Supreme Court's website: see <http://www.supremecourt.gov/media/media.aspx/> (site last accessed Dec. 19, 2021). After viewing the video, do you agree with the Court's statement that "no reasonable juror" could find that the driver's flight did not pose a danger to the public?

1034

2. A study based on a sample of more than 1,300 viewers of the Scott video found that although a "fairly substantial majority did interpret the facts the way the Court did," this view generally was not shared by African Americans, low-income workers, residents of the Northeast, and persons who identified themselves as Democrats, who tended to view the facts in a light more favorable to the plaintiff. Based on these findings, the authors have criticized the decision in Scott for terminating the case on summary judgment:

* * * Although an admitted minority of American society, citizens disposed to see the facts differently from the Scott majority share a perspective founded on common experiences and values. By insisting that a case like Scott be decided summarily, the Court not only denied those citizens an opportunity, in the context of jury deliberations, to inform and possibly change the view of citizens endowed with a different perspective. It also needlessly bound the result in the case to a process of decisionmaking that deprived the decision of any prospect of legitimacy in the eyes of that subcommunity whose members saw the facts differently.

Kahan, Hoffman & Braman, Whose Eyes Are You Going To Believe? Scott v. Harris and the Perils of Cognitive Illiberalism, 122 Harv.L.Rev. 837, 841–42 (2009).

3. TOLAN v. COTTON, 572 U.S. 650, 134 S.Ct. 1861, 188 L.Ed.2d 895 (2014), was a civil rights action against a police officer alleging the use of excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Defendant moved for summary judgment; the district court granted the motion, and the court of appeals affirmed. The Supreme Court, per curiam, vacated and remanded:

* * * [T]he court below credited the evidence of the party seeking summary judgment and failed properly to acknowledge key evidence offered by the party opposing that motion. And while “this Court is not equipped to correct every perceived error coming from the lower federal courts,” * * * we intervene here because the opinion below reflects a clear misapprehension of summary judgment standards in light of our precedents. * * *

The witnesses on both sides come to this case with their own perceptions, recollections, and even potential biases. It is in part for that reason that genuine disputes are generally resolved by juries in our adversarial system. By weighing the evidence and reaching factual inferences contrary to Tolan’s competent evidence, the court below neglected to adhere to the fundamental principle that at the summary judgment stage, reasonable inferences should be drawn in favor of the nonmoving party.

Applying that principle here, the court should have acknowledged and credited Tolan’s evidence with regard to the lighting, his mother’s demeanor, whether he shouted words that were an overt threat, and his positioning during the shooting. This is not to say, of course, that these are the only facts that the Fifth Circuit should consider, or that no other facts might contribute to the reasonableness of the officer’s actions as a matter of law. Nor do we express a view as to whether Cotton’s actions violated clearly established law. We instead vacate the Fifth Circuit’s judgment so that the court can determine whether, when Tolan’s evidence is properly credited and factual inferences are reasonably drawn in his favor, Cotton’s actions violated clearly established law.

1035

Id. at 660, 134 S.Ct. at 1867–68, 188 L.Ed.2d at 902–03. Justice Alito, joined by Justice Scalia, concurred in the judgment:

In my experience, a substantial percentage of the civil appeals heard each year by the courts of appeals present the question whether the evidence in the summary judgment record is just enough or not quite enough to support a grant of summary judgment. The present case falls into that very large category. There is no confusion in the courts of appeals about the standard to be applied in ruling on a summary judgment motion, and the Court of Appeals invoked the correct standard here. * * * Thus, the only issue is whether the relevant evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, is sufficient to support a judgment for that party. In the courts of appeals, cases presenting this question are utterly routine. There is no question that this case is important for the parties, but the same is true for a great many other cases that fall into the same category.

On the merits of the case, while I do not necessarily agree in all respects with the Court’s characterization of the evidence, I agree that there are genuine issues of material fact and that this is a case in which summary judgment should not have been granted.

Id. at 661–62, 134 S.Ct. at 1868–69, 188 L.Ed.2d at 904. By contrast, in PLUMHOFF v. RICKARD, 572 U.S. 765, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 188 L.Ed.2d 1056 (2014), also a civil rights action alleging use of excessive force by a police officer, the Supreme Court reversed the denial of the officer’s motion for summary judgment. For a discussion of the Court’s approach to video evidence in these cases, see Wasserman, Mixed Signals on Summary Judgment, 2014 Mich.St.L.Rev. 1331 (2015).

4. The Supreme Court has characterized the standard for avoiding summary judgment as “relatively lenient.” AMGEN INC. v. CONNECTICUT RETIREMENT PLANS AND TRUST FUNDS, 568 U.S. 455, 480, 135 S.Ct. 1184, 1203, 185 L.Ed.2d 308, 328 (2013). Some studies suggest that there has not been a significant increase in the grant of summary judgment motions in the wake of Celotex, Anderson, and Matsushita, but this may be because Rule 12(b)(6) now plays an early and robust role in filtering out cases pretrial. See Eisenberg & Clermont, Plaintiphobia in the Supreme Court, 100 Cornell L.Rev. 193 (2014). Moreover, the trilogy has had an uneven effect; civil rights claims, for example, appear to be disproportionately terminated by Rule 56 motions. See Gertner, Losers’ Rules, 122 Yale L.J.Online 109 (2012); Schneider, The Dangers of Summary Judgment: Gender and Federal Litigation, 59 Rutgers L.Rev. 705 (2007); see also Pfautz, What Would a Reasonable Jury Do? Jury Verdicts Following Summary Judgment Reversals, 115 Colum.L.Rev. 1255 (2015). What is clear, as Professor Miller has written, is the fact that the “three decisions in one term sent a clear signal to the legal profession that Rule 56 provides a useful mechanism for disposing of cases short of trial when the district judge feels the plaintiff’s case is not plausible. Many courts responded to this invitation with considerable receptivity.” Miller, From Conley to Twombly to Iqbal: A Double Play on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 60 Duke L.J. 1, 10 (2010).

1036

NOTE ON THE TIMING OF A FEDERAL RULE 56 MOTION

Rule 56(b) permits the filing of a summary judgment motion “until 30 days after the close of discovery,” unless another time is ordered by the court or specified by local rule. This means that a motion for summary judgment may be filed before defendant has filed an answer and before discovery has commenced or been completed. However, the Court in Celotex warned that a Rule 56 motion should be granted only if the nonmovant has had an adequate time for discovery. The district court, using its Rule 16 managerial authority, may set a scheduling order for the filing of summary judgment motions and for discovery. See Gensler & Rosenthal, Managing Summary Judgment, 43 Loy.Ch.L.J. 517 (2012). In addition, Rule 56(d) provides safeguards for a nonmovant who requires additional time to marshal facts in opposition to a summary judgment motion. Although the general presumption is that a continuance should be liberally granted, Rule 56(d) requests are not automatically granted—the rule “is designed to minister to the vigilant, not to those who slumber upon perceptible rights.” Pina v. Children’s Place, 740 F.3d 785, 794 (1st Cir. 2014) (internal quotation omitted). In some circuits, the party seeking Rule 56(d) relief must submit an affidavit, and the motion “must: 1) be timely; 2) be authoritative; 3) show good cause for failure to discover the relevant facts earlier; 4) establish a plausible basis for believing that the specified facts probably exist, and 5) indicate how those facts will influence the outcome of summary judgment.” Id.

B. DISMISSAL OF ACTIONS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 41 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

1037

1.VOLUNTARY DISMISSAL

Rule 41 allows a plaintiff to extricate itself from a lawsuit before significant resources have been expended by the court and an opposing party. Generally, a voluntary dismissal places the parties in the positions they occupied before the lawsuit began and does not affect plaintiff’s legal rights. Are there situations when a voluntary dismissal should be preclusive on the merits? Should it ever toll the statute of limitations? See 9 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure §§ 2361–68 (4th ed.). Is there a danger that a party might use repeated voluntary dismissals to harass an opponent?

MCCANTS v. FORD MOTOR CO., 781 F.2d 855 (11th Cir. 1986). McCants, a member of the United States Army Reserve on a two-week active duty training mission, was killed while riding in a military jeep built by Ford. His administratrix commenced a wrongful death suit in federal district court in Alabama. After discovery had proceeded for about a year, interrogatories were served and answered, and defendant had moved for summary judgment based on Alabama’s one-year general statute of limitations, plaintiff moved for voluntary dismissal of the action without prejudice under Rule 41(a)(2), and filed a new suit in Mississippi, where the controlling statute of limitations had not expired. The district court granted the motion to dismiss, and simultaneously denied Ford’s motion for summary judgment. The Eleventh Circuit vacated the order and remanded to determine whether conditions ought to have been attached to the order of dismissal. The court of appeals explained that “in most cases a [voluntary] dismissal should be granted unless the defendant will suffer clear legal prejudice, other than the mere prospect of a subsequent lawsuit, as a result,” emphasizing that the district court is to “bear in mind principally the interests of the defendant, for it is the defendant’s position that the court should protect.” Id. at 856–57. When defendant “has been put to considerable expense,” then dismissal is not warranted except on condition that plaintiff reimburse defendant for a portion of his expenses, including attorney’s fees. Id. at 860.

WOJTAS v. CAPITAL GUARDIAN TRUST CO., 477 F.3d 924 (7th Cir. 2007). Plaintiff, the owner of an Individual Retirement Account, instructed the custodian to roll over the investment into a new account managed by a successor custodian. An employee at the successor custodian converted the funds and later was convicted of mail fraud. Plaintiff sued the original custodian for breach of fiduciary duty and negligence, alleging that defendant had failed to verify that the successor custodian was legally qualified. Defendant answered and moved for judgment on the pleadings, arguing that both claims were time-barred under Wisconsin’s two-year statute of limitations, and, in the alternative, that plaintiff failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. Plaintiff responded to the latter argument but also moved for a voluntary dismissal without prejudice, and filed a new action in Illinois, where the controlling statute of limitations was longer. The district court denied the motion for voluntary dismissal and granted the motion for judgment on the pleadings. The court of appeals affirmed, finding that the plaintiff’s failure to respond to the statute of limitations argument constituted a waiver, and that it would be an abuse of the district court’s discretion to permit voluntary dismissal when “the defendant would suffer ‘plain legal prejudice’ as a result.” Id. at 927.

1038

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. At common law, plaintiff was permitted, at any time prior to judgment, to dismiss a case voluntarily and without prejudice and to refile the action. Today the right to dismiss voluntarily generally is governed by a rule or statute that typically permits a dismissal before “trial” or “commencement” of trial. These provisions have raised many problems of interpretation regarding the meaning of the words “trial” and “commencement.” A few courts have held that “before trial” means at any time prior to submission of the case to the jury or court for decision. Can you explain this distinction?

2. In McCants, plaintiff moved to dismiss after defendant had made a motion for summary judgment. Could any plaintiff simply move to dismiss before losing such a motion and refile in another, possibly more sympathetic, court? Could plaintiff do this repeatedly? Would it be appropriate for the court to attach conditions to a Rule 41 dismissal? What might those conditions be? See Solimine & Lippert, Deregulating Voluntary Dismissals, 36 U.Mich.J.L.Reform 367, 367 (2003), calling unilateral dismissal under Rule 41(a) “an anachronism in an age of managerial judging.”

3. In ESPOSITO v. PIATROWSKI, 223 F.3d 497 (7th Cir. 2000), plaintiff voluntarily dismissed his initial case against defendant. Plaintiff was ordered to reimburse defendant the costs of that proceeding. Subsequently plaintiff sued on the same cause, joining other defendants with the original defendant. Because plaintiff never did comply with the order to pay costs, the trial court, under Rule 41(b), dismissed the second case, not only against the original defendant but against all the defendants. The court of appeals affirmed. Is the decision consistent with the spirit of Rule 41(b) and (d)?

4. Courts are divided as to whether attorney fees can be awarded to a defendant as costs when a plaintiff has voluntarily dismissed an action and later refiled it. Compare Rogers v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 230 F.3d 868 (6th Cir. 2000), cert. denied, 532 U.S. 953, 121 S.Ct. 1428, 149 L.Ed.2d 367 (2001) (fees cannot be awarded under Rule 41(d)), with Andrews v. America’s Living Centers, LLC, 827 F.3d 306 (4th Cir. 2016) (fees can be awarded).

2.DISMISSAL FOR FAILURE TO PROSECUTE

It is accepted that courts possess inherent discretionary power to dismiss an action if plaintiff does not proceed to trial with “due diligence.” Exactly when this power should be invoked has been a matter about which judges have disagreed. Should simple delay by plaintiff be sufficient to justify dismissal, or should prejudice to defendant also be required? In MESSENGER v. UNITED STATES, 231 F.2d 328, 331 (2d Cir. 1956),^f the court said: “The operative condition of the Rule is lack of due diligence on the part of the plaintiff—not a showing by the defendant that it will be prejudiced by denial of its motion. * * * It may well be that the latter factor may be considered by the court, especially in cases of moderate or excusable neglect, in the formulation of its discretionary ruling.” Does this standard make sense? Does it have any practical utility as a guide for the trial judge? What is its effect on appellate-court review of the trial court’s exercise of discretion?

Some jurisdictions control dismissals for want of prosecution by statute. In the federal system, Rule 41(b) “allows dismissal for the plaintiff’s failure to prosecute, [and] is intended as a safeguard against delay in litigation and harassment of a defendant.” 9 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2370 (4th ed.). If the court has power under Rule 41(b) to dismiss the action, does it have an implied authority to fashion other, less onerous sanctions? Does Rule 16 affect your analysis?

LINK v. WABASH RAILROAD CO., 370 U.S. 626, 629–30, 633–34, 82 S.Ct. 1386, 1388, 1390–91, 8 L.Ed.2d 734, 737–38, 739–40 (1962). Petitioner appealed a sua sponte dismissal of his diversity negligence action after petitioner and his counsel failed to attend a pretrial conference. The trial date had been set some six years after the action had been commenced, during which two other fixed trial dates had been postponed. The Seventh Circuit affirmed, after which the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Harlan, affirmed, holding:

The authority of a federal trial court to dismiss a plaintiff’s action with prejudice because of his failure to prosecute cannot seriously be doubted. The power to invoke this sanction is necessary in order to prevent undue delays in the disposition of pending cases and to avoid congestion in the calendars of the District Courts. The power is of ancient origin, having its roots in judgments of nonsuit and non prosequitur entered at common law, e.g., 3 Blackstone, Commentaries (1768), 295–296, and dismissals for want of prosecution of bills in equity * * *. It has been expressly recognized in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 41(b) * * *.

* * *

Accordingly, when circumstances make such action appropriate, a District Court may dismiss a complaint for failure to prosecute even without affording notice of its intention to do so or providing an adversary hearing before acting. Whether such an order can stand on appeal depends not on power but on whether it was within the permissible range of the court’s discretion. On this record we are unable to say that the District Court’s dismissal of this action for failure to prosecute, as evidenced only partly by the failure of petitioner’s counsel to appear at a duly scheduled pretrial conference, amounted to an abuse of discretion.
* * *

There is certainly no merit to the contention that dismissal of petitioner’s claim because of his counsel’s unexcused conduct imposes an unjust penalty on the client. Petitioner voluntarily chose this attorney as his representative in the action, and he cannot now avoid the consequences of the acts or omissions of this freely selected agent. Any other notion would be wholly inconsistent with our system of representative litigation, in which each party is deemed bound by the acts of his lawyer-agent and is considered to have “notice of all facts, notice of which can be charged upon the attorney.” * * *

We need not decide whether unexplained absence from a pretrial conference would alone justify a dismissal with prejudice if the record showed no other evidence of dilatoriness on the part of the plaintiff. For the District Court in this case relied on all the circumstances that were brought to its attention, including the earlier delays.

In his dissent, Justice Black argued that it was unfair to impose such a harsh penalty upon plaintiff for the misconduct of an attorney. The Justice suggested that numerous other sanctions were available in this situation that could penalize the attorney without resorting to a dismissal that barred plaintiff from any recovery.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

Lengthy delays do not necessarily lead to a dismissal for failure to prosecute. In GCIU EMPLOYER RETIREMENT FUND v. CHICAGO TRIBUNE, 8 F.3d 1195 (7th Cir. 1993), the court held that a dismissal with prejudice for failure to prosecute was improper, despite a 22-month delay, because during that period the litigants were actively negotiating. What other factors should affect the court’s decision? Is the district court required to give a warning before dismissing the case?

1041

C. DEFAULT JUDGMENT

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 55 in the Supplement.

COULAS v. SMITH

Supreme Court of Arizona, 1964.
96 Ariz. 325, 395 P.2d 527.

UDALL, CHIEF JUSTICE. This is an appeal from an order of the Superior Court of Pima County, denying a motion to set aside a judgment entered against the appellant.

* * *

The plaintiff filed a complaint against the defendant and cross-claimant on two counts. The first count was for $ 669.32 on an open account. The second count was on a promissory note upon which $ 3,666.67 was alleged to be due. The cross-claimant answered individually by his attorney and denied any liability to the plaintiff on either count and thereafter filed a cross-claim against the defendant in which he sought judgment against the defendant for any sums or amounts which the plaintiff may obtain against him by virtue of the judgment; for the sum of $ 4,000 on a debt alleged to be owed by the defendant to him, and $ 500 attorney’s fees. The defendant appeared individually by his attorneys and answered the complaint of the plaintiff, answered the cross-claim of the cross-claimant, and counterclaimed against the plaintiff, seeking damages in the sum of $ 18,000. The plaintiff replied to the defendant’s counterclaim.

On July 11, 1958, the lower court made an order setting the case for trial on October 10, 1958. All counsel were notified by the clerk of the court. On October 6, 1958, counsel for the plaintiff and counsel for the cross-claimant stipulated that the trial be set for December 10, 1958. The lower court ordered that the prior trial date be vacated and the case be reset for trial on December 10, 1958. All counsel were regularly notified by the clerk of the new trial setting. The defendant’s counsel was not present before the court on October 6, 1958, and did not participate in the stipulation vacating the original trial setting and resetting the case for trial on December 10, 1958. The defendant and defendant’s counsel deny ever receiving any notice from the clerk concerning the new trial date.

1042

On December 10, 1958, the new trial date, the case came on regularly to be heard. The defendant did not appear either in person or by counsel. The court made the following minute entry during the course of the trial:

* * *

“The plaintiff Smith and the defendant Bray announce ready for trial.

“William J. Bray is sworn, cross-examined, and examined.

“Plaintiff’s Exhibit 1, being a promissory note in the sum of $4,000.00 dated February 14, 1955, is marked for identification and admitted in evidence.

“Nicholas Coulas having failed to appear at this time either in person or by counsel, and it further appearing that this case was previously set for trial both as to the issues framed by the complaint and answer thereto of the defendant Nicholas Coulas and as to the cross-claim filed by the defendant William J. Bray, Jr., against the defendant Nicholas Coulas,

“IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that the default of the said defendant Nicholas Coulas be entered as to said complaint and as to said cross-claim and the court proceeding to hear evidence pertaining to said complaint and cross-claim and being fully advised in the premises,

“IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED that judgment is hereby rendered * * * against the defendant Nicholas Coulas * * *.”

The plaintiff obtained judgment against the defendant on both counts and against the cross-claimant as to count two (the promissory note). The cross-claimant obtained judgment against the defendant on the promissory note. The judgment was entered on December 11, 1958.

On October 29, 1960, nearly two years later, the defendant filed a motion to set aside and vacate the judgment. The trial court denied this motion. * * *

The defendant subsequently filed this appeal.

The defendant contends that the “default” judgment entered against him was void, since he did not receive 3 days’ notice of the application for judgment by default pursuant to Rule 55(b) of the Arizona Rules of Civil Procedure * * *. The defendant’s contention would be valid if the judgment below was a judgment by default. A default judgment obtains when a defendant fails to plead or otherwise defend. Rule 55. If he has made an appearance in the case, he must be given 3 days’ notice of application for judgment by default. * * *

However, the defendant’s contention is invalid here since the judgment below was not a default judgment. It should be noted that the defendant did plead to the merits. He answered the complaint and filed a counterclaim. He then failed to appear at the trial in person or by counsel. The trial proceeded, evidence was heard, and a judgment on the merits of the plaintiff’s and counter-claimant’s claims was entered. The judgment was not by default within the meaning of Rule 55. Therefore Rule 55(b) with its 3-day notice requirement is not applicable. In fact, the trial court would have erred if a default was entered, since the case was at issue. Bass v. Hoagland, 172 F.2d 205 (5th Cir. 1949), cert. denied, 338 U.S. 816, 70 S.Ct. 57, 94 L.Ed. 494 (1949) * * *.

The following language is from Bass v. Hoagland * * * concerning the applicability of Rule 55:

“Rule 55(a) authorizes the clerk to enter a default * * *. This does not require that to escape default the defendant must not only file a sufficient answer to the merits, but must also have a lawyer or be present in court when the case is called for a trial. The words ‘otherwise defend’ refer to attacks on the service, or motions to dismiss, or for better particulars, and the like, which may prevent default without presently pleading to the merits. When Bass by his attorney filed a denial of the plaintiff’s case neither the clerk nor the judge could enter a default against him. The burden of proof was put on the plaintiff in any trial. When neither Bass nor his attorney appeared at the trial, no default was generated; the case was not confessed. The plaintiff might proceed, but he would have to prove his case.” 172 F.2d p. 210 (emphasis added).

* * *

* * * It should * * * be stated that once an answer on the merits is filed and the case is at issue, a default judgment is not proper, and if the defendant fails to appear at the trial a judgment on the merits may be entered against him upon proper proof.

* * *

The contention of the defendant that he did not receive notice of the new trial date is not substantiated by the minutes. The record indicates that the clerk of the superior court notified all counsel of all of the orders and judgment pursuant to Rule 77(h) * * *. It is well settled that in the absence of a showing to the contrary a public officer, such as the clerk of the court in this case, is presumed to have performed the duty imposed upon him by law. * * * In addition, if the defendant’s counsel did not receive the notice of the change of the trial date to December 10, 1958, he certainly would have learned of the change in the trial date when he appeared for trial on the earlier date, October 10, 1958.

Since the judgment of the lower court is merely voidable, at most, Rule 60(c) * * * prevents the defendant from attacking the judgment more than six months after it was entered. The defendant attempted to attack the judgment nearly two years after it was entered. * * * The lower court properly denied defendant’s motion to set aside and vacate the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In BASS v. HOAGLAND, 172 F.2d 205 (5th Cir. 1949), cert. denied, 338 U.S. 816, 70 S.Ct. 57, 94 L.Ed. 494 (1949), which is relied upon in Coulas, a default judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff after defendant’s counsel, who had filed an answer, had withdrawn from the case. The judgment recited that defendant had been informed of the withdrawal. Defendant did not appeal but collaterally attacked the judgment when enforcement was sought against him in another jurisdiction. Defendant claimed that he did not know of the counsel’s withdrawal from the case and was not aware that the adverse judgment had been rendered. A majority of the Fifth Circuit held that, since an answer had been filed, defendant was not in default under Federal Rule 55, that the entry of judgment without trial by jury, which had been demanded, was a violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, and that the judgment was void. The court indicated that even if the case fell within Rule 55, the failure to give notice under Rule 55(b)(2) might render the judgment void, although in that event no jury trial would be required. The dissenting judge took the position that defendant, by not attending trial, was in default, that no jury trial was required, and that the decision was not void or subject to collateral attack.

2.Rule 54(c) provides that plaintiff may recover all the relief to which it is entitled but in the case of a default judgment is limited to the amount demanded in the prayer for relief. Suppose at trial in Coulas v. Smith plaintiff’s evidence showed that defendant was liable for $10,000, although only $4,000 had been claimed. Would the court have been justified in awarding plaintiff the full amount?

3.What activities, short of a formal challenge to the jurisdiction or the pleadings, constitute an appearance for purposes of Rule 55(b)(2)? Consider these situations:

- (a)There are oral and written communications between counsel for the parties with a view toward settlement, and a letter by plaintiff to defendant that he would apply for a default judgment if defendant did not answer.
- (b)There are oral and written communications between counsel for the parties, and both parties intended to contest the suit if settlement negotiations broke down.

1045

- (c)Defendant executes a waiver of service of process.

See 10A Wright, Miller, Kane & Marcus, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2686 (4th ed.).

4. A defendant’s default does not automatically entitle plaintiff to a court-ordered default judgment; the decision to grant or deny the application rests in the court’s discretion. In making the determination, the Ninth Circuit relies on the following factors:

- (1) the possibility of prejudice to the plaintiff, (2) the merits of plaintiff’s substantive claim, (3) the sufficiency of the complaint, (4) the sum of money at stake in the action, (5) the possibility of a dispute concerning the material facts, (6) whether the default was due to excusable neglect, and (7) the strong policy underlying the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure favoring decisions on the merits.

Eitel v. McCool, 782 F.2d 1470, 1471–72 (9th Cir. 1986). For a discussion of the appropriate standard in debt collection cases, see Bearden, Employing the Prima Facie Standard in Third Party Debt Collection Default Judgments, 48 Urb. Law. 365 (2016).

5.A special type of default judgment can be imposed on a party who has appeared and contested the matters at issue but willfully violated the rules of procedure or disobeyed an order of the court. Normally, this penalty is invoked against a party who is defending a claim; if the complaining party is guilty of comparable violations, the most typical remedy is to dismiss the case with prejudice. See Federal Rule 41(b). The penalty default can be used to sanction discovery violations. Federal Rules 37(b)(2)(A) and 37(d) and their state counterparts specifically permit default judgments in these situations. The Seventh Circuit has stated “that the ultimate sanction of dismissal should be involved only in extreme situations, when there is a clear record of delay or contumacious conduct, or when other less drastic sanctions have proven unavailable.” Rice v. City of Chicago, 333 F.3d 780, 785–86 (7th Cir. 2003) (internal quotations omitted).

Are “penalty” defaults subject to the limitation on recovery in Federal Rule 54(c)? In TRANS WORLD AIRLINES, INC. v. HUGHES, 32 F.R.D. 604, 607–08 (S.D.N.Y. 1963), modified 332 F.2d 602 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. dismissed, 380 U.S. 248, 85 S.Ct. 934, 13 L.Ed.2d 817 (1965), the court, after granting plaintiff’s motion for entry of a default judgment on the ground of defendant’s failure to produce the owner of 100 percent of its stock for a deposition, held:

That branch of the [plaintiff’s] motion seeking to increase the ad damnum clause from $105,000,000 to $135,000,000 is granted. This is not a case where a party has defaulted in appearance. Here issue was joined and adversary proceedings continued in the pretrial stages of this litigation. The damages originally asserted were unliquidated and TWA is entitled to recover for whatever damage it can show it suffered. Furthermore, Toolco [a defendant] will be represented at the hearings necessary to assess damages under rule 55(b)(2).

1046

Suppose TWA’s suit had been on a contract and the damages were for a liquidated sum that plaintiff had erroneously understated in its complaint. Would the result have been different?

6.Default judgments represent a significant portion of the civil dockets of the state courts. Typically, defendant is an unrepresented individual, often in a consumer debt case, who does not make an appearance. Although many defendants choose to default because they have no defense on the merits, examples of abusive default judgments—entered without proper notice due to “sewer service”—are common. One study of consumer debt litigation reported that in the limited number of state courts that had been studied, more than 70 percent of all debt-collection cases ended in default judgments. The Pew Charitable Trusts, How Debt Collectors Are Transforming the Business of State Courts, May 2020, at 15–16. In New York, where more than 100,000 debt collection suits were filed each year as of 2014, the state court system responded to concerns about abusive default judgments by requiring that: (1) debt collectors provide additional notice explaining the consequences of defaulting to defendants before a default judgment may be entered; (2) debt collectors submit affidavits evidencing their right to collect on the debt in question; and (3) counsel for debt collectors represent by affirmation that the applicable statute of limitations on the debt has not expired. See, e.g., 22 N.Y.C.R.R. §§ 202.27-a & 202.27-b. See also McKinley, Top State Judge Tightens Rules on Debt Collection, N.Y. Times, May 1, 2014, at A20. Should a properly functioning procedural system be expected to produce such a high number of default judgments?

²²¹368 U.S. 464 (1962).

^aThe rule was amended and currently is Rule 56(c).

^bThe rule was amended and currently is Rule 56(d).

^cThe rule was changed and the substance now appears in Rule 56(a).

^dThe practice is now subject to current Rule 56(c).
^eThe rule currently is Rule 56(d)(2) and (e)(1).
^f*Messenger* was superseded on other grounds by the addition in 1983 of Rule 4(j), as stated in Frasca v. United States, 921 F.2d 450, 452 (2d Cir. 1990). Rule 4(j) was later redesignated as Rule 4(m).

CHAPTER 14

TRIAL

Prior chapters have explored the ways in which litigants initiate actions, prepare for trial, and (when possible) avoid trial. But trials do take place, and it is important to discuss and analyze how they proceed, how decisions ultimately are reached, and whether the process is a fair one. The chapter begins with a discussion of jury trials. Next, the materials discuss the nature of a trial in which a judge hears the case without a jury. Finally, the focus is on the ways in which errors, omissions, and improper tactics may result in the reversal of a decision and an order for a new trial. For several reasons, the primary attention is given to the trial in the federal courts. First, each state has its own rules and procedures, and it would be impossible to deal with each of them in any meaningful detail. Second, the federal system is a sound prototype for study since most states, generally speaking, employ procedures that follow those of the federal courts.

One might think that a trial is the natural destination for a case in the civil justice system. In reality, trials have become rare today in both the federal and state courts. In the 1930s, about 20 percent of civil cases in federal court concluded with a trial. See Yeazell, The Misunderstood Consequences of Modern Civil Process, 1994 Wis.L.Rev. 631, 633 n.3. That number dropped to about 9 percent in 1972, to 3.5 percent in 1992, and to about 2 percent in 2002. See Gallanter, The Vanishing Trial: An Examination of Trials and Related Matters in Federal and State Courts, 1 J. Empirical Legal Stud. 459, 462–63 tbl.1 (2004). A similar trend happened in the state courts, where the vast majority (perhaps 98 percent) of civil trials occur. See Burns, The Death of the American Trial 85 (2011). One survey found that in 2005 about 3 percent of civil cases in the state courts were concluded by trial. See Langton & Cohen, Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Dep’t of Justice, Civil Bench and Jury Trials in State Courts, 2005, at 9 & tbl.10 (2008) (revised Apr. 9, 2009). More recent data confirm a continuation of this downward trend. In 2016, only 1 percent of civil cases in the federal courts concluded with a trial, and the portion of civil cases going to trial in a sample of state courts (covering almost half the states) ranged from 0.05 percent to 0.5 percent. See Nora Freeman Engstrom, The Diminished Trial, 86 Fordham L.Rev. 2131, 2131–32 (2018).

Scholars and policymakers have attempted to explain the causes of the “vanishing trial.” There is a large literature exploring many theories for the phenomenon, but a few prominent ones bear mention. One theory points to the procedural model adopted by the Federal Rules as contributing, perhaps unintentionally, to the decline. To be sure, at the time of their adoption “many believed that the Federal Rules represented a Gold Standard that envisioned a trial and, when appropriate, one before a jury.” Miller, What Are Courts For? Have We Forsaken the Procedural Gold Standard?, 78 La.L.Rev. 739, 740 (2018). Because the rules provide for robust pretrial discovery, however, cases now develop a deeper factual record than would have been typical on the eve of trial in an earlier era. As a result, liberal discovery under the rules facilitates settlement by the parties or summary judgment by the court rather than disposition at trial. See Langbein, The Disappearance of Civil Trial in the United States, 122 Yale L.J. 522, 544–53 (2012). That effect is intensified by the rise of “managerial judging,” the drive toward active judicial case management from the commencement of litigation, which has been said to limit contested issues and produce a greater likelihood of settlement. Id. Some commentators go beyond the details of Rule 16 (and similar case management tools developed over the years), see p. 989, supra, and point to a longterm change in judicial mood accompanying active case management—a shift toward the view that the civil justice system has failed when a case gets to trial. See Resnik, Trial as Error, Jurisdiction as Injury: Transforming the Meaning of Article III, 113 Harv.L.Rev. 924 (2000). That shift, it is said, encourages judges to avoid trial in favor of resolution by settlement or dispositive motion. See generally Miller, The Pretrial Rush to Judgment: Are the “Litigation Explosion,” “Liability Crisis,” and Efficiency Cliches Eroding Our Day in Court and Jury Trial Commitments?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982 (2003).

The documented decline in trial rates has sparked renewed interest in countering the trend. The arguments in favor of encouraging trials fall generally into three categories. First, some commentators believe the decline of civil trials undermines the role of the jury as a democratic institution—“the New England town meeting writ large”—in the administration of justice. Young, Vanishing Trials, Vanishing Juries, Vanishing Constitution, 40 Suffolk L.Rev. 67, 69 (2006).

Second, others suggest that a trial may be a more cost effective path to resolving cases than motion-dependent litigation. On this view, the certainty of a looming trial actually enhances efficiency by limiting overreliance on time-consuming motion practice and forcing parties to streamline discovery, which is now viewed “as the battleground where the adversary process is played out.” Anderson, Where

Have You Gone, Spot Mozingo? A Trial Judge’s Lament over the Demise of the Civil Jury Trial, 4 Fed.Cts.L.Rev. 99, 99 (2010); see also Inst. for the Advancement of the Am.

1049

Legal Sys., A Return to Trials: Implementing Effective Short, Summary, and Expedited Civil Action Programs 3–5 (2012). In 2012, Texas adopted rules for expedited civil actions designed to proceed to trial within one year of filing. The expedited action rules provide for more constricted discovery and impose a firm date for trial. See Tex. R. Civ. P. 169. A number of other states have explored the adoption of similar rules. The evidence is unclear whether this approach increases resort to trials or simply prompts earlier settlement. See National Center for State Courts, Call to Action: Achieving Civil Justice for All, app. D at 7–8 (2016).

Third, some commentators fear that advocacy skills in the legal profession will deteriorate due to the rarity of civil trials. Judge Joseph F. Anderson, Jr., describes the concern this way:

With a dramatic decline in trials, courtroom skills atrophy, the Rules of Evidence become an unnecessary annoyance and the well-read, flamboyant trial lawyer—an advocate in the truest sense of the term—goes the way of the dodo bird. Young lawyers lose the once-considered indispensable opportunity to observe attorneys in the courtroom. The phenomenon then feeds on itself as more and more lawyers—having no courtroom experience—settle cases, at least in part, because of the fear of going to trial. With the growth in unseasoned trial lawyers, it follows that in the not too distant future, judges as well will occupy the bench with little trial experience.

Anderson, Where Have You Gone, Spot Mozingo? A Trial Judge’s Lament over the Demise of the Civil Jury Trial, 4 Fed.Cts.L.Rev. 99, 110 (2010).

Whether or not the rate of civil trials increases, litigants and their counsel must appreciate the dynamics of a potential trial when choosing their litigation strategy. Accordingly, the materials in this chapter provide a comprehensive discussion of the trial process.

A. TRIAL BY JURY

The jury trial established itself as central to the process of adjudication under the common law. As one commentator has observed, “the main features of the Anglo-American civil trial developed * * * as a consequence of the jury system, in which panels of lay persons were used to decide cases.” Langbein, The Disappearance of Civil Trial in the United States, 122 Yale L.J. 522, 527 (2012). Indeed, before the middle of the nineteenth century, trial by jury was the only form of trial used in any common law court. Id.

This section discusses the historical development of the right to trial by jury and the connection between that history and the constitutional guarantee of a jury trial in civil cases under the Seventh Amendment. The materials in this section also consider: the division of authority between the judge and the jury; tactical considerations that might guide whether litigants demand a jury trial; the mechanics of properly invoking the right to a jury trial; and the process for selecting and seating a jury.

1050

1.THE INSTITUTION OF TRIAL BY JURY

During its formative period, the jury was an activist group that both investigated the facts and judged the evidence. A famous example of the work of the early jury is the Domesday Book, compiled in the twelfth century, setting forth an inventory of William the Conqueror’s realm. The Domesday “jury” viewed the land and formed its own judgments without using witnesses. The revered status of the jury trial at common law is evidenced by Blackstone’s statement that the right to trial by jury “has been, and I trust ever will be, looked upon as the glory of the English law * * * and * * * it is the most transcendent privilege which any subject can enjoy or wish for, that he not be affected either in his property, his liberty, or his person, but by unanimous consent of twelve of his neighbors and equals.” 3 Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England *378 (1765–1769). Yet in modern English practice, trial by jury in civil actions has been abandoned except in rare cases.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Excellent historical material on the jury in England can be found in 1 Holdsworth, A History of English Law 298–350 (7th ed. 1956); 1 Pollock & Maitland, The History of English Law 138–49 (2d ed. 1911); 2 id. 616–32, 641–59; Thayer, The Jury and Its Development, 5 Harv.L.Rev. 249, 295, 357 (1892), substantially reprinted in A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence at the Common Law 47–182 (1898). For discussions of the civil jury trial in other countries, see Devlin, Trial by Jury (3d imp. 1966); Smith, Civil Jury Trial: A Scottish Assessment, 50 Va.L.Rev. 1076 (1964).
2. Today, the jury is theorized as a passive, disinterested body that renders its decisions on the basis of the information placed before it. Critics argue that use of the jury as a decision-maker is expensive, slow, and not suited to complex cases. Chief Justice Burger (who served on the Supreme Court from 1969 to 1986) perceived the following problems with jury trials in civil cases:

First, do we really have truly representative juries? Experienced business executives, bankers, professional people, accountants, professors of economics, statisticians, teachers, and others arguably more competent than most to cope with complex economic or scientific questions, rarely survive to sit in the box. Peremptory challenges in the jury selection process eliminate them and more often they are excused for cause, including the cause that they are too busy! We must stop deluding ourselves. The juries actually selected in most protracted cases are rarely true cross-sections, as we are so fond of repeating.

1051

* * *

Second, the factual issues in protracted cases are often of enormous complexity. The analysis of documents, of expert testimony, of charts, graphs and other visual aids, and the comprehension of such evidence, present problems which often only a sophisticated business executive, an economist, or another expert could grasp; some cases would baffle even them.

Third, the legal issues, which must be explained to jurors by the trial judge, may take not hours, but a whole day or several days, by way of instructions.

Fourth, there is a limit to the capacity of any of us—jurors or judges—to understand and remember the mass of complicated transactions, documents, and legal principles usually described in the course of a long trial.

Fifth, quite apart from these considerations, there is an enormous—and inordinate—impact on the life of each of twelve jurors, and alternate jurors, thrust for months into a totally strange environment, and then confronted with the burden of decisions in areas in which few, if any of them, have any experience.

Burger, Thinking the Unthinkable, 31 Loyola L.Rev. 205, 210–11 (1985). See also Redish, Seventh Amendment Right to Jury Trial: A Study in the Irrationality of Rational Decision Making, 70 Nw.U.L.Rev. 486 (1975). Might concerns about the civil jury help explain the increased trend toward pretrial disposition through use of the motion to dismiss, the motion for summary judgment, settlement, and forms of alternative dispute resolution? See Solomon & Hunnford-Agor, Introduction: The Civil Jury as a Political Institution, 55 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 715 (2014), and other articles in the same law review issue.

2.THE RIGHT TO A JURY TRIAL

Read the Seventh Amendment of United States Constitution and the accompanying state materials in the Supplement.

a.The Nature of the Right Under the United States Constitution

The federal Constitution and most state constitutions do not “create” a right to a civil jury trial. Rather, they “preserve” the right as it existed at common law, either in 1791, the date of the Seventh Amendment’s ratification, or, in the case of some states, as of the time the state constitution was adopted. Because the Seventh Amendment was assumed to incorporate then-existing jury trial practice, federal courts developed a historical test for determining whether the civil jury right attached. Critics have argued that the historical test is difficult to apply and inappropriate for novel, hybrid actions. See 9 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2302 (4th ed.).

1052

b.The Effect of Federal Rule 2 (the Single Form of Action) and Other Modern-Day Procedural Developments on the Right to Trial by Jury in Federal Courts

The formal elimination by Federal Rule 2 of separate actions in law and equity and other procedural innovations present a number of challenging issues regarding the historic right to a trial by jury:

- (1)What remains of the law-equity distinction that governed the right to a jury in 1791?
- (2)What happens when parties seek both legal and equitable remedies in the same case?
- (3)What is the situation when a party makes a claim in court, pursuant to a statute or common-law development that was unknown in 1791?
- (4)What is the situation when vindication of a claim is taken out of the jurisdiction of the courts and placed in an administrative tribunal?
- (5)What is the nature of the right to a jury when a party initiates a claim, normally cognizable only at law, but historically brought in courts of equity because of the status of the party?

c.The Implementation of the Right to Jury Trial in the Federal Courts

i.Maintenance of the Law-Equity Distinction

Cases at law—those that were brought in courts of law in 1791—continue to carry the right to trial by jury in cases in federal courts. In contrast, suits in equity, historically decided by the chancellor, sitting without a jury, continue to be decided by judges, although judges can, in their discretion, employ an advisory jury. See Federal Rule 39(c).

The distinction is based primarily on the nature of the relief sought. Relief at law generally is limited to compensatory damages along with the ejectment of a defendant who wrongfully is occupying plaintiff’s land. Equity provides remedies when the law does not, including injunctions, restitution, rescission, and reformation of contracts.

1053

ii. Cases Involving Both Equitable and Legal Relief

In simple cases, a plaintiff, by designating the right to relief sought, is able to control whether or not a jury trial is required. See Thomas, A Limitation on Congress: “In Suits at Common Law,” 71 Ohio St.L.J. 1071 (2010). However, the merger of law and equity has complicated the application of the jury trial right because today a party may enter a single court with both legal and equitable claims. Even if a plaintiff brings claims of only one type, a defendant, by way of counterclaim, may introduce the other type.

The “mixed” remedies case was not completely unknown in 1791. Long before merger, equity developed the so-called “clean-up” doctrine, which allowed an equity court that had obtained jurisdiction over a suit primarily of an equitable character to decide any incidental legal issues that arose in the course of the litigation.

Sound considerations of policy lay behind * * * [the] “clean-up” rule, considerations which loom large and real against the background of two entirely independent systems of trial courts. The plaintiff entitled to both legal and equitable remedies needed relief from the burden of two days in court. Even worse was the plight of the litigant who had legitimately but vainly sought the chancellor’s aid. The statute of limitations threatened him with total loss of remedy on an admittedly valid claim. It was the more dangerous a choice when crowded dockets and cumbersome procedure made the equitable process less than speedy. In any event, the dangers of a wrong choice of forum involved delay and all-consuming expense of litigation.

Here then was plaintiff’s dilemma: to turn first to law might, as a simple matter of res judicata, lose him the more-desired chancellor’s remedy; to turn to equity would often invite decision by an unpredictable conscience and perhaps the loss of all remedy. Equities had to be weighed on an imprecise balance and hardships measured by a rule the fine divisions of which were often known only to the chancellor himself. Small wonder then that the clean-up rule, the disposition of incidental questions legal in nature, was often applied even where all equitable relief was denied.

The cost of this efficiency was, however, substantial, for it involved the denial of trial by jury on all legal issues so adjudicated. In some situations this price was considered too heavy to pay for the trial convenience achieved. In others, where equity viewed a plaintiff’s conduct as sufficiently reprehensible, the chancellor was pleased not to afford him aid by rapid disposition of a remaining issue.

1054

Levin, Equitable Clean-up and the Jury: A Suggested Orientation, 100 U.Pa.L.Rev. 320, 320–21 (1951).

BEACON THEATRES, INC. v. WESTOVER

Supreme Court of the United States, 1959.
359 U.S. 500, 79 S.Ct. 948, 3 L.Ed.2d 988.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

Petitioner, Beacon Theatres, Inc., sought by mandamus to require a district judge in the Southern District of California to vacate certain orders alleged to deprive it of a jury trial of issues arising in a suit brought against it by Fox West Coast Theatres, Inc. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit refused the writ, holding that the trial judge had acted within his proper discretion in denying petitioner’s request for a jury. * * *

Fox had asked for declaratory relief against Beacon alleging a controversy arising under the Sherman Antitrust Act, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2, and under the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 731, 15 U.S.C. § 15, which authorizes suits for treble damages against Sherman Act violators. According to the complaint Fox operates a movie theatre in San Bernardino, California, and has long been exhibiting films under contracts with movie distributors. These contracts grant it the exclusive right to show “first run” pictures in the “San Bernardino competitive area” and provide for “clearance”—a period of time during which no other theatre can exhibit the same pictures. After building a drive-in theatre about 11 miles from San Bernardino, Beacon notified Fox that it considered contracts barring simultaneous exhibitions of first-run films in the two theatres to be overt acts in violation of the antitrust laws. Fox’s complaint alleged that this notification, together with threats of treble damage suits against Fox and its distributors, gave rise to “duress and coercion” which deprived Fox of a valuable property right, the right to negotiate for exclusive first-run contracts. Unless Beacon was restrained, the complaint continued, irreparable harm would result. Accordingly, while its pleading was styled a “Complaint for Declaratory Relief,” Fox prayed both for a declaration that a grant of clearance between the Fox and Beacon theatres is reasonable and not in violation of the antitrust laws, and for an injunction, pending final resolution of the litigation, to prevent Beacon from instituting any action under the antitrust laws against Fox and its distributors arising out of the controversy alleged in the complaint. Beacon filed an answer, a counterclaim against Fox, and a cross-claim against an exhibitor who had intervened. These denied the threats and asserted that there was no substantial competition between the two theatres, that the clearances granted were therefore unreasonable, and that a conspiracy existed between Fox and its distributors to manipulate contracts and clearances so as to restrain trade and monopolize first-run pictures in violation of the antitrust laws. Treble damages were asked.

1055

Beacon demanded a jury trial of the factual issues in the case as provided by Federal Rule * * * 38(b). The District Court, however, viewed the issues raised by the “Complaint for Declaratory Relief,” including the question of competition between the two theatres, as essentially equitable. Acting under the purported authority of Rules 42(b) and 57, it directed that these issues be tried to the court before jury determination of the validity of the charges of antitrust violations made in the counterclaim and cross-claim. A common issue of the “Complaint for Declaratory Relief,” the counterclaim, and the cross-claim was the reasonableness of the clearances granted to Fox, which depended, in part, on the existence of competition between the two theatres. Thus the effect of the action of the District Court could be, as the Court of Appeals believed, “to limit the petitioner’s opportunity fully to try to a jury every issue which has a bearing upon its treble damage suit,” for determination of the issue of clearances by the judge might “operate either by way of res judicata or collateral estoppel so as to conclude both parties with respect thereto at the subsequent trial of the treble damage claim.” * * *

The District Court’s finding that the Complaint for Declaratory Relief presented basically equitable issues draws no support from the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201, 2202; Fed.Rules Civ.Proc. 57. * * * That statute, while allowing prospective defendants to sue to establish their nonliability, specifically preserves the right to jury trial for both parties. It follows that if Beacon would have been entitled to a jury trial in a treble damage suit against Fox it cannot be deprived of that right merely because Fox took advantage of the availability of declaratory relief to sue Beacon first. Since the right to trial by jury applies to treble damage suits under the antitrust laws, and is, in fact, an essential part of the congressional plan for making competition rather than monopoly the rule of trade * * *, the Sherman and Clayton Act issues * * * were essentially jury questions.

Nevertheless the Court of Appeals * * * held that the question of whether a right to jury trial existed was to be judged by Fox’s complaint read as a whole. In addition to seeking a declaratory judgment, the court said, Fox’s complaint can be read as making out a valid plea for injunctive relief, thus stating a claim traditionally cognizable in equity. A party who is entitled to maintain a suit in equity for an injunction, said the court, may have all the issues in his suit determined by the judge without a jury regardless of whether legal rights are involved. The court then rejected the argument that equitable relief, traditionally available only when legal remedies are inadequate, was rendered unnecessary in this case by the filing of the counterclaim and cross-claim which presented all the issues necessary to a determination of the right to injunctive relief. Relying on American Life Ins. Co. v. Stewart, 300 U.S. 203, 215, 57 S.Ct. 377, 380, 81

1056

L.Ed. 605, decided before the enactment of the Federal Rules * * *, it invoked the principle that a court sitting in equity could retain jurisdiction even though later a legal remedy became available. In such instances the equity court had discretion to enjoin the later lawsuit in order to allow the whole dispute to be determined in one case in one court. Reasoning by analogy, the Court of Appeals held it was not an abuse of discretion for the district judge, acting under Federal Rule * * * 42(b), to try the equitable cause first even though this might, through collateral estoppel, prevent a full jury trial of the counterclaim and cross-claim which were as effectively stopped as by an equity injunction.⁶

Beacon takes issue with the holding of the Court of Appeals that the complaint stated a claim upon which equitable relief could be granted. As initially filed the complaint alleged that threats of lawsuits by petitioner against Fox and its distributors were causing irreparable harm to Fox’s business relationships. The prayer for relief, however, made no mention of the threats but asked only that pending litigation of the claim for declaratory judgment, Beacon be enjoined from beginning any lawsuits under the antitrust laws against Fox and its distributors arising out of the controversy alleged in the complaint. Evidently of the opinion that this prayer did not state a good claim for equitable relief, the Court of Appeals construed it to include a request for an injunction against threats of lawsuits. * * * But this fact does not solve our problem. Assuming that the pleadings can be construed to support such a request and assuming additionally that the complaint can be read as alleging the kind of harassment by a multiplicity of lawsuits which would traditionally have justified equity to take jurisdiction and settle the case in one suit, we are nevertheless of the opinion that, under the Declaratory Judgment Act and the Federal Rules * * *, neither claim can justify denying Beacon a trial by jury of all the issues in the antitrust controversy.

The basis of injunctive relief in the federal courts has always been irreparable harm and inadequacy of legal remedies. At least as much is required to justify a trial court in using its discretion under the Federal Rules to allow claims of equitable origins to be tried ahead of legal ones, since this has the same effect as an equitable injunction of the legal claims. And it is immaterial, in judging if that discretion is properly employed, that before the Federal Rules and the Declaratory Judgment Act were passed, courts of equity, exercising a jurisdiction separate from courts of law, were, in some cases, allowed to enjoin subsequent legal actions between the same parties involving the same controversy. This was because the subsequent legal action, though providing an opportunity to try the case to a jury, might not protect the right of the equity plaintiff to a fair and orderly adjudication of the controversy. * * * Under such circumstances the legal remedy could quite naturally be deemed inadequate. Inadequacy of remedy and irreparable harm * * * today must be determined, not by precedents decided under discarded procedures, but in the light of the remedies now made available by the Declaratory Judgment Act and the Federal Rules.

1057

Viewed in this manner, the use of discretion by the trial court under Rule 42(b) to deprive Beacon of a full jury trial on its counterclaim and cross-claim, as well as on Fox’s plea for declaratory relief, cannot be justified. Under the Federal Rules the same court may try both legal and equitable causes in the same action. * * *

Thus any defenses, equitable or legal, Fox may have to charges of antitrust violations can be raised either in its suit for declaratory relief or in answer to Beacon’s counterclaim. On proper showing, harassment by threats of other suits, or other suits actually brought, involving the issues being tried in this case, could be temporarily enjoined pending the outcome of this litigation. Whatever permanent injunctive relief Fox might be entitled to on the basis of the decision in this case could, of course, be given by the court after the jury renders its verdict. In this way the issues between these parties could be settled in one suit giving Beacon a full jury trial of every antitrust issue. * * * By contrast, the holding of the court below while granting Fox no additional protection unless the avoidance of jury trial be considered as such, would compel Beacon to split his antitrust case, trying part to a judge and part to a jury. Such a result, which involves the postponement and subordination of Fox’s own legal claim for declaratory relief as well as of the counterclaim which Beacon was compelled by the Federal Rules to bring, is not permissible.

Our decision is consistent with the plan of the Federal Rules and the Declaratory Judgment Act to effect substantial procedural reform while retaining a distinction between jury and nonjury issues and leaving substantive rights unchanged. Since in the federal courts equity has always acted only when legal remedies were inadequate, the expansion of adequate legal remedies provided by the Declaratory Judgment Act and the Federal Rules necessarily affects the scope of equity. Thus, the justification for equity’s deciding legal issues once it obtains jurisdiction, and refusing to dismiss a case, merely because subsequently a legal remedy becomes available, must be re-evaluated in the light of the liberal joinder provisions of the Federal Rules which allow legal and equitable causes to be brought and resolved in one civil action. Similarly the need for, and therefore, the availability of such equitable remedies as Bills of Peace, Quia Timet and Injunction must be reconsidered in view of the existence of the Declaratory Judgment Act as well as the liberal joinder provision of the Rules. * * *

If there should be cases where the availability of declaratory judgment or joinder in one suit of legal and equitable causes would not in all respects protect the plaintiff seeking equitable relief from irreparable harm while affording a jury trial in the legal cause, the trial court will necessarily have to use its discretion in deciding whether the legal or equitable cause should be tried first. Since the right to jury trial is a constitutional one, however, while no similar requirement protects trials by the court, that discretion is very narrowly limited and must, wherever possible, be exercised to preserve jury trial. * * * [O]nly under the most imperative circumstances, circumstances which in view of the flexible procedures of the Federal Rules we cannot now anticipate, can the right to a jury trial of legal issues be lost through prior determination of equitable claims. * * *

As we have shown, this is far from being such a case.

* * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

Reversed.

JUSTICE FRANKFURTER took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

JUSTICE STEWART, with whom JUSTICE HARLAN and JUSTICE WHITTAKER concur, dissenting.

* * *

I.

The Court suggests that “the expansion of adequate legal remedies provided by the Declaratory Judgment Act * * * necessarily affects the scope of equity.” Does the Court mean to say that the mere availability of an action for a declaratory judgment operates to furnish “an adequate remedy at law” so as to deprive a court of equity of the power to act? That novel line of reasoning is at least implied in the Court’s opinion. But the Declaratory Judgment Act did not “expand” the substantive law. That Act merely provided a new statutory remedy, neither legal nor equitable, but available in the areas of both equity and law. When declaratory relief is sought, the right to trial by jury depends upon the basic context in which the issues are presented. * * * If the basic issues in an action for declaratory relief are of a kind traditionally cognizable in equity, e.g., a suit for cancellation of a written instrument, the declaratory judgment is not a “remedy at law.” If, on the other hand, the issues arise in a context traditionally cognizable at common law, the right to a jury trial of course remains unimpaired, even though the only relief demanded is a declaratory judgment.

Thus, if in this case the complaint had asked merely for a judgment declaring that the plaintiff’s specified manner of business dealings with distributors and other exhibitors did not render it liable to Beacon under the antitrust laws, this would have been simply a “juxtaposition of parties” case in which Beacon could have demanded a jury trial. But the complaint * * * presented issues of exclusively equitable cognizance, going well beyond a mere defense to any subsequent action at law. Fox sought from the court protection against Beacon’s allegedly unlawful interference with its business relationships—protection which this Court seems to recognize might not have been afforded by a declaratory judgment, unsupplemented by equitable relief. The availability of a declaratory judgment did not, therefore, operate to confer upon Beacon the right to trial by jury with respect to the issues raised by the complaint.

II.

* * * [T]he Court holds, quite apart from its reliance upon the Declaratory Judgment Act, that Beacon by filing its counterclaim and cross-claim acquired a right to trial by jury of issues which otherwise would have been properly triable to the court. Support for this position is found in the principle that, “in the federal courts equity has always acted only when legal remedies were inadequate. * * * ” Yet that principle is not employed in its traditional sense as a limitation upon the exercise of power by a court of equity. This is apparent in the Court’s recognition that the allegations of the complaint entitled Fox to equitable relief—relief to which Fox would not have been entitled if it had had an adequate remedy at law. Instead, the principle is employed today to mean that because it is possible under the counterclaim to have a jury trial of the factual issue of substantial competition, that issue must be tried by a jury, even though the issue was primarily presented in the original claim for equitable relief. This is a marked departure from long-settled principles.

It has been an established rule “that equitable jurisdiction existing at the filing of a bill is not destroyed because an adequate legal remedy may have become available thereafter.” * * * American Life Ins. Co. v. Stewart, 300 U.S. 203, 215, 57 S.Ct. 377, 380, 81 L.Ed. 605 [(1937)]. * * * It has also been long settled that the District Court in its discretion may order the trial of a suit in equity in advance of an action at law between the same parties, even if there is a factual issue common to both. * * *

III.

The Court today sweeps away these basic principles as “precedents decided under discarded procedures.” It suggests that the Federal Rules * * * have somehow worked an “expansion of adequate legal remedies” so as to oust the District Courts of equitable jurisdiction, as well as to deprive them of their traditional power to control their own dockets. But obviously the Federal Rules could not and did not “expand” the substantive law one whit.

1060

Like the Declaratory Judgment Act, the Federal Rules preserve inviolate the right to trial by jury in actions historically cognizable at common law, as under the Constitution they must. They do not create a right of trial by jury where that right “does not exist under the Constitution or statutes of the United States.” Rule 39(a).^a Since Beacon’s counterclaim was compulsory under the Rules, see Rule 13(a), it is apparent that by filing it Beacon could not be held to have waived its jury rights. * * * But neither can the counterclaim be held to have transformed Fox’s original complaint into an action at law. * * *

The Rules make possible the trial of legal and equitable claims in the same proceeding, but they expressly affirm the power of a trial judge to determine the order in which claims shall be heard. Rule 42(b). Certainly the Federal Rules were not intended to undermine the basic structure of equity jurisprudence, developed over the centuries and explicitly recognized in the United States Constitution.

For these reasons I think the petition for a writ of mandamus should have been dismissed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Explain the relevance of Beacon Theatres to an action in which plaintiff seeks redress for a single wrong but asks for both legal and equitable relief. An example would be a copyright infringement action in which damages for past infringement (legal) and injunctive relief against future infringement (equitable) are sought. See Bruckman v. Hollzer, 152 F.2d 730 (9th Cir. 1946). Suppose that defendant in addition to denying infringement, puts forward a number of affirmative defenses, some of which pertain only to the demand for legal relief. After the presentation of evidence in the case, the jury renders a general verdict for defendant. Under what circumstances may the trial judge thereafter enter a judgment for plaintiff for equitable relief? See Ag Servs. of America v. Nielsen, 231 F.3d 726 (10th Cir. 2000).

2.Explain the relevance of Beacon Theatres to an action in which plaintiff is entitled to either legal or equitable relief but not both (for example, a breach of contract action in which plaintiff sues for specific performance or damages in the alternative). If plaintiff demands a jury, will the resolution of the question depend on which relief that party prefers and on the extent of the common issues? See Ford v. C.E. Wilson & Co., 30 F.Supp. 163 (D.Conn. 1939), affirmed, 129 F.2d 614 (2d Cir. 1942). If defendant demands a jury trial and plaintiff opposes it, does this mean that plaintiff elects equitable relief?

3.Explain the relevance of Beacon Theatres to a case in which a legal counterclaim is asserted against a claim for equitable relief or an equitable counterclaim is asserted against a legal claim. Compare Bendix Aviation Corp. v. Glass, 81 F.Supp. 645 (E.D.Pa.1948), with Liberty Oil Co. v. Condon Nat.

1061

Bank, 260 U.S. 235, 43 S.Ct. 118, 67 L.Ed. 232 (1922). Should the permissive or compulsory nature of the counterclaim be relevant in determining whether there is a jury trial right?

4. Explain the relevance of Beacon Theatresto a situation in which an issue that was determined without a jury in an equitable proceeding arises in a subsequent action at law under circumstances in which the doctrine of issue preclusion normally would bar relitigation. How should the court rule if one of the parties demanded a jury trial in the second action? See Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, p. 1334, infra.

5. Explain the relevance of Beacon Theatres to a situation in which a jury verdict is set aside in its entirety and a new trial ordered. May the court order that equitable remedies nonetheless be awarded to one party in advance of a new trial on the basis of the jury’s finding with regard to one aspect of liability in the first trial? See U.S. ex rel. Drakeford v. Tuomey Healthcare System, Inc., 675 F.3d 394 (4th Cir. 2012).

6. For an excellent analysis of many Beacon Theatres problems, see McCoid, Procedural Reform and the Right to Jury Trial, 116 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1 (1967).

DAIRY QUEEN, INC. v. WOOD, 369 U.S. 469, 82 S.Ct. 894, 8 L.Ed.2d 44 (1962), arose out of a licensing agreement entered into by respondents, owners of the trademark “Dairy Queen,” under which petitioner agreed to pay $150,000 for the exclusive right to use that trademark in certain parts of Pennsylvania. The contract provided for a small initial payment, with the remaining payments to be made at the rate of 50 percent of all amounts received by petitioner on sales and franchises to deal with the trademark; minimum annual payments were to be made regardless of petitioner’s receipts. In August 1960, respondents wrote petitioner a letter in which they claimed that the latter had committed “a material breach of that contract” by defaulting on the contract’s payment provisions and notified petitioner that the contract would be terminated unless the claimed default was remedied immediately. When petitioner continued to deal with the trademark, respondents brought an action for breach of contract praying for: (1) temporary and permanent injunctions to restrain petitioner from any future use of or dealing in the franchise and the trademark; (2) an accounting to determine the exact amount of money owed by petitioner and a judgment for that amount; and (3) an injunction pending an accounting to prevent petitioner from collecting any money from “Dairy Queen” stores in the territory.

The Eastern District of Pennsylvania granted a motion to strike petitioner’s demand for a jury trial on the alternative grounds that either the action was “purely equitable” or, if not purely equitable, the legal issues were “incidental” to equitable issues, and, in either case, no right to trial by jury existed. The Third Circuit refused to mandamus the district judge to vacate this order. The Supreme Court reversed. The Court first disposed of the District Court’s conclusion that there is no right to jury trial on legal issues that are “incidental” to equitable issues.

1062

* * * The holding in Beacon Theatres * * * applies whether the trial judge chooses to characterize the legal issues presented as “incidental” to equitable issues or not. Consequently, * * * Beacon Theatres requires that any legal issues for which a trial by jury is timely and properly demanded be submitted to a jury. * * *

Id. at 472–73, 82 S.Ct. at 897, 8 L.Ed.2d at 48.

As to the lower court’s conclusion that the action was “purely equitable,” the Court said:

* * * The most natural construction of the respondents’ claim for a money judgment would seem to be that it is a claim that they are entitled to recover whatever was owed them under the contract as of the date of its purported termination plus damages for infringement of their trademark since that date. * * * As an action on a debt allegedly due under a contract, it would be difficult to conceive of an action of a more traditionally legal character. And as an action for damages based upon a charge of trademark infringement, it would be no less subject to cognizance by a court of law.

The respondents’ contention that this money claim is “purely equitable” is based primarily upon the fact that their complaint is cast in terms of an “accounting,” rather than in terms of an action for “debt” or “damages.” But the constitutional right to trial by jury cannot be made to depend upon the choice of words used in the pleadings. The necessary prerequisite to the right to maintain a suit for an equitable accounting, like all other equitable remedies, is, as we pointed out in Beacon Theatres, the absence of an adequate remedy at law. Consequently, in order to maintain such a suit on a cause of action cognizable at law, as this one is, the plaintiff must be able to show that the “accounts between the parties” are of such a “complicated nature” that only a court of equity can satisfactorily unravel them. In view of the powers given to District Courts by Federal Rule * * * 53(b) to appoint masters to assist the jury in those exceptional cases where the legal issues are too complicated for the jury adequately to handle alone, the burden of such a showing is considerably increased and it will indeed be a rare case in which it can be met. * * * A jury, under proper instructions from the court, could readily determine the recovery, if any, to be had here, whether the theory finally settled upon is that of breach of contract, that of trademark infringement, or any combination of the two. * * *

1063

Id. at 476–79, 82 S.Ct. at 899–900, 8 L.Ed.2d at 50–52.

ROSS v. BERNHARD, 396 U.S. 531, 90 S.Ct. 733, 24 L.Ed.2d 729 (1970). Plaintiffs brought a derivative suit in federal court against the directors of a closed-end investment company of which they were shareholders and joined the company’s brokers, alleging that the company had been charged excessive brokerage fees. Plaintiffs’ demand for jury trial, granted by the trial court but set aside by the Second Circuit, was upheld by the Supreme Court in a five-to-three decision:

The common law refused * * * to permit stockholders to call corporate managers to account in actions at law. * * * Early in the 19th century, equity provided relief both in this country and in England. * * * The remedy made available in equity was the derivative suit, viewed in this country as a suit to enforce a corporate cause of action against officers, directors, and third parties. As elaborated in the cases, one precondition for the suit was a valid claim on which the corporation could have sued; another was that the corporation itself had refused to proceed after suitable demand, unless excused by extraordinary conditions. Thus the dual nature of the stockholder’s action: first, the plaintiff’s right to sue on behalf of the corporation and, second, the merits of the corporation’s claim itself.

Derivative suits posed no Seventh Amendment problems where the action against the directors and third parties would have been by a bill in equity had the corporation brought the suit. Our concern is with cases based upon a legal claim of the corporation against directors or third parties. Does the trial of such claims at the suit of a stockholder and without a jury violate the Seventh Amendment?

* * * The heart of the action is the corporate claim. If it presents a legal issue, one entitling the corporation to a jury trial under the Seventh Amendment, the right to a jury is not forfeited merely because the stockholder’s right to sue must first be adjudicated as an equitable issue triable to the court. Beacon and Dairy Queen require no less.

If under older procedures, now discarded, a court of equity could properly try the legal claims of the corporation presented in a derivative suit, it was because irreparable injury was threatened and no remedy at law existed as long as the stockholder was without standing to sue and the corporation itself refused to pursue its own remedies. * * *

1064

* * * Actions are no longer brought as actions at law or suits in equity. Under the Rules there is only one action—a “civil action”—in which all claims may be joined and all remedies are available. Purely procedural impediments to the presentation of any issue by any party, based on the difference between law and equity, were destroyed. In a civil action presenting a stockholder’s derivative claim, the court after passing upon the plaintiff’s right to sue on behalf of the corporation is now able to try the corporate claim for damages with the aid of a jury. * * * The “expansion of adequate legal remedies provided by * * * the Federal Rules necessarily affects the scope of equity.” Beacon Theatres, Inc. v. Westover, 359 U.S., at 509, 99 S.Ct., at 956.

Thus, for example, before-merger class actions were largely a device of equity, and there was no right to a jury even on issues that might, under other circumstances, have been tried to a jury. * * * [I]t now seems settled in the lower federal courts that class action plaintiffs may obtain a jury trial on any legal issues they present. * * *

Justice Stewart, dissented:

* * * Since, as the Court concedes, a shareholder’s derivative suit could be brought only in equity, it would seem to me to follow by the most elementary logic that in such suits there is no constitutional right to trial by jury. * * *

* * * [T]he Court’s effort to force the facts of this case into the mold of Beacon Theatres and Dairy Queen simply does not succeed. Those cases involved a combination of historically separable suits, one in law and one in equity. * * *

But the present case is not one involving traditionally equitable claims by one party, and traditionally legal claims by the other. Nor is it a suit in which the plaintiff is asserting a combination of legal and equitable claims. For, as we have seen, a derivative suit has always been conceived of as a single, unitary, equitable cause of action. It is for this reason, and not because of “procedural impediments,” that the courts of equity did not transfer derivative suits to the law side. * * *

If history is to be so cavalierly dismissed, the derivative suit can, of course, be artificially broken down into separable elements. But so then can any traditionally equitable cause of action, and the logic of the Court’s position would lead to the virtual elimination of all equity jurisdiction. An equitable suit for an injunction, for instance, often involves issues of fact which, if damages had been sought, would have been triable to a jury. Does this mean that in a suit asking only for injunctive relief these factual issues must be tried to the jury, with the judge left to decide only whether, given the jury’s findings, an injunction is the appropriate remedy? * * *

1065

Id. at 534–35, 539–41, 544, 549–50, 90 S.Ct. at 736, 738–39, 741, 743–44, 24 L.Ed.2d at 733–34, 736–37, 739, 742.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.A footnote in the majority opinion in Ross provided some guidance on the categorization of issues as legal or equitable for Seventh Amendment purposes:

As our cases indicate, the “legal” nature of an issue is determined by considering, first, the pre-merger custom with reference to such questions; second, the remedy sought; and, third, the practical abilities and limitations of juries. * * *

396 U.S. at 538 n.10, 90 S.Ct. at 738 n.10, 24 L.Ed.2d at 736 n.10. The significance of the third factor mentioned by the Court—the practical abilities and limitations of juries—was unclear. Did it suggest that the trial judge has discretion to limit the jury trial right to issues that are believed to be well suited for lay jury determination? On what grounds? Kane, Civil Jury Trial: The Case for Reasoned Iconoclasm, 28 Hastings L.J. 1, 11, 34 (1976), saw the third factor as representing “a movement toward a truly functional jury trial test.”

2. Some lower federal courts read the third “consideration” mentioned in the Ross footnote as a basis for denying a jury trial in cases in which the number of parties, complexity of the issues, or conceptual sophistication of the evidence and applicable substantive law support a finding that a jury would not be a rational and capable factfinder. See In re Japanese Electronic Prods. Antitrust Litigation, 631 F.2d 1069 (3d Cir. 1980), affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds following summary judgment 723 F.2d 238, 319 (3d Cir. 1983), reversed on other grounds Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 89 L.Ed.2d 538 (1986). Other federal courts rejected this approach as too great an incursion on the Seventh Amendment. See In re United States Financial Secs. Litigation, 609 F.2d 411 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 929, 100 S.Ct. 1866, 64 L.Ed.2d 281 (1980), overruling In re United States Fin. Secs. Litig., 75 F.R.D. 702 (S.D.Cal.1977).

The argument for the “complexity exception” was threefold. First, because this exception was recognized at common law at the time of the drafting and adoption of the Seventh Amendment, it was said to be consistent with the Constitution. See Arnold, A Historical Inquiry into the Right to Trial by Jury in Complex Civil Litigation, 128 U.Pa.L.Rev. 829 (1980); Campbell & Poidevin, Complex Cases and Jury Trials: A Reply to Professor Arnold, 128 U.Pa.L.Rev.

1066

965 (1980); Arnold, A Modest Replication to a Lengthy Discourse, 128 U.Pa.L.Rev. 986 (1980). Second, because there are practical limitations on jurors’ knowledge, experience, and ability, it was argued that complex and esoteric cases, arguably outstripping the capacity of even well-educated jurors, were best entrusted to the factfinding capacity of an experienced trial judge. Third, it was contended that to submit to a jury issues exceeding its capacity for rational and sound decision-making constitutes a denial of the litigants’ due process rights.

Consider whether procedures could be designed to overcome the concerns raised by the complexity exception. Some research suggests that the jury system could be improved by allowing note taking; permitting interim discussion of complicated evidence; or providing jurors with “notebooks” to enhance understanding of complicated material. See Reiber & Weinberg, The Complexity of Complexity: An Empirical Study of Juror Competence in Civil Cases, 78 U.Cin.L.Rev. 929 (2010); Hans, Judges, Juries, and Scientific Evidence, 16 J.L. & Pol’y 19 (2007). Would it be constitutional to limit the juror pool in a complex case to highly educated professionals? See Helm, Hans & Reyna, Trial by Numbers, 27 Cornell J.L. & Pub. Pol’y 107 (2017); Fisher, Going for the Blue Ribbon, 2 Colum. Sci. & Tech.L.Rev. 1 (2001). Procedural innovations are discussed in Section D, p. 1133, infra.

3. Do you see a relation between the complexity exception to the jury trial right and the Supreme Court’s increasing tendency to dispose of cases on motions to dismiss and summary judgment? These developments coincide with a drop in the number of jury trials overall. Consider Professor Miller’s analysis of these trends:

The less confident a court is in a jury’s ability to comprehend, retain, and apply quantities of technical, scientific, and economic information, or to distinguish intertwined legal and factual issues, the more disposed it may be to use the occasion of a summary judgment motion to decide mixed law and fact questions and those it labels “beyond dispute.” Thus the court may tend to believe that its own determination will be more rational than that of a jury. However, jurors should not be assumed incompetent or unable to comprehend issues posed by difficult cases. In fact, the ability to employ court-appointed experts or masters under Rule 53 to assist a jury when issues are complex exhibits the Rules’ presumption of juror competence.

Miller, The Pretrial Rush to Judgment: Are the “Litigation Explosion,” “Liability Crisis,” and Efficiency Clichés Eroding Our Day in Court and Jury Trial Commitments?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982, 1108–09 (2003).

4. Is there a constitutional right to a non-jury trial on issues that historically were considered equitable and therefore were tried by the chancellor? See Note, The Right to a Nonjury Trial, 74 Harv.L.Rev. 1176 (1961). In Michaelson v. United States ex rel. Chicago, ST. P., M. & O. R. Co., 291 Fed. 940, 946 (7th Cir. 1923), the court remarked that “Congress cannot constitutionally deprive the parties in an equity court of the right of trial by the chancellor.” The Supreme Court reversed on other grounds, 266 U.S. 42, 45 S.Ct. 18, 69 L.Ed. 162 (1924), and simply acknowledged the importance of the question. See Van Hecke, Trial by Jury in Equity Cases, 31 N.C.L.Rev. 157, 173 (1953). What is the significance of the statement in Beacon Theatres that “the right to jury trial is a constitutional one * * * while no similar requirement protects trials by the court”?

1067

iii. Newly Established Court-Based Rights to Relief

CURTIS V. LOETHER

Supreme Court of the United States, 1974.
415 U.S. 189, 94 S.Ct. 1005, 39 L.Ed.2d 260.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

Section 812 of the Civil Rights Act of 1968, 82 Stat. 88, 42 U.S.C. § 3612, authorizes private plaintiffs to bring civil actions to redress violations of Title VIII, the fair housing provisions of the Act * * *. The question presented in this case is whether the Civil Rights Act or the Seventh Amendment requires a jury trial upon demand by one of the parties in an action for damages and injunctive relief under this section.

Petitioner, a Negro woman, brought this action under § 812, claiming that respondents, who are white, had refused to rent an apartment to her because of her race * * *. In her complaint she sought only injunctive relief and punitive damages; a claim for compensatory damages was later added. After an evidentiary hearing, the District Court granted preliminary injunctive relief, enjoining the respondents from renting the apartment in question to anyone else pending the trial on the merits. This injunction was dissolved some five months later with the petitioner’s consent, after she had finally obtained other housing, and the case went to trial on the issues of actual and punitive damages.

Respondents made a timely demand for jury trial in their answer. The District Court * * * denied the jury request. * * * After trial on the merits, the District Judge found that respondents had in fact discriminated against petitioner on account of her race. Although he found no actual damages, * * * he awarded $250 in punitive damages, denying petitioner’s request for attorney’s fees and court costs.

The Court of Appeals reversed on the jury trial issue. * * * In view of the importance of the jury trial issue in the administration and enforcement of Title VIII and the diversity of views in the lower courts on the question, we granted certiorari * * *. We affirm.

1068

* * * [W]e think it is clear that the Seventh Amendment entitles either party to demand a jury trial in an action for damages in the federal courts under § 812.

* * * Although the thrust of the Amendment was to preserve the right to jury trial as it existed in 1791, it has long been settled that the right extends beyond the common-law forms of action recognized at that time. * * *

Petitioner nevertheless argues that the Amendment is inapplicable to new causes of action created by congressional enactment. As the Court of Appeals observed, however, we have considered the applicability of the constitutional right to jury trial in actions enforcing statutory rights “as a matter too obvious to be doubted.” * * * The Seventh Amendment does apply to actions enforcing statutory rights, and requires a jury trial upon demand, if the statute creates legal rights and remedies, enforceable in an action for damages in the ordinary courts of law.

NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 57 S.Ct. 615, 81 L.Ed. 893 (1937), relied on by petitioner, lends no support to her statutory-rights argument. The Court there upheld the award of back pay without jury trial in an NLRB unfair labor practice proceeding, rejecting a Seventh Amendment claim on the ground that the case involved a “statutory proceeding” and “not a suit at common law or in the nature of such a suit.” Id. at 48[, 57 S.Ct. at 629, 81 L.Ed. at 918]. Jones & Laughlin merely stands for the proposition that the Seventh Amendment is generally inapplicable in administrative proceedings, where jury trials would be incompatible with the whole concept of administrative adjudication and would substantially interfere with the NLRB’s role in the statutory scheme. * * * These cases uphold congressional power to entrust enforcement of statutory rights to an administrative process or specialized court of equity free from the strictures of the Seventh Amendment. But when Congress provides for enforcement of statutory rights in an ordinary civil action in the district courts, where there is obviously no functional justification for denying the jury trial right, a jury trial must be available if the action involves rights and remedies of the sort typically enforced in an action at law.

We think it is clear that a damages action under § 812 is an action to enforce “legal rights” within the meaning of our Seventh Amendment decisions. See, e.g., Ross v. Bernhard * * * [p. 1063, supra]; Dairy Queen, Inc. v. Wood * * * [p. 1061, supra]. A damages action under the statute sounds basically in tort—the statute merely defines a new legal duty, and authorizes the courts to compensate a plaintiff for the injury caused by the defendant’s wrongful breach. As the Court of Appeals noted, this cause of action is analogous to a number of tort actions recognized at common law.¹⁰ More important, the relief sought here—actual and punitive damages—is the traditional form of relief offered in the courts of law.

1069

We need not, and do not, go so far as to say that any award of monetary relief must necessarily be “legal” relief. * * * A comparison of Title VIII with Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, where the courts of appeals have held that jury trial is not required in an action for reinstatement and back pay, is instructive, although we of course express no view on the jury trial issue in that context. In Title VII cases the courts of appeals have characterized back pay as an integral part of an equitable remedy, a form of restitution. But the statutory language on which this characterization is based—

[T]he court may enjoin the respondent from engaging in such unlawful employment practice, and order such affirmative action as may be appropriate, which may include, but is not limited to, reinstatement or hiring of employees, with or without back pay * * *, or any other equitable relief as the court deems appropriate, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g) (1970 ed., Supp. II)— contrasts sharply with § 812’s simple authorization of an action for actual and punitive damages. In Title VII cases, also, the courts have relied on the fact that the decision whether to award back pay is committed to the discretion of the trial judge. There is no comparable discretion here: if a plaintiff proves unlawful discrimination and actual damages, he is entitled to judgment for that amount. Nor is there any sense in which the award here can be viewed as requiring the defendant to disgorge funds wrongfully withheld from the plaintiff. Whatever may be the merit of the “equitable” characterization in Title VII cases, there is surely no basis for characterizing the award of compensatory and punitive damages here as equitable relief.

We are not oblivious to the force of petitioner’s policy arguments. Jury trials may delay to some extent the disposition of Title VIII damages actions. But Title VIII actions seeking only equitable relief will be unaffected, and preliminary injunctive relief remains available without a jury trial even in damages actions, Dairy Queen, Inc. v. Wood * * *. Moreover, the statutory requirement of expedition of § 812 actions * * * applies equally to jury and nonjury trials. We recognize, too, the possibility that jury prejudice may deprive a victim of discrimination of the verdict to which he or she is entitled. Of course, the trial judge’s power to direct a verdict, to grant judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or to grant a new trial provides substantial protection against this risk, and respondents’ suggestion that jury trials will expose a broader segment of the populace to the example of the federal civil rights laws in operation has some force. More fundamentally, however, these considerations are insufficient to overcome the clear command of the Seventh Amendment. * * * The decision of the Court of Appeals must be affirmed.

1070

Affirmed.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

TULL v. UNITED STATES, 481 U.S. 412, 107 S.Ct. 1831, 95 L.Ed.2d 365 (1987), further considered how a federal court should decide whether a modern-day statutory action is entitled to a trial by jury. In Tull the Government sued in federal court to impose a statutory monetary penalty on defendant for alleged violations of the Clean Water Act. Defendant demanded a jury trial, arguing that the action was akin to an historical action in debt decided by the law courts. The Government countered with arguments that the action was basically one in equity to abate a nuisance. The Supreme Court noted that in making its decision it first must “compare the statutory action to 18th-century actions brought in the courts of England prior to the merger of the courts of law and equity * * * [and then] examine the remedy sought and determine whether it is legal or equitable in nature.” Id. at 417–18, 107 S.Ct. at 1835, 95 L.Ed.2d at 373. However, the Court went on to state “that characterizing the relief sought is ‘[m]ore important’ than finding a precisely analogous common law cause of action in determining whether the Seventh Amendment guarantees a jury trial.” Id. at 421, 107 S.Ct. at 1837, 95 L.Ed.2d at 375 (internal citation omitted). The Court then found that a civil penalty was a remedy enforced by the law courts and thus entitled to a trial by jury. Does the Court’s two-part “test” make sense? If the nature of the remedy is “more important” than the characterization of the action, what is the value of the latter determination? See the concurring opinion of Justice Brennan in Chauffeurs, Teamsters & Helpers, Local 391 v. Terry, pp. 1079–1080, infra.

iv. Decisions by Non-Article III Tribunals

ATLAS ROOFING CO. v. OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY & HEALTH REVIEW COMMISSION, 430 U.S. 442, 97 S.Ct. 1261, 51 L.Ed.2d 464 (1977). Petitioners were cited for violations of the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) and fines were imposed on them after hearings before administrative law judges of the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission (OSHRC). Two Courts of Appeals upheld the Commission’s orders and rejected the petitioners’ claim that the enforcement scheme violated the Seventh Amendment. In an opinion by Justice White, the Supreme Court affirmed:

* * * At least in cases in which “public rights” are being litigated—e.g., cases in which the Government sues in its sovereign capacity to enforce public rights created by statutes within the power of Congress to enact—the Seventh Amendment does not prohibit Congress from assigning the factfinding function and initial adjudication to an administrative forum with which the jury would be incompatible.

1071

* * * [Petitioners also argue] that the right to jury trial was never intended to depend on the identity of the forum to which Congress has chosen to submit a dispute; otherwise, it is said, Congress could utterly destroy the right to a jury trial by always providing for administrative rather than judicial resolution of the vast range of cases that now arise in the courts. The argument is well put, but it overstates the holdings of our prior cases and is in any event unpersuasive. Our prior cases support administrative factfinding in only those situations involving “public rights,” e.g., where the Government is involved in its sovereign capacity under an otherwise valid statute creating enforceable public rights. Wholly private tort, contract, and property cases, as well as a vast range of other cases, are not at all implicated.

More to the point, it is apparent from the history of jury trial in civil matters that factfinding, which is the essential function of the jury in civil cases, * * * was never the exclusive province of the jury under either the English or American legal systems at the time of the adoption of the Seventh Amendment; and the question whether a fact would be found by a jury turned to a considerable degree on the nature of the forum in which a litigant found himself. * * * The question whether a particular case was to be tried in a court of equity—without a jury—or a court of law—with a jury—did not depend on whether the suit involved factfinding or on the nature of the facts to be found. * * * Rather, as a general rule, the decision turned on whether courts of law supplied a cause of action and an adequate remedy to the litigant. If it did, then the case would be tried in a court of law before a jury. * * *

* * *

The point is that the Seventh Amendment was never intended to establish the jury as the exclusive mechanism for factfinding in civil cases. * * * We cannot conclude that the Amendment rendered Congress powerless—when it concluded that remedies available in courts of law were inadequate to cope with a problem within Congress’ power to regulate—to create new public rights and remedies by statute and commit their enforcement, if it chose, to a tribunal other than a court of law—such as an administrative agency—in which facts are not found by juries. * * *

1072

* * * [H]istory and our cases support the proposition that the right to a jury trial turns not solely on the nature of the issue to be resolved but also on the forum in which it is to be resolved. Congress found the common-law and other existing remedies for work injuries resulting from unsafe working conditions to be inadequate to protect the Nation’s working men and women. It created a new cause of action, and remedies therefor, unknown to the common law, and placed their enforcement in a tribunal supplying speedy and expert resolutions of the issues involved. The Seventh Amendment is no bar to the creation of new rights or to their enforcement outside the regular courts of law.

* * *

Id. at 450, 457–61, 97 S.Ct. at 1266, 1270–72, 51 L.Ed.2d at 472, 476–79.

QUESTIONS

Does Atlas create an exception only for “public rights” cases? Could the legislature provide that ordinary personal injury actions are to be decided by an administrative tribunal because existing remedies are “inadequate”? Are there any limits on Congress’s power to replace common law claims with statutory claims and to assign adjudication of the latter to administrative tribunals?

GRANFINANCIERA, S.A. v. NORDBERG, 492 U.S. 33, 109 S.Ct. 2782, 106 L.Ed.2d 26 (1989). Nordberg, the bankruptcy trustee for the debtor, Chase & Sanborn Corporation, brought an adversary proceeding under the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 548 & 550, against Granfinanciera to recover funds fraudulently transferred to Granfinanciera by the debtor before bankruptcy. In addition to avoiding (that is, unwinding) the transfers, the trustee’s fraudulent conveyance action sought damages, costs, expenses, and interest. Granfinanciera’s request for a jury trial was denied on the ground that the bankruptcy courts, like administrative agencies, are outside the Seventh Amendment. The Supreme Court disagreed:

The form of our analysis is familiar. “First, we compare the statutory action to 18th-century actions brought in the courts of England prior to the merger of the courts of law and equity. Second, we examine the remedy sought and determine whether it is legal or equitable in nature.” Tull v. United States * * *. The second stage of this analysis is more important than the first. * * * If, on balance, these two factors indicate that a party is entitled to a jury trial under the Seventh Amendment, we must decide whether Congress may assign and has assigned resolution of the relevant claim to a non-Article III adjudicative body that does not use a jury as factfinder.

1073

Id. at 42, 109 S.Ct. at 2790, 106 L.Ed.2d at 41. Applying this test, the Court determined that the jury trial right attached to an action to recover a fraudulent conveyance, and that the public-rights exception was not implicated in private tort, contract, and property cases:

* * * Congress may devise novel causes of action involving public rights free from the strictures of the Seventh Amendment if it assigns their adjudication to tribunals without statutory authority to employ juries as factfinders. But it lacks the power to strip parties contesting matters of private right of their constitutional right to a trial by jury. * * *

In certain situations, of course, Congress may fashion causes of action that are closely analogous to common-law claims and place them beyond the ambit of the Seventh Amendment by assigning their resolution to a forum in which jury trials are unavailable. * * * Congress’ power to do so is limited, however, just as its power to place adjudicative authority in non-Article III tribunals is circumscribed.

* * * If a statutory right is not closely intertwined with a federal regulatory program Congress has power to enact, and if the right neither belongs to nor exists against the Federal Government, then it must be adjudicated by an Article III court. If the right is legal in nature, then it carries with it the Seventh Amendment’s guarantee of a jury trial.

The Court then considered whether the jury trial right attached to an action in the bankruptcy court:

* * * Although the issue admits of some debate, a bankruptcy trustee’s right to recover a fraudulent conveyance under 11 U.S.C. 548(a)(2) seems to us more accurately characterized as a private rather than a public right as we have used those terms in our Article III decisions. * * * There can be little doubt that fraudulent conveyance actions by bankruptcy trustees * * * are quintessentially suits at common law that more nearly resemble state-law contract claims brought by a bankrupt corporation to augment the bankruptcy estate than they do creditors’ hierarchically ordered claims to a pro rata share of the bankruptcy res. They therefore appear matters of private rather than public right. * * *

* * * It may be that providing jury trials in some fraudulent conveyance actions—if not in this particular case, because respondent’s suit was commenced after the bankruptcy court approved the debtor’s plan of reorganization—would impede swift resolution of bankruptcy proceedings and increase the expense of Chapter 11 reorganizations. But “these considerations are insufficient to overcome the clear command of the Seventh Amendment.” * * *

Id. at 55–63, 109 S.Ct. at 2797–802, 106 L.Ed.2d at 49–54.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In foot note 4 of the majority opinion in Granfinanciera, Justice Brennan commented:

This quite distinct inquiry into whether Congress has permissibly entrusted the resolution of certain disputes to an administrative agency or specialized court of equity, and whether jury trials would impair the functioning of the legislative scheme, appears to be what the Court contemplated when, in Ross v. Bernhard * * * it identified “the practical abilities and limitations of juries” as an additional factor to be consulted in determining whether the Seventh Amendment confers a jury trial right. * * *

Does this mean that the complexity of the issues can justify denial of the jury trial right only if the dispute involves a public right and Congress has created an administrative agency for adjudication of the claim?

2. Granfinanciera left open whether a bankruptcy judge may preside over a jury trial, and the lower courts divided in their response to this question. In 1994, Congress authorized bankruptcy courts to conduct jury trials in core matters with the express consent of the parties; however, a party that submits a claim against the bankruptcy estate waives the right to a civil jury trial. 28 U.S.C. § 157(e). See 17 Wright, Miller & Amar, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4106 (3d ed.).

v. The Modern Effect of Historical Equity Jurisdiction Based on a Party’s Legal Status

CHAUFFEURS, TEAMSTERS AND HELPERS LOCAL 391 v. TERRY

Supreme Court of the United States, 1990.
494 U.S. 558, 110 S.Ct. 1339, 108 L.Ed.2d 519.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court except as to Part III-A.

This case presents the question whether an employee who seeks relief in the form of backpay for a union’s alleged breach of its duty of fair representation has a right to trial by jury. We hold that the Seventh Amendment entitles such a plaintiff to a jury trial.

I

McLean Trucking Company and the Chauffeurs, Teamsters, and Helpers Local Union No. 391 were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement that governed the terms and conditions of employment at McLean’s terminals. The 27 respondents were employed by McLean as truckdrivers in bargaining units covered by the agreement, and all were members of the Union.

* * * Claiming a violation of their seniority rights, respondents filed a * * * grievance with the Union, but the Union declined to refer the charges to a grievance committee on the ground that the relevant issues had been determined in * * * prior proceedings.

In July 1983, respondents filed an action in District Court, alleging * * * that the Union had violated its duty of fair representation * * * [and] sought, inter alia, compensatory damages for lost wages and health benefits. * * *

Respondents had requested a jury trial in their pleadings. The Union moved to strike the jury demand on the ground that no right to a jury trial exists in a duty of fair representation suit. The District Court denied the motion to strike. After an interlocutory appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the trial court, holding that the Seventh Amendment entitled respondents to a jury trial of their claim for monetary relief. 863 F.2d 334 (1988). We granted the petition for certiorari to resolve a circuit conflict on this issue * * * and now affirm the judgment of the Fourth Circuit.

II

The duty of fair representation is inferred from unions’ exclusive authority under the National Labor Relations Act, 49 Stat. 449, 29 U.S.C. § 159(a) (1982 ed.), to represent all employees in a bargaining unit. * * * The duty requires a union “to serve the interests of all members without hostility or discrimination toward any, to exercise its discretion with complete good faith and honesty, and to avoid arbitrary conduct.” * * *

III

* * *

To determine whether a particular action will resolve legal rights, we examine both the nature of the issues involved and the remedy sought. “First, we compare the statutory action to 18th-century actions brought in the courts of England prior to the merger of the courts of law and equity. Second, we examine the remedy sought and determine whether it is legal or equitable in nature.” Tull * * * [p. 1070]. The second inquiry is the more important in our analysis. * * *

1076

A

An action for breach of a union’s duty of fair representation was unknown in 18th-century England; in fact, collective bargaining was unlawful. * * * We must therefore look for an analogous cause of action that existed in the 18th century to determine whether the nature of this duty of fair representation suit is legal or equitable.

The Union contends that this duty of fair representation action resembles a suit brought to vacate an arbitration award because respondents seek to set aside the result of the grievance process. In the 18th century, an action to set aside an arbitration award was considered equitable. * * *

The arbitration analogy is inapposite, however, to the Seventh Amendment question posed in this case. No grievance committee has considered respondents’ claim that the Union violated its duty of fair representation; the grievance process was concerned only with the employer’s alleged breach of the collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, respondents’ claim against the Union cannot be characterized as an action to vacate an arbitration award * * *.

The Union next argues that respondents’ duty of fair representation action is comparable to an action by a trust beneficiary against a trustee for breach of fiduciary duty. Such actions were within the exclusive jurisdiction of courts of equity. * * * This analogy is far more persuasive than the arbitration analogy. Just as a trustee must act in the best interests of the beneficiaries, * * * a union, as the exclusive representative of the workers, must exercise its power to act on behalf of the employees in good faith * * *. Moreover, just as a beneficiary does not directly control the actions of a trustee, * * * an individual employee lacks direct control over a union’s actions taken on his behalf * * *.

The trust analogy extends to a union’s handling of grievances. In most cases, a trustee has the exclusive authority to sue third parties who injure the beneficiaries’ interest in the trust, * * * including any legal claim the trustee holds in trust for the beneficiaries, * * *. The trustee then has the sole responsibility for determining whether to settle, arbitrate, or otherwise dispose of the claim. * * * Similarly, the union typically has broad discretion in its decision whether and how to pursue an employee’s grievance against an employer. * * * Just as a trust beneficiary can sue to enforce a contract entered into on his behalf by the trustee only if the trustee “improperly refuses or neglects to bring an action against the third person,” * * * so an employee can sue his employer for a breach of the collective-bargaining agreement only if he shows that the union breached its duty of fair representation in its handling of the grievance * * *.

1077

Respondents contend that their duty of fair representation suit is less like a trust action than an attorney malpractice action, which was historically an action at law * * *.

The attorney malpractice analogy is inadequate in several respects. Although an attorney malpractice suit is in some ways similar to a suit alleging a union’s breach of its fiduciary duty, the two actions are fundamentally different. The nature of an action is in large part controlled by the nature of the underlying relationship between the parties. Unlike employees represented by a union, a client controls the significant decisions concerning his representation. Moreover, a client can fire his attorney if he is dissatisfied with his attorney’s performance. This option is not available to an individual employee who is unhappy with a union’s representation, unless a majority of the members of the bargaining unit share his dissatisfaction. * * * Thus, we find the malpractice analogy less convincing than the trust analogy.

Nevertheless, the trust analogy does not persuade us to characterize respondents’ claim as wholly equitable. The Union’s argument mischaracterizes the nature of our comparison of the action before us to 18th-century forms of action. As we observed in Ross v. Bernhard * * * [p. 1063, supra], “The Seventh Amendment question depends on the nature of the issue to be tried rather than the character of the overall action.” * * * [T]o recover from the Union here, respondents must prove both that McLean violated § 301 by breaching the collective-bargaining agreement and that the Union breached its duty of fair representation. When viewed in isolation, the duty of fair representation issue is analogous to a claim against a trustee for breach of fiduciary duty. The § 301 issue, however, is comparable to a breach of contract claim—a legal issue.

Respondents’ action against the Union thus encompasses both equitable and legal issues. The first part of our Seventh Amendment inquiry, then, leaves us in equipoise as to whether respondents are entitled to a jury trial.

B

Our determination under the first part of the Seventh Amendment analysis is only preliminary. * * * In this case, the only remedy sought is a request for compensatory damages representing backpay and benefits. Generally, an action for money damages was “the traditional form of relief offered in the courts of law.” Curtis v. Loether * * * [p. 1067, supra]. This Court has not, however, held that “any award of monetary relief must necessarily be ‘legal’ relief.” Ibid. (emphasis added). * * * [B]ecause we conclude that the remedy respondents seek has none of the attributes that must be present before we will find an exception to the general rule and characterize damages as equitable, we find that the remedy sought by respondents is legal.

1078

First, we have characterized damages as equitable where they are restitutionary, such as in “action[s] for disgorgement of improper profits,” Tull * * *. * * * The backpay sought by respondents is not money wrongfully held by the Union, but wages and benefits they would have received from McLean had the Union processed the employees’ grievances properly. Such relief is not restitutionary.

Second, a monetary award “incidental to or intertwined with injunctive relief” may be equitable. Tull * * *. * * * Because respondents seek only money damages, this characteristic is clearly absent from the case.⁸

The Union argues that the backpay relief sought here must nonetheless be considered equitable because this Court has labeled backpay awarded under Title VII, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq. (1982 ed.), as equitable. * * *

The Court has never held that a plaintiff seeking backpay under Title VII has a right to a jury trial. See Lorillard v. Pons, 434 U.S. 575, 581–582[, 98 S.Ct. 866, 870–871, 55 L.Ed.2d 40] (1978). Assuming, without deciding, that such a Title VII plaintiff has no right to a jury trial, the Union’s argument does not persuade us that respondents are not entitled to a jury trial here. Congress specifically characterized backpay under Title VII as a form of “equitable relief.” * * * Congress made no similar pronouncement regarding the duty of fair representation. Furthermore, the Court has noted that backpay sought from an employer under Title VII would generally be restitutionary in nature, see Curtis v. Loether * * *, in contrast to the damages sought here from the union. Thus, the remedy sought in this duty of fair representation case is clearly different from backpay sought for violations of Title VII.

* * *

We hold, then, that the remedy of backpay sought in this duty of fair representation action is legal in nature. Considering both parts of the Seventh Amendment inquiry, we find that respondents are entitled to a jury trial on all issues presented in their suit.

1079

* * *

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE BRENNAN, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

I agree with the Court that respondents seek a remedy that is legal in nature and that the Seventh Amendment entitles respondents to a jury trial on their duty of fair representation claims. * * * I do not join that part of the opinion which reprises the particular historical analysis this Court has employed to determine whether a claim is a “Suit at common law” under the Seventh Amendment, * * * because I believe the historical test can and should be simplified.

The current test * * * requires a court to compare the right at issue to 18th-century English forms of action to determine whether the historically analogous right was vindicated in an action at law or in equity, and to examine whether the remedy sought is legal or equitable in nature. However, this Court, in expounding the test, has repeatedly discounted the significance of the analogous form of action for deciding where the Seventh Amendment applies. I think it is time we dispense with it altogether. I would decide Seventh Amendment questions on the basis of the relief sought. If the relief is legal in nature, i.e., if it is the kind of relief that historically was available from courts of law, I would hold that the parties have a constitutional right to a trial by jury—unless Congress has permissibly delegated the particular dispute to a non-Article III decisionmaker and jury trials would frustrate Congress’ purposes in enacting a particular statutory scheme.

* * *

We have long acknowledged that, of the factors relevant to the jury trial right, comparison of the claim to ancient forms of action, “requiring extensive and possibly abstruse historical inquiry, is obviously the most difficult to apply.” Ross v. Bernhard * * *. Requiring judges, with neither the training nor time necessary for reputable historical scholarship, to root through the tangle of primary and secondary sources to determine which of a hundred or so writs is analogous to the right at issue has embroiled courts in recondite controversies better left to legal historians. * * *

To rest the historical test required by the Seventh Amendment solely on the nature of the relief sought would not, of course, offer the federal courts a rule that is in all cases self-executing. Courts will still be required to ask which remedies were traditionally available at law and which only in equity. But this inquiry involves fewer variables and simpler choices, on the whole, and is far more manageable than the scholasticist debates in which we have been engaged. Moreover, the rule I propose would remain true to the Seventh Amendment, as it is undisputed that, historically,

1080

“[j]urisdictional lines [between law and equity] were primarily a matter of remedy.” McCoid, Procedural Reform and the Right to Jury Trial: A Study of Beacon Theaters, Inc. v. Westover, 116 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1 (1967). * * *

This is not to say that the resulting division between claims entitled to jury trials and claims not so entitled would exactly mirror the division between law and equity in England in 1791. But it is too late in the day for this Court to profess that the Seventh Amendment preserves the right to jury trial only in cases that would have been heard in the British law courts of the 18th century. See, e.g., * * * Ross v. Bernhard * * *.

JUSTICE STEVENS, concurring in part and concurring in the judgment.

Because I believe the Court has made this case unnecessarily difficult by exaggerating the importance of finding a precise common-law analogue to the duty of fair representation, I do not join Part III-A of its opinion. * * *

* * * Duty of fair representation suits are for the most part ordinary civil actions involving the stuff of contract and malpractice disputes. There is accordingly no ground for excluding these actions from the jury right.

In my view, the evolution of this doctrine through suits tried to juries, the useful analogy to common-law malpractice cases, and the well-recognized duty to scrutinize any proposed curtailment of the right to a jury trial “with the utmost care,” * * * provide a plainly sufficient basis for the Court’s holding today. * * *

JUSTICE KENNEDY, with whom JUSTICE O’CONNOR and JUSTICE SCALIA join, dissenting.

* * *

I disagree with the analytic innovation of the Court that identification of the trust action as a model for modern duty of fair representation actions is insufficient to decide the case. The Seventh Amendment requires us to determine whether the duty of fair representation action “is more similar to cases that were tried in courts of law than to suits tried in courts of equity.” Tull v. United States. Having made this decision in favor of an equitable action, our inquiry should end. Because the Court disagrees with this proposition, I dissent.

* * *

II

The Court relies on two lines of precedents to overcome the conclusion that the trust action should serve as the controlling model. The first consists of cases in which the Court has considered simplifications in litigation resulting from modern procedural reforms in the federal courts. Justice Marshall asserts that these cases show that the Court must look at the character of individual issues rather than claims as a whole. * * * The second line addresses the significance of the remedy in determining the equitable or legal nature of an action for the purpose of choosing the most appropriate analogy. Under these cases, the Court decides that the respondents have a right to a jury because they seek money damages. * * * These authorities do not support the Court’s holding.

1081

A

In * * * [Beacon Theatres, Dairy Queen, and Ross] we have found a right to trial by jury where there are legal claims that, for procedural reasons, a plaintiff could have or must have raised in the courts of equity before the systems merged. * * *

These three cases responded to the difficulties created by a merged court system. * * * They stand for the proposition that, because distinct courts of equity no longer exist, the possibility or necessity of using former equitable procedures to press a legal claim no longer will determine the right to a jury. Justice Marshall reads these cases to require a jury trial whenever a cause of action contains legal issues and would require a jury trial in this case because the respondents must prove a breach of the collective-bargaining agreement as one element of their claim. * * *

I disagree. The respondents, as shown above, are asserting an equitable claim. Having reached this conclusion, the Beacon, Dairy Queen, and Ross cases are inapplicable. Although we have divided self-standing legal claims from equitable declaratory, accounting, and derivative procedures, we have never parsed legal elements out of equitable claims absent specific procedural justifications. Actions which, beyond all question, are equitable in nature may involve some predicate inquiry that would be submitted to a jury in other contexts. For example, just as the plaintiff in a duty of fair representation action against his union must show breach of the collective-bargaining agreement as an initial matter, in an action against a trustee for failing to pursue a claim the beneficiary must show that the claim had some merit. * * * But the question of the claim’s validity, even if the claim raises contract issues, would not bring the jury right into play in a suit against a trustee.

* * *

B

The Court also rules that, despite the appropriateness of the trust analogy as a whole, the respondents have a right to a jury trial because they seek money damages. * * * The nature of the remedy remains a factor of considerable importance in determining whether a statutory action had a legal or equitable analog in 1791, but we have not adopted a rule that a statutory action permitting damages is by definition more analogous to a legal action than to any equitable suit. In each case, we look to the remedy to determine whether, taken with other factors, it places an action within the definition of “suits at common law.”

1082

In Curtis * * *, for example, we ruled that the availability of actual and punitive damages made a statutory antidiscrimination action resemble a legal tort action more than any equitable action. We made explicit that we did not “go so far as to say that any award of monetary relief must necessarily be ‘legal’ relief.” * * * Although monetary damages might cause some statutory actions to resemble tort suits, the presence of monetary damages in this duty of fair representation action does not make it more analogous to a legal action than to an equitable action. Indeed, as shown above, the injunctive and monetary remedies available make the duty of fair representation suit less analogous to a malpractice action than to a suit against a trustee.

* * *

III

The Court must adhere to the historical test in determining the right to a jury because the language of the Constitution requires it. The Seventh Amendment “preserves” the right to jury trial in civil cases. We cannot preserve a right existing in 1791 unless we look to history to identify it. * * *

I would hesitate to abandon or curtail the historical test out of concern for the competence of the Court to understand legal history. We do look to history for the answers to constitutional questions. * * * Although opinions will differ on what this history shows, the approach has no less validity in the Seventh Amendment context than elsewhere.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In footnote 8 of his opinion in Terry, does Justice Marshall provide an adequate explanation for continuing to employ a two-prong test that values the second prong more than the first? Or does the historical analysis “needlessly convolute our Seventh Amendment jurisprudence,” as Justice Brennan argues? Justices Marshall and Stevens and the dissenters all disagree on the appropriate historical model for a “duty of fair representation” action. Is this disagreement in favor of severing the historical analysis from the Seventh Amendment test, or favor keeping the analysis as it is?

2. In CITY OF MONTEREY v. DEL MONTE DUNES, 526 U.S. 687, 119 S.Ct. 1624, 143 L.Ed.2d 882 (1999), a property owner sued for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 to challenge, as an unconstitutional regulatory taking of property without just compensation, the city’s land-use decisions blocking development of a residential complex on the property. The Court rendered three opinions, holding by a five-to-four majority that a jury trial was proper.

1083

The four dissenting Justices argued that the case was at heart a condemnation action, and prior decisions of the Court had established that there is no right to trial by jury in those eminent domain proceedings. In a plurality opinion, four Justices disagreed, noting that a condemnation action historically is one brought by the government conceding liability for compensation owed to the owner of the property, thereby leaving “a mere determination of the amount of compensation due.” Id. at 712, 119 S.Ct. at 1639, 143 L.Ed. at 906. However, in Del Monte Dunes, the property owner initiated the suit. The plurality concluded that such a case is akin historically to a tort action for damages, and thus carries the right to a jury trial under the Seventh Amendment. Justice Scalia concurred in part and concurred in the judgment on the ground that Section 1983 itself, when an action is brought to recover damages, provides for a jury trial, regardless of the nature of the underlying cause.

d. The Right to Jury Trial in the State Courts

In some states there is a right to a jury trial in equity cases, which eliminates the problem presented by Beacon Theatres and Dairy Queen. In most states that have merged law and equity, however, issues similar to those in the federal courts have arisen since the adoption of the codes.

The Commissioners who prepared the original New York Code of Procedure (1848) were aware of the problem presented by abolishing the distinction between law and equity at a time when that state’s constitution continued to guarantee “trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used.” This language appeared in the New York Constitutions of 1777, 1821, 1846, and 1894. Because it was interpreted to mean that each successive constitution guaranteed jury trial in any case to which it had been extended by the legislature since the adoption of the preceding constitution, it was changed in the constitution of 1938 to guarantee jury trial only “in all cases in which it has heretofore been guaranteed by constitutional provision.” N.Y. Const. Art. I, § 2. The Commissioners also attempted to solve the characterization problem by specific provisions, N.Y. Code of Proc. §§ 208–09 (1848):

§ 208. Whenever, in an action for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property, there shall be an issue of fact, it must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial be waived * * *.

§ 209. Every other issue is triable by the court, which, however, may order the whole issue, or any specific question of fact involved therein, to be tried by a jury * * *.

These provisions were copied in a great many states. Nevertheless, “in most jurisdictions * * * the courts, while occasionally giving the statute some weight, * * * regarded it generally as merely restating the law-equity dichotomy, and have proceeded to make their determination on historical grounds.” Note, The Right to Jury Trial Under Merged Procedures, 65 Harv.L.Rev. 453, 454 (1952). When there have been “legal” and “equitable” issues in the same case, the tendency has been to find one or the other the “predominant” concern and try the case accordingly. Perhaps most frequently the decision has been to find the case “predominantly” equitable, with jury trial denied on the “legal” issues on the grounds that they are “incidental,” or that a jury trial is waived by joining a legal claim in an equitable action. Id. at 454–55. For a classic example, see Hiatt v. Yergin, 152 Ind.App. 497, 284 N.E.2d 834 (1972).

1084

3.THE PROVINCE OF JUDGE AND JURY

The modern law-fact distinction assigns factfinding to the jury, but there is substantial evidence that until the nineteenth century the jury in some jurisdictions also determined questions of law. See Harrington, The Law-Finding Function of the American Jury, 1999 Wis.L.Rev. 377; Note, The Changing Role of the Jury in the Nineteenth Century, 74 Yale L.J. 170 (1964); Scott, Trial by Jury and the Reform of Civil Procedure, 31 Harv.L.Rev. 669, 675–78 (1918).

WEINER, THE CIVIL JURY AND THE LAW-FACT DISTINCTION, 54 Calif.L.Rev. 1867, 1867–68 (1966):

The categories of “questions of law” and “questions of fact” have been the traditional touchstones by which courts have purported to allocate decision-making between judge and jury. * * * Many statutes in effect today echo * * * [the] dichotomy, utilizing the law and fact terminology to identify the respective provinces of the judge and the jurors in a civil case. None of these statutes, however, attempts to define what is meant by a question of law or a question of fact. Nor have the courts shown any inclination to fashion definitions which can serve as useful guidelines. Indeed, when faced with a dispute as to whether a specific issue should be resolved by the judge or the jury, the typical appellate opinion today does no more than label the question as one of law or of fact, perhaps citing some authorities which are equally devoid of any more detailed consideration of the point. * * * A question of law or a question of fact is a mere synonym for a judge question or a jury question.

MARKMAN V. WESTVIEW INSTRUMENTS, INC.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1996.
517 U.S. 370, 116 S.Ct. 1384, 134 L.Ed.2d 577.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit.

JUSTICE SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

1085

The question here is whether the interpretation of a so-called patent claim, the portion of the patent document that defines the scope of the patentee’s rights, is a matter of law reserved entirely for the court, or subject to a Seventh Amendment guarantee that a jury will determine the meaning of any disputed term of art about which expert testimony is offered. We hold that the construction of a patent, including terms of art within its claim, is exclusively within the province of the court.

[The dispute involved competing claims to a patent used to monitor clothing in a dry-cleaning establishment. Both systems used a keyboard and data processor and generated records including bar codes. Westview argued that Markman’s patent was not infringed because Westview’s patent merely recorded an inventory of receivables by tracking invoices, rather than an inventory of articles of clothing.]

* * * Part of the dispute hinges upon the meaning of the word “inventory,” a term found in Markman’s independent claim 1, which states that Markman’s product can “maintain an inventory total” and “detect and localize spurious additions to inventory.” The case was tried before a jury, which heard, among others, a witness produced by Markman who testified about the meaning of the claim language.

After the jury compared the patent to Westview’s device, it found an infringement of Markman’s claim 1 * * *. The District Court nevertheless granted Westview’s deferred motion for judgment as a matter of law, one of its reasons being that the term “inventory” in Markman’s patent encompasses “both cash inventory and the actual physical inventory of articles of clothing.” * * * Under the trial court’s construction of the patent, the production, sale, or use of a tracking system for dry cleaners would not infringe Markman’s patent unless the product was capable of tracking articles of clothing throughout the cleaning process and generating reports about their status and location. Since Westview’s system cannot do these things, the District Court directed a verdict * * *.

Markman appealed, arguing it was error for the District Court to substitute its construction of the disputed claim term “inventory” for the construction the jury had presumably given it. The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed, holding the interpretation of claim terms to be the exclusive province of the court and the Seventh Amendment to be consistent with that conclusion. * * * Markman sought our review on each point, and we granted certiorari. * * *

* * *

III

Since evidence of common law practice at the time of the Framing does not entail application of the Seventh Amendment’s jury guarantee to the construction of the claim document, we must look elsewhere to characterize this determination of meaning in order to allocate it as between court or jury. We accordingly consult existing precedent and consider both the relative interpretive skills of judges and juries and the statutory policies that ought to be furthered by the allocation.

A.

* * * [The Court examined the few cases that were alleged to be relevant and found them to be inconclusive. The Court indicated that, if anything, they supported the view that a jury determination of the issue was not required.]

B.

Where history and precedent provide no clear answers, functional considerations also play their part in the choice between judge and jury to define terms of art. We said in Miller v. Fenton, 474 U.S. 104, 114[, 106 S.Ct. 445, 451, 88 L.Ed.2d 405, 413] (1985), that when an issue “falls somewhere between a pristine legal standard and a simple historical fact, the fact/law distinction at times has turned on a determination that, as a matter of sound administration of justice, one judicial actor is better positioned than another to decide the issue in question.” So it turns out here, for judges, not juries, are the better suited to find the acquired meaning of patent terms.

The construction of written instruments is one of those things that judges often do and are likely to do better than jurors unburdened by training in exegesis. Patent construction in particular “is a special occupation, requiring, like all others, special training and practice. The judge, from his training and discipline, is more likely to give a proper interpretation to such instruments than a jury, and he is, therefore, more likely to be right, in performing such a duty, than a jury can be expected to be.” Parker v. Hulme, 18 F. Cas., at 1140. Such was the understanding nearly a century and a half ago, and there is no reason to weigh the respective strengths of judge and jury differently in relation to the modern claim; quite the contrary, for “the claims of patents have become highly technical in many respects as the result of special doctrines relating to the proper form and scope of claims that have been developed in the courts and the Patent Office.” Woodward, Definiteness and Particularity in Patent Claims, 46 Mich.L.Rev. 755, 765 (1948).

Markman would trump these considerations with his argument that a jury should decide a question of meaning peculiar to a trade or profession simply because the question is a subject of testimony requiring credibility determinations, which are the jury’s forte. It is, of course, true that credibility judgments have to be made about the experts who testify in patent cases, and in theory there could be a case in which a simple credibility judgment would suffice to choose between experts whose testimony was equally consistent with a patent’s internal logic. But our own experience with document construction leaves us doubtful that trial courts will run into many cases like that. In the main, we expect, any credibility determinations will be subsumed within the necessarily sophisticated analysis of the whole document, required by the standard construction rule that a term can be defined only in a way that comports with the instrument as a whole. * * * Thus, in these cases a jury’s capabilities to evaluate demeanor, * * * to sense the “mainsprings of human conduct,” * * * or to reflect community standards, * * * are much less significant than a trained ability to evaluate the testimony in relation to the overall structure of the patent. The decisionmaker vested with the task of construing the patent is in the better position to ascertain whether an expert’s proposed definition fully comports with the specification and claims and so will preserve the patent’s internal coherence. We accordingly think there is sufficient reason to treat construction of terms of art like many other responsibilities that we cede to a judge in the normal course of trial, notwithstanding its evidentiary underpinnings.

C.

Finally, we see the importance of uniformity in the treatment of a given patent as an independent reason to allocate all issues of construction to the court. As we noted in General Elec. Co. v. Wabash Appliance Corp., 304 U.S. 364, 369[, 58 S.Ct. 899, 902, 82 L.Ed. 1402, 1405] (1938), “[t]he limits of a patent must be known for the protection of the patentee, the encouragement of the inventive genius of others and the assurance that the subject of the patent will be dedicated ultimately to the public.” Otherwise, a “zone of uncertainty which enterprise and experimentation may enter only at the risk of infringement claims would discourage invention only a little less than unequivocal foreclosure of the field,” United Carbon Co. v. Binney & Smith Co., 317 U.S. 228, 236[, 63 S.Ct. 165, 170, 87 L.Ed. 232, 237] (1942), and “[t]he public [would] be deprived of rights supposed to belong to it, without being clearly told what it is that limits these rights.” Merrill v. Yeomans, 94 U.S. 568, 573[, 24 L.Ed. 235, 237] (1877). * * *

Uniformity would, however, be ill served by submitting issues of document construction to juries. Making them jury issues would not, to be sure, necessarily leave evidentiary questions of meaning wide open in every new court in which a patent might be litigated, for principles of issue preclusion would ordinarily foster uniformity. * * * But whereas issue preclusion could not be asserted against new and independent infringement defendants even within a given jurisdiction, treating interpretive issues as purely legal will promote (though it will not guarantee) intrajurisdictional certainty through the application of stare decisis on those questions not yet subject to interjurisdictional uniformity under the authority of the single appeals court.

* * *

Accordingly, we hold that the interpretation of the word “inventory” in this case is an issue for the judge, not the jury, and affirm the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit.

It is so ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The classic discussion of whether the jury or judge decides if injurious conduct is negligent appears in Holmes, The Common Law 123–26 (1881). See also Gergen, The Jury’s Role in Deciding Normative Issues in the American Common Law, 68 Fordham L.Rev. 407 (1999). How does Markman affect the assignment of decision-making in the following situations:

- (a) In a suit for breach of an oral agreement to clear timber from defendant’s lands, sell it, and pay a set amount of money to defendant, should the judge or jury determine whether the oral agreement was enforceable under the state Statute of Frauds? If the contract was interpreted as one for services, it would be enforceable; if it was found to be a contract for the sale of timber, recovery would be barred. See Dobson v. Masonite Corp., 359 F.2d 921 (5th Cir. 1966) (assigned to jury on a special interrogatory).
- (b) In a suit for breach of contract, should the judge or jury determine whether a series of letters that appeared to be contradictory constituted a contract? See Rankin v. Fidelity Insurance Trust & Safe Deposit Co., 189 U.S. 242, 23 S.Ct. 553, 47 L.Ed. 792 (1903) (assigned to jury, subject to court’s instructions).
- (c) In a suit for breach of contract, should the judge or jury determine whether a letter was written in unambiguous terms? See Holtman v. Butterfiled, 51 Cal.App. 89, 196 P. 85 (1st Dist. 1921) (court).

2. When an issue is classified as one of “law,” the rule binds litigants in subsequent cases. When is the need for a precise legal standard sufficient to justify withdrawing the matter from the jury? Consider the question whether a posting on the Internet is obscene. Should the decision to give the question of obscenity to the judge or jury depend on the need for legal certainty, or should consideration also be given to the desirability of informing the judgment with community values as reflected by several juries in different locales passing on the question? Compare Solomon, The Political Puzzle of the Civil Jury, 61 Emory L.J. 1331 (2012), with Miller, The Pretrial Rush to Judgment: Are the “Litigation Explosion,” “Liability Crisis,” and Efficiency Clichés Eroding Our Day in Court and Jury Trial Commitments?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982, 1094–1126 (2003).

3. Preliminary questions such as those involving personal or subject-matter jurisdiction or venue often require resolution of factual disputes. In the ordinary course, these determinations are considered “legal” and thus not subject to jury trial. But what happens when the factual question on such a preliminary matter also is an issue regarding the right to relief? When a nonresident defendant is sued in a state based on an allegation that he negligently caused plaintiff an injury in that state, defendant’s claim that plaintiff has sued the wrong defendant and that defendant never has been in the forum state goes both to the question of personal jurisdiction and to substantive liability. Is the topic of jurisdiction one in which “any credibility determinations will be subsumed within the necessarily sophisticated analysis of the whole [matter],” as with the patent claim in Markman? Or should the matter proceed to a jury when resolution of the jurisdictional question implicates the merits of the suit? See Clermont, Jurisdictional Fact, 91 Cornell L.Rev. 973 (2006).

1089

4. In MERCK SHARP & DOHME CORP. v. ALBRECHT, 587 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct. 1668, 203 L.Ed.2d 822 (2019), the Court considered whether a judge or jury should decide if a failure-to-warn drug labeling claim under state law was preempted by the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. In a prior case, Wyeth v. Levine, 555 U.S. 555, 129 S.Ct. 1187, 173 L.Ed.2d 51 (2009), the Court had held that for preemption to apply there must be “clear evidence” that the Federal Food and Drug Administration (which administers the statute) would not have approved a change in a label required by state law. The trial judge in Merck held that it was for the judge; the court of appeals reversed, holding it was a question for the jury. The Supreme Court agreed that the question was for the judge, although the Court noted its complexity, falling somewhere between a clear legal standard and a simple historical fact. Drawing on Markman, the Court analyzed the situation as follows:

The complexity of the * * * law [pertaining to when federal law preempts state law] helps to illustrate why we answer this question by concluding that the question is a legal one for the judge, not a jury. The question often involves the use of legal skills to determine whether agency disapproval fits facts that are not in dispute. Moreover, judges, rather than lay juries, are better equipped to evaluate the nature and scope of an agency’s determination. Judges are experienced in “[t]he construction of written instruments,” such as those normally produced by a federal agency to memorialize its considered judgments. Markman v. Westview Instruments, Inc., [p. 1084, supra]. And judges are better suited than are juries to understand and to interpret agency decisions in light of the governing statutory and regulatory context. * * * To understand the question as a legal question for judges makes sense given the fact that judges are normally familiar with principles of administrative law. Doing so should produce greater uniformity among courts; and greater uniformity is normally a virtue when a question requires a determination concerning the scope and effect of federal agency action. * * *

1090

We understand that sometimes contested brute facts will prove relevant to a court’s legal determination about the meaning and effect of an agency decision. For example, if the FDA rejected a drug manufacturer’s supplemental application to change a drug label on the ground that the information supporting the application was insufficient to warrant a labeling change, the meaning and scope of that decision might depend on what information the FDA had before it. Yet in litigation between a drug consumer and a drug manufacturer (which will ordinarily lack an official administrative record for an FDA decision), the litigants may dispute whether the drug manufacturer submitted all material information to the FDA.

But we consider these factual questions to be subsumed within an already tightly circumscribed legal analysis. And we do not believe that they warrant submission alone or together with the larger pre-emption question to a jury. Rather, in those contexts where we have determined that the question is “for the judge and not the jury,” we have also held that “courts may have to resolve subsidiary factual disputes” that are part and parcel of the broader legal question. Teva Pharmaceuticals USA, Inc. v. Sandoz, Inc., 574 U. S. 318, 327, 135 S.Ct. 831, 838, 190 L.Ed.2d 719, 730 (2015). And, as in contexts as diverse as the proper construction of patent claims and the voluntariness of criminal confessions, they create a question that “ ‘falls somewhere between a pristine legal standard and a simple historical fact.’ ” Markman, 517 U. S. at 388, 116 S.Ct. 1384 (quoting Miller v. Fenton, 474 U. S. 104, 114, 106 S.Ct. 445, 88 L.Ed.2d 405 (1985)). In those circumstances, “ ‘the fact/law distinction at times has turned on a determination that, as a matter of the sound administration of justice, one judicial actor is better positioned than another to decide the issue in question.’ ” Markman, 517 U. S. at 388, 116 S.Ct. 1384 (quoting Miller, 474 U. S. at 114, 106 S.Ct. 445). In this context, that “better positioned” decisionmaker is the judge.

587 U.S. at ___, 139 S.Ct. at 1680, 203 L.Ed.2d 822, 837–38 (2019).

5.How should decisionmaking be divided between judge and jury when an issue is a mixed question of law and fact—that is, when there is underlying factfinding that informs the application of a legal standard? In GOOGLE v. ORACLE, 593 U.S. ___, 141 S.Ct. 1183, 209 L.Ed.2d 311 (2021), the Supreme Court held that the Seventh Amendment jury trial right is not violated when a judge decides whether a defendant in a copyright dispute has established “fair use,” a defense to copyright infringement. The Court treated the defense as an equitable one; although informed by the jury’s factfinding, the ultimate fair use determination could be resolved by the judge.

4.TACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS IN DECIDING BETWEEN TRIAL BY JUDGE OR BY JURY

The right to trial by jury may be waived. Even when an attorney feels that a client’s chances of winning on the merits are the same whether the case is tried by judge or by jury, there may be a decided tactical advantage in choosing one form of trial over another. In making the choice between judge and jury, a lawyer will consider the nature of the case, the characteristics of the parties and the witnesses, the passions that may surround the trial, the type of jurors who are likely to be chosen, and the background and predilections of the trial judge, if the judge’s identity is known in advance, which often is not the case. See Clermont & Eisenberg, Trial by Jury or Judge: Transcending Empiricism, 77 Cornell L.Rev. 1124 (1992); Gross, Settling for a Judge: A Comment on Clermont & Eisenberg, 77 Cornell L.Rev. 1178 (1992).

One institutional factor is whether waiting periods are longer for a jury trial than before a judge. It often was assumed that application of Beacon Theatres, p. 1054, supra, would delay case disposition because of crowded jury dockets in many parts of the country. See Posner, Economic Analysis of Law §§ 21.14 & 21.15 (9th ed. 2014). Empirical studies of sizable tort and contract cases are mixed on this point. Studies of federal jury trials have shown that the “wait in the jury queue” is shorter than in a bench trial. However, studies of state jury trials have shown the opposite—that some state systems impose “waiting costs” on litigants wanting a jury trial in a civil case. Other factors concern the perceived competence of the jury, and whether the jury or judge will be more favorable to categories of parties; research suggests that “certain groups of plaintiffs do far better before judges, but the reason likely lies in prevailing misperceptions about juries, rather than in differences between judges and juries:

Lawyers entertain longstanding perceptions of the jury as biased and incompetent, relative to the judge. There is, however, no actual evidence that juries are relatively biased or incompetent. Those perceptions nevertheless could have the consequence of a selection of cases reaching jury trial that differs from the case selection reaching judge trial. In particular, the theorizing ran that in certain categories of cases such as product liability and medical malpractice, lawyers view the jury as relatively favorable to plaintiffs. They then settle cases in a way that leaves for trial by jury or judge a residue of what they consider close cases, with juries accordingly seeing, on average, weaker cases. The perceptions then turn out to be misperceptions, as jury and judge turn out to perform similarly. Thus, the jury produces fewer winners than expected, while the judge produces more winners.

Clermont, Litigation Realities Redux, 84 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1919, 1963 (2009). See also Hersch & Viscusi, Punitive Damages: How Judges and Juries Perform, 33 J.Legal Stud. 1 (2004); Hans & Albertson, Empirical Research and Civil Jury Reform, 78 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1497 (2003).

5.DEMAND AND WAIVER OF TRIAL BY JURY

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 38 and 39 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

In BERESLAVSKY v. CAFFEY, 161 F.2d 499 (2d Cir. 1947), cert. denied, 332 U.S. 770, 68 S.Ct. 82, 92 L.Ed. 355 (1947), plaintiff sought an injunction against patent infringement. Subsequently he amended the complaint by striking the request for equitable relief and asking for monetary damages. The court held that plaintiff was entitled to trial by jury even though the Rule 38(b) time period had expired. The court reasoned that although the original complaint carried no right to jury trial, a later amendment changing the claim from equitable to legal relief renewed the right and gave plaintiff an additional ten days to demand a jury.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Does Dairy Queen, p. 1061, supra, render Bereslavsky obsolete? The current view is that an amendment to the pleadings cannot revive a right to jury trial that has been waived. See American Home Products Corp. v. Johnson & Johnson, 111 F.R.D. 448 (S.D.N.Y. 1986). In AMC Demolition Specialists, Inc. v. Bechtel Jacobs Co., 2005 WL 3240576 (E.D.Tenn. 2005), plaintiff amended the complaint to assert contractual breaches that involved events arising after the original complaint, and requested a jury trial on all claims. The court ordered a jury trial only on the new claims:

The Court acknowledges that its ruling today essentially requires that this case be tried twice: once before the Court on the sworn account and once before a jury on the breach of contract claims. While such an arrangement may prove to be inefficient and unwieldy, the Court feels constrained to do so in order to accommodate the plaintiff’s request for a jury trial on its new claims while protecting the interests of the other parties in this case. While the plaintiff is entitled to proceed to trial in this fashion, the Court recognizes that, in light of the Court’s ruling on this motion, the plaintiff may decide not to pursue its jury demand in the interest of resolving this matter in a more expedient and cost-effective manner. * * *

1093

Id. at *2. How might the court structure the proceedings to make them less “unwieldy”?

2.The district court has broad discretion under Rule 39(b) to grant a motion excusing an untimely jury demand. Courts typically consider such factors as: the length of the delay in making the jury demand, the reasons for the delay, prejudice to the nonmovant, and the effect on the court’s docket. See Olympia Express, Inc. v. Linee Aeree Italiane, S.P.A., 509 F.3d 347 (7th Cir. 2007). Additional factors may include whether the case “involves issues which are best tried to a jury.” TG Plastics Trading Co., Inc. v. Toray Plastics (America), Inc., 775 F.3d 31, 36 (1st Cir. 2014).

A party can waive the jury right before litigation begins and, indeed, before a dispute even arises. Waiver of a constitutional right usually requires a voluntary, intentional, and knowing decision. A waiver of this sort can take the form of a contract clause that explicitly waives the jury right. However, a party may be deemed to have waived the jury right by assenting to arbitrate a dispute that might later develop. Indeed, courts have found a jury waiver in an arbitration agreement, even when the agreement does not refer to waiver of a jury right, reasoning that the “loss of the right to a jury trial is a necessary and fairly obvious consequence of an agreement to arbitrate.” Pierson v. Dean, Witter, Reynolds, Inc., 742 F.2d 334, 339 (7th Cir. 1984). But see Burden v. Check Into Cash of Kentucky, LLC, 267 F.3d 483, 492 (6th Cir. 2001) (holding that a district court was required to determine whether the arbitration agreement was unenforceable as an “uninformed waiver of jury trial rights”). For differing views on this question, compare Ware, Arbitration Clauses, Jury-Waiver Clauses, and Other Contractual Waivers of Constitutional Rights, 67 Law & Contemp. Probs. 167 (2004), with Kepper, Contractual Waiver of Seventh Amendment Rights: Using the Public Rights Doctrine to Justify a Higher Standard of Waiver for Jury Waiver Clauses than for Arbitration Clauses, 91 Iowa L.Rev. 1345 (2006).

6.SELECTION AND COMPOSITION OF THE JURY

a.Size

At common law, a trial jury consisted of twelve members. In Patton v. United States, 281 U.S. 276, 288, 50 S.Ct. 253, 254, 74 L.Ed. 854, 858 (1930), a criminal case, the Court said that the phrase “trial by jury” incorporated “all the essential elements” of such a trial “as they were recognized in this country and England when the Constitution was adopted,” including “[t]hat the jury should consist of twelve men, neither more nor less.” However, in Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78, 90 S.Ct. 1893, 26 L.Ed.2d 446 (1970), the Court held that a state constitutionally might use a jury with six (or perhaps fewer) members in a criminal case without violating the Sixth Amendment’s jury trial guarantee, as applied to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. In the years following Williams, numerous district courts seized upon its holding and transferred its analysis to the civil-jury guarantee in the Seventh Amendment, using their Rule 83 power to promulgate local rules to provide that ordinary civil actions shall be tried by six-member juries.

1094

COLGROVE v. BATTIN, 413 U.S. 149, 93 S.Ct. 2448, 37 L.Ed.2d 522 (1973). Petitioner sought mandamus to compel a federal district judge to impanel a twelve-member jury, notwithstanding Local Rule 13(d)(1) of the District Court for the District of Montana, which provided for a six-member jury in all civil cases. The Ninth Circuit denied mandamus, and the Supreme Court affirmed, five-to-four:

* * * [T]he Framers of the Seventh Amendment were concerned with preserving the right of trial by jury in civil cases where it existed at common law, rather than the various incidents of trial by jury. In short, what was said in Williams with respect to the criminal jury is equally applicable here: constitutional history reveals no intention on the part of the Framers “to equate the constitutional and common-law characteristics of the jury.” * * *

* * * In Williams, we rejected the notion that “the reliability of the jury as a factfinder * * * [is] a function of its size,” * * * and nothing has been suggested to lead us to alter that conclusion. * * *

* * * Significantly, our determination that there was “no discernible difference between the results reached by the two different-sized juries” * * * drew largely upon the results of studies of the operations of juries of six in civil cases. * * * Thus, while we express no view as to whether any number less than six would suffice, we conclude that a jury of six satisfies the Seventh Amendment’s guarantee of trial by jury in civil cases.

Id. at 152, 155–56, 157, 158–60, 93 S.Ct. at 2450, 2452, 2453–54, 37 L.Ed.2d at 526, 528, 529, 530–31.

NOTES

1. For empirical data regarding the six-member jury, see Chud & Berman, Six-Member Juries: Does Size Really Matter?, 67 Tenn.L.Rev. 743 (2000); Devine, Clayton, Dunford, Seying & Pryce, Jury Decision Making, 7 Psychol. Pub. Pol’y & L. 622 (2001); Miller & Kazmar, Psychology Research and Public Opinion Do Not Support Proposed Changes to the Jury System, 30 Hamline L.Rev. 285 (2007).

1095

2. In 1991, Federal Rule 48 was amended to permit a court to decide the size of the jury so long as it consists of at least six and no more than twelve members. Prior to the amendment, the Rule merely allowed parties to stipulate that the jury could consist of any number less than twelve. Note that the local court rule at issue in Colgrove predated this amendment and arguably was inconsistent with the Federal Rules as they existed at the time. See Resnik, Changing Practices, Changing Rules: Judicial and Congressional Rulemaking on Civil Juries, Civil Justice, and Civil Judging, 49 Ala.L.Rev. 133 (1997). In 1996 the Advisory Committee recommended the restoration of the twelve-person jury. The proposal was rejected by the Judicial Conference of the United States.

3. In some states, juries of less than six members are permitted in civil trials. See Rottman, Flango, Cantrell, Hansen & LaFountain, State Court Organization 1998 tbl 42 (2000) (stating jury size requirements for all states). In Virginia, three-person juries are an option if the parties consent, and some Virginia judges consider a three-member jury to be a superior trier of fact. See Painter v. Fred Whitaker Co., 235 Va. 631, 369 S.E.2d 191 (1988).

b. Empaneling the Jury

Jury selection is a two-stage process. First, a list of potential jurors, the venire, is compiled and they are assembled. A number of them, equal to the number who will serve, are then selected at random to sit as a tentative jury. Second, these tentative jurors are questioned by the judge and/or by the attorneys to determine whether each of them can decide the case fairly and appropriately. This questioning is called “voir dire.” If one of them is dismissed, the person’s place is taken by another member of the venire, selected at random, who is in turn subject to questioning. This process continues until the final panel is in place. See Zalman & Tsoudis, Plucking Weeds from the Garden: Lawyers Speak About Voir Dire, 51 Wayne L.Rev. 163 (2005).

1096

THIEL v. SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO., 328 U.S. 217, 66 S.Ct. 984, 90 L.Ed. 1181 (1946). Plaintiff, in an action for negligence, moved to strike the jury panel on the ground that it had been unfairly selected. The clerk of the court and the jury commissioner testified that they deliberately and intentionally had excluded from the jury lists all persons who work for a daily wage. They noted that in the past, because of the financial hardship imposed by jury service, those workers inevitably were excused by the judge. Workers who were paid by the week or the month, as well as the wives of daily wage earners were included on the jury lists. The Court held that such an exclusion cannot be justified “without doing violence to the democratic nature of the jury system. Were we to sanction an exclusion of this nature * * * we would breathe life into any latent tendencies to establish the jury as an instrument of the economically and socially privileged.” Id. at 223–24, 66 S.Ct. at 987, 90 L.Ed. at 1186. Although the judge can excuse individuals for whom jury service would be a financial hardship, that cannot justify the exclusion of all daily wage earners regardless of whether an actual hardship is involved. The dissent noted that the matter was one of judicial administration, and that no constitutional issue was at stake. It took the position that selection of jurors from a jury pool that contained weekly wage earners and wives of daily workers was sufficient to avoid reversal of a judgment otherwise untainted by error.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Report of the Committee on the Operation of the Jury System of the Judicial Conference of the United States, on which the present federal jury selection statute is based, appears at 42 F.R.D. 353 (1967). See 28 U.S.C. §§ 1861–66. Qualifications for jury service vary from state-to-state but may include such factors as citizenship, residence, criminal history, and the ability to use and understand English. See Mize, Hannaford-Agor & Waters, National Center for State Courts, The State-of-the-States Survey of Jury Improvement Efforts: A Compendium Report 21–22 (2007).
2. A guarantee of accessible jury service derives from both the Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12101, enacted in 1990, and Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794. In Galloway v. Superior Court, 816 F.Supp. 12 (D.D.C.1993), the court held that visual impairment cannot be a ground for automatic exclusion from jury service, relying on “uncontradicted testimony that blind individuals, like sighted jurors, weigh the content of the testimony given and examine speech patterns, intonation, and syntax in assessing credibility.” Id. at 16.
3. The most common method for creating jury lists is by relying on voter registration records, with supplemental sources used to promote fair representation. See 28 U.S.C. § 1863(b). These other sources can include driver’s license or public utilities lists, state tax rolls, or telephone lists. Because of the under-representation of minority and low-income persons in voter registration records, as well as the low percentage of voters overall, many have argued that use of multiple lists should be constitutionally compelled. For an examination of how jury selection methods may lead to unrepresentative juries, see Rose & Abramson, Data, Race, and the Courts: Some Lessons on Empiricism from Jury Representation Cases, 2011 Mich.St.L.Rev. 911.

4.The “blue ribbon” jury, which is composed of people who are specially selected because of their level of education, is an attempt to meet concerns that the ordinary juror is incompetent to deal with the complex problems of modern litigation. See Strier, The Educated Jury: A Proposal for Complex Litigation, 47 DePaul L.Rev. 49 (1997). Is a “blue ribbon” jury consistent with 28 U.S.C. § 1862, which bars exclusion of citizens on account of “economic status”? See Fisher, Going for the Blue Ribbon: The Legality of Expert Juries in Patent Litigation, 2 Colum. Sci. & Tech.L.Rev. 1 (2001).

1097

5.Do nationwide cases require a jury drawn from a nationwide pool? See Dooley, National Juries for National Cases: Preserving Citizen Participation in Large-Scale Litigation, 83 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 411 (2008).

c.Challenging Individual Jurors

Challenges to individual jurors—sometimes called challenges to the polls—are of two kinds: for cause and peremptory. Challenges for cause permit a prospective juror to be rejected when partiality can be shown. Peremptory challenges permit rejection of jurors without any statement of reason and usually are based on an assumed partiality that may not be susceptible of proof.

An unlimited number of challenges for cause are permitted each party. These challenges are determined by the trial judge, although some states have experimented with so-called “triers”—independent officials who have the responsibility of determining challenges for cause. The number of peremptory challenges allowed each side varies among the states. See Mize, Hannaford-Agor & Waters, National Center for State Courts, The State-of-the-States Survey of Jury Improvement Efforts: A Compendium Report 8 (2007). In the federal courts each side is permitted three. See 28 U.S.C. § 1870.

FLOWERS V. FLOWERS
Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, 1965.
397 S.W.2d 121.

CHAPMAN, JUSTICE.

The subject matter of this suit involves a question of the disqualification of a juror in a child custody contest tried to a jury * * *.

This case was tried in a town and county of very small population where the record shows many members of the jury panel had heard what they referred to as gossip or rumors concerning the case. The parties to the suit are Billie Charlene Flowers, plaintiff below, the mother; and R.A. Flowers, Jr., the father. The victims of the unfortunate broken home are three little girls ranging in ages from two to ten at the time of the filing of divorce by their mother in January 1964.

* * *

The jurors were told on voir dire examination that the evidence would show that plaintiff drank some socially and on one or two occasions had consumed alcoholic beverages to excess. They were questioned as to whether that fact standing alone would prejudice them against her as a fit and proper person to have custody of the children.

The record preserved upon examination of Mrs. Schmidt as a prospective juror shows that she first testified she was well acquainted with the Flowers family, belonged to the same Baptist church they did in the little town of Miami, and that she had no opinion formed in the case at all. Then when counsel said to her the evidence will show “that Billie does drink upon social occasions with the crowd at a dance, or something of that sort, she would have a highball or cocktail, and it will show on one occasion that she had too much, or two times had too much, what is your attitude—,” she answered:

1098

A. I am against drinking in any manner, any kind.

Q. Any way or any fashion at all?

A. Any type.

Q. Mrs. Schmidt, that would definitely affect your judgment in the case wouldn’t it?

A. If the evidence was true.

Q. Could you enter the—you would take a seat as a juror with a positive feeling that any drinking whatsoever is wrong, and it is bad so far as the mother of these little girls is concerned,—

A. Anybody else.

Q. If the evidence shows Billie has had one drink or two—drinks at a social occasion, you would hold that against her?

A. I don't approve.

The court then took over the examination and asked her a number of questions, one of which was:

Q. Well, are you saying by that, Mrs. Schmidt, that you wouldn't grant either party to this law suit custody of their children if they drank?

A. I am.

The court then turned to leading questions to the juror as to her attitude about passing upon whether the mother was a fit person to have the custody of the girls, saying:

Q. Dependent upon the testimony you hear in a trial; the mere fact that she got drunk a few times and threw a conniption fit or something, you wouldn't hold that against her and think she wasn't—

A. Not especially.

The court then overruled the challenge of the juror for cause.

The record also shows by affidavit of a lady juror panelist who sat next to Mrs. Schmidt during voir dire examination that Mrs. Schmidt stated “ * * * she felt sorry for R.A. Flowers, Jr. and that you had to admire a man that would go on to Sunday School and church after what had happened to him.” Mrs. Philpot's affidavit also affirmed that Mrs. Schmidt made a statement to one of the other prospective jurors sitting next to her before the jury was selected that Billie Flowers had run off and left R.A. Flowers, Jr. once before and that both of such statements were made before she was selected and sworn to serve as a juror.

1099

At both the motion for mistrial and motion for new trial based partly upon the proceedings just related, the court declined to hear Mrs. Philpot's tendered testimony as a witness in support of her affidavit. Upon the hearing of the motion for new trial Mrs. Flowers' attorney testified there were eleven jurors, including Mrs. Schmidt, who were undesirable to the plaintiff and that if Mrs. Schmidt on voir dire had correctly stated her attitude reflected by Mrs. Philpot's affidavit, they would have exercised a peremptory challenge as to her rather than as to some other juror. * * *

Article 2134, Vernon's Ann.Tex.Civ.St., provides as one of the disqualifications: “Any person who has a bias or prejudice in favor of or against either of the parties.”

This disqualification for bias or prejudice extends not only to the parties personally, but also to the subject matter of the litigation. * * * Compton v. Henrie, Tex., 364 S.W.2d 179.

In defining the terms “bias” and “prejudice” as used in Article 2134 our Supreme Court in the Henrie case just cited has said:

Bias, in its usual meaning, is an inclination toward one side of an issue rather than to the other, but to disqualify, it must appear that the state of mind of the juror leads to the natural inference that he will not or did not act with impartiality. Prejudice is more easily defined for it means pre-judgment, and consequently embraces bias; the converse is not true. * * *

Mrs. Schmidt's statements indicate to us both bias and prejudice factually and such a prejudgment of the case as to indicate she could not have acted with impartiality. If we are correct in this factual conclusion then under the authorities just cited her disqualification is not a matter of discretion with the trial court but a matter of law. * * *

Even if we are in error in our pronouncements in the preceding paragraphs, it cannot be gainsaid that the record shows bias and prejudice on the part of Mrs. Schmidt toward plaintiff and toward her alcoholic consumption her attorney admitted would be shown before the examination of the jury on voir dire. From the viewpoint of this writer, such feelings on the part of Mrs. Schmidt are to her credit even if it did disqualify her as a juror. But even if under the facts of this case bias or prejudice was a fact to be determined by the trial court, those feelings having been clearly established, her answer of “Yes, sir” to a leading question to the effect that she would be able to decide the case on the evidence submitted, should be disregarded. * * * In any event we believe the court abused its discretion in refusing to hold the juror disqualified.

1100

* * *

The judgment of the trial court is reversed and remanded for a new trial.

EDMONSON v. LEESVILLE CONCRETE COMPANY, INC.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1991.

500 U.S. 614, 111 S.Ct. 2077, 114 L.Ed.2d 660.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

JUSTICE KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

We must decide in the case before us whether a private litigant in a civil case may use peremptory challenges to exclude jurors on account of their race. * * * This civil case originated in a United States District Court, and we apply the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause. * * *

I

Thaddeus Donald Edmonson, a construction worker, was injured in a job-site accident at Fort Polk, Louisiana, a federal enclave. Edmonson sued Leesville Concrete Company for negligence in the United States District Court for the Western District of Louisiana, claiming that a Leesville employee permitted one of the company’s trucks to roll backward and pin him against some construction equipment. Edmonson invoked his Seventh Amendment right to a trial by jury.

During voir dire, Leesville used two of its three peremptory challenges authorized by statute to remove black persons from the prospective jury. Citing our decision in Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79[, 106 S.Ct. 1712, 90 L.Ed.2d 69] (1986), Edmonson, who is himself black, requested that the District Court require Leesville to articulate a race-neutral explanation for striking the two jurors. The District Court denied the request on the ground that Batson does not apply in civil proceedings. As impaneled, the jury included 11 white persons and 1 black person. The jury rendered a verdict for Edmonson, assessing his total damages at $90,000. It also attributed 80% of the fault to Edmonson’s contributory negligence, however, and awarded him the sum of $18,000.

Edmonson appealed, and a divided en banc panel affirmed * * *. We granted certiorari, and now reverse the Court of Appeals.

1101

II

A

In Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400[, 111 S.Ct. 1364, 113 L.Ed.2d 411] (1991), we held that a criminal defendant, regardless of his or her race, may object to a prosecutor’s race-based exclusion of persons from the petit jury. Our conclusion rested on a two-part analysis. First, following our opinions in Batson and in Carter v. Jury Commission of Greene County, 396 U.S. 320[, 90 S.Ct. 518, 24 L.Ed.2d 549] (1970), we made clear that a prosecutor’s race-based peremptory challenge violates the equal protection rights of those excluded from jury service. * * * Second, we relied on well-established rules of third-party standing to hold that a defendant may raise the excluded jurors’ equal protection rights. * * *

That an act violates the Constitution when committed by a government official, however, does not answer the question whether the same act offends constitutional guarantees if committed by a private litigant or his attorney. The Constitution’s protections of individual liberty and equal protection apply in general only to action by the government. * * * Racial discrimination, though invidious in all contexts, violates the Constitution only when it may be attributed to state action. * * * Thus, the legality of the exclusion at issue here turns on the extent to which a litigant in a civil case may be subject to the Constitution’s restrictions. * * *

The trial judge exercises substantial control over voir dire in the federal system. See Fed.Rule Civ.Proc. 47. The judge determines the range of information that may be discovered about a prospective juror, and so affects the exercise of both challenges for cause and peremptory challenges. In some cases, judges may even conduct the entire voir dire by themselves, a common practice in the District Court where the instant case was tried. See Louisiana Rules of Court, Local Rule W.D.La. 13.02 (1990). The judge oversees the exclusion of jurors for cause, in this way determining which jurors remain eligible for the exercise of peremptory strikes. In cases involving multiple parties, the trial judge decides how peremptory challenges shall be allocated among them. 28 U.S.C. § 1870. When a lawyer exercises a peremptory challenge, the judge advises the juror he or she has been excused. * * *

The principle that the selection of state officials, other than through election by all qualified voters, may constitute state action applies with even greater force in the context of jury selection through the use of peremptory challenges. Though the motive of a peremptory challenge may be to protect a private interest, the objective of jury selection proceedings is to determine representation on a governmental body. Were it not for peremptory challenges, there would be no question that the entire process of determining who will serve on the jury constitutes state action. The fact that the government delegates some portion of this power to private litigants does not change the governmental character of the power exercised. * * *

1102

Here, as in most civil cases, the initial decision whether to sue at all, the selection of counsel, and any number of ensuing tactical choices in the course of discovery and trial may be without the requisite governmental character to be deemed state action. That cannot be said of the exercise of peremptory challenges, however; when private litigants participate in the selection of jurors, they serve an important function within the government and act with its substantial assistance. If peremptory challenges based on race were permitted, persons could be required by summons to be put at risk of open and public discrimination as a condition of their participation in the justice system. The injury to excluded jurors would be the direct result of governmental delegation and participation.

Finally, we note that the injury caused by the discrimination is made more severe because the government permits it to occur within the courthouse itself. Few places are a more real expression of the constitutional authority of the government than a courtroom, where the law itself unfolds. Within the courtroom, the government invokes its laws to determine the rights of those who stand before it. In full view of the public, litigants press their cases, witnesses give testimony, juries render verdicts, and judges act with the utmost care to ensure that justice is done.

Race discrimination within the courtroom raises serious questions as to the fairness of the proceedings conducted there. Racial bias mars the integrity of the judicial system and prevents the idea of democratic government from becoming a reality. * * * In the many times we have addressed the problem of racial bias in our system of justice, we have not “questioned the premise that racial discrimination in the qualification or selection of jurors offends the dignity of persons and the integrity of the courts.” Powers * * *. To permit racial exclusion in this official forum compounds the racial insult inherent in judging a citizen by the color of his or her skin. * * *

III

It remains to consider whether a prima facie case of racial discrimination has been established in the case before us, requiring Leesville to offer race-neutral explanations for its peremptory challenges. In Batson, we held that determining whether a prima facie case has been established requires consideration of all relevant circumstances, including whether there has been a pattern of strikes against members of a particular race. * * * The same approach applies in the civil context, and we leave it to the trial courts in the first instance to develop evidentiary rules for implementing our decision.

The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with our opinion.

1103

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE O’CONNOR, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and JUSTICE SCALIA join, dissenting.

* * * As an initial matter, the judge does not “encourage” the use of a peremptory challenge at all. The decision to strike a juror is entirely up to the litigant, and the reasons for doing so are of no consequence to the judge. It is the attorney who strikes. The judge does little more than acquiesce in this decision by excusing the juror. In point of fact, the government has virtually no role in the use of peremptory challenges. Indeed, there are jurisdictions in which, with the consent of the parties, voir dire and jury selection may take place in the absence of any court personnel. * * *

Whatever reason a private litigant may have for using a peremptory challenge, it is not the government’s reason. The government otherwise establishes its requirements for jury service, leaving to the private litigant the unfettered discretion to use the strike for any reason. This is not part of the government’s function in establishing the requirements for jury service. * * *

Racism is a terrible thing. It is irrational, destructive, and mean. Arbitrary discrimination based on race is particularly abhorrent when manifest in a courtroom, a forum established by the government for the resolution of disputes through “quiet rationality.” * * *. But not every opprobrious and inequitable act is a constitutional violation. The Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause prohibits only actions for which the Government can be held responsible. The Government is not responsible for everything that occurs in a courtroom. The Government is not responsible for a peremptory challenge by a private litigant. I respectfully dissent.

In J.E.B. v. ALABAMA EX REL. T.B., 511 U.S. 127, 114 S.Ct. 1419, 128 L.Ed.2d 89 (1994), the State of Alabama, on behalf of the mother of a minor child, brought suit in a state court against defendant for paternity and child support. The state used nine of its ten peremptory challenges to remove male jurors, with the result that the jury consisted solely of women. The Alabama courts rejected defendant’s objection that the use of peremptory challenges solely to exclude persons on the basis of gender violated the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause. A divided Supreme Court, noting that both federal and state courts were in disagreement on the matter, reversed. Justice Blackmun, writing for himself and three others, stated:

Discrimination in jury selection, whether based on race or on gender, causes harm to the litigants, the community and the individual jurors who are wrongfully excluded from participation in the judicial process. * * *

1104

* * * All persons, when granted the opportunity to serve on a jury, have the right not to be excluded summarily because of discriminatory and stereotypical presumptions that reflect and reinforce patterns of historical discrimination. Striking individual jurors on the assumption that they hold particular views simply because of their gender is “practically a brand upon them, affixed by the law, an assertion of their inferiority.” Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 308, 25 L.Ed. 664, 666 (1880).

Our conclusion that litigants may not strike potential jurors solely on the basis of gender does not imply the elimination of all peremptory challenges. * * * Parties still may remove jurors who they feel might be less acceptable than others on the panel; gender simply may not serve as a proxy for bias. * * * Even strikes based on characteristics that are disproportionately associated with one gender [e.g. employment in the military or as nurses] could be appropriate, absent a showing of pretext.

Id. at 140–43, 114 S.Ct. at 1427–29, 128 L.Ed.2d at 104–06.

Justice Kennedy concurred. Justice O’Connor also concurred in a separate opinion. She wrote:

Today’s decision severely limits a litigant’s ability to act on * * * intuition, for the import of our holding is that any correlation between a juror’s gender and attitudes is irrelevant as a matter of constitutional law. * * * [T]o say that gender makes no difference as a matter of law is not to say that gender makes no difference as a matter of fact. * * * In extending [our holdings on race] * * * to gender we have * * * taken a step closer to eliminating the peremptory challenge, and diminishing the ability of litigants to act on sometimes accurate gender-based assumptions about juror attitudes.

* * *

Accordingly, I adhere to my position that the Equal Protection Clause does not limit the exercise of peremptory challenges by private civil litigants * * *. This case itself presents no state action dilemma for here the State of Alabama itself filed the paternity suit. * * * But what of the next case? Will we, in the name of fighting gender discrimination, hold that the battered wife—on trial for wounding her abusive husband—is a state actor? Will we preclude her from using her peremptory challenges to ensure that the jury of her peers contains as many women members as possible? I assume we will, but I hope we will not.

1105

Id. at 149–51, 114 S.Ct. at 1432–33, 128 L.Ed.2d at 109–10.

Justice Scalia, writing for himself and two other Justices, dissented. Essentially he agreed with Justice O’Connor’s assessment of the importance of the peremptory challenge system and argued that it did not deny anyone the equal protection of the laws even in the case before the Court.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. For a discussion of how race affects civil jury access, see Gifford & Jones, Keeping Cases from Black Juries: An Empirical Analysis of How Race, Income Inequality, and Regional History Affect Tort Law, 73 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 557 (2016).
2. After Batson, Edmonson, and J.E.B., should it be permissible to exercise peremptory challenges on the basis of religion? See Gendleman, The Equal Protection Clause, the Free Exercise Clause and Religion-Based Peremptory Challenges, 63 U.Chi.L.Rev. 1639 (1996); Waggoner, Peremptory Challenges and Religion: the Unanswered Prayer for a Supreme Court Opinion, 36 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 285 (2004). On the basis of disability? See Benson, Stricken: The Need for Positive Statutory Law to Prevent Discriminatory Peremptory Strikes of Disabled Jurors, 103 Cornell L.Rev. 437 (2018). On the basis of gender or sexual status? See Boso, Dignity, Inequality, and Stereotypes, 92 Wash.L.Rev. 1119 (2017).

d. Conducting the Voir Dire

Rules concerning the extent to which the judge or the lawyers conduct voir dire vary among jurisdictions. Federal Rule 47(a) leaves the matter entirely in the district judge’s discretion. For the range of state practices, see Mize, Hannaford-Agor & Waters, National Center for State Courts, The State-of-the-States Survey of Jury Improvement Efforts: A Compendium Report 28 (2007).

In SNYDER v. PHELPS, 533 F.Supp.2d 567, 583 (D.Md.2008), reversed on other grounds, 580 F.3d 206 (4th Cir. 2009), affirmed, 562 U.S. 443, 131 S.Ct. 1207, 179 L.Ed.2d 172 (2011), the father of a deceased soldier sued church members who picketed the son’s funeral “to publicize their message of God’s hatred of America for its tolerance of homosexuality,” and especially its tolerance of homosexuality in the military. 533 F.Supp.2d at 572. The lawsuit attracted a great deal of media attention, and resulted in an extensive voir dire. As explained by the district court:

* * * The parties requested, and this Court permitted, a jury questionnaire to be sent to all potential jurors, asking questions about their views on protesting, the military, the First Amendment of the United States Constitution, and other “screening” questions. As such questionnaires are rarely sent to potential jurors by this Court, this was an extraordinary precaution. These questionnaires were sent to several hundred individuals and the ultimate venire pool itself consisted of more than 100 people—more than triple the usual size of a venire pool in a civil case. * * *

1106

Every potential juror who indicated that he or she had some knowledge of the case was questioned individually at the bench, and many were stricken if they had already formed an opinion about the case. Where, as in this case, a trial has received pre-trial publicity, the Fourth Circuit has held that specific questioning regarding potential jurors’ exposure to the publicity and what effect it had on their opinions was sufficient to remove any concerns about bias. * * * Thus, this Court’s individualized questioning of the potential jurors about their knowledge of the case gave the parties ample opportunity to inquire about preconceived opinions. Furthermore, as most people in the venire pool were called to the bench at some point, the attorneys were able to question almost all of them individually. There was no error in the conduct of voir dire in this case.

B. THE SCOPE AND ORDER OF TRIAL

1.SETTING THE CASE FOR TRIAL

Trial will take place only after one of the parties or the court takes steps to have the case placed on the appropriate trial calendar and the court disposes of all the cases previously on that calendar. The Federal Rules contemplate that the trial judge, after consulting the parties, may schedule the date of trial. See Federal Rule 16(b)(3)(B)(vi) and (c)(2)(G). It is impossible to pinpoint case scheduling with total certainty, but case management techniques and computers have helped to increase the predictability of the flow of business through the courts.

2.ORDER OF TRIAL

Trial courts have the ability to divide cases into discrete portions, trying claims or issues separately whenever that is convenient, economical, or avoids prejudice to a party or parties. See Federal Rules 42(b) and 16(c)(2)(M), and (O).

a.Jury Cases

When a particular case or aspect of a case comes before a jury, the court invariably has discretion to determine the order of trial, but a judge usually will not deviate from standard practice, which is as follows:

1.Plaintiff’s opening statement

1107

2.Defendant’s opening statement

3.Plaintiff’s presentation of direct evidence

4.Defendant’s presentation of direct evidence

5.Plaintiff’s presentation of rebuttal evidence

6.Defendant’s presentation of rebuttal evidence

7.Opening final argument by plaintiff

8.Defendant’s final argument

9.Closing final argument by plaintiff

10.Giving instructions to the jury.

b.Non-Jury Cases

Although jury and non-jury cases generally are handled in the same way, there are a number of significant differences in scope. For example, the court often will dispense with the opening statement and the closing argument, and, of course, there is never a need to give instructions. Some jurisdictions provide that an attorney has an absolute right to argue, even in non-jury cases. Rarely will that right be exercised, however, if the judge, as is often the situation, makes clear that she believes an argument to be unnecessary.

3.THE BURDEN OF PROOF

Review Chapter 13, pp. 1012–1013, supra.

The burdens of production and persuasion usually fall on the same party at trial, either plaintiff or defendant. But there are times when the burden of production is placed on one party and the burden of persuasion on the other. In these cases, once the burden of production is satisfied, the burden of persuasion “shifts” to the other party.

One example of a type of action in which the burden shifts is an employment discrimination action alleging disparate impact of systemic disparate treatment under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. In proceedings under this statute, the employee must make out a prima facie case that there was intentional discrimination. At that point, the burden of production falls on the employer, who must explain the non-discriminatory basis for the adverse employment action in question. If the employer offers a legitimate explanation for the action, then plaintiff must show that the reason given for the employer’s action is merely pretextual—that the action was, in fact, taken for discriminatory reason. The burden of persuasion remains with plaintiff, but the intermediate burden of production that falls on defendant serves an important function. As the Supreme Court has explained, the shifting of burdens allows the employer the opportunity to rebut plaintiff’s claims and helps “to frame the factual issue with sufficient clarity so that plaintiff will have a full and fair opportunity to demonstrate pretext.” See Texas Dep’t of Comm’y Affairs v. Burdine, 450 U.S. 248, 255–56, 101 S.Ct. 1089, 1095, 67 L.Ed.2d 207, 217–18 (1981).

1108

4.THE PRESENTATION OF EVIDENCE

a.The Problems of Admissibility

The admissibility of evidence at trial is determined by a complex set of rules that are studied in a course on Evidence. Each lawyer must plan carefully to make certain that her evidence will be accepted. Evidence may be admissible under multiple evidentiary rules. Even if evidence is inadmissible according to the rules, it will rarely be excluded unless the opposing party objects to its introduction. Thus, attorneys often offer inadmissible evidence in the hope that it will not be challenged. This strategy must be pursued carefully. The opposing party would be ill-advised to object to inadmissible evidence that is not seriously prejudicial, as too many objections might lead the jury to believe that objecting party has something to hide; but if offered evidence is repeatedly ruled inadmissible upon objection, it might damage the standing of the party offering such evidence with the judge or jury.

In some situations, even the most diligent attorney is powerless to keep inadmissible, highly prejudicial statements from the jurors. For example, a witness simply may blurt out such a statement without notice. In such cases, the court has a choice. It may admonish the jury not to consider the evidence or it may declare a mistrial. In the latter case the jury is dismissed and the trial must begin anew before a different panel. Where the trial continues, is it realistic to expect jurors to ignore completely something they have heard and are told to forget? Do you think judges would be any better at ignoring relevant but inadmissible information? See Wistrich, Guthrie & Rachlinski, Can Judges Ignore Inadmissible Information? The Difficulty of Deliberately Disregarding, 153 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1251 (2005).

b.The Technique of Presentation

Much has been written concerning the way in which evidence should be presented. Most of this commentary can be distilled into one basic observation: The better the preparation before trial, the better the presentation.

Generally speaking, most evidence is presented at trial through the examination and cross-examination of witnesses. A party should call witnesses in a logical order so that the jury will know, at every step of the way, what part of the case is being explored. Usually the most important witnesses are called first to put the jurors in a favorable frame of mind. The testimony of less important witnesses will then be understood by the jury as backing and fortifying that party’s version of the facts. There are, of course, many factors that interfere with a planned presentation. The opposition, through cross-examination, will attempt to upset the pattern not only by raising questions as to the witnesses’ accuracy but also by injecting new considerations that tend to confuse the jurors. A party who wishes to stay in the witnesses’ good graces, particularly those of expert witnesses, may be forced to accommodate their interests by calling them when it is convenient for them to testify rather than at the most logical point in the trial. Finally, no matter how fine the preparation, every trial produces a number of surprises to which the lawyer must react immediately. If, for example, during cross-examination of an opposition witness, the interrogating attorney receives a surprise favorable response, he must press forward on the issue immediately, before the witness and the opposing attorney have the time and opportunity to soften the impact by planning an explanation.

1109

Cross-examination is a potent trial weapon. With it, a clever attorney can raise doubts concerning the accuracy of even the most accomplished and prepared witness, let alone an unsophisticated witness who actually is trying to cover up the facts. There are two ways to minimize the effects of cross-examination. The first is to make certain that the witness is clear as to the story and is telling the truth. This requires the attorney and the witness to go over the facts in detail shortly before the trial begins. Even after this precaution the excitement of the trial may so unnerve the witness that he forgets even the most basic facts. Consider the following actual exchange (with the names changed), as reported in Saturday Review, August 19, 1967, p. 12, col. 2:

Q: What is your brother-in-law’s name?

A: Borofkin.

Q: What’s his first name?

A: I can’t remember.

Q: He’s been your brother-in-law for forty-five years and you can’t remember his first name?

A: No, I tell you I’m too excited! (Rising from the witness chair and pointing to Borofkin.) Nathan, for God’s sake tell them your first name!

The second method of limiting the effectiveness of cross-examination is for the attorney on direct examination to raise and dispense with any matter that might cast doubt on a witness’ veracity if it were raised for the first time on cross-examination. For example, in most jurisdictions an attorney may impugn the credibility of an opposition witness by introducing evidence showing that the witness previously has been convicted of a felony. If the fact that the witness had once been convicted of a felony is raised at the very beginning of his testimony by the attorney who called him, the jury will tend to think of the witness as a person willing to suffer embarrassment to tell the truth; but if the matter is first raised on cross-examination, the jurors may tend to consider the witness a person who is trying to hide important facts.

1110

c.The Role of the Trial Judge in the Presentation of Evidence

Judges have significant powers to shape the presentation of evidence at trial. To give one example, it is not unusual for judges to impose time limits for each side to present its case, a practice authorized under Federal Rule 16(c)(2)(O). A “chess clock” trial encourages the parties to streamline their case, thereby sharpening the issues and reducing the length (and burden) of the trial—an especially important consideration with a jury. But time limits might also impair the goals of accuracy and procedural justice in trials. See Nora Freeman Engstrom, The Trouble with Time Limits, 106 Geo. L.J. 933 (2018).

A judge’s powers with respect to other aspects of trial are less certain. Suppose that an attorney’s presentation of a case appears inadequate. To what extent should the trial judge take over the trial by interrogating the witness herself and perhaps by calling new witnesses she believes should be heard? Does it make a difference if the case is before a jury? See Blanck, Calibrating the Scales of Justice: Studying Judges’ Behavior in Bench Trials, 68 Ind.L.J. 1119 (1993). These questions raise fundamental considerations regarding the role of the trial judge: Is the court a mere umpire who must stand aloof except when called upon to make decisions or a participant with the right to supervise the conduct of the trial to help ensure a just result?

There is agreement that judges have some limited power to call and interrogate witnesses, although no consensus as to the extent of that power. Judges may use this power to draw out important facts or clear up confused testimony. The tenor of the judge’s questioning may also affect the jury’s perception of the evidence. In particular, any apparent bias on the judge’s part may encourage the jury to view the facts presented by the witness more or less favorably. See Laughlin, Learning from the Past? Or Destined to Repeat Past Mistakes?: Lessons from the English Legal System and Its Impact on How We View the Role of Judges and Juries Today, 14 Widener L.Rev. 357 (2009). Do you think a judge ought to be required to intercede when the failure to do so might result in a miscarriage of justice? Does the judge owe a special responsibility to a pro se litigant? See Carpenter, Active Judging and Access to Justice, 93 Notre Dame L.Rev. 647 (2017).

1111

d.The Power of Jurors to Question Witnesses

What if a juror is dissatisfied with the evidence? Should the juror be permitted to ask a witness questions that were not asked by the attorneys? Would it be feasible, tactically, for an attorney to object to the question if it called for inadmissible evidence? Is there some means by which this latter problem could be avoided? Would it be preferable to permit the juror to submit written questions to witnesses? See Frank, The Jury Wants to Take the Podium—But Even with the Authority to Do So, Can It? An Interdisciplinary Examination of Jurors’ Questioning of Witnesses at Trial, 38 Am.J.Trial Advoc. 1 (2014).

C. TAKING THE CASE FROM THE JURY—MOTIONS FOR JUDGMENT AS A MATTER OF LAW

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 50 in the Supplement.

Various procedural devices enable a judge to insure that the jury carries out its functions. Rule 50(a) permits the judge, after the witnesses have testified and the evidence has been presented, to withhold the case from the jury and instead to enter judgment as a matter of law if there is not sufficient evidence to raise a genuine factual dispute and a particular result is required under the governing law (until 1991, this procedure was known as a “directed verdict”). Rule 50(b) authorizes a similar procedure for cases that have been submitted to the jury once the jurors have already reached a verdict. If the judge in this situation decides that judgment as a matter of law should have been granted, the court may set aside the verdict and enter judgment (until 1991, this procedure was known as a “judgment notwithstanding the verdict” or “j.n.o.v.”—for “judgment non obstante veredicto”).

1.THE CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUES

In GALLOWAY v. UNITED STATES, 319 U.S. 372, 63 S.Ct. 1077, 87 L.Ed. 1458 (1943), the Supreme Court faced directly the charge that taking a case away from a jury on the ground that a plaintiff had not met its burden of production at trial was a violation of the Seventh Amendment right to a trial by jury. The Court held as follows:

If the intention is to claim generally that the Amendment deprives the federal courts of power to direct a verdict for insufficiency of evidence, the short answer is the contention has been foreclosed by repeated decisions made here consistently for nearly a century. More recently the practice has been approved explicitly in the promulgation of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. * * * The objection therefore comes too late.

1112

Furthermore, the argument from history is not convincing. It is not that “the rules of the common law” in 1791 deprived trial courts of power to withdraw cases from the jury, because not made out, or appellate courts of power to review such determinations. The jury was not absolute master of fact in 1791. Then as now courts excluded evidence for irrelevancy and relevant proof for other reasons. The argument concedes they weighed the evidence, not only piecemeal but in toto for submission to the jury, by at least two procedures, the demurrer to the evidence and the motion for a new trial. The objection is not therefore to the basic thing, which is the power of the court to withhold cases from the jury or set aside the verdict for insufficiency of the evidence. It is rather to incidental or collateral effects, namely, that the directed verdict as now administered differs from both those procedures because, on the one hand, allegedly higher standards of proof are required and, on the other, different consequences follow as to further maintenance of the litigation. Apart from the standards of proof, the argument appears to urge that in 1791, a litigant could challenge his opponent’s evidence, either by the demurrer, which when determined ended the litigation, or by motion for a new trial which, if successful, gave the adversary another chance to prove his case; and therefore the Amendment excluded any challenge to which one or the other of these consequences does not attach.

The Amendment did not bind the federal courts to the exact procedural incidents or details of jury trial according to the common law in 1791, any more than it tied them to the common-law system of pleading or the specific rules of evidence then prevailing. Nor were “the rules of the common law” then prevalent, including those relating to the procedure by which the judge regulated the jury’s role on questions of fact, crystalized in a fixed and immutable system. On the contrary, they were constantly changing and developing during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. In 1791 this process already had resulted in widely divergent common-law rules on procedural matters among the states, and between them and England. * * *

This difficulty, no doubt, accounts for the amorphous character of the objection now advanced, which insists, not that any single one of the features criticized, but that the cumulative total or the alternative effect of all, was embodied in the Amendment. The more logical conclusion, we think, and the one which both history and the previous decisions here support, is that the Amendment was designed to preserve the basic institution of jury trial in only its most fundamental elements, not the great mass of procedural forms and details, varying even then so widely among common-law jurisdictions.

1113

* * *

Finally, the objection appears to be directed generally at the standards of proof judges have required for submission of evidence to the jury. But standards, contrary to the objection’s assumption, cannot be framed wholesale for the great variety of situations in respect to which the question arises. * * * The matter is essentially one to be worked out in particular situations and for particular types of cases. Whatever may be the general formulation, the essential requirement is that mere speculation be not allowed to do duty for probative facts, after making due allowance for all reasonably possible inferences favoring the party whose case is attacked. The mere difference in labels used to describe this standard * * * cannot amount to a departure from “the rules of the common law” which the Amendment requires to be followed. * * *

Id. at 389–95, 63 S.Ct. at 1086–89, 87 L.Ed. at 1470–73.

Justice Black, with whom Justices Douglas and Murphy concurred, wrote a dissenting opinion:

The Court here re-examines testimony offered in a common law suit, weighs conflicting evidence, and holds that the litigant may never take this case to a jury. * * * Today’s decision marks a continuation of the gradual process of judicial erosion which in one hundred fifty years has slowly worn away a major portion of the essential guarantee of the Seventh Amendment.

I.

Alexander Hamilton in The Federalist emphasized his loyalty to the jury system in civil cases and declared that jury verdicts should be re-examined, if at all, only “by a second jury, either by remanding the cause to the court below for a second trial of the fact, or by directing an issue immediately out of the Supreme Court.”

* * * The first Congress expected the Seventh Amendment to meet the objections of men like Patrick Henry to the Constitution itself. Henry, speaking in the Virginia Constitutional Convention, had expressed the general conviction of the people of the Thirteen States when he said, “ * * * We are told that we are to part with that trial by jury with which our ancestors secured their lives and property. * * * I hope we shall never be induced, by such arguments, to part with that excellent mode of trial. No appeal can now be made as to fact in common law suits. The unanimous verdict of impartial men cannot be reversed.” * * *

1114

* * *

As Hamilton had declared in The Federalist, the basic judicial control of the jury function was in the court’s power to order a new trial. In 1830, this Court said: “The only modes known to the common law to re-examine such facts, are the granting of a new trial by the court where the issue was tried, or to which the record was properly returnable; or the award of a venire facias de novo, by an appellate court, for some error of law which intervened in the proceedings.” Parsons v. Bedford, * * * [3 Pet. 433, 448, 7 L.Ed. 732 (1830)]. * * *

A long step toward the determination of fact by judges instead of by juries was the invention of the directed verdict. In 1850, what seems to have been the first directed verdict case considered by this Court, Parks v. Ross, [11 How. 362, 374, 13 L.Ed. 730 (1850)], was presented for decision. The Court held that the directed verdict serves the same purpose as the demurrer to the evidence, and that since there was “no evidence whatever” on the critical issue in the case, the directed verdict was approved. The decision was an innovation, a departure from the traditional rule restated only fifteen years before in Greenleaf v. Birth, 9 Pet. 292, 299[9 L.Ed. 132 (1835)], in which this Court had said: “Where there is no evidence tending to prove a particular fact, the court[s] are bound so to instruct the jury, when requested; but they cannot legally give any instruction which shall take from the jury the right of weighing the evidence and determining what effect it shall have.”

This new device contained potentialities for judicial control of the jury which had not existed in the demurrer to the evidence. In the first place, demurring to the evidence was risky business, for in so doing the party not only admitted the truth of all the testimony against him but also all reasonable inferences which might be drawn from it; and upon joinder in demurrer the case was withdrawn from the jury while the court proceeded to give final judgment either for or against the demurrant. * * * The litigant not only takes no risk by a motion for a directed verdict, but in making such a motion gives himself two opportunities to avoid the jury's decision; for under the federal variant of judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the judge may reserve opinion on the motion for a directed verdict and then give judgment for the moving party after the jury was formally found against him. In the second place, under the directed verdict practice the courts soon abandoned the "admission of all facts and reasonable inferences" standard referred to, and created the so-called "substantial evidence" rule which permitted directed verdicts even though there was far more evidence in the case than a plaintiff would have needed to withstand a demurrer.

1115

* * * The rule that a case must go to the jury unless there was "no evidence" was completely repudiated in Schuylkill and Dauphin Improvement Co. v. Munson, 14 Wall. 442, 447[, 448, 20 L.Ed. 867 (1871)], upon which the Court today relies in part. There the Court declared that "some" evidence was not enough—there must be evidence sufficiently persuasive to the judge so that he thinks "a jury can properly proceed." The traditional rule was given an ugly name, "the scintilla rule", to hasten its demise. * * * The same transition from jury supremacy to jury subordination through judicial decisions took place in State courts.

* * *

The call for the true application of the Seventh Amendment is not to words, but to the spirit of honest desire to see that Constitutional right preserved. Either the judge or the jury must decide facts and to the extent that we take this responsibility, we lessen the jury function. Our duty to preserve this one of the Bill of Rights may be peculiarly difficult, for here it is our own power which we must restrain. * * * As for myself, I believe that a verdict should be directed, if at all, only when, without weighing the credibility of the witnesses, there is in the evidence no room whatever for honest difference of opinion over the factual issue in controversy. * * *

Id. at 397–407, 63 S.Ct. at 1089–96, 87 L.Ed. 1474–81.

NEELY v. MARTIN K. EBY CONSTRUCTION CO., 386 U.S. 317, 321–22, 87 S.Ct. 1072, 1076–77, 18 L.Ed.2d 75, 80–81 (1967). Plaintiff brought a wrongful death action against defendant, claiming that defendant's negligent construction, maintenance, and supervision of a missile silo proximately caused the death of plaintiff's father, who died when he fell from a platform while working at the silo. At the close of plaintiff's case and again at the close of all the evidence, defendant moved unsuccessfully for a directed verdict. The jury returned a $25,000 verdict for plaintiff, and the trial judge entered judgment for plaintiff after denying defendant's Rule 50(b) motion or, alternatively, its motion for a new trial.

On appeal, the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit found the evidence insufficient to establish negligence or proximate cause, and reversed the district court's ruling on defendant's Rule 50(b) motion.

1116

Plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that she had had no opportunity to raise claims for a new trial, and therefore an appellate court could not dismiss the case without running afoul of the Seventh Amendment jury trial right. Justice White wrote:

* * * The question here is whether the Court of Appeals, after reversing the denial of a defendant's Rule 50(b) motion * * *, may itself order dismissal or direct entry of judgment for defendant. As far as the Seventh Amendment's right to jury trial is concerned, there is no greater restriction on the province of the jury when an appellate court enters judgment n.o.v. than when a trial court does; consequently, there is no constitutional bar to an appellate court granting judgment n.o.v. * * *

In our view, therefore, Rule 50(d)^b makes express and adequate provision for the opportunity—which the plaintiff-appellee had without this rule—to present his grounds for a new trial in the event his verdict is set aside by the court of appeals. If he does so in his brief—or in a petition for rehearing if the court of appeals has directed entry of judgment for appellant—the court of appeals may make final disposition of the issues presented, except those which in its informed discretion should be reserved for the trial court. If appellee presents no new trial issues in his brief or in a petition for rehearing, the court of appeals may, in any event, order a new trial on its own motion or refer the question to the district court, based on factors encountered in its own review of the case.

* * *

In the case before us, petitioner won a verdict in the District Court which survived respondent's n.o.v. motion. In the Court of Appeals the issue was the sufficiency of the evidence and that court set aside the verdict. Petitioner, as appellee, suggested no grounds for a new trial in the event her judgment was reversed, nor did she petition for rehearing in the Court of Appeals, even though that court had directed a dismissal of her case. Neither was it suggested that the record was insufficient to present any new trial issues or that any other reason required a remand to the District Court. Indeed, in her brief in the Court of Appeals, petitioner stated, “this law suit was fairly tried and the jury was properly instructed.” It was, of course, incumbent on the Court of Appeals to consider the new trial question in the light of its own experience with the case. But we will not assume that the court ignored its duty in this respect, although it would have been better had its opinion expressly dealt with the new trial question.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In Weisgram v. Marley Co., 528 U.S. 440, 120 S.Ct. 1011, 145 L.Ed.2d 958 (2000), a wrongful death action, plaintiff introduced expert testimony over defendant’s objection and won a jury verdict. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit held that the district court erred in admitting the expert testimony, and found that the remainder of the evidence in the record was insufficient to support the verdict. The Supreme Court held that the appeals court under Neeley could direct entry of judgment as a matter of law for the verdict-loser, if “on excision of testimony erroneously admitted, there remains insufficient evidence to support the jury’s verdict.” Id. at 457, 120 S.Ct. at 1022, 145 L.Ed.2d at 974.

2.For a criticism of Galloway and other Supreme Court cases upholding procedures that impinge on the jury right, see Thomas, The Missing American Jury: Restoring the Fundamental Constitutional Role of the Criminal, Civil, and Grand Juries (2016); Thomas, The Seventh Amendment, Modern Procedure, and the English Common Law, 82 Wash.U.L.Q. 687 (2004).

2.STANDARDS FOR A MOTION FOR JUDGMENT AS A MATTER OF LAW

DENMAN V. SPAIN

Supreme Court of Mississippi, 1961.
242 Miss. 431, 135 So.2d 195.

LEE, PRESIDING JUSTICE.

Betty Denman, a minor, * * * sued * * * [the] executrix of the estate of Joseph A. Ross, deceased, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by her, allegedly resulting from the negligence of the decedent in the operation of an automobile. The issue was submitted to a jury on the evidence for the plaintiff—no evidence being offered for the defendant—and there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $5,000. However, on motion of the defendant, a judgment non obstante veredicto * * * was sustained and entered. From that action, the plaintiff has appealed.

* * *

The appellant contends that the evidence offered by her, together with the reasonable inferences therefrom, was sufficient to make an issue for the jury as to whether the alleged negligence of the deceased driver, Ross, proximately caused or contributed to the collision and the consequent damage * * *.

A careful scrutiny and analysis of the evidence is therefore necessary:

Sunday, March 23, 1958, was a rainy, foggy day. About six o’clock that afternoon, at dusk, Mrs. Eva B. Denman, accompanied by her granddaughter, Betty, the plaintiff, was driving her Ford car southward on U.S. Highway 49E. At that time, Joseph A. Ross, accompanied by Miss Euna Tanner and Mrs. J.L. Haining, was driving his Plymouth car northward on said highway. Just south of the Town of Sumner, the cars collided. Mrs. Denman, Miss Tanner and Ross were killed. Betty, nearly seven years of age at the time, and Mrs. Haining were injured. Neither had any recollection of what had happened at the time of the collision. * * *

Plaintiff’s father, Stuart Denman, who went to the scene shortly after the collision, described the situation substantially as follows: The Ford car was about seven yards off the paved surface on the east side in a bar pit “heading back towards the railroad track, which is in an easterly direction.” The engine and transmission were on the opposite side of the road, out of the car and about fifty yards apart. The Plymouth was also on the east side, facing west, about fifteen yards north of the Ford.

No proof was offered as to skid marks, or other evidence to show the point of contact between these two vehicles. Eleven photographs of the damaged Plymouth, taken from various positions, and thirteen pictures of the damaged Ford, also taken from various positions, other than being mute evidence of a terrible tragedy, depict no reasonable or plausible explanation as to why this collision occurred, or who was responsible for it. * * *

Over objection by the defendant, John Barnett testified that he was driving a Dodge pickup north of [sic] highway 49E on his way to Tutwiler; that he was traveling at a speed of fifty or fifty-five miles per hour; that the Plymouth, which was in the wreck, passed him about three-fourths of a mile south of where the collision occurred, going at a speed of about seventy miles per hour; that when it passed, it got back in its lane, and neither wavered nor wobbled thereafter; that he followed and observed it for a distance of forty or fifty yards, and that it stayed in its proper lane as long as he saw it. Although another car was on the road ahead of him, he could have seen as far as the place of the accident except for the rain and fog.

Over objection by the defendant, Hal Buckley, a Negro man, testified that he was also traveling north on 49E on his way to Tutwiler at a speed of forty to fifty miles per hour. About two hundred yards south of the place where the collision occurred, a light green Plymouth, which he later saw at the scene of the accident, passed him at a speed of seventy-five or eighty miles an hour. He could see its taillights after it passed, and “he was just steady going; he wasn’t doing no slowing up.” He saw it until it ran into the other car. On cross-examination, he said that, after this car passed him, it got back on its side of the road, drove straight, and he did not notice that it ever went back over the center. Also on cross-examination, in an effort at impeachment, a part of the transcript in [an earlier] * * * trial [brought unsuccessfully against the estate of plaintiff’s grandmother] containing this question and answer, was read to him as follows: “What do you estimate the speed of that car was when it passed you—the one that was going the same direction that you were?”, and the answer was: “Well, I don’t have no idea.” * * * He then admitted that when the car passed him, it got back on its side and drove straight ahead, and that he could see the accident, but he could not tell anything about it or on which side of the road it happened. He also did not notice the other car, which came from the other direction.

1119

Since Barnett did not see the car any more after it had gone forty or fifty yards beyond him, and his knowledge of speed was based on what he saw about three-fourths of a mile south of the place where the collision occurred, this evidence was inadmissible * * *. On the contrary, since Buckley testified the speed of this car, when it passed him, was seventy-five to eighty miles an hour and that it did not slow down in the remaining distance of two hundred yards before the collision, such evidence was competent and admissible * * *. The attempted impeachment went to its credibility and not its admissibility.

From this evidence, the plaintiff reasons that the jury could, and did, find that the Ross car was being operated, under inclement weather conditions, at an unlawful and negligent rate of speed, and that, if Ross had had his car under adequate and proper control, in all probability the collision could have been avoided. She voices the opinion that the physical facts, including the pictures of the wrecked vehicles, indicated that the Ford car was probably across the highway at an angle of perhaps forty-five degrees at the time of the collision.

But the testimony of Buckley showed only that the Plymouth was being operated at an excessive and negligent rate of speed. It otherwise showed that the car was in its proper lane. He did not notice it go over the center at any time, but it was driven straight down the road. No eyewitness claimed to have seen what happened. There was no evidence to indicate the place in the road where the vehicles came in contact with each other. There was no showing as to the speed of the Ford, whether fast or slow; or as to whether it was traveling on the right or wrong side of the road; or as to whether it slid or was suddenly driven to the wrong side of the road into the path of the Plymouth. The cars were so badly damaged that the pictures afford no reasonable explanation as to what person or persons were legally responsible for their condition. In other words, just how and why this grievous tragedy occurred is completely shrouded in mystery.

The burden was on the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence, not only that the operator of the Plymouth was guilty of negligence but also that such negligence proximately caused or contributed to the collision and consequent damage. By the use of metaphysical learning, speculation and conjecture, one may reach several possible conclusions as to how the accident occurred. However such conclusions could only be classed as possibilities; and this Court has many times held that verdicts cannot be based on possibilities. At all events, there is no sound or reasonable basis upon which a jury or this Court can say that the plaintiff met that burden.

1120

The judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

Do you agree that a jury properly could not have found for plaintiff in the Denman case? What inferences would have to be drawn from the evidence to reach such a conclusion? How would you support the proposition that these inferences reasonably could be found to be stronger than other inferences that would not lead to a verdict for plaintiff? If the jury could decide reasonably one way or the other, is the decision “an emotional rather than a rational act”? See Michael, The Basic Rules of Pleading, 5 Record of N.Y.C.B.A. 175, 199–200 (1950).

REEVES V. SANDERSON PLUMBING PRODUCTS, INC.

Supreme Court of the United States, 2000.
530 U.S. 133, 120 S.Ct. 2097, 147 L.Ed.2d 105.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

JUSTICE O’CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case concerns the kind and amount of evidence necessary to sustain a jury’s verdict that an employer unlawfully discriminated on the basis of age. Specifically, we must resolve whether a defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law when the plaintiff’s case consists exclusively of a prima facie case of discrimination and sufficient evidence for the trier of fact to disbelieve the defendant’s legitimate, nondiscriminatory explanation for its action. * * *

* * * [In age discrimination cases, the Courts of Appeals generally first require plaintiff to establish a prima facie case of discrimination, and then the burden of production shifts to defendant to present evidence supporting a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for the job action. Petitioner satisfied this burden, and the burden shifted to respondent.] Respondent met this burden by offering admissible evidence sufficient for the trier of fact to conclude that petitioner was fired because of his failure to maintain accurate attendance records. * * * Accordingly, * * * the sole remaining issue was “discrimination vel non” * * *.

1121

Although intermediate evidentiary burdens shift back and forth under this framework, “[t]he ultimate burden of persuading the trier of fact that the defendant intentionally discriminated against the plaintiff remains at all times with the plaintiff.” * * * And in attempting to satisfy this burden, the plaintiff—once the employer produces sufficient evidence to support a nondiscriminatory explanation for its decision—must be afforded the “opportunity to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the legitimate reasons offered by the defendant were not its true reasons, but were a pretext for discrimination.” * * * That is, the plaintiff may attempt to establish that he was the victim of intentional discrimination “by showing that the employer’s proffered explanation is unworthy of credence.” * * * Moreover, although the presumption of discrimination “drops out of the picture” once the defendant meets its burden of production, * * * the trier of fact may still consider the evidence establishing the plaintiff’s prima facie case “and inferences properly drawn therefrom . . . [omission in original] on the issue of whether the defendant’s explanation is pretextual” * * *.

In this case, the evidence supporting respondent’s explanation for petitioner’s discharge consisted primarily of testimony by [the supervisor and others] * * * of petitioner’s alleged “shoddy record keeping.” * * *

Petitioner, however, made a substantial showing that respondent’s explanation was false. First, petitioner offered evidence that he had properly maintained the attendance records. * * *

Petitioner similarly cast doubt on whether he was responsible for any failure to discipline late and absent employees. * * * [The company admitted that petitioner was not responsible for disciplining employees, and conceded that there had never been a union grievance or employee complaint about petitioner’s recordkeeping, and there was testimony about the absence of overpayments.]

Based on this evidence, the Court of Appeals concluded that petitioner “very well may be correct” that “a reasonable jury could have found that [respondent’s] explanation for its employment decision was pretextual.” * * * Nonetheless, the court held that this showing, standing alone, was insufficient to sustain the jury’s finding of liability: “We must, as an essential final step, determine whether Reeves presented sufficient evidence that his age motivated [respondent’s] employment decision.” * * * And in making this determination, the Court of Appeals ignored the evidence supporting petitioner’s prima facie case and challenging respondent’s explanation for its decision. * * * The court confined its review of evidence favoring petitioner to that evidence showing that * * * [the supervisor] had directed derogatory, age-based comments at petitioner, and that * * * [the supervisor] had singled out petitioner for harsher treatment than younger employees. * * * It is therefore apparent that the court believed that only this additional evidence of discrimination was relevant to whether the jury’s verdict should stand. That is, the Court of Appeals proceeded from the assumption that a prima facie case of discrimination, combined with sufficient evidence for the trier of fact to disbelieve the defendant’s legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for its decision, is insufficient as a matter of law to sustain a jury’s finding of intentional discrimination.

1122

In so reasoning, the Court of Appeals misconceived the evidentiary burden borne by plaintiffs who attempt to prove intentional discrimination through indirect evidence. * * * [T]he factfinder’s rejection of the employer’s legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for its action does not compel judgment for the plaintiff. * * *

* * * [H]owever, * * * it is permissible for the trier of fact to infer the ultimate fact of discrimination from the falsity of the employer’s explanation. * * *

Proof that the defendant’s explanation is unworthy of credence is simply one form of circumstantial evidence that is probative of intentional discrimination, and it may be quite persuasive. * * * In appropriate circumstances, the trier of fact can reasonably infer from the falsity of the explanation that the employer is dissembling to cover up a discriminatory purpose. * * * Moreover, once the employer’s justification has been eliminated, discrimination may well be the most likely alternative explanation, especially since the employer is in the best position to put forth the actual reason for its decision. * * * Thus, a plaintiff’s prima facie case, combined with sufficient evidence to find that the employer’s asserted justification is false, may permit the trier of fact to conclude that the employer unlawfully discriminated.

This is not to say that such a showing by the plaintiff will always be adequate to sustain a jury’s finding of liability. Certainly there will be instances where, although the plaintiff has established a prima facie case and set forth sufficient evidence to reject the defendant’s explanation, no rational factfinder could conclude that the action was discriminatory. * * *

Whether judgment as a matter of law is appropriate in any particular case will depend on a number of factors. Those include the strength of the plaintiff’s prima facie case, the probative value of the proof that the employer’s explanation is false, and any other evidence that supports the employer’s case and that properly may be considered on a motion for judgment as a matter of law. * * * For purposes of this case, we need not—and could not—resolve all of the circumstances in which such factors would entitle an employer to judgment as a matter of law. It suffices to say that, because a prima facie case and sufficient evidence to reject the employer’s explanation may permit a finding of liability, the Court of Appeals erred in proceeding from the premise that a plaintiff must always introduce additional, independent evidence of discrimination.

1123

* * *

The remaining question is whether, despite the Court of Appeals’ misconception of petitioner’s evidentiary burden, respondent was nonetheless entitled to judgment as a matter of law [under Federal Rule 50]. * * * The Courts of Appeals have articulated differing formulations as to what evidence a court is to consider in ruling on a Rule 50 motion. * * * Some decisions have stated that review is limited to that evidence favorable to the nonmoving party, * * * while most have held that review extends to the entire record, drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of the nonmovant * * *.

On closer examination, this conflict seems more semantic than real. Those decisions holding that review under Rule 50 should be limited to evidence favorable to the nonmovant appear to have their genesis in Wilkerson v. McCarthy, 336 U.S. 53[, 69 S.Ct. 413, 93 L.Ed. 497] (1949). * * * In Wilkerson, we stated that “in passing upon whether there is sufficient evidence to submit an issue to the jury we need look only to the evidence and reasonable inferences which tend to support the case of” the nonmoving party. * * * But subsequent decisions have clarified that this passage was referring to the evidence to which the trial court should give credence, not the evidence that the court should review. In the analogous context of summary judgment under Rule 56, we have stated that the court must review the record “taken as a whole.” Matsushita * * * [p. 1029, supra]. And the standard for granting summary judgment “mirrors” the standard for judgment as a matter of law, such that “the inquiry under each is the same.” Anderson v. Liberty Lobby * * * [p. 1027, supra]. It therefore follows that, in entertaining a motion for judgment as a matter of law, the court should review all of the evidence in the record.

In doing so, however, the court must draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the nonmoving party, and it may not make credibility determinations or weigh the evidence. * * * “Credibility determinations, the weighing of the evidence, and the drawing of legitimate inferences from the facts are jury functions, not those of a judge.” * * * Thus, although the court should review the record as a whole, it must disregard all evidence favorable to the moving party that the jury is not required to believe. * * * That is, the court should give credence to the evidence favoring the nonmovant as well as that “evidence supporting the moving party that is uncontradicted and unimpeached, at least to the extent that that evidence comes from disinterested witnesses.” * * *

* * *

1124

Applying this standard here, it is apparent that respondent was not entitled to judgment as a matter of law. In this case, in addition to establishing a prima facie case of discrimination and creating a jury issue as to the falsity of the employer’s explanation, petitioner introduced additional evidence that * * * [the supervisor] was motivated by age-based animus and was principally responsible for petitioner’s firing. * * *

Further, petitioner introduced evidence that [the supervisor] was the actual decisionmaker behind his firing. * * *

* * * Again, the court disregarded critical evidence favorable to petitioner * * *. The court also failed to draw all reasonable inferences in favor of petitioner. For instance, while acknowledging “the potentially damning nature” of * * * [the supervisor’s] age-related comments, the court discounted them on the ground that they “were not made in the direct context of Reeves’s termination.” * * * And the court discredited petitioner’s evidence that * * * [the supervisor] was the actual decisionmaker by giving weight to the fact that there was “no evidence to suggest that any of the other decisionmakers were motivated by age.” * * * In concluding that these circumstances so overwhelmed the evidence favoring petitioner that no rational trier of fact could have found that petitioner was fired because of his age, the Court of Appeals impermissibly substituted its judgment concerning the weight of the evidence for the jury’s.

* * * Given the evidence in the record supporting petitioner, we see no reason to subject the parties to an additional round of litigation before the Court of Appeals rather than to resolve the matter here. * * * Given that petitioner established a prima facie case of discrimination, introduced enough evidence for the jury to reject respondent’s explanation, and produced additional evidence of age-based animus, there was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that respondent had intentionally discriminated. The District Court was therefore correct to submit the case to the jury, and the Court of Appeals erred in overturning its verdict.

For these reasons, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed.

It is so ordered.

[A concurring opinion of JUSTICE GINSBURG is omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Court in Reeves resolved a conflict in the circuits concerning the portion of the evidence a court is to consider in ruling on a motion under Rule 50. Some of the circuits had examined all of the evidence in a manner most favorable to the nonmoving party; others considered only the evidence that supports the verdict winner; still others considered uncontradicted, unimpeached evidence from disinterested witnesses. See Schwimmer

Electronics Co. v. Sony Corp., 459 U.S. 1007, 103 S.Ct. 362, 74 L.Ed.2d 398 (1982) (White, J., dissenting from the denial of certiorari). Do you agree with the majority’s statement in Reeves that these various standards reflect only “semantic” differences? What did the Court mean when it stated the “the court should give credence to the evidence favoring the nonmovant as well as that ‘evidence supporting the moving party that is uncontradicted and unimpeached, at least to the extent that that evidence comes from disinterested witnesses.’ ”? For a discussion, see Childress, Standards of Review Primer: Federal Civil Appeals, 293 F.R.D. 156 (2013).

2. In deciding Reeves, the Court analogized a motion for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50 to a motion for summary judgment under Rule 56 because “the standard for granting summary judgment ‘mirrors’ the standard for judgment as a matter of law.” For a discussion of the operation of summary judgment motions, see Chapter 13, supra. The interaction between Rule 50 and Rule 56 can be complicated when the court denies a motion for summary judgment and the case then proceeds to trial. In ORTIZ v. JORDAN, 562 U.S. 180, 131 S.Ct. 884, 178 L.Ed.2d 703 (2011), the Supreme Court held that challenges to the sufficiency of the record at summary judgment are not preserved for appeal after trial. Instead, the Court explained that defendants needed, post-trial, to file a motion for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(b) in order to raise a sufficiency-of-the-evidence issue that they had pursued unsuccessfully in a pretrial summary judgment motion. Id. at 191–92, 131 S.Ct. at 893, 178 L.Ed.2d at 708. What purpose does this requirement serve?

3. Either party may move for a judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(a). If plaintiff’s motion is denied, what are defendant’s next steps in the litigation? What if it is defendant’s motion that has been denied?

3. THE MOTION FOR JUDGMENT AS A MATTER OF LAW AFTER THE VERDICT (J.N.O.V.)

Why is there a need for a judgment as a matter of law after the jury has rendered its verdict? If a case has not been made during the presentation of the evidence, shouldn’t the court have dismissed the case without submission to the jury? In fact, it is extremely rare that a court will grant a motion for judgment as a matter of law at the end of all of the evidence. Instead it will wait until after the jury has made its decision. Why is this so? In this context consider the situation if the trial judge is held to be incorrect in granting the motion and the appellate court reverses. What is the posture of the case at that point? Do the same considerations obtain when the court grants such a motion at an earlier time, e.g., at the end of plaintiff’s case?

BALTIMORE & CAROLINA LINE, INC. v. REDMAN, 295 U.S. 654, 656, 658–60, 55 S.Ct. 890, 891–93, 79 L.Ed. 1636, 1637–40 (1935) (opinion by Justice Van Devanter):

This was an action in a federal court in New York to recover damages for personal injuries allegedly sustained by the plaintiff through the defendant’s negligence. The issues were tried before the court and a jury. At the conclusion of the evidence, the defendant moved for a dismissal of the complaint because the evidence was insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, and also moved for a directed verdict in its favor on the same ground. The court reserved its decision on both motions, submitted the case to the jury subject to its opinion on the questions reserved, and received from the jury a verdict for the plaintiff. No objection was made to the reservation or this mode of proceeding. Thereafter the court held the evidence sufficient and the motions ill grounded, and accordingly entered a judgment for the plaintiff on the verdict.

The defendant appealed to the Circuit Court of Appeals, which held the evidence insufficient and reversed the judgment with a direction for a new trial. The defendant urged that the direction be for a dismissal of the complaint. But the Court of Appeals ruled that under our decision in Slocum v. New York Life Insurance Company [, 228 U.S. 364, 33 S.Ct. 523, 57 L.Ed. 879,] the direction must be for a new trial. * * *

In Slocum * * * a jury trial in a federal court resulted in a general verdict for the plaintiff over the defendant’s request that a verdict for it be directed. Judgment was entered on the verdict for the plaintiff and the defendant obtained a review in the court of appeals. That court examined the evidence, concluded that it was insufficient to support the verdict, and on that basis reversed the judgment given to the plaintiff on the verdict, and directed that judgment be entered for the defendant. The question presented to us was whether, in the situation disclosed, the direction for a judgment for the defendant was an infraction of the Seventh Amendment. We held it was and that the direction should be for a new trial.

It therefore is important to have in mind the situation to which our ruling applied. In that case the defendant’s request for a directed verdict was denied without any reservation of the question of the sufficiency of the evidence or of any other matter; and the verdict for the plaintiff was taken unconditionally, and not subject to the court’s opinion on the sufficiency of the evidence. * * *

A very different situation is disclosed in the present case. The trial court expressly reserved its ruling on the defendant’s motions to dismiss and for a directed verdict, both of which were based on the asserted insufficiency of the evidence to support a verdict for the plaintiff. Whether the evidence was sufficient or otherwise was a question of law to be resolved by the court. The verdict for the plaintiff was taken pending the court’s rulings on the motions and subject to those rulings. No objection was made to the reservation or this mode of proceeding, and they must be regarded as having the tacit consent of the parties. * * *

At common law there was a well-established practice of reserving questions of law arising during trials by jury and of taking verdicts subject to the ultimate ruling on the questions reserved; and under this practice the reservation carried with it authority to make such ultimate disposition of the case as might be made essential by the ruling under the reservation, such as nonsuiting the plaintiff where he had obtained a verdict, entering a verdict or judgment for one party where the jury had given a verdict to the other, or making other essential adjustments.

Fragmentary references to the origin and basis of the practice indicate that it came to be supported on the theory that it gave better opportunity for considered rulings, made new trials less frequent, and commanded such general approval that parties litigant assented to its application as a matter of course. But whatever may have been its origin or theoretical basis, it undoubtedly was well established when the Seventh Amendment was adopted, and therefore must be regarded as a part of the common-law rules to which resort must be had in testing and measuring the right of trial by jury as preserved and protected by that amendment.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Note that the Seventh Amendment provides that “no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, other than according to the rules of the common law.” It was in that regard that the Supreme Court in SLOCUM v. NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO., 228 U.S. 364, 33 S.Ct. 523, 57 L.Ed. 879 (1913), relied upon in Redman, p. 1125, supra, held that once the trial court has denied a defendant’s directed verdict motion and allowed the case to go to the jury, the court could not order a judgment contrary to the jury verdict, but could only order a new trial. In Redman, the Court distinguished Slocum because the judge had reserved ruling on the directed verdict, so that the jury verdict was taken subject to his decision on the motion. Initially, Rule 50(b) appeared to authorize a court to grant a motion for judgment as a matter of law after a jury verdict only if a motion for a directed verdict had been made “at the close of all of the evidence.” Some courts had read this strictly to bar the later motion if the motion for a directed verdict had originally been made only at the end of plaintiff’s case. In 2006 Rule 50(b) was amended to permit renewal of any Rule 50(a) motion without any requirement that the motion have been made at the close of evidence. Does the automatic reservation of legal questions raised by the motion meet the concerns raised in Redman?

2. What are the purposes of Rule 50(b) other than to satisfy the requirements of Redman? Suppose a party who has moved for a judgment as a matter of law at the end of all the evidence solely on the ground that one element of the case has not been proven, argues that the evidence was insufficient to establish a different element when the motion is renewed after the jury verdict? Should the new ground be considered?

3. When must a Rule 50(b) motion be filed? When does the period begin to run if the jury is discharged without reaching a verdict?

D. INSTRUCTIONS AND VERDICTS

1. INSTRUCTIONS TO THE JURY

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 51 and the comparative state materials in the Supplement.

a. Requests for and Objections to Instructions

Before the jury retires to deliberate and decide, the court instructs it on the law to be applied and the manner in which it is to reach a decision. In most jurisdictions, the courts take the position that the judge, as the impartial umpire in the case, should have the last word in order that partisan appeals by counsel will be tempered by a dispassionate statement of the law to be applied. Federal Rule 51 was amended in 1987 to give the judge the option to instruct the jury before or after closing arguments, or both.

Normally, the court requires the attorneys to submit proposed instructions at some point during the trial, usually after the evidence has been completed. The court then determines which of these instructions to give and which of its own to add. Under the rules of most jurisdictions, unless the party requested an instruction or immediately objected to an instruction, an appeal cannot be taken. See Alexander v. Kramer Bros. Freight Lines, Inc., p. 50, supra. However, courts may treat the failure to request an important instruction differently than the failure to object to an erroneous instruction. In Fisher v. Ford Motor Co., 224 F.3d 570, 576 (6th Cir. 2000), the court stated that it reviews de novo the accuracy of instructions that were given, whereas it reviews a trial court’s decision not to give a requested instruction only for an abuse of discretion.

One explanation for the disparate treatment was offered by Wirtz v. International Harvester Co., 331 F.2d 462 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 845, 85 S.Ct. 36, 13 L.Ed.2d 50 (1964), in which the court reversed a judgment on the ground that a vital instruction, not challenged below, clearly was incorrect. The appellate court stated that both parties have a duty to ensure that important instructions are phrased properly, not just the party who would be injured if an improper instruction were to be given.

From a tactical point of view, the drafting of proposed instructions poses a serious dilemma. On the one hand, every attorney wants a set of instructions that is as favorable to his client as possible. On the other hand, the more slanted the instructions proposed, the more likely it is that the judge will discard them. Moreover, if the judge accepts a highly prejudicial instruction, a jury verdict based upon it may be reversed on appeal. See generally Powers, Requests for Instructions, 28 F.R.D. 239 (1960). In addition, instructions are likely to be ignored if they are so long and technical that the jurors cannot understand them. Thus an attorney is wise to seek a simple, favorable instruction on a point. See Bissett & Heinen, Accurately Instructed in the Law: Finding State Jury Instructions, 94 Mich.B.J. 48 (Nov. 2015).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why shouldn't instructions be the sole responsibility of the trial judge? Federal Rule 51 and its state counterparts usually are justified on the ground that a court should be told of its errors and omissions in time to correct them in order to avoid the costs and delays of a new trial. Is there some other reason? Note that Rule 51 requires the trial judge to inform the lawyers prior to their closing arguments as to what instructions will be given. Objections are then to be made before the jury retires but out of its hearing. What purpose do these provisions serve?

2. In 1981, a noted federal judge pointed to serious problems in the instruction process:

Prevailing practices of instructing juries are often so archaic and unrealistic that even in relatively simple cases what the jurors hear is little more than legal mumbo jumbo to them. Responsibility for the shortcomings of present practices must be shared by lawyers, trial courts, and appellate courts—lawyers for submitting self-serving, excessively long and argumentative instructions, trial judges for adhering to archaic practices out of fear of being reversed, and appellate courts for elevating legal abstractions over juror understanding.

Schwartz, Communicating with Juries: Problems and Remedies, 69 Calif.L.Rev. 731, 732 (1981). Since then, steps have been taken to improve juror comprehension. See Dumas, Jury Trials: Lay Jurors, Pattern Jury Instructions, and Comprehension Issues, 67 Tenn.L.Rev. 701 (2000); see also Marder, Bringing Jury Instructions into the Twenty-First Century, 81 Notre Dame L.Rev. 449 (2006).

3. Juries frequently have been accused of invading the province of the judge by ignoring its instructions, fabricating their own rules of law, and applying them to the facts. E.g., Frank, Courts on Trial 110–11 (1949). Consider the following excerpt in terms of whether the jury really is abusing its function by not applying the law in strict fashion:

Some might view the jury's * * * [ability to ignore the law] as a disadvantage of the jury. However it does ensure that the process of adjudication is democratic and allows for flexibility from the potentially rigid application of rules of law that do not countenance novel situations or fact patterns. Furthermore, the actions of the jury in importing community values into the adjudicatory process are incremental in the sense that a single jury can act only in the case before it based on the facts presented to it. * * * The ability of the jury to import community values into the process of adjudication is also what allows it to function as a “bulwark of liberty” and to resist abusive exercise of governmental power against the citizenry. * * *

Smith, Structural and Functional Aspects of the Jury: Comparative Analysis and Proposals for Reform, 48 Ala.L.Rev. 441, 473–74 (1997). See also Varol, Structural Rights, 100 Geo.L.J. 1001, 1047 (2017):

The importance of juries as a structural check on the political branches is enhanced by several other factors. First, the local nature of most juries ensures that the jury represents local majorities that are often minorities on a national scale. Juries can therefore protect the rights of the local community against abusive national majorities. In addition, where unanimous verdicts are required, even a sole dissenter can be outcome determinative. And even where non-unanimous verdicts are possible, a small number of jurors can still influence the outcome. Finally, the transparent nature of the jury trial, which allows all citizens to observe the judicial process, enhances the structural role of the jury as a check on government power.

b. Commenting on the Evidence by Judges

NUNLEY v. PETTWAY OIL CO., 346 F.2d 95, 98–99 (6th Cir. 1965). Plaintiff brought suit for personal injuries received when a truck fell off a grease rack in a gas station. The jury found plaintiff to be a licensee rather than an invitee at the time of the accident, and, applying the applicable law, the court entered judgment for defendant. On appeal plaintiff contended that the court had commented improperly to the jury on the licensee-invitee question. During their initial deliberations the jurors were unable to agree on this issue. The judge then called them into the courtroom and urged them to try to arrive at a decision as follows:

Now, the jury of course is the sole and exclusive judge of the facts in this lawsuit. It is appropriate that the Court in an effort to be possibly of some help to the jury may comment upon the evidence. I refrain from doing that and have refrained until this time from doing it in this case. However, in an effort to be of some possible assistance to you I think that I should under these circumstances make some comment upon the evidence upon this issue of invitee-licensee. I want you to understand, however, that in making these comments that you are not in any degree, in any respect, obligated to receive or accept or agree with what I may say. It is your duty to accept what I say with regard to the law in the case, but it is not your duty to accept any comment that I may make or any evaluation that I may make or conclusion that I might reach on the evidence. That is solely your responsibility and solely your duty. But, with that understanding, it is the opinion of the Court in this case that, from all the evidence upon the issue of invitee or licensee, that the evidence will establish that at the time and place of the accident the plaintiff was a licensee and not an invitee. Now, I say that just for the purpose, as I say, of possibly being of some help to you, but I want you to understand that in making that comment you are not obligated whatsoever to accept that comment as your comment or as your opinion in the case, because it is your job and your responsibility to resolve that issue. I only make that with the thought and the hope that it may be of some possible assistance to you. At any rate, I want to ask you once again to retire and consider your verdict and see if you cannot come to some agreement, some verdict that will reflect the views of all of the jurors. * * *

The Court of Appeals reversed, stating:

We recognize that the right of a District Judge to comment on the evidence is firmly established in the federal system. See Quercia v. United States, 289 U.S. 466, 53 S.Ct. 698, 77 L.Ed. 1321 (1933) * * *. We do not seek narrowly to confine this right when it is used to inform the jury as to problems which they must consider.

* * *

Nonetheless, we believe that under the circumstances enumerated, the trial judge’s opinion on the licensee-invitee issue was an opinion on an ultimate fact question peculiarly for jury consideration and amounted to an instructed verdict as to defendant Pettway Oil Company.

In Quercia v. United States, supra, Chief Justice Hughes commented:

“This privilege of the judge to comment on the facts has its inherent limitations. His discretion is not arbitrary and uncontrolled, but judicial, to be exercised in conformity with the standards governing the judicial office. In commenting upon testimony he may not assume the role of a witness. He may analyze and dissect the evidence, but he may not either distort it or add to it. His privilege of comment in order to give appropriate assistance to the jury is too important to be left without safeguards against abuses.”

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.In Quercia, a criminal case, quoted in Nunley, the Supreme Court reversed a conviction because the following charge was given to the jury:

And now I am going to tell you what I think of the defendant’s testimony. You may have noticed, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen, that he wiped his hands during his testimony. It is rather a curious thing, but that is almost always an indication of lying. Why it should be so we don’t know, but that is the fact. I think that every single word that man said, except when he agreed with the Government’s testimony, was a lie.

Now, that opinion is an opinion of evidence and is not binding on you, and if you don’t agree with it, it is your duty to find him not guilty.

Id. at 468–69, 53 S.Ct. at 698, 77 L.Ed. at 1324. Was the court in Nunley justified in relying on Quercia? Aren’t there substantial differences between the two cases?

2. In light of the decision in Nunley, what is the meaning of the court’s statement: “We recognize that the right of a District Judge to comment on the evidence is firmly established in the federal system”? The Sixth Circuit, relying upon Nunley, explained: “Courts have long recognized that while trial judges have wide discretion to comment upon the evidence presented during trial and to bring facts deemed important to the jury’s attention, such activities must be performed with ‘strict neutrality and utmost impartiality.’ ” Rocha v. Great American Insurance Co., 850 F.2d 1095 (6th Cir. 1988) (citation omitted).

3.What are the arguments for and against allowance of a broad judicial power to comment on the evidence? See Lerner, The Transformation of the American Civil Trial: The Silent Judge, 42 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 195 (2000); Weinstein, The Power and Duty of Federal Judges to Marshall and Comment on the Evidence in Jury Trials and Some Suggestions on Charging Juries, 118 F.R.D. 161 (1988); Wright, Instructions to the Jury: Summary Without Comment, 1954 Wash.U.L.Q. 177. Professor Wigmore severely criticized the federal approach exemplified in Quercia. See 9 Wigmore on Evidence § 2551 (Chadbourn rev. 1981).

4. Jurisdiction in the Nunley case was based on diversity of citizenship. Suppose that the law of the state permits the trial judge to express an opinion as to whether the evidence is sufficient to establish the ultimate facts in the case. To what extent is the federal court allowed to follow the state practice?

2.PERMITTING INSTRUCTIONS TO BE TAKEN INTO THE JURY ROOM; NOTE-TAKING AND JUROR DISCUSSIONS DURING TRIAL

EASTERBROOK, CHIEF JUDGE.

Waste Management, Inc., grew at an average annual rate of 26% from 1979 through 1991. When growth fell off, James Koenig, its Chief Financial Officer, decided to improve appearances. He devised several accounting strategies that a jury found to be fraudulent. The district judge imposed a civil penalty of about $2.1 million and ordered Koenig to disgorge the bonuses he received in 1992, 1994, and 1995 ($831,500, plus more than $1.2 million in prejudgment interest). Bonuses depended on Waste Management’s profits. If its profits had been stated correctly, the judge concluded, Koenig would not have received these bonuses. The court also enjoined Koenig from again serving as a director or top manager of a public company.

* * *

After learning that Koenig planned to pitch his defense on the theory that Waste Management’s new management had taken an “earnings bath” to make its own performance look good by comparison, the SEC filed a motion in limine asking the district court to exclude all evidence related to this theme. The right question, the SEC insisted, was whether Koenig intentionally made (or caused Waste Management to make) materially misleading statements * * *. According to the SEC, the motive of anyone other than Koenig was irrelevant. Indeed, Koenig’s motive also was irrelevant * * *. The plaintiff in a securities-fraud suit must show intentional deceit * * *; the motive for that deceit is beside the point.

The district court should have granted the SEC’s motion. Instead the judge denied the motion, while warning Koenig that if motive became an issue he would allow the SEC to introduce its own evidence (much of which was sure to be hearsay) about why people acted as they did. Koenig then presented his defense, the SEC responded in kind, hearsay became rampant, and the trial dragged on and on, lasting a total of 12 weeks.

A good deal of research shows that 20 days is about the longest trial any jury can comprehend fully; the longer the trial goes, the more the jury forgets and the less accurate the decision becomes. * * * No wonder the ABA strongly recommends short trials. * * * Koenig does not complain about the trial’s length; perhaps he was hoping that jurors would lose focus. (A 12-week trial about accounting! Sounds like material for Jay Leno.) * * *

1134

* * *

* * * Principle 13(C) of the ABA’s American Jury Project recommends that judges permit jurors to ask questions of witnesses. The Final Report of the Seventh Circuit’s American Jury Project 15–24 (Sept.2008) concurs, with the proviso that jurors should submit their questions to the judge, who will edit them and pose appropriate, non-argumentative queries. District judges throughout the Seventh Circuit participated in that project. The judges, the lawyers for the winning side, and, tellingly, the lawyers for the losing side, all concluded (by substantial margins) that when jurors were allowed to ask questions, their attention improved, with benefits for the overall quality of adjudication. Keeping the jurors’ minds on their work is an especially vital objective during a long trial about a technical subject, such as accounting. The district judge in this case permitted jurors to submit questions to him. Some were asked; others were reformulated and asked; some were not asked, when the judge thought them inappropriate or repetitive.

Koenig contends that permitting the jurors to participate in this fashion is a reversible error. That can’t be because any statute or rule of procedure bans the process. There is no such statute or rule. Nor has any court of appeals forbidden the judge to ask questions submitted by the jurors. * * * The ABA and Seventh Circuit jury projects found benefits; so have scholars. * * *

In opposition to these studies, Koenig has only occasional judicial skepticism. For example, we said more than a decade ago that questions from jurors are “fraught with risks”. * * * Similar [appellate court] statements are easy to find * * *. These expressions reflect concern that allowing jurors to ask questions will lead them to take positions too early in the trial, emulating the advocates by choosing sides and becoming argumentative rather than reflective. The jury projects and other studies were designed to find out whether these risks are realized so frequently that they overcome the benefits, such as keeping jurors alert and focused. Now that several studies have concluded that the benefits exceed the costs, there is no reason to disfavor the practice. Like other issues of trial management—may jurors take notes? Should written jury instructions and copies of exhibits be sent to the jury room during deliberations?—whether to allow the jurors to pose questions is a topic committed to the sound discretion of the judge. That discretion was not abused in this case; to the contrary, the judge’s decision, like his supervision of the questioning process, was well considered and sensible.

Koenig contends that the judge should have limited the jurors to “clarifying” questions, but jurors’ perspectives are so different from those of lawyers that it is difficult to see how such a limit could be enforced (or why it would be appropriate). Testimony that seems clear to a specialist in accounting or securities law may be confusing to a juror encountering these subjects for the first time, so a juror may see as “clarifying” a question that the lawyer sees as unnecessary or obtuse. A judge should serve as a filter for questions and eliminate or rephrase those that are irrelevant or disguised argument (as the judge at this trial did); more than that a court of appeals cannot sensibly demand.

1135

That some glitches occurred in the process—the judge forgot to ask some of the jurors’ questions for some witnesses, and he failed to call back one witness when the jurors wanted to ask additional questions—is neither surprising nor a ground for concern. Trials are complex proceedings, and a judge must concentrate attention on what is most pressing. Jurors were told not to draw inferences from the judge’s decision not to ask particular questions; there is little reason to think that jurors would have held against Koenig the judge’s failure (even if inadvertent) to ask any particular question. Nor does it strike us as unusual or a source of concern that three jurors collectively asked about two-thirds of the 127 total questions submitted by the panel; some people are more voluble than others. That the panel had members of different interests and proclivities is a strength rather than a weakness of the system. (Note that 127 questions is roughly two per trial day; this litigation was not taken over by the jury.)

Koenig sees in some of the proposed questions (principally those filtered out by the judge) signs that a few jurors had made up their minds or taken an adversarial position in mid-trial. It is dangerous to draw such inferences from questions; judges often ask pointed questions of both sides, and it would be a mistake to infer from these questions that the judge was leaning against both litigants. No matter. Koenig’s position seems to be that ignorance is bliss: if some jurors have reached a tentative conclusion in mid-trial, it is best not to know it. Why? Jurors must be impartial, but like everyone else they respond to evidence and may think that they know enough even when lawyers want to feed them more. (We’ve already said that this trial lasted far too long; it is no surprise that some jurors thought they knew enough to decide even while the trial was ongoing.) Lawyers should want to know when some jurors are tending the other side’s way, so that they can make adjustments to their presentations in an effort to supply whatever proof the jurors think vital, but missing. Just as questions from the bench can supply insight that helps lawyers make a stronger case, so questions from jurors can help lawyers tailor their presentations. Keeping jurors silent won’t prevent them from reacting to the evidence; it will just make it harder for lawyers to know how things are going. It is a lot easier (and more reliable) to read jurors’ questions than to read the expressions on their faces.

* * *

1136

* * * The judgment is affirmed except with respect to the calculation of Koenig’s bonuses [relevant to the District Court’s disgorgement remedy] * * *, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

The Koenig decision reflects recent efforts to enhance juror performance through various procedural innovations. See p. 1065, Note 2, supra. In addition to permitting jurors to ask questions, reforms include providing jurors with a written copy of instructions, permitting jurors to take notes, and allowing interim discussion. See Hannaford-Agor, Judicial Nullification? Judicial Compliance and Non-Compliance with Jury Improvement Efforts, 28 N.Ill.U.L.Rev. 407 (2008). See also Susman & Jolly, An Empirical Study on Jury Trial Innovations (2016).

Written Instructions: Practices vary on whether the judge will give written instructions to the jury to be taken into the jury room, and in the federal system Rule 51 does not mandate such delivery. Some courts provide only a single copy which the jurors must share. See Mize, Hannaford-Agor & Waters, National Center for State Courts, The State-of-the-States Survey of Jury Improvement Efforts: A Compendium Report (2007). Other courts have provided an audiotape or videotape of the judge reading the instructions. See Marder, Bringing Jury Instructions into the Twenty-First Century, 81 Notre Dame L.Rev. 449, 500–01 (2006).

An early study of written instructions found it to be “hardly reasonable to suppose that the jury, composed as it is of persons unfamiliar with either law or legal language and having heard the instructions but once as given orally by the court, will be able to remember them in detail as it ponders the matters committed to it for decision.” California Law Revision Commission, Recommendation and Study Relating to Taking Instructions into the Jury Room, pp. C-15–C-17 (1956) (Tabular Summary of the Law of Other States). Later empirical studies associate written jury instructions with improved juror performance. See, e.g., Heuer & Penrod, Instructioning Jurors: A Field Experiment with Written and Preliminary Instructions, 13 Law & Hum. Behav. 409 (1989); see also Diamond & Ryken, The Modern American Jury: A One Hundred Year Journey, 96 Judicature 315 (May–June 2013). Are there any effective arguments against giving written instructions to the jury? Might the possession of written instructions unduly influence the jury’s discussion? Does possession of written instructions tend to affect the amount of influence some jurors have on the rest of the panel?

Juror Note-Taking: In many jurisdictions jurors are permitted and even encouraged to take notes throughout the trial for use during the deliberations, and empirical research supports the practice as a way to enhance juror performance. See Hans, Empowering the Active Jury: A Genuine Tort Reform, 13 Roger Williams U.L.Rev. 39, 50–52 (2008) (reporting survey data that jurors could take notes in more than 70 percent of state and federal civil trials). The ABA Principles, referred to in Koenig, recommend the practice in Principle 13. Is there a danger that note-taking will distract the juror from listening to the evidence? Will jurors tend to give excessive weight to their notes, even if taken in error? Does the ability to take notes quickly give untoward influence to some jurors? Should jurors be permitted to use laptops?

1137

Early Juror Discussion: Jurors almost always are warned that they are not to discuss the case with anyone, even the other jurors until the case is submitted to them at the close of the trial. What dangers do you see if jurors were to be permitted to discuss the case at an earlier stage? The Arizona judiciary, a leader among the states in studying jury practices and implementing reforms, has adopted a rule permitting jurors to discuss the case among themselves during the course of trial, but only if all jurors are present in the room. What are the potential advantages of the Arizona rule? Is it ever possible to reserve judgment on complicated issues while engaged in an active discussion? See Strier, Making Jury Trials More Truthful, 30 U.C.Davis

L.Rev. 95, 140–41 (1996). For a study of the participants’ views of the Arizona experiment, see Hans, Hannaford & Munsterman, The Arizona Jury Reform Permitting Civil Jury Trial Discussions: The Views of Trial Participants, Judges, and Jurors, 32 U.Mich.J.L.F. 349 (1999). See also Diamond, Vidmar, Rose, Ellis & Murphy, Juror Discussions During Civil Trials: Studying an Arizona Innovation, 45 Ariz.L.Rev. 1 (2003). Although these reforms have been shown to improve juror competence, one survey, based on a questionnaire for judges about trial practices, showed that only 14 percent of judges permit such discussion. See Civil Jury Project at NYU School of Law, Fact Sheet: Juror Discussion of Evidence Before Deliberation (data current as of April 2016).

Social Media: A majority of federal courts bar jurors from using social media to discuss trial. See St. Eve & Zuckerman, Ensuring an Impartial Jury in the Age of Social Media, 11 Duke L. & Tech Rev. 1 (2012); Simpler III, The Unjust “Web” We Weave: The Evolution of Social Media and Its Psychological Impact of Juror Impartiality and Fair Trials, 36 Law & Psychol. Rev. 275 (2012); Mastro, Preventing the “Google Mistrial”: The Challenge Posed by Jurors Who Use the Internet and Social Media, 37 No. 2 Litigation 23 (2011).

3.VERDICTS

a.Submission of the Case to the Jury

After final arguments are completed and the instructions given, the jurors are placed in the custody of a bailiff or similar court official who guards them during deliberations. It is the bailiff’s duty to make certain that the jurors remain together and have no contact with other persons except by court order.

In some cases the jurors will find it difficult to agree on a verdict. If this is due to uncertainty as to the content of the instructions, they may ask the court to reread the instructions, and, if necessary, to augment them. See, e.g., Diniero v. United States Lines Co., p. 53, supra. If there is disagreement as to what one or more of the witnesses said, the jurors may request that the testimony of those witnesses be read to them. Whenever the jury reenters the courtroom, whether for further instructions or for the reading of testimony, it is wise to notify both parties and their attorneys in advance. Otherwise the verdict may be subject to reversal on appeal. What is the purpose of a rule requiring notice? How rigidly should it be enforced?

1138

Suppose after lengthy deliberations the jurors still are unable to agree. How long may they be kept in session? When a court orders an end to a session, must it then dismiss the jury and order a new trial? If not, must the jurors be locked up, free from all contact with outsiders, or should they be allowed to go home until such time as they are ordered to reassemble?

At some point, of course, if the jurors cannot agree, they will have to be discharged and a mistrial declared. However, courts are reluctant to order a mistrial; a new trial generates cost and delay. Thus, in some situations, a court will urge a stalemated jury to make a further attempt to arrive at a verdict. Moreover, a substantial number of jurisdictions have tried to cut down the number of stalemates by permitting a non-unanimous verdict. See Diamond, Revisiting the Unanimity Requirement: The Behavior of the Non-Unanimous Civil Jury, 100 Nw.U.L.Rev. 201 (2006).

In some cases the jury is able to arrive at a verdict almost immediately. Indeed, it may be possible for the jurors to agree without even leaving the jury box. Should a verdict in a complex case ever be subject to attack because it was rendered quickly?

b.The Form of the Verdicts

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 48(b) and (c) and 49 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

The traditional form of the jury decision, the general verdict, is used almost exclusively in the great majority of courts. A general verdict simply announces which party wins, and, if it is plaintiff, the amount to be recovered. This type of verdict has two major deficiencies. First, there is no way to tell how the jurors decided specific issues, which, in turn, can result in the unnecessary retrial of the entire case. For example, suppose defendant raises a number of defenses, any one of which, if established, would require a verdict for defendant. Then the court, in an otherwise faultless charge, erroneously instructs the jury on one of these defenses in a manner detrimental to plaintiff, after which the jury finds for defendant. On appeal, the court will be required to reverse, since it has no way of telling whether the verdict was based solely on the tainted defense. If, however, the jury had been required to render a separate verdict on each one of the defenses, the court would know at once the bases of the jury decision and whether the error in the instruction was harmless. The second major drawback to the general verdict is the fact that there is no way of knowing whether the jury actually focused its attention on every major aspect of the case as required by the instructions, or whether it ignored the instructions altogether and rendered a decision based solely on sentiment, public opinion, bias, or similar emotion. Kotler, Reappraising the Jury’s Role as Finder of Fact, 20 Ga.L.Rev. 123 (1985).

1139

The special verdict requires the jury to answer a series of questions regarding each facet of the case, but not to enter a verdict stating who wins:

A special verdict would seem to do away with some of the most objectionable features of trial by jury. The division of functions between jury and judge is apparently assured, the one attending to the facts alone, the other to the legal rules alone. The jury seems, by this device, to be shorn of its power to ignore the rules or to make rules to suit itself. As one court said, special verdicts “dispel * * * the darkness visible of general verdicts.” The finding of facts, says Sunderland, “is much better done by means of the special verdict. Every advantage which the jury is popularly supposed to have over the [judge] as a trier of facts is retained, with the very great additional advantage that the analysis and separation of the facts in the case which the court and the attorney must necessarily effect in employing the special verdict, materially reduce the chance of error. It is easy to make mistakes in dealing at large with aggregates of facts. The special verdict compels detailed consideration. But above all it enables the public, the parties and the court to see what the jury has really done * * *.” [Sunderland, Verdicts General and Special, 29 Yale L.J. 253 (1920).]

Frank, Courts on Trial 141–42 (1950). Critics of the special verdict argue that its use subverts the fundamental nature of the jury decision.

Not all would agree that [making jury decisions more scientific and trustworthy] is desirable, even if it were assumed that it is possible. Little is gained by making the law more scientific if, in the process, it becomes harder to achieve substantial justice. Some of the most famous students of the judicial process have argued that one of the purposes of the jury system is to permit the jury to temper strict rules of law by the demands and necessities of substantial justice and changing social conditions, thereby adding a much needed element of flexibility. Those who share this conception of the role of the jury rightly fear that it will be limited or defeated by the restraints imposed by the special verdict practice, and thus oppose widespread use of it.

1140

9B Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2503 (3d ed.). Concerns of this nature induced Justices Black and Douglas to issue the following statement in connection with the Court’s 1963 amendment of Rule 49, see 374 U.S. 865, 867–68, 83 S.Ct. 43, 44–45 (1963):

* * * Rule 49 should be repealed. * * * Such devices are used to impair or wholly take away the power of a jury to render a general verdict. One of the ancient, fundamental reasons for having general jury verdicts was to preserve the right of trial by jury as an indispensable part of a free government. Many of the most famous constitutional controversies in England revolved around litigants’ insistence, particularly in seditious libel cases, that a jury had the right to render a general verdict without being compelled to return a number of subsidiary findings to support its general verdict. Some English jurors had to go to jail because they insisted upon their right to render general verdicts over the repeated commands of tyrannical judges not to do so. Rule 49 is but another means utilized by courts to weaken the constitutional power of juries and to vest judges with more power to decide cases according to their own judgments.

Judges may be reluctant to utilize the special verdict procedure because it can be difficult to form appropriate questions that cover the elements of the case yet avoid ambiguities that can lead to a reversal on appeal. See Ginsburg, Special Findings and Jury Unanimity in the Federal Courts, 65 Colum.L.Rev. 256 (1965) (setting out the history of the forms of jury verdict and raising questions about the unanimity requirement in cases in which an ultimate issue is supported by separate fact theories).

Rule 49(b) sets out an intermediate approach, namely the general verdict with answers to interrogatories, which requires the jury to give a general verdict but also requires it to provide answers to a series of questions that usually are less extensive than those used with the special verdict. Although this form alleviates some of the concerns about the general verdict, problems arise when the answers to the interrogatories are inconsistent with the general verdict or with each other. See Larsen, Specificity and Juror Agreement in Civil Cases, 69 U.Chi.L.Rev. 379 (2002).

NOLLENBERGER V. UNITED AIR LINES, INC.

United States District Court, Southern District of California, 1963.

216 F.Supp. 734, vacated 335 F.2d 379 (9th Cir.), cert. dismissed, 379 U.S. 951, 85 S.Ct. 452, 13 L.Ed.2d 549 (1964).

HALL, CHIEF JUDGE.

[This is a wrongful-death action in which the jury, pursuant to Rule 49(b), rendered a general verdict accompanied by interrogatories. Plaintiffs allege that the answers to the interrogatories are inconsistent with the general verdict. They request that the court either submit additional interrogatories to the jury, or calculate the verdict on the basis of the answers to the questions given, or grant a new trial.]

1141

* * *

The first task of the Court is to determine whether or not the Findings of Fact in the answers, given by the jury to the special interrogatories, are consistent with each other and whether one or more, if consistent with each other, are inconsistent with the general verdict fixing the total sum of damages to the plaintiffs resulting from the death of the decedent. And in doing so, Gallick v. Baltimore & Ohio R.R. Co. , 372 U.S. 108, 83 S.Ct. 659, 9 L.Ed.2d 618 (1963), “it is the duty of the courts to attempt to harmonize the answers, if it is possible under a fair reading of them * * *.”

The text of the special verdict on damages in the Nollenberger case is as follows:
We, the Jury in the above entitled case, unanimously find as follows:
QUESTIONS	ANSWERS
1. Which one of the following named persons, viz.: William Edward Nollenberger, 45 years of age on April 21, 1958; Catherine B. Nollenberger, his widow, age 47 on April 21, 1958; William Edward Nollenberger, Jr., son, age 20 on April 21, 1958; Lawrence P. Nollenberger, son, age 11 on April 21, 1958; had the shortest life expectancy?	Wm. E. Nollenberger
1. How many years was that life expectancy on April 21, 1958?	25 (Total number of years)
1. How many years was decedent’s work and earning expectancy from and after April 21, 1958?	15 yrs (Total number of years)
1. From and after April 21, 1958, what total sum of money do you find the decedent would have earned during the period of his work and earning expectancy stated in your answer to No. 3 above?	$235,210 (Total)
1. From and after the end of his work and earning expectancy, and during the remainder of his life, if any such remained, what total sum of money do you find decedent would have received as a result of his government employment?	$100,200 (Total sum)
1. What is the total reasonable value of services susceptible of being furnished by others which you find it was reasonably probable that decedent would have provided under my instructions to you to the plaintiffs during his lifetime?	$25,000 (Total value)
1. What percentage of his annual earnings, had he lived, from and after April 21, 1958, would have been used by decedent for his own personal expenses which were eliminated by his death?	25% (Percentage of annual earnings)
1. What percentage of his income would be paid as annual income tax had he lived after April 21, 1958?	15%
1. What percentage of the income from the award will be paid by plaintiffs as income tax?	11%
1. In determining the present reasonable value of services as defined in No. 6 above, what annual rate of inflation, if any, do you find should be allowed?	1%
1. What discount rate should be applied in arriving at the total sum of general damages?	4% (Discount rate)
1. What sum of money do you find plaintiffs’ general damages to be which you assess against Defendant United Air Lines?	$114,655.00

DATED: At Los Angeles, California, January 16, 1963.

S/Burford A. Reynold
Foreman

The answers to the Special Interrogatories No. 1 to No. 11 are plainly consistent with each other and are amply supported by the evidence.

But, in repeated efforts to “harmonize” and “reconcile” the answers to the 11 special interrogatories with the general verdict of $114,655.00, I have been unable to do so. And hence I must and do conclude that they are not harmonious or reconcilable.

While Rule 49(b) * * * under such circumstances permits, as one of three alternatives, the Court to re-submit the matter to the jury for further consideration, the plaintiffs desire the Court to go further and to submit additional interrogatories * * *. [H]ad it been the intention to permit additional interrogatories to be submitted after the general verdict and answers to the special interrogatories submitted with the verdict, the rule would have so provided, and the rule would not have contained the restrictive language of the second sentence of Rule 49(b)^c that the Court “ * * * shall direct the jury both to make written answers and to render a general verdict,” or the language * * * of Rule 49(b)^d (applicable here) that the Court, as one alternative, “ * * * may return the jury for further consideration of its answers and verdict.”

It could be argued from the portion of the rule last quoted that if that procedure were followed the jury could change both its answers and general verdict, or only the answers and not the general verdict. * * * That such action by the jury was not intended by the Rule is evidenced from the citation in the note to Rule 49 by the Advisory Committee of the case of Victor-American Fuel Co. v. Peccarich, (C.C.A.1913) 209 F. 568, cert. den. 232 U.S. 727, 34 S.Ct. 603, 58 L.Ed. 817. In that case the Court stated, at page 571: “ * * * these special findings must control when they clearly compel a different judgment from that which would follow the general verdict” * * *.

I conclude (1) that the findings of fact of the jury in answer to special interrogatories control over the general verdict; (2) that it is not within the power of the court under F.R.Civ.P. 49(b) to submit additional interrogatories after the jury has returned its verdict answering special interrogatories and at the same time returned a general verdict; (3) that in * * * Nollenberger * * * the answers to the special interrogatories are consistent with each other and inconsistent with and cannot be reconciled or harmonized with the general verdict; (4) that before granting a new trial, it is the duty of the Court to make calculations from the special interrogatories, and enter a judgment thereon. Which latter, I shall now do.

[The court then calculated the damages at $171,702.00 and entered judgment for that amount.]

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In overturning the Nollenberger decision, the court of appeals held as follows (335 F.2d at 407–09):

The district court stated that after repeated efforts, by mathematical calculation, to harmonize and reconcile the answers to the eleven special interrogatories with the general verdict, no harmony resulted. This may be so. But nothing in the law compelled the jury to calculate its damage awards according to a fixed mathematical formula using only the factors contained in the eleven special findings. * * *

The jury was admonished to award damages in accordance with all the instructions of the court. No party specifies as error the giving of any of the instructions set forth in the margin.⁴³

* * * Suffice it to say that the answers to the eleven special interrogatories do not exhaust all of the factors of damage included within the instructions, and therefore no square conflict exists between the answers and the general verdict. We are not called upon to consider either whether the jury should not have been permitted to consider one or more of the italicized factors or whether the damage awards manifest such passion or prejudice as would render them inadequate. We hold that the court’s utilization of the provisions of Rule 49(b) did not render proper its increase of damages in accordance with mathematical computations based upon the special findings.

2. Is the appellate decision in Nollenberger realistic? If so, what possible justification was there for the trial court’s decision to present the jury with special interrogatories? The appellate court gave plaintiff the option of accepting the jury’s general verdict or of having the case returned to the trial court for a ruling on plaintiff’s motion for a new trial. Should the court of appeals itself have decided whether there should be a new trial in the event that plaintiff decided not to accept the jury award?

3. How far should a court go in reconciling a general verdict that appears to be in legal error on the basis of the jury’s answers to an interrogatory? In Popham v. City of Kennesaw, 820 F.2d 1570, rehearing denied, 828 F.2d 775 (11th Cir. 1987), plaintiff sued to recover for violations of his civil rights alleging that the police used excessive force to arrest him, falsely arrested him, and arrested him in order to deprive him of his First Amendment rights. The trial court submitted special interrogatories, including one asking whether the police used excessive force and another asking whether the officers held qualified immunity. The jury answered both in the affirmative, yet awarded damages to plaintiff. The court of appeals, in upholding the jury verdict, held that the trial judge had an obligation to interpret apparently conflicting interrogatories so as to sustain the jury’s general verdict. Applying the principle to the facts of the case, the court found that the jury’s answer about immunity was made only with respect to the false arrest and First Amendment claims, citing the trial judge’s instructions as support for its holding.

4.FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS IN NON-JURY CASES

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 52 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

LANSFORD-COALDALE JOINT WATER AUTHORITY v. TONOLLI CORP.

United States Court of Appeals, Third Circuit, 1993.

4 F.3d 1209.

BECKER, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

The plaintiff, the Lansford-Coaldale Joint Water Authority (“Authority”), provides public water in Carbon County, Pennsylvania. The Authority’s groundwater production and supply wells are adjacent to a site formerly used for lead smelting that is owned by Tonolli Pennsylvania (“Tonolli PA”). After learning that there had been releases of hazardous substances on the Tonolli site and that Tonolli PA had applied for a hazardous waste disposal permit, the Authority commissioned a study to determine whether there was or would be any contamination of its wells. Based on this study, the Authority brought suit against Tonolli PA, its sister corporation, Tonolli Canada, and its parent corporation, IFIM, alleging that they were owners or operators of the Tonolli PA facility and that hazardous discharges from their property posed a threat of future contamination to the Authority’s water supply. Because Tonolli PA had become bankrupt, the Authority subsequently dropped its claims against it, and the trial proceeded against only Tonolli Canada and IFIM. The Authority’s suit sought to recover response costs under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (CERCLA), 42 U.S.C. § 9607(a). More specifically, the Authority sought to obtain both the costs it would incur due to the threat of future contamination, e.g., the costs of obtaining an alternative water supply, and the costs it would incur in monitoring and evaluation. At the conclusion of the trial, the district court made oral findings of fact and conclusions of law denying the Authority recovery on all claims. This appeal followed.

1146

* * *

Both the Authority and Tonolli Canada agree that the issues that surround the district court’s grant of judgment in favor of Tonolli Canada on both claims present mixed questions of law and fact. The general rule is that we break down the issues into their legal and factual components and engage in plenary review of the legal and factual components and engage in plenary review of the legal components and deferential review of the factual components. See Ram Constr. Co. v. American States Ins. Co., 749 F.2d 1049, 1053 (3d Cir. 1984). There is disagreement, however, over the appropriate scope of review of the district court’s factual findings in this case. While ordinarily the factual components are reviewed only for clear error, the Authority contends that the district court’s factual findings here do not satisfy the purposes of Fed.R.Civ.P. 52(a) and hence should not be reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard.

The Authority complains that, despite the complexity of the case, the district court made its findings within a few hours after the trial ended instead of waiting for a transcript and taking the time to reflect and craft a written opinion. It also objects to the court’s having requested proposed findings from the parties only before and not after the trial. These objections seem to us designed more to undermine the substance of the findings themselves than to advance a claim of flawed methodology in their creation. However, the Authority also argues that the district court’s findings are not entitled to deference on appeal because most of them were adopted verbatim from the defendant’s proposed findings of fact.

We reject the Authority’s contention that, because the district court issued its findings orally a few hours after the trial without the benefit of proposed findings submitted by the parties post-trial, the findings do not satisfy the purposes of Fed.R.Civ.P. 52(a). Rule 52(a) expressly authorizes oral findings. * * * In fact, in 1983 Rule 52(a) was amended explicitly to sanction the use of oral findings in bench trials. See generally 9 Charles A. Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Frank W. Elliot, Federal Practice & Procedure § 2571, at 225 (Supp.1993). Not only did the district court’s approach not violate the literal language of Rule 52(a), but contrary to the Authority’s argument, it did not violate the spirit of the rule.

1147

We do not deny the force of the Authority’s contention that the district court would have been well-served by requesting the parties to submit proposed factual findings after the close of trial and then articulating its own findings and legal reasoning in a carefully crafted opinion. In many cases this is the more desirable course of action. However, the Authority ignores the benefits of the district court’s approach: by issuing oral findings on the day the trial ended, the district court served the interests of the parties and the legal system in speedy adjudication. * * * In addition, by announcing its findings soon after the conclusion of the trial, the district court ensured that the record was fresh on its mind, an advantage a court lacks when making findings months later. Furthermore, the overwhelming demands on a district court’s time and resources also affects its ability to prepare extensive findings. For these reasons we reject the Authority’s suggestion that the district court’s oral findings are somehow suspect or tainted.⁴

We similarly reject the Authority’s argument that the district court’s verbatim adoption of many of Tonolli Canada’s proposed factual findings contravened the purposes of Fed.R.Civ.P. 52(a) such that they do not warrant review under the clearly erroneous standard. This argument has been rejected by the Supreme Court in Anderson v. Bessemer City, N.C., 470 U.S. 564, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985), in which the Court held that a district court’s findings should receive no less deferential review when the district court announced its decision to the parties first and then asked the prevailing party to prepare findings of fact, many of which it ultimately adopted verbatim. The Court explained that “even when the trial judge adopts proposed findings verbatim, the findings are those of the court and may be reversed only if clearly erroneous.” Id. at 572, 105 S.Ct. at 1510–11.

In addition, we have squarely held that a district court’s findings, when adopted verbatim from a party’s proposed findings, do not demand more stringent scrutiny on appeal. * * *⁵ While we cannot dispute that a district court’s verbatim adoption of many of a party’s proposed findings does not always represent a desirable practice, we are satisfied that the district court’s findings here satisfy Rule 52(a) and should be upheld unless they are not supported by the evidence in the record. We note that we found no indication in the record that the district court was unfamiliar with the testimony and exhibits or that it was using the proposed findings as a crutch; if we had, we might view the matter differently. Rather, the record suggests to us that the district court’s findings reflected its informed and considered views.

1148

* * *

We hold that the district court’s factual finding that the Tonolli site and the Authority’s wells are hydrogeologically isolated is not clearly erroneous. * * * We thus uphold the district court’s conclusion that the Authority did not sufficiently demonstrate * * * that the Tonolli site poses any threat of contamination to the Authority’s water supply. Moreover we have observed in this case and in a number of others * * * that the judge of the court has followed the practice of announcing his decision for the plaintiff or the defendant substantially in the form of a general verdict, either in a written order or by communication to counsel, and of thereupon directing counsel for the prevailing party to prepare and submit findings of fact, conclusions of law and a form of judgment. The trial judge’s order has not been accompanied by an opinion setting out, even summarily, the facts and legal conclusions which have brought him to his decision. Obviously the judge must have dealt with the questions of fact and law involved in the case in the course of the reasoning by which he has reached his ultimate conclusion, even though his reasoning has not been articulated and put on paper. But counsel who is called upon to articulate and write out the findings and conclusions must do so without any knowledge of the fact findings and reasoning processes through which the judge has actually gone in reaching his decision.

We strongly disapprove this practice. * * * Findings and conclusions prepared ex post facto by counsel, even though signed by the judge, do not serve adequately the function contemplated by the rule. At most they provide the judge with an opportunity to reconsider the bases of his original decision but without affording the parties any information as to what those bases were or which of them are being reconsidered. * * *

* * * We * * * do not * * * mean to suggest that a trial judge should not have the right to invite counsel for both parties to submit to him proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, accompanied by briefs if he desires them, to assist him in formulating his own findings and conclusions and reaching his decision. In the process of studying the facts and the law, findings and conclusions formulated and proposed by the parties may be most helpful to the judge in sharpening the issues and may serve a very useful purpose in aiding him in drafting his own findings and conclusions. * * * But it should be remembered that findings and conclusions prepared by a party and adopted by the trial judge without change are likely to be looked at by the appellate court more narrowly and given less weight on review than if they are the work product of the judge himself or at least bear evidence that he has given them careful study and revision. * * * It has been the general practice of the district judges of the Third Circuit in the past under Rule 52(a) to formulate their findings of fact and conclusions of law in the course of and as a part of their decision-making process and to articulate and file them at the time of announcing the decision, either in an opinion if filed at that time or in a separate document. * * * [W]e strongly approve this practice and direct it to be followed * * * by the court below.

1149

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Roberts v. Ross, which the Third Circuit rejected in footnote 5, strongly criticized the practice of a judge announcing a decision “substantially in the form of a general verdict, either in a written order or by communication to counsel, and of thereupon directing counsel for the prevailing party to prepare and submit findings of fact, conclusions of law and a form of judgment”:

* * * Findings and conclusions prepared ex post facto by counsel, even though signed by the judge, do not serve adequately the function contemplated by the rule. At most they provide the judge with an opportunity to reconsider the bases of his original decision but without affording the parties any information as to what those bases were or which of them are being reconsidered. * * *

* * * We * * * do not * * * mean to suggest that a trial judge should not have the right to invite counsel for both parties to submit to him proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, accompanied by briefs if he desires them, to assist him in formulating his own findings and conclusions and reaching his decision. * * * But it should be remembered that findings and conclusions prepared by a party and adopted by the trial judge without change are likely to be looked at by the appellate court more narrowly and given less weight on review than if they are the work product of the judge himself or at least bear evidence that he has given them careful study and revision. * * *

Roberts v. Ross, 344 F.2d 747, 752 (3d Cir. 1965). The decision is discussed in 51 Cornell L.Q. 567 (1966), in which it is noted that on remand, the trial court, without a new hearing, reversed its earlier decision, and entered judgment for the party against whom it ruled initially.

1150

2. In LEIGHTON v. ONE WILLIAM STREET FUND, INC., 343 F.2d 565, 567 (2d Cir. 1965), the court discussed Rule 52(a) as follows:

The purpose of Rule 52(a), as it is applied to a non-jury case, is usually stated to be three-fold: (1) to aid the appellate court by affording it a clear understanding of the ground or the basis of the decision of the trial court; (2) to make definite just what is decided by the case to enable the application of res judicata and estoppel principles to subsequent decisions; and (3) to evoke care on the part of the trial judge in ascertaining the facts.

Which of the listed purposes of Rule 52(a) do you find most important? How detailed must the findings and conclusions be to satisfy these purposes?

3. Rule 52(a)(6) was amended in 1985 and currently provides that findings of fact, “whether based on oral or other evidence,” are not to be set aside “unless clearly erroneous.” In ANDERSON v. CITY OF BESSEMER, p. 72, Note 3, supra, the Court emphasized that the clearly erroneous standard applies even to credibility determinations based upon documentary evidence, and the rule now so provides.

4. A motion to amend the court’s findings and conclusions of law may be made, but not later than 28 days after entry of judgment. See Rule 52(b). The procedure allows a court to correct plain errors of law or to take account of newly discovered evidence, and amendment may be requested “even if the modified or additional findings in effect reverse the judgment.” Fontenot v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 791 F.2d 1207, 1219 (5th Cir. 1986). The motion may be made together with a Rule 59 motion for a new trial.

E. CHALLENGING ERRORS: NEW TRIAL

1. THE NATURE AND THE SCOPE OF THE POWER TO GRANT A NEW TRIAL

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 59 and 61 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

NOTE ON THE RANGE OF THE TRIAL COURT’S DISCRETION

Errors committed during the course of a trial may be categorized as follows: (i) those that would result in reversal if the case were to be appealed; (ii) those that may have had an impact on the verdict, but do not justify reversal of the case on appeal, and (iii) those that did not significantly affect the outcome. Obviously errors that do not have any impact on the decision are harmless and it would be an abuse of discretion for the trial court to predicate a new trial on them. On the other hand, errors that would justify a reversal by an appellate court demand remedial measures at the trial level. A judge should not force a litigant to pay the costs of prosecuting an appeal as well as the costs of the new trial to which he is entitled.

1151

The district court has discretion to decide whether a new trial is appropriate only with regard to errors that affect the result in the case but would not lead to reversal on appeal. However, the court’s power to grant a new trial is greater than it might otherwise seem to be. First, an aggrieved litigant may decide to stand or fall on the motion for new trial since the case simply may not be worth the added cost of an appeal or the litigant may not have sufficient funds to continue fighting. Second, in many jurisdictions, the grant of a new trial, not being a final judgment, cannot be appealed. Thus the cost of a new trial will have to be absorbed before an appeal is even possible. Third, the very question of what constitutes reversible error on appeal often is affected by the ruling of the trial judge on the motion for new trial. In those jurisdictions in which a motion for a new trial is a prerequisite for appeal, the denial of a new trial certainly will influence the appellate court in deciding whether the error is harmless for purposes of appeal if the effect of the error in question can better be determined by the trial judge. Even when a motion for a new trial is not required, and when, theoretically, the appellate court should not penalize a litigant for having so moved, knowledge that the trial judge has rejected the alleged error as harmless may have an impact on the decision of the appellate court. Finally, in some jurisdictions the trial judge may grant a new trial without specifying or without actually relying on any precise grounds. Obviously this narrows the scope of review of such decisions.

GINSBERG v. WILLIAMS, 270 Minn. 474, 135 N.W.2d 213 (1965). Plaintiff brought suit for damages received in an automobile accident. The jury rendered a verdict for defendant and plaintiff moved for a new trial. The court granted the motion “in the interests of justice,” giving no other basis for its ruling. Defendant sought a writ of prohibition to restrain enforcement of the ruling, claiming that the trial court is empowered to grant a new trial only for one of the grounds specifically set forth in Rule 59.01 of the Minnesota Rules of Civil Procedure. The Minnesota Supreme Court granted the writ, holding as follows:

* * * The causes enumerated in Rule 59.01 are so comprehensive that they include every conceivable reason for which a new trial ought to be ordered. Those causes requiring the exercise of discretion, such as 59.01(1) (irregularities depriving the moving party of a fair trial) and 59.01(8) (insufficiency of the evidence), vest the broadest possible discretionary power in the trial court. To permit granting a new trial “in the interests of justice” would invite an arbitrary exercise of power over which appellate review is not now available. Even if it were, it would be difficult to fashion any effective rules to control arbitrary action since the basis for such an order would necessarily be subjective, varying from judge to judge. Further, each of the causes enumerated is designed to promote justice and prevent injustice. It is one thing to order a new trial “on the ground that on the evidence substantial justice has not been done” or in the interest of justice on the ground that the evidence does not justify the verdict, and quite another thing to order a new trial simply “in the interests of justice.” It is difficult to conceive how such a general ground would add anything to the grounds enumerated in our rules unless it is desirable to restore the common-law power of granting a new trial when the judge is personally dissatisfied with the verdict.

1152

Id. at 483–84, 135 N.W.2d at 220.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In COPPO v. VAN WIERINGEN, 36 Wash.2d 120, 123–24, 217 P.2d 294, 297 (1950), the court stated:

One of the reasons assigned by the trial judge in the instant cases for granting new trials is that “substantial justice has not been done.” The statutes which enumerate the grounds on which new trials may be granted * * * make no mention of such a ground for a new trial; but we have always upheld the right of the trial judge to grant a new trial when he is convinced that substantial justice has not been done, on the theory that it is an exercise of the trial court’s inherent power. * * *

Actually, of course, when a trial judge says that “substantial justice has not been done,” he is stating a conclusion for which there must be a reason or reasons. * * * The reason we have barred any review of an order granting a new trial based on this conclusion * * * was expressed by the supreme court of Wisconsin in the case of McLimans v. City of Lancaster, 57 Wis. 297, 15 N.W. 194, 195: “The judge before whom the cause was tried heard the testimony, observed the appearance and bearing of the witnesses and their manner of testifying, and was much better qualified to pass upon the credibility and weight of their testimony than this court can be. There are many comparatively trifling appearances and incidents, lights and shadows, which are not preserved in the record, which may well have affected the mind of the judge as well as the jury in forming opinions of the weight of the evidence, the character and credibility of the witnesses, and of the very right and justice of the case. These considerations cannot be ignored in determining whether the judge exercised a reasonable discretion or abused his discretion in granting or refusing a motion for a new trial.” (Italics ours.)

2. Suppose a party moves for a new trial based on a number of specific errors, no one of which alone would be sufficiently prejudicial to justify a new trial. May the court under Ginsberg v. Williams grant the motion on the ground that all of the errors, taken together, deprived the losing party of a fair trial?

1153

2.INCOHERENT JURY VERDICTS

MAGNANI V. TROGI

Appellate Court of Illinois, Second District, 1966.
70 Ill.App.2d 216, 218 N.E.2d 21.

CORYN, PRESIDING JUSTICE. * * *

Plaintiff’s complaint states two separate causes of action. In Count I she seeks recovery of $30,000.00, as Administratrix, for the wrongful death of her decedent, pursuant to the Wrongful Death Act (Ill.Rev.Stats., ch. 70, §§ 1 & 2). By the second count of the complaint she seeks reimbursement, in her individual capacity, for medical and funeral expenses necessarily incurred by her as the result of the injury and death to her husband, pursuant to the Family Expense Statute (Ill.Rev.Stats., ch. 68, § 15).

The Wrongful Death Act provides that any recovery thereunder shall be distributed by the court in which the cause was heard to the widow and next of kin of the decedent, in proportion, as determined by the trial court, “that the percentage of dependency of each such person upon the deceased person bears to the sum of the percentages of dependency of all such persons upon the deceased person.” Here, any award of the jury, for a wrongful death, would be apportioned by the trial court to the widow and minor son of decedent. There would be no apportionment of any award made under the provisions of the Family Expense Statute.

* * *

In the instant case, there can be no doubt that the recovery sought under each count of plaintiff’s complaint was based on separate causes of action, that is, one action for wrongful death, and the other under the Family Expense Statute. Unfortunately, neither party to this suit tendered separate forms of verdict for each of these counts. Rather, a single form of verdict was submitted by the court to the jury without objection from plaintiff or defendant. Using this form the jury returned the following verdict: “We, the jury, find in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. We assess the damages in the sum of $19,000.00.” The trial judge, in his memorandum of opinion allowing a new trial, properly expressed the dilemma this verdict created for him by stating: “In the case at bar, there were two counts. Does the single verdict all apply to just one count, or to both counts? It might be that the verdict was all for the wrongful death action, and non-liability as to the medical expense cause of action.” After making this observation, the trial judge then concluded that the verdict must be set aside and a new trial ordered as to both the liability and damage aspects of the case. Although other points have been raised in this appeal, we believe the determinative issue to be whether the trial judge, when faced with this situation, abused his discretion by granting a new trial.

1154

The purpose of vesting the trial judge with power to grant a new trial is to permit him, before losing jurisdiction of the case, to correct errors that he or the jury might have made during the course of the trial. Courts of review have repeatedly stated that they will not disturb the decision of a trial court on a motion for new trial unless a clear abuse of discretion is affirmatively shown. The reason for this rule is that the trial court has had the opportunity to consider the conduct of the trial as a whole, and therefore is in a superior position to consider the effects of errors which occurred, the fairness of the trial to all parties, and whether substantial justice was accomplished. * * * Greater latitude is allowed a trial court in granting a new trial than in denying a new trial. * * *

Plaintiff argues that defendant has waived his right to complain of the form of verdict because he did not object to the giving of this form to the jury, but raised the issue for the first time in his post-trial motion. In most instances this would be a valid argument. Here, however, because of the single form of verdict, the jury’s determination of liability and damages on each of the two causes of action was not made known. * * *

The jury returned its verdict on December 21, 1962, and the defendant filed his post-trial motion on January 15, 1963, thereby raising this issue for the first time. It was impossible, then, for the court to re-assemble the jury and instruct them to correct the error in the form of verdict. * * * We are not holding, by this opinion, that the failure to submit to the jury separate forms of verdict in cases involving multiple causes of action should, in every instance, result in the granting of a new trial, but rather, that in the situation presented here it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial judge to grant a new trial.

The order of the Circuit Court of Lake County, granting defendant’s motion for new trial, vacating and setting aside the verdict and judgment, and denying defendant’s motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

STOUDER, JUSTICE (dissenting).

* * *

As was succinctly stated in Hall v. Chicago and Northwestern Ry. Company, 349 Ill.App. 175, 110 N.E.2d 654 “We are not unmindful of the rule and cases which hold that the trial judge is allowed broad discretion in granting motions for a new trial, and that his actions will not be reversed on appeal except in cases of clear abuse of such discretion; but this rule, like all others, has its limitations. A judge is not empowered to set aside a verdict in any case simply because he does not agree with it. * * * ” In the instant case the trial court’s granting of a new trial was based upon a finding that the forms of verdict submitted to the jury were improper. It therefore should be our duty to examine the propriety of this finding in order to determine the limits which were self-imposed upon the discretion of the trial court.

1155

Upon thorough examination of the record before us I am unable to find that Defendant made any objection to the forms of verdict at the conference on instructions or at any time prior to his post-trial motion. * * * Defendant’s failure to object to the forms at the proper time as well as his later failure to show that he was in fact prejudiced compels me in the instant case to find that the trial court’s finding was erroneous and Defendant’s motion for a new trial should have been denied.

* * *

ROBB v. JOHN C. HICKEY, INC.
Circuit Court of New Jersey, Morris County, 1941.
19 N.J.Misc. 455, 20 A.2d 707.

LEYDEN, JUDGE.

The issues presented by the pleadings were the negligence of the defendants and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff’s decedent. The jury was instructed concerning the applicable principles of law, in the course of which it was pointed out that if contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff’s decedent had been established, the comparative degrees of the negligence of the parties was immaterial.

The jury returned a verdict in the absence of the judge and it was recorded at the clerk’s desk as follows: “The jury finds that there was negligence on the part of both parties involved—The evidence shown is that the defendant was more negligent than the plaintiff—We therefore recommend an award of $2,000.00 to the plaintiff Clyde J. Robb and against the defendants John C. Hickey, Inc., a New Jersey Corporation and Roger W. King.”

Both parties are dissatisfied with the verdict; the plaintiff with its substance and the defendants with its form. Plaintiff has a rule to set aside the verdict upon the ground that it is ambiguous, inconsistent, inadequate and contrary to the charge of the court. Defendants, upon notice, move to mould the verdict into one in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiff, urging that it is merely informal and the intent of the jury to find for the defendants is clearly indicated * * *.

* * *

1156

* * * Here the verdict finds both parties guilty of negligence, erroneously compares the degrees of their negligence and recommends an award of $2,000 in favor of the plaintiff and against both defendants. What then did the jury agree upon and intend? Did it find in favor of the defendants as is legally indicated by the first sentence, or in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $2,000 as is clearly indicated by the last sentence? The recommendation of an award to the plaintiff is pertinent to the issues, for basically the liability of defendants to plaintiff in damages was in question. It cannot be treated as surplusage and disregarded. Reading the verdict as a whole, it is self-contradictory, inconsistent and ambiguous. One is left to conjecture and surmise as to the real purpose of the jury. It is defective in substance, not merely in form.

The court may, in fact should, mould an informal verdict to render it formal, effective and to coincide with the substance of the verdict as agreed upon and intended by the jury, but this power is only exercised where the real purpose and intent of the jury clearly, sufficiently and convincingly appears. * * * Where, as here, the verdict is uncertain or ambiguous, it cannot be moulded. The court will not substitute its verdict in place thereof. * * *

This leads to the denial of defendants’ motion to mould and is also dispositive of the plaintiff’s rule. The latter will be made absolute and a new trial granted.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why is the verdict in Robb different from a verdict that recommends that the amount claimed be donated to the American Red Cross or some other charity? Can an argument be made in favor of a new trial in the latter situation? See Rusidoff v. DeBolt Transfer, Inc., 251 Pa.Super. 208, 380 A.2d 451 (1977), in which the trial judge’s denial of a new trial was reversed when the jury verdict for defendant was rendered “with reservations due to the evidence provided.”

2. Suppose plaintiff brings suit for injuries suffered in an accident allegedly due to defendant’s negligence. The jury renders a verdict in favor of plaintiff but assesses damages at zero, although it is clear from the evidence that plaintiff has been badly hurt. May the judge enter judgment on the verdict? See Wingerter v. Maryland Cas. Co., 313 F.2d 754 (5th Cir. 1963), and Pitcher v. Rogers, 259 F.Supp. 412 (N.D.Miss.1966), in which the courts answered “yes.” Can these decisions be reconciled with Robb? Would you agree that a motion for a new trial challenging a zero damages award as inconsistent with liability is waived when the moving party argues that the jury has rendered a verdict that contains two legal conclusions that are inconsistent with one another, but failed to object before the jury was discharged? In this situation, the Ninth Circuit has explained,

1157

[D]istrict court judges are in a unique position to instruct the jury regarding the meaning of the law, including whether two legal conclusions by the jury are inconsistent. * * * Where the jury’s verdict is in no way internally inconsistent, there is no more basis for resubmission to the jury than in any other case in which a party believes the verdict to be inconsistent with the record. The usual procedures for overturning jury verdicts as inconsistent with the facts therefore suffice and may be used without objecting to the verdict before the jury is dismissed.

Kode v. Carlson, 596 F.3d 608, 611 (9th Cir. 2010).

DUK V. MGM GRAND HOTEL, INC.

United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, 2003.

320 F.3d 1052.

HAWKINS, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

Fernando Duk (“Duk”) appeals the judgment arising from a defense verdict in favor of MGM Grand Hotel, Inc. (“MGM”) in Duk’s personal injury action in which there were two trials and three verdicts. MGM cross-appeals the district court’s decision to resubmit the first verdict to the jury for clarification. Because we find that the court was within its discretion in resubmitting the first verdict, but erred in ordering a new trial upon receipt of the second verdict, we reverse and remand with instructions to enter judgment in Duk’s favor consistent with the first jury’s second verdict.

* * *

* * * The first jury trial was held in 1998. Because Nevada’s comparative negligence scheme awards damages only to those plaintiffs who are found to be 50% negligent or less, the jury was presented with a special verdict form in which it was asked to determine the relative negligence of each party. Nev.Rev.Stat. § 41.141. Question 5 of the verdict form asked the jury to allot a percentage of the total negligence to the plaintiff and to the defendant. Following question 5, the jury was instructed that if it found the plaintiff to be more than 50% negligent, it should “sign and return [the] [in original] verdict” and judgment would be entered for the defendant. However, if in question 5 the jury found the plaintiff’s negligence to be 50% or less, it was instructed to answer question 6, which asked for a determination of damages. Despite these instructions, the verdict form returned by the jury (“the first verdict”) attributed 65% of the negligence to Duk and 35% to MGM, but still went on to award Duk $3.3 million in damages.

The district court reviewed the first verdict and, before announcing it, resubmitted the verdict form to the jury, informing the jury that the verdict contained an inconsistency and asking it to “continue [its] deliberations.” Following 20 minutes of deliberation, the jury returned with a new verdict

1158

(“the second verdict”), apportioning 51% of the fault to MGM and 49% to Duk, but leaving the award of damages the same. The court granted MGM’s subsequent motion for a new trial based on the inconsistency between the two verdicts.

* * *

At the second trial, the jury returned a verdict for MGM. Duk appeals the new trial grant and the judgment based upon the MGM verdict in the second trial, claiming that the second verdict was legitimate. * * * MGM cross-appeals, claiming that the trial court should not have resubmitted the original inconsistent verdict, but should have discarded the damages award and entered judgment for MGM. In the alternative, MGM argues that a new trial was properly ordered. * * *

* * * Although Rule 49(a), dealing with special verdicts such as this one, does not explicitly provide for resubmission in case of an inconsistency, we have held that, because the rule does not prohibit it, special verdicts are also subject to the practice. * * *

* * * [E]mbrace of the practice is based on the notion that resubmission “promotes both fairness and efficiency.” * * * That principle was reaffirmed in Larson v. Neimi, 9 F.3d 1397 (9th Cir. 1993), when we held that the resubmission of an inconsistent special verdict to a jury, with a request for clarification, was within the district court’s discretion. * * * Id. at 1402. * * *

Here, the inconsistency arose when the jury awarded damages to Duk, even though it found him more than 50% responsible for his own injuries. MGM argues that the jury contravened the verdict form’s instructions to “sign and return [the] verdict” if Duk were found to be more than 50% negligent and, as a result, resubmission was barred by Floyd v. Laws, 929 F.2d 1390, 1397 (9th Cir. 1991) (responses in special verdict given in violation of a “stop here” instruction should be disregarded).

Floyd involved a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 suit and pendent state tort claims brought by a mother and her children against a municipality and its police chief. Id. at 1392. The jury was given a special verdict form addressing each of the claims, and found the police chief liable for assault and false imprisonment. Id. However, after the jury had been discharged, the defendant’s counsel pointed out that the jury’s answers to two of the questions were apparently inconsistent with one another. The jury answered “no” to question 13, which asked whether the plaintiffs were damaged as a result of the chief’s actions. Following question 13 was an instruction which read: “If your answer to question 13 is ‘No,’ do not answer any further questions, but proceed to the end of this form and sign the verdict. If you answered ‘Yes’ to question 13, proceed to question 14.” Id. at 1392–93. Question 14 asked the jury to award damages, which it did, awarding the plaintiffs $7,500. Id. at 1393. The trial court declared the answer to question 14 to be surplusage and entered judgment for the defendants. Id.

1159

We upheld the trial court’s decision, holding that, “as in the case of parenthetical comments, special findings issued in violation of the trial court’s express instructions do not constitute legitimate or viable findings of fact.” Id. at 1397. Because the trial court was “bound by law to disregard any answer to question 14 as surplusage,” the damages award “never became a part of the special verdict, and the trial court was faced with no apparent inconsistency.” Id. at 1399–1400.

Floyd, however, does not address the situation where the jury is still available when the inconsistency is recognized. Id. at 1392. * * * Because the jury had already been dismissed, the trial court in Floyd was left with the option of either disregarding the jury’s answers following the “stop here” instruction or ordering a new trial. Thus, we had no occasion to consider whether resubmission, if it were possible, would also be within a trial court’s discretion.

* * *

* * * [W]hen the jury is still available, resubmitting an inconsistent verdict best comports with the fair and efficient administration of justice. Allowing the jury to correct its own mistakes conserves judicial resources and the time and convenience of citizen jurors, as well as those of the parties. It also allows for a resolution of the case according to the intent of the original fact-finder, while that body is still present and able to resolve the matter. An entirely different situation is present where the jury has been dismissed. There, dismissal of surplusage * * * makes sense. It is certainly preferable to ordering a new trial, and is very probably the best available instrument to determine the jury’s intent.

Resubmission, of course, leaves open the possibility that the jury will reach an improper “compromise” verdict. * * * However, we presume that citizen jurors will properly perform the duties entrusted them and will not construe resubmission as an invitation to subvert the law and contort findings of fact in favor of a desired result.

* * *

A trial court, is rarely entitled to disregard jury verdicts that are supported by substantial evidence. The Supreme Court has held that a trial court has a duty to attempt to harmonize seemingly inconsistent answers to special verdict interrogatories, “if it is possible under a fair reading of them.” * * * A court may not disregard a jury’s verdict and order a new trial until it “attempt[s] to reconcile the jury’s findings, by exegesis if necessary.” * * *

1160

[T]here is little authority addressing the question whether harmonization is required across different verdicts, where a verdict has been resubmitted for clarification. Indeed, resubmission necessarily means that there might well be a difference between the first verdict and that reached after resubmission. Such an “inconsistency” will usually be considered a proper correction of a mistake in the original verdict. However, even if the second verdict appears to the trial court to be an improper compromise, the Seventh Amendment requires the court to seek a legitimate explanation for a verdict that is not contrary to the weight of the evidence.* * * Further, verdicts rendered pursuant to resubmission are readily amenable to the harmonization requirement. In this case, the second verdict is flatly inconsistent with the first because it apportions liability differently. However, this discrepancy is easily explained by the process of redeliberation.

* * *

Resubmission of an inconsistent verdict is done with the sole purpose of allowing a jury to reconcile inconsistencies. This process is not simply restricted to correcting transcription errors, but also envisions a process of redeliberation. * * * Such a result is possible only where the jury is allowed to resume its deliberations. Some inconsistencies may only be resolved if the jury reconsiders its answers in light of the instructions given to determine how its legally inconsistent answers can be properly reconciled according to its view of the facts.

Once this premise is accepted, it becomes clear that a post-resubmission verdict can easily be harmonized with its earlier counterpart by reference to a wholly proper process of redeliberation. In this case, the second verdict was not internally inconsistent. The only reason the district court expressed in finding that a new trial was required was that the second verdict was the product of a “manipulation of negligence percentages.” The court did not consider the possibility that the jury came to a different conclusion as to the facts because it engaged in further deliberations and legitimately came to new findings of fact. This is precisely what the trial court instructed the jury to do. When the court resubmitted the verdict to the jury, it twice instructed the jurors to “continue [their] deliberations.”

* * *

* * * [H]owever, the amount of damages remained unchanged from the first verdict to the second. Therefore, it is still quite plausible that the jury changed the apportionment of liability because it redeliberated and either changed its mind or clarified its thinking. It cannot be said here that the jury was clearly seeking a predetermined result. * * * As we have stated, the trial court has a duty to reconcile the verdicts “on any reasonable theory consistent with the evidence.” * * * Because it is possible to explain the inconsistency in a way that comports with the law, the district court’s decision to disregard the second verdict and order a new trial was an abuse of discretion.

1161

* * *

* * * We order reinstatement of the second verdict and entry of judgment for the plaintiff, including such interest thereon as calculated by the district court.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

Are there practical difficulties to resubmission in jurisdictions that do not require jurors to remain together constantly once the case has been submitted? Before allowing the jurors to separate, the court normally will warn them not to discuss the case with anyone outside the jury room and not to inspect sites referred to in the testimony or otherwise to obtain evidence. See Steckler, Management of the Jury, 28 F.R.D. 190, 191 (1960). Is it realistic to expect jurors not to have some discussions of a case with other jurors or with their families? What should the court do if it learns that discussions have occurred?

3.JURY MISCONDUCT AND THE INTEGRITY OF THE VERDICT

Should a juror be permitted to impeach his or her own verdict? Under Lord Mansfield’s rule, courts were barred from relying on jurors’ affidavits to revisit a verdict. See Vaise v. Delaval, 1 Term Rep. 11, 99 Eng. Rep. 944 (K.B. 1785). In 1866, the Iowa Supreme Court became the first state to deviate from the Mansfield rule, holding that “affidavits of jurors may be received for the purpose of avoiding a verdict, to show any matter occurring during the trial or in the jury room, which does not essentially inhere in the verdict.” Wright v. Illinois & Mississippi Telegraph Co., 20 Iowa 195, 210 (1866). See also Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 Mass. 453 (1871).

Almost a century later, in SOPP v. SMITH, 59 Cal.2d 12, 27 Cal.Rptr. 593, 377 P.2d 649 (1963), the majority’s adherence to the Mansfield rule provoked a strong dissent from Justice Peters. Justice Peters acknowledged five reasons for adhering to “the strict rule of exclusion”:

- (1) The need for stability of verdicts;
- (2) the need to protect jurors from fraud and harassment by disappointed litigants;
- (3) the desire to prevent prolonged litigation;
- (4) the need to prevent verdicts from being set aside because of the subsequent doubts or change of attitude by a juror; (5) the concept of the sanctity of the jury room.

But he saw the Iowa alternative as a better way to protect the integrity of the verdict without unduly intruding on jury deliberations:

1162

The Iowa rule is based upon the distinction between extrinsic or overt acts which may be corroborated or disproved, such as access to improper matter or an illegal method of reaching a verdict, and intrinsic matters which “inhere in the verdict itself” and hence are known only to the individual juror, such as misunderstanding or prejudice. Because matters which “inhere” in the verdict, including the thought processes and motives of the juror in reaching his decision, are not readily capable of being either corroborated or disproved they should be excluded.

Id. at 15–20, 27 Cal.Rptr. at 595–98, 377 P.2d at 651–54. In 1969 the California Supreme Court in People v. Hutchinson, 71 Cal.2d 342, 78 Cal.Rptr. 196, 455 P.2d 132 (1969), reversed its prior stance and accepted Justice Peters’ position that juror affidavits may be used in appropriate circumstances to impeach the verdict. Can you explain the distinction between extrinsic and intrinsic matters?

For an example of the difficulties that can arise when the court accepts affidavits of dissenting jurors alleging misconduct of the majority (when only a majority verdict is required), see Johns v. City of Los Angeles, 78 Cal.App.3d 983, 144 Cal.Rptr. 629 (2d Dist.1978) (hearing denied by four-to-three vote of the California Supreme Court). See MacKenzie III & Bromberg, Jr., Jury Misconduct: What Happens Behind Closed Doors, 62 Ala.L.Rev. 623 (2011).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Federal Rule of Evidence 606 addresses a juror’s competency as a witness. Subsection (b) is set out below.

(b) During an Inquiry into the Validity of a Verdict or Indictment.

(1) Prohibited Testimony or Other Evidence. During an inquiry into the validity of a verdict or indictment, a juror may not testify about any statement made or incident that occurred during the jury’s deliberations; the effect of anything on that juror’s or another juror’s vote; or any juror’s mental processes concerning the verdict or indictment. The court may not receive a juror’s affidavit or evidence of a juror’s statement on these matters.

(2) Exceptions. A juror may testify about whether:

(A) extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury’s attention;

(B) an outside influence was improperly brought to bear on any juror; or

1163

(C) a mistake was made in entering the verdict on the verdict form.

Does Rule 606(b) follow the Mansfield or the Iowa rule? In PENA-RODRIGUEZ v. COLORADO, 137 S.Ct. 855, 197 L.Ed.2d 107 (2017), a Colorado jury convicted petitioner of harassment and unlawful sexual contact on a child. The empaneled jurors did not express any reservations based on racial or any other bias after repeatedly being asked if they could be fair and impartial in the case. Petitioner moved for a new trial based on affidavits of two of the jurors that during deliberations, a third juror had made statements establishing that his vote to convict was based on racial bias against petitioner and an alibi witness. The Colorado courts rejected the affidavits under Colorado’s Rule of Evidence 606(b) (virtually identical to Federal Rule 606(b)) that prohibits juror testimony as to statements made during deliberations to overturn a verdict. The Supreme Court, by a five-to-three decision, reversed. Although the Court generally praised Rule 606(b), it held that in the special case of racial bias in a criminal action, the Sixth Amendment required the rule to give way to permit consideration of the affidavits. Should this same approach be taken in civil cases, where the Sixth Amendment does not apply? See HARDEN v. HILLMAN, 993 F.3d 465, 481 (6th Cir. 2021) (holding that “the Fourteenth Amendment’s guarantee of ‘equal protection of the laws’ provides a sufficient basis to extend Pena-Rodriguez to civil cases”).

2. Jury misconduct can take many forms. See O’Malley, Impeaching a Jury Verdict, Juror Misconduct, and Related Issues: A View from the Bench, 33 J.Marshall L.Rev. 145 (1999). Often the question is not whether the conduct was improper but whether the error is so serious that the verdict must be overturned. Assuming that a trial court has before it the following sets of facts, what rulings should it make on motions for a new trial?

(a) The jury, after deliberation, was deadlocked seven-to-five for defendant, but because, during trial, one juror learned of the death of a son and wished to return home, the jurors agreed to abide by the vote of the majority, and therefore, without further discussion, rendered a verdict for defendant. See Jorgensen v. York Ice Mach. Corp., 160 F.2d 432 (2d Cir. 1947), cert. denied, 332 U.S. 764, 68 S.Ct. 69, 92 L.Ed. 349 (1947). What if the jury, although properly instructed, erroneously believed that a majority verdict was all that was necessary?

(b) After the case was submitted to the jury and the jury deliberated for more than an hour without reaching a verdict the bailiff, on instruction of the court, took the jurors to lunch in a local hotel and supplied them with alcoholic beverages in moderate amounts. Shortly thereafter the jurors returned to the court and, after a half hour of deliberation, rendered a verdict. See Kealoha v. Tanaka, 45 Haw. 457, 370 P.2d 468 (1962) (denial of new trial affirmed by three-to-two decision). What difference would it make if one juror had become intoxicated?

1164

(c)During a court recess plaintiff entered an elevator containing three jurors on their way to lunch. Plaintiff initiated a friendly conversation with one of the jurors regarding the fact that some of plaintiff’s relatives lived in the area where the juror owned and operated a drugstore. The conversation was short and nothing was said about the case. See United States v. Harry Barfield Co., 359 F.2d 120 (5th Cir. 1966) (denial of new trial reversed by a two-to-one decision).

There are many cases in which jurors have been charged with misconduct for holding unauthorized conversations concerning the case. Most of the decisions turn on the nature of the conversation regarding the case and the extent to which the juror might have been influenced in his decision. Does it make sense to presume prejudice conclusively in contexts such as United States v. Harry Barfield Co., above? Should every contact between a juror and a party or attorney, or between a juror and a witness, be considered prejudicial? See Printed Terry Finishing Co. v. City of Lebanon, 247 Pa.Super. 277, 299–300, 372 A.2d 460, 469 (1977) (unexplained contact requires new trial).

In McDONOUGH POWER EQUIPMENT, INC. v. GREENWOOD, 464 U.S. 548, 104 S.Ct. 845, 78 L.Ed.2d 663 (1984), the respondent was injured in an accident involving a power mower manufactured by the petitioner. During the voir dire before the empaneling of the six-member jury, the respondents’ attorney asked a panel of prospective jurors how many of them had sustained or had immediate family members who had sustained any severe injury. The man who would become the foreman of the jury did not respond. The jury ultimately found for the petitioner. After judgment was entered for the petitioner, the respondents’ attorney questioned the jurors and discovered that the son of the foreman of the jury had been injured some time before by the explosion of a truck tire, sustaining a broken leg. During the post-judgment interview, the foreman said that “having accidents are a part of life,” and that “all his children have been involved in accidents.” Id. at 553 n.3, 104 S.Ct. at 848 n.3, 78 L.Ed.2d at 669 n.3. When the respondents’ motion for a new trial reached the Supreme Court, it held that:

To invalidate the result of a 3-week trial because of a juror’s mistaken, though honest, response to a question, is to insist on something closer to perfection than our judicial system can be expected to give. A trial represents an important investment of private and social resources, and it ill serves the important end of finality to wipe the slate clean simply to recreate the peremptory challenge process because counsel lacked an item of information which objectively he should have obtained from a juror on voir dire examination. * * * We hold that to obtain a new trial in such a situation, a party must first demonstrate that a juror failed to answer honestly a material question on voir dire, and then further show that a correct response would have provided a valid basis for a challenge for cause. * * *

1165

Id. at 555–56, 104 S.Ct. at 849–50, 78 L.Ed.2d at 671.

Justice Blackmun, joined by Justices Stevens and O’Connor, concurred, stressing that the decision should not be understood as “foreclos[ing] the normal avenue of relief available to a party who is asserting that he did not have the benefit of an impartial jury.” Id. at 556, 104 S.Ct. at 850, 78 L.Ed.2d at 672. Justice Brennan, joined by Justice Marshall, concurred in the judgment, proposing a different legal standard:

* * * In my view, the proper focus when ruling on a motion for new trial in this situation should be on the bias of the juror and the resulting prejudice to the litigant. More specifically, to be awarded a new trial, a litigant should be required to demonstrate that the juror incorrectly responded to a material question on voir dire, and that, under the facts and circumstances surrounding the particular case, the juror was biased against the moving litigant. * * *

* * * [F]or a court to determine properly whether bias exists, it must consider at least two questions: are there any facts in the case suggesting that bias should be conclusively presumed; and, if not, is it more probable than not that the juror was actually biased against the litigant. Whether the juror answered a particular question on voir dire honestly or dishonestly, or whether an inaccurate answer was inadvertent or intentional, are simply factors to be considered in this latter determination of actual bias. * * *

Id. at 557–58, 104 S.Ct. at 851, 78 L.Ed.2d at 672–73.

4.NEW TRIAL BECAUSE THE VERDICT IS AGAINST THE WEIGHT OF THE EVIDENCE

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 59 and the accompanying state materials in the Supplement.

1166

PARKER, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

This is the second appeal in a suit originally instituted to obtain a declaratory judgment with respect to the coverage of a policy of indemnity insurance. * * * The company denied liability on the ground that the defendant Yeatts was engaged in the performance of a criminal abortion at the time he incurred the liability for which the recovery was had against him, and that such liability was expressly excluded from the coverage of the policy. The question as to whether the defendant Yeatts was engaged in such criminal conduct was submitted to the jury, and from verdict and judgment in his favor the plaintiff brings this appeal.

There was testimony below from which the jury would have been amply justified in finding in favor of the plaintiff insurance company on the issue submitted; but the defendant himself was examined as a witness and, if his testimony is believed, he was guilty of no criminal act. No motion for directed verdict was made by the plaintiff, nor was the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a finding in favor of the defendant challenged in any other way before verdict. After verdict, plaintiff moved for judgment non obstante veredicto and also for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the credible evidence in the case; and exceptions directed to denial of these motions constitute the only points presented by the appeal.

Even if a motion for directed verdict had been made by plaintiff, it is clear that same should have been denied as should also, any motion for judgment non obstante veredicto based thereon * * *.

The motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial was a matter of federal procedure, governed by Rule * * * 59 and not subject in any way to the rules of state practice. On such a motion it is the duty of the judge to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, if he is of opinion that the verdict is against the clear weight of the evidence, or is based upon evidence which is false, or will result in a miscarriage of justice, even though there may be substantial evidence which would prevent the direction of a verdict. The exercise of this power is not in derogation of the right of trial by jury but is one of the historic safeguards of that right. * * * The matter was well put by Mr. Justice Mitchell, speaking for the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Smith v. Times Publishing Co. * * * [178 Pa. 481, 501, 36 A. 296, 298 (1897)], as follows: “The authority of the common pleas in the control and revision of excessive verdicts through the means of new trials was firmly settled in England before the foundation of this colony, and has always existed here without challenge under any of our constitutions. It is a power to examine the whole case on the law and the evidence, with a view to securing a result, not merely legal, but also not manifestly against justice,—a power exercised in pursuance of a sound judicial discretion, without which the jury system would be a capricious and intolerable tyranny, which no people could long endure. This court has had occasion more than once recently to say that it was a power the courts ought to exercise unflinchingly.” (Italics supplied).

1167

In the same case, Mr. Justice Williams, in a concurring opinion, traces the history of the exercise of this power and sums up his conclusion as follows:

* * *

As early * * * as 1665, the courts at Westminster did precisely what we have done in this case, and for the same reason. The right of trial by jury was not then supposed to give to a successful party the right to insist on an advantage due to the mistake or the willful misconduct of the jury, no matter how grossly unjust and oppressive the result might be; but the supervisory control of the court in banc, sitting as a court of review, was promptly exercised to relieve against the miscarriage of justice. The exercise of this power was then thought to be in aid of trial by jury. * * *

[Id. at 508–09, 36 A. at 309.]

* * *

The distinction between the rules to be followed in granting a new trial and directing a verdict were stated by us with some care in Garrison v. United States, 4 Cir., 62 F.2d 41, 42, * * * as follows: “Where there is substantial evidence in support of plaintiff’s case, the judge may not direct a verdict against him, even though he may not believe his evidence or may think that the weight of the evidence is on the other side; for, under the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury, it is for the jury to weigh the evidence and pass upon its credibility. He may, however, set aside a verdict supported by substantial evidence where in his opinion it is contrary to the clear weight of the evidence, or is based upon evidence which is false; for, even though the evidence be sufficient to preclude the direction of a verdict, it is still his duty to exercise his power over the proceedings before him to prevent a miscarriage of justice. * * * ”

It is equally well settled, however, that the granting or refusing of a new trial is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the trial judge, and that his action thereon is not reviewable upon appeal, save in the most exceptional circumstances. * * * The rule and the reason therefor is thus stated by Mr. Justice Brandeis in Fairmount Glass Works v. Cub Fork Coal Co. * * * [287 U.S. 474, 481, 53 S.Ct. 252, 254, 77 L.Ed. 439, 443 (1933)]: “The rule that this Court will not review the action of a federal trial court in granting or denying a motion for a new trial for error of fact has been settled by a long and unbroken line of decisions * * *. The rule precludes likewise a review of such action by a Circuit Court of Appeals. Its early formulation by this Court was influenced by the mandate of the Judiciary Act of 1789, which provided in section 22 that there should be ‘no reversal in either (circuit or Supreme) court on such writ of error * * * for any error in fact.’ Sometimes the rule has been rested on that part of the Seventh Amendment which provides that ‘no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law'. More frequently the reason given for the denial of review is that the granting or refusing of a motion for a new trial is a matter within the discretion of the trial court."

1168

While an examination of the record has led us to the conclusion that the trial judge might very properly have granted the motion for new trial, we cannot say that his denial of the motion amounted to an abuse of discretion on his part or that there are present any of the special circumstances which would subject his action to review by this court. The judgment appealed from will accordingly be affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. IN RE GREEN'S ESTATE, 25 Cal.2d 535, 542-43, 154 P.2d 692, 695-96 (1944):

It is next contended by contestant that the court erred in granting proponent's motion for a new trial on the ground "that the evidence as a whole was insufficient as a matter of law to support a verdict for respondents." The rules of law applicable to an appeal from an order of the trial court granting a motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence are well settled and, as stated in one of our most recent decisions, are as follows: " * * * When the motion is granted, as here, for insufficiency of the evidence, it is only in rare cases showing abuse of discretion that an appellate court will interfere because the trial judge must weigh all the evidence and determine the just conclusion to be drawn therefrom. * * * It cannot be held that a trial court has abused its discretion where there is a conflict in the evidence or where there is any evidence which would support a judgment in favor of the moving party." Hames v. Rust, 14 Cal.2d 119, 123, 124, 92 P.2d 1010, 1012 (1939). * * *

We may not agree with the determination reached by the trial judge or with any of his conclusions. That is not the question before us. It is his duty to weigh the evidence and to pass upon any and all conflicts existing therein. * * * If after such an examination of the evidence he concludes that it is insufficient to support the verdict, his duty is to grant the motion and a reviewing court may not set aside his conclusion unless a showing of abuse of discretion is made out by appellant. * * * As we have seen, if there is any substantial evidence in the case supporting the trial court's action, then we should not interfere with its order granting said motion.

1169

Under Green's Estate, when may a new trial be granted? How does the standard differ from Aetna?

2. In MARSH v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO., 175 F.2d 498, 500 (5th Cir. 1949), the district judge granted judgment notwithstanding the verdict, but denied an alternative motion for new trial, saying: "It is my judgment that the evidence was insufficient to go to the jury, but if I am wrong in that, then I do not think a new trial should be granted as there were no other errors of law." The court of appeals reversed:

* * * While it is not our function to weigh the evidence, we do agree with the trial judge's first expressed opinion that the weight of the evidence is "overwhelmingly against the plaintiff". But we do not agree that the grant of a judgment notwithstanding the verdict was therefore justified. There was evidence of the appellant, not very explicit or positive, which if believed might authorize a jury to conclude he was hurt in the manner he claims. Because the trial judge does not believe it, because of appellant's own contradictions and conduct and of opposing evidence which seem to overwhelm it, is not ground for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and we must reverse that judgment. * * *

But it is ground for the trial judge to grant a new trial, though the trial was free of other error. He has in strong terms disapproved the verdict as contrary to the evidence * * *. We have reversed the entering of a final judgment, but it is evident that the new trial ought to be granted and would have been except for the misconception that absence of other error prevented it. The full discretion vested in the trial judge not having been exercised, we will remand the case with direction to the judge to grant a new trial * * * if he continues to think the verdict to be against the overwhelming weight of the evidence.

On remand, are there any circumstances in which the trial judge could decide that the verdict was not against the weight of the evidence?

3. How does the standard for granting a motion for a judgment as a matter of law (formerly called a motion for a directed verdict) differ from that of a motion for a new trial? In DYER v. MACDOUGALL, 201 F.2d 265, 271 (2d Cir. 1952), Judge Frank, concurring, said:

* * * The well-settled rule is that, in passing on a motion for a directed verdict, the trial judge always must utterly disregard his own views of witnesses' credibility, and therefore of their demeanor; that he believes or disbelieves some of the testimony is irrelevant. When asked to direct a verdict for the defendant, the judge must assume that, if he lets the case go to the jury, the jurymen will believe all evidence—including "demeanor evidence"—favorable to the plaintiff.

1170

In other words, the judge must not deprive plaintiff of any advantage that plaintiff might derive from having the jury pass upon the oral testimony. Indeed, the important difference between a trial judge's power on a motion for a new trial and on a motion for a directed verdict is precisely that on a new-trial motion he may base his action on his belief or disbelief in some of the witnesses, while on a directed-verdict motion he may not.

See also Bowditch v. City of Boston, 101 U.S. (11 Otto) 16, 18, 25 L.Ed. 980, 980-81 (1879): "It is now a settled rule in the courts of the United States that whenever, in the trial of a civil case, it is clear that the state of the evidence is such as not to warrant a verdict for a party, and that if such a verdict were rendered the other party would be entitled to a new trial, it is the right and duty of the judge to direct the jury to find according to the views of the court.” The Bowditch case is but one of many with language of this kind.

4.It often is said that the grant of a new trial is largely unappealable; in those systems that adhere to the final-judgment rule, it can be reviewed by appealing from the judgment on the second trial, but in that case the appellant presumably will have lost the verdict in the second trial, and it will be difficult to argue that the grant of a new trial was an abuse of discretion. Some commentators have called for more robust review of judgments granting or denying a motion for a new trial. See Robertson, Judging Jury Verdicts, 83 Tul.L.Rev. 157, 217–18 (2008).

5.Suppose a verdict has been set aside and a new trial granted. If the jury in the second trial returns a verdict similar to the one rendered in the first action, may the court again order a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence?

5.THE POWER TO GRANT CONDITIONAL AND PARTIAL NEW TRIALS

FISCH V. MANGER

Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1957.
24 N.J. 66, 130 A.2d 815.

JACOBS, J.

The plaintiff suffered serious injuries in an automobile accident and, after trial, received a jury verdict in the sum of $3,000. He applied for a new trial because of the inadequacy of the verdict but his application was denied when the defendants consented that the damages awarded to the plaintiff be increased to the sum of $7,500. The plaintiff appealed and we thereafter certified on our own motion.

* * *

The plaintiff’s actual expenditures to doctors and nurses and for drugs and hospitalization exceeded $2,200. And although he received most of his normal earnings despite his temporary incapacity, there was a loss of wages approximating $620. While the jury’s verdict of $3,000 just about took care of the plaintiff’s actual monetary losses, it awarded substantially nothing for his suffering and permanent injuries. Its gross inadequacy was recognized by the trial judge who pointed out that “there was no dispute but that the plaintiff suffered excruciating pain, and was rendered totally helpless for a considerable period of time.” On June 28, 1956 the trial judge wrote to the parties advising that unless the defendants filed a consent in writing that the verdict be increased from $3,000 to $7,500, “then the verdict heretofore rendered will be set aside and a new trial granted limited to damages only.” The consent was filed by the defendants and on June 30, 1956 a formal order was entered dismissing the plaintiff’s motion for a new trial. * * *

1171

The first point which he urges in support of his appeal is that once the trial court had concluded that the damages awarded by the verdict were inadequate it had no legal power whatever to condition the grant of a new trial upon the defendants’ failure to consent to a prescribed increase in the verdict. * * * The term remittitur is used to describe an order denying the defendant’s application for new trial on condition that the plaintiff consent to a specified reduction in the jury’s award, whereas the term additur is used to describe an order denying the plaintiff’s application for a new trial on condition that the defendant consent to a specified increase in the jury’s award. While it is now recognized that the two practices are logically and realistically indistinguishable, remittiturs have been recognized almost everywhere, whereas additurs are still outlawed in some, though by no means all, of the states. * * *

The English precedents prior to the American Revolution are somewhat obscure and they are discussed in the majority and minority opinions in Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U.S. 474, 55 S.Ct. 296, 302, 79 L.Ed. 603 (1935). There Justice Sutherland, speaking for a majority of five (with Justice Stone, joined by Chief Justice Hughes and Justices Brandeis and Cardozo, dissenting) held that although remittitur is permissible in the federal courts, additur is prohibited by * * * the Seventh Amendment * * *. Justice Sutherland in the Dimick case * * * declined to upset the remittitur practice, first approved by Justice Story in Blunt v. Little, 3 Fed.Cas.760, No. 1,578 (C.C.Mass.1822), and since reaffirmed in many federal decisions. * * *

The majority opinion in Dimick has been the subject of much criticism and it is doubtful whether the Supreme Court would still subscribe to it; in any event, the Seventh Amendment differs somewhat from our constitutional provision and has no application to proceedings in our state courts. * * * We must look primarily to our own history and precedents in ascertaining whether the highly desirable practices of remittitur and additur may be adhered to in our State * * *.

1172

The remittitur practice has been recognized in New Jersey since early days. * * * [In 1917] the Court of Errors and Appeals had occasion to deal with a negligence case in which the practice of additur had been invoked. * * * Chancellor Walker, speaking for the entire court, had this to say ([Gaffney v. Illingsworth,] 90 N.J.L. at page 492, 101 A. at page 243):

The power of the court in granting a new trial upon the ground that the damages are excessive, upon terms that a new trial shall be had unless the plaintiff will accept a certain sum named, less than that awarded by a verdict, is too well established to be questioned. It would seem to follow, by parity of reasoning, that when a new trial is granted because the damages are inadequate, the court may impose like terms, that is, terms to the effect that if the defeated party will pay a certain sum, greater than that awarded by the verdict, the rule will be discharged, subject, doubtless, to the power of an appellate court to vacate any such terms when they appear to be an abuse of discretion. * * *

* * *

* * * [W]e are satisfied that the practices of remittitur and additur violate none of our constitutional interdictions and, if fairly invoked, serve the laudable purpose of avoiding a further trial where substantial justice may be attained on the basis of the original trial. * * * Accordingly, we reject the first point urged by the plaintiff and come now to his meritorious contention that, in any event, the prescribed increase to $7,500 was “grossly inadequate and should be set aside.” * * * In the instant matter, we believe that the trial judge had a mistaken notion of the evidence which led to his prescribing the scanty sum of $7,500. He stated that the plaintiff was not entitled to a “great sum, because he certainly did have a back condition before this accident occurred”; but the evidence in the record points to the view that whatever “back condition” the plaintiff had as a result of the 1950 accident had cleared up and had no relation to the very severe injuries resulting from the 1953 accident. Under these highly special circumstances, we believe that the trial court’s action should not be permitted to stand and that the interests of justice will best be served by permitting a second jury to pass on the issue of damages. The separable issue of liability was clearly and properly decided against the defendants; under the evidence it could hardly have been determined otherwise and need not be submitted for redetermination. * * *

Reversed, with direction for a new trial on the issue of damages.

HEHER, J. (concurring in result). * * *

As is shown by Justice Sutherland’s analysis of the case history in Dimick v. Schiedt * * *, there was no power in the English courts at the time of the adoption of the New Jersey Constitution of 1776 to increase, either absolutely or conditionally, the damages fixed by a jury in a case such as this. * * *

1173

* * * Justice Sutherland concluded, and with unquestionable authority, that “while there was some practice to the contrary in respect of decreasing damages, the established practice and the rule of the common law, as it existed in England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, forbade the court to increase the amount of damages awarded by a jury in actions such as that here under consideration.” * * *

The “controlling distinction between the power of the court and that of the jury,” said Justice Sutherland, “is that the former is the power to determine the law and the latter to determine the facts,” and while the remittitur practice in the case of an excessive verdict “is not without plausible support in the view that what remains is included in the verdict along with the unlawful excess,—in the sense that it has been found by the jury,—and that the remittitur has the effect of merely lopping off an excrescence,” yet where an inadequate verdict is increased by the court there is a “bald addition of something which in no sense can be said to be included in the verdict,” and if that be done with the consent of the defendant alone, the plaintiff is compelled to forego his “constitutional right to the verdict of a jury and accept ‘an assessment partly made by a jury which has acted improperly, and partly by a tribunal which has no power to assess.’ ”

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. For an argument that the practice of remittitur is not constitutional under the Seventh Amendment, see Thomas, Re-Examining the Constitutionality of Remittitur Under the Seventh Amendment, 64 Ohio St.L.J. 731 (2003).
2. Should a trial court have discretion to set a reasonable remittitur figure somewhere between the highest and lowest possible verdicts? Would it make more sense to require, as the alternative to a new trial, the highest amount an unprejudiced jury properly could have awarded plaintiff?

DOUTRE v. NIEC

Michigan Court of Appeals, 1965.
2 Mich.App. 88, 138 N.W.2d 501.

Defendants operate a beauty shop in Flint. On April 19, 1962, plaintiff was given a bleach and color treatment by defendants without a pretreatment patch test. Plaintiff received head and facial injuries as a result of the treatment and sued for damages.

1174

During the trial defendants were not allowed to testify as to the standard of care observed by beauty shops in the Flint area when administering such treatment. The jury awarded plaintiff $10,000. Defendants filed a motion for a new trial. Such motion was granted and a new trial ordered but limited to the question of liability.

Both parties appeal.

The plaintiff alleges error in granting the new trial as to liability on the theory that the court was correct in the first place when he ruled at the trial that the proffered testimony on the standard of care was not admissible. The defendants allege the court erred in limiting the new trial to the issue of liability on the theory that the questions of liability and damages are so closely intertwined that they should be tried together.

As to the plaintiff’s claim we find little merit. His objection is based on the theory that the defendants could know of the practices of the trade in Flint only by hearsay. This is not supported by the record.

The record shows that one of the defendants had been in the business for 24 years and the other for 14 years; they had attended conventions of beauticians and observed their practices and said they were abreast of the practices of other beauticians in Genesee County.

We agree with the trial court’s last ruling that these witnesses should have been allowed to testify and that to exclude their testimony was error requiring a new trial. Such testimony is admissible because no one is held to a higher standard of care than the average in the industry. * * *

The limitation of the trial to the issue of liability only poses a more difficult problem.

It has long been recognized that the questions of liability and damages are so closely intertwined that they may not usually be separated. The only exception the Michigan Supreme Court has so far recognized is in the case wherein “liability is clear” a retrial of the issue of damage alone may be permitted. Trapp v. King (1965), 374 Mich. 608, 132 N.W.2d 640.

In this case the court reiterated its position that despite the court rule authorizing it (GCR 1963, 527.1), limited new trials are not favored.

No compelling reason moves us to extend the rule.

The trial judge’s opinion states: “This ruling (on the evidentiary question) may have materially influenced the jury on the liability issue. It could not, however, by any stretch of the imagination have affected the issue of damages.” This bespeaks an assurance we do not share.

In the case before us the damages are not liquidated and the liability was determined pursuant to a trial in which an admitted error touching on liability was committed.

Under these circumstances it seems to us that justice requires that the jury which determines the liability or lack of it should have the responsibility for measuring any damages.

The trial court’s order for a new trial shall be extended to all of the issues.

Costs are awarded defendants.

NOTE

Compare the dissenting opinion of Judge Freedman in HUTTON v. FISHER, 359 F.2d 913, 920 (3d Cir. 1966):

* * * [A]s a matter of practical justice the damage verdict should not be permitted to stand where the question of liability is to be retried. It is the great and saving virtue of the jury system in accident cases that it permits laymen guided by the courts on questions of law to work out in a worldly way an accommodation between the strict requirements of law and their everyday view of justice. That a defendant therefore suffers disadvantage when a trial is limited to damages and liability is conceded is a fact of life, acknowledged everywhere but in courtrooms. * * * The limitation of a new trial by excluding some of the issues decided is exceptional, and the power to grant a partial new trial must be “exercised with caution.” Geffen v. Winer, 100 U.S.App.D.C. 286, 244 F.2d 375, 376 (1957). A retrial of liability will be less than the full relief the defendants are entitled to have, for its effect will be insulated from the damage question into which it ordinarily percolates.

See also Vizzini v. Ford Motor Co., 569 F.2d 754, 760 (3d Cir. 1977) (vacating decision to limit new trial to amount of damages).

6.REQUIREMENT AND TIMELINESS OF REQUESTS FOR A NEW TRIAL

Reread Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 50 and 59 in the Supplement.

UNITHERM FOOD SYSTEMS, INC. v. SWIFT-ECKRICH INC., 546 U.S. 394, 126 S.Ct. 980, 163 L.Ed.2d 974 (2006). Defendant moved at the end of the evidence under Federal Rule 50(a) for judgment as a matter of law. The motion was denied, and the case was submitted to the jury, which found for plaintiff. Defendant failed either to renew the motion or to move for a new trial. The court of appeals held that although the failure to file a renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law precluded a court from entering judgment as a matter of law, an appeals court nevertheless could grant a new trial as long as a preverdict motion for judgment as a matter of law had been filed.

The Supreme Court reversed as follows:

* * * The text of Rule 50(b) confirms that respondent’s preverdict Rule 50(a) motion did not present the District Court with the option of granting a new trial. That text provides that a district court may only order a new trial on the basis of issues raised in a preverdict 50(a) motion when “ruling on a renewed motion” under Rule 50(b). Accordingly, even if the District Court was inclined to grant a new trial on the basis of arguments raised in respondents’s preverdict motion, it was without the power to do so under Rule 50(b) absent a postverdict motion pursuant to that Rule. Consequently the Court of Appeals was similarly powerless.

* * * [T]he District Court’s denial of respondent’s preverdict motion cannot form the basis of respondent’s appeal, because the denial of that motion was not in error. It was merely an exercise of the District Court’s discretion, in accordance with the text of the Rule and the accepted practice of permitting the jury to make an initial judgment about the sufficiency of the evidence. The only error here was counsel’s failure to file a post-verdict motion pursuant to Rule 50(b).

Id. at 404, 126 S.Ct. at 988, 163 L.Ed.2d at 986.

Justice Stevens, in his dissent, argued that counsel’s error did not oust the appellate court of its authority to correct plain error: Murphy’s law applies to trial lawyers as well as pilots. Even an expert will occasionally blunder. For that reason Congress has preserved the federal appeals courts’ power to correct plain error, even though trial counsel’s omission will ordinarily give rise to a binding waiver. This is not a case, in my view, in which the authority of the appellate court is limited by an explicit statute or controlling rule. The spirit of the Federal Rules * * * favors preservation of a court’s power to avoid manifestly unjust results in exceptional cases.

Id. at 407, 126 S.Ct. at 988, 163 L.Ed.2d at 987.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Does Unitherm affect motions for a new trial under Federal Rule 59? Is it significant that the text of Rule 59 does not require any preverdict motion? Does Unitherm bar appeals based on legal error unless a postverdict motion is filed? The Eighth Circuit has explained:

The Unitherm opinion includes language that, when read out of context, indicates that an appeal may never be taken unless a postverdict motion is filed * * * (“[A] party is not entitled to pursue a new trial on appeal unless that party makes an appropriate postverdict motion in the district court.”). However, in addressing whether this language extends to all post-trial appeals, appeals courts have uniformly limited it to sufficiency of the evidence challenges where parties fail to file a postverdict motion under Rule 50(b) after the denial of a Rule 50(a) preverdict motion.* * * Reading Unitherm more broadly would dramatically alter the well-accepted rule that an objection at trial generally preserves an issue for review on appeal.* * *

1177

LINDEN v. CNH AMERICA, LLC, 673 F.3d 829, 832–33 (8th Cir. 2012).

2. The time period for filing a motion under Rule 50, 52, and 59 is 28 days after the entry of the judgment. The period is treated as jurisdictional and the district court is without power to extend it. See Hulson v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway, 289 F.2d 726 (7th Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 368 U.S. 835, 82 S.Ct. 61, 7 L.Ed.2d 36 (1961).

7.THE POWER TO SET ASIDE A JUDGMENT

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60 in the Supplement.

a.Mistake and Excusable Neglect

BRIONES v. RIVIERA HOTEL & CASINO, 116 F.3d 379 (9th Cir. 1997). Plaintiff sued his former employer for unlawful discharge. Defendant filed a Federal Rule 12(b) motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction and lack of proper service, to which plaintiff failed to respond. The court thus granted the motion. Plaintiff, who was appearing pro se and was not proficient in English, moved for relief under Federal Rule 60(b)(1) on the ground that the court had never informed him that his case might be dismissed and he had failed to notify his translator and typist of the deadline for filing his opposition papers. The trial court denied the Rule 60(b) motion. At that time case law had seemed to establish as a per se rule that a motion under Rule 60(b) could not be utilized to cure a failure to comply with court rules. See, e.g., Hulson v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry., p. 1177, Note 2, supra. However the appeals court noted that the Supreme Court in PIONEER INV. SERVS. CO. v. BRUNSWICK ASSOCIATES LTD. PARTNERSHIP, 507 U.S. 380, 113 S.Ct. 1489, 123 L.Ed.2d 74 (1993), addressing the filing of untimely claims under the Bankruptcy Code, had analyzed the term “excusable neglect” and referred to Rules 6(b) and 60(b) as follows:

Although inadvertence, ignorance of the rules, or mistakes construing the rules do not usually constitute “excusable” neglect, it is clear the “excusable neglect” under Rule 6(b) is a somewhat “elastic concept” and is not limited strictly to omissions caused by circumstances beyond the control of the movant. * * * [A]t least for purposes of Rule 60(b), “excusable neglect” is understood to encompass situations in which the failure to comply with a filing deadline is attributable to negligence.

Id. at 392, 113 S.Ct. at 1496, 123 L.Ed.2d at 87. The Supreme Court in Pioneer listed four factors to be considered in deciding whether neglect was “excusable”: (1) the danger of prejudice to the opposing party, (2) the length of the delay and its potential impact on the judicial proceedings, (3) the reason for the delay, and (4) whether the moving party acted in good faith. In view of the Pioneer opinion, the Briones court remanded the case to the trial court to determine whether plaintiff’s negligence was “excusable” under all the circumstances.

In Pincay v. Andrews, 351 F.3d 947, 951–52 (9th Cir. 2003), the Ninth Circuit held that excusable neglect to extend the time for filing an appeal was not present when defendant’s lawyer relied upon his firm’s calendar clerk to calculate the filing date and the calculation was in error:

We do not have a pro se plaintiff as in Briones. * * * It is consonant with Pioneer’s teaching that “ignorance of the rules or mistakes construing the rules do not usually constitute ‘excusable’ neglect.” * * * Here there was ignorance of the rules, compounded by delegation of knowledge of the rules to a nonlawyer for whom responsibility was not accepted.

See Simpson-Wood, A Litmus Test for Pioneer: Ethical Considerations and the Delegation Situation, 31 J.Legal Prof. 171 (2007).

b. Newly Discovered Evidence; Fraud

PATRICK v. SEDWICK, 413 P.2d 169 (Alaska 1966). Plaintiff brought an action for medical malpractice, alleging permanent physical injuries. The case was tried in October 1961 without a jury. In February 1962, the trial judge rendered findings on the issues of liability. These findings were subject to a lengthy appeal and it was not until more than two years later that the appellate court directed the trial court to enter findings for plaintiff on all issues of liability and to proceed to determine damages. The trial judge fixed the amount of damages on the basis of the evidence that had been presented at the trial and entered judgment on January 12, 1965. On January 22, 1965, defendant moved for a new trial on the ground that in 1963 a Dr. Robert Lewy had devised a new treatment that would ameliorate plaintiff’s injuries and therefore should reduce his damages. The trial court denied the motion. The judge rejected the significance of the new treatment since there was no assurance that any improvement it might bring would be permanent.

The appellate court affirmed the denial of a new trial with the following explanation:

* * * [A] motion for new trial on the grounds of newly discovered evidence must meet the following requirements before it [can] be granted:

(1) must be such as would probably change the result on a new trial; (2) must have been discovered since the trial; (3) must be of such a nature that it could not have been discovered before trial by due diligence; (4) must be material; (5) must not be merely cumulative or impeaching.

In addition to the foregoing requirements, it is established that for any evidence to come within the category of “newly discovered” such evidence must relate to facts which were in existence at the time of the trial. * * *

We hold, under the authorities referred to, that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying appellee’s motion for a new trial on the grounds of newly discovered evidence. It is clear from the record that Dr. Lewy’s discovery of the Teflon technique did not occur until a considerable period of time had elapsed after the case was tried in October 1961. Thus, the Lewy technique was not in existence at the time the trial took place and under the above authorities would not qualify as newly discovered evidence.

Id. at 177.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The standard for “newly discovered evidence” is similar under the federal rule. In American Civil Liberties Union v. Department of Defense, 406 F.Supp.2d 330 (S.D.N.Y. 2005), plaintiffs sought documents under the Freedom of Information Act pertaining to the treatment of detainees and to interrogation methods used against top Al-Qaeda members. The government declined to confirm or deny the existence of any documents, on the ground that their existence was itself classified. The court entered a judgment in favor of the government. After the CIA acknowledged in the press that its agents had participated in the interrogation of detainees, plaintiffs moved under Rule 60(b)(2) and (b)(6) for relief from the judgment based on newly discovered evidence. The court denied the motion:

* * * To prevail on a Rule 60(b)(2) motion, the party must show that “ ‘(1) newly discovered evidence is of facts existing at the time of [the prior decision]; (2) the moving party is excusably ignorant of the facts despite using due diligence to learn about them; (3) the newly discovered evidence is admissible and probably effective to change the result of the former ruling; and (4) the newly discovered evidence is not merely cumulative . . . of evidence already offered.’ ” * * * To prevail under the catch-all provision of a Rule 60(b)(6) motion, the party must show that the asserted grounds for relief are other than those recognized in clauses one through five of Rule 60, in addition to showing extraordinary circumstances justify relief. * * *

Id. at 332. The court found that the media reports would not have changed its earlier ruling, and were merely cumulative of evidence already submitted. As a result, relief was not available under Rule 60(b)(2). Nor did Rule 60(b)(6) provide a catch-all basis for relief. “Because the asserted grounds for relief, ‘newly discovered evidence,’ are recognized in clause two of Rule 60, relief under clause 6 of Rule 60 is unavailable.” Id.

2.In TITLE v. UNITED STATES, 263 F.2d 28, 31 (9th Cir. 1959), cert. denied, 359 U.S. 989, 79 S.Ct. 1118, 3 L.Ed.2d 978 (1959), appellant sought to set aside a judgment of denaturalization on the ground that some two years thereafter the United States Supreme Court, in a different case, interpreted the immigration act in such a way as to demonstrate that the original decision in Title was erroneous. Appellant relied on Rules 60(b)(4) and (5). The trial court denied the motions and the court of appeals affirmed: “Rule 60(b) was not intended to provide relief for error on the part of the court or to afford a substitute for appeal. * * * Nor is a change in the judicial view of applicable law after a final judgment sufficient basis for vacating such judgment entered before announcement of the change.” Assume that the change in the law is announced after the trial court has rendered judgment but before the time for appeal has run? Now should it be open to a party to seek relief under Rule 60(b)? Which subdivision would be the appropriate basis? See Visa Intern. Service Ass’n v. JSL Corp. 590 F.Supp.2d 1306 (D.Nev.2008).

In HAZEL-ATLAS GLASS CO. v. HARTFORD-EMPIRE CO., 322 U.S. 238, 245–46, 64 S.Ct. 997, 1001, 88 L.Ed. 1250, 1255–56 (1944), plaintiff brought an action in the court of appeals to set aside a judgment rendered against it some nine years earlier. The first action had turned on the validity of a patent held by defendant. Both the issuance of that patent by the Patent Office and the determination of its validity by the federal Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in the prior action had been affected by an article offered by defendant, ostensibly written by a disinterested expert, but actually prepared by defendant’s own officials, to the effect that the machine under patent was a “revolutionary device.” One of the attorneys who presented defendant’s case in the first action also had participated in the scheme to prepare and publish the fraudulent article. The court of appeals refused to set aside the judgment; the Supreme Court reversed:

Every element of the fraud here disclosed demands the exercise of the historic power of equity to set aside fraudulently begotten judgments. This is not simply a case of a judgment obtained with the aid of a witness who, on the basis of after-discovered evidence, is believed possibly to have been guilty of perjury. Here, even if we consider nothing but Hartford’s sworn admissions, we find a deliberately planned and carefully executed scheme to defraud not only the Patent Office but the Circuit Court of Appeals. * * *

1181

The Circuit Court did not hold that Hartford’s fraud fell short of that which prompts equitable intervention, but thought Hazel had not exercised proper diligence in uncovering the fraud and that this should stand in the way of its obtaining relief. We cannot easily understand how, under the admitted facts, Hazel should have been expected to do more than it did to uncover the fraud. But even if Hazel did not exercise the highest degree of diligence, Hartford’s fraud cannot be condoned for that reason alone. This matter does not concern only private parties. There are issues of great moment to the public in a patent suit. * * * Furthermore, tampering with the administration of justice in the manner indisputably shown here involves far more than an injury to a single litigant. It is a wrong against the institutions set up to protect and safeguard the public, institutions in which fraud cannot complacently be tolerated consistently with the good order of society. Surely it cannot be that preservation of the integrity of the judicial process must always wait upon the diligence of litigants. The public welfare demands that the agencies of public justice be not so impotent that they must always be mute and helpless victims of deception and fraud.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Does Hazel-Atlas stand for the proposition that a court on its own motion may set aside a judgment obtained by fraud on the court? Was it proper for the Court to find that there had been a fraud on the lower court? Different circuits have set out similar tests of what constitutes fraud on the court meriting the setting aside of a verdict. The Third Circuit, for example, requires the showing of an intentional act, by an officer of the court, directed at the court itself, which in fact deceives the court. See Herring v. United States, 424 F.3d 384 (3d Cir. 2005).

2.In PEACOCK RECORDS, INC. v. CHECKER RECORDS, INC., 365 F.2d 145, 147 (7th Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 385 U.S. 1003, 87 S.Ct. 707, 17 L.Ed.2d 542 (1967), the court of appeals reversed the denial of a Rule 60(b) motion as an abuse of discretion:

* * * We hold that where it appears that perjured testimony may have played some part in influencing the court to render a judgment, the perjury will not be weighed, on a motion to set aside the judgment. This seems self evident. * * * [If the judgment was obtained in part by the use of perjury] then it was clearly the duty of the district court to set aside the judgment, because poison had permeated the fountain of justice.

1182

In Philos Technologies, Inc. v. Philos & D, Inc., 802 F.2d 905 (7th Cir. 2015), the Seventh Circuit emphasized that the showing of fraud must be clear and convincing, citing Peacock as a case in which the basis for granting the motion was “incontrovertible * * * evidence of perjury,” because “the witnesses were willing to testify that they had perjured themselves.” Id. at 918.

c.The Independent Action to Obtain Relief from a Prior Judgment

Reread Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(d) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Rule 60(d) is a “savings clause” that permits an independent action to be brought to attack a judgment that is older than one year. As the Sixth Circuit has explained:

* * * Independent actions for relief under this section “must, if Rule 60(b) is to be interpreted as a coherent whole, be reserved for those cases of ‘injustice which, in certain instances, are deemed sufficiently gross to demand a departure’ from rigid adherence to the doctrine of res judicata.” [United States v. Beggerly, 524 U.S. 38, 46, 118 S.Ct. 1862, 1867, 141 L.Ed.2d 32, 40 (1998) (quoting Hazel-Atlas Glass Co. v. Hartford-Empire Co., 322 U.S. 238, 244, 64 S.Ct. 997, 1000, 88 L.Ed. 1250, 1255 (1944))].

We have set forth the elements of such an independent cause of action as:

(1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; (2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; (3) fraud, accident, or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; (4) the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the defendant; and (5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law.

MARCELLI v. WALKER, 313 Fed.Appx. 839 (6th Cir. 2009), citing Barrett v. Sec’y of Health & Human Servs., 840 F.2d 1259, 1263 (6th Cir. 1987) (citations omitted).

2.Many jurisdictions permit an independent action in equity to set aside a judgment. Fraud is one of the substantive grounds upon which relief may be granted in such an action. Suppose that instead of putting forth false information, a party merely conceals facts of which she has direct knowledge that would have a definite bearing on the outcome of the case. Does this constitute fraud? Does the distinction between extrinsic and intrinsic fraud affect whether the motion will be granted? For an extensive analysis of the bases for a Rule 60(d) motion, see Benham, Twombly and Iqbal Should (Finally!) Put the Distinction Between Intrinsic and Extrinsic Fraud Out of Its Misery, 64 SMU L.Rev. 649 (2011). Should the plausible pleading standard apply to such an independent action? See Hague, Fraud on the Court and Abusive Discovery, 16 Nev.L.J. 707 (2016).

⁶ 252 F.2d at page 874. In Ettelson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 317 U.S. 188, 192, 63 S.Ct. 163, 164, 87 L.Ed. 176, this Court recognized that orders enabling equitable causes to be tried before legal ones had the same effect as injunctions. In City of Morgantown, W.Va. v. Royal Ins. Co., 337 U.S. 254, 69 S.Ct. 1067, 93 L.Ed. 1347, the Court denied at least some such orders the status of injunctions for the purposes of appealability. It did not, of course, imply that when the orders came to be reviewed they would be examined any less strictly than injunctions. * * *

^aComparable language is now found in Federal Rule 38(a).

¹⁰ For example, the Court of Appeals recognized that Title VIII could be viewed as an extension of the common-law duty of innkeepers not to refuse temporary lodging to a traveler without justification, a duty enforceable in a damages action triable to a jury, to those who rent apartments on a long-term basis. See 467 F.2d at 1117. An action to redress racial discrimination may also be likened to an action for defamation or intentional infliction of mental distress. * * *

⁸ Both the Union and the dissent argue that the backpay award sought here is equitable because it is closely analogous to damages awarded to beneficiaries for a trustee’s breach of trust. * * * Such damages were available only in courts of equity because those courts had exclusive jurisdiction over actions involving a trustee’s breach of his fiduciary duties. * * *

The Union’s argument, however, conflates the two parts of our Seventh Amendment inquiry. Under the dissent’s approach, if the action at issue were analogous to an 18th-century action within the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of equity, we would necessarily conclude that the remedy sought was also equitable because it would have been unavailable in a court of law. This view would, in effect, make the first part of our inquiry dispositive. We have clearly held, however, that the second part of the inquiry—the nature of the relief—is more important to the Seventh Amendment determination. * * * The second part of the analysis, therefore, should not replicate the “abstruse historical” inquiry of the first part, Ross * * *, but requires consideration of the general types of relief provided by courts of law and equity.

^bThe rule currently is Rule 50(e).

^cThe substance of the rule now appears in Rule 49(b)(1).

^dThe substance of the rule now appears in Rule 49(b)(3)(B).

343 * * *

“You should award the plaintiffs herein such sum as, under all of the circumstances of the case, may be fair and just compensation for the pecuniary loss which the [widow and child(ren)] have suffered by reason of the death of [decedent].

* * *

“In weighing these matters, you may consider * * * the disposition of the deceased, whether it was kindly, affectionate or otherwise; whether or not he showed an inclination to contribute to the support of the plaintiffs or any of them; the earning capacity of the deceased; and such other facts shown by the evidence as throw light upon the pecuniary value of the support, society, care, comfort and protection other than the loss of consortium between husband and wife, which the plaintiffs reasonably might have expected to receive from the deceased had he lived. * * * ” (Emphasis added.)

⁴We similarly reject the Authority’s argument that the district court erred by requesting proposed findings and conclusions of law from the parties before and not after trial. Although the district court may request proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law in order to aid it in its decisionmaking process, the terms of Rule 52(a) impose no requirement that the district court do so. Rather, it is within the district court’s broad discretion whether and when to request proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and the district court here clearly acted within the ambit of that discretion.

⁵The Authority relies heavily on our decision in Roberts v. Ross, 344 F.2d 747 (3d Cir. 1965). In Roberts, we accorded the district court’s factual findings less weight because the district court followed essentially the same practice utilized by the district court in Anderson: it first announced its decision, then requested the prevailing party to submit proposed findings, which the district court adopted verbatim. Id. at 752. Not only is the procedure we addressed in Roberts more questionable than the one followed by the district court here, but Roberts has been superseded by both Anderson and our decision in Hayes, see supra. We observe, too, that Roberts was the product of halcyon days when district court dockets were not burdened with the volume that they carry today, or with as many complex cases requiring voluminous findings. We thus reject the Authority’s claim that Roberts requires us to review more stringently the district court’s factual findings here.

CHAPTER 15

SECURING AND ENFORCING JUDGMENTS

This chapter explores the procedures used to secure and enforce a judgment. The commencement of a lawsuit or, for that matter, the entry of a judgment in favor of plaintiff, does not mean that plaintiff actually will achieve the goals of the action. A victorious plaintiff’s ability to collect a judgment depends primarily on defendant’s capacity and willingness to pay at the time the award is made and secondarily on the effectiveness of the court’s enforcement procedures in the event that the judgment debtor is capable of paying but is recalcitrant. Plaintiff’s efforts may be frustrated if defendant has become insolvent during the litigation or has secreted assets or fraudulently conveyed them to third persons. In short, the arduous litigation process often proves to be a preliminary to the equally protracted travail of collecting the award.

A. PROVISIONAL REMEDIES AND THE DUE PROCESS CLAUSE

1. RULE 64 AND THE AVAILABILITY OF STATE PROVISIONAL REMEDIES

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 64 in the Supplement.

A provisional remedy is a form of relief entered before a final judgment and does not resolve the merits of the dispute; its purpose is to preserve the status quo until the case is finally decided. Provisional remedies include such devices as the preliminary injunction, the temporary restraining order, attachment, and receivership, which are the focus of this chapter. By virtue of Federal Rule 64, a federal court may use the provisional remedies available to the courts of the state in which it sits to the extent that these state remedies are not inconsistent with any other federal rule or statute. Provisional remedies date back to the medieval writs but today are creatures of statute and their effectiveness varies considerably from state to state. See Millar, Civil Procedure of the Trial Court in Historical Perspective 481–515 (1952). For an illustrative state practice, see Articles 60 through 65 of New York’s Civil Practice Law and Rules, pertaining to attachment, garnishment, injunction, receivership, and notice of pendency (New York abolished civil arrest in 1979).

2. THE EFFECT OF THE DUE PROCESS CLAUSE

Traditionally, a creditor who sued a debtor could invoke a provisional remedy to seize property of the debtor without affording the property owner notice of the action or an opportunity to contest the underlying claim. See Chapter 3.D, supra. In a series of decisions beginning in the 1960s, see p. 279, supra, the Supreme Court extended the protections of the Due Process Clause to the use of provisional remedies, developing a flexible standard that considered the significance of the property at stake and the exigencies of the situation, such as concerns of the debtor’s flight or that the property would be dissipated or concealed. See Countryman, The Bill of Rights and the Bill Collector, 15 Ariz.L.Rev. 521 (1973).

A garnishment order directs a third party (the garnishee) that is holding money or property of the debtor to give the property instead to the creditor-garnishor. In SNIADACH v. FAMILY FINANCE CORP., the Supreme Court invalidated the Wisconsin prejudgment garnishment procedure, which authorized a summons to issue at the request of the creditor’s lawyer who served the garnishee—the debtor’s employer who held wages lawfully due to the employee—thereby freezing the debtor’s wages during the period before trial of the main suit. In FUENTES v. SHEVIN, the Court extended Sniadach’s reasoning to replevin, a procedure that at common law allowed for the recovery of personal property claimed to have been unlawfully taken. In Fuentes, the Court invalidated as unconstitutional state statutes authorizing the replevin of chattels—consumer goods sold on an installment contract—before allowing the debtor notice and an opportunity to be heard. See Clark & Landers, Sniadach, Fuentes and Beyond: The Creditor Meets the Constitution, 59 Va.L.Rev. 355 (1973); Feeherly & Zuckerman, Note—Procedural Due Process—The Prior Hearing Rule and the Demise of Ex Parte Remedies, 53

B.U.L.Rev. 41 (1973).

The Court in MITCHELL v. W.T. GRANT CO. upheld the Louisiana sequestration statute, which permitted the creditor to obtain the writ on an ex parte application without giving the debtor either notice or an opportunity for a hearing. The Court reasoned that the risk of a wrongful taking was minimized by the creditor’s pre-existing interest in the property; the fact that a judge, and not a clerk, authorized the writ; the immediate availability of a post-seizure hearing; and the risk that the debtor could conceal or destroy the property quickly and easily, thus depriving the creditor of the security interest. However, in NORTH GEORGIA FINISHING, INC. v. DI-CHEM, INC., the Court invalidated the Georgia garnishment statute, which permitted the writ to issue on the basis of conclusory allegations by plaintiff without providing defendant an opportunity for an “early hearing” or “other safeguard against mistaken repossession.” The Court stressed the importance of providing safeguards against the risk of an erroneous seizure that can cause irreparable injury to defendant, even when the debt arises in a commercial context between parties of equal bargaining power (in this case, two corporations).

1187

These early cases did not provide a general rule for assessing whether a provisional remedy comported with the Due Process Clause. In CONNECTICUT v. DOEHR, p. 286, supra, the Court invalidated a Connecticut statute pursuant to which a judge could allow the prejudgment attachment of real estate, without prior notice or hearing, upon plaintiff’s assertion under oath that there was probable cause to sustain the validity of his claims which were unrelated to the property sought to be seized. In place of the ad hoc, multi-factor approach taken in the Sniadach line of cases, the Court applied the three-part balancing test of MATHEWS v. ELDRIDGE, developed in the context of disputes concerning eligibility for government benefits. The three-part test considers (1) the private interest that will be affected by the official action; (2) the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through the procedures used, and probable value, if any, of additional procedural safeguards; and (3) the government’s interest, including the fiscal and administrative burdens that the additional or substitute procedures would entail. Four Justices in Doehr stated that, in their view, due process also required the posting of a bond or some other security, a question that remains open. Compare Diaz v. Paterson, 547 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 2008), with Tri-State Dev., Ltd. v. Johnston, 160 F.3d 528 (9th Cir. 1998). See Beale, Note—Connecticut v. Doehr and Procedural Due Process Values: The Sniadach Tetrad Revisited, 79 Cornell L.Rev. 1603 (1994); Vandeveld, Ideology, Due Process and Civil Procedure, 67 St. John’s L.Rev. 265, 317–24 (1993).

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

Connecticut amended its prejudgment remedy statute in response to Connecticut v. Doehr. The amended statute requires an evidentiary hearing before the grant of any prejudgment remedy, but retains the “probable cause” standard for the issuance of relief. Conn. Gen. Statutes § 52–278e. In HARTFORD ACCIDENT & INDEM. CO. v. ACE AM. REINSUR. CO., 103 Conn. App. 319, 930 A.2d 701 (2007), the state appeals court considered the constitutionality of Connecticut’s pre-pleading security statute, Conn. Gen. Statutes § 38a–27. Under the statute, an unauthorized insurance company doing business in the state and sued in the state was required to post security “in an amount to be fixed by the court or the commissioner sufficient to secure the payment of any final judgment which may be rendered in the action or proceeding.” The statute permitted the judge or the commissioner, in its discretion, to dispense with the requirement upon a showing that the insurer maintained sufficient funds in the state to satisfy any final judgment that might be entered or to obtain authorization to do insurance business in the state. The question was whether due process required an evidentiary hearing to set the amount of the security, or whether the court could simply accept the amount of damages alleged in plaintiff’s complaint as the basis for its determination. Relying on Doehr, the state appeals court held that a hearing was required. The Connecticut court distinguished its state’s statute from that of New York, which required court supervision and an opportunity to be heard before requiring payment, and was upheld as constitutional by the Second Circuit. See Heiser, Due Process Limitations on Pre-answer Security Requirements for Nonresident Unlicensed Insurers, 88 Neb.L.Rev. 494 (2010).

1188

B. METHODS OF SECURING THE JUDGMENT— PROVISIONAL REMEDIES

1. ATTACHMENT

Attachment is a provisional remedy that prevents defendant from selling or otherwise disposing of real or personal property once it has been taken into custody by the attaching officer. Attachment deprives defendant of the use and enjoyment of property long before liability is established (and, of course, in many cases no liability will be found). For this reason courts regard it as a drastic remedy and may decline the request even if statutory requirements are met and plaintiff is willing to post a bond. In particular, the court will consider the hardship to defendant if the value of the property exceeds the potential liability or if the property is part of an ongoing business. Attachment is an important provisional remedy when a creditor’s interest is not secured by collateral, which includes the broad range of contracts for services and material.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In 1971, relying on Sniadach, the California Supreme Court struck down that state’s prejudgment attachment statute because it permitted seizure of a debtor’s assets without notice and any hearing upon the filing of an action on an express or implied contract for payment of money. See Randone v. Appellate Department of the Superior Court of Sacramento County, 5 Cal.3d 536, 96 Cal.Rptr. 709 (1971). The current attachment statute, Cal. Code of Civil Procedure §§ 481.010 et seq., applies in similar cases when the amount of the claim is fixed or readily ascertainable and not less than $500, and the amount secured is not less than zero. The applicant must establish “the probable validity” of the claim upon which the attachment is based, which requires establishing it is more likely than not that a judgment against defendant will be obtained. The amount to be secured may be offset by a claim against the applicant, provided it is a claim on which an attachment “could be issued.” Id. at § 483.015. In LYDIG CONSTRUCTION, INC. v. MARTINEZ STEEL CORP., 234 Cal.App.4th 937, 184 Cal.Rptr.3d 329 (2015), defendant challenged plaintiff’s application for a writ of attachment, and made a claim against plaintiff for an amount greater than the attachment-claim. Defendant argued that once the offsetting claim was considered, the amount to be secured did not exceed zero. The state appellate court applied the same standard of probable cause to the offsetting claim as to the attachment claim, and found that defendant’s single conclusory declaration was insufficient to meet that standard.

1189

2.New York’s attachment statute, N.Y.C.P.L.R. 6201, permits prejudgment attachment when, among other grounds, (1) defendant is a nondomiciliary residing outside the state or an unlicensed foreign corporation, (2) defendant is within the state but diligent efforts to serve defendant personally have failed, or (3) defendant’s conduct in connection with the property indicates an intent to defraud creditors or frustrate the enforcement of a potentially unfavorable judgment. Prejudgment attachment also requires the movant to show a probability of success on the merits. See Silverman Partners, L.P. v. First Bank, 687 F.Supp.2d 269, 293 (E.D.N.Y. 2010). When the purpose of the attachment is security and not jurisdiction, New York courts require the movant to show “that something, whether it is a defendant’s financial position or past and present conduct, poses a real risk of the enforcement of a future judgment.” Bank of China v. NBM L.L.C., 192 F.Supp.2d 183, 188 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) (citation and internal quotation omitted). The court in Bank of China emphasized that the mere “possibility” that defendants will remove their assets out of the state is “too remote” to justify an order of attachment. In this case, plaintiff justified the need for the levy by showing that defendants had attempted repeatedly to remove their assets through such devices as issuing payments on transactions that had not taken place, submitting fake bills of lading, trying to sell real estate that served as collateral on a bank loan, and by attempting to transfer more than $1 million to the Cayman Islands using a forged hypothecation agreement.

2.PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIONS AND TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDERS

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 65 in the Supplement.

a.Preliminary Injunctions

A preliminary injunction is a form of provisional remedy that protects a plaintiff from irreparable injury—injury that cannot be redressed through monetary compensation—while preserving the court’s power to enter meaningful relief after a decision on the merits. By entering a preliminary injunction, the court seeks to maintain the status quo; as the Second Circuit has put it, without the injunction, it would be “difficult, and sometimes virtually impossible to ‘unscramble the eggs.’ ” Sonesta Int’l Hotels Corp. v. Wellington Assocs., 483 F.2d 247, 250 (2d Cir. 1973).

1190

Federal Rule 65 authorizes the federal court to issue a preliminary injunction, but does not set forth the standard for granting or denying the request. The standard is judicially defined, and looks to four factors: the plaintiff seeking a preliminary injunction “must establish” that the party is “likely to succeed on the merits”; “likely to suffer irreparable harm in the absence of preliminary relief;” that “the balance of equities tips” in the movant’s favor”; and that an injunction “is in the public interest.” WINTER v. NATURAL RESOURCES DEFENSE COUNCIL, 555 U.S. 7, 20, 129 S.Ct. 365, 374, 172 L.Ed.2d 249, 261 (2008). The entry of a preliminary injunction is regarded as “extraordinary” relief, and may be awarded only upon “a clear showing that the plaintiff is entitled to such relief.” Id. at 376, 129 S.Ct. at 22, 172 L.Ed.2d at 262. In Winter environmental groups sued the United States Navy to stop sonar testing that was alleged to be harmful to marine mammals living in waters near Southern California. The Supreme Court reversed the grant of the preliminary injunction, in part because the appellate court had required plaintiffs to show a possibility, and not a likelihood, of irreparable harm. In the wake of Winter, the appellate courts have divided on whether the test for a preliminary injunction permits a “sliding scale” approach to the four factors, or whether each factor must be “satisfied as articulated.” Alliance for the Wild Rockies v. Cottrell, 632 F.3d 1127, 1131 (9th Cir. 2011).

b.Temporary Restraining Orders

Federal Rule 65 authorizes the federal courts to issue a temporary restraining order. Unlike the preliminary injunction, an application for a restraining order is sought when time considerations do not provide the opportunity for formal notice. Thus, a “TRO” is appropriate only when the threat of irreparable injury is immediate and the need to preserve the status quo is urgent. Because of a concern over the potential unfairness of ex parte proceedings, a number of special conditions, such as those set out in Federal Rule 65(b), are usually imposed. The factors considered in ruling on a motion for a TRO are the same as for a preliminary injunction, and courts tend to proceed ex parte only when there is “no reasonable alternative.” American Can Co. v. Mansukhani, 742 F.2d 314, 322 (7th Cir. 1984). See 11A Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2951 (3d ed.).

TROs issued after adversary hearings or that exceed the expiration provisions set out in Rule 65(b) are evaluated as de facto preliminary injunctions by courts. See SAMPSON v. MURRAY, 415 U.S. 61, 94 S.Ct. 937, 39 L.Ed.2d 166 (1974). In Commodity Futures Trading Comm’n v. Lake Shore Asset Mgt. Ltd., 496 F.3d 769, 771–72 (7th Cir. 2007), the Seventh Circuit vacated an ex parte TRO that had remained in force for longer than 20 days, explaining that continuation of the order “would pose serious constitutional problems. It would allow a business to be destroyed without giving the affected party any opportunity to present evidence.” On the other hand, a no-notice TRO may be essential when plaintiff is faced with the imminent destruction of property. In MATTER OF VUITTON ET FILS, 606 F.2d 1 (2d Cir. 1979), Louis Vuitton, a French company that manufactures luxury leather goods, alleged trademark infringement and unfair competition because fake Vuitton items were being sold to consumers who believed they were buying authentic merchandise. On a petition for a writ of mandamus, the court of appeals directed the district court to issue a no-notice TRO that was “narrow in scope and brief in duration” because there were many defendants who had not yet been identified. Id. at 5.

1191

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The interplay between preliminary injunctions and TROs was on display in one of the earliest cases involving the Trump Administration’s ban on travel by noncitizens from designated countries. Following the signing of Executive Order 13769, the states of Washington and Minnesota sought a TRO enjoining enforcement of the ban. After a district court granted the TRO, the government quickly appealed to the Ninth Circuit. Plaintiff-appellees challenged the appellate court’s jurisdiction and ability to review the TRO. However, the court found that because of the government’s vigorous defense of the ban, the TRO was effectively a preliminary injunction, and was reviewable. See Washington v. Trump, 847 F.3d 1151, 1158 (9th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S.Ct. 448, 199 L.Ed.2d 331 (2017).

2. In some cases plaintiff may seek a preliminary injunction that mandates the taking of action, rather than prohibiting it. A classic discussion of mandatory injunctions appears in then-Judge William Howard Taft’s opinion in TOLEDO, A.A. & N.M. RY. v. PENNSYLVANIA CO., 54 Fed. 730, 741 (C.C.N.D. Ohio), appeal dismissed, 150 U.S. 393, 14 S.Ct. 123, 37 L.Ed. 1120 (1893):

The office of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the status quo until, upon final hearing, the court may grant full relief. Generally this can be accomplished by an injunction prohibitory in form, but it sometimes happens that the status quo is a condition not of rest, but of action, and the condition of rest is exactly what will inflict the irreparable injury upon complainant, which he appeals to a court of equity to protect him from. In such a case courts of equity issue mandatory writs before the case is heard on its merits. * * *

When a mandatory preliminary injunction may go beyond maintaining the status quo, the standard for its issuance is higher. See Tom Doherty Associates, Inc. v. Saban Entertainment, Inc., 60 F.3d 27 (2d Cir. 1995). As the Ninth Circuit has explained, “[w]here a party seeks mandatory preliminary relief that goes well beyond maintaining the status quo pendente lite, courts should be extremely cautious about issuing a preliminary injunction.” Martin v. International Olympic Committee, 740 F.2d 670, 675 (9th Cir. 1984). Thus, an award of mandatory preliminary relief is not to be granted unless the movant can demonstrate a higher likelihood of success or very serious damage.

1192

3. A preliminary injunction will not be issued unless it is shown that defendant’s conduct violates plaintiff’s rights and tends to render the ultimate judgment ineffectual, and that the act to be restrained affects the subject matter of the action. Thus, a preliminary injunction or temporary restraining order relating to defendant’s conduct is unavailable in an ordinary tort or contract action for money damages, since money is not considered the “subject” of the action. In this circumstance, what other provisional relief might plaintiff seek?

4. In GRUPO MEXICANO DE DESARROLLO, S.A. v. ALLIANCE BOND FUND, INC., 527 U.S. 308, 119 S.Ct. 1961, 144 L.Ed.2d 319 (1999), a divided Supreme Court held that the district court exceeded its authority when it entered a preliminary injunction freezing defendants’ use of their assets pending adjudication of plaintiffs’ right to a lien. Writing for the majority, Justice Scalia concluded that an injunction of this sort is beyond the equitable powers of the Article III courts. See Burbank, The Bitter with the Sweet: Tradition, History, and Limitations on Federal Judicial Power—A Case Study, 75 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1291 (2000). Freezing orders were introduced in England by judicial decision and then codified in the Senior Courts Act of 1981. See Capper, The Need for Mareva Injunctions Reconsidered, 73 Fordham L.Rev. 2161 (2005).

5. Preliminary injunctions and TROs typically bind not only the parties to the action, but also their agents, servants, and anyone acting in collusion with or for the benefit of a party. Must the district court hold a hearing to determine who is bound by the order? Is it appropriate to bind an individual because he or she is a member of a group or an unincorporated association that has been enjoined by the court? Should the court inquire into the association’s control over its members as an aid in determining whether individual members should be bound by an order issued against the group? See Rendleman, Beyond Contempt: Obligor to Injunctions, 53 Texas L.Rev. 873 (1975).

6. Particularly difficult questions have arisen when a party seeks to enjoin others from commencing or continuing an action in another court or from enforcing a judgment issued by another court. The traditional view, as expressed in MERRITT-CHAPMAN & SCOTT CORP. v. MUTUAL BENEFIT LIFE INS. CO., 237 App. Div. 70, 73, 260 N.Y.S. 374, 378 (1st Dep’t 1932), is that a court would not interfere with an action in another court “unless it has a clear priority of jurisdiction, or exceptional circumstances are shown to exist which require such drastic remedy.” See

McClintock, Equity § 37 (2d ed. 1948). For a historical survey of the issue, see Moore, Conflict of Jurisdiction, 23 La.L.Rev. 29 (1962). The problem is bound up with questions of federalism, jurisdiction, and conflicts of laws. Consider the different situations when the question might arise:

(a) A federal court is asked to enjoin parties from proceeding in a state court action. See Pennzoil Co. v. Texaco, Inc., 481 U.S. 1, 107 S.Ct. 1519, 95 L.Ed.2d 1 (1987); Huffman v. Pursue, Ltd., 420 U.S. 592, 95 S.Ct. 1200, 43 L.Ed.2d 482 (1975); Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 91 S.Ct. 746, 27 L.Ed.2d 669 (1971).

1193

(b) A state court is asked to enjoin parties from proceeding in a federal court action or the court of a sister state. See Donovan v. City of Dallas, 377 U.S. 408, 84 S.Ct. 1579, 12 L.Ed.2d 409 (1964).

(c) A federal court is asked to enjoin a party from prosecuting a similar action in a foreign country. See Parrish, Duplicative Foreign Litigation, 78 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 237 (2010).

3.RECEIVERSHIP

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 66 in the Supplement.

Federal Rule 66 governs the appointment of receivers in the federal courts. Section 959(b) of Title 28 of the United States Code defines the receiver’s substantive rights, duties, and liabilities. The Supreme Court has never addressed whether federal or state law governs the appointment of a receiver when the district court’s jurisdiction is based on diversity. Those circuits that have considered the issue have held that federal law governs, and that “regardless of whether state law provides a vehicle by which to appoint a receiver, the federal courts are free to provide that remedy solely by virtue of their equitable powers.” Canada Life Assurance Co. v. LaPeter, 563 F.3d 837, 843 (9th Cir. 2009).

Historically, equity courts appointed receivers to manage property that plaintiff feared would be squandered, destroyed, or otherwise diminished in value during the course of litigation. A number of factors influence the court’s decision to appoint a receiver, including the existence of a valid claim by the applicant; the probability that fraudulent conduct has occurred or will occur and frustrate the claim; imminent danger that property will be concealed; and inadequacy of legal remedies. See Aviation Supply Corp. v. R.S.B.I. Aerospace, Inc., 999 F.2d 314 (8th Cir. 1993). Although no factor is dispositive, defendant’s actual or potential insolvency is usually the primary reason for the appointment. See Resolution Trust Corp. v. Fountain Circle Assocs., 799 F.Supp. 48 (N.D. Ohio 1992).

Receiverships usually extend only to property actually involved in the litigation. Additionally, in most states, only plaintiffs can secure the appointment. New York, however, gives its courts the power to appoint a receiver upon the motion of any person having an “apparent interest” in the property. N.Y.C.P.L.R. 6401.

1194

A receiver’s primary allegiance is to the court and not to the parties who have sought the appointment. See Jacynicz v. 73 Seaman Assocs., 270 A.D.2d 83, 704 N.Y.S.2d 68 (1st Dep’t 2000). For this reason, almost all of the receiver’s official acts are subject to approval by the appointing court. The receiver also is required to execute and file an undertaking before any official duties are initiated. The undertaking protects the integrity of the court and the litigants by guaranteeing that injuries caused by any defalcation by the receiver can be indemnified.

The basic obligation of a receiver is to preserve and protect the property and assets of the estate that have been placed in the receiver’s custody. The receiver is not given title to the property, but generally is responsible for managing or disposing of the property and has power to take any action necessary to maintain or improve it. See City of Santa Monica v. Gonzalez, 43 Cal.4th 905, 182 P.3d 1027, 76 Cal.Rptr.3d 483 (2008) (a receiver, who was appointed to oversee residential rental properties that presented serious health and safety violations, had the power, among others, to rehabilitate or demolish the property).

NOTE AND QUESTION

NETSPHERE, INC. v. BARON, 703 F.3d 296 (5th Cir. 2012), cert. denied, 574 U.S. 974, 135 S.Ct. 436, 190 L.Ed.2d 327 (2014), was a chapter in a long and unruly litigation about the ownership and sale of Internet domain names. In the course of the litigation, defendant declared bankruptcy and hired and fired more than 45 attorneys. Eventually a settlement agreement was reached that would apportion ownership of the domain names. During one of the final settlement hearings, defendant’s former lawyers presented evidence that he was attempting to hide money in order to avoid paying outstanding legal bills and they sought appointment of a receiver. The district court granted the motion, on the view that defendant’s continued practice of hiring and firing lawyers would “expose the bankruptcy estate to additional administrative claims and further delay resolution of the bankruptcy proceedings.” Id. at 304. On appeal the Fifth Circuit reversed the appointment, holding that a court lacks authority to appoint a receiver over property unrelated to the underlying litigation:

There certainly was evidence that Baron’s actions were disrupting, complicating, and making more expensive both the bankruptcy and the district court suit. We do not, though, find evidence that Baron was threatening to nullify the global settlement agreement by transferring domain names outside the court’s jurisdiction. Accordingly, the receivership cannot be justified in this instance on the basis that it was needed to take control of the property that was the subject of the litigation. Rather, the receivership was established to pay the attorneys and to control vexatious litigation.

Id. at 38. What other procedures could the district court have used to control its docket?

4.CIVIL ARREST

The provisional remedy of civil arrest traces back to the writ of capias ad respondendum, which allowed arrest of the debtor to prevent flight or concealment of assets. See p. 100, Note 1, supra. Imprisonment was permitted until judgment was rendered or bail was posted. Although incarceration effectively prevented defendant from rendering the potential judgment unenforceable, its Draconian quality made it a frequent source of abuse. See Freedman, Imprisonment for Debt, 2 Temple L.Q. 330 (1928); see also Morris & Wiener, Civil Arrest: A Medieval Anachronism, 43 Brooklyn L.Rev. 383 (1976).

The current availability of civil arrest as a preliminary remedy varies from state-to-state. Some state constitutions prohibit imprisonment for debt and render civil arrest unavailable; other states have not enacted legislation authorizing the remedy although its use is not barred by the state constitution. In still other states, the constitutional bar on imprisonment for debt does not apply to imprisonment as a provisional remedy. See Appendix, State Bans on Debtors’ Prisons and Criminal Justice Debt, 129 Harv.L.Rev.F. 153 (2016) (collecting state constitutional provisions). For a discussion of the due process implications of civil arrest, see In re Harris, 69 Cal.2d 486, 72 Cal.Rptr. 340, 446 P.2d 148 (1968). Since Harris, California has restricted the use of civil arrest. See Cal. Civ. Proc. Code § 501 (1995).

Some states that authorize civil arrest also provide for exemptions to limit the remedy’s application. States granting immunity from service of process to nonresident witnesses generally extend that immunity to cover civil arrest. Traditionally, women were exempt from civil arrest in many states. In 1976, New York modified its statute by deleting the word “women” and substituting the language “parent, guardian or other person * * * whose principal responsibility is * * * the daily care and supervision of [a child under sixteen or an incompetent of any age] * * *.” New York abolished civil arrest in 1979.

NOTES

1.The question whether state law enforcement officers may effect civil arrest has become a central issue in the federal government’s enforcement of civil immigration laws. E.g., Executive Order No. 13,767, 82 Fed. Reg. 8,793 (Jan. 25, 2017), revoked by Executive Order No. 14,010, 86 Fed. Reg. 8,267 (Feb. 2, 2021); Executive Order No. 13,768, 82 Fed. Reg. 8,799 (Jan. 25, 2017), revoked by Executive Order No. 13,993, 86 Fed. Reg. 7,051 (Jan. 20, 2021). In LUNN v. COMMONWEALTH, 477 Mass. 517, 8 N.E.3d 1143 (2017), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court held that state law enforcement officers lack authority to make a civil arrest pursuant to a federal civil immigration detainer:

[T]he common law and the statutes of this Commonwealth are what establish and limit the power of Massachusetts officers to arrest. There is no history of “implicit” or “inherent” arrest authority having been recognized in Massachusetts that is greater than what is recognized by our common law and the enactments of our Legislature. Where neither our common law nor any of our statutes recognizes the power to arrest for Federal civil immigration offenses, we should be chary about reading our law’s silence as a basis for affirmatively recognizing a new power to arrest—without the protections afforded to other arrestees under Massachusetts law—under the amorphous rubric of “implicit” or “inherent” authority. Recognizing a new common-law power to effect a Federal civil immigration arrest would also create an anomaly in our common law: a State or local police officer in Massachusetts (or, as in this case, a court officer) would be able to effect a warrantless arrest for a criminal misdemeanor only if it involves a breach of the peace * * *, but would be able to arrest for a Federal civil matter without any such limitation; in other words, the officer would have greater authority to arrest for a Federal civil matter than for a State criminal offense.

Id. at 532, 8 N.E.3d at 1158. See Recent Case, 131 Harv.L.Rev. 666 (2017).

2. Many localities derive revenue from fees and fines imposed for regulatory infractions such as littering or traffic violations. See, e.g., Mai & Rafael, The High Price of Using Justice Fines and Fees to Fund Government in New York (Vera Institute of Justice 2020), available at https:// www.vera.org/ downloads/ publications/ the-high-price-of-using-justice-fines-and-fees-new-york.pdf (site last accessed Dec. 30, 2021). These fees and fines, if unpaid, can lead to civil detention. Has this practice effectively reestablished a new form of debtor’s prison? See Fagan & Ash, New Policing, New Segregation: From Ferguson to New York, 10 Geo.L.J. Online 33 (2017). Civil detention also has reemerged as a penalty in ordinary debt collection cases. See Note, State Bans on Debtors’ Prisons and Criminal Justice Debt, 129 Harv.L.Rev. 1024 (2016).

5.NOTICE OF PENDENCY

Although not strictly a provisional remedy, the notice of pendency is included in this discussion because of its similarity to the other provisional remedies already described. Notice of pendency traces back to the common law doctrine of lis pendens, which sought to guarantee the effectiveness of a judgment in an action involving specific tangible property by charging any purchaser or encumbrancer of the property with knowledge that an action involving it had been instituted. Thus, the prospective purchaser or encumbrancer not only had to check all of the conveyance records to be certain of the vendor’s good title but also had to investigate whether the vendor was involved in any pending litigation that might affect the property—often a practical impossibility. The statutory notice of pendency is designed to protect prospective purchasers and encumbrancers by requiring plaintiff to file a notice of the litigation before the protection of constructive notice can be claimed. Thus, if plaintiff fails to file a notice of pendency and properly index it, she will not be protected against a purchaser or encumbrancer who does not have actual knowledge of the litigation involving the property. Statutory notice of pendency differs from other provisional remedies because it usually does not involve judicial discretion; the right to file a notice is absolute in any litigation falling within the classes enumerated in the notice-of-pendency statute.

1197

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

How can the lis pendens procedure be justified in light of the cases discussed pp. 1186–1188, supra, which invalidated statutes providing for the attachment of defendant’s property without probable cause or a hearing? Is it significant that the notice of pendency does not deprive anyone of the use or enjoyment of property, but merely gives notice to third parties of the pendency of litigation? Isn’t it possible that the filing of the notice will exert financial pressure on the owner of property by rendering the property “unmarketable and unsuitable as security for a loan”? Kirkeby v. Superior Court of Orange County, 33 Cal.4th 642, 651, 15 Cal.Rptr.3d 805, 811, 93 P.3d 395, 401 (Sup. Ct. 2004) (internal citations omitted). Compare Kukanskis v. Griffith, 180 Conn. 501, 430 A.2d 21 (1980) (finding Connecticut’s lis pendens statute violative of due process requirements because it failed to provide for a hearing) and New Destiny Dev. Corp. v. Piccione, 802 F.Supp. 692 (D. Conn. 1992) (reaffirming the constitutionality of Connecticut’s amended lis pendens statute by distinguishing the limited holding of Doehr, p. 286, supra), with Chrysler Corp. v. Fedders Corp., 670 F.2d 1316 (3d Cir. 1982) (upholding New Jersey’s lis pendens statute because of procedural safeguards that limit the risk of erroneous deprivation of property) and Diaz v. Paterson, 547 F.3d 88 (2d Cir. 2008) (upholding the constitutionality of New York’s lis pendens statute because of its narrow application to pre-existing claims affecting the property and its provisions for post-deprivation notice and hearing).

6.A POSTSCRIPT

Despite the obvious practical importance of provisional remedies to the proper functioning of a judicial system, little effort has been devoted to their rationalization and integration into the total procedural picture. Indeed, many practitioners are ill-informed as to the availability and operation of provisional remedies in their jurisdiction and often miss an opportunity to protect their clients against debilitating and frustrating post-judgment enforcement procedures. Do you agree that the Federal Rules should rely exclusively on state provisional remedy practice? In what way does the availability of post-judgment enforcement affect the design of preliminary remedies?

1198

C. METHODS OF COLLECTING AND ENFORCING THE JUDGMENT

1.EXECUTION

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 69 and 70 in the Supplement.

GRIGGS V. MILLER

Supreme Court of Missouri, 1963.
374 S.W.2d 119.

BOHLING, SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

Bill Griggs, on January 19, 1961, sued W. A. Brookshire in ejectment for the possession of a 322 acre farm in Boone County, Missouri, and for damages for withholding possession. Plaintiff had purchased the farm for $20,600 on January 16, 1961, at a public sale under a general execution against defendant. * * * Defendant’s answer was a general denial, and his counterclaim sought to set aside the sheriff’s execution sale and deed. * * * The cause was considered and treated by the parties and the court “as one of ‘equitable cognizance.’ ” The court found the issues for the plaintiff and against the defendant on plaintiff’s petition; for the plaintiff and the third-party defendant [the sheriff] on defendant’s counterclaim; and that plaintiff was entitled to $2,483.24 damages by reason of defendant’s withholding of possession of said farm from January 18, 1961, to November 15, 1961, the date of said judgment and decree, and that plaintiff recover $250 per month from and after November 15, 1961, for so long as defendant withheld possession from plaintiff. Defendant Brookshire, after filing his notice of appeal, was incarcerated in the Missouri Penitentiary. * * * Miller was appointed trustee of the Estate of W. A. Brookshire, and substituted as a party litigant for said Brookshire.

* * *

Ray Crouch recovered a judgment against W. A. Brookshire, defendant, in the Circuit Court of Henry County, Missouri, on July 15, 1959, for $1,966.69. Said judgment was affirmed on December 5, 1960 * * *. The right to an execution follows immediately upon the rendition of a judgment. * * * No supersedeas bond was given to stay an execution. * * * A general execution was issued on said judgment to the Sheriff of Boone County on December 10, 1960. The Sheriff levied on defendant's 322 acre farm December 14, 1960, filed a notice of his levy in the office of the Recorder of Deeds of Boone County, and advertised and sold said real estate at public sale on January 16, 1961.

1199

Dorothy Contestible, Administratrix of the Estate of Ralph Burton Collings, Deceased, recovered a judgment of $17,000 against William Albert Brookshire, defendant, in a wrongful death action in the Circuit Court of Audrain County, Missouri, on July 29, 1960. A general execution issued on said $17,000 judgment to the Sheriff of Boone County on December 23, 1960. This execution was mailed to Mrs. Contestible's attorneys in Columbia and was delivered to Sheriff Powell January 10, 1961. He levied upon defendant's 322 acres under said execution on January 11, 1961.

Defendant contends it was error to sell his 322 acre farm without attempting to make the judgment debt, interest and costs out of a portion of said farm.

* * *

[A] judgment debtor is to be afforded reasonable protection in levying on and selling his property under execution. Civil Rule 76.21 (§ 513.095) [amended in 1993 and recodified as 31 Mo. Prac., Civil Rules Handbook Rule 76.11 (2004 ed.)], provides in effect that if a judgment debtor gives the officer a list of his property sufficient to satisfy the execution, "the officer shall levy upon the property and, no other, if in his opinion it is sufficient; if not, then upon such additional property as shall be sufficient."

Civil Rule 76.24 (§ 513.210) [recodified as 31 Mo. Prac., Civil Rules Handbook Rule 76.12 (2004 ed.)] provides: "When an execution shall be levied upon real estate, the officer levying the same shall divide such property, if susceptible of division, and sell so much thereof as will be sufficient to satisfy such execution, unless the debtor in the execution shall desire the whole of any tract or lot of land to be sold together, in which case it shall be sold accordingly."

And Rule 76.25 (§ 513.100) provides: "The person whose goods, chattels and real estate are taken in execution may elect what part thereof shall be first sold; and if he shall deliver to the officer having charge thereof a statement, in writing, of such election, three days before the day appointed for the sale, stating specifically what goods, chattels and real estate he desires to be first sold, and so on, until the execution be satisfied, the officer shall proceed according to such election, until sufficient money shall be made to satisfy the amount in the execution specified and costs."

It is stated in 21 Am.Jur., Execution, § 380, that an execution is not "leviable upon all the debtor's property, but only upon sufficient property owned by the debtor within the jurisdiction to satisfy the debt, interest, and costs"; and, while the officer is left to his own judgment, he "must exercise the care and discretion which a reasonably prudent man would exercise under like conditions and circumstances." And, with respect to the property to be sold when more than enough to satisfy the debt is seized, it is stated in § 384: "The general rule is that the execution officer may make a division of the property, if that is practicable, and sell only so much of it as is necessary to satisfy the debt." * * * A failure to divide real estate and sell only enough to satisfy the execution [has been] considered an abuse of discretion * * * and a constructive fraud * * *.

1200

* * *

Defendant wrote Sheriff Powell under date of January 11, 1961, re the Crouch judgment, levy and sale, stating, among other things, that his land was worth in excess of $100 an acre; and: "I am restricting the amount which you can sell to the northeast 40 acres of said tract of land. This land is clear. There is no mortgage or encumbrance of any kind against it."

Defendant protested the execution sale to those assembled for the sale and stated in effect that the judgment involved had been obtained in Henry County and the case was on appeal and the judgment was not final; that: "After the judgment becomes final it will be paid"; that Crouch had in his possession cattle belonging to defendant worth $10,000 against which there was no lien; that "I have notified the sheriff that this farm is clear of any mortgages whatsoever; that it is worth approximately $50,000.00; that one forty acre sold would be more than adequate. I have pointed out the forty acres * * * to be sold"; that he was certain the $17,000 judgment against him in the Contestible case would be reversed; that a supersedeas bond would be given; that this sale would be illegal and whoever bought the farm would buy a law suit. (The Contestible judgment, however, was affirmed January 8, 1962, in Contestible v. Brookshire, Mo., 355 S.W.2d 36.)

Sheriff Powell, who had been sheriff for about twenty years, admitted 40 acres of defendant's farm "might have been" worth far in excess of $2,000. Asked why he had not told defendant the 40 acres would not be sufficient, he would take 80 acres, Sheriff Powell answered: "I didn't intend to take 80 acres." He testified he had levied on and held three or four execution sales of defendant's 322 acre farm. He stated he did not know it was illegal to sell $50,000 worth of property to satisfy a $2,000 judgment; and there was testimony he had levied on the 322 acres to collect a $13.00 judgment, and to collect a $600 judgment. He stated "I checked the record and there was several thousand dollars” against all of the farm, and that is why “I levied on all of it.” He also stated “I never checked the records.” He did not levy on personal property because “It was much easier to do it this way.” He knew defendant had stocks in various corporations and had more than 200 head of Hereford cattle on the farm; that they might have sold for at least $200 a head on the market and as registered cattle would have brought more, and that 20 head of the cattle “might have” been sufficient to more than pay the Crouch judgment, interest and costs.

1201

Ray Crouch, the judgment creditor, testified he wanted to and asked his attorney to levy on defendant’s farm, and that he knew defendant had collateral * * * to take care of the Crouch judgment. Sheriff Powell testified that Crouch had told him defendant had deposited sufficient collateral with the Hartford Insurance Company to take care of the Crouch judgment.

* * *

A sheriff conducting an execution sale is the agent of the property owner and the judgment creditor, and his duty is to protect the interests of both and to see that the property is not sacrificed. * * * Forced sales of property usually do not bring full value.

Sheriff Powell’s advertisement of the sale of defendant’s 322 acre farm was to “sell all of said real estate or as much thereof as it be necessary to pay the judgment of $1,966.69,” in the Henry County Circuit Court, which, with interest and costs, amounted to $2,308.16 on the day of sale.

Defendant’s farm was never advertised for sale under the Audrain County (Contestible) execution. Defendant first knew of the levy on his farm under the $17,000 Audrain County judgment about 30 minutes before its sale under the Crouch judgment. Sheriff Powell testified that he sold under the Henry County, and not under the Audrain County, execution.

Defendant’s 322 acres was not divided for the purpose of selling but was sold as a whole to plaintiff for $20,600.00. The only bidders were Ed Orr, one of the attorneys for Mrs. Contestible, and Ralph Alexander, a bondsman and attorney for the sheriff. Plaintiff Griggs testified he heard the farm would bring enough to satisfy the two judgments about 15 or 20 minutes before the sale; that about 5 or 10 minutes before it was sold he decided to buy it because “it didn’t bring any more than it did,” and that he asked Mr. Alexander to bid for him. * * *

It is not questioned but that this 322 acre farm, consisting of approximately eight forties, could have been offered for sale in parcels. Rule 76.24 (§ 513.210) contemplates that the officer “divide such property, if susceptible of division, and sell so much thereof as will be sufficient to satisfy such execution.” This was not done, and we hold that it should have been so divided. In Brookshire v. Powell, Mo., 335 S.W.2d 176, 181, the disparity between the market value of this farm and a bid of $2,300 was considered so great as to require setting aside that execution sale and sheriff’s deed. In the case at bar the Henry County judgment, interest and costs amounted to $2,308.16; and for that amount under said execution and the constructive levy of the Audrain County execution, but without an advertisement for sale under Rule 76.36, supra, under said Audrain County execution, it is sought to justify this forced sale for $20,600 of property valued at about $46,000. This record calls for the result reached in Brookshire v. Powell * * *.

1202

Defendant is entitled to relief upon doing equity. * * * Accordingly, if defendant will, within thirty days, deposit in this court, for the use and benefit of those entitled thereto, the sum of $20,600 with interest at the rate of 6% per annum from the date of sale until the same is paid, the decree appealed from will be reversed and the cause remanded with directions to cancel the sheriff’s sale and the sheriff’s deed to plaintiff made pursuant thereto; otherwise the decree will stand affirmed. In either event the costs are assessed against the estate of defendant Brookshire.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion by BOHLING, Special Commissioner, is adopted as the opinion of the court.
All of the Judges concur.
[The court’s opinion on a motion to modify and for a rehearing and the court’s supplemental opinion are omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The writ of execution is the traditional method of enforcing a money judgment and it applies to both personal and real property. Essentially, the writ is a court order to an official to seize the judgment debtor’s property, to sell it, and to give the proceeds to the judgment creditor. See Wood, Short Circuiting the Justice System: How Defendants are Misusing Writs of Execution, 39 Pepp.L.Rev. 747 (2012). Various factors tend to influence the effectiveness of the device, including: the territorial reach of an execution; the order in which various types of property are levied upon and sold by the officer to whom the execution is delivered; and the determination of priorities as between competing executions.
2. Federal Rule 69 governs the execution of a money judgment entered by a federal court. The rule is applied in accord with the procedure of the state in which the district court sits, but federal courts have authority to devise additional procedures when needed. See Hankins v. Finnel, 964 F.2d 853, 860 (8th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 1013, 113 S.Ct. 635, 121 L.Ed.2d 566 (1992) (“Where state law fails to supply the necessary procedure, or actually stands in the way of enforcement, the district court may take the necessary steps to ensure compliance with its judgment.”). Rule 69(a)(2) expressly permits, in aid of execution, discovery from “any person” as provided by the Federal Rules or the procedure of the state where the court is located. “It is not uncommon to seek asset discovery from third parties, including banks, that possess information pertaining to the judgment debtor’s assets.” EM Ltd. v. Republic of Argentina, 695 F.3d 201, 207 (2d Cir. 2012), aff’d sub nom. Republic of Argentina v. NML Cap., Ltd., 573 U.S. 134, 134 S.Ct. 2250, 189 L.Ed.2d 234 (2014).

1203

3.How does Federal Rule 69 differ from Federal Rule 70? Which rule will be used to enforce a judgment seeking an award of money damages? An order of specific performance?

4.State laws exempt a variety of real and personal property from execution. Although these state laws differ in their details, they seek to prevent debtors from concealing or shielding their assets, while also promoting family stability and avoiding indigency and the need for public assistance. See Morantz, There’s No Place Like Home: Homestead Exemption and Judicial Constructions of Family in Nineteenth-Century America, 24 L. & Hist.Rev. 245 (2006) (setting out history of the exemption). Exempt property typically is defined by dollar amount and type of property, both of which vary greatly from state-to-state. Perhaps the most important exemption is for the “homestead,” which usually includes the family home and the property on which it is located. All states other than New Jersey and Pennsylvania currently protect the homestead from judgment liens. See Breitenstein, The Ideal Homestead Exemption: Avoiding Asset Conversion and Fraud but Still Protecting Dependents, 58 Drake L.Rev. 1121, 1124 n.14 (2010) (collecting state laws).

5.Garnishment can be used post-judgment to attach intangible property such as a bank account. The federal Consumer Credit Protection Act of 1968, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1671–77, sets a cap that is applicable nationwide on the portion of an employee’s disposable earnings that can be subject to garnishment and also protects an employee from being fired because of a garnishment on wages. In addition, the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act of 2003 extends temporary protection against garnishment to individuals in military service, although it does not ban garnishment of military wages. See 50 U.S.C. § 3934; see also 32 C.F.R. Parts 112 and 113 (procedures relating to “involuntary allotment” of military pay).

Additional protections against garnishment appear in different state laws. See Hynes, Credit Markets, Exemptions, and Households with Nothing to Exempt, 7 Theoretical Inquiries L. 493 (2006). However, in some states, the wage exemption from garnishment is lost once the funds are deposited in a bank account. See Walker, Wyoming’s Statutory Exemption on Wage Garnishment: Should It Include Deposited Wages?, 6 Wyo.L.Rev. 53 (2006). Federal law also exempts specified government benefits from garnishment by creditors, and special rules are intended to protect such assets from garnishment even when they have been deposited in bank accounts. See Garnishment of Accounts Containing Federal Benefit payments, 31 C.F.R. Part 212 (2013).

6.The federal government has played an increasingly important role in the enforcement of court-ordered child support, typically owed by the noncustodial parent. See Swank, The National Child Non-Support Epidemic, 2003 Mich. St. DCL L.Rev. 357. In 1950, the federal government entered the field of child support enforcement. See id. That same year, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws adopted the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act to reduce the cost of enforcement. The Act was amended in 1968, and, in 1992, it was replaced by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act, 9 U.L.A. 229 (1993). Since 1975, the federal government has required every state to adopt laws aimed at increasing unpaid child support as a condition for receiving federal funds for public assistance. See Cammett, Deadbeats, Deadbrokees, and Prisoners, 18 Geo. J. on Poverty L. & Pol’y 127 (2011).

1204

7.What if a federal judgment is rendered in one judicial district, but defendant’s assets are located in another district? Under 28 U.S.C. § 1963, the judgment may be registered in any other district by filing a certified copy with that district. It then may be enforced in the same manner as any judgment of the court in which it is registered. A 1988 amendment to the statute provides for the registration of a judgment even before it becomes final “when ordered by the court that entered the judgment for good cause shown.” Good cause has been shown when there is an “absence of assets in the judgment forum, coupled with the presence of substantial assets in the registration forum.” Columbia Pictures Television, Inc. v. Krypton Broadcasting of Birmingham, Inc., 259 F.3d 1186, 1197–98 (9th Cir. 2001). The Supreme Court has not addressed whether a judgment entered in one federal court and registered in another federal court under 28 U.S.C. § 1963 may be registered and enforced by a third federal court. E.g., Fidelity National Financial, Inc. v. Friedman, 803 F.3d 999 (9th Cir. 2015) (as matter of first impression, registration of money judgment, rendered in another district, has same effect as creating a new judgment issued by registering court); Del Prado v. B.N. Development Co., Inc., 602 F.3d 660 (5th Cir. 2010) (registered judgment could be registered in another district).

8.Federal Rule 62(b)(4) permits the district court to stay the execution of a judgment or any proceedings to enforce it when the judgment debtor has sought relief from the judgment or order under Federal Rule 60. Courts have required the party seeking a stay to post a bond to protect the judgment creditor’s interest. See Zurich American Insurance Co. v. Staffing Concepts National Inc., 2017 WL 4518662 (M.D. Fla. 2017). How should Rule 62(b)(4) operate when the judgment is entered by default? See Panoff, Debtors, Creditors, Default Judgments, & Discretion: Why Rule 62(b)(4) Will Become One of the Most Important Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 44 Creighton L.Rev. 227 (2010).

9. The enforcement of judgments rendered by a foreign court is a question of increasing importance given the global nature of commercial relations. The United States has not yet entered into any treaty with other nations dealing with the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments. How does the question of whether a federal or state court in the United States ought to enforce a foreign judgment differ from enforcement of the court’s own decree?

2.SUPPLEMENTARY PROCEEDINGS

The supplementary proceeding is an in personam remedy that requires the debtor to turn over money or property directly to the creditor. Supplementary proceedings are variously known as turnover orders, debtor’s examinations, proceedings in aid of execution, and citations to discover assets. They are now largely statutory and vary from state to state, but typically combine discovery with collection and can reach “equitable assets” that may be beyond execution and property that has been concealed and transferred. As discussed in the next section, court orders in a supplementary proceeding may be enforced by contempt, which can involve civil confinement of the judgment debtor.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Should supplementary proceedings be treated as a separate action or merely as an adjunct to the action in which the judgment was recovered? Should federal or state law control the answer? See Jackson-Platts v. General Electric Capital Corp., 727 F.3d 1127 (11th Cir. 2013).
2. Suppose A recovers a judgment from B and during supplementary proceedings B claims that C is in possession of property belonging to B. When A attempts to have the property applied to the judgment, C contests B’s interest. How is the dispute between B and C as to the ownership of the property to be determined? If the supplementary proceeding is under the control of a judge, can the court determine the dispute between B and C and, if it finds in B’s favor, apply the property to the satisfaction of A’s judgment? What objections are there to the judge making such a determination? Compare Letz v. Letz, 123 Mont. 494, 215 P.2d 534 (1950), with Exceletech, Inc. v. Williams, 597 So.2d 275 (Fla. 1992).
3. In NORTHERN MARIANA ISLANDS v. CANADIAN IMPERIAL BANK OF COMMERCE, 693 F.3d 274 (2d Cir. 2012), the court considered whether a turnover order may be issued under New York law to an entity that does not have actual custody of the debtor’s assets, but whose subsidiary might have custody of such assets. Finding that the answer turned on unresolved issues of state law, the Second Circuit certified the question to the New York Court of Appeals for clarification. Upon answer, 21 N.Y.3d 55, 967 N.Y.S.2d 876, 990 N.E.2d 114 (2013), the Second Circuit held that the turnover order could not be issued to the bank because it lacked actual possession or custody of the judgment debtor’s assets. 717 F.3d 266 (2d Cir. 2013).

3.CONTEMPT AND BODY EXECUTION

REEVES v. CROWNSHIELD
Court of Appeals of New York, 1937.
274 N.Y. 74, 8 N.E.2d 283.

FINCH, JUDGE.

The uncollectibility of money judgments has ever been a subject of concern to bench and bar. A large part of the statute law of this state is designed to enable a judgment creditor to obtain satisfaction upon his money judgment. That a large percentage of these money judgments have remained uncollectible has been confirmed by statistical surveys. Johns Hopkins University Institute of Law, Survey of Litigation in New York (1931). Many debtors who were in a position to pay have evaded their legal obligations by unlawful and technical means. Discontent with this situation resulted in agitation for reform in collection procedure. * * * Finally, in 1935, upon the recommendation of the Judicial Council, a law was enacted creating a new mode of enforcing the payment of judgments. * * *

Section 793 of the Civil Practice Act [currently N.Y.C.P.L.R. 5226] now provides that, in addition to the garnishee provisions of the old law, the court may make an order directing a judgment debtor to make payments in installments out of the income which he receives. Such orders must be made upon notice to the judgment debtor and after he has had an opportunity to show inability to pay, and with due regard to the reasonable requirements of the judgment debtor and his family, as well as of payments required to be made by him to other creditors. Section 801 of the Civil Practice Act [now found in N.Y.C.P.L.R. 5251] provides that refusal to pay after such an order of the court is punishable as a contempt. * * *

This new procedure was invoked against the appellant, in an attempt to collect a judgment for approximately $400. The examination in supplementary proceedings disclosed that he was employed by the Federal Government as a steamship inspector at a salary of $230 per month, less a small pension deduction. He has no children, and the whereabouts of his wife are unknown. Aside from $48 a month paid as rent and his living expenses, he has no financial obligations. The court ordered the appellant to pay installments of $20 per month until the judgment was satisfied. Upon his failure to pay, he was held in contempt and fined the sum of $20, commitment being provided for in default of payment.

An appeal was taken directly to this court from the City Court of New York City on the ground that a constitutional question was involved.

* * *

The judgment debtor challenges the constitutionality of section 793 and section 801 on the ground that in effect they provide for imprisonment for debt. It is admitted that neither the State nor the Federal Constitutions contain provisions expressly prohibiting imprisonment for debt, and that the statutory provision forbidding imprisonment for debt found in section 21 of the New York Civil Rights Law excepts cases otherwise specially prescribed by law. It is asserted, however, that imprisonment for debt is barred by the due process clauses of the State and Federal Constitutions (Const.N.Y. art. 1, § 6; Const.U.S. Amend. 14). No cases so holding are cited * * *. Whatever doubt there may exist as to whether imprisonment for debt without regard to ability to pay may be treated as a deprivation of liberty without due process of law * * *, there can be no doubt that imprisonment for failure to obey an order of a court to make payment out of income, which order is made with due regard to the needs of the debtor and his family, is not violative of the due process clause.

1207

* * *

In the case at bar the judgment debtor has not complained that the order directing the payment of $20 per month is unjust, inequitable, or harsh. His position is an arbitrary refusal to pay. It is based upon the ground that the courts are powerless to compel him to pay out of his income an amount fixed after deducting the sum necessary for his reasonable needs.

The Legislature has seen fit to provide a creditor with a direct remedy for the collection of his just debts. A refusal to recognize such an order by the judgment debtor entitles the creditor to move to have him punished for contempt. Without this right, there would be no power in the court to enforce its order. To compel the judgment debtor to obey the order of the court is not imprisonment for debt, but only imprisonment for disobedience of an order with which he is able to comply. His refusal is contumacious conduct, the same as a refusal to obey any other lawful order of the court.

It also is asserted that the application of this law to the appellant is unconstitutional, since it interferes with the operation of a federal instrumentality. To sustain this contention, reference is made to the cases declaring State laws taxing the salaries of federal officers unconstitutional. * * * Analysis shows that these cases are not in point. The true basis for declaring a state tax on the salaries of federal officers unconstitutional is that since the Federal Government presumably finds it necessary to pay its officers a salary based upon the value of their services, the state should not be permitted to tax the salaries thereby reducing the compensation and making it necessary for the Federal Government to increase the salaries paid by it.

* * *

It is true that the wages of a federal employee cannot be garnisheed, but once his wage has been paid to him a state is not prohibited from ordering him to apply a portion of such income towards the payment of his just debts. The moment the salary is received it becomes a part of the general income of the owner. If he should therewith purchase property the property could be taken under execution for the payment of a judgment against the owner. No reason appears for exempting the income while still held as money and not exempting it when it has been converted into property. * * *

* * *

1208

Orders affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The history of body execution is set forth in KINSEY v. PREESON, 746 P.2d 542 (Colo. 1987), in which the Supreme Court of Colorado invalidated the procedure as violating equal protection under the state constitution:

The origins of body execution are ancient and the concept of imprisonment for debt was long a part of our legal history. R. Ford, Imprisonment for Debt, 25 Mich.L.Rev. 24 (1926). The practice of imprisoning debtors had its antecedent in Roman law and continued throughout the evolution of the common law. In colonial America, the law corresponded with the law of England in the matter of civil arrest, so much so that in some states three to five times the number of persons were imprisoned for debt as for crime. Id. at 28–29. Reform came in the guise of constitutional and statutory provisions which limited or entirely prohibited imprisonment for debt, and were enacted by the states individually. * * * Some states have no constitutional provisions on the subject, but have enacted statutory limitations, while other states have constitutional provisions to restrict imprisonment for debt. * * * The United States Constitution provides no express provision against imprisonment for debt, but federal courts are required to follow the law of the state in which they sit. See 28 U.S.C. § 2007 (1982).

Body execution statutes are not uniform, but most authorize a body execution whenever a defendant is found guilty of some kind of wrongdoing, such as committing a fraud, or tort, or misconduct in public office or professional employment, or embezzlement or conversion of the plaintiff’s property, or where the defendant is about to abscond. * * * The intent of prohibitions against imprisonment for debt is to exempt from imprisonment the honest debtor who is poor, and unable to pay his or her debts. * * *

Id. at 546.

Is there any rationale for permitting body execution of a debtor who has not concealed or dissipated assets or otherwise engaged in fraud? In this situation is the procedure a means of judgment execution or a form of punishment? The Colorado court concluded that “jailing the indigent debtor defeats the purpose of obtaining payment for the judgment creditor by precluding gainful employment during the period of incarceration.” Id. at 550. Finding that the state’s body execution statute did not rationally distinguish defendants on the basis of their ability to pay, it invalidated the law as a violation of equal protection:

The purpose of the body execution statute, to coerce a judgment debtor into paying the judgment, cannot be effected against an indigent debtor. The only real effect of the body execution against an indigent debtor is that of punishment. Such a punishment can be avoided by a solvent debtor but becomes mandatory against an indigent debtor. Thus, the body execution statute is invidiously discriminatory and unconstitutional under the fourteenth amendment. Therefore, we reverse the award of execution against the body of the defendant.

1209

Id. at 549. Similarly, In GRIMES v. MILLER, 429 F.Supp. 1350 (M.D. N.C. 1977), affirmed, 434 U.S. 978, 98 S.Ct. 600, 54 L.Ed.2d 473 (1977), the North Carolina post-judgment body execution statute withstood a constitutional challenge because it required findings of fact sufficient to support the conclusion of probable cause that the debtor was about to flee or had concealed assets or that, unless immediately detained, debtor would do so, and that debtor, once imprisoned, was afforded a hearing within three days of the arrest or released subject to later imprisonment. See also Sobol, Fighting Fines & Fees, Borrowing from Consumer Law to Combat Criminal Justice Debt Abuses, 88 U.Colo.L.Rev. 841 (2017); Mitchell & Kunsch, Of Driver’s Licenses and Debtor’s Prison, 4 Seattle J. for Soc.Just. 439 (2005).

2. Writing a check on a bank account with insufficient funds can be criminally punished in every one of the 50 states, and some states impose strict liability so that the prosecutor does not need to prove intent to defraud. See Sanders, Jr., Time to Close the Collection Agency: Addressing the Abuse of Bad Check Laws, 2 Charleston L.Rev. 215, 217–218 (2007). Doesn’t this practice permit the state in some situations to imprison an individual for debt?

3. The Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, amended in 2006 and then again in 2010 by the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act, regulates the collection of consumer debts. The statute forbids a debt collector from representing or implying “that nonpayment of any debt will result in the arrest or imprisonment of any person or the seizure, garnishment, attachment, or sale of any property or wages of any person unless such action is lawful and the debt collector or creditor intends to take such action.” 15 U.S.C. § 1692e(4). However, it is permissible for a debt collector to file a criminal complaint that might lead to the arrest or imprisonment of the consumer.

4. Both body execution and civil contempt seek to coerce the recalcitrant or dilatory judgment debtor to meet obligations. In jurisdictions that have prohibited or severely limited body execution, should contempt be available to remedy nonpayment by an indigent defendant? See Shepard, Creditors’ Contempt, 2011 BYU L.Rev. 1509, 1545–46 (2011).

5. The Servicemembers Civil Relief Act, 50 U.S.C. §§ 3901–4043, provides financial protection to servicemembers while on active duty:

On December 19, 2003, Congress passed the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act to restate, clarify, and revise the Soldiers’ and Sailors’ Civil Relief Act of 1940. H.R. 100, 108th Cong. (2003). The codified purposes of the Act are to strengthen and expedite the national defense by permitting servicemembers to devote their energy to the defense needs of the Nation and “to provide for the temporary suspension of judicial administrative proceedings and transactions that may adversely affect the civil rights of servicemembers during their military service.” 50 U.S.C. Appx. § 502 [now found at 50 U.S.C. § 3902]. In interpreting the preceding act, the Supreme Court held that the “Act is always to be liberally construed to protect those who have been obliged to drop their own affairs to take up the burdens of the nation.” Boone v. Lightner, 319 U.S. 561, 575 (1943); see also Le Maistre v. Leffers, 333 U.S. 1, 6 (1948).

1210

Koenig v. Waukesha State Bank, 2006 WL 2334841 (E.D. Wis. 2006). As one court has explained,

The Act has become particularly important as our nation has increasingly relied on reservists to carry out military jobs that members of a standing army formerly would have handled. The armed forces often pluck reservists out of civilian life for indeterminate lengths of service, leaving the reservists’ various civil obligations unattended. The SCRA lessens the impact of reservists’ absence on their civilian life and obligations.

Newton v. Bank of McKenney, 2012 WL 1752407 (E.D. Va. 2012).

4.LIENS AND PRIORITIES

Lien and priority-of-lien problems are among the most complex in the law of judgment enforcement. The traditional “lien” situation involves the judgment creditor’s right to a particular piece of property as against the judgment debtor or someone claiming under the latter, such as an assignee or purchaser of the property. The judgment creditor’s rights against a transferee are based on the purchaser’s or assignee’s having actual or constructive notice of the creditor’s rights in the property.

Questions of priority of liens involve a dispute between two or more judgment creditors over the debtor’s property. As a general rule, the rights of one creditor vis-à-vis another are based on the equitable principle of “diligence,” which seeks to prevent a creditor from refraining from collecting a judgment while maintaining priority of lien. What factors should determine whether one judgment creditor is more “diligent” than another? Should it be sufficient for a judgment creditor to record the judgment (and thereby create a lien), or should the judgment creditor be required to pursue a writ of execution on the judgment? Some states may deviate from the common law diligence rule of “first in time, first in right” for priority of judgment liens depending on the nature of the debt to be collected or the nature of the property against which the lien is asserted. Compare, e.g., N.Y.C.P.L.R. 5234(b) (providing that “executions for child support shall have priority over any other assignment, levy or process”), with N.Y.C.P.L.R. 5203 (providing separate lien priorities against real property).

CHAPTER 16

APPELLATE REVIEW

■ ■ ■

This chapter considers appellate review on a number of levels. First, there is the question of timing. When can a litigant obtain review of a court order? Must the appellant await a final decision in the action or may the matter be reviewed at once? Second, there is the question of who may seek appellate review of a court decision. To what extent, for example, should a person who prevailed in a case be able to appeal the adverse determination of a specific issue, made along the way, that could have an impact on future cases? Also, should the right to appeal be limited to parties who originally litigated a case? Third, there is the question of the appellate court’s jurisdiction and the standard of review to be used. As you read these materials, consider how the availability of appellate review affects other aspects of the judicial proceeding, such as discovery, case management, and sanctions.

A. THE PRINCIPLE OF FINALITY

1.APPLICATION OF THE BASIC CONCEPT

Read 28 U.S.C. §§ 1291 and 1292 in the Supplement.

COOPER, EXTRAORDINARY WRIT PRACTICE IN CRIMINAL CASES: ANALOGIES FOR THE MILITARY COURTS, 98 F.R.D. 593, 594–96 (1983):

A truly final judgment is one that marks the completion of all the events that will occur in a trial court. Nothing more remains to be done, unless it be execution of a judgment against the defendant.

The advantages that may be gained by deferring appeals until entry of a truly final judgment are familiar, and can be summarized in short order. Immediate review of every ruling made by a trial court could not be tolerated. Repeated interruptions and delays could put the trial process beyond any reasonable control, even if appeals were taken only when there was a good faith and reasonable belief that the court was wrong. The opportunities for less honorable delay and harassment of an adversary also would not go entirely unexploited. More limited opportunities for interlocutory review would not be so disastrous, but would carry some part of the same costs. The possible advantages to be set against these costs arise from the opportunity to correct a wrong ruling. These advantages, however, are reduced by the prospects that most trial court rulings are correct; that wrong rulings often are corrected by the trial court; and that uncorrected wrong rulings will not, in the end, taint the final judgment.

The price that is paid for a final judgment rule, however, can be high. An erroneous ruling may taint everything that follows. If appeal must be delayed until final judgment, it may become necessary to repeat the entire trial proceeding. The costs of repeating the trial go beyond the obvious costs of expense and anxiety. The further proceedings will be held later, and may suffer from lapses of memory, inconsequential inconsistencies that are blown into exaggerated importance, and actual loss of evidence. Beyond these defects, the retrial proceedings often will be affected by lessons learned at the first trial. * * * The problem is more than one of boredom; strategies have been revealed and must be revised, opportunities to sustain truth by impeachment are diminished, and so on.

* * *

Beyond the impact on individual cases, loss of the opportunity for interlocutory review means that some areas of law must develop without much opportunity for appellate guidance. Questions of discovery, for example, may confuse and divide trial courts for years without the guidance and uniformity that appeals could provide.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

Respondents filed a complaint in the United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania in which they asserted that petitioner's employee insurance benefits and maternity leave regulations discriminated against women in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 * * *. The District Court ruled in favor of respondents on the issue of petitioner's liability under that Act, and petitioner appealed to the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. That court held that it had jurisdiction of petitioner's appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, and proceeded to affirm on the merits the judgment of the District Court. We granted certiorari * * * and heard argument on the merits. Though neither party has questioned the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals to entertain the appeal, we are obligated to do so on our own motion if a question thereto exists. * * *

1215

Respondents' complaint, after alleging jurisdiction and facts deemed pertinent to their claim, prayed for a judgment against petitioner embodying the following relief:

- (a)requiring that defendant establish non-discriminatory hiring, payment, opportunity, and promotional plans and programs;
- (b)enjoining the continuance by defendant of the illegal acts and practices alleged herein;
- (c)requiring that defendant pay over to plaintiffs and to the members of the class the damages sustained by plaintiffs and the members of the class by reason of defendant's illegal acts and practices, including adjusted backpay, with interest, and an additional equal amount as liquidated damages, and exemplary damages;
- (d)requiring that defendant pay to plaintiffs and to the members of the class the costs of this suit and a reasonable attorneys' fee, with interest; and
- (e)such other and further relief as the Court deems appropriate. * * *

After extensive discovery, respondents moved for partial summary judgment only as to the issue of liability. * * * The District Court * * *, finding no issues of material fact in dispute, entered an order to the effect that petitioner's pregnancy-related policies violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It also ruled that Liberty Mutual's hiring and promotion policies violated Title VII. Petitioner thereafter filed a motion for reconsideration which was denied by the District Court. * * *

It is obvious from the District Court's order that respondents, although having received a favorable ruling on the issue of petitioner's liability to them, received none of the relief which they expressly prayed for in the portion of their complaint set forth above. They requested an injunction, but did not get one; they requested damages, but were not awarded any; they requested attorneys' fees, but received none.

Counsel for respondents when questioned during oral argument in this Court suggested that at least the District Court's order of February 20 amounted to a declaratory judgment on the issue of liability pursuant to the provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 2201. Had respondents sought only a declaratory judgment, and no other form of relief, we would of course have a different case. But even if we accept respondents' contention that the District Court's order was a declaratory judgment on the issue of liability, it nonetheless left unresolved respondents' requests for an injunction, for compensatory and exemplary damages, and for attorneys' fees. It finally disposed of none of respondents' prayers for relief.

1216

The District Court and the Court of Appeals apparently took the view that because the District Court made the recital required by Fed.Rule Civ.Proc. 54(b) that final judgment be entered on the issue of liability, and that there was no just reason for delay, the orders thereby became appealable as a final decision pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291. We cannot agree with this application of the Rule and statute in question.

Rule 54(b) "does not apply to a single claim action * * *. It is limited expressly to multiple claims actions in which 'one or more but less than all' of the multiple claims have been finally decided and are found otherwise to be ready for appeal." Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Mackey, 351 U.S. 427, 435, 76 S.Ct. 895, 899, 100 L.Ed. 1297, 1306 (1956). Here, however, respondents set forth but a single claim: that petitioner's employee insurance benefits and maternity leave regulations discriminated against its women employees in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. They prayed for several different types of relief in the event that they sustained the allegations of their complaint * * *, but their complaint advanced a single legal theory which was applied to only one set of facts. Thus, despite the fact that the District Court undoubtedly made the findings required under the Rule had it been applicable, those findings do not in a case such as this make the order appealable pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291. * * *

We turn to consider whether the District Court's order might have been appealed by petitioner to the Court of Appeals under any other theory. The order, viewed apart from its discussion of Rule 54(b), constitutes a grant of partial summary judgment limited to the issue of petitioner's liability. Such judgments are by their terms interlocutory, see Fed.Rule Civ.Proc. 56(c),^a and where assessment of damages or awarding of other relief remains to be resolved have never been considered to be “final” within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1291. * * * Thus the only possible authorization for an appeal from the District Court’s order would be pursuant to the provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 1292.

If the District Court had granted injunctive relief but had not ruled on respondents’ other requests for relief, this interlocutory order would have been appealable under § 1292(a)(1). But, as noted above, the court did not issue an injunction. It might be argued that the order of the District Court, insofar as it failed to include the injunctive relief requested by respondents, is an interlocutory order refusing an injunction within the meaning of § 1292(a)(1). But even if this would have allowed respondents to then obtain review in the Court of Appeals, there was no denial of any injunction sought by petitioner and it could not avail itself of that grant of jurisdiction.

1217

Nor was this order appealable pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). Although the District Court’s findings made with a view to satisfying Rule 54(b) might be viewed as substantial compliance with the certification requirement of that section, there is no showing in this record that petitioner made application to the Court of Appeals within the 10 days therein specified. And that court’s holding that its jurisdiction was pursuant to § 1291 makes it clear that it thought itself obliged to consider on the merits petitioner’s appeal. There can be no assurance that had the other requirements of § 1292(b) been complied with, the Court of Appeals would have exercised its discretion to entertain the interlocutory appeal.

Were we to sustain the procedure followed here, we would condone a practice whereby a district court in virtually any case before it might render an interlocutory decision on the question of liability of the defendant, and the defendant would thereupon be permitted to appeal to the court of appeals without satisfying any of the requirements that Congress carefully set forth. We believe that Congress, in enacting the present §§ 1291 and 1292 of Title 28, has been well aware of the dangers of an overly rigid insistence upon a “final decision” for appeal in every case, and has in those sections made ample provision for appeal of orders which are not “final” so as to alleviate any possible hardship. We would twist the fabric of the statute more than it will bear if we were to agree that the District Court’s order of February 20, 1974, was appealable to the Court of Appeals.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is therefore vacated, and the case is remanded with instructions to dismiss the petitioner’s appeal.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE BLACKMUN took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Was the absence of finality in Liberty Mutual a jurisdictional defect or simply noncompliance with a procedural requirement for taking an appeal? Is it significant that the Court raised the defect sua sponte? Are the same dangers present when an appellate court conducts a premature review as when a trial court hears a cause that is not within its competence?

2.Appellate review serves a number of purposes. One goal is to correct errors by the court of original jurisdiction. A related goal is to develop a consistent body of law to be followed in future cases. See Shavell, The Appeals Process as a Means of Error Correction, 24 J. Legal Stud. 379, 379–80, 416, 425–26 (1995). Yet a third goal is to meet the public’s “demand for justice,” which assumes that “important grievances [will] be heard and resolved by the highest possible governmental authority.” Kelso, A Report on the California Appellate System, 45 Hastings L.J. 433, 434–35 (1994) How does the requirement of finality promote or undermine these goals?

1218

3.For a historical analysis of how the final judgment rule developed, see Crick, The Final Judgment as a Basis for Appeal, 41 Yale L.J. 539, 541–50 (1932).

2.THE NEW YORK APPROACH

New York allows appeals as of right to the state’s intermediate appellate court—the Appellate Division—in a great many situations in which no final judgment has been rendered. Read the New York provision, N.Y.C.P.L.R. 5701, which is found in the Supplement following 28 U.S.C. § 1292.

KORN, CIVIL JURISDICTION OF THE NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS AND APPELLATE DIVISIONS, 16 Buffalo L.Rev. 307, 332 (1967):

Today * * * it is well known that there is hardly a question of practice that cannot be appealed; and, if a matter is said to be addressed to the court’s discretion or favor, this may mean a more limited scope of review but will rarely affect appealability. Appeals on practice matters are legion, ranging far and wide over questions of venue, parties, consolidation and joint trial, pleading and pre-trial disclosure. The only meaningful method of inquiry as to the content of the present standards is to examine the types of orders that have been held not to involve some part of the merits or affect a substantial right.

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

In refusing to allow an appeal from an interlocutory order, an unnecessary appellate hearing may be avoided; in allowing an appeal, an unnecessary trial may be avoided, either by disposing of the case at that stage or by correcting in advance of trial an error that might otherwise require a new trial. Is there any basis for supposing that the appellate hearing is more likely to prove unnecessary than the trial? Is it relevant that the trial judge will more often be correct in an interlocutory ruling than wrong? Is it better to resolve the question of allowing an interlocutory appeal by weighing the advantages and disadvantages against each other in the abstract or by considering them as they apply in each case?

Even if it is assumed that a reversal of the trial court’s order by the appellate court is as probable as its affirmance and consideration is taken of the possibility that trial may demand more time of lawyers and judges than an appeal, does it follow that interlocutory appeals should be freely allowed? Consider the effect of the following factors:

1219

- (1) In the course of a single lawsuit there may be many interlocutory orders from which one of the parties would like to appeal; thus, if finality is required, several appeals may be saved for every trial saved under the other approach.
- (2) Not every reversal of an interlocutory order will terminate the case without trial.
- (3) The number of appellate courts cannot be increased as readily as can the number of trial courts in order to take care of heavier calendars. There will be a serious problem as long as it is the function of appellate courts not only to review trial-court decisions but also to establish and maintain a degree of uniformity in the law.

Is the trial judge’s independence and discretion threatened by too frequent a review? Is a party who has been ordered to answer questions in a deposition interested in obtaining immediate review solely in order to save time or money? Moreover, the debate over the relative merits of a final-judgment rule and an interlocutory appeal system is intertwined with the larger problem of court congestion at the appellate level. The attention given to crowding at the trial level has obscured the fact that a comparable problem may exist in many reviewing courts.

3.DEPARTURES FROM THE FINAL JUDGMENT RULE IN THE FEDERAL COURTS

a.Defining “Finality”

i.Cases Involving Multiple Claims

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 54(b) and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

SEARS, ROEBUCK & CO. v. MACKEY, 351 U.S. 427, 76 S.Ct. 895, 100 L.Ed. 1297 (1956). Mackey brought suit for damages against Sears, Roebuck under the Sherman Antitrust Act (Counts I and II) and common law for unlawfully inducing a breach of contract (Count III) and unfair competition and patent infringement (Count IV). The district court dismissed only those claims presented in Counts I and II. On appeal to the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, the court upheld its appellate jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291. The Supreme Court affirmed.

1220

The Court noted that before the promulgation of the Federal Rules, no appeal would have been allowed from the final determination of Counts I and II since the district court’s judgment was not a final decision of the whole case. However, with the adoption of the Federal Rules and the subsequent increase in multiple-claim actions, the promulgators recognized the need to ameliorate the standard that “all claims had to be finally decided before an appeal could be entertained from a final decision upon any of them.” Id. at 434, 76 S.Ct. at 899, 100 L.Ed. at 1305. Consequently, Rule 54(b) was adopted.

* * * [Rule 54(b), as amended in 1946,] does not relax the finality required of each decision, as an individual claim, to render it appealable, but it does provide a practical means of permitting an appeal to be taken from one or more final decisions on individual claims, in multiple claims actions, without waiting for final decisions to be rendered on all the claims in the case.

* * *

To meet the demonstrated need for flexibility, the District Court is used as a “dispatcher.” It is permitted to determine, in the first instance, the appropriate time when each “final decision” upon “one or more but less than all” of the claims in a multiple claims action is ready for appeal. This arrangement already has lent welcome certainty to the appellate procedure. Its “negative effect” has met with uniform approval. The effect so referred to is the rule’s specific requirement that for “one or more but less than all” multiple claims to become appealable, the District Court must make both “an express determination that there is no just reason for delay” and “an express direction for the entry of judgment.” A party adversely affected by a final decision thus knows that his time for appeal will not run against him until this certification has been made.

* * *

In the case before us, there is no doubt that each of the claims dismissed is a “claim for relief” within the meaning of Rule 54(b), or that their dismissal constitutes a “final decision” on individual claims. Also, it cannot well be argued that the claims stated in Counts I and II are so inherently inseparable from, or closely related to, those stated in Counts III and IV that the District Court has abused its discretion in certifying that there exists no just reason for delay. They certainly can be decided independently of each other.

* * *

* * * The District Court cannot, in the exercise of its discretion, treat as “final” that which is not “final” within the meaning of § 1291. But the District Court may, by the exercise of its discretion in the interest of sound judicial administration, release for appeal final decisions upon one or more, but less than all, claims in multiple claims actions. The timing of such a release is, with good reason, vested by the rule primarily in the discretion of the District Court as the one most likely to be familiar with the case and with any justifiable reasons for delay. * * *

1221

* * * [Rule 54] does not supersede any statute controlling appellate jurisdiction. It scrupulously recognizes the statutory requirement of a “final decision” under § 1291 as a basic requirement for an appeal to the Court of Appeals. It merely administers that requirement in a practical manner in multiple claims actions and does so by rule instead of by judicial decision. By its negative effect, it operates to restrict in a valid manner the number of appeals in multiple claims actions.

We reach a like conclusion as to the validity of the amended rule where the District Court acts affirmatively and thus assists in properly timing the release of final decisions in multiple claims actions. The amended rule adapts the single judicial unit theory so that it better meets the current needs of judicial administration. Just as Rule 54(b), in its original form, resulted in the release of some decisions on claims in multiple claims actions before they otherwise would have been released, so amended Rule 54(b) now makes possible the release of more of such decisions subject to judicial supervision. The amended rule preserves the historic federal policy against piecemeal appeals in many cases more effectively than did the original rule.

Id. at 435–38, 76 S.Ct. at 899–901, 100 L.Ed. at 1306–07.

On the same day it decided Mackey, the Supreme Court in COLD METAL PROCESS CO. v. UNITED ENGINEERING & FOUNDRY CO., 351 U.S. 445, 76 S.Ct. 904, 100 L.Ed. 1311 (1956), held that an appeal by defendant was appropriate under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and Rule 54(b) even though a counterclaim arising out of the same transaction had not yet been decided. Justice Frankfurter, who concurred in Mackey, dissented in Cold Metal, arguing that “the counterclaim, even if not compulsory, is based in substantial part on the transactions involved in the main litigation and hence not appealable,” and that the Court had created confusion as to the standards lower courts were to apply in determining when a decision is final. Id. at 439–40, 442–43, 76 S.Ct. at 902–04, 100 L.Ed. at 1308–10.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In the principal case, the Supreme Court declined to provide a hard and fast definition of claim for purposes of Federal Rule 54(b). Would it be best to conform the definition to the test used under Rule 8 for pleading? Under 28 U.S.C. § 1367 for supplemental jurisdiction? Under Rule 20 for claim joinder? Under the doctrine of claim preclusion?

1222

2. In CURTISS-WRIGHT CORP. v. GENERAL ELECTRIC CO., 446 U.S. 1, 100 S.Ct. 1460, 64 L.Ed.2d 1 (1980), Curtiss-Wright brought a diversity action, seeking damages and reformation with regard to a series of contracts between it and General Electric, and defendant counterclaimed. As to one of Curtiss-Wright’s affirmative claims (for $19 million due on the contracts already performed) the district court granted summary judgment to plaintiff and directed entry of final judgment under Rule 54(b) after determining, as required by the Rule, that there was “no just reason for delay.” The Third Circuit reversed, finding an abuse of discretion, given the existence of a nonfrivolous counterclaim. The Supreme Court agreed with the district court, finding that the “mere presence” of a nonfrivolous counterclaim does not make Rule 54(b) certification inappropriate; rather what matters is the “interrelationship” between the two:

Here, the District Judge determined that General Electric’s counterclaims were severable from the claims which had been determined in terms of both the factual and the legal issues involved. The Court of Appeals did not conclude otherwise.

What the Court of Appeals found objectionable about the District Judge’s exercise of discretion was the assessment of the equities involved. The Court of Appeals concluded that the possibility of a setoff required that the status quo be maintained unless petitioner could show harsh or unusual circumstances; it held that such a showing had not been made in the District Court.

This holding reflects a misinterpretation of the standard of review for Rule 54(b) certifications and a misperception of the appellate function in such cases. * * *

There are thus two aspects to the proper function of a reviewing court in Rule 54(b) cases. The court of appeals must, of course, scrutinize the district court’s evaluation of such factors as the interrelationship of the claims so as to prevent piecemeal appeals in cases which should be reviewed only as single units. But once such juridical concerns have been met, the discretionary judgment of the district court should be given substantial deference, for that court is “the one most likely to be familiar with the case and with any justifiable reasons for delay.” * * * The reviewing court should disturb the trial court’s assessment of the equities only if it can say that the judge’s conclusion was clearly unreasonable.

Id. at 9–11, 100 S.Ct. at 1465–66, 64 L.Ed.2d at 11–13. Chief Justice Burger, who wrote the opinion for the Court, underscored the difficulty of prescribing guidelines for the determination of when there is “no just reason for delay” in the entry of partial final judgment, “because the number of possible situations is large,” but did approve the factors considered by the district court: the fact that plaintiff’s claim was large and liquidated, that the difference between prejudgment and market interest rates would cause great hardship to plaintiff, and that the pending counterclaims would not be decided for many months if not years.

1223

The Supreme Court has not yet provided a generally accepted test for whether one claim or multiple claims are before the trial court. However, lower court decisions provide some insight. The Fifth Circuit, for example, has held that certification is not available “where a court disposes of an affirmative defense, or even every affirmative defense raised by the defendant” unless the court “makes an express holding as to liability”; “where the district court rules on some issues concerning a claim,” but does not complete the analysis because fact issues remain outstanding; and where the district court has resolved a threshold issue relevant to a claim, but has not resolved the claim itself. Tetra Technologies, Inc. v. Continental Ins. Co., 755 F.3d 222, 230 (5th Cir. 2014).

ii. Decisions Involving “Collateral Orders”

In COHEN v. BENEFICIAL INDUSTRIAL LOAN CORP., 337 U.S. 541, 69 S.Ct. 1221, 93 L.Ed. 1528 (1949), Cohen brought a shareholder’s derivative suit in a New Jersey federal court. The district court denied Beneficial’s motion to require Cohen to post security for costs pursuant to a New Jersey statute, holding the statute inapplicable to an action in a federal court. The court of appeals reversed, and the Supreme Court affirmed that decision. The Justices addressed the question of appealability in the following passage:

* * * Appeal gives the upper court a power of review, not one of intervention. So long as the matter remains open, unfinished or inconclusive, there may be no intrusion by appeal. But the District Court’s action upon this application was concluded and closed and its decision final in that sense before the appeal was taken.

Nor does the statute permit appeals, even from fully consummated decisions, where they are but steps towards final judgment in which they will merge. The purpose is to combine in one review all stages of the proceeding that effectively may be reviewed and corrected if and when final judgment results. But this order of the District Court did not make any step toward final disposition of the merits of the case and will not be merged in final judgment. When that time comes, it will be too late effectively to review the present order and the rights conferred by the statute, if it is applicable, will have been lost, probably irreparably. We conclude that the matters embraced in the decision appealed from are not of such an interlocutory nature as to affect, or to be affected by, decision of the merits of this case.

1224

This decision appears to fall in that small class which finally determine claims of right separable from, and collateral to, rights asserted in the action, too important to be denied review and too independent of the cause itself to require that appellate consideration be deferred until the whole case is adjudicated. The Court has long given this provision of the statute this practical rather than a technical construction. * * *

We hold this order appealable because it is a final disposition of a claimed right which is not an ingredient of the cause of action and does not require consideration with it. * * * Here it is the right to security that presents a serious and unsettled question. If the right were admitted or clear and the order involved only an exercise of discretion as to the amount of security, a matter the statute makes subject to reconsideration from time to time, appealability would present a different question.

Id. at 545, 69 S.Ct. at 1225, 93 L.Ed. at 1536.

WILL v. HALLOCK
Supreme Court of the United States, 2006.
546 U.S. 345, 126 S.Ct. 952, 163 L.Ed.2d 836.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Agents of the United States Customs Service, acting on a warrant, seized computer equipment at plaintiff’s home. No charges were brought and the equipment was returned, albeit in severely damaged condition, resulting in serious financial loss to plaintiff. Plaintiff brought suit against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging negligence of the agents. While that action was pending, plaintiff filed a separate negligence suit against the agents. The action against the United States was dismissed after which the agents moved to dismiss the second suit on the ground that the “judgment as bar” provision of the FTCA, 28 U.S.C. § 2676, barred the action against them once the first case was dismissed. The trial court denied the agents’ motion on the ground that the statute did not apply. On appeal, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that the “collateral order” doctrine justified the appeal despite the lack of a final judgment and upheld the trial court’s decision.]

* * *

The collateral order doctrine, identified with Cohen * * * is “best understood not as an exception to the ‘final decision’ rule laid down by Congress in § 1291, but as a ‘practical construction’ of it.” * * * [T]he collateral order doctrine accommodates a “small class” of rulings, not concluding the litigation, but conclusively resolving “claims of right

1225

separable from, and collateral to, rights asserted in the action” * * *. The claims are “too important to be denied review and too independent of the cause itself to require that appellate consideration be deferred until the whole case is adjudicated.” Cohen * * *.

The requirements for collateral order appeal have been distilled down to three conditions: that an order “ ‘[1] conclusively determine the disputed question, [2] resolve an important issue completely separate from the merits of the action, and [3] be effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment.’ ” * * * The conditions are “stringent,” * * * and unless they are kept so, the underlying doctrine will overpower the substantial finality interests § 1291 is meant to further: judicial efficiency, for example, and the “sensible policy ‘of avoid[ing] the obstruction to just claims that would come from permitting the harassment and cost of a succession of separate appeals from the various rulings to which a litigation may give rise.’ ” * * *

* * * [A]lthough the Court has been asked many times to expand the “small class” of collaterally appealable orders, we have instead kept it narrow and selective in its membership.

A

Prior cases mark the line between rulings within the class and those outside. On the immediately appealable side are orders rejecting absolute immunity * * * and qualified immunity * * *. A State has the benefit of the doctrine to appeal a decision denying its claim to Eleventh Amendment immunity * * * and a criminal defendant may collaterally appeal an adverse ruling on a defense of double jeopardy * * *.

The examples admittedly raise the lawyer’s temptation to generalize. In each case, the collaterally appealing party was vindicating or claiming a right to avoid trial, in satisfaction of the third condition: unless the order to stand trial was immediately appealable, the right would be effectively lost. * * * But * * * [such a] generalization is too easy to be sound and, if accepted, would leave the final order requirement of § 1291 in tatters. * * *

B

Since only some orders denying an asserted right to avoid the burdens of trial qualify, then, as orders that cannot be reviewed “effectively” after a conventional final judgment, the cases have to be combed for some further characteristic that merits appealability under Cohen; * * * that something further boils down to “a judgment about the value of the interests that would be lost through rigorous application of a final judgment requirement.” * * *

In each case [in which immediate appeal has been permitted], some particular value of a high order was marshaled in support of the interest in avoiding trial: honoring the separation of powers, preserving the efficiency of government and the initiative of its officials, respecting a

1226

State’s dignitary interests, and mitigating the government’s advantage over the individual. That is, it is not mere avoidance of a trial, but avoidance of a trial that would imperil a substantial public interest, that counts when asking whether an order is “effectively” unreviewable if review is to be left until later. * * *

C

Does the claim of the customs agents in this case serve such a weighty public objective that the judgment bar [under the Federal Tort Claims Act regarding the dismissal of the case against the United States] should be treated as an immunity demanding the protection of a collateral order appeal? * * * Qualified immunity is not the law simply to save trouble for the Government and its employees; it is recognized because the burden of trial is unjustified in the face of a colorable claim that the law on point was not clear when the official took action, and the action was reasonable in light of the law as it was. The nub of qualified immunity is the need to induce officials to show reasonable initiative when the relevant law is not “clearly established,” * * * [so] a quick resolution of a qualified immunity claim is essential.

There is, however, no such public interest at stake simply because the judgment bar is said to be applicable. It is not the preservation of initiative but the avoidance of litigation for its own sake that supports the judgment bar, and if simply abbreviating litigation troublesome to Government employees were important enough for Cohen treatment, collateral order appeal would be a matter of right whenever the Government lost a motion to dismiss under the Tort Claims Act. * * *

Another difference between qualified immunity and the judgment bar lies in the bar’s essential procedural element. While a qualified immunity claim is timely from the moment an official is served with a complaint, the judgment bar can be raised only after a case under the Tort Claims Act has been resolved in the Government’s favor. * * *

* * *

The judgment bar at issue in this case has no claim to greater importance than the typical defense of claim preclusion; and we hold true to form in deciding * * * that an order rejecting the defense of judgment bar under 28 U.S.C. § 2676 cries for no immediate appeal of right as a collateral order.

We vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals and remand with instructions to dismiss the appeal for lack of jurisdiction.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In MOHAWK INDUSTRIES, INC. v. CARPENTER, 558 U.S. 100, 130 S.Ct. 599, 175 L.Ed.2d 458 (2009), the Supreme Court held that a discovery order compelling defendant to disclose information it claimed was protected by the attorney-client privilege did not qualify for immediate appeal under the collateral order doctrine; the Court reasoned that litigants could be sufficiently protected by post-judgment appeal. There are numerous other examples of the unavailability of appeal under the collateral order doctrine despite hardship for the party seeking an appeal and the potential waste of resources:

1227

- (a) In RICHARDSON-MERRELL, INC. v. KOLLER, 472 U.S. 424, 105 S.Ct. 2757, 86 L.Ed.2d 340 (1985), the Supreme Court held that an order to disqualify a party’s attorney is not subject to immediate appeal regardless of how difficult and costly it might be for a substitute attorney to “catch up.”
- (b) In VAN CAUWENBERGHE v. BIARD, 486 U.S. 517, 108 S.Ct. 1945, 100 L.Ed.2d 517 (1988), defendant, who had been extradited to the United States, argued that he was immune from civil process. Again, the Supreme Court held that the issue would be reviewable at the end of the civil case and appeal as a collateral order was not available.
- (c) In LAURO LINES S.R.L. v. CHASSER, 490 U.S. 495, 109 S.Ct. 1976, 104 L.Ed.2d 548 (1989), defendant argued that the case, brought in a United States court, should have been filed in Italy in accordance with a contract between plaintiffs and defendant. The Supreme Court held that the issue would be reviewable at the end of the case and the collateral order doctrine did not permit an earlier appeal.
- (d) In DIGITAL EQUIP. CORP. v. DESKTOP DIRECT, INC., 511 U.S. 863, 114 S.Ct. 1992, 128 L.Ed.2d 842 (1994), the Supreme Court held that immediate review was not available from an order rejecting a party’s claim to immunity from suit under a private settlement agreement.
- (e) In CUNNINGHAM v. HAMILTON COUNTY, 527 U.S. 198, 119 S.Ct. 1915, 144 L.Ed.2d 184 (1999), the Supreme Court held that an order imposing sanctions for discovery violations under Federal Rule 37 on an attorney who no longer represented the client in the on-going matter could not be immediately appealed.

2. Should the appeals court honor a joint request for an immediate appeal that would not be permitted under the collateral order doctrine? Does your answer turn on whether the requirement of finality is jurisdictional? See Pfander, Interlocutory Review by Agreement of the Parties: A Preliminary Analysis, 105 Nw.U.L.Rev. 1043 (2011).

3. When a party refuses to obey a court order and has been held in criminal contempt, the issue is so distinct from the underlying case, and so important, that an appeal will be permitted under the collateral order doctrine. See United States v. Ryan, 402 U.S. 530, 91 S.Ct. 1580, 29 L.Ed.2d 85 (1971). Indeed, in UNITED STATES v. NIXON, 418 U.S. 683, 690–92, 94 S.Ct. 3090,

1228

3098–99, 41 L.Ed.2d 1039, 1053–55 (1974), interlocutory appeal was permitted even though there was no contempt. The case involved an order that the President of the United States produce tape recordings for examination by a federal judge. The President had not refused to comply and thus had not been held in contempt. The Court explained: “To require a President of the United States to place himself in the posture of disobeying an order of a court merely to trigger the procedural mechanism for review of the ruling would be unseemly, and would present an unnecessary occasion for constitutional confrontation between two branches of Government.” Are the facts of this case sui generis?

4. If an order satisfies the requirements of the collateral order doctrine, does the court have discretion to decline review? Are you influenced by the fact that the Supreme Court has treated Cohen as a “practical construction” of 28 U.S.C. § 1291 and not as an exception to the statute? See Digital Equipment, Note 1(d), p. 1227. See Steinman, Reinventing Appellate Jurisdiction, 48 B.C.L.Rev. 1237, 1251, 1256–57 (2007).

5. In COOPERS & LYBRAND v. LIVESAY, 437 U.S. 463, 98 S.Ct. 2454, 57 L.Ed.2d 351 (1978), the Court held that the denial of class certification under Federal Rule 23 was not appealable under the collateral order doctrine. The Court explained:

To come within the “small class” of decisions excepted from the final-judgment rule by Cohen, the order must conclusively determine the disputed question, resolve an important issue completely separate from the merits of the action, and be effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment. * * * An order passing on a request for class certification does not fall in that category. First, such an order is subject to revision in the District Court. * * * Second, the class determination generally involves considerations that are “enmeshed in the factual and legal issues comprising the plaintiff’s cause of action.” * * * Finally, an order denying class certification is subject to effective review after final judgment at the behest of the named plaintiff or intervening class members. * * *

Id. at 468–69, 98 S.Ct. at 2458, 57 L.Ed.2d at 357–58. See p. 846, supra, regarding Federal Rule 23(f), effective December 1, 1988, permitting discretionary interlocutory appeal of class certification decisions.

iii. Decisions Based on “Pragmatic Finality”

In BROWN SHOE CO. v. UNITED STATES, 370 U.S. 294, 82 S.Ct. 1502, 8 L.Ed.2d 510 (1962), the district court found defendant had violated the antitrust laws and directed divestiture of a subsidiary, but it reserved its ruling on a specific plan of divestiture. On a direct appeal by the shoe company, the Supreme Court held the divestiture decree was sufficiently final to be appealable even though a specific plan had not been formulated. Its own past practice, said the Court, had been to hear such appeals in antitrust cases; the substantive aspects of the case had been fully determined and to delay decision on the merits would chill the “careful, and often extended, negotiation and formulation” of the final divestiture order. Id. at 309, 82 S.Ct. at 1515, 8 L.Ed.2d at 526.

1229

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The appeal in Brown Shoe was taken under the Expediting Act of 1903, 15 U.S.C. § 29, and was direct from the district court to the United States Supreme Court. Justice Harlan wrote a separate opinion in that case criticizing this mode of appeal:

* * * [T]here is certainly much to be said in favor of relieving this Court of the often arduous task of searching through voluminous trial testimony and exhibits to determine whether a single district judge’s finding of fact are supportable. The legal issues in most civil antitrust cases are no longer so novel or unsettled as to make them especially appropriate for initial appellate consideration by this Court, as compared with those in a variety of other areas of federal law. And under modern conditions it may well be doubted whether direct review of such cases by this Court truly serves the purpose of expedition which underlay the original passage of the Expediting Act.

Id. at 365–82, S.Ct. at 1546, 8 L.Ed.2d at 562. The Expediting Act was amended in 1993, so that now appeals from a final judgment in antitrust civil actions (with one exception) are through the conventional route to the court of appeals under 28 U.S.C. § 1291 subject to review by the Supreme Court on a writ of certiorari. See Boskey & Gressman, Recent Reforms in the Federal Judicial Structure—Three-Judge District Courts and Appellate Review, 67 F.R.D. 135, 150 (1975).

2. How does appealability under Brown Shoe differ from the collateral order doctrine under Cohen? In UNITED STATES v. COPAR PUMICE CO., INC., 714 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 2013), an action against a mine operator and others for the wrongful removal of undersized pumice from their mine, defendants sought to appeal the denial of a protective order for documents from law firms that had provided legal advice about mining. The Tenth Circuit held that an interlocutory appeal was not available under the collateral order doctrine as interpreted in Mohawk Industries, p. 1226, Note 1, supra, or under the doctrine of pragmatic finality:

* * * Defendants attempt to distinguish Mohawk by focusing on whether the subpoenaed documents were sought from a nonparty, or from a party to the litigation. * * *

Defendants’ quote omits the remaining part of the sentence. The Supreme Court stated that “litigants confronted with a particularly injurious or novel privilege ruling have several potential avenues of review apart from collateral order appeal.” * * * Specifically, the Court delineated three potential avenues: 1) the party could ask the district court to certify an appeal under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b); 2) the party could petition the court of appeals for a writ of mandamus; and 3) the party could defy the disclosure order and incur sanctions or be held in contempt when “characterized as a criminal punishment.” * * * While the third avenue of review is arguably unavailable to Defendants because they were not the custodian of the subpoenaed documents, the first and second avenues of review are available. Defendants do not mention these available avenues, or explain how the unavailability of one of these three avenues would render Mohawk wholly distinguishable.

1230

* * *

Finally, Defendants argue that jurisdiction is proper pursuant to the pragmatic finality doctrine. Under this doctrine, a “court may assume jurisdiction where the danger of injustice by delaying appellate review outweighs the inconvenience and costs of piecemeal review.” * * * This court has described the pragmatic finality doctrine as “more subjective” than the collateral order doctrine, involving “ad hoc adjustments to the final decision requirement of § 1291.” * * *

To the extent this doctrine is still recognized, it must be “invoked only in truly ‘unique instances,’ ” and not when the dispute can be adequately reviewed on appeal from a final judgment. * * * We have questioned the pragmatic finality doctrine’s “continued viability for the last fifteen [plus] years,” and continue to do so after Mohawk. * * *

Defendants argue that the present appeal is a unique or exceptional circumstance because this court has not decisively answered whether federal or state law governs the privilege asserted. However, Defendants neither explain the importance of deciding this legal issue on immediate appeal, nor have Defendants shown that the danger of injustice by delaying appellate review outweighs the inconvenience and costs of piecemeal review. Defendants’ interests in immediate review center on their desire to prevent information they deem privileged from disclosure, but the Supreme Court has already found such interests insufficient to warrant immediate appeal. * * *

Id. at 1204–06, 1209–10.

b.Avoidance or Evasion of the Basic Concept—Mandamus

Read 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a) in the Supplement.

1231

LA BUY v. HOWES LEATHER Co.
Supreme Court of the United States, 1957.
352 U.S. 249, 77 S.Ct. 309, 1 L.Ed.2d 290.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

JUSTICE CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court.

These two consolidated cases present a question of the power of the Courts of Appeals to issue writs of mandamus to compel a District Judge to vacate his orders entered under Rule 53(b) * * * referring antitrust cases for trial before a master. The petitioner, a United States District Judge * * *, contends that the Courts of Appeals have no such power and that, even if they did, these cases were not appropriate ones for its exercise. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit has decided unanimously that it has such power and, by a divided court, that the circumstances surrounding the references by the petitioner required it to issue the mandamus about which he complains. * * *

History of the Litigation.—These petitions for mandamus * * * arose from two antitrust actions instituted in the District Court in 1950. Rohlffing involves 87 plaintiffs * * * [and] six named defendants * * *. Shaffer involves six plaintiffs * * * and six defendants * * *.

The record indicates that the cases had been burdensome to the petitioner. In Rohlffing alone, 27 pages of the record are devoted to docket entries reflecting that petitioner had conducted many hearings on preliminary pleas and motions. * * * It is reasonable to conclude that much time would have been saved at the trial had petitioner heard the case because of his familiarity with the litigation.

* * * The cases were called on February 23, 1955, on a motion to reset them for trial. * * * The petitioner announced that “it has taken a long time to get this case at issue. I remember hearing more motions, I think, in this case than any case I have ever sat on in this court.” The plaintiffs estimated that the trial would take six weeks, whereupon petitioner stated he did not know when he could try the case “if it is going to take this long.” He asked if the parties could agree “to have a Master hear” it. The parties ignored this query and at a conference in chambers the next day petitioner entered the orders of reference sua sponte. * * * The orders declared that the court was “confronted with an extremely congested calendar” and that “exception [sic]^b conditions exist for this reason” requiring the references. The cases were referred to the master “to take evidence and to report the same to this Court, together with his findings of fact and conclusions of law.” * * *

* * * Upon petitioner’s refusal to vacate the references, these mandamus actions were filed in the Court of Appeals seeking the issuance of writs ordering petitioner to do so. These applications were grounded on 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a), the All Writs Act. * * * Declaring that the references amounted to * * * “a refusal on his [petitioner’s] part,^c as a judge, to try the causes in due course,” the Court of Appeals concluded that “in view of the extraordinary nature of these causes” the references must be vacated “if we find that the orders were beyond the court’s power under the pertinent rule.” * * * And, it being so found, the writs issued under the authority of the All Writs Act. * * *

1232

The Power of the Courts of Appeals.—Petitioner contends that the power of the Courts of Appeals does not extend to the issuance of writs of mandamus to review interlocutory orders except in those cases where the review of the case on appeal after final judgment would be frustrated. * * * The question of naked power has long been settled by this Court. As late as Roche v. Evaporated Milk Association, 1943, 319 U.S. 21, 25, 63 S.Ct. 938, 941, 87 L.Ed. 1185, Mr. Chief Justice Stone reviewed the decisions and, in considering the power of Courts of Appeals to issue writs of mandamus, the Court held that “the common-law writs, like equitable remedies, may be granted or withheld in the sound discretion of the court.” * * * Since the Court of Appeals could at some stage of the antitrust proceedings entertain appeals in these cases, it has power in proper circumstances, as here, to issue writs of mandamus reaching them. * * *

The Discretionary Use of the Writs.—It appears from the docket entries to which we heretofore referred that the petitioner was well informed as to the nature of the antitrust litigation * * *. Nevertheless, he referred both suits to a master on the general issue. Furthermore, neither the existence of the alleged conspiracy nor the question of liability vel non had been determined in either case. These issues, as well as the damages, if any, and the question concerning the issuance of an injunction, were likewise included in the references. Under all of the circumstances, we believe the Court of Appeals was justified in finding the orders of reference were an abuse of the petitioner’s power under Rule 53(b). They amounted to little less than an abdication of the judicial function depriving the parties of a trial before the court on the basic issues involved in the litigation.

The use of masters is “to aid judges in the performance of specific judicial duties, as they may arise in the progress of a cause,” Ex parte Peterson * * * [p. 1004, supra] and not to displace the court. The exceptional circumstances here warrant the use of the extraordinary remedy of mandamus. * * *

It is also contended that the Seventh Circuit has erroneously construed the All Writs Act as “conferring on it a ‘roving commission’ to supervise interlocutory orders of the District Courts in advance of final decision.” Our examination of its opinions in this regard leads us to the conclusion that the Court of Appeals has exercised commendable self-restraint. It is true that mandamus should be resorted to only in extreme cases, since it places trial judges in the anomalous position of being litigants without counsel other than uncompensated volunteers. However, there is an end of patience and it clearly appears that the Court of Appeals has [since 1938] * * * admonished the trial judges of the Seventh Circuit that the practice of making references “does not commend itself” and “ * * * should seldom be made, and if at all only when unusual circumstances exist.” * * * Still the Court of Appeals did not disturb the reference practice by reversal or mandamus until this case was decided in October 1955. * * * The record does not show to what extent references are made by the full bench of the District Court in the Northern District; however, it does reveal that petitioner has referred 11 cases to masters in the past 6 years. But even “a little cloud may bring a flood’s downpour” if we approve the practice here indulged, particularly in the face of presently congested dockets, increased filings, and more extended trials. * * * [B]e that as it may, congestion in itself is not such an exceptional circumstance as to warrant a reference to a master. If such were the test, present congestion would make references the rule rather than the exception. Petitioner realizes this, for in addition to calendar congestion he alleges that the cases referred had unusual complexity of issues of both fact and law. But most litigation in the antitrust field is complex. It does not follow that antitrust litigants are not entitled to a trial before a court. On the contrary, we believe that this is an impelling reason for trial before a regular, experienced trial judge rather than before a temporary substitute appointed on an ad hoc basis and ordinarily not experienced in judicial work. * * * We agree that the detailed accounting required in order to determine the damages suffered by each plaintiff might be referred to a master after the court has determined the over-all liability of defendants, provided the circumstances indicate that the use of the court’s time is not warranted in receiving the proof and making the tabulation.

1233

* * *

Affirmed.

JUSTICE BRENNAN, with whom JUSTICE FRANKFURTER, JUSTICE BURTON and JUSTICE HARLAN join, dissenting.

* * * The case before the Court of Appeals was “not a case where a court has exceeded or refused to exercise its jurisdiction * * *.” Rule 53(b) * * * vested Judge La Buy with discretionary power to make a reference if he found, and he did, that “some exceptional condition” required the reference. * * * If Judge La Buy erred in finding that there was an “exceptional condition” requiring the reference or did not give proper weight to the caveat of the Rule that a “reference to a master shall be the exception and not the rule,” that was mere error “in ruling on matters within [the District Court’s] jurisdiction.” * * *

1234

But, regrettable as is this Court’s approval of what I consider to be a clear departure by the Court of Appeals from the settled principles governing the issuance of the extraordinary writs, what this Court says in reaching its result is reason for particularly grave concern. I think this Court has today seriously undermined the long-standing statutory policy against piecemeal appeals. My brethren say: “Since the Court of Appeals could at some stage of the antitrust proceedings entertain appeals in these cases, it has power in proper circumstances, as here, to issue writs of mandamus reaching them. * * *” I understand this to mean that proper circumstances are present for the issuance of a writ in this case because, if the litigants are not now heard, the Court of Appeals will not have an opportunity to relieve them of the burden of the added expense and delay of decision alleged to be the consequence of the reference. But that bridge was crossed by this Court in Roche * * *.

What this Court is saying, therefore, is that the All Writs Act confers an independent appellate power in the Courts of Appeals to review interlocutory orders. I have always understood the law to be precisely to the contrary. * * *

The power of the Courts of Appeals to issue extraordinary writs stems from § 14 of the Judiciary Act of 1789. Chief Judge Magruder, in In re Josephson, 1 Cir., 218 F.2d 174, provides us with an invaluable history of this power and of the judicial development of its scope. He demonstrates most persuasively that “[t]he all writs section does not confer an independent appellate power; the power is strictly of an auxiliary nature, in aid of a jurisdiction granted in some other provision of law * * *.”

The focal question posed for a Court of Appeals by a petition for the issuance of a writ is whether the action of the District Court tends to frustrate or impede the ultimate exercise by the Court of Appeals of its appellate jurisdiction granted in some other provision of the law. The answer is clearly in the affirmative where, for example, the order of the District Court transfers a cause to a District Court of another circuit for decision. That was Josephson, where * * * “the effect of the order is that the district judge has declined to proceed with the determination of a case which could eventually come to this court by appeal from a ‘final decision’.” * * * In contrast, a District Court order denying a transfer would not come under the umbrella of power under the All Writs Act, since retention of the cause by the District Court can hardly thwart or tend to defeat the power of the Court of Appeals to review that order after final decision of the case. * * *

The view now taken by this Court that the All Writs Act confers an independent appellate power, although not so broad as “to authorize the indiscriminate use of prerogative writs as a means of reviewing interlocutory orders,” in effect engrafts upon federal appellate procedure a standard of interlocutory review never embraced by the Congress throughout our history, although it is written into the English Judicature Act and is followed in varying degrees in some of the States. That standard allows interlocutory appeals by leave of the appellate court. * * *

1235

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In SCHLAGENHAUF v. HOLDER, 379 U.S. 104, 85 S.Ct. 234, 13 L.Ed.2d 152 (1964), the substantive aspects of which are set out at p. 935, supra, the Court upheld the use of mandamus to review an order requiring a defendant to submit to a physical and mental examination:

It is, of course, well settled that the writ is not to be used as a substitute for appeal * * * even though hardship may result from delay and perhaps unnecessary trial * * *. The writ is appropriately issued, however, when there is “usurpation of judicial power” or a clear abuse of discretion * * *.

[T]he challenged order * * * appears to be the first of its kind in any reported decision in the federal courts under Rule 35 * * *.

* * * It is thus appropriate for us to determine on the merits the issues presented and to formulate the necessary guidelines in this area. * * *

This is not to say, however, that following the setting of guidelines in this opinion, any future allegation that the District Court was in error in applying these guidelines to a particular case makes mandamus an appropriate remedy.

Id. at 110–12, 85 S.Ct. at 238–39, 13 L.Ed.2d at 156–60.

2.Many of the Supreme Court’s important mandamus decisions have concerned discovery disputes. Compare WILL v. UNITED STATES, 389 U.S. 90, 88 S.Ct. 269, 19 L.Ed.2d 305 (1967), a criminal case in which the government sought mandamus to overturn a district court order granting discovery for defendant. The court of appeals granted the writ. The Supreme Court reversed, stating that the facts did not reveal an extraordinary situation for which the writs must be reserved. The Court did not discuss the fact that without mandamus the government cannot obtain guidance on discovery matters since it cannot appeal an acquittal.

Relying heavily on Will, the Supreme Court in KERR v. UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, 426 U.S. 394, 96 S.Ct. 2119, 48 L.Ed.2d 725 (1976), affirmed a denial of mandamus by a court of appeals in a civil case in which the trial judge had ordered defendants, state correction officers, to turn over to plaintiff a number of prisoner personnel files. Defendants argued that such discovery should be compelled only after a determination by the trial judge that plaintiff’s need for the information outweighs its confidentiality. The Court reiterated the reasons for limiting use of writs to avoid piecemeal appeals and also recognized that restricting the use of writs to matters of “jurisdiction” in the technical sense would be too narrow. The Court “assumed” that the trial judge would accept its “suggestion” to review each of the personnel files in camera to determine if discovery should be permitted, thus making a writ unnecessary.

1236

In NIXON v. SIRICA, 487 F.2d 700, 707 (D.C. Cir. 1973), a district judge ordered the President of the United States to produce certain tape recordings for the judge’s inspection prior to a determination whether the recordings were subject to a grand jury subpoena. The President petitioned for a writ of mandamus, and the court of appeals, although denying the petition on the merits, held that mandamus was an appropriate mode of review “particularly in light of the great public interest in prompt resolution of the issues * * *.”

3.In CHENEY v. UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, 542 U.S. 367, 124 S.Ct. 2576, 159 L.Ed.2d 459 (2004), the Vice President of the United States sought a writ of mandamus to halt discovery of the National Energy Policy Development Group, an Executive Branch task force charged with making policy recommendations to the President. The court of appeals declined to issue the writ because, relying on Nixon, it regarded the possible assertion of executive privilege as an available avenue of relief. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that it was error to treat the assertion of the privilege as a “necessary precondition” to mandamus, and remanded to permit the appeals court to consider whether the writ should issue. In Cheney, the Supreme Court set out a three-part test for issuance of the writ of mandamus: there must be “no other adequate means” to attain the relief sought; the movant bears the burden of showing that the right to relief is “clear and indisputable”; and the issuing court in its discretion “must be satisfied that the writ is appropriate under the circumstances.” Id. at 380–81, 124 S.Ct. at 2587, 159 L.Ed.2d at 477–78 (internal quotations and citations omitted). Why would the issuance of mandamus in a discovery dispute ever meet this test? See Fullerton, Exploring the Far Reaches of Mandamus, 49 Brooklyn L.Rev. 1131, 1152 (1983). For a discussion of this issue in the context of privilege claims, see Robertson, Appellate Review of Discovery Orders in Federal Court: A Suggested Approach for Handling Privilege Claims, 81 Wash.L.Rev. 733, 756–58 (2006).

4. Mandamus relief as a form of interlocutory review is used sparingly, and, as a result, many intermediate procedural decisions by the district court that may have profound implications for the lawsuit are not reviewed until a final judgment is entered. These interlocutory decisions include: change of venue under 28 U.S.C. § 1404; declining to exercise supplemental jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c); and legal rulings rendered in multidistrict litigation under 28 U.S.C. § 1407. Which of these issues seems most pressing from the perspective of the goals of appellate review—error correction, legal uniformity, and public trust? Would it be appropriate to provide a method of appeal other than mandamus for these issues?

1237

c.Displacement of the Basic Concept—Discretionary Appeals

Read 28 U.S.C. §§ 1292(b) and 1292(e) in the Supplement.

ATLANTIC CITY ELECTRIC CO. v. GENERAL ELECTRIC CO.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1964.

337 F.2d 844.

PER CURIAM. The district court has certified pursuant to section 1292(b) * * * that its order, sustaining objections to interrogatories designed to discover whether damages were actually sustained by plaintiffs who may have shifted such damages, if any, to their customers of electricity, involves a controlling question of law in these litigations and that there is substantial ground for differences of opinion. * * *

In sustaining the objections to the interrogatories posed, the district court has, in effect, foreclosed defendants from pre-trial discovery of facts relating to a defense that plaintiffs have “passed-on” to their customers any damages incurred by plaintiffs and hence are not entitled to recover to the extent that defendants can prove such passing-on.

Upon this application for leave to appeal it would not be appropriate to isolate and endeavor to decide before an appeal from any final judgment this particular question of law. Pre-trial leave to appeal applications must be decided against the background of the entire case. Many important questions of law will undoubtedly arise in these cases but the problem now confronting us is the feasibility and advisability of trying to decide this particular question in advance of trial.

If pre-trial discovery were allowed as defendants request it could easily develop into a multitude of full scale rate cases which could dwarf in time and testimony the already extensive pre-trial proceedings. If the district court is in error * * * defendants will have full opportunity in the event of an adverse judgment, if based in whole or in part upon this error, to have it corrected upon appeal together with any other errors which may be urged. It is doubtful that any discoveries or hearings required to establish the extent of any damages, if the passing-on-doctrine applies, would be more burdensome then than now. Since defendants’ rights to this defense are not being taken away or prejudiced on any ultimate appeal by denial of the pre-trial appeal now sought, we believe that the ultimate disposition of these cases would be delayed rather than advanced by granting this application.

Application denied.

1238

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) the court considers many of the same factors used to determine whether there is “no just reason for delay” for the issuance of a Rule 54(b) certificate. In what respects do the two statutes differ?
2. When is a question of law considered to be “controlling” or subject to a “substantial ground for disagreement”? Must the issue be “dispositive” of the lawsuit in order to be considered controlling? Is it sufficient that the issue could produce “reversible error” on final appeal? Does the party’s “strong disagreement” with the district court’s ruling deserve any weight? For a discussion of these questions and an emphasis on the exceptional nature of review under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), see IN RE CEMENT ANTITRUST LITIGATION, 673 F.2d 1020 (9th Cir. 1982).
3. Is review under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) limited to the question that the trial court identifies in its certified order? YAMAHA MOTOR CORP. v. CALHOUN, 516 U.S. 199, 116 S.Ct. 619, 133 L.Ed.2d 578 (1996), involved the death of a 12-year-old in the territorial waters off Puerto Rico while riding a jet ski manufactured by petitioner. The district court certified the question whether particular items of damage were available in a federal maritime wrongful death action. The Third Circuit granted interlocutory review, but then considered the antecedent question whether state remedies remained available in maritime accidents of this sort. The Supreme Court held that although jurisdiction under Section 1292(b) is limited to the order certified by the district court, it “is not tied to the particular question formulated by the district court.” Rather, “the appellate court may address any issue fairly included within the certified order,” because it is the order—and not the controlling question—that is appealable. Id. at 205, 116 S.Ct. at 623, 133 L.Ed.2d at 585. Compare UNITED STATES v. STANLEY, 483 U.S. 669, 677, 107 S.Ct. 3054, 3060, 97 L.Ed.2d 550, 562 (1987) (jurisdiction does not reach “any other orders that may have been entered in the case”). The Court has relied on Yamaha’s reasoning to justify appellate review of all bases for an order remanding a case to state court even though only one ground for removal would independently support appellate jurisdiction. See BP P.L.C. v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, p. 388, Note 3, supra.

4. Since 1992 the Supreme Court has had power pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(e) to promulgate rules permitting interlocutory appeals from any orders that it deems appropriate. So far, the Court has used this power only once, to add Federal Rule 23(f) pertaining to the appeal of class certification decisions. How would Rule 23(f) affect the result in Coopers & Lybrand, p. 1228, Note 5, supra? How does Rule 23(f) differ in operation from 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b)?

5. In MICROSOFT CORP. v. BAKER, 137 S.Ct. 1702, 198 L.Ed.2d 132 (2017), consumers filed a putative class action. After the district court denied class certification and denied permission to appeal the denial under Federal Rule 23(f), plaintiffs voluntarily dismissed their individual claims with prejudice but reserved the right to revive the claims if the district court order was reversed on appeal. The Supreme Court held that the voluntary dismissal did not qualify as a final order under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, and that allowing an appeal would undermine “Rule 23(f)’s careful calibration.” Id. at 1715, 198 L.Ed.2d at 146.

1239

6. Should the Court’s rulemaking power be used to authorize mandatory interlocutory review for the situations identified in, p. 1236, Note 4 supra? See Glynn, Discontent and Indiscretion: Discretionary Review of Interlocutory Orders, 77 Notre Dame L.Rev. 175, 180 (2001). Would it be advisable to limit such review to questions of unsettled law?

d. An Historical Footnote to the Basic Concept—Injunctions

Read 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1) and Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 65(a) and (b) in the Supplement.

SMITH v. VULCAN IRON WORKS, 165 U.S. 518, 525, 17 S.Ct. 407, 410, 41 L.Ed. 810, 812 (1897):

The manifest intent of this provision, read in the light of the previous practice in the courts of the United States, contrasted with the practice in courts of equity of the highest authority elsewhere, appears to this court to have been, not only to permit the defendant to obtain immediate relief from an injunction, the continuance of which throughout the progress of the cause might seriously affect his interests, but also to save both parties from the expense of further litigation, should the appellate court be of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction because his bill had no equity to support it.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. What is the justification for allowing appeals from interlocutory orders granting or refusing injunctions? Do these reasons apply to orders granting or denying preliminary injunctions? Would it work just as well to relegate the parties to discretionary appeals under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b)? Why is it significant that injunctive orders are outside the scope of Federal Rule 54(b)?

2. Is the grant or denial of a temporary restraining order under Federal Rule 65(b) appealable? See 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1). Are the differences between preliminary injunctions and temporary restraining orders relevant to the question whether appeal should be permitted in the case of the former and not permitted in the case of the latter? In close cases it may be difficult to tell the difference between a preliminary injunction and a temporary restraining order.

1240

In UNITED STATES v. WOOD, 295 F.2d 772 (5th Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 369 U.S. 850, 82 S.Ct. 933, 8 L.Ed.2d 9 (1962), a Black man who was active in voter registration in Mississippi was arrested for disturbing the peace and ordered to trial in 15 days. Two days before trial, the United States, moving under 42 U.S.C. § 1971 and alleging that the prosecution would intimidate African-Americans in the exercise of their voting rights, brought suit to restrain the criminal action. A temporary restraining order was denied and the Government appealed. The court of appeals held that it had jurisdiction under Section 1291. Inasmuch as the case would quickly become moot if the restraining order was not issued, the court said, its denial was “a final disposition of the * * * claimed right. * * * [T]o call this de facto dismissal a nonappealable interlocutory order is to preclude review altogether.” Id. at 777.

In GULFSTREAM AEROSPACE CORP. v. MAYACAMAS CORP., 485 U.S. 271, 108 S.Ct. 1133, 99 L.Ed.2d 296 (1988), the Supreme Court resolved that a district court’s denial of a motion to stay or dismiss legal proceedings on equitable grounds is not automatically appealable under 28 U.S.C. § 1291(a)(1). Under Gulfstream, an order that has the practical effect of granting or denying an injunction is appealable under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a) if it has serious, irreparable consequence.

3. Does the appeals court retain jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291(a) if during the pendency of the appeal the district court enters a final judgment that incorporates the same relief as the preliminary injunction? See Birmingham Fire Fighters Ass’n 117 v. City of Birmingham, 603 F.3d 1248, 1254–55 (11th Cir. 2010).

B. THE NOTICE AND TIME TO APPEAL

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 58; Rules 3, 4, and 5 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure; and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Under Appellate Rule 3, what must the notice of appeal include? In SMITH v. BARRY, 502 U.S. 244, 112 S.Ct. 678, 116 L.Ed.2d 678 (1992), an inmate, without consulting counsel, filed a notice of appeal while a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict was pending in his civil rights suit. The clerk for the court of appeals responded to the notice of appeal by sending all of the parties copies of the “informal brief” that the court uses in pro se appeals, and appellant returned his informal brief to the appellate court within the deadline for filing a notice of appeal. After appointment of counsel for appellant, the Fourth Circuit dismissed the appeal for want of jurisdiction. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that an appellate brief may serve as a notice of appeal under Appellate Rule 3 when it gives notice of the litigant’s intent to seek review. On remand, the appeals court held that the informal brief sufficed as a notice of appeal with respect to six prison guards, but not to a prison psychologist. The informal brief asked for a “new trial on all issues triable by Jury,” but did not mention the doctor and so notice was not provided. Smith v. Barry, 985 F.2d 180, 184 (4th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 874, 114 S.Ct. 207, 126 L.Ed.2d 164.

1241

2. In TORRES v. OAKLAND SCAVENGER CO., 487 U.S. 312, 108 S.Ct. 2405, 101 L.Ed.2d 285 (1988), the Court held that the court of appeals lacked jurisdiction over a litigant in a purported class action when the notice of appeal under Appellate Rule 3(c) used the term “et al.” rather than listing the names of all of the appellants. The fact that the omission was due to a clerical error by the secretary employed by the litigant’s attorney did not provide grounds for waiver. Although Appellate Rule 3(c) was amended in 1979 to add that an appeal “shall not be dismissed for informality of form or title of the notice of appeal,” the Court emphasized that “[t]he failure to name a party in a notice of appeal is more than excusable ‘informality’; it constitutes a failure of that party to appeal.” Does the failure to list the parties’ names in the notice of appeal raise due process concerns?

3. What is the effect of a notice of appeal if it is filed before entry of judgment? See Appellate Rule 4(a)(2). The leading case on the effect of a premature notice of appeal, at least when the appeal is taken under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, is FIRSTIER MORTGAGE CO. v. INVESTORS MORTGAGE INSURANCE CO., 498 U.S. 269, 111 S.Ct. 648, 112 L.Ed.2d 743 (1991). The Court stated:

In our view, Rule 4(a)(2) permits a notice of appeal from a nonfinal decision to operate as a notice of appeal from the final judgment only when a district court announces a decision that would be appealable if immediately followed by the entry of judgment. In these instances, a litigant’s confusion is understandable, and permitting the notice of appeal to become effective when judgment is entered does not catch the appellee by surprise. * * *

Id. at 276, 111 S.Ct. at 653, 112 L.Ed.2d at 753. However, the Court went on to say that Appellate Rule 4(a)(2) does not permit a premature notice of appeal from a “clearly interlocutory decision—such as a discovery ruling or a sanction order under Rule 11” because a “belief that such a decision is a fatal judgment would not be reasonable.” Id. at 276, 111 S.Ct. 648, 112 L.Ed.2d at 753.

4. How does the filing of a post-judgment motion affect the time to file an appeal? See Appellate Rule 4(a)(4). Whether a motion falls within the rule has generated a great deal of confusion. In BUDINICH v. BECTON DICKINSON & CO., 486 U.S. 196, 108 S.Ct. 1717, 100 L.Ed.2d 178 (1988), the district court determined plaintiff’s new trial motion on May 14, leaving only the amount of attorney’s fees to be decided. That motion was decided August 1, and plaintiff filed a notice of appeal on August 29. Citing, among other cases, Brown Shoe, see p. 1228, supra, the Court found that the May 14 order was a final judgment and dismissed the appeal as to all issues other than attorney’s fees:

1242

We are not inclined to adopt a disposition that requires the merits or nonmerits status of each attorney’s fee provision to be clearly established before [finality can be determined]. Courts and litigants are best served by the bright-line rule, which accords with traditional understanding, that a decision on the merits is a “final decision” for purposes of § 1291 whether or not there remains for adjudication a request for attorney’s fees attributable to the case.

Id. at 202, 108 S.Ct. at 1722, 100 L.Ed.2d at 185. Appellate Rule 4(a)(4) was later amended to conform to Budinich. As the Advisory Committee Note explains, the revised rule “exclude[s] motions for attorney’s fees from the class of motions that extend the filing time unless a district court, acting under Rule 58, enters an order extending the time for appeal.”

5. Appellate Rule 4(a)(5) permits the district court to extend the filing period, but only upon a finding of excusable neglect or good cause. PIONEER INVESTMENT SERVS. CO. v. BRUNSWICK ASSOC. LTD. PARTNERSHIP, 507 U.S. 380, 113 S.Ct. 1489, 123 L.Ed.2d 74 (1993), concerned the late filing of a proof of claim in the bankruptcy court. The Supreme Court found excusable neglect on the basis of a balancing of four factors: the party’s good faith; the absence of any danger of prejudice to the opposing party; the length of the filing delay and its effect on the proceeding; and the reason for the delay. However, in BOWLES v. RUSSELL, 551 U.S. 205, 127 S.Ct. 2360, 168 L.Ed.2d 96 (2007), the Supreme Court made clear that the district court’s authority to grant an extension of time is limited by the time periods set out by statute, and rejected as untimely a notice of appeal filed outside the statutory period but in conformity with the district court’s order. The Bowles rationale is grounded in separation of powers, and does not apply to time limits set out in court rules, which are treated as claim-processing rules and may be subject to forfeiture. See Hamer v. Neighborhood Services of Chicago, 583 U.S. ___, 138 S.Ct. 13, 199 L.Ed.2d 249 (2017).

6.In 1963 and again in 2002, Federal Rule 58 was amended to clarify when a judgment is considered entered and thus the time for appeal begins to run. When is a separate document not required for a judgment?

C. THE AMBIT OF APPELLATE REVIEW

1.ISSUES SUBJECT TO REVIEW

There are a number of well-defined limits on the scope of appellate review. First, the alleged errors must appear in the trial court record. Thus it is vital during the course of pretrial preparation as well as during trial itself that an attorney make certain that all rulings and evidence that might form the basis for an appeal be formally recorded. Second, an aggrieved party must have objected promptly to the trial court regarding rulings or events that the judge could have corrected or ameliorated. Normally an error is waived unless a proper objection was taken. Third, even if the issue that the appellant seeks to have reviewed has been presented properly below and has not been waived, it must not constitute “harmless error”—that is, it must have affected substantial rights. See Federal Rule 61. Finally, an alleged error must be presented to the appellate court in appellant’s brief and the relevant portions of the trial court record must be brought to the appellate court’s attention.

1243

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

- 1. What justification is there for a rule that a party may not raise an issue on appeal that was not raised in the trial court? Is it fair to penalize the party for what is likely a lawyer’s error?
- 2.If a party has presented undisputed facts or facts necessarily determined at trial for that party which sustain a claim or defense on a theory not argued at trial, should the appellate court be permitted to make its determination on the basis of the new theory?
- 3. What underlies a rule that an error, if “harmless,” will not provide a basis for reversal? Is it really possible for an appellate court to determine what would have affected a jury’s determination? Does this rule give the appellate court broad latitude to disregard error below, undermining the appellate system’s error-correction function? Or does the rule make it possible for an appellate court to instruct lower courts without needlessly incurring the costs of a new trial?

Even when the appellant has properly preserved issues in the trial court and presented them to the appellate court for review, there is another question—whether, and in what circumstances, an appellate court may entertain an appeal by the party who, at least ostensibly, won below.

ELECTRICAL FITTINGS CORP. v. THOMAS & BETTS CO.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1939.
307 U.S. 241, 59 S.Ct. 860, 83 L.Ed. 1263.

Certiorari to United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

This was a suit in equity by the respondents for alleged infringement of a patent. The District Court held claim 1 valid but not infringed and claim 2 invalid. Instead of dismissing the bill without more, it entered a decree adjudging claim 1 valid but dismissing the bill for failure to prove infringement.

1244

The respondents did not appeal, but filed in the Patent Office a disclaimer of claim 2. The petitioners appealed to the Circuit Court of Appeals from so much of the decree as adjudicated claim 1 valid. The appeal was dismissed on the ground that the petitioners had been awarded all the relief to which they were entitled, the litigation having finally terminated in their favor. The court was of opinion that the decree would not bind the petitioners in subsequent suits on the issue of the validity of claim 1.

* * * A party may not appeal from a judgment or decree in his favor, for the purpose of obtaining a review of findings he deems erroneous which are not necessary to support the decree. But here the decree itself purports to adjudge the validity of claim 1, and though the adjudication was immaterial to the disposition of the cause, it stands as an adjudication of one of the issues litigated. We think the petitioners were entitled to have this portion of the decree eliminated, and that the Circuit Court of Appeals had jurisdiction * * * to entertain the appeal, not for the purpose of passing on the merits, but to direct the reformation of the decree.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. NEW YORK TELEPHONE CO. v. MALTBIIE, 291 U.S. 645, 645, 54 S.Ct. 443, 443, 78 L.Ed. 1041, 1042 (1934) (per curiam):

The District Court * * * permanently enjoined, as confiscatory, the enforcement of the rate orders which are the subject of this suit. The injunction is unqualified. Appellant, having obtained this relief, is not entitled to prosecute an appeal from the decree in its favor, for the purpose of reviewing the portions of the decree fixing the value of appellant’s property as of the years 1924, 1926, and 1928, and the rate of return to be allowed. The matters set forth in these portions of the decree are not to be regarded as res judicata in relation to subsequent legislative action by the Public Service Commission in fixing rates for the future or in any judicial proceeding relating to such rates.

Would the decree in Electrical Fittings have been preclusive of the validity of claim 1 of the patent? Why else might petitioners in that case have been concerned about the decree? The Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201–02, was not in force at the time of the Electrical Fittings decision. Had it been, might it have been possible to treat the district court’s decree as a declaratory judgment with respect to claim 1 and consider it as having been entered under the authority of Rule 54(c)?

2.In PARTMAR CORP. v. PARAMOUNT PICTURES THEATRES CORP., 347 U.S. 89, 74 S.Ct. 414, 98 L.Ed. 532 (1954), plaintiff leased its theater to, and entered into a franchise agreement with, defendant; the lease was to be terminable at plaintiff’s option if the franchise agreement terminated. Plaintiff sued to regain possession of the theater, alleging that it was entitled to terminate the lease because the franchise agreement was invalid under the antitrust laws; defendant counterclaimed for damages under the antitrust laws. The trial court denied plaintiff’s claim, holding that the franchise agreement was not invalid because no conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws had been established; it also dismissed the counterclaims. Defendant appealed from the dismissal of its counterclaims. The Supreme Court upheld the dismissal on the ground that the trial court’s decision on plaintiff’s claim that there was no unlawful antitrust conspiracy was binding on the counterclaim. Could defendant have appealed the decision of the trial court plaintiff’s claim, despite the fact that it had been decided in defendant’s favor? In a footnote, a majority of the Supreme Court, citing New York Tel. and Electrical Fittings, said “yes.” In effect, the Court found that defendant was a “winner” on plaintiff’s claim, but a “loser” on the counterclaim and could therefore appeal any issue that directly affected the counterclaim. Id. at 99 n.6, 74 S.Ct. at 420 n.6, 98 L.Ed. at 541 n.6.

1245

Chief Justice Warren, in dissent, took the position that defendant could not have appealed the trial court’s decision on the claim, arguing that the adverse finding that there was no conspiracy had not been included in the decree, thus distinguishing Electrical Fittings. Under those circumstances defendant need not have appealed because the decision on plaintiff’s claim should not have been held to have had a binding effect on the counterclaim.

3. Are there circumstances when a nonparty can appeal a decision? See 15A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3902.1 (2d ed.). The commentators state:

The basic rule that a nonparty cannot appeal the judgment in an action between others seems obviously sensible. * * * Appeal is likely to be available, however, if the would-be appellant can show significant involvement with the judgment, plausible reasons for not becoming involved earlier, a risk that its interests will not be adequately protected by the parties, and a lack of untoward interference in the affairs of the parties.

Does the analysis change if the nonparty is the subject of a civil contempt order? See Steinman, Irregulars: The Appellate Rights of Persons Who Are Not Full-Fledged Parties, 38 Ga.L.Rev. 411 (2005).

1246

INTERNATIONAL ORE & FERTILIZER CORP. v. SGS CONTROL SERVICES, INC.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1994.
38 F.3d 1279.

WINTER, CIRCUIT JUDGE.

[Defendant agreed to transport a cargo of fertilizer for plaintiff to a buyer in New Zealand. Because defendant’s ship had not been cleaned sufficiently, the cargo was contaminated and the purchaser refused delivery, resulting in damages to plaintiff. Plaintiff sued defendant both for breach of contract and for negligent misrepresentation of the condition of its ship. After evidence was presented, the trial judge rejected the contract claim, but upheld the claim of negligent misrepresentation and awarded damages. Defendant appealed. The appellate court held that the negligent misrepresentation claim should have been dismissed and determined that the contract claim, which would have justified a larger damage award to plaintiff, should have been upheld. However, the court was faced with the argument that it could not rule on the contract claim because plaintiff had not filed a cross-appeal.]

* * *

* * * The general rule in a case in which a party fails to cross-appeal and an appellate court would otherwise have held in its favor is that:

[A] party who does not appeal from a final decree of the trial court cannot be heard in opposition thereto when the case is brought here by the appeal of the adverse party. In other words, the appellee may not attack the decree with a view either to enlarging his own rights thereunder or of lessening the rights of his adversary, whether what he seeks is to correct an error or to supplement the decree with respect to a matter not dealt with below. But it is likewise settled that the appellee may, without taking a cross-appeal, urge in support of a decree any matter appearing in the record, although his argument may involve an attack upon the reasoning of the lower court or an insistence upon matter overlooked or ignored by it. * * *

United States v. American Ky. Express Co., 265 U.S. 425, 44 S.Ct. 560, 563–64, 68 L.Ed. 1087 (1924). * * *

This rule has been modified in some circuits by treating the requirement of a cross-appeal as one of practice rather than jurisdiction, allowing the court to use its discretion to consider unappealed grounds so as to exercise its “broad power ‘to make such a disposition . . . as justice requires.’ ” * * * Generally, however, these cases have involved multiple parties where only one of several plaintiffs or defendants failed to cross-appeal. In each case, the court included the non-cross-appellant in the amended judgment so as to preserve “fairness.”

1247

Several of our recent decisions have referred without elaboration to the discretionary nature of our power to disregard the cross-appeal requirement. * * * These cases conform to the general rule that the appellee may seek to sustain a judgment on any grounds with support in the record. * * * This rule applies even when the alternative grounds were not asserted until the court’s questioning at oral argument. * * * We may, therefore, uphold the finding of liability on a breach of contract theory.

We do not believe, however, that given the present procedural circumstances, * * * [plaintiff] is entitled to its full damages. Although an appellee who has not cross-appealed may urge alternative grounds for affirmance, it may not seek to enlarge its rights under the judgment by enlarging the amount of damages or scope of equitable relief. * * * We may therefore uphold the present judgment but we may not enlarge it to award * * * [plaintiff] its full contract damages.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Is the rule that a cross-appeal must be filed to change the amount awarded as damages a matter of practice or of jurisdiction? Is it significant that arguments that support the judgment as entered can be made without a cross-appeal? Is a cross-appeal necessary to secure post-judgment interest denied by the district court? Consider the effect of Appellate Rule 37. Is a cross-appeal necessary to challenge the subject-matter jurisdiction of the district court?

2.Consider the effect of Torres, p. 1241, Note 2, supra, on the power of the appellate court to excuse a failure to file a separate notice of appeal. In the light of the Court’s holding that a notice of appeal listing 15 of the 16 plaintiffs plus “et al.” did not support an appeal by the one unidentified plaintiff, does a court of appeals have power to enter relief to a party who is not named in a notice of appeal?

3.In JENNINGS v. STEPHENS, 574 U.S. 271, 135 S.Ct. 793, 190 L.Ed.2d 662 (2015), the Supreme Court emphasized the difference between a court’s adjudication of different theories for relief and its adjudication of different forms of relief. The petitioner sought habeas relief in the district court on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel during the sentencing phase of his state court capital murder trial. He advanced three theories for why his trial counsel had been constitutionally ineffective. The district court ruled in petitioner’s favor on the first two theories but rejected the third; the court then entered judgment ordering the state to give petitioner a new sentencing hearing or commute his sentence or else release him. When the state appealed to the Fifth Circuit, petitioner defended the district court’s ruling on the first two theories but also argued that the district court should have granted habeas relief on the third theory as well. The court of appeals rejected the district court’s decision on the first two theories and declined to consider petitioner’s arguments on the third theory because he had not filed a cross-appeal.

1248

The Supreme Court reversed and held that petitioner was not required to take a cross-appeal in order for the court of appeals to consider his arguments on the third theory. Justice Scalia, writing for the Court, explained that “[a] prevailing party seeks to enforce not a district court’s reasoning, but the court’s judgment.” Petitioner had not sought on appeal to enlarge the relief ordered by the district court or otherwise to alter the rights granted by the district court’s judgment. The district court had entered judgment in his favor, and there was nothing for him to cross-appeal, because petitioner, “whether prevailing on a single theory or all three, sought the same, indivisible relief: a new sentencing hearing.” Id. at 282, 135 S.Ct. at 802, 190 L.Ed. at 671.

2.REVIEW OF FACT FINDING

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 52 and 59 and the Seventh Amendment to the United States Constitution in the Supplement.

a.Fact Finding in Cases Decided by a Jury

CORCORAN V. CITY OF CHICAGO

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1940.
373 Ill. 567, 27 N.E.2d 451.

MURPHY, JUSTICE. John F. Corcoran * * * began a suit * * * against the city of Chicago * * * to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent acts of the defendant. The cause was tried with a jury and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $5,000. A motion for new trial was overruled and judgment entered on the verdict. On appeal, the Appellate Court for the First District reversed the judgment and remanded the cause for another trial. The plaintiff filed a motion in the Appellate Court asking that the remanding part of the order be stricken [in order that on appeal to the state Supreme Court, that court could then order that the initial verdict be reinstated]. * * * The motion was granted * * *.

The negligence charged was that defendant had carelessly and negligently permitted certain streets to be and remain in an unsafe condition for travel * * *. The evidence was conflicting. The Appellate Court found the verdict was against the manifest weight of the evidence and reversed the judgment for that reason.

1249

It is conceded the power which the Appellate Court assumed to exercise in reviewing the evidence and setting aside the verdict is found in section 92(3b) of the Civil Practice Act * * * which provides that Appellate Courts may review “error of fact, in that the judgment, decree or order appealed from is not sustained by the evidence or is against the weight of the evidence.” Plaintiff’s position is that such provision, as applied to facts found by a jury upon conflicting evidence, as in the instant case, is unconstitutional, in that the findings of the Appellate Court * * * take from him the right to a trial by jury as guaranteed by section 5 of article 2 of the [Illinois] Constitution * * *.

* * *

Prior to 1837, the law of this state was that the granting or refusal of a motion for a new trial rested in the sound discretion of the trial court and the ruling thereon could not be urged as error in the court of review. * * * In 1837, an act was passed which provided “exceptions taken to opinions or decisions of circuit court overruling motions in arrest of judgment, motions for new trials and for continuance of causes shall hereafter be allowed and the party excepting may assign for error any opinion so excepted to, any usage to the contrary notwithstanding.” The substance of the act * * * has been the statutory law of this state since 1837.

* * *

The effect of the operation of the statute was considered in Chicago & Rock Island Railroad Co. v. McKean, 40 Ill. 218, a case where the trial court had overruled a motion for new trial and error was assigned on such ruling. Mr. Justice Breese, speaking for the court, said: “An appellate court was, before the passage of that act, judge of the law only * * *. The old and honored maxim once was, ‘the judges respond to the law, the jury to the facts,’ but now, by this innovation, the judges of an appellate court have as much power over the facts as the jury had in the first instance, for it is undeniable this court may set aside a verdict if the facts fail to satisfy it of its propriety. * * *”

Plaintiff contends that on all questions of fact where the evidence is conflicting the verdict of the jury can not be set aside as being against the weight of the evidence except by the court that tried the case, and asserts that such was the practice at common law. * * *

* * *

From the authorities cited and others which have been examined, we conclude that there was a practice at common law which authorized the courts exercising appellate jurisdiction to set aside verdicts on the grounds the findings of fact were not supported by the evidence. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

1250

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. How does the reviewing court’s role differ when the trial court has denied the motion for a new trial on the weight of the evidence and when it has granted the motion? See Carrington, The Power of District Judges and the Responsibility of Courts of Appeals, 3 Ga.L.Rev. 507 (1969); Schnapper, Judges Against Juries—Appellate Review of Federal Civil Jury Verdicts, 1989 Wis.L.Rev. 237, 298–313.
2. In the federal system, the appellate court applies an abuse of discretion standard in reviewing the district court’s denial of a Rule 59(a) motion for a new trial based upon the excessiveness of the jury’s compensatory damage award, giving “the benefit of every doubt to the judgment of the trial judge.” Gasperini, p. 492, supra. Whether a jury award is excessive is considered to be a question of law. See Cooper Industries, Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc., 532 U.S. 424, 121 S.Ct. 1678, 149 L.Ed.2d 674 (2001), in which the Court stated, “Because the jury’s award of punitive damages does not constitute a finding of ‘fact,’ appellate review of the district court’s determination that an award is consistent with due process does not implicate the Seventh Amendment * * *.” Id. at 437, 121 S.Ct. at 1687, 149 L.Ed.2d at 687–88.
3. GOOGLE LLC v. ORACLE AMERICA, INC., 593 U.S. ___, 141 S.Ct. 1183, 209 L.Ed.2d 311 (2021), considered the role of an appellate court when reviewing a jury verdict that involves mixed questions of law and fact.

When developing Android, a computer operating system designed for smartphones and other mobile devices, Google copied roughly 11,500 lines of computer code (out of 2.86 million lines) from the software platform for the Java programming language. Oracle, which acquired the copyright to Java, sued Google in federal court for infringement of that copyright. In response, Google argued, among other things, that its copying of the Java code was protected by the “fair use” defense to liability under the Copyright Act of 1976. See 17 U.S.C. § 107. The statutory defense includes a non-exclusive list of factors to be considered to determine whether use of a copyrighted work constitutes infringement. After a weeklong jury trial, the district court asked the jury to determine whether Google had shown, by a preponderance of the evidence, that its copying of the Java code “constitutes a ‘fair use’ under the Copyright Act.” The jury returned a verdict finding that Google had established fair use as an affirmative defense, and the district court entered judgment accordingly. Oracle appealed to the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which reversed. The court of appeals assumed that all factual issues had been resolved in Google’s favor but treated the issue whether those facts constituted fair use under the Copyright Act as a question of law subject to de novo review. On that question, the Federal Circuit concluded Google’s copying was not fair use and remanded for a new trial on damages. The Supreme Court reversed the Federal Circuit’s fair use decision.

Although the Court disagreed with the Federal Circuit’s ultimate conclusion about the merits of Google’s fair use defense, it did agree with the court of appeals that fair use should be treated as a mixed question of law and fact, “leaving factual determinations to the jury and reviewing the ultimate question, a legal question, de novo.” The Court explained:

1251

* * * We have said, “[f]air use is a mixed question of law and fact.” We have explained that a reviewing court should try to break such a question into its separate factual and legal parts, reviewing each according to the appropriate legal standard. But when a question can be reduced no further, we have added that “the standard of review for a mixed question all depends—on whether answering it entails primarily legal or factual work.”

In this case, the ultimate “fair use” question primarily involves legal work. “Fair use” was originally a concept fashioned by judges. Our cases still provide legal interpretations of the fair use provision. And those interpretations provide general guidance for future cases.

593 U.S. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 1199–1200, 209 L.Ed.2d at 331.

The Court also rejected Google’s arguments that the Federal Circuit’s approach violated the Reexamination Clause of the Seventh Amendment or the underlying right to trial by jury preserved by the Seventh Amendment. There was no reexamination concern because “[i]t does not violate the Reexamination Clause for a court to determine the controlling law in resolving a challenge to a jury verdict, as happens any time a court resolves a motion for judgment as a matter of law.” The Court similarly rejected the argument, based on trial practice in eighteenth century English copyright cases, that the right to trial by jury under the Seventh Amendment included the right to have a jury resolve a fair use defense. The Seventh Amendment guarantees the common law jury trial right as it existed in 1791, when the amendment was adopted. But, the Court explained, “we have described the [fair use] doctrine as an ‘equitable,’ not a ‘legal,’ doctrine.” Id. at ___, 141 S.Ct. at 1200, 209 L.Ed.2d at 331–32.

In light of the Supreme Court’s holding in Google, how should an appellate court disentangle the portions of a mixed question of law and fact that are subject to de novo review? Would it be better for appellate courts to adopt a standard analogous to Rule 50, which governs motions for judgment as a matter of law at trial and after trial? See p. 1111, Chapter 14, Section C, supra. Professor Steinman offers the following argument in favor of a deferential approach, drawn from Rule 50, to appellate review of a jury’s verdict on a mixed question of law and fact:

The deference required by Rule 50’s reasonable jury standard is not absolute, of course. A court may examine whether the evidence at trial is sufficient to support a particular verdict; that is, the court can and should hold a party to its burden of production with respect to a particular issue. And Rule 50 permits the court to clarify the substantive law in a particular area in a way that renders only one outcome supportable “as a matter of law.” In this way, Rule 50 invites appellate courts to engage in “explicit norm elaboration,” which could dictate particular results for a particular set of conditions. Thus, the court can refine the governing “legal test” or “standard” for an issue by declaring subsidiary rules or principles that address particular situations.

1252

Steinman, Appellate Courts and Civil Juries, 2021 Wisc.L.Rev. 1, 25 (citations omitted).

b.Fact Findings in a Non-Jury Case

PULLMAN-STANDARD V. SWINT
Supreme Court of the United States, 1982.
456 U.S. 273, 102 S.Ct. 1781, 72 L.Ed.2d 66.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the Court.

Respondents were black employees at the Bessemer, Alabama plant of petitioner, Pullman-Standard (the “company”), a manufacturer of railway freight cars and parts. They brought suit against the company and the union petitioners * * * alleging violations of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 * * *. As they come here, these cases involve only the validity, under Title VII, of a seniority system maintained by the Company and USW [the United Steel Workers of America]. The District Court found “that the differences in terms, conditions or privileges of employment resulting [from the seniority system] are ‘not the result of an intention to discriminate’ because of race or color,” * * * and held, therefore, that the system satisfied the requirements of § 703(h) of the Act. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed:

“Because we find that the differences in the terms, conditions and standards of employment for black workers and white workers at Pullman-Standard resulted from an intent to discriminate because of race, we hold that the system is not legally valid under section 703(h) of Title VII, 42 U.S.C. 2000e–2(h).” 624 F.2d 525, 533–534 (1980).

We granted the petitions for certiorari * * * limited to the first question presented in each petition: whether a Court of Appeals is bound by the “clearly erroneous” rule of Federal Rule * * * 52(a) in reviewing a District Court’s findings of fact, arrived at after a lengthy trial, as to the motivation of the parties who negotiated a seniority system; and whether the court below applied wrong legal criteria in determining the bona fides of the seniority system. We conclude that the Court of Appeals erred in the course of its review and accordingly reverse its judgment and remand for further proceedings.

* * *

1253

In connection with its assertion that it was convinced that a mistake had been made, the Court of Appeals, in a footnote, referred to the clearly erroneous standard of Rule 52(a). * * * It pointed out, however, that if findings “are made under an erroneous view of controlling legal principles, the clearly erroneous rule does not apply, and the findings may not stand.” Finally, quoting from East v. Romine, Inc., 518 F.2d 332, 339 (C.A.5 1975), the Court of Appeals repeated the following view of its appellate function in Title VII cases where purposeful discrimination is at issue:

“Although discrimination vel non is essentially a question of fact it is, at the same time, the ultimate issue for resolution in this case, being expressly proscribed by 42 U.S.C.A. § 2000e–2(a). As such, a finding of discrimination or nondiscrimination is a finding of ultimate fact. [Cites omitted.]^d In reviewing the district court’s findings, therefore, we will proceed to make an independent determination of appellant’s allegations of discrimination, though bound by findings of subsidiary fact which are themselves not clearly erroneous.” 624 F.2d, at 533, n. 6.

* * * [P]etitioners submit that the Court of Appeals made an independent determination of discriminatory purpose, the “ultimate fact” in this case, and that this was error under Rule 52. We agree with petitioners that if the Court of Appeals followed what seems to be the accepted rule in that circuit, its judgment must be reversed.

Rule 52(a) broadly requires that findings of fact not be set aside unless clearly erroneous. It does not make exceptions or purport to exclude certain categories of factual findings from the obligation of a Court of Appeals to accept a district court’s findings unless clearly erroneous. It does not divide facts into categories; in particular, it does not divide findings of fact into those that deal with “ultimate” and those that deal with “subsidiary” facts.

The rule does not apply to conclusions of law. The Court of Appeals, therefore, was quite right in saying that if a District Court’s findings rest on an erroneous view of the law, they may be set aside on that basis. But here the District Court was not faulted for misunderstanding or applying an erroneous definition of intentional discrimination. It was reversed for arriving at what the Court of Appeals thought was an erroneous finding as to whether the differential impact of the seniority system reflected an intent to discriminate on account of race. That question, as we see it, is a pure question of fact, subject to Rule 52’s clearly erroneous standard. It is not a question of law and not a mixed question of law and fact.

* * * Rule 52 does not furnish particular guidance with respect to distinguishing law from fact. Nor do we yet know of any other rule or principle that will unerringly distinguish a factual finding from a legal conclusion. For the reasons that follow, however, we have little doubt about the factual nature of § 703(h)’s requirement that a seniority system be free of an intent to discriminate.

1254

* * *

* * * It would make no sense * * * to say that the intent to discriminate required by § 703(h) may be presumed from such an impact. As § 703(h) was construed in * * * [International Broth. of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 97 S.Ct. 1843, 52 L.Ed.2d 396 (1977)] there must be a finding of actual intent to discriminate on racial grounds on the part of those who negotiated or maintained the system. That finding appears to us to be a pure question of fact.

This is not to say that discriminatory impact is not part of the evidence to be considered by the trial court in reaching a finding on whether there was such a discriminatory intent as a factual matter. We do assert, however, that under § 703(h) discriminatory intent is a finding of fact to be made by the trial court; it is not a question of law and not a mixed question of law and fact of the kind that in some cases may allow an appellate court to review the facts to see if they satisfy some legal concept of discriminatory intent. Discriminatory intent here means actual motive; it is not a legal presumption to be drawn from a factual showing of something less than actual motive. Thus, a court of appeals may only reverse a district court’s finding on discriminatory intent if it concludes that the finding is clearly erroneous under Rule 52(a). Insofar as the Fifth Circuit assumed otherwise, it erred.

Respondents do not directly defend the Fifth Circuit rule that a trial court’s finding on discriminatory intent is not subject to the clearly erroneous standard of Rule 52. Rather, among other things, they submit that the Court of Appeals recognized and, where appropriate, properly applied Rule 52 in setting aside the findings of the District Court. This position has force, but for two reasons it is not persuasive.

First, although the Court of Appeals acknowledged and correctly stated the controlling standard of Rule 52, the acknowledgement came late in the court’s opinion. The court had not expressly referred to or applied Rule 52 in the course of disagreeing with the District Court’s resolution of the factual issues deemed relevant * * *. Furthermore, the paragraph in which the court finally concludes that the USW seniority system is unprotected by § 703(h) strongly suggests that the outcome was the product of the court’s independent consideration of the totality of the circumstances it found in the record.

Second and more fundamentally, when the court stated that it was convinced that a mistake had been made, it then not only identified the mistake but also the source of that mistake. The mistake of the District Court was that on the record there could be no doubt about the existence of a discriminatory purpose. * * *

1255

When an appellate court discerns that a district court has failed to make a finding because of an erroneous view of the law, the usual rule is that there should be a remand for further proceedings to permit the trial court to make the missing findings * * *. Likewise, where findings are infirm because of an erroneous view of the law, a remand is the proper course unless the record permits only one resolution of the factual issue. * * * All of this is elementary. Yet the Court of Appeals, after holding that the District Court had failed to consider relevant evidence and indicating that the District Court might have come to a different conclusion had it considered that evidence, failed to remand for further proceedings * * *. Instead, the Court of Appeals made its own determination [and findings] * * * and apparently concluded that the foregoing was sufficient to remove the system from the protection of § 703(h).

Proceeding in this manner seems to us incredible unless the Court of Appeals construed its own well-established Circuit rule with respect to its authority to arrive at independent findings on ultimate facts free of the strictures of Rule 52 also to permit it to examine the record and make its own independent findings with respect to those issues on which the district court’s findings are set aside for an error of law. As we have previously said, however, the premise for this conclusion is infirm: whether an ultimate fact or not, discriminatory intent under § 703(h) is a factual matter subject to the clearly erroneous standard of Rule 52. It follows that when a district court’s finding on such an ultimate fact is set aside for an error of law, the court of appeals is not relieved of the usual requirement of remanding for further proceedings to the tribunal charged with the task of fact finding in the first instance.

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the cases are remanded to that court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

* * *

[JUSTICE STEVENS concurred in part, JUSTICE MARSHALL dissented, and JUSTICE BLACKMUN joined in part. The gist of the dissent was that the evidence was documentary and thus the appellate court was in an equally good position to determine the facts as was the trial judge.]

INWOOD LABORATORIES, INC. v. IVES LABORATORIES, INC., 456 U.S. 844, 102 S.Ct. 2182, 72 L.Ed.2d 606 (1982). In a trademark infringement suit brought by Ives Laboratories against Inwood

1256

Laboratories, the district court entered judgment for defendant, finding that plaintiff had not made the necessary factual showings. The court of appeals reversed, making its own review of the evidence, and finding the evidence clearly sufficient to establish a violation. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the appellate court was bound by the clearly erroneous standard of Federal Rule 52(a):

That Rule recognizes and rests upon the unique opportunity afforded the trial court judge to evaluate the credibility of witnesses and to weigh the evidence. * * * Because of the deference due the trial judge, unless an appellate court is left with the “definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed,” * * * it must accept the trial court’s findings.

* * *

Each of [the Second Circuit’s] conclusions is contrary to the findings of the District Court. An appellate court cannot substitute its interpretation of the evidence for that of the trial court simply because the reviewing court “might give the facts another construction, resolve the ambiguities differently, and find a more sinister cast to actions which the District Court apparently deemed innocent.” * * *

In a footnote, the majority observed:

Of course, if the trial court bases its findings upon a mistaken impression of applicable legal principles, the reviewing court is not bound by the clearly erroneous standard. * * * However, in this instance the District Court applied correct legal principles when it adopted the precise test developed by the Court of Appeals. * * *

Id. at 855–59 & n.15, 102 S.Ct. at 2186–87 & n.15, 72 L.Ed.2d at 616–18 & n.15.

BOSE CORP. v. CONSUMERS UNION OF UNITED STATES, INC., 466 U.S. 485, 104 S.Ct. 1949, 80 L.Ed.2d 502 (1984). Bose, a manufacturer of stereo loudspeaker systems, sued Consumers Union for product disparagement based on statements contained in an article evaluating a system manufactured by Bose. The district court found that Bose was a “public figure” under the constitutional standard articulated in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 84 S.Ct. 710, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964), so that Bose was required to prove by clear and convincing evidence a false and disparaging statement made with “actual malice.” The trial court found “actual malice,” and entered judgment for Bose. The court of appeals reversed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Court explained that the clearly erroneous standard of Rule 52(a) does not govern the standard of review for a determination of actual malice. Rather, in a case involving First Amendment issues, the appeals court must make an independent examination of the record and is not barred from correcting errors of law. It followed that the Court could “accept all of the purely factual findings of the District Court and nevertheless hold as a matter of law that the record does not contain clear and convincing evidence” that the challenged statement was made with reckless disregard of the truth. In applying the Rule 52(a) standard, the Court clarified that when the testimony of a witness is not believed, the trial court may ignore it, and “the discredited testimony is not considered a sufficient basis for drawing a contrary conclusion.” 466 U.S. at 512–14, 104 S.Ct. at 1966–67, 80 L.Ed.2d at 525–26. Chief Justice Burger concurred in the result. Justices White, Rehnquist, and O’Connor dissented.

1257

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.If the trial court faces two permissible views of the weight of the evidence, and chooses one, may the appeals court reverse under Federal Rule 52(a)? In ANDERSON v. CITY OF BESSEMER, 470 U.S. 564, 105 S.Ct. 1504, 84 L.Ed.2d 518 (1985), the Supreme Court held:

In Pullman-Standard v. Swint * * * [p. 1252, supra], we held that a District Court’s finding of discriminatory intent in an action brought under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 * * * is a factual finding that may be overturned on appeal only if it is clearly erroneous. In this case, the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit concluded that there was clear error in a District Court’s finding of discrimination and reversed. Because our reading of the record convinces us that the Court of Appeals misapprehended and misapplied the clearly-erroneous standard, we reverse.

* * *

Although the meaning of the phrase “clearly erroneous” is not immediately apparent, certain general principles governing the exercise of the appellate court’s power to overturn findings of a district court may be derived from our cases. The foremost of these principles * * * is that “[a] finding is ‘clearly erroneous’ when although there is evidence to support it, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed.” * * * This standard plainly does not entitle a reviewing court to reverse the finding of the trier of fact simply because it is convinced that it would have decided the case differently. The reviewing court oversteps the bounds of its duty under Rule 52(a) if it undertakes to duplicate the role of the lower court. * * * If the district court’s account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety, the court of appeals may not reverse it even though convinced that had it been sitting as the trier of fact, it would have weighed the evidence differently. Where there are two permissible views of the evidence, the factfinder’s choice between them cannot be clearly erroneous. * * *

1258

The Court clarified that this standard applies even when the findings are not based on credibility determinations:

The rationale for deference to the original finder of fact is not limited to the superiority of the trial judge’s position to make determinations of credibility. The trial judge’s major role is the determination of fact, and with experience in fulfilling that role comes expertise. Duplication of the trial judge’s efforts in the court of appeals would very likely contribute only negligibly to the accuracy of fact determination at a huge cost in diversion of judicial resources. In addition, the parties to a case on appeal have already been forced to concentrate their energies and resources on persuading the trial judge that their account of the facts is the correct one; requiring them to persuade three more judges at the appellate level is requiring too much. As the Court has stated in a different context, the trial on the merits should be “the ‘main event’ . . . rather than a ‘tryout on the road.’ ” * * * For these reasons, review of factual findings under the clearly-erroneous standard—with its deference to the trier of fact—is the rule, not the exception.

Id. at 575, 105 S.Ct. at 1512, 84 L.Ed.2d at 529.

2.In 1985, Rule 52 was amended and Rule 52(a)(6) now states that findings, “whether based on oral or other evidence,” are not to be set aside unless they are found by the reviewing court to be clearly erroneous. See 9C Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2587 (3d ed.).

^aAn earlier version of Federal Rule 56(c) provided that “[a] summary judgment, interlocutory in character, may be rendered on the issue of liability alone although there is a genuine issue as to the amount of damages.”

^bAlteration in original.

^cAlteration in original.

CHAPTER 17

THE BINDING EFFECT OF PRIOR DECISIONS: RES JUDICATA AND COLLATERAL ESTOPPEL

■ ■ ■

This chapter focuses on the binding effect of prior judgments and the twin doctrines of res judicata and collateral estoppel—now known as claim preclusion and issue preclusion. The materials examine the doctrine, its history, and the policies that support the concept of finality. The chapter opens by examining the reach of claim and issue preclusion within a single court system and closes by widening the scope to examine the inter-system effects of a judgment, surely one of the most difficult and vexing questions in the entire Procedure course. As you learn about preclusion, consider this insightful statement about the doctrine: “Courts can only do their best to determine the truth on the basis of the evidence, and the first lesson one must learn on the subject of res judicata is that judicial findings must not be confused with absolute truth.” Currie, Mutuality of Collateral Estoppel: Limits of the Bernhard Doctrine, 9 Stan.L.Rev. 281, 315 (1957).

A. TERMINOLOGY

Although the doctrine of former adjudication is complex, four common sense principles explain it. First, a party ordinarily gets only one chance to litigate a “claim”; if a party litigates only a portion of a claim the first time around, the party risks losing the chance to litigate the rest. Second, a party generally gets only one chance to litigate a factual or a legal “issue”; once litigated, a party cannot ask a second court to decide it differently at a later point. Third, a party typically is entitled to at least one “full and fair” chance to litigate before being barred from having the claims and issues heard by a court. And fourth, the defense of preclusion may be waived unless it is raised at an early stage of the litigation.

The effects of a former adjudication have been discussed in varying and occasionally conflicting terminology. Although a single vocabulary is still not used, substantial progress has been made toward a convention:

“Res judicata” is used * * * as a general term referring to all of the ways in which one judgment will have a binding effect on another. That usage is and doubtless will continue to be common, but it lumps under a single name two quite different effects of judgments. The first is the effect of foreclosing any litigation of matters that never have been litigated, because of the determination that they should have been advanced in an earlier suit. The second is the effect of foreclosing relitigation of matters that have once been litigated and decided. The first of these, preclusion of matters that were never litigated, has gone under the name, “true res judicata,” or the names, “merger and bar.” * * * The second doctrine, preclusion of matters that have once been decided, has usually been called “collateral estoppel.” Professor Allen Vestal has long argued for use of the names “claim preclusion” and “issue preclusion” for these two doctrines, * * * and this usage is increasingly employed by the courts as it is by Restatement Second of Judgments. * * *

Wright & Kane, Law of Federal Courts § 100A (8th ed.).

Another useful summary is the following:

* * * “Res judicata” is the term traditionally used to describe two discrete effects: (1) what we now call claim preclusion (a valid final adjudication of a claim precludes a second action on that claim or any part of it), see Restatement (Second) of Judgments §§ 17–19 (1982); and (2) issue preclusion, long called “collateral estoppel” (an issue of fact or law, actually litigated and resolved by a valid final judgment, binds the parties in a subsequent action, whether on the same or a different claim), see id., at § 27.

BAKER v. GENERAL MOTORS CORP., 522 U.S. 222, 233 n.5, 118 S.Ct. 657, 664 n.5, 139 L.Ed.2d 580, 592 n.5 (1998). See 18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure §§ 4401–15 (3d ed.); Shapiro, Civil Procedure: Preclusion in Civil Actions (2001).

B. CLAIM AND DEFENSE PRECLUSION

It is difficult to give a precise definition of the doctrine of claim preclusion, but it is possible to sketch its general form. One formulation is: In certain circumstances, when a second suit is brought, the judgment from a prior suit will be considered conclusive, both on the parties to the judgment and on those in privity with them, as to matters that actually were litigated or should have been litigated in the first suit. Justice Field has provided a more detailed formulation of the same basic rule:

* * * [A] judgment, if rendered upon the merits, constitutes an absolute bar to a subsequent action. It is a finality as to the claim or demand in controversy, concluding parties and those in privity with them, not only as to every matter which was offered and received to sustain or defeat the claim or demand, but as to any other admissible matter which might have been offered for that purpose. Thus, for example, a judgment rendered upon a promissory note is conclusive as to the validity of the instrument and the amount due on it, although it be subsequently alleged that perfect defences actually existed, of which no proof was offered, such as forgery, want of consideration, or payment. * * * The judgment is as conclusive, so far as future proceedings at law are concerned, as though the defences never existed. * * *

1261

CROMWELL v. COUNTY OF SAC, 94 U.S. (4 Otto) 351, 352–53, 24 L.Ed. 195, 197–98 (1876).

Another helpful explanation is the following:

* * * [T]he preclusive scope of a judgment * * * depends on defining the breadth of the claim or cause of action hazarded in the first suit. If the plaintiff wins, the entire claim is merged in the judgment; the plaintiff cannot bring a second independent action for additional relief, and the defendant cannot avoid the judgment by offering new defenses. If the plaintiff loses, the entire claim is barred by the judgment, even as to evidence, theories, arguments, and remedies that were not advanced in the first litigation. The process of defining the claim or cause of action is thus aimed at defining the matters that both might and should have been advanced in the first litigation. * * * If the second lawsuit involves a new claim or cause of action, the parties may raise assertions or defenses that were omitted from the first lawsuit even though they were equally relevant to the first cause of action. * * *

18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4406 (3d ed.) (emphasis in original). For claim preclusion to operate, three elements must be present. First, only judgments that are “final,” “valid,” and “on the merits” have preclusive effect. Second, the parties in the subsequent action must be identical to or in privity with those in the first. This requirement is one of the most important distinctions between claim preclusion and its sister doctrine, issue preclusion. Third, the claim in the second suit must involve matters properly considered to have been included in the first action. This last requirement is the focus of the case that follows.

1262

1.CLAIM PRECLUSION

RUSH v. CITY OF MAPLE HEIGHTS

Supreme Court of Ohio, 1958.
167 Ohio St. 221, 147 N.E.2d 599, cert. denied, 358 U.S. 814, 79 S.Ct. 21, 3 L.Ed.2d 57.

HERBERT, JUDGE.

[Plaintiff was injured in a fall from a motorcycle. She brought an action in the Municipal Court of Cleveland for damage to her personal property; that court found that defendant city was negligent in maintaining its street and that this negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff’s damages, which were fixed at $100. Defendant appealed and the judgment was affirmed by the Ohio Court of Appeals and Supreme Court. Plaintiff also brought this action in the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga County for personal injuries she incurred in the same accident; her motion to set trial on the issue of damages alone was granted on the ground that defendant was precluded from contesting the issue of negligence because of the municipal court action; judgment was entered in plaintiff’s favor on a verdict for $12,000, and the court of appeals affirmed.]

The eighth error assigned by the defendant is that “the trial and appellate courts committed error in permitting plaintiff to split her cause of action * * *.”

* * *

In the case of Vasu v. Kohlers, Inc., 145 Ohio St. 321, 61 N.E.2d 707, 709, 166 A.L.R. 855, plaintiff operating an automobile came into collision with defendant’s truck, in which collision he suffered personal injuries and also damage to his automobile. At the time of collision, plaintiff had coverage of a $50 deductible collision policy on his automobile. The insurance company paid the plaintiff a sum covering the damage to his automobile, whereupon, in accordance with a provision of the policy, the plaintiff assigned to the insurer his claim for such damage.

In February 1942, the insurance company commenced an action * * * against Kohlers, Inc., * * * to recoup the money paid by it to cover the damage to Vasu’s automobile.

In August 1942, Vasu commenced an action in the same court against Kohlers, Inc., to recover for personal injuries which he suffered in the same collision.

In March 1943, in the insurance company’s action, a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant, followed by judgment.

Two months later an amended answer was filed in the Vasu case, setting out as a bar to the action * * * the judgment rendered in favor of defendant in the insurance company case. A motion to strike that defense

1263

* * * [was] sustained * * *. A trial of the action resulted in a verdict for plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered.

On appeal to the Court of Appeals the defendant claimed that the Court of Common Pleas erred in sustaining plaintiff's motion to strike from the defendant's answer the defense of res judicata claimed to have arisen by reason of the judgment in favor of the defendant in the action by the insurance company.

The Court of Appeals reversed the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas and entered final judgment in favor of defendant.

This court reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeals, holding in the syllabus, in part, as follows:

* * *

"4. Injuries to both person and property suffered by the same person as a result of the same wrongful act are infringements of different rights and give rise to distinct causes of action, with the result that the recovery or denial of recovery of compensation for damages to the property is no bar to an action subsequently prosecuted for the personal injury, unless by an adverse judgment in the first action issues are determined against the plaintiff which operate as an estoppel against him in the second action.

* * *

"6. Where an injury to person and to property through a single wrongful act causes a prior contract of indemnity and subrogation as to the injury to property to come into operation for the benefit of the person injured, the indemnitor may prosecute a separate action against the party causing such injury for reimbursement for indemnity monies paid under such contract.

"7. Parties in privity, in the sense that they are bound by a judgment, are those who acquired an interest in the subject matter after the beginning of the action or the rendition of the judgment; and if their title or interest attached before that fact, they are not bound unless made parties.

"8. A grantor or assignor is not bound, as to third persons, by any judgment which such third persons may obtain against his grantee or assignee adjudicating the title to or claim for the interest transferred unless he participated in the action in such manner as to become, in effect, a party."

* * *

* * * The sixth, seventh and eighth paragraphs deal with the factual situation which existed in the Vasu case, i.e., a prior contract of indemnity and subrogation. Although, as discussed infra, it was not actually necessary to the determination of the issue in that case, attention centers on the fourth paragraph.

1264

* * *

* * * [Subsequent] cases, distinguishing and explaining the Vasu case, have not changed the rule established in paragraph four of the syllabus * * *.

However, it is contended here that that rule is in conflict with the great weight of authority in this country and has caused vexatious litigation. * * *

* * *

Upon examination of decisions of courts of last resort, we find that the majority rule is followed in the following cases in each of which the action was between the person suffering injury and the person committing the tort, and where insurers were not involved, as in the case here. * * * [The court cited cases from 20 states forming the majority and five states forming the minority.]

The reasoning behind the majority rule seems to be well stated in the case of Mobile & Ohio Rd. Co. v. Matthews * * * [115 Tenn. 172, 91 S.W. 194 (1906),] as follows:

"The negligent action of the plaintiff in error constituted but one tort. The injuries to the person and property of the defendant in error were the several results and effects of one wrongful act. A single tort can be the basis of but one action. It is not improper to declare in different counts for damages to the person and property when both result from the same tort, and it is the better practice to do so where there is any difference in the measure of damages, and all the damages sustained must be sued for in one suit. This is necessary to prevent multiplicity of suits, burdensome expense, and delays to plaintiffs, and vexatious litigation against defendants. * * *

"Indeed, if the plaintiff fail to sue for the entire damage done him by the tort, a second action for the damages omitted will be precluded by the judgment in the first suit brought and tried."

The minority rule would seem to stem from the English case of Brunsdon v. Humphrey (1884), 14 Q.B. 141. The facts in that case are set forth in the opinion in the Vasu case * * *, concluding with the statement:

“The Master of the Rolls, in his opinion, stated that the test is ‘whether the same sort of evidence would prove the plaintiff’s case in the two actions,’ and that, in the action relating to the cab, ‘it would be necessary to give evidence of the damage done to the plaintiff’s vehicle. In the present action it would be necessary to give evidence of the bodily injury occasioned to the plaintiff, and of the sufferings which he has undergone, and for this purpose to call medical witnesses. This one test shows that the causes of action as to the damage done to the plaintiff’s cab, and as to the injury occasioned to the plaintiff’s person, are distinct.’ ”

1265

The fallacy of the reasoning in the English court is best portrayed in the dissenting opinion of Lord Coleridge, as follows:

“* * * [I]t seems to me a subtlety not warranted by law to hold that a man cannot bring two actions, if he is injured in his arm and in his leg, but can bring two, if besides his arm and leg being injured, his trousers which contain his leg, and his coat-sleeve which contains his arm, have been torn.”

There appears to be no valid reason in these days of code pleading to adhere to the old English rule as to distinctions between injuries to the person and damages to the person’s property resulting from a single tort. It would seem that the minority rule is bottomed on the proposition that the right of bodily security is fundamentally different from the right of security of property and, also, that, in actions predicated upon a negligent act, damages are a necessary element of each independent cause of action and no recovery may be had unless and until actual consequential damages are shown.

Whether or not injuries to both person and property resulting from the same wrongful act are to be treated as injuries to separate rights or as separate items of damage, * * * a plaintiff may maintain only one action to enforce his rights existing at the time such action is commenced.

The decision of the question actually in issue in the Vasu case is found in paragraphs six, seven and eight of the syllabus, as it is quite apparent from the facts there that the first judgment, claimed to be res judicata in Vasu’s action against the defendant, was rendered against Vasu’s insurer in an action initiated by it after having paid Vasu for the damages to his automobile. * * *

Upon further examination of the cases from other jurisdictions, it appears that in those instances where the courts have held to the majority rule, a separation of causes of action is almost universally recognized where an insurer has acquired by an assignment or by subrogation the right to recover for money it has advanced to pay for property damage.

* * *

In the light of the foregoing, it is the view of this court that the so-called majority rule conforms much more properly to modern practice, and that the rule declared in the fourth paragraph of the syllabus in the Vasu case, on a point not actually at issue therein, should not be followed [and must be overruled].

1266

* * *

Judgment reversed and final judgment for defendant.

STEWART, JUDGE (concurring). * * * If it had been necessary [in Vasu] to decide the question whether a single tort gives rise to two causes of action as to the one injured by such tort, I would be reluctant to disturb that holding. However, neither the discussion in the Vasu case as to whether a single or double cause of action arises from one tort nor the language of the fourth paragraph of the syllabus was necessary to decide the issue presented in the case, and obviously both such language and such paragraph are obiter dicta and, therefore, are not as persuasive an authority as if they had been appropriate to the question presented.

* * *

* * * [T]his court is justified in departing from the obiter dicta of the Vasu case.

ZIMMERMAN, JUDGE (dissenting). I am not unalterably opposed to upsetting prior decisions of this court where changing conditions and the lessons of experience clearly indicate the desirability of such course, but, where those considerations do not obtain, established law should remain undisturbed in order to insure a stability on which the lower courts and the legal profession generally may rely with some degree of confidence.

* * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Rush case illustrates the important and by now familiar concept of stare decisis. Although neither party in Rush had been a party to Vasu v. Kohler’s, Inc., both of the lower Ohio courts as well as the dissenting judge in the Supreme Court of Ohio regarded that case as controlling in Rush. Of course, as Rush itself demonstrates, the binding force of stare decisis is not absolute, and the parties to a later action are free to argue that the law announced in an earlier case should be changed. But a court will not lightly depart from precedent even though the parties who are before it were not represented in the case that established the precedent.

Stare decisis is a judicial doctrine that helps the courts fashion and preserve a system of laws based upon rational principle. The Supreme Court has explained:

The obligation to follow precedent begins with necessity, and a contrary necessity marks its outer limit. With Cardozo, we recognize that no judicial system could do society’s work if it eyed each issue afresh in every case that raised it. See B. Cardozo, The Nature of the Judicial Process 149 (1921). Indeed, the very concept of the rule of law underlying our own Constitution requires such continuity over time that a respect for precedent is, by definition, indispensable. * * * At the other extreme, a different necessity would make itself felt if a prior judicial ruling should come to be seen so clearly as error that its enforcement was for that very reason doomed.

1267

PLANNED PARENTHOOD OF SOUTHEASTERN PENNSYLVANIA v. CASEY, 505 U.S. 833, 854, 112 S.Ct. 2791, 2808, 120 L.Ed.2d 674, 699–700 (1992). Justice Frankfurter, in Helvering v. Hallock, 309 U.S. 106, 119, 60 S.Ct. 444, 451, 84 L.Ed. 604, 612 (1940), emphasized that “stare decisis is a principle of policy and not a mechanical formula of adherence to the latest decision * * *.” Should stare decisis operate differently when the Court is interpreting the Constitution, rather than a statute or an administrative regulation?

2. Rush illustrates an additional way in which adjudication in one action may affect a subsequent lawsuit: through the doctrine of claim and issue preclusion. As you read the materials in this section, focus on how the effect of stare decisis differs from claim preclusion and from issue preclusion. For now, consider what the effect would have been if the Ohio court had not found claim preclusion in Rush. Keep in mind that both lower courts in Rush held that the only issue open in plaintiff’s suit for her personal injuries was the amount of her damages, because the issues of negligence, proximate cause, and contributory negligence all had been determined conclusively by her judgment in the earlier action for property damage.

3. The results of res judicata sometimes may seem harsh, but the doctrine is supported by a number of important policy goals. The Supreme Court has emphasized that “res judicata and collateral estoppel relieve parties of the cost and vexation of multiple lawsuits, conserve judicial resources, and, by preventing inconsistent decisions, encourage reliance on adjudication.” Allen v. McCurry, 449 U.S. 90, 94, 101 S.Ct. 411, 415, 66 L.Ed.2d 308, 313 (1980). Why are these goals so important? How did they affect plaintiff in Rush? How would eliminating res judicata affect the judicial system?

4. Was the critical language in Vasu a holding or dictum? Consider the following:

“[I]t is often difficult to determine whether statements in a court’s opinion constitute an alternative ground for the decision or merely dicta.” * * * Black’s Law Dictionary defines “obiter dictum” as a statement “made during the course of delivering a judicial opinion, but one that is unnecessary to the decision in the case and therefore not precedential (though it may be considered persuasive).” * * * However, “where a decision rests on two or more grounds, none can be relegated to the category of obiter dictum.”

Best Life Assur. Co. of California v. Comm’r of Internal Revenue, 281 F.3d 828, 833–34 (9th Cir. 2002) (internal citations omitted). See Dorf, Dicta and Article III, 142 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1997 (1994) (“A holding consists of those propositions along the chosen decisional path or paths of reasoning that (1) are actually decided, (2) are based upon the facts of the case, and (3) lead to the judgment. If not a holding, a proposition stated in a case counts as dicta.”); Leval, Judging Under the Constitution: Dicta About Dicta, 81 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1249, 1256 (2006) (“A dictum is an assertion in a court’s opinion of a proposition of law which does not explain why the court’s judgments goes in favor of the winner.”); Abramowicz & Stearns, Defining Dicta, 57 Stan.L.Rev. 953, 961 (2005). Turning back to Rush, why was the distinction between holding and dictum significant?

1268

5. What reasons might plaintiff in Rush have had for wishing to sue first on the claim for property damage and then separately for personal injuries?

6. In making his decision, Judge Herbert in Rush asked “[w]hether or not injuries to both person and property resulting from the same wrongful act are to be treated as injuries to separate rights or as separate items of damage,” explaining that “a plaintiff may maintain only one action to enforce his rights existing at the time such action is commenced.” Is this approach the same or different from the “transaction” test currently used by most courts in determining the preclusive effect of a judgment? Under the contemporary “transaction” test:

[T]he preclusive effect of a prior judgment extends to all rights the original plaintiff had “with respect to all or any part of the transaction, or series of connected transactions, out of which the [original] action arose.” * * * What factual grouping constitutes a “transaction”, and what groupings constitute a “series”, are to be determined pragmatically, giving weight to such considerations as whether the facts are related in time, space, origin, or motivation, whether they form a convenient trial unit, and whether their treatment as a unit conforms to the parties’ expectations or business understanding or usage. * * * “[T]he critical issue is whether the two actions under consideration are based on the same nucleus of operative facts.” * * *

PETRO-HUNT, L.L.C. v. UNITED STATES, 365 F.3d 385, 395–96 (5th Cir. 2004) (internal citations omitted). See Restatement (Second), Judgments § 24, comment a (1982) (setting out factors considered in applying transactional test).

7. The tests for determining the scope of claim preclusion have undergone significant change since the beginning of the twentieth century, as summarized by the Restatement (Second), Judgments:

* * * In defining claim to embrace all the remedial rights of the plaintiff against the defendant growing out of the relevant transaction (or series of connected transactions), * * * [Section 24 of the Restatement (Second)] responds to modern procedural ideas which have found expression in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and other procedural systems.

1269

“Claim,” in the context of res judicata, has never been broader than the transaction to which it related. But in the days when civil procedure still bore the imprint of the forms of action and the division between law and equity, the courts were prone to associate claim with a single theory of recovery, so that, with respect to one transaction, a plaintiff might have as many claims as there were theories of the substantive law upon which he could seek relief against the defendant. Thus, defeated in an action based on one theory, the plaintiff might be able to maintain another action based on a different theory, even though both actions were grounded upon the defendant’s identical act or connected acts forming a single life-situation. In those earlier days there was also some adherence to a view that associated claim with the assertion of a single primary right as accorded by the substantive law, so that, if it appeared that the defendant had invaded a number of primary rights conceived to be held by the plaintiff, the plaintiff had the same number of claims, even though they all sprang from a unitary occurrence. There was difficulty in knowing which rights were primary and what was their extent, but a primary right and the corresponding claim might turn out to be narrow. Thus it was held by some courts that a judgment for or against the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries did not preclude an action by him for property damage occasioned by the same negligent conduct on the part of the defendant—this deriving from the idea that the right to be free of bodily injury was distinct from the property right. Still another view of claim looked to sameness of evidence; a second action was precluded where the evidence to support it was the same as that needed to support the first. Sometimes this was made the sole test of identity of claim; sometimes it figured as a positive but not as a negative test; that is, in certain situations a second action might be precluded although the evidence material to it varied from that in the first action. Even so, claim was not coterminous with the transaction itself.

The present trend is to see claim in factual terms and to make it coterminous with the transaction regardless of the number of substantive theories, or variant forms of relief flowing from those theories, that may be available to the plaintiff; regardless of the number of primary rights that may have been invaded; and regardless of the variations in the evidence needed to support the theories or rights. The transaction is the basis of the litigative unit or entity which may not be split.

Restatement (Second), Judgments § 24, comment a (1982).

8. In VANOVER v. NCO FINANCIAL SERVICES, INC., 857 F.3d 833 (11th Cir. 2017), a debtor sued a debt collector in Florida federal court, alleging a violation of the federal Telephone Consumer Protection Act. One year later, the same debtor sued the same defendant in Florida state court, again alleging violations of the federal law. Defendant removed to federal court, and the district court granted defendant’s motion to dismiss the federal action for improper claim splitting. The Eleventh Circuit affirmed. Noting that the doctrine of claim splitting applies “where the second suit has been filed before the first suit has reached a final judgment,” the appeals court explained that although claim splitting is related to res judicata, its application does not require a final judgment. Instead, the inquiry is two-fold: “(1) whether the case involves the same parties and their privies, and (2) whether separate cases arise from the same transaction or series of transactions.” Id. at 841–42 (internal citation omitted). The rationale for the doctrine is fairness and efficiency: The claim-splitting doctrine “ensures that a plaintiff may not ‘split up his demand and prosecute it by piecemeal, or present only a portion of the grounds upon which relief is sought, and leave the rest to be presented in a second suit, if the first fails.’ ” Id. at 841 (citation omitted). See Clermont, Res Judicata as Requisite for Justice, 68 Rutgers U.L. Rev. 1067, 1109 (2016) (explaining that under the transactional approach to claim preclusion, “[a]ny plaintiff who asserts only a part of the claim is said to have impermissibly split the claim”).

1270

9. A party may waive the benefits of preclusion by failing to raise it as an affirmative defense in the second suit. Given the systemic interest in preclusion, should a court be able to raise preclusion on its own initiative? Would this be feasible?

MATHEWS V. NEW YORK RACING ASSOCIATION, INC.

United States District Court, Southern District of New York, 1961.

193 F.Supp. 293.

MACMAHON, DISTRICT JUDGE. Defendants move for summary judgment, pursuant to Rule 56(b),^a Federal Rules * * *, on the ground that a judgment in a prior action in this court is res judicata as to the claim alleged in the complaint.

New York Racing Association Inc. is a New York corporation which operates Jamaica Race Track. It employs defendant Thoroughbred Racing Protective Association Inc., a private detective agency, for security purposes.

Plaintiff brings this action against the Association and Thoroughbred alleging that on April 4, 1958, at Jamaica Race Track, he was “assaulted,” “kidnapped,” “falsely arrested,” and “falsely imprisoned” by employees of Thoroughbred. He further alleges that the defendants charged him with disorderly conduct and maliciously caused him to be prosecuted and convicted in the Magistrate’s Court of the City of New York on April 10,

1271

1958. He prays for relief in the form of money damages and an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with his attendance at race tracks, from publication of libelous statements, and from acting as peace officers.

The prior judgment on which defendants rely was entered in this court on June 30, 1960 following a trial before Judge Palmieri sitting without a jury. The complaint in that action alleged, among other matters, that plaintiff was assaulted by the defendant's private investigators at Jamaica Race Track on April 4, 1958. It also alleged that the employees of the defendants had made libelous statements concerning the plaintiff on several occasions, including plaintiff's trial for disorderly conduct on April 10, 1958. The relief prayed for in that action was also money damages and an injunction from further interference with plaintiff's attendance at race tracks within the United States. The earlier action named three individuals as defendants. The only two properly served were employees of the defendants named in the present suit.

* * *

* * * [T]he question is whether the claim alleged in this complaint is the same as that in the suit concluded earlier. The term "claim" refers to a group of facts limited to a single occurrence or transaction without particular reference to the resulting legal rights. It is the facts surrounding the occurrence which operate to make up the claim, not the legal theory upon which a plaintiff relies. * * *

The facts relevant to [plaintiff's current lawsuit] * * * along with three other separate claims based on different facts, were tried to a conclusion in the earlier suit. There, the plaintiff relied on the acts of the agents occurring on April 4, 1958 as the basis of a claim against them on the theory of assault. Now, he asserts these same acts as the basis of a claim against the agents' principals on the theory of false arrest. In the earlier action, plaintiff relied on the statements of the agents made on April 10, 1958 as the basis of a claim against them on the theory of libel. Now, he asserts those same statements as the basis of a claim against their principals on the theory of malicious prosecution. Clearly, any liability of the defendants for the acts or statements of their agents must be predicated upon the familiar principle of respondeat superior. Thus, if the agents committed no actionable wrong against the plaintiff, neither did their principals. * * *

The plaintiff cannot be permitted to splinter his claim into a multiplicity of suits and try them piecemeal at his convenience. * * * "The plaintiff having alleged operative facts which state a cause of action because he tells of defendant's misconduct and his own harm has had his day in court. He does not get another day after the first lawsuit is concluded by giving a different reason than he gave in the first for recovery of damages for the same invasion of his rights. The problem of his rights against the defendant based upon the alleged wrongful acts is fully before the court whether all the reasons for recovery were stated to the court or not." * * *

1272

The court is cognizant of the fact that plaintiff appears pro se, but as the law provides a beginning for litigation, it must also provide an end. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. How would the different tests for determining a claim, see p. 1268, Note 7, supra, affect the reasoning and result in Mathews?
2. In Rush, plaintiff won her first suit for property damage, and the court held that any claims she had for personal injuries were "merged" into the judgment and so extinguished. In Mathews, plaintiff lost the first suit. Since the basic factual setting of the claim in the second suit was the same as in the first, the court held that the allegations were "barred" by the earlier judgment. By using a different definition of a "claim," could you make an argument that the second suit should not have been precluded?
3. One of the benefits of the transactional approach to claim preclusion is its flexibility. But flexibility comes at a price. Because a court may interpret the claim presented in the first lawsuit more broadly than a litigant does, the litigant unknowingly may forfeit parts of his action by failing to raise them. It is said that litigants thus learn "by trial and error in the harsh school of experience" of the need to raise all possibly connected allegations in the first proceeding. Cleary, Res Judicata Reexamined, 57 Yale L.J. 339, 340 (1948). This may well mean that parties will advance claims that they otherwise might not have brought to court. Recall that in Mathews, plaintiff was appearing pro se. Should the sophistication of the litigant be considered in deciding the scope of claim preclusion?
4. Should the test for claim preclusion be the same as the test for supplemental jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367 or for whether a counterclaim is compulsory? See p. 364, Notes 1 and 2, supra. How are these situations different?
5. Consider how the transaction test would affect the preclusive effect of a judgment in the following situations:
 - (a) An abused spouse sues for divorce. Does the divorce judgment bar the party from later filing a tort action for spousal abuse? Should it matter whether the abuse was claimed as the basis for the divorce in the earlier suit? Or that it took place during the course of the marriage? See Dalton, Domestic Violence, Domestic Torts and Divorce: Constraints and Possibilities, 31 New Eng.L.Rev. 319, 378–94 (1997). Assume the former spouses later cross-move to modify a child custody agreement entered following the final judgment of divorce. Will claim preclusion bar the modification? See Aviel, Family Law and the New Access to Justice, 86 Fordham L.Rev. 2279 (2018).

1273

(b) An individual who was exposed to toxic chemicals sues for damages and seeks reimbursement for the expense of ongoing medical monitoring. Years later, plaintiff experiences physical injury greater and qualitatively different than initially anticipated or diagnosed.

Does claim preclusion bar a new lawsuit? See In re Paoli R.R. Yard PCB Litigation, 916 F.2d 829 (3d Cir. 1990). For a discussion of the impact of the transaction approach in cases of latent medical injury, see Note, Claim Preclusion in Modern Latent Disease Cases: A Proposal for Allowing Second Suits, 103 Harv.L.Rev. 1989 (1990).

FEDERATED DEPARTMENT STORES, INC. v. MOITIE, 452 U.S. 394, 101 S.Ct. 2424, 69 L.Ed.2d 103 (1981). Respondents Moitie and Brown were two of seven plaintiffs to file separate antitrust actions against petitioner (Moitie I and Brown I). The actions were consolidated in the district court after which they were dismissed for failure to allege an “injury” to their “business or property” within the meaning of Section 4 of the Clayton Act. The other five plaintiffs appealed to the Ninth Circuit. Moitie and Brown, however, did not appeal, but, instead, refiled their actions in state court (Moitie II and Brown II). The actions were removed to federal court and then dismissed on res judicata grounds. Meanwhile, the five appeals cases were reversed and remanded to the district court to be reconsidered in light of an intervening Supreme Court opinion. When Moitie II and Brown II reached the Ninth Circuit on appeal, the court held that, although a strict application of res judicata would preclude the second action, an exception should be made when the dismissal rested on a case that had been effectively overruled. The Supreme Court disagreed:

The Court of Appeals * * * rested its opinion in part on what it viewed as “simple justice.” But we do not see the grave injustice which would be done by the application of accepted principles of res judicata. “Simple justice” is achieved when a complex body of law developed over a period of years is evenhandedly applied. The doctrine of res judicata serves vital public interests beyond any individual judge’s ad hoc determination of the equities in a particular case. There is simply “no principle of law or equity which sanctions the rejection by a federal court of the salutary principle of res judicata.” * * * The Court of Appeals’ reliance on “public policy” is similarly misplaced. This Court has long recognized that “[p]ublic policy dictates that there be an end of litigation; that those who have contested an issue shall be bound by the result of the contest, and that matters once tried shall be considered forever settled as between the parties.” Baldwin v.

1274

Traveling Men’s Association, 283 U.S. 522, 525[, 51 S.Ct. 517, 518, 75 L.Ed. 1244] (1931). We have stressed that “[the] doctrine of res judicata is not a mere matter of practice or procedure inherited from a more technical time than ours. It is a rule of fundamental and substantial justice, ‘of public policy and of private peace,’ which should be cordially regarded and enforced by the courts * * *.” Hart Steel Co. v. Railroad Supply Co., 244 U.S. 294, 299[, 37 S.Ct. 506, 507, 61 L.Ed. 1148] (1917).
* * *

Id. at 401–02, 101 S.Ct. at 2429–30, 69 L.Ed.2d at 110–11.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In spite of the harsh language of Moitie, there are situations in which considerations of justice and fairness dictate that prior judgments not be given preclusive effect. When the prior judgment was obtained by the use of fraud, courts generally will not consider it binding. See, e.g., McCarty v. First of Georgia Ins. Co., 713 F.2d 609 (10th Cir. 1983). Similarly, when there was a clear and fundamental jurisdictional defect that should have prevented the first court from hearing the suit, courts often will hold that the judgment has no preclusive effect. However, would you agree that by its logic and language Moitie forecloses a general fairness exception to claim preclusion? See 18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4415 (3d ed.).

2.Claim preclusion requires a final judgment. Is a judgment final if an appeal is pending? The general rule in the federal system and most states is that a pending appeal does not defeat the claim preclusive effect of a judgment. See Deposit Bank of Frankfort v. Board of Councilmen of City of Frankfort, 191 U.S. 499, 24 S.Ct. 154, 48 L.Ed. 276 (1903). The rule can create a great deal of mischief if the second appeal relies upon a first judgment that is later reversed. Restatement (Second), Judgments § 13, comment f (1982), suggests that, if possible, the second panel ought to postpone consideration of preclusion until the first appeal is concluded. See United States v. 5 Unlabeled Boxes, 572 F.3d 169 (3d Cir. 2009).

3.In Moitie, defendants removed the actions to federal court on the basis of federal question jurisdiction, and the cases subsequently were dismissed due to the preclusive effect of the prior judgment. In a similar case, RIVET v. REGIONS BANK, 522 U.S. 470, 118 S.Ct. 921, 139 L.Ed.2d 912 (1998), the dispute involved only state issues, but defendants, relying on Moitie, sought to remove the case to federal court on the ground that the action was precluded by a prior federal judgment. The Supreme Court rejected this interpretation of Moitie, holding that claim preclusion does not create an exception to the rule that removal under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(b) cannot be based upon a federal defense. On Moitie, see Miller, Artful Pleading: A Doctrine in Search of Definition, 76 Tex.L.Rev. 1781 (1998).

1275

JONES V. MORRIS PLAN BANK OF PORTSMOUTH
Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, 1937.
168 Va. 284, 191 S.E. 608.

GREGORY, JUSTICE.

William B. Jones instituted an action for damages against the Morris Plan Bank of Portsmouth for the conversion of his automobile.
* * *

After the plaintiff had introduced all of his evidence and before the defendant had introduced any evidence on its behalf, the latter’s counsel moved to strike the evidence of the plaintiff and the court sustained the motion. A verdict for the defendant resulted.

The facts are that the plaintiff purchased from J.A. Parker, a dealer in automobiles, a Plymouth sedan, agreeing to pay therefor $595. He paid a part of the purchase price by the delivery of a used car to Parker of the agreed value of $245 and after crediting that amount on the purchase price and adding a finance charge of $78.40, there remained an unpaid balance due the dealer of $428. This latter amount was payable in 12 monthly installments of $35.70 each and evidenced by one note in the principal sum of $428.40. The note contained this provision: “The whole amount of this note (less any payments made hereon) becomes immediately due and payable in the event of nonpayment at maturity of any installment thereof.” The note was secured by the usual conditional sales contract * * * in which it was agreed that the title to the car would be retained by the dealer until the entire purchase price was paid in full. * * * [T]he contract was assigned to the defendant * * * and the note was indorsed by Parker and delivered to the defendant at the same time.

Installment payments due on the note for May and June were not made when payable and for them an action was instituted in the civil and police court of the city of Suffolk. No appearance was made by the defendant (Jones) in that action and judgment was obtained against him for the two payments. Execution issued upon the judgment and it was satisfied * * * by Jones * * *.

Later the defendant instituted another action against Jones in the same court for the July installment which had become due and was unpaid, and to that action Jones filed a plea of res adjudicata, whereupon the * * * [Bank] took a nonsuit.

* * * [T]he defendant * * * took possession of the automobile without the consent of the plaintiff and later sold it and applied the proceeds upon the note.

Afterwards, the plaintiff instituted the present action for conversion to recover damages for the loss of the automobile. His action in the court below was founded upon the theory that when the May and June installments became due and were unpaid, then under the acceleration clause in the note, the entire balance due thereon matured and at once became due and the defendant having elected to sue him for only two installments instead of the entire amount of the note, and having obtained a judgment for the two installments and satisfaction of the execution issued thereon, it waived its right to collect the balance. He also contends that the note was satisfied in the manner narrated and that the conditional sales contract, the sole purpose of which was to secure the payment of the note, served its purpose and ceased to exist, and, therefore, the title to the automobile was no longer retained, but upon the satisfaction of the note, passed to the plaintiff and was his property when the agent of the defendant removed it and converted it to its own use.

1276

The position of the defendant is that * * * the title to the automobile, which was the subject of the alleged conversion, was not vested in the plaintiff at the time of the action, nor since, because the condition in the contract was that the title should be retained by the seller (whose rights were assigned to the defendant) until the entire purchase price was paid, and that the purchase price had never been paid * * *.

The defendant also contends that the note and conditional sales contract were divisible; that successive actions could be brought upon the installments as they matured; and that it was not bound, at the risk of waiving its right to claim the balance, to sue for all installments in one action.

* * *

We decide that under the unconditional acceleration provision in the note involved here and in the absence of the usual optional provision reserved to the holder, the entire amount due upon the note became due and payable when default was made in paying an installment. * * *

Was it essential that the defendant here institute an action for all of the installments then due, or could it institute its action for only two of the installments and later institute another action for other installments? The answer to that question depends upon the nature of the transaction. If a transaction is represented by one single and indivisible contract and the breach gives rise to one single cause of action, it cannot be split into distinct parts and separate actions maintained for each.

On the other hand, if the contract is divisible giving rise to more than one cause of action, each may be proceeded upon separately.

Was the contract here single and indivisible or was it divisible? Our answer is that the note and conditional sales contract constituted one single contract. The sole purpose of the conditional sales contract was to retain the title in the seller until the note was paid. When that condition was performed, the contract ended.

1277

One of the principal tests in determining whether a demand is single and entire, or whether it is several, so as to give rise to more than one cause of action, is the identity of facts necessary to maintain the action. If the same evidence will support both actions, there is but one cause of action.

In the case at bar, all of the installments were due. The evidence essential to support the action on the two installments for which the action was brought would be the identical evidence necessary to maintain an action upon all of the installments. All installments having matured at the time the action was begun, under well-settled principles, those not embraced in that action are now barred.

* * * At the time the defendant lost its right to institute any action for the remaining installments, the title to the automobile passed to the plaintiff. He was the owner at the time the agent of the defendant took possession of it and exposed it to sale.

It follows that the judgment of the court below will be reversed, and the case will be remanded for the sole purpose of determining the quantum of damages.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. When a debt is secured by a series of notes or when a bond includes a number of interest coupons, an action on one of the notes or coupons, even though others are due, does not bar a subsequent action on those others. Restatement, Judgments § 62, comment i (1942); Restatement (Second), Judgments § 24, comment d (1982). Cf. Nesbit v. Riverside Independent District, 144 U.S. 610, 619, 12 S.Ct. 746, 748, 36 L.Ed. 562, 565 (1892):
- Each matured coupon is a separable promise, and gives rise to a separate cause of action. It may be detached from the bond and sold by itself. Indeed, the title to several matured coupons of the same bond may be in as many different persons, and upon each a distinct and separate action be maintained. So, while the promises of the bond and of the coupons in the first instance are upon the same paper, and the coupons are for interest due upon the bond, yet the promise to pay the coupon is as distinct from that to pay the bond as though the two promises were placed in different instruments, upon different paper.
2. It can be difficult to define the scope of a prior judgment in controversies involving continuing or renewed conduct. Restatement (Second), Judgments § 24 (1982) lists some relevant considerations in assessing whether a factual grouping constitutes a single transaction, and so the same claim, and suggests evaluating “whether the facts are related in time, space, origin, or motivation, whether they form a convenient trial unit, and whether their treatment as a unit conforms to the parties’ expectations or business understanding or usage.”

1278

There are some other useful rules of thumb in cases of continuing or renewed conduct. For example, if the conduct that is the subject of the first action continues after judgment in the first action, claim preclusion would not prevent a second suit. Issue preclusion may apply, however, to matters of status or to issues of fact resolved in the first action. When the purpose of the first suit is to establish general rules of legality, such as when the first suit is a declaratory judgment action, subsequent claims involving the same conduct are precluded.

Suits asserting claims for nuisance commonly involve continuing conduct. Judgments involving “permanent” nuisances are considered to have full preclusive effect; those involving “temporary” nuisances are not considered to preclude later litigation involving the same behavior. Courts are not always consistent in their classification of nuisances. For a further discussion of claims that involve continuing and renewed conduct, see 18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4409 (3d ed.).

3. As the previous Notes suggest, often the underlying substantive law will affect the definition of the claim for purposes of preclusion. For example, if one party to a contract commits a material breach that is neither accompanied nor followed by a repudiation, the law of contracts teaches that the other party is free, on the one hand, to treat the contract as binding and sue for the damages or, on the other hand, to treat the contract as ended. If the aggrieved party chooses the former option and then suffers further material breaches, a later suit for damages not sought in the first suit will not be barred. See Restatement (Second), Judgments § 26, comment g (1982).

The expectations of the parties also may be decisive in determining the scope of the prior judgment. Imagine that a wholesale distributor regularly ships goods to a retailer on credit. If the parties conceive of their relationship as a series of discrete transactions, a suit by the creditor seeking to recover any one of the payments would not bar subsequent suits for other payments. If, however, the parties believe they have a single running account, the creditor would have to seek to recover the entire balance then due.

2.DEFENSE PRECLUSION

Thus far we have looked at claim preclusion from the perspective of plaintiff. However, defendants also need to take the doctrine into account, typically in one of three situations:

The first two situations involve a second action in which a former defendant seeks to advance a claim against the original plaintiff. In one, the claim involves matters that were not advanced in the first action; in the other, the claim involves matters that were advanced in the first action but are not foreclosed by issue preclusion. The third situation involves a second action by the original plaintiff in which the defendant seeks to raise defenses that were equally available in the first action but were not advanced there.

1279

18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4414 (3d ed.). “The third situation” is referred to as “defense preclusion,” and the scope of the doctrine is implicated in the case that follows.

STABLER, J.

[An action for an accounting against defendant bank for proceeds of a crop of potatoes. Plaintiff alleged that in order to obtain loans from defendant he had—at the behest of defendant’s agent—sold his potatoes through a growers’ association and assigned the proceeds as security for two notes, totaling $9,000, which had been discounted with defendant; that the potatoes had netted $18,000, but that he had never received any of this, and that the proceeds had been received by defendant or an agent of defendant. In a previous action by defendant on the notes, plaintiff had pleaded in the answer the same facts now the basis of an affirmative claim, but had not counterclaimed or asked for relief; judgment had been for him in that action. In the present suit, defendant contended that plaintiff’s claim was merged in the earlier judgment. This contention was upheld by the trial court.]

* * *

We now come to the main question presented by the appeal, namely, Was the circuit judge in error in sustaining the plea in bar to plaintiff’s action? Turning to appellant’s answer in the federal court case * * * we find that the facts there pleaded by him as a defense to the bank’s recovery on its notes are the same as those set out by him in his complaint as the basis of his action in the case at bar, it being alleged that the total amount paid to the bank was in excess of all sums advanced to him on the notes or otherwise, and as a result of the transaction the notes sued upon were fully paid and discharged. In addition, we find in the record of the case before us the following statement by appellant as an admission of fact on his part: “* * * The indebtedness of the bank to Mitchell arising from the embezzlement of the proceeds of the crop was used pro tanto as an offset to the claim of the bank in the Federal Court. The case at bar seeks recovery of the surplusage, over the offset, of the proceeds of the same crop lost by the same embezzlement. The appellant, however, is not seeking to recover in this action the same money that has already been used as an offset.”

* * *

1280

In support of his position * * * appellant cites certain decisions of this court, which he claims to be conclusive of the issue, relying especially upon Kirven v. Chemical Co., 77 S.C. 493, 58 S.E. 424, 426.

* * * [T]he record shows that Kirven had bought from the Chemical Company $2,228 worth of fertilizers and had given his note for that amount. The company, upon maturity of the note, brought action against him on his obligation. He at first filed an answer setting up three defenses, the third of which was that the fertilizers furnished were deleterious and destructive to the crops, and that there was an entire failure of consideration for the note. Later, he was permitted to file a supplemental answer in which he withdrew the third defense. On trial in the federal court, the jury rendered a verdict for the Chemical Company. Thereafter, Kirven brought an action against the company * * * alleging that the defendant caused damage to his crop in the sum of $1,995 by reason of the deleterious effect of the fertilizers furnished. The company set up the defense that the issues in this action were or could have been adjudicated in the [first] suit * * *. A verdict was given Kirven in the amount prayed for, and on appeal * * * it was pointed out that the question raised in the state court was not actually litigated and determined in the federal action, and it appears that the court, for that reason, took the view that a bar or estoppel did not exist. Mr. Justice Woods, in his concurring opinion, took the view that, as Kirven elected not to use, as a defense, the fact of worthlessness, which might have been available in the action of the company against him, “he was not precluded from using the very different facts of deleteriousness and positive injury caused by appellant’s alleged negligence in the manufacture of the fertilizer as the basis of an independent cause of action.”

We think the facts of the case at bar, however, present a different situation. * * *

O’Connor v. Varney, 10 Gray (Mass.) 231, was an action on contract to recover damages for Varney’s failure to build certain additions to a house according to the terms of a written agreement between the parties. The defendant set up as a defense “a judgment recovered by O’Connor in an action brought by Varney against him on that contract to recover the price therein agreed to be paid for the work, in defence of which O’Connor relied on the same nonperformance by Varney, and in which an auditor to whom the case was referred * * * found that Varney was not entitled to recover under the agreement,” as the work had been so imperfectly done that it would require a greater sum than the amount sued for to make it correspond with the contract. At the trial of the second action, the trial judge ruled that the judgment in the first suit was a bar, and directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff O’Connor thereupon appealed.

1281

Chief Justice Shaw, who rendered the opinion of the court, said: “The presiding judge rightly ruled that the former judgment was a bar to this action. A party against whom an action is brought on a contract has two modes of defending himself. He may allege specific breaches of the contract declared upon, and rely on them in defence. But if he intends to claim, by way of damages for nonperformance of the contract, more than the amount for which he is sued, he must not rely on the contract in defence, but must bring a cross action, and apply to the court to have the cases continued so that the executions may be set off. He cannot use the same defence, first as a shield, and then as a sword. * * *”

It will be noted that Varney was not entitled to recover in the first suit because his dereliction amounted to more than he sued for. This would seem to be exactly the situation in the case at bar.

* * * When the bank sued * * * [Mitchell] on his two notes, amounting to about $9,000, he had the option to interpose his claim as a defense to that suit or to demand judgment against the bank, by way of counterclaim, for the amount owing him by it. * * * The transaction out of which the case at bar arises is the same transaction that Mitchell pleaded as a defense in the federal suit. He might, therefore, “have recovered in that action, upon the same allegations and proofs which he there made, the judgment which he now seeks, if he had prayed for it.” He did not do this, but attempted to split his cause of action, and to use one portion of it for defense in that suit and to reserve the remainder for offense in a subsequent suit, which, under applicable principles, could not be done. * * *

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The federal courts and a majority of the state courts require a party to include a compulsory counterclaim in the answer. Can a party raise the omitted claim in a separate action? See p. 732, supra. Professor Wright has written that “it has never been doubted in any of the jurisdictions which have adopted such a rule that the pleader who fails to comply therewith is prohibited from subsequent assertion of his claim.” Wright, Estoppel by Rule: The Compulsory Counterclaim Under Modern Pleading, 38 Minn.L.Rev. 423, 449 n.121 (1954). Is the preclusion a result of waiver or res judicata?

2. At common law, would Mitchell’s defense in the first action have been in the nature of a recoupment or a set-off? Consider the following definitions:

At common law the term “recoupment” described a claim that defendant could assert against plaintiff only if it arose from the same transaction as plaintiff’s claim. It was purely defensive in its character and could be used only to defeat or diminish plaintiff’s recovery; recoupment could not be the basis for affirmative relief. “Setoff,” on the other hand, referred to a claim by defendant that was unrelated to plaintiff’s claim. Moreover, unlike recoupment, setoff permitted defendant to assert an affirmative claim for relief. But the utility of setoff was limited by the requirement that the claim either be for a liquidated amount or arise out of a contract of judgment.

1282

6 Wright, Miller & Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1401 (3d ed.). Assuming that the defense would have been one or the other, would this have made a difference to Mitchell’s right to bring a later suit for the excess?

3. The Supreme Court cast doubt on defense preclusion as an independent doctrine separate from ordinary principles of claim and issue preclusion in LUCKY BRAND DUNGAREES, INC. v. MARCEL FASHIONS GROUP INC., 590 U.S. ___, 140 S.Ct. 1589, 206 L.Ed.2d 893 (2020). The parties, competitors in the fashion industry, both used the word “Lucky” as part of their marks on jeans and other apparel. They were involved in three rounds of trademark litigation. In a 2003 settlement, Lucky Brand agreed to stop using the phrase “Get Lucky”—a trademark claimed by Marcel Fashions—and Marcel Fashions agreed to release any claims regarding Lucky Brand’s use of its own trademarks. Then, in a 2005 action, Lucky Brand sued Marcel Fashions for trademark infringement involving use of “Lucky” marks on a new line of clothing sold under a license from Marcel. In that lawsuit, Marcel Fashions filed counterclaims turning on Lucky Brand’s alleged continued use of the “Get Lucky” mark. In its motion to dismiss the counterclaims and in its answer, Lucky Brand initially raised the 2003 settlement as a defense, but it did not press that defense again as the litigation proceeded through summary judgment and trial. The 2005 action concluded when the court permanently enjoined Lucky Brand from copying or imitating the “Get Lucky” mark, and a jury found against Lucky Brand on the remaining counterclaims.

In a 2011 action, Marcel Fashions sued Lucky Brand for trademark infringement involving “Lucky” marks but involving conduct that postdated the 2005 case. This time, Lucky Brand argued as a defense that Marcel Fashions had released any infringement claims concerning Lucky Brand’s marks in the 2003 settlement agreement. Marcel Fashions countered that Lucky Brand was precluded from raising the release defense because it could have pursued that defense in the 2005 action and failed to do so. The district court disagreed with Marcel and granted Lucky Brand’s motion to dismiss. But the Second Circuit vacated and remanded, concluding that, because Lucky Brand could have asserted the release defense in the 2005 action, the doctrine of defense preclusion barred it from asserting the defense in the new case.

A unanimous Supreme Court reversed. Because the 2011 action challenged different conduct and raised different claims from the 2005 action, the Court held that Lucky Brand could not be precluded in the later action from raising defenses that it had not litigated in the prior action. In an opinion by Justice Sotomayor, the Court emphasized that it had never recognized a doctrine of defense preclusion “as a standalone category of res judicata, unmoored from the two guideposts of issue preclusion and claim preclusion.”

1283

Rather, the Court rested its decision on the fact that the parties agreed that issue preclusion did not apply, so Lucky Brand could be barred only if the requirements of claim preclusion were met. (In an extended footnote, the Court questioned whether claim preclusion ought ever to apply to defenses, but explicitly did not decide the question.)

The Court then held that claim preclusion did not apply because the two suits did not share a common nucleus of operative facts. To the contrary, “the two suits here were grounded on different conduct, involving different marks, occurring at different times.” Nor could it be argued that allowing the assertion of defenses in the 2011 action would “impair or destroy” the judgment in the prior action, for the “lawsuits involved both different conduct and different trademarks.” Indeed, the challenged conduct in the 2011 action occurred after the 2005 action had concluded, and “preclusion generally does not bar claims that are predicated on events that postdate the filing of the initial complaint.” 590 U.S. at ___, 140 S.Ct. at 1596, 206 L.Ed.2d at 901–02 (internal quotation marks omitted). The Court emphasized the importance of this principle “in the trademark context, where the enforceability of a mark and likelihood of confusion between marks often turns on extrinsic facts that change over time.”

The Court also distinguished cases involving judgment enforcement or a collateral attack on a prior judgment. The Court questioned whether these cases could be said to “stand for anything more than traditional claim- or issue-preclusion principles,” and, in any event, they did not apply to Lucky Brand’s defense of release. Id. at ___, 140 S.Ct. at 1597, 206 L.Ed.2d at 902–03.

LINDERMAN MACHINE CO. v. HILLENBRAND CO., 75 Ind.App. 111, 127 N.E. 813 (1920). L sold H a machine, and subsequently sued to recover the purchase price. H answered that the contract had been obtained by fraudulent representations as to the machine’s capacity to do H’s work, that the machine did not perform as represented, and that H had notified L to remove the machine. Judgment was rendered against L. Subsequently H sued L to recover damages for fraud, alleging that H had incurred great expense in transporting, installing, attempting to operate, and removing the machine. L answered that the action was barred by the judgment in the first suit. The court held for H:

It is true that a party, when sued, must interpose all defenses which he has, and as to them, whether pleaded or not, the judgment is conclusive; but it is not conclusive as to an affirmative right or cause of action which he may have against the plaintiff, and of which he could have taken advantage by way of cross-complaint. He is not compelled to file his cross-complaint, and, on his failure to do so, his rights with reference thereto will not be adjudged. * * *

1284

There was no issue in the action brought by [L] to recover the purchase price * * * as to the right of [H] to recover the expenses which it had been put to in installing the machinery, and without such issue therein, [L] is not in position now to invoke against [H] the doctrine of res adjudicata.

Id. at 118, 127 N.E. at 815.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Is Linderman consistent with Mitchell? Generally defendant’s failure to raise a counterclaim that is not compulsory does not preclude a later action. See Harrison v. Springdale Water & Sewer Commission, 780 F.2d 1422 (8th Cir. 1986). However, as is suggested in the Supreme Court’s decision in Lucky Brand Dungarees, p. 1282, Note 3, supra, the rule is more complicated when the claim that defendant seeks to assert would impair or nullify rights established in the first action. In Rudell v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., 802 F.2d 926, 929 (7th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 480 U.S. 907, 107 S.Ct. 1351, 94 L.Ed.2d 521 (1987), franchisees were barred from challenging a franchise agreement as procured by fraud, when that defense could have been raised in a prior arbitration proceeding. As the court of appeals explained, allowing the party to raise the fraud claim in a later action “could now serve to undermine or nullify the prior decision of the district court confirming the arbitration award.” See Clermont, Common-Law Compulsory Counterclaim Rule: Creating Effective and Elegant Res Judicata, 79 Notre Dame L.Rev. 1745 (2004).

2. Some state systems recognize a doctrine of common law compulsory counterclaim. In Jacobson v. Miller, 41 Mich. 90, 1 N.W. 1013 (1879), a landlord brought and prevailed on an action to recover unpaid installments of rent. Subsequently, the landlord brought another suit to recover later unpaid installments. Although he had made no mention of a defense in the initial proceeding, the tenant sought to defend the second suit by alleging that he had never executed the lease. Should the court have permitted the defense to be made? Remember that if defendant had raised this claim in the first action successfully, the landlord could have taken affirmative steps to remedy the problem, and perhaps even could have found a new tenant. Should the defense be precluded on the possibility of indirect reliance on the course of the first action? See Restatement (Second), Judgments § 22 (1982).

3. Restatement (Second), Judgments § 20(1) (1982) sets out a nonexhaustive list of valid and final judgments that are not preclusive: (a) dismissal for lack of jurisdiction, dismissal for improper venue, dismissal for nonjoinder or misjoinder of parties; and (b) election or direction of a nonsuit. How should dismissals that are not expressly listed be treated?

COSTELLO v. UNITED STATES, 365 U.S. 265, 287, 81 S.Ct. 534, 545, 5 L.Ed.2d 551, 565 (1961), concerned an order dismissing a denaturalization proceeding on the ground that the government had failed to file an affidavit of good cause. Although the order did not specify that the dismissal was “without prejudice,” the Supreme Court held that the dismissal was “for lack of jurisdiction” within the meaning of Federal Rule 41(b) and did not bar a subsequent denaturalization proceeding by the government. The Court explained:

1285

At common law dismissal on a ground not going to the merits was not ordinarily a bar to a subsequent action on the same claim. * * * We do not discern in Rule 41(b) a purpose to change this common-law principle with respect to dismissals in which the merits could not be reached for failure of the plaintiff to satisfy a precondition. * * * Although a sua sponte dismissal is not an enumerated ground, here * * * the defendant has been put to the trouble of preparing his defense because there was no initial bar to the Court’s reaching the merits. * * *

In contrast, the failure of the Government to file the affidavit of good cause in a denaturalization proceeding does not present a situation calling for the application of the policy making dismissals operative as adjudications on the merits. The defendant is not put to the necessity of preparing a defense because the failure of the Government to file the affidavit with the complaint require the dismissal of the proceeding.

Id. at 545–46, 81 S.Ct. at 287–88, 5 L.Ed.2d at 566.

4.The general rule in the federal system and in most state systems is that a dismissal for failure to state a claim carries claim preclusive effect. But that is not always the case. In the federal courts, an order granting a motion to dismiss a complaint under Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim is a dismissal with prejudice unless it contains specific language to the contrary. See p. 677, Note 2, supra. In some state courts, the presumption is reversed. New York, for example, adheres to the rule that “when a complaint is dismissed for legal insufficiency or other defect in pleading, it does not act as a bar to commencement of a new action for the same relief unless the dismissal was expressly made on the merits or the new complaint fails to correct the defects or omissions fatal to the prior one.” Deacon’s Bench, Inc. v. Hoffman, 477 N.Y.S.2d 447, 449 (App. Div. 3d Dep’t 1984); see also N.Y.C.P.L.R. 5013 (“A judgment dismissing a cause of action before the close of the proponent’s evidence is not a dismissal on the merits unless it specifies otherwise * * *”). Why should a later claim ever be barred if the pleading defect is curable? See Shreve, Preclusion and Federal Choice of Law, 64 Tex.L.Rev. 1209, 1218 n.44 (1986); 18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4439 (3d ed.). The Restatement justifies the majority approach as follows:

* * * [Claim preclusion] is warranted by the ease with which pleadings may be amended, normally at least once as a matter of course, and by the unfairness of requiring the defendant to submit to a second action (often initiated long after the first has come to an end) when no such amendment is sought, or when no appeal has been taken from an erroneous denial of leave to amend.

1286

Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 19, comment d (1982).

C. ISSUE PRECLUSION

One of the most frequently quoted descriptions of what once was called collateral estoppel and is now referred to as issue preclusion was provided by the first Justice Harlan in Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. United States, 168 U.S. 1, 48–49, 18 S.Ct. 18, 27, 42 L.Ed. 355, 377 (1897):

The general principle announced in numerous cases is that a right, question, or fact distinctly put in issue and directly determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, as a ground of recovery, cannot be disputed in a subsequent suit between the same parties or their privies; and, even if the second suit is for a different cause of action, the right, question, or fact once so determined must, as between the same parties or their privies, be taken as conclusively established, so long as the judgment in the first suit remains unmodified.

As this passage reveals, there is a critical difference between claim preclusion and issue preclusion. Under the doctrine of claim preclusion, a claim may be “merged” or “barred” by a party’s failure to raise the claim in a prior action. Issue preclusion, however, applies only to matters argued and decided in an earlier lawsuit.

For issue preclusion to exist, a proceeding must involve the identical issue that was presented in a previous suit. However, more than a mere duplication of issues is required. It is necessary to examine the nature of the first action and the treatment that the issue received in it. Just as for claim preclusion, the judgment in the first action must have been of a certain “quality”—that is, it must have been valid, final, and on the merits (the “on the merits” requirement does not apply if the issue being precluded is exclusively a procedural issue). Moreover, the issue raised in a second suit must have been actually litigated in the first action, and must have been decided by the first court. In addition, determination of that issue must have been necessary to the court’s judgment.

Some courts require still more before they will allow a party to invoke issue preclusion. For example, some demand that the issue have occupied a high position in the hierarchy of legal rules applied in the first action—that it was important. Others require “mutuality”—that is, that the party invoking preclusion would have been bound by an unfavorable judgment in the first suit. However, fewer and fewer courts now impose these latter two conditions, and the mutuality requirement in particular is no longer required if certain conditions are met.

1287

A party may invoke issue preclusion in different procedural contexts. Two main situations are presented. First, plaintiff in a second action may invoke issue preclusion offensively, in order to preclude litigation of an issue that was decided favorably to that party in a prior action. Second, defendant in a second suit may seek to preclude relitigation of an issue that was decided in that party’s favor in a prior suit. Some courts and commentators further distinguish between “direct” and “collateral” preclusion or estoppel—depending upon whether the second proceeding involves the same cause of action as the first. When the two suits involve the same cause of action, issue preclusion sometimes is referred to as direct estoppel. When the second suit involves a new claim or cause of action, issue preclusion sometimes is referred to as collateral estoppel.

1.ACTUALLY LITIGATED

CROMWELL V. COUNTY OF SAC
Supreme Court of the United States, 1876.
94 U.S. \(4 Otto\) 351, 24 L.Ed. 195.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa.

JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action on four bonds * * * each for $1,000, and four coupons for interest, attached to them, each for $100. The bonds were issued in 1860, and were made payable to bearer, in the city of New York, in the years 1868, 1869, 1870, and 1871, respectively, with annual interest at the rate of ten per cent a year.

To defeat this action, the defendant relied upon the estoppel of a judgment rendered in favor of the county in a prior action brought by one Samuel C. Smith upon certain earlier maturing coupons on the same bonds, accompanied with proof that the plaintiff Cromwell was at the time the owner of the coupons in that action, and that the action was prosecuted for his sole use and benefit.

* * *

In considering the operation of this judgment, it should be borne in mind * * * that there is a difference between the effect of a judgment as a bar or estoppel against the prosecution of a second action upon the same claim or demand, and its effect as an estoppel in another action between the same parties upon a different claim or cause of action. In the former case, the judgment, if rendered upon the merits, constitutes an absolute bar to a subsequent action.^b * * * The language * * * which is so often used, that a judgment estops not only as to every ground of recovery or defence actually presented in the action, but also as to every ground which might have been presented, is strictly accurate, when applied to the demand or claim in controversy. * * *

1288

But where the second action between the same parties is upon a different claim or demand, the judgment in the prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered. In all cases, therefore, where it is sought to apply the estoppel of a judgment rendered upon one cause of action to matters arising in a suit upon a different cause of action, the inquiry must always be as to the point or question actually litigated and determined in the original action, not what might have been thus litigated and determined. Only upon such matters is the judgment conclusive in another action.

The difference in the operation of a judgment in the two classes of cases mentioned is seen through all the leading adjudications upon the doctrine of estoppel. Thus, in the case of Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 346, the defendants were held estopped from averring title to a mine, in an action of trespass for digging out coal from it, because, in a previous action for a similar trespass, they had set up the same title, and it had been determined against them. In commenting upon a decision cited in that case, Lord Ellenborough, in his elaborate opinion, said: "It is not the recovery, but the matter alleged by the party, and upon which the recovery proceeds, which creates the estoppel. The recovery of itself in an action of trespass is only a bar to the future recovery of damages for the same injury; but the estoppel precludes parties and privies from contending to the contrary of that point or matter of fact, which, having been once distinctly put in issue by them, or by those to whom they are privy in estate or law, has been, on such issue joined, solemnly found against them."

* * *

Various considerations, other than the actual merits, may govern a party in bringing forward grounds of recovery or defence in one action, which may not exist in another action upon a different demand, such as the smallness of the amount or the value of the property in controversy, the difficulty of obtaining the necessary evidence, the expense of the litigation, and his own situation at the time. A party acting upon considerations like these ought not to be precluded from contesting in a subsequent action other demands arising out of the same transaction. * * *

If, now, we consider the main question presented for our determination * * * its solution will not be difficult. It appears from the findings in the original action of Smith, that the county of Sac, by a vote of its people, authorized the issue of bonds to the amount of $10,000, for the erection of a court-house; that bonds to that amount were issued by the county judge, and delivered to one Meserey, with whom he had made a contract for the erection of the court-house; that immediately upon receipt of the bonds the contractor gave one of them as a gratuity to the county judge; and that the court-house was never constructed by the contractor, or by any other person pursuant to the contract. It also appears that the plaintiff had become, before their maturity, the holder of twenty-five coupons, which had been attached to the bonds, but there was no finding that he had ever given any value for them. * * * The case coming here on writ of error, this court held that the facts disclosed by the findings were sufficient evidence of fraud and illegality in the inception of the bonds to call upon the holder to show that he had given value for the coupons; and, not having done so, the judgment was affirmed. Reading the record of the lower court by the opinion and judgment of this court, it must be considered that the matters adjudged in that case were these: that the bonds were void as against the county in the hands of parties who did not acquire them before maturity and give value for them, and that the plaintiff, not having proved that he gave such value, was not entitled to recover upon the coupons. * * * The finding and judgment upon the invalidity of the bonds, as against the county, must be held to estop the plaintiff here from averring to the contrary. But as the bonds were negotiable instruments * * * they would be held as valid obligations against the county in the hands of a bona fide holder taking them for value before maturity * * *. If, therefore, the plaintiff received the bond and coupons in suit before maturity for value, as he offered to prove, he should have been permitted to show that fact. There was nothing adjudged in the former action in the finding that the plaintiff had not made such proof in that case which can preclude the present plaintiff from making such proof here. The fact that a party may not have shown that he gave value for one bond or coupon is not even presumptive, much less conclusive, evidence that he may not have given value for another and different bond or coupon. The exclusion of the evidence offered by the plaintiff was erroneous * * *.

1289

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

[The dissenting opinion of JUSTICE CLIFFORD is omitted.]

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Restatement (Second), Judgments § 27 (1982) adopted the “actually litigated” requirement as a condition for issue preclusion. What is the justification for the requirement? Consider this criticism:

The Restatement Second offers several reasons to support its adoption of the “actually litigated” requirement. First, the Comment * * * states that an action may involve “so small an amount that litigation of the issue may cost more than the value of the lawsuit.”⁵ This is a rather curious rationale. It does not support the “actually litigated” requirement; rather it supports a rejection of issue preclusion under any circumstances. If there is insufficient incentive to litigate a matter, then there should be no issue preclusion. Litigation in small claims courts or prosecutions for misdemeanors cannot give rise to issue preclusion because often those actions provide litigants with inadequate incentive to litigate. Although the line is not clearly defined, it seems reasonable to conclude that prosecutions for felonies and civil litigation involving substantial amounts will give rise to issue preclusion. The burden properly falls on the presumably precluded party to show why issue preclusion should not apply.

1290

* * * [A second argument used to justify the actually litigated requirement is] that “the forum may be an inconvenient one in which to produce the necessary evidence or in which to litigate at all.” If a valid judgment is going to be handed down, then this forum must have jurisdiction over the defendant and it is the forum of choice of the plaintiff. As the forum of choice of the plaintiff, it is proper to hold that the plaintiff should be bound by any adverse decision reached by the court. It is only in the case of the defendant that he might be able to assert that he should not be bound because it is inconvenient.

In light of (a) the present constitutional limitations on the exercise of jurisdiction over defendants, (b) the fact that the suit by definition involves a substantial interest, and (c) the availability of procedures to get and present the relevant evidence, this justification is not very persuasive. Would it not be better to hold for issue preclusion, and then permit the apparently precluded party to explain why preclusion should not apply?

The [Restatement’s] Comment also gives as a reason for the “actually litigated” rule that a rule to the contrary “might serve to discourage compromise, to decrease the likelihood that the issues in an action would be narrowed by stipulation, and thus to intensify litigation.” This litigation, where there is the incentive to litigate, must involve substantial interests on the part of the parties. The issue preclusion that may flow from the judgment does not change the suit from unimportant to important. The suit is, by definition, important. If a compromise is going to be discouraged, it probably will be by the size of the present suit. If there is going to be a refusal to stipulate and thus narrow issues, in all probability it will be because of the importance of the instant suit and not because of the issue preclusion that may flow from the decision.

Vestal, The Restatement (Second) of Judgments: A Modest Dissent, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 464, 473–74 (1981).

2.Should an issue be considered actually litigated simply because it is included in the pleadings? Consider this analysis:

1291

A good case can be made for saying that if a matter is distinctly put in issue and formally admitted, the party making the admission should be bound by it in subsequent litigation. This was the old formulation of the rule of “judicial estoppel,” as it was then called: “The former verdict is conclusive only as to facts directly and distinctly put in issue * * *.” But how can a matter be “directly and distinctly put in issue”? Obviously, by actual litigation. Another way is through pleadings. In a pleading system where matters are “distinctly put in issue,” it makes sense to say that if a proposition is clearly asserted, and if a party is called upon solemnly to admit or deny the proposition, and if the stakes are high enough to assure that the party is serious in dealing with the issue, and if the party then admits or fails to deny the proposition, then he ought to be estopped from controverting it on some other occasion, particularly if that other occasion involves essentially the same transaction. The clearest case for such an estoppel is where a defendant pleads guilty to a substantial criminal charge and then seeks in civil litigation concerning the same transaction to assert that he did not commit the criminal act. Particularly galling is the situation where a criminal convicted on his own guilty plea seeks as plaintiff in a subsequent civil action to claim redress based on a repudiation of the confession. * * *

The same principle could apply when an issue is put forward and admitted “distinctly”—that is, clearly and solemnly—in a civil case. It is therefore appropriate to impose an estoppel based on a formal admission in a civil case, and the law of evidence does so. A judicial admission is considered in subsequent litigations as prima facie evidence that the admitted matter is true.

* * *

Professor Vestal says there should be an estoppel because, where there is an incentive to deny, failure to deny constitutes an admission. This turns the notion of incentive to litigate on its head. The “incentive to litigate” formula, as used in most of the cases and in the Restatement Second, allows a party who did litigate an issue to relitigate it if the party can show that the original litigation was a side show rather than a struggle to the finish. [See Restatement (Second), Judgments § 28, comment j (1982).] The Restatement Second allows a party to rebut the inference naturally drawn from the fact that the issue was actually litigated—the inference that the party had treated the issue with entire seriousness in the first litigation. In Professor Vestal’s system, however, “incentive to litigate” allows a court to conjecture that the party probably had reason to litigate the issue in the first action, and to conjecture further that the failure to litigate is an admission of a proposition not litigated. Professor Vestal’s “opportunity” theory allows the court to infer that the issue was important to a party whose behavior indicates he thought the issue was unimportant, and, having done that, to convict the party by his silence. * * *

1292

Hazard, Revisiting the Second Restatement of Judgments: Issue Preclusion and Related Problems, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 564, 577–79, 584 (1981).

3.Should a default judgment be given issue preclusive effect? Restatement (First) treated the default as an implied admission of the truth of the allegations, but Restatement (Second) withholds preclusive effect because the implied admission is seen as only a fiction and the issue was not actually litigated. See Noland, Finding Fault with Defaults: New York Courts’ Inconsistent Application of Issue Preclusion to Default Judgments, 31 Cardozo L.Rev. 941, 953 (2010). Not all states follow the rule of Restatement (Second) on this question.

Should a default judgment entered as a penalty under Federal Rule 37 be given issue preclusive effect? Federal Rule 41(b) would seem to provide a clear answer; unless the dismissal states otherwise, a dismissal for failure to comply with a Federal Rule or court order is treated as an adjudication on the merits. Generally, a penalty dismissal carries claim preclusive effect but not issue preclusive effect, because the dismissal does not in and of itself actually litigate any of the issues. However, the procedural context and the purposes of the sanction can affect the court’s decision. In In re Bush, 62 F.3d 1319 (11th Cir. 1995), the Eleventh Circuit, on an issue of first impression, considered whether in a bankruptcy discharge exception proceeding, a default judgment based on allegations of fraud may be used to establish conclusively the elements of fraud and prevent discharge of the judgment debt. In this context, the appeals court held that a default judgment entered as a sanction for the deliberate refusal to participate in discovery carried issue preclusive effect. The court explained:

Where a party has substantially participated in an action in which he had a full and fair opportunity to defend on the merits, but subsequently chooses not to do so, and even attempts to frustrate the effort to bring the action to judgment, it is not an abuse of discretion * * * for a district court to apply the doctrine of collateral estoppel to prevent further litigation of the issues resolved by the default judgment in the prior action.

Id. at 1326. There is division on this question. E.g., In re Martel, 332 B.R. 922 (M.D.Fla. 2005).

4. What is the preclusive effect of a guilty plea in a subsequent civil lawsuit? Not surprisingly, Professor Vestal has argued that a guilty plea should be given preclusive effect unless defendant can show that an adequate opportunity or incentive to litigate the issue was not present in the first lawsuit. Restatement (Second), Judgments § 85, comment b (1982) does not exempt a guilty plea from the “actually litigated” requirement and withholds issue preclusive effect, but notes that a guilty plea is admissible into evidence in later civil suits. Despite the Restatement’s position, some courts, without always setting forth a clear rationale, have granted preclusive effect to guilty pleas in subsequent suits involving the essential elements of the crime. See Shapiro, Should a Guilty Plea Have Preclusive Effect?, 70 Iowa L.Rev. 27 (1984).

1293

5. How should a court determine what was actually decided in a prior litigation? Will the difficulty of this task be affected by whether the case was tried to a judge or to a jury? Are there any procedural rules that can play a role in defining what a suit has decided? Consider, in particular, Rule 49 (special verdict) and Rule 52 (findings and conclusions). The proponent of the defense has the burden to plead and prove it. In making that showing, the record of the prior trial, as well as extraneous evidence, may be used to prove what issues actually were decided. For a general discussion of this topic, see 18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4420 (3d ed.).

6.Should a judgment carry issue preclusive effect when an appeal is pending? Isn’t there the problem of inconsistency if a judgment is given issue preclusive effect and then is reversed on appeal? On the other hand, isn’t there a danger that the losing party will seek appeal only to delay allowing the prevailing party to benefit from her judgment? Should a judgment that cannot be appealed trigger issue preclusive effect? For a discussion of these and other issues relevant to issue preclusion, see Cavanagh, Issue Preclusion in Complex Litigation, 29 Rev.Litig. 859 (2010).

2.NECESSARILY DECIDED

RUSSELL V. PLACE

Supreme Court of the United States, 1876.
94 U.S. \(4 Otto\) 606, 24 L.Ed. 214.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York.

JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a suit for an infringement of a patent to the complainant for an alleged new and useful improvement in the preparation of leather * * *.

The bill of complaint sets forth the invention claimed, the issue of a patent for the same, its surrender for alleged defective and insufficient description of the invention, its reissue with an amended specification, and the recovery of judgment against the defendants for damages in an action at law for a violation of the exclusive privileges secured by the patent.

The bill then alleges the subsequent manufacture, use, and sale by the defendants, without the license of the patentee, of the alleged invention and improvement, and prays that they may be decreed to account for the gains and profits thus acquired by them, and be enjoined from further infringement.

1294

The answer admits the issue of the patent, its surrender and reissue, and, as a defence to this suit, sets up in substance the want of novelty in the invention, its use by the public for more than two years prior to the application for the patent, and that the reissue, so far as it differs from the original patent, is not for the same invention. * * *

The action at law was brought * * * in the ordinary form of such actions for infringement of the privileges secured by a patent. The defendants pleaded the general issue, and set up, by special notice under the act of Congress, the want of novelty in the invention, and its use by the public for more than two years prior to the application for a patent. The plaintiff obtained a verdict for damages, upon which the judgment mentioned was entered; and this judgment, it is now insisted, estops the defendants in this suit from insisting upon the want of novelty in the invention patented, and its prior use by the public, and also from insisting upon any ground going to the validity of the patent which might have been availed of as a defence in that action, and, of course, upon the want of identity in the invention covered by the reissue with that of the original patent.

It is undoubtedly settled law that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, upon a question directly involved in one suit, is conclusive as to that question in another suit between the same parties. But to this operation of the judgment it must appear, either upon the face of the record or be shown by extrinsic evidence, that the precise question was raised and determined in the former suit. If there be any uncertainty on this head in the record—as, for example, if it appear that several distinct matters may have been litigated, upon one or more of which the judgment may have passed, without indicating which of them was thus litigated, and upon which the judgment was rendered—the whole subject-matter of the action will be at large, and open to a new contention, unless this uncertainty be removed by extrinsic evidence showing the precise point involved and determined. * * *

Tested by these views, the question presented * * * is of easy solution. The record of that action does not disclose the nature of the infringement for which damages were recovered. The declaration only avers * * * as the infringement complained of, that the defendants have made and used the invention, and have caused others to make and use it. The patent contains two claims: one for the use of fat liquor generally in the treatment of leather, and the other for a process of treating bark tanned lamb or sheep skin by means of a compound composed and applied in a particular manner. Whether the infringement for which the verdict and judgment passed consisted in the simple use of fat liquor in the treatment of leather, or in the use of the process specified, does not appear from the record. A recovery for an infringement of one claim of the patent is not of itself conclusive of an infringement of the other claim, and there was no extrinsic evidence offered to remove the uncertainty upon the record * * *. The verdict may have been for an infringement of the first claim; it may have been for an infringement of the second; it may have been for an infringement of both. The validity of the patent was not necessarily involved, except with respect to the claim which was the basis of the recovery. A patent may be valid as to a single claim and not valid as to the others. The record wants, therefore, that certainty which is essential to its operation as an estoppel, and does not conclude the defendants from contesting the infringement or the validity of the patent in this suit.

1295

The record is not unlike a record in an action for money had and received to the plaintiff's use. It would be impossible to affirm from such a record, with certainty, for what moneys thus received the action was brought, without extrinsic evidence showing the fact; and, of course, without such evidence the verdict and judgment would conclude nothing, except as to the amount of indebtedness established.

* * *

Decree affirmed.

JUSTICE CLIFFORD dissented.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Assume that plaintiff brings suit for personal injuries arising out of a car collision. Defendant answers, denying negligence and affirmatively pleading contributory negligence. Evidence is presented on both issues, and there is a general verdict for defendant. If defendant subsequently sues plaintiff for his own injuries arising out of the same accident, may defendant rely upon the first judgment as establishing any part of the case? See Note, Developments in the Law—Res Judicata, 65 Harv.L.Rev. 818, 845–46 (1952).
2. In Kelley v. Curtiss, 16 N.J. 265, 273, 108 A.2d 431, 435 (1954), the New Jersey Supreme Court said: “The case against [defendant] having been submitted to the jury with instructions that he was entitled to a verdict of no cause of action if the jury found either that he was not negligent or that [plaintiff] was guilty of contributory negligence, the general verdict is to be considered as determining both grounds in [defendant’s] favor.” Is this holding consistent with Russell v. Place? If not, which case advances the better rule?

3.Should the principles embodied in Russell call for a different result if the jury in the first action makes specific findings of fact on each of the alternative grounds? What if the first action is a bench trial and the judge specifically discusses her findings on each of the alternative grounds?

4. What should be the outcome if an appellate court, faced with alternative determinations by the trial court, affirms on only one ground? If conservation of judicial resources is the ultimate goal, why should anything short of reversal on appeal strip a conclusive determination of its preclusive effect? See Lucas, The Direct and Collateral Estoppel Effects of Alternative Holdings, 50 U.Chi.L.Rev. 701 (1983).

1296

Rios v. Davis

Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, Eastland, 1963.
373 S.W.2d 386.

COLLINGS, JUSTICE.

Juan C. Rios brought this suit against Jessie Hubert Davis in the District Court to recover damages * * * alleged to have been sustained as a result of personal injuries received * * * in an automobile collision. Plaintiff alleged that his injuries were proximately caused by negligence on the part of the defendant. The defendant answered alleging that Rios was guilty of contributory negligence. Also, among other defenses, the defendant urged a plea of res judicata and collateral estoppel based upon the findings and the judgment entered * * * in a suit between the same parties in the County Court at Law of El Paso County. The plea of res judicata was sustained and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant * * *.

It is shown by the record that * * * Popular Dry Goods Company brought suit against appellee Davis * * * seeking to recover for damages to its truck in the sum of $443.97, alleged to have been sustained in the same collision here involved. Davis answered alleging contributory negligence on the part of Popular and joined appellant Juan C. Rios as a third party defendant and sought to recover from Rios $248.50, the alleged amount of damages to his automobile. The jury * * * found that Popular Dry Goods Company and Rios were guilty of negligence proximately causing the collision. However, the jury also found that Davis was guilty of negligence proximately causing the collision, and judgment was entered * * * denying Popular Dry Goods any recovery against Davis and denying Davis any recovery against Rios.

Appellant Rios in his third point contends that the District Court erred in sustaining appellee’s plea of res judicata based upon the judgment of the County Court at Law because the findings on the issues regarding appellant’s negligence and liability * * * were immaterial because the judgment entered in that case was in favor of appellant. We sustain this point. * * * The sole basis for the judgment * * * as between Rios and Davis was the findings concerning the negligence of Davis. The finding that Rios was negligent was not essential or material to the judgment and the judgment was not based thereon. On the contrary, the finding * * * that Rios was negligent proximately causing the accident would, if it had been controlling, led [sic] to a different result. Since the judgment was in favor of Rios he had no right or opportunity to complain of or to appeal from the finding that he was guilty of such negligence even if such finding had been without any support whatever in the evidence. The right of appeal is from a judgment and not from a finding. * * * In the case of Word v. Colley, Tex.Civ.App., 173 S.W. 629, at page 634 of its opinion (Error Ref.), the court stated as follows:

1297

It is the judgment, and not the verdict or the conclusions of fact, filed by a trial court which constitutes the estoppel, and a finding of fact by a jury or a court which does not become the basis or one of the grounds of the judgment rendered is not conclusive against either party to the suit.

* * *

The judgment is, therefore, reversed, and the cause is remanded.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The verdict in the earlier action in Rios reflects the consistent practice, utilized in some states, of submitting a case to the jury on “special issues.” Does Rios offer a reason for special verdicts to be used more frequently?

2.In Russell, there was no issue preclusion because the jury gave a general verdict. In Rios, even though the jury gave a special verdict, certain issues were not given preclusive effect because the outcome did not depend upon those findings. However, multiple findings have been found preclusive when the jury could not have arrived at the same judgment without each of those findings. See, e.g., Patterson v. Saunders, 194 Va. 607, 74 S.E.2d 204 (1953).

3.The court in Rios held that the judgment in the earlier case did not estop Rios from denying his own negligence. Should the earlier judgment estop Davis from denying his own negligence?

4.Suppose Davis had not crossclaimed against Rios, but had impleaded the latter on a contingent claim for contribution; that Popular had then made a claim against Rios; that at trial Davis and Rios each had argued the other was solely negligent; and that the jury had found for Popular against both of them. In a subsequent suit by Rios against Davis, would the earlier finding that each had been negligent estop Rios from denying negligence?

Compare Byrum v. Ames & Webb, Inc., 196 Va. 597, 85 S.E.2d 364 (1955) (no), with Stangle v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 295 F.2d 789 (7th Cir. 1961) (yes). In both of these cases, the parties in the later action had been named as codefendants by the plaintiff in the earlier action; should it make any difference if one of them had brought the other in by impleader? Should it make any difference if, in the earlier case, the jury had found one of them negligent, and the other not negligent?

Generally, a judgment does not act as collateral estoppel between coparties unless they are adversaries, and they are considered adversaries only if there is a claim for relief by one coparty against the other. The fact that their interests clash and that they are on opposite sides of every issue does not make them adversaries for this purpose in the absence of such a claim.

5.The court in Rios supported its view by noting that Rios could not appeal the finding of his negligence in the earlier action. See also Restatement (Second), Judgments § 28(1) (1982). Should the prevailing party in the earlier action be permitted in a later action to attack a finding that was necessary to the judgment in the earlier action? Such a situation will not be common.

1298

6. Rios should be compared with Home Owners Federal Savings & Loan Association v. Northwestern Fire & Marine Insurance Co., 354 Mass. 448, 238 N.E.2d 55 (1968), in which the majority opinion states, in what may well be dictum, that “certain findings not strictly essential to the final judgment in the prior action * * * may be relied upon if it is clear that the issues underlying them were treated as essential to the prior case by the court and the party to be bound.” Three of the seven justices dissented. What advantages does this test have over the Rios approach? What disadvantages?

7.How would you justify each of these statements?

(a)When a judgment is supported by multiple independent grounds, all of the grounds may be relitigated. See Halpern v. Schwartz, 426 F.2d 102, 106 (2d Cir. 1970).

(b)When a judgment is supported by multiple independent grounds, none of the grounds may be relitigated. See In re Westgate-California Corp., 642 F.2d 1174 (9th Cir. 1981).

(c)When a judgment is supported by multiple independent grounds, the primary issue may not be relitigated, but secondary issues are not barred. See National Satellite Sports, Inc. v. Eliadis, Inc., 253 F.3d 900 (6th Cir. 2001).

For a full discussion of each approach, see Brownell, Note—Rethinking the Restatement View (Again!): Multiple Independent Holdings and the Doctrine of Issue Preclusion, 37 Val.U.L.Rev. 879 (2003), in which the author recounts the following shift in the position of the Restatement with respect to the collateral estoppel effect of multiple alternative holdings:

The American Law Institute (“ALI”) completely reversed its position on the proper procedure for multiple independent holdings and collateral estoppel between the 1942 edition and the 1982 edition. According to the Restatement of Judgments section 68, comment n, when a judgment is based on alternative grounds, the “judgment is determinative on both grounds.” The Second Restatement, however, mandates that, when there are multiple independent holdings in the first decision, the judgment is not conclusive to either issue alone.

The Second Restatement compares a judgment on multiple independent grounds to that of a nonessential determination. One of the main reasons for this shift was that in 1977, when the Tentative Draft Number Four of the Second Restatement of Judgments was published, Halpern v. Schwartz [Note 7(a), above] was the most recent decision on the question of issue preclusion and multiple independent grounds for a decision. The rationale behind the Second Restatement’s position is that determinations in the alternative may not have been as carefully considered as a judgment based on one holding. The second justification deals with the issue of appeal. The losing party, who is entitled to take an appeal from both determinations, might be dissuaded from appealing because there is a likelihood that at least one of the determinations would be upheld, although the other determination would not even be analyzed by the appellate court. The Second Restatement emphasizes that, “in the interest of predictability and simplicity,” the result of nonpreclusion should be uniform.

1299

Id. at 892–93 (citations omitted). Is it appropriate to analogize multiple independent holdings to nonessential holdings? Is it significant that the multiple holdings are appealable?

3.DEFINING AND CHARACTERIZING THE ISSUE

UNITED STATES v. MOSER, 266 U.S. 236, 45 S.Ct. 66, 69 L.Ed. 262 (1924). Moser was a captain when he retired from the Navy. In his first action, he won a ruling that service as a Naval Academy cadet during the Civil War constituted service during the war that entitled him to be retired with the rank and three-fourths of the sea pay of the next higher grade. Although the Court of Claims changed its mind about the interpretation of the pension statutes, he won his next two actions for later installments of his pay on grounds of preclusion. In his fourth action for still later installments, the Court of Claims ruled both that its initial interpretation of the statute had been correct and that in any event he was entitled to rely on preclusion. The Supreme Court affirmed solely on the res judicata ground:

* * * The question expressly and definitely presented in this suit is the same as that definitely and actually litigated and adjudged in favor of the claimant in the three preceding suits, viz. whether he occupied the status of an officer who had served during the Civil War.

The contention of the government seems to be that the doctrine of res judicata does not apply to questions of law; and, in a sense, that is true. It does not apply to unmixed questions of law. Where, for example, a court in deciding a case has enunciated a rule of law, the parties in a subsequent action upon a different demand are not estopped from insisting that the law is otherwise, merely because the parties are the same in both cases. But a fact, question or right distinctly adjudged in the original action cannot be disputed in a subsequent action, even though the determination was reached upon an erroneous view or by an erroneous application of the law. That would be to affirm the principle in respect of the thing adjudged but, at the same time, deny it all efficacy by sustaining a challenge to the grounds upon which the judgment was based. * * *

1300

Id. at 241–42, 45 S.Ct. at 67, 69 L.Ed. at 264.

COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE V. SUNNEN

Supreme Court of the United States, 1948.

333 U.S. 591, 68 S.Ct. 715, 92 L.Ed. 898.

Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.

JUSTICE MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

[Under a series of agreements, a taxpayer had licensed a corporation, which he controlled, to use his patents in exchange for payment of a 10 percent royalty. At various times, the taxpayer assigned his interest in these agreements to his wife without consideration. Income from these agreements was reported on her income tax returns, and these taxes were paid. The Commissioner contended that the income was taxable to the taxpayer himself and a deficiency was assessed against him.]

* * * [T]he Tax Court held that, with one exception, all the royalties paid to the wife from 1937 to 1941 were part of the taxable income of the taxpayer. * * * The one exception concerned the royalties of $4,881.35 paid in 1937 under the 1928 agreement. In an earlier proceeding in 1935, the Board of Tax Appeals dealt with the taxpayer's income tax liability for the years 1929–1931; it concluded that he was not taxable on the royalties paid to his wife during those years under the 1928 license agreement. This prior determination by the Board caused the Tax Court to apply the principle of res judicata to bar a different result as to the royalties paid pursuant to the same agreement during 1937.

The Tax Court's decision was affirmed in part and reversed in part by the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals. * * * Approval was given to the Tax Court's application of the res judicata doctrine to exclude from the taxpayer's income the $4,881.35 in royalties paid in 1937 under the 1928 agreement. But to the extent that the taxpayer had been held taxable on royalties paid to his wife during the taxable years of 1937–1941, the decision was reversed on the theory that such payments were not income to him. * * *

If the doctrine of res judicata is properly applicable so that all the royalty payments made during 1937–1941 are governed by the prior decision of the Board of Tax Appeals, the case may be disposed of without reaching the merits of the controversy. * * *

* * * [The concepts of res judicata and collateral estoppel] are applicable in the federal income tax field. Income taxes are levied on an annual basis. Each year is the origin of a new liability and of a separate cause of action. Thus if a claim of liability or non-liability relating to a particular tax year is litigated, a judgment on the merits is res judicata as to any subsequent proceeding involving the same claim and the same tax year. But if the later proceeding is concerned with a similar or unlike claim relating to a different tax year, the prior judgment acts as a collateral estoppel only as to those matters in the second proceeding which were actually presented and determined in the first suit. Collateral estoppel operates, in other words, to relieve the government and the taxpayer of “redundant litigation of the identical question of the statute's application to the taxpayer's status.” Tait v. Western Md. R. Co., 289 U.S. 620, 624[, 53 S.Ct. 706, 707, 77 L.Ed. 1405 (1933)].

1301

But collateral estoppel is a doctrine capable of being applied so as to avoid an undue disparity in the impact of income tax liability. A taxpayer may secure a judicial determination of a particular tax matter, a matter which may recur without substantial variation for some years thereafter. But a subsequent modification of the significant facts or a change or development in the controlling legal principles may make that determination obsolete or erroneous, at least for future purposes. If such a determination is then perpetuated each succeeding year as to the taxpayer involved in the original litigation, he is accorded a tax treatment different from that given to other taxpayers of the same class. As a result, there are inequalities in the administration of the revenue laws, discriminatory distinctions in tax liability, and a fertile basis for litigious confusion. * * * Such consequences, however, are neither necessitated nor justified by the principle of collateral estoppel. That principle is designed to prevent repetitious lawsuits over matters which have once been decided and which have remained substantially static, factually and legally. It is not meant to create vested rights in decisions that have become obsolete or erroneous with time, thereby causing inequities among taxpayers.

And so where two cases involve income taxes in different taxable years, collateral estoppel must be used with its limitations carefully in mind so as to avoid injustice. It must be confined to situations where the matter raised in the second suit is identical in all respects with that decided in the first proceeding and where the controlling facts and applicable legal rules remain unchanged. * * * As demonstrated by Blair v. Commissioner, 300 U.S. 5, 9 [, 57 S.Ct. 330, 331, 81 L.Ed. 465 (1937)], a judicial declaration intervening between the two proceedings may so change the legal atmosphere as to render the rule of collateral estoppel inapplicable. But the intervening decision need not necessarily be that of a state court, as it was in the Blair case. While such a state court decision may be considered as having changed the facts for federal tax litigation purposes, a modification or growth in legal principles as enunciated in intervening decisions of this Court may also effect a significant change in the situation. Tax inequality can result as readily from neglecting legal modulations by this Court as from disregarding factual changes wrought by state courts. In either event, the supervening decision cannot justly be ignored by blind reliance upon the rule of collateral estoppel. * * * It naturally follows that an interposed alteration in the pertinent statutory provisions or Treasury regulations can make the use of that rule unwarranted. * * *

1302

Of course, where a question of fact essential to the judgment is actually litigated and determined in the first tax proceeding, the parties are bound by that determination in a subsequent proceeding even though the cause of action is different. * * * And if the very same facts and no others are involved in the second case, a case relating to a different tax year, the prior judgment will be conclusive as to the same legal issues which appear, assuming no intervening doctrinal change. But if the relevant facts in the two cases are separable, even though they be similar or identical, collateral estoppel does not govern the legal issues which recur in the second case. Thus the second proceeding may involve an instrument or transaction identical with, but in a form separable from, the one dealt with in the first proceeding. In that situation, a court is free in the second proceeding to make an independent examination of the legal matters at issue. It may then reach a different result or, if consistency in decision is considered just and desirable, reliance may be placed upon the ordinary rule of stare decisis. Before a party can invoke the collateral estoppel doctrine in these circumstances, the legal matter raised in the second proceeding must involve the same set of events or documents and the same bundle of legal principles that contributed to the rendering of the first judgment. * * *

It is readily apparent in this case that the royalty payments growing out of the license contracts which were not involved in the earlier action before the Board of Tax Appeals and which concerned different tax years are free from the effects of the collateral estoppel doctrine. That is true even though those contracts are identical in all important respects with the 1928 contract, the only one that was before the Board, and even though the issue as to those contracts is the same as that raised by the 1928 contract. * * *

A more difficult problem is posed as to the $4,881.35 in royalties paid to the taxpayer's wife in 1937 under the 1928 contract. Here there is complete identity of facts, issues and parties as between the earlier Board proceeding and the instant one. The Commissioner claims, however, that legal principles developed in various intervening decisions of this Court have made plain the error of the Board's conclusion in the earlier proceeding, thus creating a situation like that involved in Blair v. Commissioner, supra. * * *

The principles which have * * * been recognized and developed by * * * [Helvering v. Clifford, 309 U.S. 331, 60 S.Ct. 554, 84 L.Ed. 788 (1940), and Helvering v. Horst, 311 U.S. 112, 61 S.Ct. 144, 85 L.Ed. 75, 131 A.L.R. 655 (1940)] are directly applicable to the transfer of patent license contracts between members of the same family. They are guideposts for those who seek to determine in a particular instance whether such an assignor retains sufficient control over the assigned contracts or over the receipt of income by the assignee to make it fair to impose income tax liability on him.

1303

Moreover, the clarification and growth of these principles through the Clifford-Horst line of cases constitute, in our opinion, a sufficient change in the legal climate to render inapplicable in the instant proceeding, the doctrine of collateral estoppel relative to the assignment of the 1928 contract. True, these cases did not originate the concept that an assignor is taxable if he retains control over the assigned property or power to defeat the receipt of income by the assignee. But they gave much added emphasis and substance to that concept, making it more suited to meet the "attenuated subtleties" created by taxpayers. So substantial was the amplification of this concept as to justify a reconsideration of earlier Tax Court decisions reached without the benefit of the expanded notions, decisions which are now sought to be perpetuated regardless of their present correctness. Thus in the earlier litigation in 1935, the Board of Tax Appeals was unable to bring to bear on the assignment of the 1928 contract the full breadth of the ideas enunciated in the Clifford-Horst series of cases. And, as we shall see, a proper application of the principles as there developed might well have produced a different result, such as was reached by the Tax Court in this case in regard to the assignments of the other contracts. Under those circumstances collateral estoppel should not have been used by the Tax Court in the instant proceeding to perpetuate the 1935 viewpoint of the assignment.

* * *

The judgment below must therefore be reversed and the case remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary in light of this opinion.

Reversed.

JUSTICE FRANKFURTER and JUSTICE JACKSON believe the judgment of the Tax Court is based on substantial evidence and is consistent with the law, and would affirm that judgment * * *.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. How might you reconcile Sunnen and Moser? Both opinions, in a sense, seek to determine if the subsequent suit concerns facts that are separable from those of the first suit. What is the proper test for this separability? Is it whether historically distinct facts are at issue? Is it whether the facts in the subsequent suit legally are indistinguishable from those of the earlier suit?

2. Is the outcome in the Sunnen case consistent with the underlying goals of res judicata? Does its holding undermine the sense of reliance that judgments should foster? After all, if Sunnen had lost the first litigation, he probably would not have renewed the contract assigning income to his wife.

1304

3. Moser held that “unmixed questions of law” are not subject to issue preclusion. In UNITED STATES v. STAUFFER CHEMICAL CO., 464 U.S. 165, 172, 104 S.Ct. 575, 579, 78 L.Ed.2d 388, 394 (1984), the Court acknowledged that “the purpose underlying the exception for ‘unmixed questions of law’ in successive actions on unrelated claims is far from clear.” Rather than engaging in the virtually impossible task of delineating the boundary between an issue of fact, law, or mixed fact and law, the Court adopted the more pragmatic approach suggested in Restatement (Second), Judgments § 28, comment b (1982):

When the claims in two separate actions between the same parties are the same or are closely related * * * it is not ordinarily necessary to characterize an issue as one of fact or of law for purposes of issue preclusion. * * * In such a case, it is unfair to the winning party and an unnecessary burden on the courts to allow repeated litigation of the same issue in what is essentially the same controversy, even if the issue is regarded as one of “law.”

Why isn’t the doctrine of stare decisis an adequate protection against the undue burden of relitigation of issues of “law”? Further, is it appropriate, as a noted commentator has asked, for “the law to remain static as between two litigants in a prior case if it is subject to change in any other litigation”? Shapiro, Civil Procedure: Preclusion in Civil Actions 54 (2001).

4. As Sunnen and Moser illustrate, the careful “delineation” of questions of pure law, and their exemption from issue preclusion, have important public implications. Ought the government be able to relitigate a legal issue until the matter has been finally decided by the Supreme Court? Hazard, Preclusion as to Issues of Law: The Legal System’s Interest, 70 Iowa L.Rev. 81, 92 (1984). Relatedly, is it appropriate for an agency to refuse to follow circuit court rulings? Compare Estreicher & Revesz, Nonacquiescence by Federal Administrative Agencies, 98 Yale L.J. 679 (1989), with Diller & Morawetz, Intracircuit Nonacquiescence and the Breakdown of the Rule of Law: A Response to Estreicher and Revesz, 99 Yale L.J. 801 (1990).

5. When a court determines a mixed question of law and fact, how should subsequent changes in the relevant substantive law influence whether preclusive effect is given to the determination? The Sunnen opinion helps answer this question. When new historic facts are the basis of the second suit and there has been a change in legal regime since the prior suit was adjudicated, the first judgment will not preclude the second litigation. See, e.g., Spradling v. City of Tulsa, 198 F.3d 1219, 1223 (10th Cir. 2000); Bingaman v. Dep’t of the Treasury, 127 F.3d 1431, 1438 (Fed.Cir. 1997).

In some situations it is easy to determine when this exception is invoked properly. When a new statute or new regulation has been enacted, or when a controlling Supreme Court precedent has been altered, the exception’s application is indisputable. In other situations it is not so clear that a change in substantive law should prevent preclusion. Should preclusion be allowed if there is an inconsistent decision by the same court on similar facts? Should a “change in legal atmosphere” count as an intervening “change in controlling legal principles”? See Charter Fed. Savs. Bank v. United States, 54 Fed.Cl. 120, 127 (Fed.Cl. 2002); see also Minarik Electric Co. v. Electro Sales Co., Inc., 223 F.Supp.2d 334, 341 (D.Mass. 2002) (discussing “substantial change in the legal climate since the judgment in the previous case”).

1305

6. The frequent changes in tax law arguably prevent any individual from developing much of a sense of repose in tax decisions, and there is a particularly urgent need to treat similarly situated taxpayers alike. These factors suggest that a narrow definition of “issue” may be appropriate in cases involving tax law. However, in tax, as in other areas, the policy considerations that underlie substantive law still must be balanced against the strong individual interests in repose and reliance that particular fact patterns may exhibit. See Webster, The Limits of Collateral Estoppel in Tax Court Litigation, 8 B.U.J.Tax Law 43 (1990).

7. In HERRERA v. WYOMING, 587 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct. 1686, 203 L.Ed.2d 846 (2019), the Supreme Court concluded that a change in law justified an exception to issue preclusion. Herrera, a member of the Crow Tribe, was convicted in a Wyoming state court of taking elk off-season and without a Wyoming hunting license. He based his defense on an 1868 Treaty in which the Crow Indian Nation ceded lands to the United States in exchange for the right to hunt on unoccupied portions of those lands. Wyoming argued that the treaty had been terminated when the state was admitted to the Union. Wyoming invoked issue preclusion based on a prior judgment in Crow Tribe of Indians v. Repsis, 73 F.3d 982 (10th Cir. 1995), a case that had involved the same treaty and had been argued on behalf of the Crow Tribe. Repsis determined that the treaty rights did not survive statehood.

In a 5–4 decision, the Supreme Court held that Repsis did not preclude Herrera from asserting a defense under the treaty. Although Repsis involved the same treaty and the same tribe, it relied on the reasoning of an older Supreme Court case, Ward v. Race Horse, 163 U.S. 504, 16 S.Ct. 1076, 41 L.Ed.2d 244 (1896), which the Court had repudiated—after the Repsis decision—in Minnesota v. Mille Lacs Band of Chippewa Indians, 526 U.S. 172, 119 S.Ct. 1187, 143 L.Ed.2d 270 (1999). The majority explained that under the change-in-law exception to issue preclusion, Repsis was not a bar to litigating whether the treaty’s grant of hunting rights survived Wyoming’s statehood:

Because this Court’s intervening decision in Mille Lacs repudiated the reasoning on which the Tenth Circuit relied in Repsis, Repsis does not preclude Herrera from arguing that the 1868 Treaty right survived Wyoming’s statehood.

Under the doctrine of issue preclusion, “a prior judgment . . . foreclos[es] successive litigation of an issue of fact or law actually litigated and resolved in a valid court determination essential to the prior judgment.” New Hampshire v. Maine, 532 U.S. 742, 748–749, 121 S.Ct. 1808, 149 L.Ed.2d 968 (2001). Even when the elements of issue preclusion are met, however, an exception may be warranted if there has been an intervening “ ‘change in [the] applicable legal context.’ ” Bobby v. Bies, 556 U.S. 825, 834, 129 S.Ct. 2145, 173 L.Ed.2d 1173 (2009) (quoting Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 28, Comment c (1980)) * * * ; Commissioner v. Sunnen, 333 U.S. 591, 599, 68 S.Ct. 715, 92 L.Ed. 898 (1948) * * *. The change-in-law exception recognizes that applying issue preclusion in changed circumstances may not “advance the equitable administration of the law.” Bobby, 556 U.S., at 836–837, 129 S.Ct. 2145, 173 L.Ed.2d 1173.

We conclude that a change in law justifies an exception to preclusion in this case. * * * When the Tenth Circuit reached its decision in Repsis, it had no authority to disregard this Court’s holding in Race Horse and no ability to predict the analysis this Court would adopt in Mille Lacs. Mille Lacs repudiated Race Horse’s reasoning. Although we recognize that it may be difficult at the margins to discern whether a particular legal shift warrants an exception to issue preclusion, this is not a marginal case. At a minimum, a repudiated decision does not retain preclusive force.

587 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct. at 1697–98, 203 L.Ed.2d at 858–59.

In dissent, Justice Alito contended that Repsis also relied on another ground for decision—namely, that the lands in question were occupied and no longer subject to Crow hunting rights under the treaty—and that this ground was not disturbed by Mille Lacs. (In a footnote, the majority rejected the argument that the Wyoming state courts gave issue preclusive effect to that ground for decision.) As to the scope of the change-in-law exception to issue preclusion, the dissent stated:

* * * There is support in the Restatement (Second) of Judgments for the general proposition that a change in law may alter a judgment’s preclusive effect, § 28, Comment c, p. 276 (1980), and in a prior case, Bobby v. Bies * * *, we invoked that provision. But we have never actually held that a prior judgment lacked preclusive effect on this ground. Nor have we ever defined how much the relevant “legal context” must change in order for the exception to apply. If the exception is applied too aggressively, it could dangerously undermine the important interests served by issue preclusion. So caution is in order in relying on that exception here.

The majority thinks that the exception applies because Mille Lacs effectively overruled Race Horse, even though it did not say that in so many words. But that is a questionable interpretation. The fact of the matter is that the Mille Lacs majority held back from actually overruling Race Horse, even though the dissent claimed that it had effectively done so. * * * And while the opinion of the Court repudiated one of the two grounds that the Race Horse Court gave for its decision * * *, it is by no means clear that Mille Lacs also rejected the second ground (the conclusion that the terms of the Act admitting Wyoming to the Union manifested a congressional intent not to burden the State with the right created by the 1868 Treaty). * * *

On this reading, it appears that Mille Lacs did not reject the second ground for the decision in Race Horse but simply found it inapplicable to the facts of the case at hand. I do not claim that this reading of Mille Lacs is indisputable, but it is certainly reasonable, and if it is correct, Mille Lacs did not change the legal context as much as the majority suggests. * * *

The majority cites no authority holding that a decision like Mille Lacs is sufficient to deprive a prior judgment of its issue-preclusive effect. * * *

587 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct. at 1707–08, 203 L.Ed.2d at 870.

THE EVERGREENS DOCTRINE. In addition to limiting collateral estoppel to identical issues, courts sometimes have distinguished between “ultimate” and “mediate” facts when determining whether issues decided in one suit will be viewed as preclusive in a later one. The most influential explanation of this distinction is found in Judge Learned Hand’s opinion in THE EVERGREENS v. NUNAN, 141 F.2d 927 (2d Cir. 1944), cert. denied, 323 U.S. 720, 65 S.Ct. 49, 89 L.Ed. 579 (1944). The gist of the doctrine is simple: imagine a lawsuit as a logical structure resembling a pyramid. At its base are the facts introduced into evidence. From these facts are drawn conclusions that, when combined with other deductions or evidence, lead eventually to “ultimate facts” that establish a legal right, duty, or status. The ultimate facts are the summit of the structure; all that supports them are “mediate data.” The Evergreens held that only matters constituting ultimate facts in the second action are subject to preclusion by collateral estoppel.

The controversy in The Evergreens turned on the value for tax purposes of cemetery lots appropriated by the City of New York. The lots were of two kinds, improved and unimproved. An earlier proceeding had determined the value of the improved lots, and that determination was accepted in the later action without dispute. The earlier proceeding also had fixed the cost of upgrading the unimproved lots to “improved” status. The plaintiff maintained that these two findings taken together should determine the value of the unimproved lots: The uncontested value of the improved lots minus the cost of improving them should be taken as the value of the unimproved lots.

The Second Circuit rejected this argument, relying on the distinction between ultimate and mediate facts. Judge Hand first noted that authorities differed concerning whether mediate facts or only ultimate facts in the first suit are decided conclusively by the judgment.

The question presented, however, was whether a determination, either mediate or ultimate in the first suit, could establish a mediate fact in the second suit. On this question, authority was silent; Judge Hand decided that collateral estoppel could not be used.

This determination was based on the notion that the consequences that would result if estoppel were to apply might be both unintended and unjust as a given fact can lead to unpredictable deductions. Restricting the use of collateral estoppel to ultimate issues in the second suit attempts to ensure that the consequences of issues decided by the first judgment are plainly visible when that judgment was entered. According to Judge Hand:

What jural relevance facts may acquire in the future it is often impossible even remotely to anticipate. Were the law to be recast, it would therefore be a pertinent inquiry whether the conclusiveness * * * might not properly be limited to future controversies which could be thought reasonably in prospect when the first suit was tried. That is, of course, not the law as it stands * * *.

Id. at 929.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Commentators have criticized the mediate and ultimate fact terminology as difficult to understand and even more difficult to apply. See Heckman, Collateral Estoppel as the Answer to Multiple Litigation Problems in Federal Tax Law: Another View of Sunnen and The Evergreens, 19 Case W.Res.L.Rev. 230 (1967); Polasky, Collateral Estoppel—Effects of Prior Litigation, 39 Iowa L.Rev. 217 (1954). The terminology reflects an earlier era of civil procedure—before the advent of the Federal Rules—when the concept of ultimate facts, which were necessary to state a cause of action, played a central role in framing a complaint under Code pleading regimes. See pp. 604–607, supra. Moreover, some courts have rejected the analysis set out in The Evergreens as inconsistent with the purposes of collateral estoppel. Consider the following:

[Criticism of The Evergreens rule] is based primarily upon the difficulty in administering a distinction between ultimate and mediate facts, and the lack of correspondence of such a distinction to any intelligible reasons for limiting preclusion. * * *

[E]ven though a fact may be regarded in theory as less than an ultimate fact, the parties may have expended great effort in proving whether or not that fact existed, and the fact may even have been regarded by everyone involved in the litigation as the key issue in a dispute. In these circumstances, * * * the rule is at odds with the purposes of the doctrine of issue preclusion: the conservation of judicial resources and the fostering of reliance on prior judicial action by minimizing the possibility of inconsistent decisions and by protecting a prevailing party from vexatious litigation. * * *

1309

On this basis, many courts * * * have ignored the Evergreens rule, and they have measured the scope of preclusion, not by a distinction between ultimate and mediate facts, but rather by focusing more directly on the quality and extensiveness of litigation in the first action. For that reason too, the Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27 comment j has rejected the distinction between ultimate and evidentiary facts, instead according preclusive effect to determinations that are essential or necessary to the judgment.

* * *

Accordingly, we hold, following the Restatement, that preclusive effect may be accorded to a decision on an issue if that issue was “actually recognized by the parties as important and by the trier of fact as necessary to the first judgment.” Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27 comment j.

SYNANON CHURCH v. UNITED STATES, 820 F.2d 421, 426–27 (D.C.Cir. 1987).

2.A second part of Judge Hand’s analysis in The Evergreens appears to look to the role that the issue will play in the second litigation. The following excerpt may help cast some light on the purposes that underlie The Evergreens rule:

The valid core of the Evergreens rule might be preserved by expanding the requirement that the first action afford a full and fair opportunity to litigate the common issue. Substantial changes in the legal context or the consequences of the issue, particularly, could support the conclusion that the initial opportunity was not sufficient to support preclusion. It would be more difficult to consider the need to retry related issues on substantially the same evidence through the full and fair opportunity test. Reliance on the full and fair opportunity test would also work against relitigation because of a common reluctance to challenge directly the adequacy of a prior action. Wise administration of the full and fair opportunity test can go far; it may not go far enough.

In the end, the question can be simply put. There are strong reasons to adopt a general rule that issue preclusion is defeated by substantial changes in the legal context in which the issue arises, by substantial changes in the consequences it may entail, or by the need to retry related issues. A general rule framed in these terms would force attention to the real sources of concern. It seems likely that such a general rule would not defeat issue preclusion in any substantial portion of the cases that satisfy all of the other requirements. Even when the result is to deny preclusion, there may be little injury to the values generally served by preclusion. Nonetheless, the price might prove too high. Federal courts have not yet spun any such rule out of the Evergreens decision, and any proof of its value must await the effort and the experience.

1310

18 Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4424 (3d ed.).

3.In SECURITIES EXCHANGE COMMISSION v. MONARCH FUNDING CORP., 192 F.3d 295 (2d Cir. 1999), the Second Circuit held, as a matter of first impression, that there was no per se bar to according issue preclusive effect to findings made in a criminal sentencing proceeding in a subsequent civil case, but that it should be “presumed improper” and “applied only in those circumstances where it is clearly fair and efficient to do so”:

* * * [R]egardless of how carefully considered an issue may have been during the process leading up to decision, and regardless of what may be inferred from that decision, estoppel does not apply to a finding that was not legally necessary to the final sentence. See 18 Charles Alan Wright, Arthur R. Miller & Edward H. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4421, at 196 (1981).

* * *

* * * [I]n this case, it was not legally necessary for Judge Lechner to find that [defendant] committed securities fraud to impose the [sentencing] enhancement. Thus, while Judge Lechner’s findings that [defendant] induced perjury, attempted to conceal assets and shredded documents were necessary to the [sentencing] enhancement, the finding that these nefarious activities were part of a securities fraud was not.

* * *

In addition, we conclude that precluding relitigation in this case failed to promote the primary rationale for collateral estoppel, namely: judicial economy. The sentencing proceedings in the criminal action were exhaustive. As noted, there was a high degree of cooperation between the SEC and the New Jersey United States Attorney’s Office in the criminal action. Given that cooperation, we cannot say that the criminal action was not complicated by efforts to have express findings made on tangential issues at sentencing in order to give the SEC a chance to invoke collateral estoppel in the subsequent civil action. More importantly, however, collateral estoppel did not do much to simplify the civil action. Even discounting the added complexities associated with the novelty of the issue, the district court’s “close scrutiny” and “searching examination” in this case required considerable effort—in all probability more effort than would have been required for a summary adjudication under Federal Rule * * * 56(c), or even for a trial. * * *

1311

We raise this point to make clear that in determining whether to apply collateral estoppel to sentencing findings in the future, district courts should start by making a threshold assessment of whether it will be efficient to do so. Given the potential unfairness associated with extending collateral estoppel to sentencing findings generally, if the court reasonably determines that the doctrine will not promote efficiency, it should feel free to deny preclusion for that reason alone.

Id. at 307–11. But see U.S. ex rel. Lamberts v. Stokes, 640 F.Supp.2d 927 (W.D.Mich. 2009) (presumption overcome when sentencing hearing litigated and the court decided the precise issues raised in the later case; the findings were necessary to and embodied in the judgment, and defendant had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the issue, presenting expert testimony on the issue).

D. THE REQUIRED QUALITY OF JUDGMENT

Only judgments of a certain quality will give rise to preclusion. The traditional words used to describe that quality was that the judgment must be valid, final, and on the merits. Keep in mind that courts enter judgments that are regarded as “on the merits” although reached without a full adjudicatory proceeding. In addition, courts increasingly are faced with the prior determinations of state or federal administrative agencies that act in a quasi-judicial capacity. This Section highlights some of the difficult questions the “quality of judgment” requirement raises.

1.JUDGMENTS OF JUDICIAL TRIBUNALS

HANOVER LOGANSPORT, INC. v. ROBERT C. ANDERSON, INC.

Court of Appeals of Indiana, Third District, 1987.

512 N.E.2d 465.

STATON, JUDGE.

[Hanover Logansport, Inc. (“Hanover”) and Robert C. Anderson, Inc. (“Anderson”) entered into an agreement pursuant to which Hanover agreed to lease certain property to Anderson for use as a liquor store. Hanover failed to deliver the premises on the agreed upon date, and Anderson filed suit for breach of the lease. Before trial, Hanover offered to deliver the real estate to Anderson, and Anderson accepted with the following reservation: “[T]he offer is only accepted for purposes of mitigation of damages and not in settlement of damages arising to Plaintiff caused by Defendants’ breach of contract.”

The parties filed a stipulation that “the judgment as stipulated to by the Defendants herein should be recorded of record in the judgment record book of the County of St. Joseph.” Anderson took possession of the premises, and, after several months, Hanover moved to dismiss the earlier breach action. The trial court denied the motion, and Hanover appealed, arguing that the prior consent judgment precluded any further litigation based on the same cause of action.]

1312

* * *

Hanover makes the following argument:

1. The complaint seeks specific performance of the lease or in the alternative money damages for loss of profits over the term of the lease.
2. Hanover made an offer of real estate pursuant to [Indiana Trial Rule 68] consistent with one of the alternatives—specific performance—in the complaint.^d
3. Anderson accepted the offer.
4. Under T.R. 68, the clerk is required to enter judgment.
5. Anderson took possession of the real estate.
6. By accepting the offer of real estate and taking possession of the premises, Anderson chose its remedy and is now barred by law from continuing the litigation.

Anderson argues that (1) an offer of judgment under T.R. 68 may be in part or in whole; and (2) both Hanover and the trial court were on notice that the offer of judgment did not address and dispose of the whole of its claim. Anderson points to the portion of its acceptance which states: “ * * * Further, the offer is only accepted for purposes of mitigation of damages and not in settlement of damages arising to Plaintiff caused by Defendants’ breach of contract.” In its brief, Anderson states: “The acceptance of said offer specifically states that the lease between the parties would be as contracted, subject to the conditions in the lease, but that the Plaintiff did not waive damages for breach of contract which arose due to the failure of Defendant to honor its contract between the date the offer was signed and the date the Court entered an Order approving the settlment [sic] [in original] as to possession.” (Emphasis added.) * * *

Thus, we address the following issue: Whether, by law, a plaintiff, who accepts an offer of judgment which conforms to one of the alternative prayers for relief contained in his complaint, may then seek additional damages arising from the same cause of action.

* * *

1313

A consent judgment has a dual aspect. It represents an agreement between the parties settling the underlying dispute and providing for the entry of judgment in a pending or contemplated action. See James, Consent Judgments as Collateral Estoppel, 108 U.Pa.L.Rev. 173, 175 (1959). It also represents the entry of such a judgment by a court—with all that this means in the way of committing the force of society to implement the judgment of its courts. Id.

As a result of this dual aspect, some courts and commentators focus on the contractual aspect of a consent judgment, thus determining whatever its preclusive effect may be by ascertaining the intent of the parties—in the same way courts construe other agreements. * * *

Yet, other courts and commentators focus on the entry of a consent judgment by a court and argue that such a judgment possesses the same force with regard to res judicata and collateral estoppel as a judgment entered after a trial on the merits. * * *

Proponents of the consent-judgment-as-contract theory argue that if consent judgments are given preclusive effect regardless of the intent of the parties, such a rule would lessen the chance of compromise between them. This, they argue, is true for two reasons. First, in many cases, the application of such a rule (at least in regard to the collateral estoppel aspect of the rule) would be unforeseeable—it would reach into all possible future disputes among the parties, no matter how hard it may be to predict them at the outset of the first litigation. Second, if all issues and claims must be negotiated and dealt with in a consent judgment or foregone forever, parties will be reluctant to enter into such an agreement for fear that they will “miss” something.

But, proponents of the consent-judgment-as-final judgment theory counter that the preclusive effect of a consent judgment serves several objectives. Among them, economy is achieved in the use of judicial resources, the harassment of parties avoided, and the possibility of inconsistent results is eliminated. * * *

We note that T.R. 68 is intended to encourage settlements, discourage vexatious suits, and avoid protracted litigation. See 12 Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure, § 3001. Therefore, the result we reach should serve those purposes.

Because we agree that if all issues and claims must be negotiated and dealt with in a consent judgment or foregone forever, parties will be reluctant to enter into such agreements, we adopt the consent-judgment-as-contract theory and hold that the preclusive effect of a consent judgment must be measured by the intent of the parties. However, it must be clear that both parties have agreed to reserve an issue or claim. And, it must be precisely stated what issues or claims are being reserved.

1314

* * *

[I]n order to insure that both parties have agreed to reserve a claim or issue⁹ and that the reserved claim or issue is clearly apparent to both parties, we hold that (1) the reservation must be incorporated into the offer of judgment itself and (2) it must be an inherent part of the original complaint. Thus, for example, before a party may reserve an additional cause of action in a consent judgment, that cause of action must have been originally set out on the face of the complaint. Because Anderson did not include a claim for damages for delay in tendering the real estate in its Complaint, it is precluded from reserving such a claim in the consent judgment.¹⁰ * * *

[T]his rule will avoid protracted litigation, since it requires plaintiffs to reserve a claim or issue both in the complaint and in the consent judgment. If we were to require such a reservation only in the consent judgment (as Anderson asks us to do here), the potential for protracted litigation would be too great. For example, in a situation where A and B have entered a consent judgment and B thinks the controversy has ended, such a rule would allow A: (1) to argue that it had no intention of ending the controversy and (2) to proceed on the alleged balance of its claim. This could potentially allow the litigation to continue on and on through the years.

But, under the rule we have set forth here, A would not be allowed to make such a claim unless it was shown that a reservation was made in A’s complaint and in the consent judgment. In this way, courts can be assured it was also B’s intention to continue the litigation.

Therefore, we reverse and remand to the trial court, with instructions to enter a judgment on the offer of judgment and to grant Hanover’s motion to dismiss.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Should the agreement between Hanover and Anderson be considered a court judgment, or is it more properly characterized as a contract? If it is merely a contract, should the intent of the parties as to its preclusive effect be dispositive? Did the parties require the approval of the court in the form of a judgment to make a new contract? Do you agree that a rule that did not make the intent of the parties dispositive would have the effect of discouraging consent judgments? See Easterbrook, Justice and Contract in Consent Judgments, 1987 U.Chi.Legal F. 19.

1315

2. Even if a consent decree has claim preclusive effect, should it also have issue preclusive effect? Doesn’t collateral estoppel doctrine require that an issue be “actually litigated”? In ARIZONA v. CALIFORNIA, 530 U.S. 392, 120 S.Ct. 2304, 147 L.Ed.2d 374 (2000), the Supreme Court explained:

* * * [S]ettlements ordinarily occasion no issue preclusion (sometimes called collateral estoppel), unless it is clear * * * that the parties intend their agreement to have such an effect. * * * “In most circumstances, it is recognized that consent agreements ordinarily are intended to preclude any further litigation on the claim presented but are not intended to preclude further litigation on any of the issues presented. Thus consent judgments ordinarily support claim preclusion but not issue preclusion.” * * * This differentiation is grounded in basic res judicata doctrine. It is the general rule that issue preclusion attaches only “[w]hen an issue of fact or law is actually litigated and determined by a valid and final judgment, and the determination is essential to the judgment.” Restatement (Second) of Judgments, § 27 * * * (1982). “In the case of a judgment entered by confession, consent, or default, none of the issues is actually litigated. * * *.”

Id. at 414, 120 S.Ct. at 2319, 147 L.Ed.2d at 395–96 (internal citation omitted).

3. Should a final judgment be stripped of its preclusive effect if both parties consent to that result on appeal? A stipulated reversal allows parties seeking to facilitate settlement during the pendency of an appeal to join in asking the appellate court to set aside a trial court judgment, rather than dismissing the appeal, thereby avoiding the preclusive effect of a final judgment. In U.S. BANCORP MORTGAGE CO. v. BONNER MALL PARTNERSHIP, 513 U.S. 18, 115 S.Ct. 386, 130 L.Ed.2d 233 (1994), the Supreme Court unanimously denied petitioner’s motion to vacate a judgment of a court of appeals in a case that had become moot by reason of settlement after certiorari was sought, but the Court recognized that vacatur could be granted in “extraordinary circumstances.” Id. at 29, 115 S.Ct. at 393, 130 L.Ed.2d at 244. What circumstances might count as “extraordinary”?

Two years earlier, in NEARY v. REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, 3 Cal.4th 273, 10 Cal.Rptr.2d 859, 834 P.2d 119 (1992), the California Supreme Court held that stipulated reversals are consistent with the policy in favor of peaceful settlements and should be granted absent a showing of extraordinary circumstances warranting an exception to this general rule. What did the California court mean by “extraordinary circumstances”? The California legislature during its 1999–2000 session modified California Code of Civil Procedure § 128(a)(8) to provide that an appellate court shall not permit a stipulated reversal absent a finding of two specified conditions:

1316

- (a) There is no reasonable possibility that the interests of nonparties or the public will be adversely affected by the reversal.
- (b) The reasons of the parties for requesting reversal outweigh the erosion of public trust that may result from the nullification of a judgment and the risk that the availability of stipulated reversal will reduce the incentive for pretrial settlement.

See City of Palmdale v. State Bd. of Equalization, 206 Cal.App.4th 329, 141 Cal.Rptr.3d 719 (2012) (motion to vacate judgment that exposed an agency’s deficiencies denied because it would adversely affect the public interest). For a discussion of issues raised by Bancorp and Neary, see Resnik, Whose Judgment? Vacating Judgments, Preferences for Settlement, and the Role of Adjudication at the Close of the Twentieth Century, 41 UCLA L.Rev. 1471 (1994).

4. Suppose that rather than settling the dispute in Hanover, the parties merely stipulated most of the material facts concerning the lease agreement.

The case went to trial, further factual findings were made, and a decision was rendered for Hanover against Anderson. Should the admissions in those stipulations be available in a subsequent suit between the parties? What if the suit is between another plaintiff and Hanover, and the complaint is based upon the same alleged breach of the lease? What light does the last sentence of Rule 36(b) shed on this problem? Do stipulated facts constitute an “adjudication on the merits”?

HOUSING AUTHORITY FOR LA SALLE COUNTY v. YOUNG MEN’S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION OF OTTAWA, 101 Ill.2d 246, 78 Ill.Dec. 125, 461 N.E.2d 959 (1984). In 1932, the federal government sought to condemn easements over certain property for the purpose of constructing a system of locks and dams on the Illinois River. Seventy parties were summoned to court to adjudicate the title to the property so the government would know who was entitled to compensation as a result of the condemnation. With respect to a certain parcel of land, the government’s petition pointed to a conflict over the title between Ella E. Deenis and The First Trust Company of Ottawa, Illinois (“First Trust”). Deenis failed to appear after being served properly with summons, resulting in a default judgment in favor of First Trust. The judgment determined that First Trust owned the property in question, and First Trust was awarded $650 as compensation for the easements.

The second suit arose over 50 years later between the parties’ successors in interest to the property. The Housing Authority for La Salle

1317

County, Deenis’ successor in interest, sought an injunction prohibiting the Young Men’s Christian Association of Ottawa (“YMCA”), First Trust’s successor in interest, from constructing a parking lot on the real estate. The YMCA asserted the earlier judgment in the condemnation action as collateral estoppel with respect to the title to the property. The court decided that the case was governed by the principles of res judicata rather than collateral estoppel, but nonetheless held that the earlier judgment was conclusive as to the parties’ rights:

* * * When Deenis defaulted and the court entered a judgment finding First Trust to be the fee owner of the property, the title dispute was resolved and the doctrine of res judicata applied to bar any relitigation of that claim.

Although the judgment against Deenis was by default, it is entitled to the same preclusive effect under the doctrine of res judicata as any other judgment. Some courts have held that default judgments have limited preclusive effects under the doctrine of collateral estoppel. * * * However, default judgments are always res judicata on the ultimate claim or demand presented in the complaint.

* * *

The housing authority argues that Deenis lacked sufficient incentive to litigate the issue of title in the condemnation proceeding and, therefore, it is inequitable to accord the judgment in that proceeding preclusive effect as having determined the ownership of the disputed parcel. This argument is unpersuasive. Under special circumstances, the absence of an incentive to litigate might be relevant in the application of collateral estoppel (Restatement (Second) of Judgments sec. 28(5)(c) (1982)), but no authority suggests that it is relevant when the doctrine to be applied is res judicata.

Id. at 253, 78 Ill.Dec. at 129, 461 N.E.2d at 963.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Suppose a small Massachusetts computer company contracts with a large California microchip supplier. The computer company refuses to pay for a shipment, alleging that a large percentage of the chips are defective. The supplier files suit in California to recover $2,000, the balance due on the contract. The computer company chooses not to defend the action because the liability isn’t large enough to justify the cost of litigation, and a default judgment is entered against it. Subsequently, the computer company is sued for $1,000,000 by a customer whose computer exploded due to a defective chip. The computer company impleads the supplier, seeking indemnification. But the supplier argues that the judgment in the California suit determined that it had delivered chips produced to specifications. Should the default judgment be given preclusive effect in these circumstances? Is the supplier seeking claim or issue preclusion? Should the absence of incentive to litigate be treated differently when issue preclusion, rather than claim preclusion, is sought?

1318

2. How should the dismissal of a prior action on the ground that it was barred by a statute of limitations be treated in a subsequent suit on the same matter? Suppose a discharged employee brings a sex discrimination suit against her employer, but the case is dismissed because it was filed after the limitations period had expired. The employee then files a second suit based on breach of contract, a cause of action that would not be barred by the statute of limitations. Is the second action precluded?

3. How should a prior criminal proceeding affect subsequent civil litigation? Suppose that upon trial in federal court a criminal defendant, who asserted the defense of entrapment, was acquitted of charges of knowingly engaging in the business of dealing in firearms without a license, and that the government then instituted an in rem action for forfeiture of the firearms involved, pursuant to a federal statute that authorizes forfeiture of firearms used or intended to be used in violation of federal law. Can defendant argue that the in rem proceeding is precluded by the prior acquittal? Is it significant that an acquittal may have reflected only the existence of a reasonable doubt about defendant’s guilt as the jury did not find that it was more probable than not that defendant did not have possession of the firearms with an intent to violate federal law? See United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354, 104 S.Ct. 1099, 79 L.Ed.2d 361 (1984); see also Allred v. Chynoweth, 990 F.2d 527 (10th Cir. 1993).

2.JUDGMENTS OF NONJUDICIAL TRIBUNALS

HOLMBERG V. STATE, DIVISION OF RISK MANAGEMENT
Supreme Court of Alaska, 1990.
796 P.2d 823.

MOORE, JUSTICE.

Karen Holmberg asks us to reverse the Alaska Workers’ Compensation Board (“AWCB”) decision denying her permanent total disability benefits on the ground that a later decision of the Public Employees Retirement Board (“PERB”) conclusively determined that she was not physically able to perform her duties as an employee of the State of Alaska. * * *

I.

Karen Holmberg began working for the State of Alaska, Division of Risk Management (“Risk Management”) in 1979. She has a history of back injuries dating to the early 1960s. * * *

* * * On February 18, 1988, AWCB awarded Holmberg temporary total disability benefits, but denied her claim for permanent total disability benefits. Holmberg appealed AWCB’s denial of permanent total disability benefits to the superior court in March 1988.

1319

Holmberg also sought disability benefits from [the Public Employees Retirement System (“PERS”)]. The Division of Retirement and Benefits (“Retirement and Benefits”), which administers PERS, awarded her non-occupational disability benefits. However, the Disability Review Board denied her claim for occupational disability benefits. Holmberg appealed this initial decision to PERB. On April 20, 1988, after AWCB had denied her claim for permanent total disability benefits, PERB found that Holmberg was permanently and totally disabled as a result of accidents at work, and accordingly, awarded her occupational disability benefits.

Holmberg supplemented the record in her appeal from the prior AWCB decision with the new PERB decision. In the proceedings before the superior court, Holmberg argued that the AWCB decision should be reversed because of the preclusive effect of the later PERB decision. The superior court affirmed the AWCB decision and Holmberg appealed.

II.

Holmberg’s primary contention is that PERB’s factual determination that she was physically unable to perform her duties at Risk Management should be given binding effect in this appeal of the AWCB decision against her.² * * *

Although res judicata principles were developed in judicial settings, they “may be applied to adjudicative determinations made by administrative agencies.” Jeffries v. Glacier State Tel. Co., 604 P.2d 4, 8 (Alaska 1979) * * *. Of course, “[a]n administrative decision commands preclusive effects only if it resulted from a procedure that seems an adequate substitute for judicial procedure.” * * * [18 Wright, Miller and Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure: Jurisdiction and Related Matters § 4475 (2d ed.)].

Recently, we held that AWCB decisions may have preclusive effect. * * * We see no reason why PERB decisions should not also be given preclusive effect. First, like AWCB proceedings, PERB hearings include many of the procedural safeguards of a judicial hearing including the right to introduce evidence, call witnesses, and cross-examine opposing witnesses. * * * Second there is no indication in the PERS enabling statute * * * that a PERB determination should not preclude an independent judicial determination.

1320

The state does not contend that PERB decisions should not be given preclusive effect. Rather, the state argues that preclusive effect should not be given to PERB determinations in AWCB proceedings. We have not addressed the question how res judicata principles apply between different agencies. The Supreme Court has held that litigation conducted before one agency or official is generally binding on another agency or official of the same government because officers of the same government are in privity with each other. Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U.S. 381, 402–03, 60 S.Ct. 907, 916–17, 84 L.Ed. 1263 (1940). The Court stated that “[t]he crucial point is whether or not in the earlier litigation the representative of the United States had authority to represent its interests in a final adjudication of the issue in controversy.” 310 U.S. at 403, 60 S.Ct. at 917. * * *

The United States Court of Appeals has applied this authority principle in appropriate cases. In Safir v. Gibson, 432 F.2d 137 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 850, 91 S.Ct. 57, 27 L.Ed.2d 88 (1970), the court relied on the authority principle in holding that the Federal Maritime Commission’s determination that the rates of a conference of common carriers were unfair and unjustly discriminatory precluded the independent Maritime Administration from relitigating the issue. * * * In Porter & Dietsch, Inc. v. FTC, 605 F.2d 294 (7th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 950, 100 S.Ct. 1597, 63 L.Ed.2d 784 (1980), the court refused to give preclusive effect to a Postal Service factual determination concerning the safety of a diet pill in a Federal Trade Commission proceeding. The court found that there was “a clear and convincing need for a new determination of the issue . . . because of the potential impact of the determination on the public interest or the interests of persons not themselves parties to the initial action.” 605 F.2d at 300.

The court’s holding in Porter & Dietsch illustrates the principle that preclusion may be defeated by finding such an important difference in the functions of different agencies that one does not have authority to represent the interests of the other. * * *

In this case, it does not appear that PERB has any more expertise than AWCB in making factual determinations of a person’s physical ability to work at a particular job. Therefore, there is no affirmative reason why the PERB decision should be given preclusive effect as * * * [the agency’s] decision was in Safir. The state makes several arguments why granting PERB determinations preclusive effect in AWCB proceedings would be inconsistent with the Alaska Workers Compensation Act * * * [but this argument] stems from the false premise that Holmberg seeks to preclude AWCB’s ultimate disability determination instead of its factual determination that Holmberg was physically able to perform her job duties.³

1321

The state argues that the different functions of the workers compensation system and PERS prevent the application of collateral estoppel. * * * [The court noted that the disability standards for PERB and AWCB decisions differ, but went on to state that these differences] * * * provide no substantial reason why AWCB should be allowed to relitigate the narrow factual question whether Holmberg is physically able to continue performing her job with Risk Management. Although the value of collateral estoppel may be low in light of the [different] * * * disability inquiry under AWCA, that is not a substantial reason to allow relitigation.* * *

III.

[The court then determined whether the two agencies are in privity with each other as to allow issue preclusion against a nonparty to a judgment.]

* * *

A.

* * * Privity exists between different agencies of the same government unless “there are important differences in the authority of the respective agencies.” Briggs v. State, 732 P.2d 1078, 1082 (Alaska 1987). This is the same test that determines whether the decision of one agency binds another agency. In the privity context, however, the question is not whether the forum agencies are in privity, but whether the agencies appearing before them are. * * *

* * * Holmberg * * * argues that Retirement and Benefits is in privity with Risk Management because “the interests of the two agencies are virtually identical for purposes of [her] claims, and Retirement and Benefits had every incentive to vigorously defend the PERS claim.”

Holmberg’s error is in identifying Retirement and Benefits as the party against which PERB entered judgment. Retirement and Benefits is charged with administrative responsibility for PERS. The significance of this is that when Retirement and Benefits appears before PERB, it represents the interests of PERS, not the interests of the state. Thus, while Retirement and Benefits contested Holmberg’s claim before PERB, the state is correct in saying that the party against which PERB entered judgment is the system itself.

1322

* * *

* * * PERS is not a state agency but an independent retirement plan in which public employees are members and in which their employers participate. * * * While a state agency administers PERS and represents it during appeals, the state as employer is just one participant. The state treasury is affected by a benefit determination only insofar as the state is an employer participant. * * *

* * * The question is not whether PERS is bound by an AWCB decision against one of its members, but whether one of its members is bound by a decision against PERS. The questions are not symmetrical. The PERS constituency is not represented at all in a workers’ compensation proceeding. The employer-participant, however, is at least nominally represented in the PERS proceeding to the extent that it has an interest in the PERS fund. At the same time, this nominal representation is not sufficient to assure that the participant has had adequate notice and opportunity to be heard and that its rights and interests have been protected. We therefore hold that the state as a participant in PERS is not in privity with PERS.

B.

Our holding that the state is not in privity with PERS is sufficient to deny affording any preclusive effect to the PERB decision as against the state. However, even if the state and PERS were in privity, the PERB decision would not preclude any issues raised in the earlier AWCB proceeding because the PERB decision was not the first final judgment addressing those issues. Holmberg observes that “[t]his case presents the collateral estoppel issue in a somewhat unusual procedural context.” AWCB reached its decision first. While that decision was on appeal, PERB entered a contrary decision which was not appealed. Holmberg argues that the PERB decision was the first final judgment for the res judicata purposes and therefore precludes AWCB’s contrary decision because the AWCB decision was appealed.

We disagree. A final judgment retains all of its res judicata effects pending resolution of an appeal of the judgment. * * * This rule respects the principle of repose inherent in the doctrine of res judicata. If a judgment was denied its res judicata effects merely because an appeal was pending, a litigant could refile an identical case in another trial court creating duplicative litigation. This case well illustrates the point. Having lost on the issue whether she was physically able to perform her job duties in the AWCB proceeding, Holmberg appealed the decision and then successfully relitigated the issue before PERB. Retirement and Benefits did not argue that PERB was precluded from relitigating the issue that AWCB already had decided. Now Holmberg asks us to reverse the earlier AWCB determination simply because of the later PERB determination. * * * To reward relitigation of an issue by reversing the original determination is completely at odds with the purpose of collateral estoppel to prevent relitigation of issues that already have been decided.

1323

* * *

In this case, the AWCB decision was the first final judgment even though it was appealed. The later PERB determination that Holmberg was not physically able to perform her duties at Risk Management cannot preclude AWCB’s earlier contrary determination. Indeed, if the other requirements of collateral estoppel were satisfied, Retirement and Benefits could have precluded Holmberg from relitigating the issue already decided by AWCB.

* * *

The decision of the superior court is AFFIRMED.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The Supreme Court opened the door of the federal courts to administrative preclusion in UNITED STATES v. UTAH CONSTRUCTION & MINING CO., 384 U.S. 394, 86 S.Ct. 1545, 16 L.Ed.2d 642 (1966): “When an administrative agency is acting in a judicial capacity and resolves disputed issues of fact properly before it which the parties have had an adequate opportunity to litigate, the courts have not hesitated to apply res judicata * * *.” Id. at 422, 86 S.Ct. at 1560, 16 L.Ed.2d at 661. Holmberg likewise examined whether the adjudication was sufficiently judicial to warrant issue preclusion. What factors might be appropriate to make that determination? Restatement (Second), Judgments § 83(2) (1982) suggests the following:

- (2)An adjudicative determination by an administrative tribunal is conclusive under the rules of res judicata only insofar as the proceeding resulting in the determination entailed the essential elements of adjudication, including:
- (a)Adequate notice to persons who are to be bound by the adjudication * * *;
 - (b)The right on behalf of a party to present evidence and legal argument in support of the party’s contentions and fair opportunity to rebut evidence and argument by opposing parties;
 - (c)A formulation of issues of law and fact in terms of the application of rules with respect to specified parties concerning a specific transaction, situation, or status, or a specific series thereof;
 - (d)A rule of finality, specifying a point in the proceeding when presentations are terminated and a final decision is rendered; and

1324

- (e)Such other procedural elements as may be necessary to constitute the proceeding a sufficient means of conclusively determining the matter in question, having regard for the magnitude and complexity of the matter in question, the urgency with which the matter must be resolved, and the opportunity of the parties to obtain evidence and formulate legal contentions * * *.
- 2.In PORTER & DIETSCH, INC. v. FTC, 605 F.2d 294 (7th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 950, 100 S.Ct. 1597, 63 L.Ed.2d 84 (1980), relied upon in Holmberg, the court refused to grant preclusive effect (in a Federal Trade Commission proceeding concerning the safety of a diet pill) to a factual determination made by the Postal Service in prior administrative proceedings. The court explained:

[T]he Commission was not required to give the Postal Service decisions preclusive effect. Relitigation of an issue is not precluded even between the original parties when “(t)here is a clear and convincing need for a new determination of the issue . . . because of the potential impact of the determination on the public interest or the interests of persons not themselves parties to the initial action.” Restatement (Second) of Judgments s 68.1(e) (i) (Tent. Draft No. 4, 1977). Comment H to this section of the Restatement gives as an example of the s 68.1(e)(i) exception an action by “an agency of government . . . for the protection . . . Of a broad segment of the public.” This is such a case. This is not only a proceeding by an agency of government to protect the public from both health risks and false advertising; it deals with a body of knowledge in the fields of medical and pharmacological science that is constantly increasing. The government is not precluded from subsequently relitigating against a new respondent under these circumstances. * * *

Id. at 300.

3. Ratemaking proceedings are conducted by administrative agencies with special expertise to assess economic and other conditions. The proceedings often involve the calling of witnesses, the availability of cross-examination, and other adjudicative protections. Should issue preclusion attach to ratemaking determinations, or are they really legislative decisions? See Allied Chem., An Operating Unit of Allied Corp. v. Niagara Mohawk

Power Corp., 72 N.Y.2d 271, 278, 528 N.E.2d 153, 156, 532 N.Y.S.2d 230, 233 (1988), in which the New York Court of Appeals explained that “[b]ecause a ratemaking agency must be free to reassess the reasonableness of rates, it would be illogical, and inconsistent with the agency’s function, to give preclusive effect to a prior ratemaking determination * * *.” However, the court made clear that context matters, explaining that:

1325

[t]he court must look at the over-all context of the agency’s decision to assess whether according a preclusive effect to a particular agency determination is consistent with the agency’s scheme of administration; for example, the agency’s need for flexibility, and its need to modify prior determinations in order to adapt its policy to changing conditions, may counsel against applying issue preclusion to a particular administrative decision.

Id. at 277, 528 N.E.2d at 155, 532 N.Y.S.2d at 232.

4.What role did privity play in the court’s decision in Holmberg? Privity recognizes that certain substantive relationships justify extending the preclusive effect of a judgment to a nonparty. These relationships include a partnership and its members, successors in interest to property, and a corporation and its officers. Restatement (Second) of Judgments §§ 41, 54, 59–60 (1982). Privity has been criticized as an “elusive” concept that is more conclusory than explanatory:

* * * [T]he term privity in itself does not state a reason for either including or excluding a person from the binding effect of a prior judgment, but rather it represents a legal conclusion that the relationship between the one who is a party on the record and the non-party is sufficiently close to afford application of the principle of preclusion.

Southwest Airlines Co. v. Texas Int’l Airlines, 546 F.2d 84, 95 (5th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 832, 98 S.Ct. 117, 54 L.Ed.2d 93 (1977) (citation omitted). See also 18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4449 (3d ed.). What factors did the court in Holmberg consider in deciding whether the two government agencies were in privity? Should these same factors apply when the question is whether natural persons are in privity?

E. PERSONS BENEFITED AND PERSONS BOUND BY PRECLUSION

1.THE TRADITIONAL MODEL

The traditional rule of issue preclusion was that persons benefitted from a prior judgment only if they also were bound by it. “This rule, known as the rule of mutuality, established a pleasing symmetry—a judgment was binding only on parties and persons in privity with them, and a judgment could be invoked only by parties and their privies.” 18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4463 (3d ed.). The modern trend has been an erosion in the requirement of mutuality—“followed more recently by second thoughts about whether the erosion is sufficiently justified.” Shapiro, Civil Procedure: Preclusion in Civil Actions 102–03 (2001).

1326

Indemnification relations provided the earliest basis for an exception from the rule of mutuality. See First Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 182 Mass. 130, 65 N.E. 24 (1902). The policy rationale was rooted in the substantive obligation created by the relation:

* * * [D]enial of preclusion would force an impossible choice between unacceptable alternatives. If a second action can be maintained against the indemnitee, either the indemnitee must be allowed to assert his right of indemnification or the right must be defeated by the judgment in favor of the indemnitor. To allow the right of indemnification would be to destroy the victory won by the indemnitor in the first action. To deny the right of indemnification would be to destroy the indemnitee’s right by the result of an action in which he took no part.

18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4463 (3d ed.).

NOTE AND QUESTIONS

How would the rule of mutuality affect the analysis in the following situations?

(a)A works for B. A, while acting within the scope of employment and driving B’s car, collides with a car driven by C. C sues A, and judgment is for A. Subsequently B sues C for damages to the car. What effect should the earlier judgment for A have in B’s suit against C?

(b) Suppose on the facts of (a) that C first sued B, and judgment had been for B, and C had then sued A. What effect should the earlier judgment for B have in C’s suit against A? Would your answer be different if the second suit had been by A against C?

(c)Suppose that A, a real-estate broker, sues B, the seller of property, to recover a commission. The trial court dismisses A’s action after trial on the ground that A had not produced C, the person who purchased the property from B and so had not established that A was entitled to the commission. In a second action A sues C for inducing B to breach the brokerage contract causing a loss of the commission. Can C successfully rely on the decision against A in the first action as a bar to A’s action?

(d)Suppose a mother and child are in a car accident. The mother is injured and the child dies. A, the personal representative of the estate, brings a wrongful death action and judgment is entered for defendant. Is the mother estopped by that judgment if she later sues to recover damages for her own injuries? Keep in mind that had the first action been successful, the mother would have been a beneficiary of the damages award.

2.THE DECLINE OF THE MUTUALITY DOCTRINE

BERNHARD V. BANK OF AMERICA NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS ASS’N

Supreme Court of California, 1942.
19 Cal.2d 807, 122 P.2d 892.

TRAYNOR, JUSTICE.

In June, 1933, Mrs. Clara Sather, an elderly woman, made her home with Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Cook in San Dimas, California. Because of her failing health, she authorized Mr. Cook and Dr. Joseph Zeiler to make drafts jointly against her commercial account in the Security First National Bank of Los Angeles. On August 24, 1933, Mr. Cook opened a commercial account at the First National Bank of San Dimas in the name of “Clara Sather by Charles O. Cook.” * * * Thereafter, a number of checks drawn by Cook and Zeiler on Mrs. Sather’s commercial account in Los Angeles were deposited in the San Dimas account * * *.

On October 26, 1933, a teller from the Los Angeles Bank called on Mrs. Sather at her request to assist in transferring her money from the Los Angeles Bank to the San Dimas Bank. In the presence of this teller, the cashier of the San Dimas Bank, Mr. Cook, and her physician, Mrs. Sather signed by mark an authorization directing the Security First National Bank of Los Angeles to transfer the balance of her savings account in the amount of $4,155.68 to the First National Bank of San Dimas * * * “for credit to the account of Mrs. Clara Sather.” The order was credited by the San Dimas Bank to the account of “Clara Sather by Charles O. Cook.” Cook withdrew the entire balance from that account and opened a new account in the same bank in the name of himself and his wife. * * *

Mrs. Sather died in November, 1933. Cook qualified as executor of the estate and proceeded with its administration. After a lapse of several years he filed an account at the instance of the probate court accompanied by his resignation. The account made no mention of the money transferred by Mrs. Sather to the San Dimas Bank; and Helen Bernhard * * * [and other] beneficiaries under Mrs. Sather’s will, filed objections to the account for this reason. After a hearing on the objections the court settled the account, and as part of its order declared that the decedent during her lifetime had made a gift to Charles O. Cook of the amount of the deposit in question.

After Cook’s discharge, Helen Bernhard was appointed administratrix with the will annexed. She instituted this action against defendant, the Bank of America, successor to the San Dimas Bank, seeking to recover the deposit on the ground that the bank was indebted to the estate for this amount because Mrs. Sather never authorized its withdrawal. In addition to a general denial, defendant pleaded two affirmative defenses: (1) That the money on deposit was paid out to Charles O. Cook with the consent of Mrs. Sather and (2) that this fact is res judicata by virtue of the finding of the probate court * * *. The trial court * * * gave judgment for defendant on the ground that Cook’s ownership of the money was conclusively established by the finding of the probate court. * * *

Plaintiff contends that the doctrine of res judicata does not apply because the defendant who is asserting the plea was not a party to the previous action nor in privity with a party to that action and because there is no mutuality of estoppel.

* * *

Many courts have stated the facile formula that the plea of res judicata is available only when there is privity and mutuality of estoppel. * * * Under the requirement of privity, only parties to the former judgment or their privies may take advantage of or be bound by it. * * * A party in this connection is one who is “directly interested in the subject matter, and had a right to make defense, or to control the proceeding, and to appeal from the judgment.” * * * A privity is one who, after rendition of the judgment, has acquired an interest in the subject matter affected by the judgment through or under one of the parties, as by inheritance, succession, or purchase. * * * The estoppel is mutual if the one taking advantage of the earlier adjudication would have been bound by it, had it gone against him. * * *

The criteria for determining who may assert a plea of res judicata differ fundamentally from the criteria for determining against whom a plea of res judicata may be asserted. The requirements of due process of law forbid the assertion of a plea of res judicata against a party unless he was bound by the earlier litigation in which the matter was decided. * * * He is bound by that litigation only if he has been a party thereto or in privity with a party thereto. * * * There is no compelling reason, however, for requiring that the party asserting the plea of res judicata must have been a party, or in privity with a party, to the earlier litigation.

No satisfactory rationalization has been advanced for the requirement of mutuality. Just why a party who was not bound by a previous action should be precluded from asserting it as res judicata against a party who was bound by it is difficult to comprehend. * * * Many courts have abandoned the requirement of mutuality and confined the requirement of privity to the party against whom the plea of res judicata is asserted. * * * The commentators are almost unanimously in accord. * * * The courts of most jurisdictions have in effect accomplished the same result by recognizing a broad exception to the requirements of mutuality and privity, namely, that they are not necessary where the liability of the defendant asserting the plea of res judicata is dependent upon or derived from the liability of one who was exonerated in an earlier suit brought by the same plaintiff upon the same facts. * * * Typical examples of such derivative liability are master and servant, principal and agent, and indemnitor and indemnitee. Thus, if a plaintiff sues a servant for injuries caused by the servant’s alleged negligence within the scope of his employment, a judgment against the plaintiff * * * [on] the grounds that the servant was not negligent can be pleaded by the master as res judicata if he is subsequently sued by the same plaintiff for the same injuries. Conversely, if the plaintiff first sues the master, a judgment against the plaintiff on the grounds that the servant was not negligent can be pleaded by the servant as res judicata if he is subsequently sued by the plaintiff. In each of these situations the party asserting the plea of res judicata was not a party to the previous action nor in privity with such a party * * *. Likewise, the estoppel is not mutual since the party asserting the plea, not having been a party or in privity with a party to the former action, would not have been bound by it had it been decided the other way. The cases justify this exception on the ground that it would be unjust to permit one who has had his day in court to reopen identical issues by merely switching adversaries.

In determining the validity of a plea of res judicata three questions are pertinent: Was the issue decided in the prior adjudication identical with the one presented in the action in question? Was there a final judgment on the merits? Was the party against whom the plea is asserted a party or in privity with a party to the prior adjudication?

* * * Since the issue as to the ownership of the money is identical with the issue raised in the probate proceeding, and since the order of the probate court settling the executor’s account was a final adjudication of this issue on the merits * * *, it remains only to determine whether the plaintiff in the present action was a party or in privity with a party to the earlier proceeding. The plaintiff has brought the present action in the capacity of administratrix of the estate. In this capacity she represents the very same persons and interests that were represented in the earlier hearing on the executor’s account. In that proceeding plaintiff and the other legatees who objected to the executor’s account represented the estate of the decedent. They were seeking not a personal recovery but, like the plaintiff in the present action, as administratrix, a recovery for the benefit of the legatees and creditors of the estate, all of whom were bound by the order settling the account. * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. In which of the following situations would preclusion be available under Bernhard?
- (a)Three cars, driven by A, B, and C, respectively, collide at an intersection in a jurisdiction without a compulsory joinder statute. Driver A, believing that C does not have enough money to satisfy the judgment, institutes a negligence action against B. At trial B is exonerated, the court holding that A’s injuries were solely the result of A’s own negligence. A then discovers that C actually does have enough money to make it worthwhile to sue, and promptly files suit against C. Can C invoke the judgment in A’s prior action against B to preclude recovery by A in the second suit?

1330

(b)Assume the same fact pattern as above. Could C assert the judgment in the prior suit as the basis to recover on a counterclaim against A?

(c)A bus owned and driven by D is in an accident. Passenger P1 sues D, alleging that the accident was caused by D’s negligent driving. The trial court finds for P1. Passenger P2 then files a lawsuit against D, also alleging damages as a result of D’s negligence. Is preclusion available to P2? Can you articulate how this fact pattern differs from that of (b)?

(d)What if, on the facts of (c), the bus driver/owner had prevailed in the first suit? When P2 brought the second litigation, could D then use the first suit’s judgment as a defense to the second action?

2.In Bernhard, a new defendant sought to bar a plaintiff who lost on an issue decided in defendant’s favor from relitigating the issue in a second lawsuit—a rule of preclusion now called “nonmutual defensive collateral estoppel.” For a classic discussion, see Currie, Civil Procedure: The Tempest Brews, 53 Calif.L.Rev. 25, 38–46 (1965); and, Currie, Mutuality of Collateral Estoppel—Limits of the Bernhard Doctrine, 9 Stan.L.Rev. 281 (1957).

In BLONDER-TONGUE LABORATORIES, INC. v. UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS FOUNDATION, 402 U.S. 313, 91 S.Ct. 1434, 28 L.Ed.2d 788 (1971), a patent infringement action, the Supreme Court began to abrogate the mutuality requirement in the federal system. The Court expressed the following views on the propriety of nonmutual preclusion:

The cases and authorities discussed * * * connect erosion of the mutuality requirement to the goal of limiting relitigation of issues where that can be achieved without compromising fairness in particular cases. The courts have often discarded the rule while commenting on crowded dockets and long delays preceding trial. Authorities differ on whether the public interest in efficient judicial administration is a sufficient ground in and of itself for abandoning mutuality, but it is clear that more than crowded dockets is involved. The broader question is whether it is any longer tenable to afford a litigant more than one full and fair opportunity for judicial resolution of the same issue. The question in these terms includes as part of the calculus the effect on judicial administration, but it also encompasses the concern exemplified by Bentham's reference to the gaming table in his attack on the principle of mutuality of estoppel. In any lawsuit where a defendant, because of the mutuality principle, is forced to present a complete defense on the merits to a claim which the plaintiff has fully litigated and lost in a prior action, there is an arguable misallocation of resources. To the extent the defendant in the second suit may not win by asserting, without contradiction, that the plaintiff had fully and fairly, but unsuccessfully, litigated the same claim in the prior suit, the defendant's time and money are diverted from alternative uses—productive or otherwise—to relitigation of a decided issue. And, still assuming that the issue was resolved correctly in the first suit, there is reason to be concerned about the plaintiff's allocation of resources. Permitting repeated litigation of the same issue as long as the supply of unrelated defendants holds out reflects either the aura of the gaming table or "a lack of discipline and of disinterestedness on the part of the lower courts, hardly a worthy or wise basis for fashioning rules of procedure." Kerotest Mfg. Co. v. C-O-Two Co., 342 U.S. 180, 185[, 72 S.Ct. 219, 222, 96 L.Ed. 200] (1952). Although neither judges, the parties, nor the adversary system performs perfectly in all cases, the requirement of determining whether the party against whom an estoppel is asserted had a full and fair opportunity to litigate is a most significant safeguard.

Some litigants—those who never appeared in a prior action—may not be collaterally estopped without litigating the issue. They have never had a chance to present their evidence and arguments on the claim. Due process prohibits estopping them despite one or more existing adjudications of the identical issue which stand squarely against their position. * * * Also, the authorities have been more willing to permit a defendant in a second suit to invoke an estoppel against a plaintiff who lost on the same claim in an earlier suit than they have been to allow a plaintiff in the second suit to use offensively a judgment obtained by a different plaintiff in a prior suit against the same defendant. But the case before us involves neither due process nor "offensive use" questions. Rather, it depends on the considerations weighing for and against permitting a patent holder to sue on his patent after it has once been held invalid following opportunity for full and fair trial.

Id. at 328–33, 91 S.Ct. at 1442–43, 28 L.Ed.2d at 799–800.

The Court emphasized that the district court retained discretion to accept or reject a plea of collateral estoppel:

1332

* * * [W]e do not suggest, without legislative guidance, that a plea of estoppel by an infringement or royalty suit defendant must automatically be accepted once the defendant in support of his plea identifies the issue in suit as the identical question finally decided against the patentee or one of his privies in previous litigation. * * * Rather, the patentee-plaintiff must be permitted to demonstrate, if he can, that he did not have "a fair opportunity procedurally, substantively and evidentially to pursue his claim the first time." * * * This element in the estoppel decision will comprehend, we believe, the important concerns about the complexity of patent litigation and the posited hazard that the prior proceedings were seriously defective.

Determining whether a patentee has had a full and fair chance to litigate the validity of his patent in an earlier case is of necessity not a simple matter. In addition to * * * considerations of choice of forum and incentive to litigate * * *, certain other factors immediately emerge. For example, if the issue is nonobviousness, appropriate inquiries would be whether the first validity determination purported to employ the [appropriate legal] standards * * *; whether the opinions filed by the District Court and the reviewing court, if any, indicate that the prior case was one of those relatively rare instances where the courts wholly failed to grasp the technical subject matter and issues in suit; and whether without fault of his own the patentee was deprived of crucial evidence or witnesses in the first litigation. But as so often is the case, no one set of facts, no one collection of words or phrases will provide an automatic formula for proper rulings on estoppel pleas. In the end, decision will necessarily rest on the trial courts' sense of justice and equity.

Id. at 332–34, 91 S.Ct. at 1445, 28 L.Ed.2d at 802.

The Court underscored that relaxing the mutuality requirement in patent cases would produce cost savings for the federal courts:

* * * [A]lthough patent trials are only a small portion of the total amount of litigation in the federal courts, they tend to be of disproportionate length. * * *

* * * [I]t is clear that abrogation of [the mutuality rule in patent cases] * * * will save some judicial time if even a few relatively lengthy patent suits may be fairly disposed of on pleas of estoppel. More fundamentally, while the cases do discuss reduction in dockets as an effect of elimination of the mutuality requirement, they do not purport to hold that predictions about the actual amount of judicial time that will be saved under such a holding control decision of that question.

1333

Id. at 348–49, 91 S.Ct. at 1452–53, 28 L.Ed.2d at 810–11.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Do you find the justification for relaxing the mutuality requirement in patent cases persuasive? Does the Blonder-Tongue rule "merely shift the focus of litigation from the merits of the dispute to the question whether the party to be estopped had a full and fair opportunity to litigate his claim in the first action"? Blonder-Tongue, 402 U.S. at 347, 91 S.Ct. at 1452, 28 L.Ed.2d at 810. Does this inquiry really save time and resources?

2. Although Blonder-Tongue could be read as limited to patent actions, lower courts have cited to it as authority for nonmutual preclusion in suits involving different types of substantive claims. Is it clear that relaxing the mutuality requirement in these other contexts will produce cost savings?
3. Is it feasible or fair to require extensive party joinder in a single lawsuit? Is it possible that the presence of too many defendants in an action will undermine the quality of decision-making in the first action? See 18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4464 (3d ed.).
4. Does the Bernhard test for nonmutual collateral estoppel differ from that of the Supreme Court in Blonder-Tongue? In what ways? Which test is preferable?
5. In both Bernhard and Blonder-Tongue the party against whom the preclusion defense was asserted had instituted the first action. Should this be an important factor in determining whether nonmutual preclusion is appropriate? Or should the only relevant consideration be whether the party against whom preclusion is asserted have had a full and fair opportunity to litigate? See Zdanok v. Glidden Co., 327 F.2d 944, 956 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 934, 84 S.Ct. 1338, 12 L.Ed.2d 298 (1964). For a criticism of nonmutual issue preclusion, see Waggoner, Fifty Years of Bernhard v. Bank of America Is Enough: Collateral Estoppel Should Require Mutuality But Res Judicata Should Not, 12 Rev. Litig. 391 (1993), arguing:

That nonmutual collateral estoppel is unfair emerges from the fact that litigation involves a substantial element of chance * * *.

The risk in litigation is much like the risk in a coin flip, even though the court system by a variety of mechanisms tries to resolve disputes accurately, and even though each side tries by retention of skilled counsel and by diligent preparation to make the odds as much as possible favor it. In such a coin flip you put up your money and you abide by the result, win or lose. That seems fair. Now suppose a bystander who has watched the coin flip but who has not risked his cash were to approach the loser and say, “Pay me, too.” Such a demand would be laughed away, it is so obviously unfair. Yet such demands are now commonly enforced under the doctrine of nonmutual collateral estoppel.

1334

Id. at 416.

PARKLANE HOSIERY CO. v. SHORE

Supreme Court of the United States, 1979.
439 U.S. 322, 99 S.Ct. 645, 58 L.Ed.2d 552.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

JUSTICE STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * *

The respondent brought this stockholder’s class action against the petitioners in a federal district court. The complaint alleged that the petitioners * * * had issued a materially false and misleading proxy statement in connection with a merger. * * * The complaint sought damages, rescission of the merger, and recovery of costs.

Before this action came to trial, the SEC filed suit against the same defendants in a federal district court, alleging that the proxy statement that had been issued by Parklane was materially false and misleading in essentially the same respects as those that had been alleged in the respondent’s complaint. Injunctive relief was requested. After a four-day trial, the District Court found that the proxy statement was materially false and misleading in the respects alleged, and entered a declaratory judgment to that effect. * * * The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed * * *.

The respondent in the present case then moved for partial summary judgment against the petitioners, asserting that the petitioners were collaterally estopped from relitigating the issues that had been resolved against them in the action brought by the SEC. The District Court denied the motion on the ground that such an application of collateral estoppel would deny the petitioners their Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed * * *. Because of an intercircuit conflict,³ we granted certiorari.

I

The threshold question to be considered is whether, quite apart from the right to a jury trial under the Seventh Amendment, the petitioners can be precluded from relitigating facts resolved adversely to them in a prior equitable proceeding with another party under the general law of collateral estoppel. Specifically, we must determine whether a litigant who was not a party to a prior judgment may nevertheless use that judgment

1335

“offensively” to prevent a defendant from relitigating issues resolved in the earlier proceeding.⁴

* * *

B

The Blonder-Tongue case involved defensive use of collateral estoppel * * *. The present case, by contrast, involves offensive use of collateral estoppel—a plaintiff is seeking to estop a defendant from relitigating the issues which the defendant previously litigated and lost against another plaintiff. In both the offensive and defensive use situations, the party against whom estoppel is asserted has litigated and lost in an earlier action. Nevertheless, several reasons have been advanced why the two situations should be treated differently.

First, offensive use of collateral estoppel does not promote judicial economy in the same manner as defensive use does. Defensive use of collateral estoppel precludes a plaintiff from relitigating identical issues by merely “switching adversaries.” * * * Thus defensive collateral estoppel gives a plaintiff a strong incentive to join all potential defendants in the first action if possible. Offensive use of collateral estoppel, on the other hand, creates precisely the opposite incentive. Since a plaintiff will be able to rely on a previous judgment against a defendant but will not be bound by that judgment if the defendant wins, the plaintiff has every incentive to adopt a “wait and see” attitude, in the hope that the first action by another plaintiff will result in a favorable judgment. * * * Thus offensive use of collateral estoppel will likely increase rather than decrease the total amount of litigation, since potential plaintiffs will have everything to gain and nothing to lose by not intervening in the first action.¹³

A second argument against offensive use of collateral estoppel is that it may be unfair to a defendant. If a defendant in the first action is sued for small or nominal damages, he may have little incentive to defend vigorously, particularly if future suits are not foreseeable. * * * Allowing offensive collateral estoppel may also be unfair to a defendant if the judgment relied upon as a basis for the estoppel is itself inconsistent with one or more previous judgments in favor of the defendant. Still another situation where it might be unfair to apply offensive estoppel is where the second action affords the defendant procedural opportunities unavailable in the first action that could readily cause a different result.¹⁵

1336

C

We have concluded that the preferable approach for dealing with these problems in the federal courts is not to preclude the use of offensive collateral estoppel, but to grant trial courts broad discretion to determine when it should be applied. The general rule should be that in cases where a plaintiff could easily have joined in the earlier action or where, either for the reasons discussed above or for other reasons, the application of offensive estoppel would be unfair to a defendant, a trial judge should not allow the use of offensive collateral estoppel.

In the present case, however, none of the circumstances that might justify reluctance to allow the offensive use of collateral estoppel is present. The application of offensive collateral estoppel will not here reward a private plaintiff who could have joined in the previous action, since the respondent probably could not have joined in the injunctive action brought by the SEC even had he so desired.¹⁷ Similarly, there is no unfairness to the petitioners in applying offensive collateral estoppel in this case. First, in light of the serious allegations made in the SEC’s complaint against the petitioners, as well as the foreseeability of subsequent private suits that typically follow a successful government judgment, the petitioners had every incentive to litigate the SEC lawsuit fully and vigorously. Second, the judgment in the Commission action was not inconsistent with any previous decision. Finally, there will in the respondent’s action be no procedural opportunities available to the petitioner that were unavailable in the first action of a kind that might be likely to cause a different result.¹⁹

We conclude, therefore, that none of the considerations that would justify a refusal to allow the use of offensive collateral estoppel is present in this case. Since the petitioners received a “full and fair” opportunity to litigate their claims in the SEC action, the contemporary law of collateral estoppel leads inescapably to the conclusion that the petitioners are collaterally estopped from relitigating the question of whether the proxy statements were materially false and misleading.

1337

II

The question that remains is whether, notwithstanding the law of collateral estoppel, the use of offensive collateral estoppel in this case would violate the petitioners’ Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial.

A

* * *

Recognition that an equitable determination could have collateral estoppel effect in a subsequent legal action was the major premise of this Court’s decision in Beacon Theatres v. Westover * * * [p. 1054, supra].

It is clear that the Court in the Beacon Theatres case thought that if an issue common to both legal and equitable claims was first determined by a judge, relitigation of the issue before a jury might be foreclosed by res judicata or collateral estoppel. * * *

B

* * * The petitioners contend that since the scope of the Amendment must be determined by reference to the common law as it existed in 1791, and since the common law permitted collateral estoppel only where there was mutuality of parties, collateral estoppel cannot constitutionally be applied when such mutuality is absent.

The petitioners have advanced no persuasive reason, however, why the meaning of the Seventh Amendment should depend on whether or not mutuality of parties is present. A litigant who has lost because of adverse factual findings in an equity action is equally deprived of a jury trial whether he is estopped from relitigating the factual issues against the same party or a new party. In either case, the party against whom estoppel is asserted has litigated questions of fact, and has had the facts determined against him in an earlier proceeding. In either case there is no further factfinding function for the jury to perform, since the common factual issues have been resolved in the previous action. * * *

The Seventh Amendment has never been interpreted in the rigid manner advocated by the petitioners. On the contrary, many procedural devices developed since 1791 that have diminished the civil jury’s historic domain have been found not to be inconsistent with the Seventh Amendment. * * *

The law of collateral estoppel, like the law in other procedural areas defining the scope of the jury’s function, has evolved since 1791. * * * [T]hese developments are not repugnant to the Seventh Amendment simply for the reason that they did not exist in 1791. Thus if, as we have held, the law of collateral estoppel forecloses the petitioners from relitigating the factual issues determined against them in the SEC action, nothing in the Seventh Amendment dictates a different result, even though because of lack of mutuality there would have been no collateral estoppel in 1791.

1338

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is

Affirmed.

JUSTICE REHNQUIST, dissenting.

It is admittedly difficult to be outraged about the treatment accorded by the federal judiciary to petitioners’ demand for a jury trial in this lawsuit. Outrage is an emotion all but impossible to generate with respect to a corporate defendant in a securities fraud action, and this case is no exception. But the nagging sense of unfairness as to the way petitioners have been treated, engendered by the imprimatur placed by the Court of Appeals on respondent’s “heads I win, tails you lose” theory of this litigation, is not dispelled by this Court’s antiseptic analysis of the issues in the case. It may be that if this Nation were to adopt a new Constitution today, the Seventh Amendment guaranteeing the right of jury trial in civil cases in federal courts would not be included among its provisions. But any present sentiment to that effect cannot obscure or dilute our obligation to enforce the Seventh Amendment, which was included in the Bill of Rights in 1791 and which has not since been repealed in the only manner provided by the Constitution for repeal of its provisions.

* * *

The Seventh Amendment requires that the right of trial by jury be “preserved.” Because the Seventh Amendment demands preservation of the jury trial right, our cases have uniformly held that the content of the right must be judged by historical standards. * * * If a jury would have been impaneled in a particular kind of case in 1791, then the Seventh Amendment requires a jury trial today, if either party so desires.

* * *

To say that the Seventh Amendment does not tie federal courts to the exact procedure of the common law in 1791 does not imply, however, that any nominally “procedural” change can be implemented, regardless of its impact on the functions of the jury. * * *

Judged by the foregoing principles, I think it is clear that petitioners were denied their Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial in this case. Neither respondents nor the Court doubt that at common law as it existed in 1791, petitioners would have been entitled in the private action to have a jury determine whether the proxy statement was false and misleading in the respects alleged. The reason is that at common law in 1791, collateral estoppel was permitted only where the parties in the first action were identical to, or in privity with, the parties to the subsequent action. * * * [D]evelopments in the judge-made doctrine of collateral estoppel, however salutary, cannot, consistent with the Seventh Amendment, contract in any material fashion the right to a jury trial that a defendant would have enjoyed in 1791. * * *

1339

* * * [T]he Court seems to suggest that the offensive use of collateral estoppel in this case is permissible under the limited principle set forth above that a mere procedural change that does not invade the province of the jury and a defendant’s right thereto to a greater extent than authorized by the common law is permissible. But the Court’s actions today constitute a far greater infringement of the defendant’s rights than it ever before has sanctioned. * * * The procedural devices of summary judgment and directed verdict are direct descendants of their common-law antecedents. They accomplish nothing more than could have been done at common law, albeit by a more cumbersome procedure. * * *

By contrast, the development of nonmutual estoppel is a substantial departure from the common law and its use in this case completely deprives petitioners of their right to have a jury determine contested issues of fact. * * *

Even accepting, arguendo, the majority’s position that there is no violation of the Seventh Amendment here, I nonetheless would not sanction the use of collateral estoppel in this case. * * * In my view, it is “unfair” to apply offensive collateral estoppel where the party who is sought to be estopped has not had an opportunity to have the facts of his case determined by a jury. Since in this case petitioners were not entitled to a jury trial in the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) lawsuit, I would not estop them from relitigating the issues determined in the SEC suit before a jury in the private action. I believe that several factors militate in favor of this result.

First, the use of offensive collateral estoppel in this case runs counter to the strong federal policy favoring jury trials, even if it does not, as the majority holds, violate the Seventh Amendment. * * *

Second, I believe that the opportunity for a jury trial in the second action could easily lead to a different result from that obtained in the first action before the court and therefore that it is unfair to estop petitioners from relitigating the issues before a jury. * * *

The ultimate irony of today’s decision is that its potential for significantly conserving the resources of either the litigants or the judiciary is doubtful at best. That being the case, I see absolutely no reason to frustrate so cavalierly the important federal policy favoring jury decisions of disputed fact questions. The instant case is an apt example of the minimal savings that will be accomplished by the Court’s decision. As the Court admits, even if petitioners are collaterally estopped from relitigating whether the proxy was materially false and misleading they are still entitled to have a jury determine whether respondents were injured by the alleged misstatements and the amount of damages, if any, sustained by respondents. * * * Thus, a jury must be impaneled in this case in any event. The time saved by not trying the issue of whether the proxy was materially false and misleading before the jury is likely to be insubstantial.²⁴ It is just as probable that today’s decision will have the result of coercing defendants to agree to consent orders, or settlements in agency enforcement action in order to preserve their right to jury trial in the private actions. In that event, the Court, for no compelling reason, will have simply added a powerful club to the administrative agencies’ arsenals that even Congress was unwilling to provide them.

1340

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Offensive nonmutual collateral estoppel is the term used to describe a case in which “a plaintiff seeks to preclude a defendant from relitigating an issue which the defendant previously litigated and lost against a different plaintiff.” 47 Am Jur.2d Judgments § 647 (2d ed.). How does this situation differ from the defensive use of collateral estoppel in Bernhard and Blonder-Tongue?
2. Parklane permits but limits a stranger’s offensive use of nonmutual issue preclusion against a party to a prior judgment. Professor Currie, in an important article, recommended two distinct limits on the nonmutual application of collateral estoppel:

(a) that one not a party to the prior action should not be allowed to assert the prior judgment against one who was a party thereto unless the person against whom the judgment is asserted in fact had a full, fair and effective opportunity to contest the issue; and (b) that the plea should not be allowed where its allowance would result in intolerable anomalies in the administration of justice.

Currie, Mutuality of Collateral Estoppel: The Limits of the Bernhard Doctrine, 9 Stan.L.Rev. 281, 322 (1957). One important exception involves what Professor Currie called the “multiple-claimant anomaly”:

An express train speeds through the night. Suddenly, as it enters a curve, the locomotive leaves the rails, followed by half a dozen tumbling passenger cars. Fifty passengers are injured. Fifty actions for personal injuries are filed against the railroad—some in California courts, some in federal courts in California, some in other state and federal courts. The first of these to be reached for trial is in a California court. A full trial is had on the issue of the railroad’s negligence, and the result is a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. The judgment becomes final. What is the status of the forty-nine remaining actions?

1341

* * *

Suppose, that, in a case like our railroad case, the first injured passenger to sue loses his action against the railroad. The railroad cannot plead that judgment against the next passenger to sue, because the second passenger was not a party to the first action, nor in privity with the first passenger. Nevertheless, let us say that the second passenger also loses, and indeed that twenty-five passengers, in twenty-five separate actions, all fail to establish negligence on the part of the railroad. Then passenger No. 26 wins his action. Are we to understand that the remaining twenty-four passengers can plead the judgment in the case of No. 26 as conclusively establishing that the railroad was guilty of negligence, while the railroad can make no reference to the first twenty-five cases which it won?

There is only one possible answer to this question: no such absurdity would be tolerated for a moment. The indefensibility of such a result seems obvious * * *.

* * *

Our aversion to the twenty-sixth judgment as a conclusive adjudication stems largely from the feeling that such a judgment in such a series must be an aberration, but we have no warrant for assuming that the aberrational judgment will not come as the first in the series.

Id. at 281 & 285–86.

3.What if before a case settles it yields a judicial finding that conflicts with a prior adjudication of the same issue? Such a finding could result, for example, when a motion to dismiss is denied before a settlement is reached. Does that finding create sufficient inconsistency to block offensive issue preclusion? In JACK FAUCETT ASSOCS. v. AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO., 744 F.2d 118 (D.C.Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1196, 105 S.Ct. 980, 83 L.Ed.2d 982 (1985), Judge Mikva wrote for the court: “Parklane Hosiery does not hold that only inconsistent final judgments can preclude offensive estoppel.” Id. at 130. Rather, according to Judge Mikva, the issue was whether “the inconsistency undermines the court’s confidence in the correctness of the prior decision.” Id.

In the Jack Faucett case, the court found another factor weighing against allowing the plea of offensive issue preclusion. The prior decision upon which the party seeking preclusion sought to rely had been affirmed by the Second Circuit. However, the appeals court held that one of the trial judge’s evidentiary rulings was erroneous, although harmless. The District of Columbia Circuit found that the presence of even “harmless” error in the rulings of the trial court constituted a “serious obstacle” to offensive issue preclusion. Id. at 128.

1342

4.In Garcia v. General Motors Corp., 195 Ariz. 510, 990 P.2d 1069 (Ariz.Ct.App.1999), Arizona residents while passengers in a van manufactured by General Motors and rented in Arizona were injured in a rollover accident in Idaho. The passengers were not wearing seatbelts. One of the injured parties immediately sued in federal court in Idaho. Applying Idaho state law, the trial court granted plaintiff’s motion in limine to exclude all evidence that she had failed to wear a seatbelt. She subsequently settled before trial. Meanwhile, the other passengers filed a suit regarding the same accident in an Arizona state court. They sought to use the Idaho ruling to preclude General Motors from using their failure to wear seatbelts as a defense. The court declined to give issue preclusive effect to the Idaho court’s ruling in limine. In the court’s view, the ruling was not sufficiently final nor essential to the prior decision. Moreover, the ruling was not independently appealable and according it preclusive effect could perpetuate error. The court further emphasized that General Motors had not conceded any issues in its settlement agreement and applying collateral estoppel effect to the ruling could discourage future settlements in multi-party actions. The court added:

We note that Plaintiffs are represented by the same Idaho counsel who represented [the plaintiff] in the Idaho case. Although we do not know counsel’s reasons for filing separate lawsuits in different forums on behalf of passengers involved in the same accident, this case highlights a problematic result of applying collateral estoppel: encouraging forum-shopping. One plaintiff in a multi-party case could first bring suit in the forum most likely to give a favorable choice-of-law ruling; then counsel could attempt to use that ruling offensively in a subsequent suit to estop the defendant from raising a defense in another forum. Whether that was intended in this case, we do not decide, but we will not encourage the potential for such conduct. * * *

Id. at 516, 90 Pd. at 1075.

5.What issue preclusive effect should be given to a guilty verdict? Obviously, since plaintiff in a subsequent civil action did not have the opportunity to join in the criminal case, the concern that plaintiff will bring repetitious litigation is not present. On the other hand, are the issues necessary to resolve the civil case the same as those that are central to the criminal case? Are the burdens of persuasion the same? Does the criminal defendant have the same range of discovery as a civil litigant? In deciding whether or not to allow the civil plaintiff to employ offensive collateral estoppel, courts consider the incentives defendant had to litigate the first action vigorously, the procedural opportunities available, and any other factors that weigh on fairness. See, e.g. Doe v. Tobias, 715 N.E.2d 829 (Ind.1999) (allowing plaintiff rape victim to assert offensive collateral estoppel against defendant, who had been convicted of the offense in a prior criminal trial).

1343

6. What issue preclusive effect should be given to a compromise verdict? In Taylor v. Hawkinson, 47 Cal.2d 893, 306 P.2d 797 (1957), the California Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Traynor, held that the Bernhard rule should not be applied due to evidence of a compromise verdict. Id. at 896–97, 306 P.2d at 799. Katz v. Eli Lilly & Co., 84 F.R.D. 378 (E.D.N.Y.1979), may represent the extreme. A suit prior to Katz had held defendant liable for the wrongful death of the child of a mother who had taken diethylstilbestrol (DES) during pregnancy. Plaintiff Katz sought to take advantage of this prior verdict. Defendant, noticing signs that the earlier verdict may have been a compromise, subpoenaed two members of the jury in the prior case. The plaintiff moved to quash the subpoenas on the ground that the testimony of jurors may not be used to impeach a verdict. The court denied the motion to quash. Is there any justification for the court’s refusal to quash the subpoenas? Would allowing such testimony truly impeach the verdict of the prior case? Are there ways to get the jurors’ testimony without impeaching the earlier verdict? At what point does the effort involved in evaluating the prior verdict outweigh the effort saved in relitigating the substantive issues at stake in the suit? For a discussion of the limitations on impeaching a jury’s verdict, see p. 1161, supra.

7. Suits against the federal government represent an important exception to the extension of offensive nonmutual collateral estoppel, but the scope of the exception is uncertain. See 18A Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4465.4 (3d ed.). In UNITED STATES v. MENDOZA, 464 U.S. 154, 162, 104 S.Ct. 568, 573, 78 L.Ed.2d 379, 386 (1984), the Court held “that nonmutual offensive collateral estoppel simply does not apply against the Government in such a way as to preclude relitigation of issues such as those involved in this case.” The Court justified this result on the ground that offensive issue preclusion “would thwart the development of important questions of law by freezing the first decision rendered on a particular legal issue.” Id. at 160, 104 S.Ct. at 572, 78 L.Ed.2d at 385.

However, in UNITED STATES v. STAUFFER CHEMICAL CO., 464 U.S. 165, 173 104 Sup. Ct. 575, 580, 78 L.Ed.2d 388, 395 (1984), decided the same day as Mendoza, the Court clarified that this rationale “is persuasive only to prevent the application of collateral estoppel against the Government in the absence of mutuality. When estoppel is applied in a case where the Government is litigating the same issue arising under virtually identical facts against the same party * * * the Government’s argument loses its force.” Should the Mendoza exception be extended to state governments? See Note, Nonmutual Issue Preclusion Against States, 109 Harv.L.Rev. 792 (1996).

3.BINDING NONPARTIES

Often, formal substantive relationships between persons may justify nonparty preclusion. For example, when a guardian litigates a suit on behalf of a minor, the minor in the usual situation will be bound by that suit’s outcome. However, a relationship between parties need not always be so formal as to justify nonparty preclusion. In MONTANA v. UNITED STATES, 440 U.S. 147, 99 S.Ct. 970, 59 L.Ed.2d 210 (1979), the Supreme Court held that when nonparties assume control over litigation in which they have a direct financial or pecuniary interest, they may be precluded from relitigating issues that the earlier suit resolved. The state of Montana gave contractors different tax treatment depending on whether they contracted to build public or private projects. A contractor on a federal construction project brought a state court action challenging the constitutionality of this practice. The United States directed and financed the litigation for the contractor, but it also brought a federal court action challenging the practice. After the Montana Supreme Court upheld Montana’s system of taxation, the United States continued with its federal action. But Montana argued that the federal government was bound by the state court judgment. When the case reached the United States Supreme Court, Justice Marshall, writing for the Court, observed that “although not a party, the United States plainly had a sufficient laboring oar in the conduct of the state-court litigation to actuate principles of estoppel.” Id. at 154–55, 99 S.Ct. at 974, 59 L.Ed.2d at 217–18.

Are there other types of informal relations or litigation conduct that arguably justify nonparty preclusion? What if individuals agree that a case will serve as a test case? See Lahav, Bellwether Trials, 76 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 576 (2008). Certain proceedings, such as bankruptcy and probate actions, bind nonparties, making use of special procedures to insure that due process is satisfied. See Mullane, p. 237, supra. For an overview of trust proceedings, see Begleiter, Serve the Cheerleader—Serve the World: An Analysis of Representation in Estate and Trust Proceedings and Under the Uniform Trust Code and Other Modern Trust Codes, 43 Real Prop.Tr. & Est.L.J. 311 (2008).

MARTIN V. WILKS

Supreme Court of the United States, 1989.
490 U.S. 755, 109 S.Ct. 2180, 104 L.Ed.2d 835.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit.

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

[The City of Birmingham, Alabama (“City”) and the Jefferson County Personnel Board (“Board”) entered into consent judgments with black firefighters setting goals for hiring blacks as firefighters and for promoting them. White firefighters who were not a party to the prior lawsuits sued the City and the Board alleging that they were being denied promotions illegally on the basis of race. The City and the Board defended on the basis of the consent decrees, which mandated the challenged promotion procedures, and argued that these consent decrees precluded the current suit. The district court held that the earlier consent decrees provided a defense to the reverse discrimination suits, but the court of appeals reversed, holding that because the white firefighters were not parties to the earlier litigation, their discrimination claims could not be precluded.]

* * *

* * * All agree that “[i]t is a principle of general application in Anglo-American jurisprudence that one is not bound by a judgment in personam in a litigation in which he is not designated as a party or to which he has not been made a party by service of process.” * * * This rule is part of our “deep-rooted historic tradition that everyone should have his own day in court.” * * * A judgment or decree among parties to a lawsuit resolves issues as among them, but it does not conclude the rights of strangers to those proceedings.²

Petitioners argue that, because respondents failed to timely intervene in the initial proceedings, their current challenge to actions taken under the consent decree constitutes an impermissible “collateral attack.” They argue that respondents were aware that the underlying suit might affect them and if they chose to pass up an opportunity to intervene, they should not be permitted to later litigate the issues in a new action. The position has sufficient appeal to have commanded the approval of the great majority of the Federal Courts of Appeals, but we agree with the contrary view expressed by the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit in this case.

* * * [A] party seeking a judgment binding on another cannot obligate that person to intervene; he must be joined. * * * [T]he drafters cast Rule 24, governing intervention in permissive terms. * * * They determined that the concern for finality and completeness of judgments would be “better [served] by mandatory joinder procedures.” * * * Accordingly, Rule 19(a) provides for mandatory joinder in circumstances where a judgment rendered in the absence of a person may * * * [produce inconsistent obligations for those who are already parties]. Rule 19(b) sets forth the factors to be considered by a court in deciding whether to allow an action to proceed in the absence of an interested party.

Joinder as a party, rather than knowledge of a lawsuit and an opportunity to intervene, is the method by which potential parties are subjected to the jurisdiction of the court and bound by a judgment or decree. The parties to a lawsuit presumably know better than anyone else the nature and scope of relief sought in the action, and at whose expense such relief might be granted. It makes sense, therefore, to place on them a burden of bringing in additional parties where such a step is indicated, rather than placing on potential additional parties a duty to intervene when they acquire knowledge of the lawsuit. The linchpin of the “impermissible collateral attack” doctrine—the attribution of preclusive effect to a failure to intervene—is therefore quite inconsistent with Rule 19 and Rule 24.

* * *

Petitioners contend that a different result should be reached because the need to join affected parties will be burdensome and ultimately discouraging to civil rights litigation. Potential adverse claimants may be numerous and difficult to identify; if they are not joined, the possibility for inconsistent judgments exists. Judicial resources will be needlessly consumed in relitigation of the same question.

* * *

The difficulties petitioners foresee in identifying those who could be adversely affected by a decree granting broad remedial relief are undoubtedly present, but they arise from the nature of the relief sought and not because of any choice between mandatory intervention and joinder. Rule 19’s provisions for joining interested parties are designed to accommodate the sort of complexities that may arise from a decree affecting numerous people in various ways. We doubt that a mandatory intervention rule would be any less awkward. As mentioned, plaintiffs who seek the aid of the courts to alter existing employment policies, or the employer who might be subject to conflicting decrees, are best able to bear the burden of designating those who would be adversely affected if plaintiffs prevail; these parties will generally have a better understanding of the scope of likely relief than employees who are not named but might be affected. Petitioners’ alternative does not eliminate the need for, or difficulty of, identifying persons who, because of their interests, should be included in a lawsuit. It merely shifts that responsibility to less able shoulders.

* * *

* * * A voluntary settlement in the form of a consent decree between one group of employees and their employer cannot possibly “settle,” voluntarily or otherwise, the conflicting claims of another group of employees who do not join in the agreement. This is true even if the second group of employees is a party to the litigation:

1347

“[P]arties who choose to resolve litigation through settlement may not dispose of the claims of a third party * * * without that party’s agreement. A court’s approval of a consent decree between some of the parties therefore cannot dispose of the valid claims of nonconsenting intervenors.” * * *

Insofar as the argument is bottomed on the idea that it may be easier to settle claims among a disparate group of affected persons if they are all before the Court, joinder bids fair to accomplish that result as well as a regime of mandatory intervention.

* * *

Affirmed.

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE BRENNAN, JUSTICE MARSHALL, and JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, dissenting.

As a matter of law there is a vast difference between persons who are actual parties to litigation and persons who merely have the kind of interest that may as a practical matter be impaired by the outcome of a case. Persons in the first category have a right to participate in a trial and to appeal from an adverse judgment; depending on whether they win or lose, their legal rights may be enhanced or impaired. Persons in the latter category have a right to intervene in the action in a timely fashion, or they may be joined as parties against their will. But if they remain on the sidelines, they may be harmed as a practical matter even though their legal rights are unaffected. One of the disadvantages of sideline-sitting is that the bystander has no right to appeal from a judgment no matter how harmful it may be.

In this case the Court quite rightly concludes that the white firefighters who brought the second series of Title VII cases could not be deprived of their legal rights in the first series of cases because they had neither intervened nor been joined as parties. * * * The consent decrees obviously could not deprive them of any contractual rights, such as seniority, * * * or accrued vacation pay, * * * or of any other legal rights, such as the right to have their employer comply with federal statutes like Title VII * * *. There is no reason, however, why the consent decrees might not produce changes in conditions at the white firefighters’ place of employment that, as a practical matter, may have a serious effect on their opportunities for employment or promotion even though they are not bound by the decrees in any legal sense. The fact that one of the effects of a decree is to curtail the job opportunities of nonparties does not mean that the nonparties have been deprived of legal rights or that they have standing to appeal from that decree without becoming parties.

1348

Persons who have no right to appeal from a final judgment—either because the time to appeal has elapsed or because they never became parties to the case—may nevertheless collaterally attack a judgment on certain narrow grounds. If the court had no jurisdiction over the subject matter, or if the judgment is the product of corruption, duress, fraud, collusion, or mistake, under limited circumstances it may be set aside in an appropriate collateral proceeding. * * * This rule not only applies to parties to the original action, but also allows interested third parties collaterally to attack judgments. In both civil and criminal cases, however, the grounds that may be invoked to support a collateral attack are much more limited than those that may be asserted as error on direct appeal. Thus, a person who can foresee that a lawsuit is likely to have a practical impact on his interests may pay a heavy price if he elects to sit on the sidelines instead of intervening and taking the risk that his legal rights will be impaired.

In this case there is no dispute about the fact that respondents are not parties to the consent decrees. It follows as a matter of course that they are not bound by those decrees. Those judgments could not, and did not, deprive them of any legal rights. The judgments did, however, have a practical impact on respondents' opportunities for advancement in their profession. For that reason, respondents had standing to challenge the validity of the decrees, but the grounds that they may advance in support of a collateral challenge are much more limited than would be allowed if they were parties prosecuting a direct appeal. * * *

There is nothing unusual about the fact that litigation between adverse parties may, as a practical matter, seriously impair the interests of third persons who elect to sit on the sidelines. Indeed, in complex litigation this Court has squarely held that a sideline-sitter may be bound as firmly as an actual party if he had adequate notice and a fair opportunity to intervene and if the judicial interest in finality is sufficiently strong. * * *

There is no need, however, to go that far in order to agree with the District Court's eminently sensible view that compliance with the terms of a valid decree remedying violations of Title VII cannot itself violate that statute or the Equal Protection Clause. The city of Birmingham, in entering into and complying with this decree, has made a substantial step toward the eradication of the long history of pervasive racial discrimination that has plagued its fire department. The District Court, after conducting a trial and carefully considering respondents' arguments, concluded that this effort is lawful and should go forward. Because respondents have thus already had their day in court and have failed to carry their burden, I would vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

1349

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The specific holding of Martin, in the Title VII arena, was legislatively overruled by Section 108 of the Civil Rights Act of 1991, Pub.L.No. 102-166, tit. I, § 108, 105 Stat. 1071, 1076. The 1991 Act prohibits challenges to employment consent decrees by individuals who had actual notice and a reasonable opportunity to intervene, or whose interests were represented adequately.
2. What problems do you see with a rule requiring intervention by persons who are aware of litigation that could potentially affect their interests? Suppose a nonparty becomes aware of litigation that will affect its interests, but the litigation is taking place in a jurisdiction where the party would not be subject to in personam jurisdiction. Are there due process concerns? See Bone, Rethinking the "Day in Court" Ideal and Nonparty Preclusion, 67 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 193 (1992).
3. The preclusion issues addressed in Martin generated much commentary. See Kramer, Consent Decrees and the Rights of Third Parties, 87 Mich.L.Rev. 321 (1988); Pielemeier, Due Process Limitations on the Application of Collateral Estoppel Against Nonparties to Prior Litigation, 63 B.U.L.Rev. 383 (1983).

TAYLOR V. STURGELL

Supreme Court of the United States, 2008.
553 U.S. 880, 128 S.Ct. 2161, 171 L.Ed.2d 155.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

JUSTICE GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court for a unanimous Court.

[Taylor filed a lawsuit under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) in the District Court for the District of Columbia seeking documents from the Federal Aviation Administration related to a vintage airplane manufactured by the Fairchild Engine and Airplane Corporation. Greg Herrick, his friend, had previously filed an unsuccessful suit in the District of Wyoming seeking the same documents. In the earlier lawsuit, the FAA successfully argued that the documents contained trade secrets and were therefore exempt from disclosure under FOIA. When Herrick appealed to the Tenth Circuit, the court of appeals affirmed the district court's judgment against him but noted that Herrick had not raised two legal issues concerning whether the documents still qualified for the trade secret exemption.

1350

Taylor and Herrick had no legal relationship, and there was no evidence that Taylor controlled, financed, participated in, or had notice of Herrick's lawsuit. But Taylor's suit, which was filed shortly after the Tenth Circuit's decision in Herrick's case, raised the two unresolved legal issues about the trade secret exemption that had been noted by the Tenth Circuit. The district court did not address those issues and instead granted summary judgment to defendants, holding that Taylor was barred by the District of Wyoming judgment because his interests had been virtually represented by a party in that suit, Herrick. In reaching this result, the district court relied on the Eighth Circuit's seven-factor test for virtual representation that requires an identity of interests between the nonparty and the party to the judgment, and six other factors that are relevant but not required: (1) a close relationship between the present party and a party to the judgment alleged to be preclusive; (2) participation in the prior litigation by the present party; (3) the present party's apparent acquiescence to the preclusive effect of the judgment; (4) the present party’s deliberate maneuvering to avoid the preclusive effect of the prior judgment; (5) adequate representation of the present party by a party to the prior adjudication; and (6) a suit raising a public law (such as a constitutional question) rather than a private law issue.]

* * *

The D.C. Circuit affirmed. It observed, first, that other Circuits “vary widely” in their approaches to virtual representation. * * * In this regard, the D.C. Circuit contrasted the multifactor balancing test applied by the Eighth Circuit and the D.C. District Court with the Fourth Circuit’s narrower approach, which “treats a party as a virtual representative only if the party is ‘accountable to the nonparties who file a subsequent suit’ and has ‘the tacit approval of the court’ to act on the nonpart[ies]’ behalf.” * * *

Rejecting both of these approaches, the D.C. Circuit announced its own five-factor test. The first two factors—“identity of interests” and “adequate representation”—are necessary but not sufficient for virtual representation. * * * In addition, at least one of three other factors must be established: “a close relationship between the present party and his putative representative,” “substantial participation by the present party in the first case,” or “tactical maneuvering on the part of the present party to avoid preclusion by the prior judgment.” * * *

Applying this test to the record in Taylor’s case, the D.C. Circuit found both of the necessary conditions for virtual representation well met. * * *

* * *

We granted certiorari * * * to resolve the disagreement among the Circuits over the permissibility and scope of preclusion based on “virtual representation.” * * *

1351

II

* * *

Taylor’s case presents an issue of first impression in this sense: Until now, we have never addressed the doctrine of “virtual representation” adopted (in varying forms) by several Circuits and relied upon by the courts below. Our inquiry, however, is guided by well-established precedent regarding the propriety of nonparty preclusion. We review that precedent before taking up directly the issue of virtual representation.

* * *

A person who was not a party to a suit generally has not had a “full and fair opportunity to litigate” the claims and issues settled in that suit. The application of claim and issue preclusion to nonparties thus runs up against the “deep-rooted historic tradition that everyone should have his own day in court.” * * * [Richards v. Jefferson County, 517 U.S. 793, 798, 116 S.Ct. 1761, 1766, 135 L.Ed.2d 76, 82 (1996)].

B

Though hardly in doubt, the rule against nonparty preclusion is subject to exceptions. For present purposes, the recognized exceptions can be grouped into six categories. * * *

[The Court summarized the exceptions as: (1) a nonparty may agree to be bound by a judgment and is bound by the terms of the agreement; (2) certain substantive relationships, traditionally referred to by the term privity, may justify preclusion of a nonparty; (3) a nonparty may be bound if its interests are represented adequately by a party to the suit, citing as examples class actions and suits by trustees and guardians; (4) a nonparty who has assumed control over a lawsuit, as in Montana, p. 1344, supra, may be precluded; (5) a nonparty who has colluded to avoid the preclusive effect of a judgment by litigating through a proxy may be bound; and (6) special statutory schemes, such as bankruptcy, or other suits that are brought “only on behalf of the public at large,” see Richards, may bind a nonparty.]

III

Reaching beyond these six established categories, some lower courts have recognized a “virtual representation” exception to the rule against nonparty preclusion. Decisions of these courts, however, have been far from consistent. * * *

The D.C. Circuit, the FAA, and Fairchild have presented three arguments in support of an expansive doctrine of virtual representation. We find none of them persuasive.

1352

A

[The D.C. Circuit argued that] * * * a person may be bound by a judgment if she was adequately represented by a party to the proceeding yielding that judgment. * * * But the D.C. Circuit’s definition of “adequate representation” strayed from the meaning our decisions have attributed to that term.

* * * [Our precedent has] established that representation is “adequate” for purposes of nonparty preclusion only if (at a minimum)

one of * * * two circumstances is present. [The Court described the two circumstances as when (1) the court uses “special procedures to protect the nonparties’ interests” or (2) “an understanding by the concerned parties that the first suit was brought in a representative capacity.”] * * *

* * *

B

Fairchild and the FAA do not argue that the D.C. Circuit’s virtual representation doctrine fits within any of the recognized grounds for nonparty preclusion. Rather, they ask us to abandon the attempt to delineate discrete grounds and clear rules altogether. Preclusion is in order, they contend, whenever “the relationship between a party and a non-party is ‘close enough’ to bring the second litigant within the judgment.” * * * Courts should make the “close enough” determination, they urge, through a “heavily fact-driven” and “equitable” inquiry. * * * Only this sort of diffuse balancing, Fairchild and the FAA argue, can account for all of the situations in which nonparty preclusion is appropriate.

We reject this argument for three reasons. First, our decisions emphasize the fundamental nature of the general rule that a litigant is not bound by a judgment to which she was not a party. * * * Accordingly, we have endeavored to delineate discrete exceptions that apply in “limited circumstances.” * * * Respondents’ amorphous balancing test is at odds with the constrained approach to nonparty preclusion our decisions advance.

* * *

Our second reason for rejecting a broad doctrine of virtual representation rests on the limitations attending nonparty preclusion based on adequate representation. A party’s representation of a nonparty is “adequate” for preclusion purposes only if, at a minimum: (1) the interests of the nonparty and her representative are aligned, see Hansberry [p. 804, supra]; and (2) either the party understood herself to be acting in a representative capacity or the original court took care to protect the interests of the nonparty * * *. In addition, adequate representation sometimes requires (3) notice of the original suit to the persons alleged to have been represented * * *. In the class-action context, these limitations are implemented by the procedural safeguards contained in Federal Rule * * * 23.

1353

An expansive doctrine of virtual representation, however, would “recogniz[e], in effect, a common-law kind of class action.” Tice [v. American Airlines, Inc., 162 F.3d 966, 972 (7th Cir. 1988)] * * *. That is, virtual representation would authorize preclusion based on identity of interests and some kind of relationship between parties and nonparties, shorn of the procedural protections [that are grounded in due process and] prescribed in Hansberry, Richards, and Rule 23. * * *

Third, a diffuse balancing approach to nonparty preclusion would likely create more headaches than it relieves. Most obviously, it could significantly complicate the task of district courts faced in the first instance with preclusion questions. An all-things-considered balancing approach might spark wide-ranging, time-consuming, and expensive discovery tracking factors potentially relevant under seven- or five-prong tests. And after the relevant facts are established, district judges would be called upon to evaluate them under a standard that provides no firm guidance. * * * Preclusion doctrine, it should be recalled, is intended to reduce the burden of litigation on courts and parties. * * * “In this area of the law,” we agree, “ ‘crisp rules with sharp corners’ are preferable to a round-about doctrine of opaque standards.” Bittinger v. Tecumseh Products Co., 123 F.3d 877, 881 (C.A.6 1997).

C

Finally, * * * the FAA maintains that nonparty preclusion should apply more broadly in “public-law” litigation than in “private-law” controversies. To support this position, the FAA offers two arguments. First, the FAA urges * * * the plaintiff has a reduced interest in controlling the litigation “because of the public nature of the right at issue.” * * *

Taylor’s FOIA action falls within * * * the [public-law] category * * *, the FAA contends, because “the duty to disclose under FOIA is owed to the public generally.” * * * The Act, however, instructs agencies receiving FOIA requests to make the information available not to the public at large, but rather to the “person” making the request. * * * Thus, in contrast to * * * public-law litigation * * *, a successful FOIA action results in a grant of relief to the individual plaintiff, not a decree benefiting the public at large.

Furthermore, * * * States are free to adopt procedures limiting repetitive litigation [of public-law claims]. * * * It hardly follows, however, that this Court should proscribe or confine successive FOIA suits by different requesters. Indeed, Congress’ provision for FOIA suits with no statutory constraint on successive actions counsels against judicial imposition of constraints through extraordinary application of the common law of preclusion.

1354

But we are not convinced that this risk justifies departure from the usual rules governing nonparty preclusion. First, stare decisis will allow courts swiftly to dispose of repetitive suits brought in the same circuit. Second, even when stare decisis is not dispositive, “the human tendency not to waste money will deter the bringing of suits based on claims or issues that have already been adversely determined against others.” Shapiro[, Civil Procedure: Preclusion in Civil Actions] 97 [(2001)]. This intuition seems to be borne out by experience: The FAA has not called our attention to any instances of abusive FOIA suits in the Circuits that reject the virtual-representation theory respondents advocate here.

IV

For the foregoing reasons, we disapprove the theory of virtual representation on which the decision below rested. * * *

Although references to “virtual representation” have proliferated in the lower courts, our decision is unlikely to occasion any great shift in actual practice. Many opinions use the term “virtual representation” in reaching results at least arguably defensible on established grounds. * * *

In some cases, however, lower courts have relied on virtual representation to extend nonparty preclusion beyond the latter doctrine’s proper bounds. We now turn back to Taylor’s action to determine whether his suit is such a case, or whether the result reached by the courts below can be justified on one of the recognized grounds for nonparty preclusion.

A

It is uncontested that * * * [there] is no indication that Taylor agreed to be bound by Herrick’s litigation, that Taylor and Herrick have any legal relationship, that Taylor exercised any control over Herrick’s suit, or that this suit implicates any special statutory scheme limiting relitigation. Neither the FAA nor Fairchild contends otherwise.

It is equally clear that preclusion cannot be justified on the theory that Taylor was adequately represented in Herrick’s suit. Nothing in the record indicates that Herrick understood himself to be suing on Taylor’s behalf, that Taylor even knew of Herrick’s suit, or that the Wyoming District Court took special care to protect Taylor’s interests. Under our pathmarking precedent, therefore, Herrick’s representation was not “adequate.” * * *

That leaves only the * * * [possibility of] preclusion because a nonparty to an earlier litigation has brought suit as a representative or agent of a party who is bound by the prior adjudication. Taylor is not Herrick’s legal representative and he has not purported to sue in a representative capacity. He concedes, however, that preclusion would be appropriate if respondents could demonstrate that he is acting as Herrick’s “undisclosed agent[t].” * * *

1355

Respondents argue here, as they did below, that Taylor’s suit is a collusive attempt to relitigate Herrick’s action. * * * The D.C. Circuit considered a similar question in addressing the “tactical maneuvering” prong of its virtual representation test. * * * The Court of Appeals did not, however, treat the issue as one of agency, and it expressly declined to reach any definitive conclusions due to “the ambiguity of the facts.” * * * We therefore remand to give the courts below an opportunity to determine whether Taylor, in pursuing the instant FOIA suit, is acting as Herrick’s agent. Taylor concedes that such a remand is appropriate. * * *

We have never defined the showing required to establish that a nonparty to a prior adjudication has become a litigating agent for a party to the earlier case. Because the issue has not been briefed in any detail, we do not discuss the matter elaboratively here. We note, however, that courts should be cautious about finding preclusion on this basis. A mere whiff of “tactical maneuvering” will not suffice; instead, principles of agency law are suggestive. They indicate that preclusion is appropriate only if the putative agent’s conduct of the suit is subject to the control of the party who is bound by the prior adjudication. * * *

B

On remand, Fairchild suggests, Taylor should bear the burden of proving he is not acting as Herrick’s agent. * * *

We reject Fairchild’s suggestion. Claim preclusion, like issue preclusion, is an affirmative defense. * * * Ordinarily, it is incumbent on the defendant to plead and prove such a defense, * * * and we have never recognized claim preclusion as an exception to that general rule * * *. We acknowledge that direct evidence justifying nonparty preclusion is often in the hands of plaintiffs rather than defendants. * * * But “[v]ery often one must plead and prove matters as to which his adversary has superior access to the proof.” * * * In these situations, targeted interrogatories or deposition questions can reduce the information disparity. We see no greater cause here than in other matters of affirmative defense to disturb the traditional allocation of the proof burden.

* * *

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Why might the trend toward nonparty preclusion apply more broadly in public law cases than in private law cases? Are there some substantive areas of law, such as those involving property, in which the need for finality and predictability ought to outweigh an individual’s autonomy interests? Professor Nagareda has urged that the law should recognize a concept of “embedded aggregation” which would permit a judgment even in a traditional one-on-one litigation to have a binding effect on a mass scope. Would recognition of this concept avoid the need for establishing safeguards of the type discussed by the Court in Taylor? See Nagareda, Embedded Aggregation in Civil Litigation, 95 Cornell L.Rev. 1105 (2010). Or would it simply change the nature of the safeguards that are needed?

1356

- 2.Under what circumstances would Taylor bar issue preclusion against a nonparty to a prior litigation? In Lynch v. Merrell-National Labs. Div. OF Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 646 F.Supp. 856 (D.Mass.1986), affirmed on other grounds 830 F.2d 1190 (1st Cir. 1987), plaintiff sought damages for injuries sustained by her child’s exposure during gestation to a prescription drug manufactured by defendant. Plaintiff had elected not to participate in earlier consolidated trials raising identical claims against the drug company. The court held that plaintiff was issue precluded by the earlier judgment from proving causation. Is Lynch at odds with the day-in-court ideal that informs the Court’s decision in Taylor? Or can the decision be explained by the fairness and efficiency concerns that informed the Court’s decision in Parklane?
- 3.Professor Bone has argued that the day-in-court ideal is supported both by process-based values—“respect for the dignity of individual litigants”—and outcome-based results—the fit between the judgment and “the entitlements the substantive law creates.” See Bone, The Puzzling Idea of Adjudicative Representation: Lessons for Aggregation Litigation and Class Actions, 79 Geo.Wash.L.Rev. 577, 578–83 (2011). Haven’t both of these justifications for the day-in-court ideal been compromised by such trends as summary disposition, aggregate litigation, and mass settlement? See Miller, The Pretrial Rush to Judgment: Are the “Litigation Explosion,” “Liability Crisis,” and Efficiency Clichés Eroding Our Day in Court and Jury Trial Commitments?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982 (2003). Why draw the line at nonparty preclusion?
- 4.Is the doctrine of stare decisis, see p. 1266, Note 1, supra, inconsistent with the Court’s rationale against nonparty preclusion in Taylor? Isn’t there a strong societal interest in allowing individuals to plan and shape conduct in reliance on legal precedent? For a discussion of this argument, Minzer, Saving Stare Decisis: Preclusion, Precedent, and Procedural Due Process, 2010 BYU L.Rev. 597 (2010).

F. INTERSYSTEM PRECLUSION

Taylor v. Sturgell considered the preclusive effect of a federal-court judgment upon another court in the federal system. Often, however, questions of preclusion are presented to a court that is part of a different judicial system than that of the court that rendered the judgment. Should this affect the preclusive effect of the prior judgment?

1357

Read Article IV, § 1 of the United States Constitution and 28 U.S.C. § 1738 in the Supplement.

1.INTERSTATE PRECLUSION

HART V. AMERICAN AIRLINES, INC.

Supreme Court of New York, 1969.
61 Misc.2d 41, 304 N.Y.S.2d 810.

FRANK, JUSTICE.

* * *

The actions all arise out of the crash, in Kentucky on November 8, 1965, of an American Airlines aircraft while the plane was en route from La Guardia Airport, New York to an airport in Covington, Kentucky. The crash resulted in the death of 58 out of the 62 persons aboard and, in addition to the multiple actions pending in this court, comparable actions have been instituted in other States and in various United States District Courts.

Of the various actions instituted as a result of the crash, the first case to be tried to conclusion was that brought in the United States District Court, Northern District of Texas (Creasy v. American Airlines), which resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff therein against the defendant American Airlines. * * * [I]t is undisputable from the pleadings and papers herein that the issue of defendant airline’s liability in these cases is identical to the issue in that regard determined in the Texas action.

In light of the Texas result which has now been affirmed on appeal, plaintiffs Landano and Kirchstein oppose defendant’s motion for a joint trial by cross-moving for summary judgment on the issue of liability which, if granted, would obviate a trial on such issue and necessarily require a denial of defendant’s motion.

Plaintiffs contend that while, concededly, they were not parties to the Texas action, nevertheless the determination in that action of defendant’s liability for the plane crash of November 8, 1965 is, under the doctrine of collateral estoppel, conclusive on the issue of defendant’s liability for such crash in the actions brought by these plaintiffs.

* * * [In order to invoke the doctrine of collateral estoppel:] “There must be an identity of issue which has necessarily been decided in the prior action and is decisive of the present action, and, second, there must have been a full and fair opportunity to contest the decision now said to be controlling.”

1358

* * * [S]uch requirements are amply met in the instant cases. As already indicated, the issue of defendant airline’s liability for the crash in which plaintiffs’ decedents perished is identical to the issue of liability litigated in the Texas action where defendant was similarly charged with responsibility for that same accident. Indeed, in an airplane crash there are absent any of the problems with respect to “identity of issue” on liability which might arise in other types of accidents involving multiple participants such as automobile accident cases. With respect to the second requirement, it is in no way disputed that defendant had a full and fair opportunity to contest the issue of its liability in the course of the 19-day trial in the Texas action, and in order to defeat collateral estoppel on this ground the burden rests on the defendant to show that it had no such opportunity.

* * *

Defendant’s reliance on “full faith and credit” to defeat the application of collateral estoppel herein is misplaced. This is not a situation where the judgment, as such, of the Texas court is sought to be enforced. What is here involved is a policy determination by our courts that “ ‘One who has had his day in court should not be permitted to litigate the question anew’ ” (B.R. De Witt, Inc. v. Hall, 19 N.Y.2d 141, 144, supra), and, further, refusal “to tolerate a condition where, on relatively the same set of facts, one fact-finder, be it court or jury” may find a party liable while another exonerates him leading to the “inconsistent results which are always a blemish on a judicial system” (Schwartz v. Public Administrator, 24 N.Y.2d 65, 74 * * *).

Perhaps the strongest argument for applying the New York doctrine of collateral estoppel herein is the nature of the showing by defendant of the supposed “inequity” that would ensue from such application. There is a belabored emphasis on the merits of “mutuality of estoppel” and its favored status in “a majority of jurisdictions”. Such of course wholly ignores the fact that our highest court has resoundingly stated in terms leaving no room for doubt that “the ‘doctrine of mutuality’ is a dead letter” (B.R. De Witt, Inc. v. Hall, 19 N.Y.2d 141, 147 * * *).

Among the reasons submitted by defendant as to why it should have an opportunity to retry the issue of its liability, notwithstanding its failure to prove its freedom therefrom on the trial in Texas, is the argument that such issue was submitted to the jury under the substantive law of Kentucky which is less favorable to defendant than is the New York law. While one is tempted to wonder what the argument would be if the situation were reversed, such contention is in any event wholly without merit since a New York court would also be obliged to submit the case under the substantive law of Kentucky, the place where the crash occurred. * * *

1359

Even more interesting is the argument raised by defendant which may be paraphrased in Biblical terms as “hear them not for they know not what they do”. Defendant seriously suggests that the determination in the Texas action should not be accorded further conclusive effect because that action involved only a single claimant and the jury’s decision as to defendant’s negligence is somehow impaired because rendered “without any awareness whatsoever by the jury that its verdict would determine the obligation of the defendant to many other persons not before it”. It is apparently defendant’s contention that the issue as to whether or not it was negligent in the operation of its aircraft is in some manner dependent upon the number of claims which may ultimately be asserted against it.

* * *

Accordingly, plaintiffs’ cross motion for summary judgment is granted and defendant’s motion for a joint trial is denied. Settle order providing for an assessment of damages.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.Is a state required to give the same preclusive effect to a judgment—neither more nor less—as would the courts of the rendering state? Or do the Full Faith and Credit statutory and constitutional provisions establish a minimum preclusive effect that one state must give another’s judgment? There has been considerable debate over whether a court can rest nonmutual preclusion on the judgment of a court that itself would require mutuality. The more common view appears to be in favor of employing the rules of the rendering court. See Rourke v. Amchem Products, Inc., 384 Md. 329, 863 A.2d 926 (2004), in which the court held that under both Full Faith and Credit and common law collateral estoppel analysis, Maryland was not required to give greater preclusive effect to a Virginia judgment than Virginia would give to it, despite—as the dissent emphasized—the fact that defendants in the second suit participated in the first. This approach allows the first court the power to limit the effect of its own proceedings See 18B Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure §§ 4467, 4469 (2d ed.). The issue is left open in Restatement (Second), Judgments § 86, comment g (1982).

Nonetheless, some courts have given nonmutual preclusive effect to a judgment that the rendering state’s courts would not have treated as preclusive. In FINLEY v. KESLING, 105 Ill.App.3d 1, 60 Ill.Dec. 874, 433 N.E.2d 1112 (1982), Finley testified in Indiana divorce proceedings that four of his children owned 40 percent of the stock in a family corporation, and this testimony was accepted as the basis for the division of property. Thereafter he sued his four children in Illinois for a declaration that he was the beneficial owner of the stock. The Illinois court expressed doubt whether Indiana would cling to its traditional mutuality requirement in these circumstances, but concluded that it could apply collateral estoppel without regard to what Indiana might do. In the Illinois court’s view, although a second state cannot reduce the effect of a judgment below the level commanded by the law of the judgment state, it can expand its effect. The court, nonetheless, advanced an alternative ground for its decision—that Illinois courts would not permit a party to contradict that person’s sworn testimony in a prior proceeding, and that this is a matter independent of the effect of judgments or Full Faith and Credit requirements.

1360

2.Does the Due Process Clause limit efforts to expand the preclusive effect accorded a state judgment? See Shreve, Preclusion and Federal

Choice of Law, 64 Tex.L.Rev. 1209, 1251–63 (1986).

3. Often a plaintiff may wish to enforce a judgment in a state other than the one that rendered the judgment. The procedures for enforcing an out-of-state judgment vary from state-to-state. Sometimes it is possible simply to register the existence of the out-of-state judgment with the clerk of the court in which the judgment is to be enforced. Other times plaintiff must institute a new suit, which is then subject to abbreviated procedures. In the federal system, a judgment in an action for recovery of money or property may be registered in any other district when the judgment is final or the time to appeal has run or when ordered by the rendering court “for good cause shown.” 28 U.S.C. § 1963. See Chapter 15, p. 1204, Note 7, supra.

4. In BAKER v. GENERAL MOTORS CORP., 522 U.S. 222, 118 S.Ct. 657, 139 L.Ed.2d 580 (1998), the Bakers subpoenaed Elwell, a former GM engineering analyst, to testify in a wrongful death action brought in Missouri against the automobile company. GM asserted Elwell’s testimony was barred by a prior Michigan court settlement and permanent injunction generally prohibiting Elwell from testifying in any litigation involving GM. Reversing the Eighth Circuit, the Supreme Court, in an opinion authored by Justice Ginsburg, held Elwell may testify “without offense” to the Full Faith and Credit requirement: “Recognition, under full faith and credit, is owed to dispositions Michigan has authority to order. But a Michigan decree cannot command obedience elsewhere on a matter the Michigan court lacks authority to resolve.” Id. at 240–41, 118 S.Ct. at 667–68, 139 L.Ed.2d at 597. The Court held that Michigan “lacks authority” to dictate evidentiary issues in courts of other states, in the context of actions brought by strangers to the Michigan litigation. However, the Court noted that this exception is a narrow one: “If the Bakers had been parties to the Michigan proceedings and had actually litigated the privileged character of Elwell’s testimony, the Bakers would of course be precluded from relitigating that issue in Missouri.” Id. at 239 n.12, 118 S.Ct. at 667 n.12, 139 L.Ed.2d at 596 n.12 (internal citations omitted).

Another example of the limits of Full Faith and Credit is that a state may refuse to entertain an enforcement proceeding on ground that its statute of limitations for such enforcement proceedings has run, even though the statute of the rendering state would not have run. And, for a final example, state statutes often specify that certain items of personal property, such as social-security payments and the last $200 of a savings account, cannot be used to satisfy court judgments. It is not a violation of Full Faith and Credit for a state to refuse to enforce a judgment because it would require attachment of exempt property, even though that property would not have been considered exempt in the state rendering the judgment. For more general discussions of Full Faith and Credit, see Engdahl, The Classic Rule of Faith and Credit, 118 Yale L.J. 1584 (2009); Sterk, The Muddy Boundaries Between Res Judicata and Full Faith and Credit, 58 Wash. & Lee L.Rev. 47 (2001); Radin, The Authenticated Full Faith and Credit Clause: Its History, 39 Ill.L.Rev. 1 (1994); Nadelmann, Full Faith and Credit to Judgments and Public Acts, 56 Mich.L.Rev. 33 (1957).

1361

The substantive areas of matrimonial and custody law present special problems for the application of preclusion.

THOMPSON V. THOMPSON

Supreme Court of the United States, 1988.
484 U.S. 174, 108 S.Ct. 513, 98 L.Ed.2d 512.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

We granted certiorari in this case to determine whether the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A, furnishes an implied cause of action in federal court to determine which of two conflicting state custody decisions is valid.

I

The Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act (PKPA or Act) imposes a duty on the States to enforce a child custody determination entered by a court of a sister State if the determination is consistent with the provisions of the Act. In order for a state court’s custody decree to be consistent with the provisions of the Act, the State must have jurisdiction under its own local law and one of five conditions set out in § 1738A(c)(2) must be met. Briefly put, these conditions authorize the state court to enter a custody decree if the child’s home is or recently has been in the State, if the child has no home State and it would be in the child’s best interest for the State to assume jurisdiction, or if the child is present in the State and has been abandoned or abused. Once a State exercises jurisdiction consistently with the provisions of the Act, no other State may exercise concurrent jurisdiction over the custody dispute, § 1738A(g), even if it would have been empowered to take jurisdiction in the first instance, and all States must accord full faith and credit to the first State’s ensuing custody decree.

As the legislative scheme suggests, and as Congress explicitly specified, one of the chief purposes of the PKPA is to “avoid jurisdictional competition and conflict between State courts.” Pub.L. 96–611, 94 Stat. 3569, § 7(c)(5), note following 28 U.S.C. § 1738A. This case arises out of a jurisdictional stalemate that came to pass notwithstanding the strictures of the Act. In July 1978, respondent Susan Clay (then Susan Thompson) filed a petition in Los Angeles Superior Court asking the court to dissolve her marriage to petitioner David Thompson and seeking custody of the couple’s infant son, Matthew. The court initially awarded the parents joint custody of Matthew, but that arrangement became infeasible when respondent decided to move from California to Louisiana to take a job. The court then entered an order providing that respondent would have sole custody of Matthew once she left for Louisiana. This state of affairs was to remain in effect until the court investigator submitted a report on custody, after which the court intended to make a more studied custody determination. * * *

1362

Respondent and Matthew moved to Louisiana in December 1980. Three months later, respondent filed a petition in Louisiana state court for enforcement of the California custody decree, judgment of custody, and modification of petitioner’s visitation privileges. By order dated April 7, 1981, the Louisiana court granted the petition and awarded sole custody of Matthew to respondent. Two months later, however, the California court, having received and reviewed its investigator’s report, entered an order awarding sole custody of Matthew to petitioner. Thus arose the current impasse.

In August 1983, petitioner brought this action in the District Court for the Central District of California. Petitioner requested an order declaring the Louisiana decree invalid and the California decree valid, and enjoining the enforcement of the Louisiana decree. Petitioner did not attempt to enforce the California decree in a Louisiana state court before he filed suit in federal court. The District Court granted respondent’s motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject-matter and personal jurisdiction. * * * The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed. * * * We granted certiorari * * * and we now affirm.

II

* * *

We examine initially the context of the PKPA with an eye toward determining Congress’ perception of the law that it was shaping or reshaping. * * * At the time Congress passed the PKPA, custody orders held a peculiar status under the full faith and credit doctrine, which requires each State to give effect to the judicial proceedings of other States, see U.S. Const., Art. IV, § 1; 28 U.S.C. § 1738. The anomaly traces to the fact that custody orders characteristically are subject to modification as required by the best interests of the child. As a consequence, some courts doubted whether custody orders were sufficiently “final” to trigger full faith and credit requirements, * * * and this Court had declined expressly to settle the question. See Ford v. Ford, 371 U.S. 187, 192, 83 S.Ct. 273, 276, 9 L.Ed.2d 240 (1962). Even if custody orders were subject to full faith and credit requirements, the Full Faith and Credit Clause obliges States only to accord the same force to judgments as would be accorded by the courts of the State in which the judgment was entered. Because courts entering custody orders generally retain the power to modify them, courts in other States were no less entitled to change the terms of custody according to their own views of the child’s best interest. * * * For these reasons, a parent who lost a custody battle in one State had an incentive to kidnap the child and move to another State to relitigate the issue. This circumstance contributed to widespread jurisdictional deadlocks like this one, and more importantly, to a national epidemic of parental kidnapping. At the time the PKPA was enacted, sponsors of the Act estimated that between 25,000 and 100,000 children were kidnapped by parents who had been unable to obtain custody in a legal forum. See Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1979: Joint Hearing on S. 105 before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice of the Judiciary Committee and the Subcommittee on Child and Human Development of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, 96th Cong., 2d Sess., 10 (1980) (hereinafter PKPA Joint Hearing) (statement of Sen. Malcolm Wallop).

1363

A number of States joined in an effort to avoid these jurisdictional conflicts by adopting the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA), 9 U.L.A. §§ 1–28 (1979). The UCCJA prescribed uniform standards for deciding which State could make a custody determination and obligated enacting States to enforce the determination made by the State with proper jurisdiction. The project foundered, however, because a number of States refused to enact the UCCJA while others enacted it with modifications. In the absence of uniform national standards for allocating and enforcing custody determinations, noncustodial parents still had reason to snatch their children and petition the courts of any of a number of haven States for sole custody.

The context of the PKPA therefore suggests that the principal problem Congress was seeking to remedy was the inapplicability of full faith and credit requirements to custody determinations. Statements made when the Act was introduced in Congress forcefully confirm that suggestion. The sponsors and supporters of the Act continually indicated that the purpose of the PKPA was to provide for nationwide enforcement of custody orders made in accordance with the terms of the UCCJA. As Acting Deputy Attorney General Michel testified:

* * *

“In essence [the PKPA] would impose on States a Federal duty, under enumerated standards derived from the UCCJA, to give full faith and credit to the custody decrees of other States. Such legislation would, in effect, amount to Federal adoption of key provisions of the UCCJA for all States and would eliminate the incentive for one parent to remove a minor child to another jurisdiction.” PKPA Joint Hearing 48.

1364

* * * [T]he [Full Faith and Credit Clause] “only prescribes a rule by which courts, Federal and state, are to be guided when a question arises in the progress of a pending suit as to the faith and credit to be given by the court to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of a State other than that in which the court is sitting.” [Minnesota v. Northern Securities Co., 194 U.S. 48, 72, 24 S.Ct. 598, 605, 48 L.Ed. 870, 881 (1904)]. Because Congress’ chief aim in enacting the PKPA was to extend the requirements of the Full Faith and Credit Clause to custody determinations, the Act is most naturally construed to furnish a rule of decision for courts to use in adjudicating custody disputes and not to create an entirely new cause of action. It thus is not compatible with the purpose and context of the legislative scheme to infer a private cause of action. * * *

The language and placement of the statute reinforce this conclusion. The PKPA, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A, is an addendum to the full faith and credit statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1738. This fact alone is strong proof that the Act is intended to have the same operative effect as the full faith and credit statute.

* * *

In sum, the context, language, and history of the PKPA together make out a conclusive case against inferring a cause of action in federal court to determine which of two conflicting state custody decrees is valid. Against this impressive evidence, petitioner relies primarily on the argument that failure to infer a cause of action would render the PKPA nugatory. We note, as a preliminary response, that ultimate review remains available in this Court for truly intractable jurisdictional deadlocks. In addition, the unspoken presumption in petitioner’s argument is that the States are either unable or unwilling to enforce the provisions of the Act. This is a presumption we are not prepared, and more importantly, Congress was not prepared, to indulge. State courts faithfully administer the Full Faith and Credit Clause every day; now that Congress has extended full faith and credit requirements to child custody orders, we can think of no reason why the courts’ administration of federal law in custody disputes will be any less vigilant. Should state courts prove as obstinate as petitioner predicts, Congress may choose to revisit the issue. But any more radical approach to the problem will have to await further legislative action; we “will not engraft a remedy on a statute, no matter how salutary, that Congress did not intend to provide.” California v. Sierra Club, 451 U.S. 287, 297 (1981). The judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

It is so ordered.

[JUSTICE O’CONNOR concurred in part and concurred in the judgment. JUSTICE SCALIA concurred in the judgment.]

1365

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Thompson v. Thompson raised the issue of interstate preclusion when each state retains jurisdiction over a dispute. In the context of custody disputes, a court always can reopen proceedings if it is in the best interests of the child. The ability to reopen the case, then, is actually what is granted preclusive effect.

2.In PARKER v. HOEFER, 2 N.Y.2d 612, 162 N.Y.S.2d 13, 142 N.E.2d 194, cert. denied, 355 U.S. 833, 78 S.Ct. 51, 2 L.Ed.2d 45 (1957), the New York Court of Appeals gave Full Faith and Credit to a Vermont final judgment, notwithstanding the fact that the underlying claim was not enforceable in New York. In holding that plaintiff could initiate an enforcement action in New York, the court said:

* * * [T]he plaintiff is not attempting to enforce in the courts of New York an action for alienation of affections and criminal conversation, which have been abolished in New York but, rather, to enforce a judgment rendered in Vermont as between these parties, which was final and conclusive on the rights litigated. New York cannot retry the case or review as on appeal the Vermont judgment. * * * The present suit, then, is upon an entirely different cause of action from that merged in the judgment * * * and may not be called a suit on an action abolished in New York. * * *

Id. at 617, 162 N.Y.S.2d at 17, 142 N.E.2d at 197.

3.In V.L. v. E.L., 577 U.S. 404, 136 S.Ct. 1017, 194 L.Ed.2d 92 (2016), the Supreme Court held that the Alabama Supreme Court erred in refusing to enforce a Georgia adoption decree involving the child of a same-sex couple that later separated. The Alabama court held that it was not required to accord Full Faith and Credit to the Georgia judgment because the Georgia court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction to enter an adoption decree while still recognizing the parental rights of the non-adoptive party. The Supreme Court rejected that argument. Although a court, before according recognition to a sister state’s judgment, may inquire into the decree’s jurisdictional basis, in this case the Georgia judgment “on its face” appeared under Georgia law to have been entered by a court with jurisdiction and therefore warranted respect. Id. at 407–08, 136 S.Ct. at 1022, 194 L.Ed.2d at 96.

2.STATE-FEDERAL PRECLUSION

Although it is generally agreed that the Full Faith and Credit Clause of the Constitution applies only to state courts, 28 U.S.C. § 1738 imposes the same general principles on the federal courts, requiring them to accord Full Faith and Credit to the judgments of state courts. Because the requirement is statutory and not constitutional, however, it may be supervened. For example, the writ of habeas corpus, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2241–55, provides a federal forum in which people who have been convicted of crimes in state court may litigate constitutional claims arising out of their prosecutions. Under traditional rules of preclusion, this subsequent action would be prevented.

1366

What other circumstances might justify departing from the usual rules of intersystem preclusion? Consider, for example, cases involving federal issues. Should a federal court give preclusive effect to a state court’s determination of federal law? What about circumstances in which the federal claim arises only by way of defense, and thus the original action could not have been removed to federal court? What if the issue falls in an area, such as copyright, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts?

ALLEN v. McCURRY
Supreme Court of the United States, 1980.
449 U.S. 90, 101 S.Ct. 411, 66 L.Ed.2d 308.

Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.

JUSTICE STEWART delivered the opinion of the Court.

[McCurry was charged with possession of heroin in a state-court proceeding. At a pretrial suppression hearing, the trial judge excluded some of the evidence on the ground that it was the product of an illegal police search, but admitted the drugs and other contraband that the officers had found “in plain view.” McCurry subsequently was convicted after a jury trial. McCurry later filed a civil action for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, claiming that Allen and other police officers had unconstitutionally searched his house and seized the property that had been used to convict him. The district court granted Allen and the other defendants summary judgment, holding that McCurry already had raised the Fourth Amendment issue unsuccessfully in the state-court proceeding. The court of appeals reversed, holding that the issue should be allowed to go to trial unencumbered by rules of issue preclusion due to the special role of the federal courts in protecting civil rights.]

* * *

In recent years, this Court has reaffirmed the benefits of collateral estoppel in particular, finding the policies underlying it to apply in contexts not formerly recognized at common law. Thus, the Court has eliminated the requirement of mutuality in applying collateral estoppel to bar relitigation of issues decided earlier in federal-court suits, * * * and has allowed a litigant who was not a party to a federal case to use collateral estoppel “offensively” in a new federal suit against the party who lost on the decided issue in the first case * * *. But one general limitation the Court has repeatedly recognized is that the concept of collateral estoppel cannot apply when the party against whom the earlier decision is asserted did not have a “full and fair opportunity” to litigate that issue in the earlier case. * * *

1367

The federal courts generally have * * * consistently accorded preclusive effect to issues decided by state courts. * * * Thus, res judicata and collateral estoppel not only reduce unnecessary litigation and foster reliance on adjudication, but also promote the comity between state and federal courts that has been recognized as a bulwark of the federal system. * * *

Indeed, though the federal courts may look to the common law or to the policies supporting res judicata and collateral estoppel in assessing the preclusive effect of decisions of other federal courts, Congress has specifically required all federal courts to give preclusive effect to state-court judgments whenever the courts of the State from which the judgments emerged would do so * * * [citing 28 U.S.C. § 1738]. It is against this background that we examine the relationship of § 1983 and collateral estoppel, and the decision of the Court of Appeals in this case.

III

This Court has never directly decided whether the rules of res judicata and collateral estoppel are generally applicable to § 1983 actions. But in Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475, 497, 93 S.Ct. 1827, 1840, 36 L.Ed.2d 439 [(1973)], the Court noted with implicit approval the view of other federal courts that res judicata principles fully apply to civil rights suits brought under that statute. * * * And the virtually unanimous view of the Courts of Appeals since Preiser has been that § 1983 presents no categorical bar to the application of res judicata and collateral estoppel concepts.¹⁰ These federal appellate court decisions have spoken with little explanation or citation in assuming the compatibility of § 1983 and rules of preclusion, but the statute and its legislative history clearly support the courts’ decisions.

Because the requirement of mutuality of estoppel was still alive in the federal courts until well into this century, * * * the drafters of the 1871 Civil Rights Act, of which § 1983 is a part, may have had less reason to concern themselves with rules of preclusion than a modern Congress would. Nevertheless, in 1871 res judicata and collateral estoppel could certainly have applied in federal suits following state-court litigation between the same parties or their privies, and nothing in the language of § 1983 remotely expresses any congressional intent to contravene the common-law rules of preclusion or to repeal the express statutory requirements of the predecessor of 28 U.S.C. § 1738 * * *. Section 1983 creates a new federal cause of action. It says nothing about the preclusive effect of state-court judgments.

1368

Moreover, the legislative history of § 1983 does not in any clear way suggest that Congress intended to repeal or restrict the traditional doctrines of preclusion. The main goal of the Act was to override the corrupting influence of the Ku Klux Klan and its sympathizers on the governments and law enforcement agencies of the Southern States, see Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167, 174, 81 S.Ct. 473, 477, 5 L.Ed.2d 492, and of course the debates show that one strong motive behind its enactment was grave congressional concern that the state courts had been deficient in protecting federal rights * * *. But in the context of the legislative history as a whole, this congressional concern lends only the most equivocal support to any argument that, in cases where the state courts have recognized the constitutional claims asserted and provided fair procedures for determining them, Congress intended to override § 1738 or the common-law rules of collateral estoppel and res judicata. Since repeals by implication are disfavored, * * * much clearer support than this would be required to hold that § 1738 and the traditional rules of preclusion are not applicable to § 1983 suits.

As the Court has understood the history of the legislation, Congress realized that in enacting § 1983 it was altering the balance of judicial power between the state and federal courts. * * * But in doing so, Congress was adding to the jurisdiction of the federal courts, not subtracting from that of the state courts. * * * The debates contain several references to the concurrent jurisdiction of the state courts over federal questions, and numerous suggestions that the state courts would retain their established jurisdiction so that they could, when the then current political passions abated, demonstrate a new sensitivity to federal rights.

To the extent that it did intend to change the balance of power over federal questions between the state and federal courts, the 42d Congress was acting in a way thoroughly consistent with the doctrines of preclusion. In reviewing the legislative history of § 1983 * * * the Court inferred that Congress had intended a federal remedy in three circumstances: where state substantive law was facially unconstitutional, where state procedural law was inadequate to allow full litigation of a constitutional claim, and where state procedural law, though adequate in theory, was inadequate in practice. * * * In short, the federal courts could step in where the state courts were unable or unwilling to protect federal rights. * * * This understanding of § 1983 might well support an exception to res judicata and collateral estoppel where state law did not provide fair procedures for the litigation of constitutional claims, or where a state court failed to even acknowledge the existence of the constitutional principle on which a litigant based his claim. Such an exception, however, would be essentially the same as the important general limit on rules of preclusion that already exists: Collateral estoppel does not apply where the party against whom an earlier court decision is asserted did not have a full and fair opportunity to litigate the claim or issue decided by the first court. * * * But the Court’s view of § 1983 in Monroe lends no strength to any argument that Congress intended to allow relitigation of federal issues decided after a full and fair hearing in a state court simply because the state court’s decision may have been erroneous.

1369

* * *

The actual basis of the Court of Appeals’ holding appears to be a generally framed principle that every person asserting a federal right is entitled to one unencumbered opportunity to litigate that right in a federal district court, regardless of the legal posture in which the federal claim arises. But the authority for this principle is difficult to discern. It cannot lie in the Constitution, which makes no such guarantee, but leaves the scope of the jurisdiction of the federal district courts to the wisdom of Congress. And no such authority is to be found in § 1983 itself. For reasons already discussed at length, nothing in the language or legislative history of § 1983 proves any congressional intent to deny binding effect to a state-court judgment or decision when the state court, acting within its proper jurisdiction, has given the parties a full and fair opportunity to litigate federal claims, and thereby has shown itself willing and able to protect federal rights. And nothing in the legislative history of § 1983 reveals any purpose to afford less deference to judgments in state criminal proceedings than to those in state civil proceedings. There is, in short, no reason to believe that Congress intended to provide a person claiming a federal right an unrestricted opportunity to relitigate an issue already decided in state court simply because the issue arose in a state proceeding in which he would rather not have been engaged at all.

* * *

The only other conceivable basis for finding a universal right to litigate a federal claim in a federal district court is hardly a legal basis at all, but rather a general distrust of the capacity of the state courts to render correct decisions on constitutional issues. * * *

The Court of Appeals erred in holding that McCurry’s inability to obtain federal habeas corpus relief upon his Fourth Amendment claim renders the doctrine of collateral estoppel inapplicable to his § 1983 suit. Accordingly, the judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded to the Court of Appeals for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

JUSTICE BLACKMUN, with whom JUSTICE BRENNAN and JUSTICE MARSHALL join, dissenting.

* * *

1370

The following factors persuade me to conclude that this respondent should not be precluded from asserting his claim in federal court. First, at the time § 1983 was passed, a nonparty’s ability, as a practical matter, to invoke collateral estoppel was nonexistent. One could not preclude an opponent from relitigating an issue in a new cause of action, though that issue had been determined conclusively in a prior proceeding, unless there was “mutuality.” Additionally, the definitions of “cause of action” and “issue” were narrow. As a result, and obviously, no preclusive effect could arise out of a criminal proceeding that would affect subsequent civil litigation. Thus, the 42d Congress could not have anticipated or approved that a criminal defendant, tried and convicted in state court, would be precluded from raising against police officers a constitutional claim arising out of his arrest.

Also, the process of deciding in a state criminal trial whether to exclude or admit evidence is not at all the equivalent of a § 1983 proceeding. The remedy sought in the latter is utterly different. In bringing the civil suit the criminal defendant does not seek to challenge his conviction collaterally. At most, he wins damages. In contrast, the exclusion of evidence may prevent a criminal conviction. A trial court, faced with the decision whether to exclude relevant evidence, confronts institutional pressures that may cause it to give a different shape to the Fourth Amendment right from what would result in civil litigation of a damages claim. Also, the issue whether to exclude evidence is subsidiary to the purpose of a criminal trial, which is to determine the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and a trial court, at least subconsciously, must weigh the potential damage to the truth-seeking process caused by excluding relevant evidence. * * *

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The logic of Allen was soon extended by the Supreme Court. In MIGRA v. WARREN CITY SCHOOL DISTRICT BOARD OF EDUCATION, 465 U.S. 75, 104 S.Ct. 892, 79 L.Ed.2d 56 (1984), the Court found that a prior state court adjudication precluded plaintiff's subsequent federal civil rights action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 because she could have, but did not, raise her constitutional claims in the prior action. Justice Blackmun, who dissented in Allen, wrote for the Court:

Petitioner suggests that to give state-court judgments full issue preclusive effect but not claim preclusive effect would enable litigants to bring their state claims in state court and their federal claims in federal court, thereby taking advantage of the relative expertise of both forums. Although such a division may seem attractive from a plaintiff's perspective, it is not the system established by § 1738. That statute embodies the view that it is more important to give full faith and credit to state-court judgments than to ensure separate forums for federal and state claims. This reflects a variety of concerns, including notions of comity, the need to prevent vexatious litigation, and a desire to conserve judicial resources.

1371

In the present litigation, petitioner does not claim that the state court would not have adjudicated her federal claims had she presented them in her original suit in state court. Alternatively, petitioner could have obtained a federal forum for her federal claim by litigating it first in a federal court. Section 1983, however, does not override state preclusion law and guarantee petitioner a right to proceed to judgment in state court on her state claims and then turn to federal court for adjudication of her federal claims. We hold, therefore, that petitioner's state-court judgment in this litigation has the same claim preclusive effect in federal court that the judgment would have in the Ohio state courts.

Id. at 84, 104 S.Ct. at 898, 79 L.Ed.2d at 64.

2. In MARRESE v. AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ORTHOPAEDIC SURGEONS, 470 U.S. 373, 105 S.Ct. 1327, 84 L.Ed.2d 274 (1985), a case arising under the Sherman Act, Justice O'Connor set forth a two-step approach for determining the preclusive effect of a state court judgment in a subsequent suit over which federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction. First, applying the Full Faith and Credit Statute, the federal court must determine whether state claim preclusion law would preclude the federal suit. If not, there is no preclusion. If the state would bar the federal action, then, as a second step, the federal court must determine whether the relevant federal law contains an implied or explicit exception to 28 U.S.C. § 1738. The Marrese Court remanded the case before it for a determination of how Illinois would have treated the second lawsuit, thereby avoiding the issue of whether the Sherman Act creates an exception to 28 U.S.C. § 1738.

In most cases Marrese will prevent preclusion. This is so because virtually every state follows the "prior jurisdictional competency" rule, which prohibits preclusion of a claim beyond the rendering court's jurisdiction. Since state courts cannot hear cases when the federal court's jurisdiction is exclusive, the prior jurisdictional competency rule would prevent a state court from precluding such cases; Marrese prohibits federal courts from precluding claims that would not be precluded under state rules.

Marrese does raise the possibility, however, of the application of state issue preclusion rules whenever a congressional grant of exclusive jurisdiction is deemed not to imply an exception to 28 U.S.C. § 1738. The application of state rules of issue preclusion often will effectively eliminate the federal action. See Murphy v. Gallagher, 761 F.2d 878 (2d Cir. 1985) (state rules of issue preclusion apply in later federal securities fraud action, over which federal court has exclusive jurisdiction, even though the result is to dispose of entire federal action). The Supreme Court has since applied the Marrese test in Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Epstein, 516 U.S. 367, 116 S.Ct. 873, 134 L.Ed.2d 6 (1996), involving a judgment of a Delaware state court settling a shareholder class action. Justice Thomas held that under Section 1738, the Delaware judgment was entitled to Full Faith and Credit even though it settled state law claims as well as federal securities claims that could not have been litigated in state court because they were within the exclusive subject-matter jurisdiction of the federal courts. Writing separately, Justice Ginsburg dissented in part on the ground that the denial of an opportunity to raise exclusively federal issues raised due process concerns. For an analysis of Matsushita's effects on state court settlements encompassing exclusively federal claims, see Kahan & Silberman, Matsushita and Beyond: The Role of State Courts in Class Actions Involving Exclusive Federal Claims, 1996 Sup.Ct.Rev. 219.

1372

3. In KREMER v. CHEMICAL CONSTRUCTION CORP., 456 U.S. 461, 102 S.Ct. 1883, 72 L.Ed.2d 262 (1982), the Court held that, although plaintiff initially could have sued in federal court on an employment discrimination claim, once he had opted to appeal a state agency determination of an employment discrimination charge in state court, he was subject to the usual rules of preclusion. Having litigated in state court, he could relitigate the issues in federal court only if there was reason to doubt the quality, extensiveness, or fairness of the procedures followed in the state court action. Justice Blackmun, in dissent, argued that the nature of the state court review was different from the review that a federal district court would give the action. The standard of review in state court was whether the state agency's determination was arbitrary; a federal court would have engaged in a full adjudication on the merits of the employment-discrimination claim.

3.FEDERAL-STATE PRECLUSION

Must a state court grant preclusive effect to a prior federal court judgment? The general requirement that federal judgments be given Full Faith and Credit in state courts never has been challenged seriously, even though the constitutional clause by its text does not apply to the situation, and even though most courts agree that Section 1738 is inapplicable as well. Commentators invoke various provisions of the Constitution (including the Supremacy Clause and the “case or controversy” doctrine of Article III) to support binding state courts to federal court judgments.

The conclusion that state courts are obliged to grant preclusive effect to federal court judgments does not determine which rules of preclusion the state should apply. There is almost universal agreement that federal preclusion rules usually apply in a state court when the prior federal-court judgment involved a federal question. Should federal preclusion rules define the effect of a prior federal judgment deciding state-law claims? Arguably, the Erie doctrine, p. 445, supra, requires the court to treat a prior federal determination of the claim in the same way that it would treat a prior state determination of the claim; under Section 1738, that would mean the application of the preclusion rules of the state in which the rendering federal court sits.

1373

The Restatement of Judgments adopted the position that, although federal law ultimately must control the choice of preclusion rules, federal law should mandate the application of state rules when those rules are important to the effectuation of substantive state policies. Restatement (Second), Judgments § 87 (1982). See also 18B Wright, Miller & Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure §§ 4468, 4472 (2d ed.).

SEMTEK INTERNATIONAL INC. v. LOCKHEED MARTIN CORP.
Supreme Court of the United States, 2001.
531 U.S. 497, 121 S.Ct. 1021, 149 L.Ed.2d 32.

Certiorari to the Court of Special Appeals of Maryland.

JUSTICE SCALIA delivered the opinion for a unanimous Court.

[Petitioner sued respondent in a California state court, alleging breach of contract and various business torts. After removal to the United States District Court for the Central District of California on the basis of diversity of citizenship, the action was dismissed “on the merits and with prejudice” because it was barred by California’s two-year statute of limitations. The Ninth Circuit affirmed. Petitioner also brought suit against respondent in the Circuit Court for Baltimore City, Maryland, alleging the same causes of action, which were not time barred under Maryland’s three-year statute of limitations. Respondent asked the California federal court to enjoin this action; it also removed the Maryland state court action on federal question grounds (diversity grounds were not available because Lockheed “is a Maryland citizen”). The California federal court denied the requested relief, and the Maryland federal court remanded the case to state court because the federal question arose only by way of defense. The Maryland state court granted Lockheed’s motion to dismiss on the ground of res judicata. Petitioner appealed the Maryland trial court’s order of dismissal to the Maryland Court of Special Appeals. That court affirmed, holding that, regardless of whether California would have accorded claim preclusive effect to a statute of limitations dismissal by one of its own courts, the dismissal by the California federal court barred the Maryland complaint since the res judicata effect of federal diversity judgments is prescribed by federal law, under which the earlier dismissal was “on the merits” and claim preclusive. The Maryland Court of Appeals declined to review the case.]

* * *

II

Petitioner contends that the outcome of this case is controlled by Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 21 Wall. 130, 135 (1874), which held that the res judicata effect of a federal diversity judgment “is such as would belong to judgments of the State courts rendered under similar circumstances,” and may not be accorded any “higher sanctity or effect.” Since, petitioner argues, the dismissal of an action on statute-of-limitations grounds by a California state court would not be claim preclusive, it follows that the similar dismissal of this diversity action by the California federal court cannot by claim preclusive. While we agree that this would be the result demanded by Dupasseur, the case is not dispositive because it was decided under the Conformity Act of 1872, 17 Stat. 196, which required federal courts to apply the procedural law of the forum State in nonequity cases.

1374

Respondent, for its part, contends that the outcome of this case is controlled by Federal Rule * * * 41(b), which provides as follows:

* * * Unless the court in its order for dismissal otherwise specifies, a dismissal under this subdivision and any dismissal not provided for in this rule, other than a dismissal for lack of jurisdiction, for improper venue, or for failure to join a party under Rule 19, operates as an adjudication upon the merits.

Since the dismissal here did not “otherwise specify” (indeed, it specifically stated that it was “on the merits”), and did not pertain to the excepted subjects of jurisdiction, venue, or joinder, it follows, respondent contends, that the dismissal “is entitled to claim preclusive effect.”⁵ * * * Implicit in this reasoning is the unstated minor premise that all judgments denominated “on the merits” are entitled to claim-preclusive effect. That premise is not necessarily valid. The original connotation of an “on the merits” adjudication is one that actually “pass[es] directly on the substance of [a particular] claim” before the court. Restatement § 19, Comment a, at 161. That connotation remains common to every jurisdiction of which we are aware. See ibid. * * * And it is, we think, the meaning intended in those many statements to the effect that a judgment “on the merits” triggers the doctrine of res judicata or claim preclusion. * * *

But over the years the meaning of the term “judgment on the merits” “has gradually undergone change,” R. Marcus, M. Redish, & E. Sherman, Civil Procedure: A Modern Approach 1140–1141 (3d ed. 2000), and it has come to be applied to some judgments (such as the one involved here) that do not pass upon the substantive merits of a claim and hence do not (in many jurisdictions) entail claim-preclusive effect. * * * That is why the Restatement of Judgments has abandoned the use of the term—“because of its possibly misleading connotations,” Restatement § 19, Comment a, at 161.

In short, it is no longer true that a judgment “on the merits” is necessarily a judgment entitled to claim-preclusive effect; and there are a number of reasons for believing that the phrase “adjudication upon the merits” does not bear that meaning in Rule 41(b). To begin with, Rule 41(b) sets forth nothing more than a default rule for determining the import of a dismissal (a dismissal is “upon the merits,” with the three stated exceptions, unless the court “otherwise specifies”). This would be a highly peculiar context in which to announce a federally prescribed rule on the complex question of claim preclusion, saying in effect, “All federal dismissals (with three specified exceptions) preclude suit elsewhere, unless the court otherwise specifies.”

1375

And even apart from the purely default character of Rule 41(b), it would be peculiar to find a rule governing the effect that must be accorded federal judgments by other courts ensconced in rules governing the internal procedures of the rendering court itself. Indeed, such a rule would arguably violate the jurisdictional limitation of the Rules Enabling Act: that the Rules “shall not abridge, enlarge or modify any substantive right” * * *. In the present case, for example, if California law left petitioner free to sue on this claim in Maryland even after the California statute of limitations had expired, the federal court’s extinguishment of that right (through Rule 41(b)’s mandated claim-preclusive effect of its judgment) would seem to violate this limitation.

Moreover, as so interpreted, the rule would in many cases violate the federalism principle of Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins * * * [p. 445, supra] by engendering “ ‘substantial’ variations [in outcomes] between state and federal litigation” which would “likely . . . influence the choice of a forum,” Hanna v. Plumer * * * [p. 468, supra]. With regard to the claim-preclusion issue involved in the present case, for example, the traditional rule is that expiration of the applicable statute of limitations merely bars the remedy and does not extinguish the substantive right, so that dismissal on that ground does not have claim-preclusive effect in other jurisdictions with longer, unexpired limitation periods. * * * Out-of-state defendants sued on stale claims in California and in other States adhering to this traditional rule would systematically remove state-law suits brought against them to federal court—where, unless otherwise specified, a statute-of-limitations dismissal would bar suit everywhere.

Finally, if Rule 41(b) did mean what respondent suggests, we would surely have relied upon it in our cases recognizing the claim-preclusive effect of federal judgments in federal-question cases. Yet for over half a century since the promulgation of Rule 41(b), we have not once done so. * * *

We think the key to a more reasonable interpretation of the meaning of “operates as an adjudication upon the merits” in Rule 41(b) is to be found in Rule 41(a), which, in discussing the effect of voluntary dismissal by the plaintiff, makes clear that an “adjudication upon the merits” is the opposite of a “dismissal without prejudice” * * *. * * * The primary meaning of “dismissal without prejudice,” we think, is dismissal without barring the defendant from returning later, to the same court, with the same underlying claim. That will also ordinarily (though not always) have the consequence of not barring the claim from other courts, but its primary meaning relates to the dismissing court itself. Thus, Black’s Law Dictionary (7th ed. 1999) defines “dismissed without prejudice” as “removed from the court’s docket in such a way that the plaintiff may refile the same suit on the same claim,” * * * and defines “dismissal without prejudice” as “[a] dismissal that does not bar the plaintiff from refiling the lawsuit within the applicable limitations period,” ibid.

1376

We think, then, that the effect of the “adjudication upon the merits” default provision of Rule 41(b)—and, presumably, of the explicit order in the present case that used the language of that default provision—is simply that, unlike a dismissal “without prejudice,” the dismissal in the present case barred refiling of the same claim in the United States District Court for the Central District of California. That is undoubtedly a necessary condition, but it is not a sufficient one, for claim-preclusive effect in other courts.

III

Having concluded that the claim-preclusive effect, in Maryland, of this California federal diversity judgment is dictated neither by Dupasseur v. Rochereau, as petitioner contends, nor by Rule 41(b), as respondent contends, we turn to consideration of what determines the issue. Neither the Full Faith and Credit Clause * * * [and] no other federal textual provision, neither of the Constitution nor of any statute, addresses the claim-preclusive effect of a judgment in a federal diversity action.

It is also true, however, that no federal textual provision addresses the claim-preclusive effect of a federal-court judgment in a federal-question case, yet we have long held that States cannot give those judgments merely whatever effect they would give their own judgments, but must accord them the effect that this Court prescribes. * * * The reasoning of that line of cases suggests, moreover, that even when States are allowed to give federal judgments * * * no more than the effect accorded to state judgments, that disposition is by direction of this Court, which has the last word on the claim-preclusive effect of all federal judgments * * *. In other words, in Dupasseur the State was allowed (indeed, required) to give a federal diversity judgment no more effect than it would accord one of its own judgments only because reference to state law was the federal rule that this Court deemed appropriate. In short, federal common law governs the claim-preclusive effect of a dismissal by a federal court sitting in diversity. * * *

It is left to us, then, to determine the appropriate federal rule. And despite the sea change that has occurred in the background law since Dupasseur was decided * * * we think the result decreed by Dupasseur continues to be correct for diversity cases. Since state, rather than federal, substantive law is at issue there is no need for a uniform federal rule. And indeed, nationwide uniformity in the substance of the matter is better served by having the same claim-preclusive rule (the state rule) apply whether the dismissal has been ordered by a state or a federal court. This is, it seems to us, a classic case for adopting, as the federally prescribed rule of decision, the law that would be applied by state courts in the State in which the federal diversity court sits. * * * As we have alluded to above, any other rule would produce the sort of “forum-shopping . . . and . . . inequitable administration of the laws” that Erie seeks to avoid * * * since filing in, or removing to, federal court would be encouraged by the divergent effects that the litigants would anticipate from likely grounds of dismissal. * * *

1377

This federal reference to state law will not obtain, of course, in situations in which the state law is incompatible with federal interests. * * * No such conflict with potential federal interests exists in the present case. Dismissal of this state cause of action was decreed by the California federal court only because the California statute of limitations so required; and there is no conceivable federal interest in giving that time bar more effect in other courts than the California courts themselves would impose.

* * *

Because the claim-preclusive effect of the California federal court’s dismissal “upon the merits” of petitioner’s action on statute-of-limitations grounds is governed by a federal rule that in turn incorporates California’s law of claim preclusion (the content of which we do not pass upon today), the Maryland Court of Special Appeals erred in holding that the dismissal necessarily precluded the bringing of this action in the Maryland courts. The judgment is reversed * * *.

It is so ordered.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The rule in Semtek requires courts to apply federal common law to determine the preclusive effect of an earlier judgment of a federal court that exercised diversity jurisdiction, but the federal common law rule adopts the rule of preclusion of the state in which the federal diversity court sat. Will this rule, as Justice Scalia posits, really reduce forum shopping?.

2. In what circumstances might the Supreme Court conclude that the application of a state preclusion standard is “incompatible” with federal interests?

3. What happens if a state court, in attempting to apply federal preclusion doctrine, makes a mistake? If the parties return to federal court to correct the error, is the federal court nevertheless bound to give effect to the state court judgment? In PARSONS STEEL, INC. v. FIRST ALABAMA BANK, 474 U.S. 518, 106 S.Ct. 768, 88 L.Ed.2d 877 (1986), the Alabama appeals court mistakenly rejected a plea of res judicata that a prior federal judgment barred the state action. The Supreme Court held that as a matter of Full Faith and Credit, the state court’s determination of the res judicata issue was entitled to the same preclusive effect it would have had in the rendering state.

1378

4. If a plaintiff properly brings an action in federal court and fails to include certain related state claims that fall within the court’s supplemental jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367, should that plaintiff be permitted to litigate those claims in a subsequent state action? The Restatement (Second), Judgments § 25, comment e (1982) recommends that preclusion result if the federal court would have exercised jurisdiction over the claims. Yet even assuming that answer is correct, difficult questions remain. How will a court considering such preclusion determine whether the first court would have exercised its discretion in favor of supplemental jurisdiction?

Before the enactment of 28 U.S.C. § 1367, a commentator suggested that when the federal claim is decided after a full trial on the merits, or when it is decided by default judgment, the state claims should be precluded from subsequent litigation. But when the federal claim is dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, improper venue, or failure to join an indispensable party, preclusion should not attach. Similarly, when the federal claim is dismissed for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted, plaintiff should not be precluded from subsequently filing a state suit asserting the state claims. See Note, The Res Judicata Implications of Pendent Jurisdiction, 66 Cornell L.Rev. 608 (1981).

NWOSUN v. GENERAL MILLS RESTAURANTS, INC., 124 F.3d 1255 (10th Cir. 1997), cert. denied, 523 U.S. 1064, 118 S.Ct. 1398, 140 L.Ed.2d 654 (1998), involved a retaliatory discharge action filed in Oklahoma state court against plaintiff’s employer. Plaintiff then filed a race discrimination claim in Oklahoma federal court, challenging his discharge. The federal court granted summary judgment against plaintiff for failure to exhaust his administrative remedies, and the appeals court affirmed. Plaintiff then amended the state court complaint to include the discrimination claim, and defendant removed the action to federal court. The appeals court affirmed the district court’s grant of summary judgment on the ground of res judicata:

Res judicata * * * requires that the party had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the claim in the prior suit. * * * The fairness of the process is determined by examining any procedural limitations, the party’s incentive to fully litigate the claim, and whether effective litigation was limited * * *

When a federal claim is disposed of pretrial, any supplemental state claims are generally dismissed without prejudice. If [plaintiff] had alleged both theories of recovery in Nwosun II, his suit would have been in precisely this posture since the federal claim was disposed of by summary judgment. His state retaliatory discharge claim would therefore have been ripe for dismissal without prejudice. * * * This is a procedural limitation that arguably could have affected Nwosun’s ability to litigate his state claim in Nwosun II.

1379

However, the district court retains the discretion to exercise jurisdiction over the supplemental claim after pretrial adjudication of the federal claim. * * * It would be pure speculation to conclude that the district court would not have exercised its jurisdiction over the state claim had it been brought in the federal action.

One of the main policy considerations underlying res judicata is the interest in bringing litigation to an end. * * * If we were to participate in the speculative gymnastics required to determine whether a federal court would or would not have exercised its supplemental jurisdiction over a state claim never brought, we would be doing disservice to the policy considerations res judicata protects. * * * We are persuaded that uncertainty over whether a federal court would have exercised [pendant] jurisdiction does not justify a conclusion that a plaintiff was denied a full and fair opportunity to litigate a claim. * * *

We have found nothing under the Oklahoma law of res judicata to convince us that Oklahoma would have permitted Mr. Nwosun to proceed with Nwosun I after the same cause of action was dismissed in Nwosun II had these state law claims remained in state court. Since [plaintiff] failed to assert his state retaliatory discharge claim under the federal court’s supplemental jurisdiction in Nwosun II, we conclude the district court correctly held him barred by the doctrine of res judicata from litigation of that claim in Nwosun I.

Id. at 1257–58. What is your response?

5. Semtek decided the appropriate rule of claim preclusion for a judgment rendered by a federal court sitting in diversity. Should the same rule apply to the issue preclusive effect of a diversity judgment? And what rule of preclusion should a diversity court apply to the judgment of a prior diversity court of another state? See CSX Transportation, Inc. v. General Mills, Inc., 846 F.3d 1333 (11th Cir. 2017) (adopting Georgia’s rule denying nonmutual issue preclusion as the federal common law rule for determining the preclusive effects of a prior federal diversity judgment based on Florida law).

4.INTERSYSTEM ADMINISTRATIVE PRECLUSION

The Supreme Court has held that 28 U.S.C. § 1738 is limited in scope to the judgments of courts, and does not apply to the decisions of administrative agencies. Recall the discussion, see p. 1323, Note 1, supra, regarding the quality of administrative determinations and the preclusive effect accorded to factual and legal decisions of administrative agencies. Increasingly, states are moving toward giving preclusive effect within the state court system to the decisions of state administrative agencies. What preclusive effect should a federal court give to the determination of a state administrative agency?

1380

In UNIVERSITY OF TENNESSEE v. ELLIOTT, 478 U.S. 788, 106 S.Ct. 3220, 92 L.Ed.2d 635 (1986), plaintiff was discharged as an employee of the University. He commenced an action in federal court alleging that the discharge was racially motivated and violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and 42 U.S.C. § 1983. While the federal lawsuit was pending, a state administrative law judge found that the discharge was not racially motivated, and the University moved for summary judgment in the federal action on the ground of issue preclusion. The Sixth Circuit denied preclusion on both the Title VII and the Section 1983 claims. The Supreme Court affirmed the ruling as to Title VII and reversed as to Section 1983.

On both points, the Court looked to legislative intent, and found that Title VII showed a clear legislative intent not to accord unreviewed state administrative proceedings preclusive effect on a later-filed Title VII discrimination claim. However, no such intent was present in the history of 42 U.S.C. § 1983; neither was there evidence that Congress “wished to foreclose the adaption of traditional principles of preclusion to such subsequent developments as the burgeoning use of administrative adjudication in the 20th century.” Id. at 797, 106 S.Ct. at 3225, 92 L.Ed.2d at 645. Rather, following the policy developed in Utah Construction & Mining Co., p. 1323, Note 1, supra, and Kremer, p. 1372, Note 3, supra, the Court held that it was appropriate to devise a federal common law rule of preclusion to administrative factfinding, so that when a state administrative agency is acting in a judicial capacity and gives the parties an adequate opportunity to litigate disputed issues of fact, the agency’s fact finding will receive the same preclusive effect as would be accorded in the state’s courts. The Court remanded for a determination of whether the agency provided the litigant the necessary opportunity to be heard.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Once the Supreme Court found, based on legislative intent, that certain claims could not be precluded by state agency findings of fact (Title VII claims) but that others could be precluded (Section 1983 claims), the federal courts were left to decide which federal statutes fell into each category. In ASTORIA FEDERAL SAVINGS & LOAN ASSOCIATION v. SOLIMINO, 501 U.S. 104, 111 S.Ct. 2166, 115 L.Ed.2d 96 (1991), the Supreme Court provided some guidance as to what level of congressional intent is required to defeat the presumption in favor of administrative preclusion. The Court rejected a test that would have required a “clear statement” by Congress, and held that the presumption would apply unless “administrative preclusion would be inconsistent with Congress’ intent in enacting the particular statute.” The “clear statement” test would have provided more certainty to lower courts trying to determine when administrative preclusion should apply. Why then did the Court reject the “clear statement” test in favor of a less certain test that requires congressional intent to be discerned by inference?

1381

2. Elliott addressed the issue preclusive effect accorded unreviewed state administrative determinations under federal common law. Does it also require a federal court to give the same claim preclusive effect to a state administrative agency as would a court of the rendering state? The Eleventh Circuit addressed this issue in GJELLUM v. CITY OF BIRMINGHAM, 829 F.2d 1056 (11th Cir. 1987). Although Migra, p. 1370, Note 1, supra, held that Section 1983 did not create an exception to state claim preclusion laws under the Full Faith and Credit statute, the court in Gjellum saw different interests at stake when the administrative determination was not subject to judicial review:

With respect to the claim preclusive effect of unreviewed state agency rulings, we conclude that the importance of the federal rights at issue, the desirability of avoiding the forcing of litigants to file suit initially in federal court rather than seek relief in an unreviewed administrative proceeding, and the limitations of state agencies as adjudicators of federal rights override the lessened federalism concerns implicated outside the contours of the full faith and credit statute. In addition, claim preclusion, unlike issue preclusion, does not create a risk of inconsistent results in this context after Elliott because claim preclusion seeks to prevent litigation of issues that were not adjudicated before the state agency. We hold therefore that, at least in the context of section 1983 suits, the federal common law of preclusion does not require application of state claim preclusion rules to unreviewed state administrative decisions.

Id. at 1064–65. Assume that a state establishes a Personnel Court to decide employment discrimination disputes. Is the state’s characterization of the decision-maker as judicial dispositive for purposes of 28 U.S.C. § 1738? See McINNES v. CALIFORNIA, 943 F.2d 1088 (9th Cir. 1991), in which the Ninth Circuit explained:

[F]ederal law, not state law, ultimately governs the question of what constitutes a “court” within the meaning of section 1738. Section 1738 is a federal statute, and as such its interpretation is a matter of federal law. Section 1738 requires the federal courts to follow state preclusion law under certain circumstances—for example, when a prior judgment has been rendered by a state court and is sufficiently authenticated—but whether the conditions for preclusion exist is a question of federal law. We look to state law to identify the attributes and functions of an entity, and the state’s characterization of the entity is entitled to some deference, but federal law ultimately determines whether the entity is a court for purposes of section 1738. * * *

1382

The [Personnel Board] certainly enjoys adjudicatory or quasi-judicial powers. However, that the [Board] has these powers does not make it a court. Such powers are common to many administrative agencies, including the New York State Division of Human Rights, the state agency whose decision was at issue in Kremer. * * *

Id. at 1094–95. Does Solimino, p. 1380, Note 1, supra, support or undermine this analysis?

3. In arbitration, the parties agree by contract to be bound by the decision of a third party. It is more informal than judicial adjudication, but uses some adversarial procedures. Arbitration is studied in Chapter 18, infra. Should arbitral determinations be given claim or issue preclusive effect in a judicial proceeding? See Carlisle, Getting a Full Bite of the Apple: When Should the Doctrine of Issue Preclusion Make an Administrative or Arbitral Determination Binding in a Court of Law?, 55 Fordham L.Rev. 63 (1986). Does the answer to the question turn exclusively on the parties’ intent as reflected in their contract, or should the court in its discretion consider the procedural character of the arbitral proceeding and the substantive policies at stake? See Shell, Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel Effects of Commercial Arbitration, 35 UCLA L.Rev. 623 (1988). Should it matter that in some settings (such as employment), arbitration is a mandatory and not a negotiated feature of the commercial relationship? See Kim, Arbitrating Statutory Rights in the Union Setting: Breaking the Collective Interest Problem Without Damaging Labor Relations, 65 U.Chi.L. Rev. 225 (1998).

^aThe rule was changed and the substance now appears in Rule 56(a).

^bThe Court’s description of claim preclusion appears at p. 1260, supra.

^cAll quotations in the excerpt are from: Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 68, Comment e (Tent. Draft No. 4, 1977) [§ 27].

^dIndiana Rule 68: Offer of judgment

* * * An offer not accepted shall be deemed withdrawn and evidence thereof is not admissible except in a proceeding to determine costs. If the judgment finally obtained by the offeree is not more favorable than the offer, the offeree must pay the costs incurred after the making of the offer. The fact that an offer is made but not accepted does not preclude a subsequent offer. * * *

⁹ Here, we are dealing with the reservation of a claim for damages. However, there may be cases where a party desires to reserve an issue or another cause of action. The same rule would apply in those situations.

¹⁰ Indiana Rules of Procedure, Trial Rule 12(B) states, in part:

“ * * * When a motion to dismiss is sustained for failure to state a claim under subdivision (B)(6) of this rule the pleading may be amended once as of right pursuant to Rule 15(A) within ten [10] days after service of notice of the court’s order sustaining the motion and thereafter with permission of the court pursuant to such rule. * * * ”

However, Anderson may not take advantage of this rule by amending the complaint, then arguing it has met the requirements set out by this opinion. Obviously, the claim or issue must be in the complaint at the time the parties reach an agreement or enter a judgment.

² * * * Holmberg recognizes that the question whether she was disabled for purposes of PERS is not the same question as whether she was disabled for purposes of the Alaska Workers’ Compensation Act. * * * Holmberg limits her collateral estoppel claim to the narrower factual question whether she was physically able to work at Risk Management. However, she maintains that the resolution of this factual issue in her favor is tantamount to a finding that she was permanently and totally disabled for purposes of workers’ compensation because the state conceded as much in the AWCB proceeding.

³ Foreexample, the State’s argument that collateral estoppel is not properly invoked between two independent tribunals which have statutory discretion to fashion separate remedies confuses issue preclusion with claim preclusion. * * * AWCB’s authority to fashion a separate remedy is no argument against precluding the relitigation of identical factual issues decided in an earlier PERB proceeding. * * *

³ The position of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is in conflict with that taken by the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Rachal v. Hill, 435 F.2d 59.

⁴ In this context, offensive use of collateral estoppel occurs when the plaintiff seeks to foreclose the defendant from litigating an issue the defendant has previously litigated unsuccessfully in an action with another party. Defensive use occurs when a defendant seeks to prevent a plaintiff from asserting a claim the plaintiff has previously litigated and lost against another defendant.

³¹³ The Restatement (Second) of Judgments (Tent. Draft No. 2, 1975) § 88(3), provides that application of collateral estoppel may be denied if the party asserting it “could have effected joinder in the first action between himself and his present adversary.”

¹⁵ If, for example, the defendant in the first action was forced to defend in an inconvenient forum and therefore was unable to engage in full scale discovery or call witnesses, application of offensive collateral estoppel may be unwarranted. Indeed, differences in available procedures may sometimes justify not allowing a prior judgment to have estoppel effect in a subsequent action even between the same parties, or where defensive estoppel is asserted against a plaintiff who has litigated and lost. The problem of unfairness is particularly acute in cases of offensive estoppel, however, because the defendant against whom estoppel is asserted typically will not have chosen the forum in the first action. See * * * [Restatement (Second) of Judgments (Tentative Draft No. 2, 1975) § 88(2)] and Comment d.

¹⁷ SEC v. Everest Management Corp., 475 F.2d 1236, 1240 (CA2) (“[T]he complicating effect of the additional issues and the additional parties outweighs any advantage of a single disposition of the common issues.”). Moreover, consolidation of a private action with one brought by the SEC without its consent is prohibited by statute. 15 U.S.C. § 78u(g).

¹⁹ It is true, of course, that the petitioners in the present action would be entitled to a jury trial of the issues bearing on whether the proxy statement was materially false and misleading had the SEC action never been brought—a matter to be discussed in Part II of this opinion. But the presence or absence of a jury as factfinder is basically neutral, quite unlike, for example, the necessity of defending the first lawsuit in an inconvenient forum.

²⁴ Much of the delay in jury trials is attributed to the jury selection, voir dire and the charge. See H. Zeisel, H. Kalven, & B. Buchholtz, Delay in the Court 79 (1959). None of these delaying factors will be avoided by today’s decision.

² We have recognized an exception to the general rule when, in certain limited circumstances, a person, although not a party, has his interests adequately represented by someone with the same interests who is a party. See Hansberry v. Lee * * * [p. 804, supra] (“class” or “representative” suits); Fed.Rule Civ.Proc. 23 (same); Montana v. United States * * * [p. 1344, supra] (control of litigation on behalf of one of the parties in the litigation). Additionally, where a special remedial scheme exists expressly foreclosing successive litigation by nonlitigants, as for example in bankruptcy or probate, legal proceedings may terminate preexisting rights if the scheme is otherwise consistent with due process. See * * * Tulsa Professional Collection Services, Inc. * * * [p. 246, Note 4, supra] (nonclaim statute terminating unsubmitted claims against the estate). Neither of these exceptions, however, applies in this case.

¹⁰ * * * A very few courts have suggested that the normal rules of claim preclusion should not apply in § 1983 suits in one peculiar circumstance: Where a § 1983 plaintiff seeks to litigate in federal court a federal issue which he could have raised but did not raise in an earlier state-court suit against the same adverse party. * * * These cases present a narrow question not now before us, and we intimate no view as to whether they were correctly decided.

⁵The quoted language was altered in 2007 without substantive effect.

CHAPTER 18

ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION

This chapter examines alternative dispute resolution (“ADR”), an umbrella term for private decision-making mechanisms that include arbitration, mediation, and negotiation. The use of ADR became widespread after the 1970s in response to perceived defects in litigation and adversarial process. Over the last generation, courts have integrated ADR into their adjudicative procedures, and consumer and employment contracts now routinely mandate ADR should disputes arise. The institutionalization of ADR, including its enforcement by state-sponsored power, has raised concerns about the absence of meaningful consent to its use and the fairness of its procedures. To the extent that ADR does not function as a freely negotiated system of private dispute resolution, critics argue that it should be publicly regulated and not automatically exempt from the requirements of the Due Process Clause, the jury trial right, or other public laws. What new problems, as well as new possibilities, does ADR present for the fair and efficient resolution of disputes?

A. ADR AND THE CRITIQUE OF ADVERSARIAL JUSTICE

ADR is the collective shorthand for a cluster of privately organized practices that offer an alternative to adjudication. When the push for ADR began, proponents argued that the traditional lawsuit had become too expensive and was too emotionally enervating given its reliance on legal formality, procedural regularity, and elite third-party decision-makers. Chief Justice Burger posed the problem in the title of his article, Isn’t There a Better Way?, 68 A.B.A.J. 274 (1982). Later, the Chief Justice bluntly stated that litigation “is too costly, too painful, too destructive, too inefficient for a truly civilized people.” Burger, Remarks at the Midyear Meeting of the American Bar Association (Feb. 13–14, 1984), reprinted in 52 U.S.L.W. 2471 (Feb. 28, 1984). Proponents of ADR responded to this critique by offering innovative procedures for use outside of the court system. See Reynolds, Games, Dystopia, and ADR, 27 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 477 (2012). In this earlier period, ADR was characterized as an informal and inexpensive process that could expedite dispute resolution, enhance relationships, and reduce decision-making costs.

1384

ADR now is understood to offer not a single alternative to court-centered adjudication but rather multiple processes that are practiced in a variety of private as well as public places. See Sternlight, Is Binding Arbitration a Form of ADR?: An Argument That the Term “ADR” Has Begun To Outlive Its Usefulness, 2000 J.Disp.Resol. 97, 99. As one commentator has explained, “The first obstacle to an understanding of the role of ADR is the sheer breadth and diversity of activities to be taken into account, a breathtaking range of approaches and strategies that we lump under the heading of ‘ADR’ (an outmoded acronym that survives as a matter of convenience).” Stipanowich, ADR and the “Vanishing Trial”: The Growth and Impact of “Alternative Dispute Resolution,” 1 J. Empirical Legal Stud. 843, 845 (2004). New terms such as “litigotiation” have been coined for practices that combine elements of ADR and traditional adjudication. Galanter, Worlds of Deals: Using Negotiation to Teach about Legal Process, 34 J. Legal Educ. 268, 268 (1984). In place of the transsubstantive procedure of the federal courts, commentators now speak of the need for “appropriate” (rather than alternative) modes of resolution specific to the dispute. See Sternlight, ADR Is Here: Preliminary Reflections on Where It Fits in a System of Justice, 3 Nev.L.J. 289, 295 (2002–03).

Since the 1970s, ADR has moved outside the commercial and family context and is now a routine and mandatory feature of consumer and employment contracts. See Developments in the Law—The Paths of Civil Litigation, 113 Harv.L.Rev. 1851 (2000). Critics warn that ADR’s increasing use is having negative effects on public life, pointing to elimination of the jury right, dilution of due process, and uninformed, unknowing, or mandated waivers of federal statutory protections. Professor Miller has observed, “Compelled private adjudication essentially is now competing with the public adjudicatory system and replacing access to the courts, the possibility of jury trial, and any process transparency.” Miller, Simplified Pleading, Meaningful Days in Court, and Trials on the Merits: Reflections on the Deformation of Federal Procedure, 88 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 286, 328–29 (2013).

This section introduces the basic forms of ADR and identifies the features that distinguish them from court-based adjudication. As you read these materials, consider whether ADR mechanisms differ qualitatively from adjudication or whether they really are only different points on a procedural spectrum. In particular, focus carefully on these questions:

Who presides over the dispute? Possibilities include: a judge, an officer of the state with professional education in the law; a lawyer with similar professional training; an expert in the field in which the dispute arose with no legal training; a representative of the community; the disputants with the help of a neutral third party; the disputants themselves.

1385

What is the source of the standard for resolution? Possibilities include: rules established by legislatures and courts (“law”); the prior practice of those similarly situated; community values; standards developed by the disputants themselves.

Who speaks for the disputants? Possibilities include: lawyers; persons without professional legal training (including friends, relatives, or neighbors); the disputants themselves.

What is the nature and extent of fact finding and standard-finding? Possibilities include: no factfinding or standard-finding; monopolization of these tasks by a third party; the sharing of these tasks by a third party and the disputants and their representatives; responsibility in the disputants and their representatives alone.

Who decides the dispute? Possibilities include: a third party privately chosen by the disputants; a third party mandated by the state; the parties themselves; the parties through their lawyers.

What remedies are available and awarded? Possibilities include: compensatory damages; punitive damages; group monetary awards; individual equitable relief; company- or industry-wide structural reforms.

What is the binding effect of any resolution? Possibilities include: binding on the parties through coercive sanctions; binding on the parties in an advisory or precatory sense; binding on nonparties; binding on the parties in ways that they decide themselves; binding when enforced through a court’s coercive power.

Who pays for the decision-making process? Possibilities include: taxpayers; industry groups; the claimant; the parties to the dispute; the losing party.

Who can access the process and its decisional results? Possibilities include: the parties; industry groups; the public-at-large; the courts.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1.At the start of the AD R movement, commentators suggested establishing a Dispute Resolution Center that would match disputes to the decision-making mechanism “best suited for the resolution of the particular controversy”:

Take, for example, a case involving a minor assault by one neighbor against another growing out of increasing anger over a trespassing dog.

Presently such a dispute would probably wind up in criminal court because that is the tag society has placed on this type of conflict.

1386

But since the parties really want help in resolving this interpersonal problem, not a determination of whether A struck B, the case might well be sent to mediation, at least in the first instance. Similar treatment might be accorded to a landlord-tenant dispute over the adequacy of the services provided by the landlord. But if the landlord sought to raise questions about the constitutionality of the rent-control law, then obviously that case would have to be sent to the regular court. * * *

Sander, Varieties of Dispute Processing, in The Pound Conference: Perspectives on Justice in the Future 65 (Levin & Wheeler eds. 1979); see also Sander, The Multidoor Courthouse, National Forum, Vol. LXIII, No. 4, Fall 1983. For a criticism of the view that disputes can be resolved by matching them to different processing techniques, see Sarat, The “New Formalism” in Disputing and Dispute Processing, 21 Law & Soc’y Rev. 695 (1987–1988).

2.ADR presumes that private parties should have wide authority to design the procedures and substantive rules that govern their disputes. Is there a danger that a stronger party will impose an unfair process or one-sided rules that work to its advantage? Won’t some private arrangements negatively affect individuals who are not parties to the dispute and have no say in its resolution? See Davis & Hershkoff, Contracting for Procedure, 53 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 507, 513 (2011). Should the public be able to access ADR decisions that involve dangerous products, employers who are sexual predators, or other matters than pertain to health and safety?

B. FORMS OF ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE PROCESS

1.NEGOTIATION

Negotiation is a process that allows the parties to choose both the procedures and standards that will help them reach a settlement of their dispute. Negotiation can take place in a variety of places and can be conceptualized along a temporal continuum. Some cases may reach a settlement before litigation is ever commenced. In this setting, a lawsuit reflects a failed negotiation, and each party, for different reasons, may believe he can achieve better results through a formal, law-based process supervised by an impartial judge. The filing of a lawsuit, however, often precipitates a new round of negotiation, this time under the auspices of the court. In the federal system, a judge may invoke Rule 16 managerial authority to encourage and even to require the disputants to attempt to negotiate a settlement during the pretrial phase of the litigation or once trial has begun. In some settlements, information gained through the discovery process may shift some of the power imbalance that might have existed at the commencement of the suit. Although in the early stages of some disputes the parties may represent themselves, once a lawsuit is commenced it is likely that lawyers will take charge of negotiations; both counsel and a party who has settlement authority will be expected to attend judicially mandated settlement conferences.

1387

Proponents of negotiation cast it as an alternative to the “win-lose” mentality of litigation. Because negotiation is said to focus on the parties’ interests, rather than on their positions, theoretically it creates a procedural space that distances the parties from the problem that divides them and potentially creates a “win-win” situation that maximizes overall gain. See Fisher & Ury, Getting to Yes: Negotiating Agreement Without Giving In 73 (1981). A commentator has explained:

In contrast [to adjudication], the universe and operation of norms in dispute-negotiation is typically open-ended. Thus it is characteristic of dispute-negotiation that when norms collide account is taken of both, although the eventual settlement may reflect an adjustment for relative applicability and weight. Similarly, the parties in dispute-negotiation may accord partial or even full recognition to a norm that is generally deemed subordinate or even legally invalid, so that a negligent plaintiff who has no “right” to prevail in a tort action because of the doctrine of contributory negligence may nevertheless make a favorable settlement by reason of the legally invalid but socially real principle of comparative negligence. Finally, parties to dispute-negotiation can and frequently do take person-oriented norms into account as freely as act-oriented norms.

Eisenberg, Private Ordering Through Negotiation: Dispute-Settlement and Rulemaking, 89 Harv.L.Rev. 637, 644–45 (1976). Studies indicate that the parties’ success in reaching and accepting a negotiated solution turns on perceptions of fairness, as well as on compliance with substantive law. See Hollander-Blumoff & Tyler, Procedural Justice in Negotiation: Procedural Fairness, Outcome Acceptance, and Integrative Potential, 33 L. & Soc. Inq’y 473 (2008). An influential commentary emphasizes that negotiation takes place “in the shadow of the law,” which sets the parameters and terms of an acceptable deal even when the parties do not seek judicial intervention. See Mnookin & Kornhauser, Bargaining in the Shadow of the Law: The Case of Divorce, 88 Yale L.J. 950 (1979).

2.MEDIATION

Mediation is a process that uses a third party as a “go-between” to assist the disputants in reaching a settlement of their differences. Mediation differs from “lawyers only” bargaining sessions in that the mediator functions as a neutral party with no personal interest in the outcome of the case and is not empowered to render a decision. See Tarpley, ADR, Jurisprudence, and Myth, 17 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 113, 116

(2001). The mediator's role is to help the parties find common ground and to identify potential paths to resolution. Proponents underscore the potential of mediation to encourage the parties' self-determination and autonomous decision-making. See Welsh, The Thinning Vision of Self-Determination in Court-Connected Mediation: The Inevitable Price of Institutionalization?, 6 Harv.Negot.L.Rev. 1, 4 (2001).

Mediation lacks any discovery mechanism to force the opposing side to reveal information (for example, about finances) that may be critical to a full and fair evaluation of the dispute. Although the disputants decide themselves the standard for resolution, other values, such as those of the mediator or the community, also come into play. Disputants often but do not always represent themselves; some mediators actively discourage the presence of lawyers and witnesses. Mediation is considered to be most appropriate when the disputants have equal bargaining power, when they engage in the process voluntarily, and when they have a relationship that they believe is important to preserve. In its ideal form, rather than attempting to assess blame for past conduct, mediation focuses on the future and encourages prospective changes in behavior. Mediators come from a variety of backgrounds and often have differing conceptions of their proper role. See Daiker, No J.D. Required: The Critical Role and Contributions of Non-Lawyer Mediators, 24 Rev. Litig. 499 (2005); see also Alberstein, Forms of Mediation and Law: Cultures of Dispute Resolution, 22 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 321 (2007). The mediator might be a former attorney, someone familiar with the norms of a particular industry, someone specially trained as a mediator, or simply a member of the community. Mediators also use a variety of approaches, broadly categorized as facilitative, transformative, and evaluative. Thus, some mediators actively intervene to suggest possible grounds for settlement and to persuade the disputants to settle. If successful, mediation results in a signed agreement that defines the parties' future behavior and may be enforceable in court.

Proponents saw mediation as an appropriate process to resolve disputes between neighbors or family members, and early mediation programs often were located in family courts and "community justice centers." Hensler, Our Courts, Ourselves: How the Alternative Dispute Resolution Movement Is Re-Shaping Our Legal System, 108 Penn St.L.Rev. 165, 172 (2003); see also Brazil, Hosting Mediations as a Representative of the System of Civil Justice, 22 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 227, 237 (2007). Critics questioned whether in practice mediation benefited claimants from subordinated groups, such as women, people of color, consumers, and workers. See Grillo, The Mediation Alternative: Process Dangers for Women, 100 Yale L.J. 1545 (1991). Some research has suggested that once litigation commences, women have a greater preference than men for mediation in the two types of lawsuits studied, "slip and fall" and pay discrimination cases. See Wofford, The Effect of Gender and Relational Distance on Plaintiff Decision Making in the Litigation Process, 51 Law & Soc'y Rev. 966 (2017).

Over time, mediation has emerged in many contexts that seem at odds with the core notion of voluntarism and autonomy. For example, "court-annexed mediation" programs directing the parties to mediation have become entrenched within civil court systems. See Ward, Mandatory Court-Annexed Alternative Dispute Resolution in the United States Federal Courts: Panacea or Pandemic?, 81 St. John's L.Rev. 77 (2007). Proponents of this development argue that it relieves courts of caseload burdens. See Brazil, Should Court-Sponsored ADR Survive?, 21 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 241, 245 (2006). Mediation also has gained wide acceptance in private commercial contexts. See Nolan-Haley, Mediation: The "New Arbitration," 17 Harv. Negot.L.Rev. 61, 68 (2012). According to one report, 96 percent of major corporations utilize mediation for a range of matters including employment and consumer disputes. See Lipsky, How Corporate America Uses Conflict Management: The Evidence from a New Survey of the Fortune 1000, 30 Alternatives to High Cost Litig. 139, 140 (2012); see also Lande, Getting the Faith: Why Business Lawyers and Executives Believe in Mediation, 5 Harv. Negot.L.Rev. 137 (2000). Although some companies mandate mediation, the practice is criticized. See Quek, Mandatory Mediation: An Oxymoron? Examining the Feasibility of Implementing a Court-Mandated Mediation Program, 11 Cardozo J. Conflict Resol. 479 (2010).

3.ARBITRATION

Arbitration is the form of ADR with which the American legal system has had the longest experience. The parties select an arbitrator or arbitrators, who conduct hearings and then reach a decision. The arbitration hearing is an adversarial proceeding, in which each of the parties presents its case, with full opportunity for cross-examination and rebuttal. Lawyers often represent the disputants, and are responsible for gathering and presenting evidence and arguments. Frequently, the decision of the arbitrator, called an "award," is then entered in court, much as a judgment in a formally adjudicated case is entered. In each case, both parties are bound to abide by the award, even though in certain limited circumstances, either or both parties may seek to challenge, modify, or even vacate the award in a court. Arbitration thus is a form of adversarial adjudication that is conducted largely outside the courts.

As a general matter, arbitration is contractual: the parties will either enter a written agreement before a dispute arises to submit the possible dispute to arbitration, or they will enter into an agreement to submit an existing dispute to arbitration. Arbitration achieved widespread acceptance after World War II, having first developed in the commercial area, then moving to the labor-management field, and then extending to industries in which disputants share roughly equal bargaining power, such as securities broker agreements and construction contracts. Federal and state statutes play a significant role in shaping the context in which arbitration occurs. The Federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. §§ 1 et seq., and Article 75 of New York's Civil Practice Law and Rules are the most notable statutes of this type, and both have served as models for other states’ arbitration statutes.

Arbitration’s procedural structure depends largely on the pre-dispositions of the arbitrator conducting a given hearing; the arbitrator is relatively free to shape the hearing as it sees fit and has three broad areas of responsibility: (1) the pre-hearing phase; (2) the hearing; and (3) the award and the opinion (if an opinion is thought necessary). Patterns of practice tend to become associated with particular types of arbitration. For example, commercial arbitrators follow a practice of receiving written briefs; by contrast, labor arbitrators tend to discourage them. Pre-hearing discovery often is limited to what the parties voluntarily disclose, but arbitrators are empowered at the request of either party to subpoena documents and persons for the hearing, and counsel generally can agree on a procedure to review the subpoenaed documents in advance of the hearing. Further, arbitration in the securities industry offers formalized discovery in the pre-hearing phase that permits the parties themselves to serve written requests for information or documents on other parties to the arbitration. The arbitrator is the sole judge of the relevance and materiality of evidence offered and need not conform to the legal rules of evidence. However, some arbitrators believe that at least some compliance with traditional rules of evidence is necessary and beneficial. Because the arbitrator has such broad discretion to choose to admit or exclude evidence or to hear or refuse to hear witnesses, its power to find facts and decide questions of law virtually is unlimited. The final phase of arbitration produces the award. The arbitrator’s award need not contain anything more than a statement of the rights and obligations of the parties to that dispute. However, the parties may request a written statement of decision.

In addition to this standard form, arbitration also may be of the final-form or one-way variety. Final-offer arbitration plays an important role in contexts in which it is important not to interrupt the disputants’ relation. It is used, for example, to set the terms of contracts, rather than to interpret and apply contractual provisions, and has figured prominently in setting the salaries of major league baseball players and some public employees. See Carrell & Bales, Considering Final Offer Arbitration to Resolve Public Sector Impasses in Times of Concession Bargaining, 28 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 1 (2013). Each party proposes a final offer of settlement, and the neutral must choose between the two. The process encourages the parties to be reasonable in the positions they advocate and to engage in serious negotiation. Factfinding can be more limited because the arbitrator need only choose between two positions rather than find and justify one particular result out of many that are possible. In one-way arbitration only one party agrees to be bound.

1391

Arbitration’s presumed flexibility, privacy, and expertise traditionally have made it an attractive alternative for resolving commercial disputes outside of courts. See Stipanowich, Arbitration: The “New Litigation,” 2010 U.Ill.L.Rev. 1, 4. Numerous private organizations have emerged to facilitate use of arbitration, to provide procedural default rules, and to maintain lists of possible arbitrators. The American Arbitration Association is now the preferred arbitration forum for construction and other commercial disputes, while the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority handles a large number of securities disputes. Arbitration has become pervasive in international matters; in that context transnational parties rely on the International Chamber of Commerce or the London Court of International Arbitration to provide a neutral forum. Arbitration also has assumed an important role in resolving disputes that arise out of religious contracts. See Mohammedi, Sharia-Compliant Wills: Principles, Recognition, and Enforcement, 57 N.Y.L.Sch.L.Rev. 259 (2012/2013).

What is distinctive about practice in the United States is the expansion and great growth of arbitration in the consumer and employment settings. See Resnik, The Privatization of Process: Requiem for and Celebration of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure at 75, 162 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1793 (2014). Professor Miller has written:

Many businesses and employers now insist on private dispute resolution with their customers and employees through the widespread use of contractual mandatory arbitration provisions that expressly forbid resort to the courts; many of these provisions also prohibit the use of any form of law and affect a range of consumer, financing, employment, and small business transactions. These activities are engaged in by millions of people. Thus, dispute resolution is being privatized by a process that is invisible, under the control of industry, not constrained by rules of evidence or procedure, and lacks any meaningful judicial or other review.

Miller, What Are Courts For? Have We Forsaken the Procedural Gold Standard?, 78 La.L.Rev. 739, 773 (2018).

4.PRIVATE JUDGING

Disputants who can afford it may utilize private judging in order to avoid the delays of the court system. The disputants agree, after the dispute has arisen and been filed in court, to hire a private judge, often someone who has retired from the public court system. The court then refers the case to that judge. The standard for resolution is the applicable legal principles and the proceedings are conducted in much the same manner as a bench trial, although in an expedited and simplified manner. Unlike an arbitrator’s award, the decision can be appealed as if the court referring it to the private judge had made the decision itself. Thus the disputants can ensure that the resolution will be in accordance with the law, while bypassing the backlog in the trial courts. In California, which served as a model for other states, the process is well established (particularly in family law disputes), and parties may pursue private adjudication before referees or designated “temporary judges.” See Cal. Civ. Proc. Code §§ 638–645 (providing for appointment of referees by agreement of the parties or on the court’s own motion); Cal. Const. art. VI § 21 (providing that “on stipulation of the parties litigant the court may order a cause to be tried by a temporary judge who is a member of the State Bar, sworn and empowered to act until final determination of the cause”).

1392

Unlike a civil trial, the process of private judging can be much faster, and the proceedings generally take place outside the public gaze. As such, although the process protects the privacy of the participants, it fails to generate precedent in the same way as a dispute before a court and lacks the transparency needed for public accountability. Concerns also have been raised whether the process creates “a two-tiered system of justice that benefits the wealthy at the expense of others.” Nagaraj, Comment, The Marriage of Family Law and Private Judging in California, 116 Yale L.J. 1615, 1621 (2007).

5.NEUTRAL FACT FINDING AND OMBUDSPERSONS

Neutral fact finding is a generic term for the use of a third party to gather information relevant to the settlement of a dispute. One of the most common institutional instances of a neutral fact finder is the ombudsperson. An ombudsperson is a third party who receives and investigates complaints aimed at an institution by its constituents, clients, or employees. The ombudsperson may take actions such as bringing an apparent injustice to the attention of high-level officials, advising the complainant of available options and resources, proposing a settlement of the dispute, or proposing systemic changes within the institution. A neutral fact finder often is employed by the institution against which the complaint is made. In government, an ombudsperson can serve the important function of steering a complaint through a tangled bureaucracy.

Ombudspersons are most likely to be hired in closely regulated institutions, fields in which customer satisfaction is critical, and institutions concerned with resolving disputes internally. Universities frequently use ombudspersons to enforce a set of rules that may be different from those applicable to people generally. Some independent ombudspersons are employed by local media and use publicity as their major tool. The disputants are responsible for resolving the dispute, although the ombudsperson can pressure them to settle. The source of the standard for resolution is either internal policy or commonly shared values. The ombudsperson acts as a representative of the complainant, investigating and presenting the facts for her as well as reminding the high-level officials of the policies they have set or the community’s shared values.

1393

6.EARLY NEUTRAL EVALUATION

It has been observed that parties often do not settle at an early stage in the litigation process because they fail to evaluate the case adequately until the trial process requires them to do so. Early neutral evaluation (“ENE”) is a mechanism designed to respond to this problem. ENE involves the factual and legal presentation of a dispute to a neutral selected by the parties or a court. On the basis of this presentation the neutral, often an experienced lawyer, arbitrator, or former judge, provides the parties with an open assessment of their respective positions. This can have the effect of encouraging settlement, but at the very least it should help to focus the issues for the litigation process and assist in its efficient management. Roughly one-third of the district courts are authorized to refer parties to ENE, but it is less clear how often this process is utilized. See Judicial Conference of the United States, Civil Litigation Management Manual 69 (2d ed. 2010).

7.MINI-TRIALS

Similar to early neutral evaluation, but procedurally more complex, the mini-trial is a privately developed method of helping to bring about a negotiated settlement in lieu of protracted litigation. The procedural contours of mini-trials are tailored individually in accordance with the desires of the disputants. A typical mini-trial is a confidential process that entails a period of limited discovery after which attorneys for each side present an abbreviated version of the case before a panel consisting of managers with authority to settle and a neutral advisor. The neutral advisor is often a retired judge or respected lawyer. The managers then enter settlement negotiations.

Thus the parties resolve the dispute aided by the assessment of the neutral advisor as to the likely outcome should the matter go to court. The advisor’s impartial appraisal of the conflict encourages the parties to adopt more realistic goals in negotiating a settlement. The source of the resolution standard is the disputants, despite the presence of the neutral legal advisor. Facts and standards are researched and presented by the disputants’ lawyers, although in an abbreviated way. Mini-trials have been used successfully in disputes that were bogged down in discovery and motion practice by reconverting what had become a lawyer’s problem back into a business problem. See Recent Developments in Alternative Forms of Dispute Resolution, 100 F.R.D. 512 (1984).

1394

8.SUMMARY JURY TRIALS

A summary jury trial is a nonbinding process used for cases ready to be tried before a jury. Instead of presenting a formal case before a full jury panel, the lawyers for the parties present an abbreviated case before a panel of six jurors. The presentations usually last less than a week and the resulting “verdict”—although not binding on the parties—provides a basis for settlement. The practice was introduced in the 1980s and is defended as a useful procedure when the parties hold highly divergent views of the likely outcome of the case and settlement efforts have been futile. See Lambros, The Summary Jury Trial and Other Alternative Methods of Dispute Resolution, 103 F.R.D. 481 (1984). Some states limit the summary jury trial to small claims. See Croley, Summary Jury Trials in Charleston County, South Carolina, 41 Loy.L.A.L.Rev. 1585 (2008). Early critics argued that in practice the procedure yielded little or no cost savings. See Posner, The Summary Jury Trial and Other Alternative Methods of Alternative Dispute Resolution: Some Cautionary Observations, 53 U.Chi.L.Rev. 366 (1986).

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. ADR responds to a number of repeated criticisms of adversarial process as practiced in United States courts: that it is too costly and takes too long; that it cannot work because of litigant inequality; and that it is impersonal and disempowering.

Cost and Delay: Whether an actual litigation crisis exists in the United States remains a contested and unresolved question. Professor Miller has observed “that the supposed litigation crisis is the product of assumption; that reliable empirical data is in short supply; and that data exist that support any proposition.” Miller, The Pretrial Rush to Judgment: Are the “Litigation Explosion,” “Liability Crisis,” and Efficiency Clichés Eroding Our Day in Court and Jury Trial Commitments?, 78 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 982, 996 (2003); see also Reda, The Cost-and-Delay Narrative in Civil Justice Reform: Its Fallacies and Functions, 90 Or.L.Rev. 1085 (2012).

How much delay might be attributable to the rules of procedure, evidence, and appellate review that govern traditional adjudication? Rules of procedure are designed to protect litigants and to enforce the integrity of judicial decision-making. However, they also generate strategic behavior by lawyers depending on the case and client. For certain litigants, delay may produce serious injustice—directly, because justice delayed may be justice denied, and indirectly, because the threat of delay may create an artificial pressure on one of the litigants to settle on less than fair terms. In addition, because delay might increase the cost of litigation, some individuals with meritorious claims may be discouraged from pursuing litigation or find themselves “out litigated” by an opponent with greater resources.

1395

In theory, ADR introduces elements of informality that tend to expedite the process, resulting in faster and cheaper resolution. For example, arbitration’s traditional hallmarks are its limited discovery and motion practice, the arbitrator’s subject-matter expertise, and the finality of the award. Together, these factors provide a streamlined process intended to accelerate resolution. Expedition, however, may produce error or unfairness. Moreover, to the extent ADR adopts adjudicative-like procedures, won’t cost and delay increase too, but without public accountability? See Stipanowich, Arbitration: The “New Litigation,” 2010 U.Ill.L.Rev. 1, 4. Indeed, it is now not unusual for disputants to litigate the results of ADR, challenging such issues as costs, confidentiality, and the size of awards. See Coben & Thompson, Disputing Irony: A Systematic Look at Litigation About Mediation, 11 Harv.Negot.L.Rev. 43 (2006).

Litigant Inequality: Another criticism of the adversarial system is that it does not work properly because disputants are not evenly matched in terms of resources, representation, and information. See Kruse, Learning from Practice: What ADR Needs from a Theory of Justice, 5 Nev.L.J. 389, 390–92 (2004–2005). Adjudication thus is said to contain a structural bias that tilts in favor of some groups more than others. See Nader, Controlling Processes in the Practice of Law: Hierarchy and Pacification in the Movement to Re-Form Dispute Ideology, 9 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 1 (1993).

ADR responds to this problem by attempting to level the playing field and having the parties depend less on counsel and procedural rules. See Edwards, Alternative Dispute Resolution: Panacea or Anathema?, 99 Harv.L.Rev. 668, 671 (1986); see also Kovach, Privatization of Dispute Resolution: In the Spirit of Pound, But Mission Incomplete: Lessons Learned and a Possible Blueprint for the Future, 48 S.Tex.L.Rev. 1003 (2007). However, this cure is a double-edged sword; diluting procedural protection may magnify resource and political disparities between disputants. See Oliver, Jr., Alternate Dispute Resolution and Minorities in the Federal Courts, 39 Cap.U.L.Rev. 805 (2011).

Impersonal Formalism: Litigation builds on a professional model of attorney representation and so tends to remove the parties from direct and personal control of decisions and solutions. Litigation also may polarize the parties, decreasing opportunities for future cooperation and straining the social fabric. This is particularly problematic when disputants have an ongoing relationship, as in the case of neighbors or family members and even in commercial settings. All of these factors may combine in some situations to obstruct disputants from reaching optimal outcomes. Professor Menkel-Meadow explains:

The “culture of adversarialism” and the rules that enforce this culture often (not always) distort how we think about legal and human problem solving by assuming there are only two sides to an issue or question, that “truth” about either what happened factually or what is correct legally can best be resolved by vigorous contestations between two fully armed advocates and decided by a third-party judge who is separate from the parties and appointed by the state. * * * Often, what is most important to parties may be excluded from consideration, as irrelevant or inadmissible, according to our well-worn legal principles, which may protect other important interests (like privileges, trade secrets, bias and prejudice, or constitutional rights).

1396

Menkel-Meadow, The Lawyer as Problem Solver and Third-Party Neutral: Creativity and Non-Partisanship in Lawyering, 72 Temple L.Rev. 785, 788–89 (1999) (citations omitted).

ADR builds on a different conceptual model of dispute resolution that is not dependent on legal formality, attorney representation, or coercive power. See Welsh, Musings on Mediation, Kleenex, and (Smudged) White Hats, 33 U. La Verne L.Rev. 5 (2011). However, does arbitration, which in many respects closely resembles litigation, really solve the problems associated with the impersonal legalism of adjudication? Relatedly, can non-voluntary mediation, in which the mediator speaks for the parties, truly be said to promote personal empowerment? See Harper, Mediator as Peacemaker: The Case for Activist Transformative-Narrative Mediation, 2006 J.Disp.Resol. 595; see also Rack, A Letter to My Successor, 26 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 429, 432 (2011). Can mandatory ADR ever claim to be personal in its focus?

2.The literature on procedural justice, discussed in Chapter 1, p. 5, Note 3, supra, repeatedly has found that participants favor adjudicative procedure because of its perceived fairness and its related capacity to generate satisfaction and trust. See Thibaut & Walker, Procedural Justice (1975). However, procedural preferences also are affected by the size and scale of the dispute. A psychological study of small civil law disputants observed that participants favor processes that offer “control”: “(a) control over the decision such that a neutral third party would help disputants arrive at their own resolution; (b) a process that granted disputants control over the presentation of evidence (rather than using a representative to do so); and (c) either a set of rules that both disputants would have agreed to in advance of the resolution process, or the well-established rules used in a court of law.” See Shestowsky, Procedural Preferences in Alternative Dispute Resolution, 10 Psychol. Pub. Pol’y & L. 211, 233 (2004). What other information might be relevant to ensuring the fairness and accuracy of dispute resolution mechanisms?

3.How might the financial stakes of a dispute affect the parties’ preference for different forms of procedure? In the aftermath of the attack on the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001, Congress created a Victim Compensation Fund (“VCF”) to ensure the payment of damages to individuals who suffered loss. Compensation was conditioned on the claimant’s waiver of damage claims associated with the attack. See Berkowitz, The Problematic Role of the Special Master: Undermining the Legitimacy of the September 11th Compensation Fund, 24 Yale L. & Pol’y Rev. 1, 5–7 (2006). The VCF paid out more than $7.048 billion for about 5,500 claims, and only 95 lawsuits were filed on behalf of 96 claimants. See In re September 11 Litigation, 600 F.Supp.2d 549, 552 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). These lawsuits were judicially managed to secure a mediated, coordinated settlement, and the aggregate amount that was approved by the District Court totaled $500 million. The District Court noted the different reasons for the claimants’ decision to litigate rather than accept a cash payment from the VCF:

1397

Some, the successors of victims with very high incomes or income potential, believed that the Fund would not compensate them adequately in relation to lost income, and filed suits instead. Others filed suits to avoid having to deduct their life insurance recoveries and other collateral source payments * * *. Still others wanted to tell their stories, participate in forcing facts into the public domain, or avail themselves of traditional remedies for other reasons. And some could not free themselves from the shadows and despair of the September 11 tragedy to do anything on a timely basis, even though the Special Master [of the VCF] made special efforts to reach such people and relaxed the Fund’s requirements to accommodate such claimants.

Id. at 561, citing Report of the Mediator on the Mediation and the Settlement Efforts of the Parties in the Cases Previously Docketed Under 21 MC 97. All but three lawsuits settled. See Hadfield, Framing the Choice Between Cash and the Courthouse: Experiences with the 9/11 Victim Compensation Fund, 42 Law & Soc’y Rev. 645 (2008).

C. ADR AND CIVIL LITIGATION

Read Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 16, 54(a), 54(d), and 68 and 28 U.S.C. § 1920 in the Supplement.

1.THE INSTITUTIONALIZATION OF ADR WITHIN THE COURT AND ADMINISTRATIVE SYSTEM

Over the last generation ADR has become an integral and mandatory feature of the public system of courts and agency administration. This development raises new and important questions about the fairness and efficiency of ADR when the parties no longer play a role in its design or voluntarily accede to its use.

An important first step toward the institutionalization of ADR within the court and administrative system occurred with the enactment of the Civil Justice Reform Act of 1990, requiring federal courts to consider ADR mechanisms as a way to reduce litigation expense and delay. 28 U.S.C.

1398

§§ 471 et seq. In 1998, this “invitation” was upgraded to a requirement under the Alternative Dispute Resolution Act, 28 U.S.C. § 651, that federal courts implement ADR programs and mandate participation. See Crowne, The Alternative Dispute Resolution Act of 1998: Implementing a New Paradigm of Justice, 76 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 1768 (2001). Congress also authorized administrative agencies to use alternative means of dispute resolution, and agencies have responded by establishing large-scale ADR programs. See Administrative Dispute Resolution Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 571–83; Marcus & Senger, ADR and the Federal Government: Not Such Strange Bedfellows After All, 66 Mo.L.Rev. 709 (2001). On a parallel track, states incorporated ADR into their judicial systems. See, e.g., Dana, Jr., Court-Connected Alternative Dispute Resolution in Maine, 57 Me.L.Rev. 349 (2005). For a comprehensive assessment of court-annexed ADR, see Shestowsky, Disputants’ Preferences for Court-Connected Dispute Resolution Procedures: Why We Should Care and Why We Know So Little, 23 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 549 (2008).

Court-annexed arbitration builds upon the standard model of arbitration except that the parties have not previously agreed to arbitrate their dispute. Instead, certain disputes, usually those in which the amount in controversy is less than a certain dollar figure, must be referred to an arbitrator before the court will hear them. The arbitrator thus is less likely to have expertise in the subject area in which the conflict arose. Moreover, since the source of the standard for resolution is the law, the arbitrator typically will be a lawyer. The nature and extent of factfinding and standard-finding are not substantially different from adjudication, although discovery may be limited and the rules of evidence may be relaxed. If a disputant is dissatisfied with the arbitrator's decision, he can demand a trial de novo, but if the disputant fails to obtain a better result at trial, he may be required to pay the costs of the opposing party. See Boyarin, Court-Connected ADR—A Time of Crisis, A Time of Change, 95 Marq.L.Rev. 993 (2012).

Some commentators predicted that the institutionalization of ADR would subvert its claim to flexibility, voluntarism, and cooperation. See Menkel-Meadow, Pursuing Settlement in an Adversary Culture: A Tale of Innovation Co-opted or “The Law of ADR,” 19 Fla.St.U.L.Rev. 1 (1990). Others warned that mainstreaming ADR would cause it to become mass-produced, more expensive, and subject to delay, yet remain less protective of litigant rights. See Sabatino, ADR as “Litigation Lite”: Procedural and Evidentiary Norms Embedded Within Alternative Dispute Resolution, 47 Emory L.J. 1289 (1998). See generally Reuben, Public Justice: Toward a State Action Theory of Alternative Dispute Resolution, 85 Calif.L.Rev. 579 (1997).

As the institutionalization of ADR has become more conventional, a persistent criticism is that court-annexed ADR functions as no more than settlement conferences that push disputants to a quick disposition rather than a consensual working out of grievances. See Brown, A Community of Court ADR Programs: How Court-Based ADR Programs Help Each Other Survive and Thrive, 26 Just. Sys.J. 327, 330 (2005). Typical is the following concern:

1399

Those who established court-annexed mandatory mediation programs and those who run them appear to have a very clear agenda—to settle cases. Legislatures that have been persuaded to support such programs have viewed them as a cost-effective way of dealing with rising judicial caseloads. The chief criterion for providing funds has been the number of settlements arranged. * * * When settlement is king, the idea of self-determination is likely to be undercut—the only determination that is acceptable is the one that ends the case.

Landsman, Nothing for Something? Denying Legal Assistance to Those Compelled to Participate in ADR Proceedings, 37 Fordham Urb.L.J. 273, 286–87 (2010).

Proponents of ADR have argued that courts should be more aggressive in adopting streamlined procedures that have proven useful in practice. These techniques include narrowing the scope of discovery and restricting the use of expert submissions. See Welsh, The Current Transitional State of Court-Connected ADR, 95 Marq.L.Rev. 873 (2012). Other analysts have asked, again drawing on the ADR experience, whether courts should use non-uniform procedural rules and, if so, how these rules ought to be designed. See Tidmarsh, Exiting Litigation, 41 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 263, 283 (2010).

It is difficult to assess the effects of court-annexed ADR on litigants, the court system, or ADR. One commentator has referred to the “exodus from and transformation of American civil litigation,” as disputes are shifted from a trial-centered, norm-generating process, to alternatives that emphasize cost reduction, limited or no discovery, and private settlement. See Freer, Exodus from and Transformation of American Civil Litigation, 65 Emory L.J. 1491 (2016). What further legal or political effects do you anticipate if courts increasingly recede from their law-declaring and information-disclosing functions?

2.CHANGING JUDICIAL ATTITUDES TOWARD ADR: THE EXAMPLE OF BINDING ARBITRATION

Congress enacted the Federal Arbitration Act (“FAA”) in 1925 in part to overcome common law hostility to arbitration. Initially, the Supreme Court refused to enforce pre-dispute arbitration agreements when their use would dilute statutory protections. For example, in WILKO v. SWAN, 346 U.S. 427, 74 S.Ct. 182, 98 L.Ed. 168 (1953), the Supreme Court held that the Securities Act of 1933 barred a mandatory arbitration clause that was included in a brokerage margin agreement. The Court explained:

1400

Two policies, not easily reconcilable, are involved in this case. Congress has afforded participants in transactions subject to its legislative power an opportunity generally to secure prompt, economical and adequate solution of controversies through arbitration if the parties are willing to accept less certainty of legally correct adjustment. On the other hand, it has enacted the Securities Act to protect the rights of investors and has forbidden a waiver of any of those rights. Recognizing the advantages that prior agreements for arbitration may provide for the solution of commercial controversies, we decide that the intention of Congress concerning the sale of securities is better carried out by holding invalid such an agreement for arbitration of issues arising under the Act.

Id. at 438, 74 S.Ct. at 188–89, 98 L.Ed. at 177 (citations omitted).

Since then, the Court's approach to arbitration has undergone a radical change with far-reaching social effects. In 1983, in MOSES H. CONE MEMORIAL HOSPITAL v. MERCURY CONSTRUCTION CORP., 460 U.S. 1, 103 S.Ct. 927, 74 L.Ed.2d 765 (1983), the Court held that a district court could adjudicate a petition to compel arbitration even though a state court was considering the claims that the federal plaintiff sought to arbitrate, relying upon a “liberal federal policy favoring arbitration agreements.” Id. at 24, 103 S.Ct. at 941, 74 L.Ed.2d at 785.

After Moses H. Cone, the Court steadily expanded the reach of the FAA. A sea change came in SOUTHLAND CORP. v. KEATING, 465 U.S. 1, 104 S.Ct. 852, 79 L.Ed.2d 1 (1984). Southland involved individual and class actions brought in state court by convenience store franchisees under state law; the trial court ordered arbitration of all claims but the California Supreme Court held that statutory claims were not arbitrable. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the FAA preempted state law and withdrew from the states any power to require a judicial forum for claims that the parties agreed to resolve by arbitration. See Dunham, Southland Corp. v. Keating Revisited: Twenty-Five Years in Which Direction?, 4 Charleston L.Rev. 331, 345 (2010). Then, in RODRIGUEZ DE QUIJAS v. SHEARSON/AMERICAN EXPRESS, 490 U.S. 477, 484, 109 S.Ct. 1917, 1922, 104 L.Ed.2d 526, 536 (1989), the Court, five-to-four, overruled Wilko, holding that it “was incorrectly decided” and at odds with other federal statutes that in the interim had been interpreted to permit pre-dispute agreements to arbitrate.

In keeping with Rodriguez de Quijas, the Court has rejected arguments that other federal statutes displace the FAA’s policy favoring arbitration. In EPIC SYSTEMS CORP. v. LEWIS, 584 U.S. ___, 138 S.Ct.

1401

1612, 200 L.Ed.2d 889 (2018), employees brought wage-and-hour claims against their employers under federal and state law. Although they were bound by pre-dispute arbitration agreements that required individualized arbitration, plaintiffs sought to litigate their claims as collective actions and class actions, relying on § 7 of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), which guarantees to workers the right to engage in “concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.” The Court nevertheless concluded that the NLRA did not overcome the presumption in favor of arbitration because it did “not mention class or collective action procedures or even hint at a clear and manifest wish to displace the Arbitration Act.” Id. at ___, 138 S.Ct. at 1617, 200 L.Ed.2d at 902. The result in Epic Systems is consistent with the Court’s view that the FAA embodies not only a policy in favor of arbitration but in favor of individualized arbitration. In LAMPS PLUS, INC. v. VARELA, 587 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct. 1407, 203 L.Ed.2d 636 (2019), the Court held that an arbitration agreement must have clear, express language permitting class arbitration. In so holding, the Court rejected application of the doctrine of contra proferentem—the contract law principle that an ambiguous contractual provision should be interpreted against the drafter.

The Court currently accords a strong presumption of validity to arbitration agreements, even when the clauses are adhesive, not voluntary, and curtail jury and other public rights. In AT&T MOBILITY v. CONCEPCION, p. 890, supra, the Court held that the FAA preempts state laws that treat class-action waivers as unconscionable. See Gilles & Friedman, After Class: Aggregate Litigation in the Wake of AT&T Mobility v. Concepcion, 79 U.Chi.L.Rev. 623 (2012). Then, in DIRECTV, INC. v. IMBURGIA, 577 U.S. 47, 136 S.Ct. 463, 193 L.Ed.2d 365 (2015), the Court held that an arbitration clause providing it would be invalid if the “law of your state” made its waiver of class-wide arbitration unenforceable, did not include the California law that was valid at the time the contract was entered into, but later was ruled preempted in Concepcion. Justice Thomas dissented, on the view that the FAA “does not require state courts to order arbitration.” Id. at 59, 136 S.Ct. at 471, 193 L.Ed.2d at 375. Justice Ginsburg also dissented, joined by Justice Sotomayor, criticizing the majority as having substituted its judgment for that of the state court in the interpretation of state contract law, for depriving consumers of choice in the laws that govern their arbitration agreements, and for insulating “powerful economic interests from liability.” Id. at 68, 136 S.Ct. 477, 193 L.Ed.2d at 381.

The Supreme Court also upheld a contractual ban on class-wide arbitration in AMERICAN EXPRESS CO. v. ITALIAN COLORS RESTAURANT, 570 U.S. 228, 133 S.Ct. 2304, 186 L.Ed.2d 417 (2013), see p. 893, supra. At issue was an arbitration agreement with a credit card company that barred merchants from bringing a group or collective action against the company. The Court explicitly rejected plaintiffs’ argument that the class-bar was unenforceable because the “cost of individually arbitrating a federal statutory claim exceed[ed] the potential recovery.” Id. at 2307, 186 L.Ed.2d at 422.

1402

In KINDRED NURSING CENTERS LIMITED PARTNERSHIP v. CLARK, 137 S.Ct. 1421, 197 L.Ed.2d 806 (2017), the estates of two nursing home residents sued the nursing home in state court alleging substandard care leading to wrongful death, personal injuries, and violation of the Kentucky Long Term Care Facilities Act. The Kentucky court denied defendant’s motion to dismiss and to compel arbitration. The Kentucky Supreme Court affirmed, holding that under Kentucky law, a power of attorney must include a specific statement that the attorney-in-fact has authority to waive the principal’s state constitutional rights to access the courts and to a jury trial. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Kentucky rule disfavored arbitration agreements and was preempted by the FAA. Id. at 1426, 197 L.Ed.2d at 812. Again, Justice Thomas dissented, emphasizing his view that the FAA does not apply in state court. Id. at 1429, 197 L.Ed.2d at 815.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. Arbitrators do not receive any in-depth professional training or briefing on their task, but they exercise broad discretion in their decision-making. Is there a danger that their method of selection might create a potential for bias, particularly among arbitrators who receive repeat appointments by one company or by one segment of a regulated industry? See Rossein & Hope, Disclosure and Disqualification Standards for Neutral

Arbitrators: How Far to Cast the Net and What Is Sufficient to Vacate Award, 81 St. John's L.Rev. 203 (2007). An empirical study found a perception of pro-industry bias among securities-industry arbitrators, leading customers to "express a consistently negative impression of the overall arbitration process." Gross, When Perception Changes Reality: An Empirical Study of Investors' Views of the Fairness of Securities Arbitration, 2008 J.Disp.Resol. 349, 389. Is there also a danger that informality will permit bias or prejudice to go unchecked? See Delgado, Dunn, Brown, Lee & Hubbert, Fairness and Formality: Minimizing the Risk of Prejudice in Alternative Dispute Resolution, 1985 Wis.L. Rev. 1359.

2. Arbitration decisions need not be based on statute or common law. For this reason some commentators view arbitration as "lawless." Black & Gross, Making It Up As They Go Along: The Role of Law in Securities Arbitration, 23 Cardozo L.Rev. 991 (2002). Does that view fairly account for the important autonomy interests arguably promoted by arbitration? In recent years it has become common practice for arbitral parties to circulate arbitration awards and decisions, and forms of nonbinding precedent have emerged. See Weidemaier, Toward a Theory of Precedent in Arbitration, 51 Wm. & Mary L.Rev. 1895 (2010); see also Weidemaier, Judging-Lite: How

1403

Arbitrators Use and Create Precedent, 90 N.C.L.Rev. 1091 (2012). Might the diversion of disputes to arbitration proceedings make it more difficult for the courts to create precedent in important fields of law? See Scodro, Note—Arbitrating Novel Legal Questions: A Recommendation for Reform, 105 Yale L.J. 1927 (1996).

3. The expansion of international trade and commercial transactions in the past 50 years has created a need for private international commercial dispute resolution. Many commercial parties are uncomfortable adjudicating disputes in foreign court systems because they are unfamiliar with the procedures and law of foreign forums and fear favoritism to nationals. The demand for mechanisms for private commercial dispute resolution has led to the development of international commercial arbitration rules (such as the International Chamber of Commerce Rules). These are applied in international arbitration centers around the world. Using these accepted rules and forums, private parties are able to arbitrate and resolve their commercial disputes without submitting the dispute to a foreign forum. Enforcement of these arbitration awards can then be sought in court under the Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards (commonly known as the New York Convention), a treaty that has been ratified by most countries, including the United States. Given these resources, why might parties still prefer to resolve their dispute in court? Should an international commercial arbitration decision be enforceable in any forum in the world?

4. Arbitration has spread from disputes between evenly matched corporate entities seeking a private, expeditious, and industry-specific resolution to a wide range of employment and consumer disputes in which its use is mandated by an adhesive term in a boilerplate contract. See Sternlight, Rethinking the Constitutionality of the Supreme Court's Preference for Binding Arbitration: A Fresh Assessment of Jury Trial, Separation of Powers, and Due Process Concerns, 72 Tul.L.Rev. 1 (1997); see also Eisenberg, Miller & Sherwin, Arbitrator's Summer Soldiers: An Empirical Study of Arbitration Clauses in Consumer and Nonconsumer Contracts, 41 U.Mich.J.L. Reform. 871 (2008). The Supreme Court through its interpretation of the Federal Arbitration Act has encouraged this development. See Wasserman, Legal Process in a Box, or What Class Action Waivers Teach Us About Law-Making, 44 Loy.U.Chi.L.J. 391, 399–400 (2012). Critics have warned that in these new contexts arbitration inevitably tilts in favor of the commercial party which, as a repeat player, enjoys strategic advantages. See Ingham, Employment Arbitration: The Repeat Player Effect, 1 Emp. Rts. & Emp. Pol'y J. 189 (1997). For discussions of the "repeat player" critique, see Marrow, Determining If Mandatory Arbitration Is "Fair": Asymmetrically Held Information and the Role of Mandatory Arbitration in Modulating Uninsurable Contract Risks, 54 N.Y.L.Sch.L.Rev. 187 (2010); Kapeliuk, The Repeat Appointment Factor: Exploring Decision Patterns of Elite Investment Arbitrators, 96 Cornell L.Rev. 47 (2010).

Justice Ginsburg, in her dissenting opinion in DIRECTV, p. 1401, supra, pointed out that the United States is an outlier among industrialized democracies in its acceptance of mandatory and adhesive arbitration clauses in consumer contracts:

1404

A 1993 European Union Directive forbids binding consumers to unfair contractual terms, defined as those "not . . . individually negotiated" that "caus[e] a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations . . . to the detriment of the consumer." Coun. Directive 93/13, Art. 3, 1993 O.J. (L. 95) 31. A subsequent EU Recommendation interpreted this Directive to bar enforcement of one-party-dictated mandatory consumer arbitration agreements. Comm'n Recommendation 98/257, 1998 O.J. (L. 115) 34 ("The consumer's recourse to the out-of-court procedure may not be the result of a commitment prior to the materialisation of the dispute, where such commitment has the effect of depriving the consumer of his right to bring an action before the courts for the settlement of the dispute."). As a result of this Directive and Recommendation, disputes between providers and consumers in the EU are arbitrated only when the parties mutually agree to arbitration on a "post-dispute basis." Sternlight, Is the U.S. Out on a Limb? Comparing the U.S. Approach to Mandatory Consumer and Employment Arbitration to That of the Rest of the World, 56 U. Miami L. Rev. 831, 847–848 (2002) (emphasis deleted); see id., at 852 (enforcement of mandatory arbitration clauses in consumer contracts of adhesion "is quite rare, if not nonexistent," outside the United States).

577 U.S. 47, 71, 136 S.Ct. 463, 478, 193 L.Ed.2d 365, 383 (2015). See Resnik, A2J/A2K: Access to Justice, Access to Knowledge, and Economic Inequalities in Open Courts and Arbitrations, 96 N.C.L.Rev. 605 (2018).

5. Because arbitration is private, it remains difficult to obtain information needed to assess disputant satisfaction. Available information has shown an uneven pattern across parties and industries. See Landsman, ADR and the Cost of Compulsion, 57 Stan.L.Rev. 1593 (2005). One study of publicly held companies suggested that although arbitration clauses are common in consumer contracts, sophisticated companies prefer litigation to arbitration when they deal with peers. See Eisenberg & Miller, The Flight from Arbitration: An Empirical Study of Ex Ante Arbitration Clauses in the Contracts of Publicly Held Companies, 56 DePaul L.Rev. 335 (2007). A study commissioned by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Institute for Legal Reform, based on a dataset of approximately 100,000 arbitrations between 2014 and 2020, claims that consumers prevailed more often in arbitration than in comparable court proceedings. See Pham & Donovan, Fairer, Faster, Better II: An Empirical Assessment of Consumer Arbitration (2020). But see Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, Arbitration Study: Report to Congress Pursuant to Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protections Act § 5.1, p.5 (March 2015) (“Because our ability to review substantive outcomes is generally limited to arbitration decisions on the merits, the substantive outcomes of most consumer financial arbitration disputes are unknown and largely unknowable to reviewers.” (emphasis omitted)). A close examination of consumer arbitration data, however, strongly suggests that very few individual consumers file standalone arbitration cases. Resnik, Garlock & Wang, Collective Preclusion and Inaccessible Arbitration: Data, Nondisclosure, and Public Knowledge, 24 Lewis & Clark L.Rev. 611 (2020). Instead, the bulk of consumer arbitration cases appear to be the product of aggregation of claims by “[l]awyers and other entities [that] enable groups of consumers and workers to file individual claims against the same respondents.” Id. at 615.

1405

The Consumer Financial Protection Bureau prepared an extensive report for Congress in 2015 on the prevalence of pre-dispute arbitration clauses in consumer agreements. The report confirmed that tens of millions of consumers use financial products or services that are subject to mandatory arbitration. Surveys of credit card users indicated that these consumers generally were unaware that their contracts included mandatory arbitration clauses and wrongly believed they could sue in court. Moreover, although some agreements—most typically for storefront payday loans—provided a right to pursue a claim in small claims court, consumers generally were unaware of their rights. See Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, Arbitration Study: Report to Congress Pursuant to Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protections Act (March 2015), http://files.consumerfinance.gov/f/201503_cfpb_arbitration-study-report-to-congress-2015.pdf.

6.Critics of arbitration argue that it withholds the protections and benefits of federal law by making enforcement more difficult “by changing rules of evidence, the availability of aggregation, burdens of production and proof, and other features of the dispute resolution process.” See Noll, Regulating Arbitration, 105 Calif.L.Rev. 985, 990 (2017). Professor Miller thus has questioned whether the use of mandatory arbitration for consumer and employment matters subverts regulatory and democratic goals:

[T]he great expansion of contractual limitations on private law enforcement by consumers through the insertion of arbitration clauses into agreements that are often adhesive—and the validation by the Supreme Court of such clauses—may be seen as part of an overall campaign to reduce the effectiveness of federal regulatory law and public enforcement proceedings. These clauses impair citizen access to a judicial forum with the possibility of jury trial. And quite recently the Supreme Court indicated that the availability of the class action in arbitration may be extremely limited, potentially impairing the effectiveness of consumer remedies in various contexts.

Miller, From Conley to Twombly to Iqbal: A Double Play on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 60 Duke L.J. 1, 12–13 (2010).

7.It is not only an arbitrator’s decision on the merits of a dispute that enjoys a high degree of insulation from court scrutiny. The Supreme Court has interpreted the FAA to permit the parties to assign to the arbitrator, rather than the court, the power to decide the threshold question whether a dispute is subject to an arbitration agreement in the first instance. In HENRY SCHEIN, INC. v. ARCHER & WHITE SALES, INC., 586 U.S. ___, 139 S.Ct.

1406

524, 202 L.Ed.2d 480 (2019), the parties entered into a contract requiring arbitration of disputes under or related to the contract, except for actions seeking injunctive relief. Respondent brought suit against petitioner in federal district court alleging violations of federal and state antitrust laws and seeking both money damages and injunctive relief. When petitioner moved to compel arbitration, respondent argued that the case was not subject to the arbitration agreement because respondent sought, in part, injunctive relief. Petitioner argued that the arbitrator, and not the court, should decide whether the dispute was subject to arbitration. The district court, without deciding if the contract called for arbitration of the threshold question, denied arbitration on the ground that the arguments for arbitration were “wholly groundless,” and the Fifth Circuit affirmed. In a unanimous opinion, the Supreme Court vacated the judgment, holding that if a contract delegates to an arbitrator the question whether a dispute is subject to arbitration, the court may not override that delegation, even if it thinks that the argument favoring arbitration is “wholly groundless.” According to the Court, the “wholly groundless” doctrine, which some lower courts had recognized, was inconsistent with the FAA. The Court remanded the case to permit the Fifth Circuit to determine whether the arbitration contract, by its terms, in fact delegated the question of arbitrability to the arbitrator.

Note, however, that parties cannot agree to more expansive judicial review of an arbitrator’s decision than the narrow and deferential post-arbitral review provided under the FAA. In HALL STREET ASSOCIATES, L.L.C. v. MATTEL, INC., 552 U.S. 576, 128 S.Ct. 1396, 170 L.Ed.2d 254 (2008), the Court read the text of the FAA to mean that the statute provides the exclusive grounds for vacating or modifying an arbitral award:

Hall Street is certainly right that the FAA lets parties tailor some, even many * * * features of arbitration by contract, including the way arbitrators are chosen, what their qualifications should be, which issues are arbitrable, along with procedure and choice of substantive law. But to rest this case on the general policy of treating arbitration agreements as enforceable as such would be to beg the question, which is whether the FAA has textual features at odds with enforcing a contract to expand judicial review following the arbitration.

Id. at 586, 128 S.Ct. at 1404, 170 L.Ed.2d at 264.

3.ADR AND THE JUDICIAL PREFERENCE FOR SETTLEMENT

Read Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 68 and the accompanying materials in the Supplement.

In DELTA AIR LINES, INC. v. AUGUST, 450 U.S. 346, 101 S.Ct. 1146, 67 L.Ed.2d 287 (1981), Rosemary August filed suit against Delta Air Lines seeking $20,000 in back pay for violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Delta made a formal settlement offer of $450, which August rejected. At trial, judgment was for Delta and the District Court directed that each party bear its own costs. The court held that Federal Rule 68, which directs that a plaintiff who rejects a formal settlement offer must pay post-offer costs if the “judgment that the offeree finally obtains is not more favorable than the unaccepted offer,” was not applicable since Delta’s offer of $450 was not a reasonable, good faith attempt to settle the case. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed on the same grounds.

The Supreme Court affirmed the result, although it rejected the reasoning of the lower courts. In an opinion written by Justice Stevens, the Court held that Rule 68’s reference to “judgment * * * obtained by the offeree” did not encompass a judgment against the offeree:

Our interpretation of the Rule is consistent with its purpose. The purpose of Rule 68 is to encourage the settlement of litigation. In all litigation, the adverse consequences of potential defeat provide both parties with an incentive to settle in advance of trial. Rule 68 provides an additional inducement to settle in those cases in which there is a strong probability that the plaintiff will obtain a judgment but the amount of recovery is uncertain. Because prevailing plaintiffs presumptively will obtain costs under Rule 54(d), Rule 68 imposes a special burden on the plaintiff to whom a formal settlement offer is made. If a plaintiff rejects a Rule 68 settlement offer, he will lose some of the benefits of victory if his recovery is less than the offer. Because costs are usually assessed against the losing party, liability for costs is a normal incident of defeat. Therefore, a nonsettling plaintiff does not run the risk of suffering additional burdens that do not ordinarily attend a defeat, and Rule 68 would provide little, if any, additional incentive if it were applied when the plaintiff loses.

Defendant argues that Rule 68 does provide such an incentive, because it operates to deprive the district judge of the discretion vested in him by Rule 54(d). According to this reasoning, Rule 68 is mandatory, and a district judge must assess costs against a plaintiff who rejects a settlement offer and then either fails to obtain a judgment or recovers less than the offer. * * *

* * * If, as defendant argues, Rule 68 applies to defeated plaintiffs, any settlement offer, no matter how small, would apparently trigger the operation of the Rule. Thus any defendant, by performing the meaningless act of making a nominal settlement offer, could eliminate the trial judge’s discretion under Rule 54(d). We cannot reasonably conclude that the drafters of the Federal Rules intended on the one hand affirmatively to grant the district judge discretion to deny costs to the prevailing party under Rule 54(d) and then on the other hand to give defendants—and only defendants—the power to take away that discretion by performing a token act. Moreover, if the Rule operated as defendant argues, we cannot conceive of a reason why the drafters would have given only defendants, and not plaintiffs, the power to divest the judge of his Rule 54(d) discretion. * * * When Rule 68 is read literally, however, it is evenhanded in its operation. As we have already noted, it does not apply to judgments in favor of the defendant or to judgments in favor of the plaintiff for an amount greater than the settlement offer. In both of those extreme situations the trial judge retains his Rule 54(d) discretion. * * * Thus unless we assume that the Federal Rules were intended to be biased in favor of defendants, we can conceive of no reason why defendants—and not plaintiffs—should be given an entirely risk-free method of denying trial judges the discretion that Rule 54(d) confers regardless of the outcome of the litigation.

The Court of Appeals, perceiving the anomaly of allowing defendants to control the discretion of district judges by making sham offers, resolved the problem by holding that only reasonable offers trigger the operation of Rule 68. But the plain language of the Rule makes it unnecessary to read a reasonableness requirement into the Rule. * * *

Id. at 352–55, 101 S.Ct. at 1150–52, 67 L.Ed.2d at 292–95.

MAREK v. CHESNY, 473 U.S. 1, 105 S.Ct. 3012, 87 L.Ed.2d 1 (1985), involved three police officers, who, in answering a call on a domestic disturbance, shot and killed Alfred Chesny’s son. Chesny, on his own behalf and as administrator of his son’s estate, filed suit against the officers in federal district court under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and state tort law. Prior to trial, the police officers made a timely offer of settlement of $100,000, expressly including accrued costs and attorney’s fees, but Chesny did not accept the offer. The case went to trial and Chesny was awarded $5,000 on the state-law claim, $52,000 for the Section 1983 violation, and $3,000 in punitive damages. Chesny then filed a request for attorney’s fees under 42 U.S.C. § 1988, which provides that a prevailing party in a Section 1983 action may be awarded attorney’s fees “as part of the costs.” The claimed attorney’s fees included fees for work performed subsequent to the settlement offer. The District Court declined to award these latter fees pursuant to Rule 68. The Court of Appeals reversed, but the Supreme Court agreed with the District Court.

The Court held first that the officers’ offer was valid under Rule 68. As the Court read it, the Rule does not require that a defendant’s offer itemize the respective amounts being tendered for settlement of the underlying substantive claim and for costs. In reaching this result, Chief Justice Burger, writing for the majority, asserted that the drafters’ concern was not so much with the particular components of offers, but with the judgments to be allowed against defendants. Whether or not the offer recites that costs are included or specifies an amount for costs, the offer allows judgment to be entered against defendant both for damages caused by the challenged conduct and for costs. In the Chief Justice’s view, this construction of Rule 68 furthers its objective of encouraging settlements.

He next noted that the drafters of Rule 68 were aware of the various federal statutes that, as an exception to the “American Rule,” authorize an award of attorney’s fees to prevailing parties as part of the costs in particular cases. From this, he concluded that the term “costs” in the Rule was intended to refer to all costs properly awardable under the relevant substantive statute. Thus, when the underlying statute defines “costs” to include attorney’s fees, the fees are to be included as costs for purposes of Rule 68. Since Section 1983 expressly includes attorney’s fees as “costs” available to a prevailing plaintiff in a suit under the statute, those fees are subject to the cost-shifting provision of Rule 68. As Chief Justice Burger saw it, rather than “cutting against the grain” of Section 1983, applying Rule 68 in the context of a Section 1983 action is consistent with Section 1988’s policies and objectives of encouraging plaintiffs to bring meritorious civil rights suits; Rule 68 simply encourages settlements.

Justice Brennan filed a vigorous dissent for himself and Justices Marshall and Blackmun.

NOTES AND QUESTIONS

1. The majority in Marek argued that the effect of Rule 68 is neutral because settlements serve the interest of plaintiffs as well as defendants. However, because the rule is available only to defendants, might its use tend to lower settlement offers? See Miller, An Economic Analysis of Rule 68, 15 J.Legal Stud. 93 (1986); Rowe, Predicting the Effects of Attorney Fee Shifting, 47 Law & Contemp.Probs. 139 (1984).

2. Rule 68 remains underutilized. Why might this be the case? A pair of commentators offers this possible explanation:

Federal Rule 68’s use of the term “offer of judgment” is criticized as off-putting to some litigants. A typical privately negotiated settlement would include a non-admission of liability and likely a confidentiality provision. In contrast, a judgment is considered a formal public declaration of wrongdoing that clients want to avoid for various reasons. Concerns over copycat litigation, adverse publicity, and negative career impact make defendants wary of the offer of judgment. It is suggested that the phrase “offer of settlement” might be more palatable.

1410

Sherman & Fairman, Interplay Between Mediation and Offer of Judgment Rule Sanctions, 26 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 327, 332–34 (2011); see also Bone, “To Encourage Settlement”: Rule 68, Offers of Judgment, and the History of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 102 Nw.U.L.Rev. 1561 (2008).

3.Implicit in the attempt to encourage settlement is an assumption that a negotiated resolution of a dispute is more desirable than that of a judicial disposition. Consider the contrary position of Professor Fiss, who has emphasized the public role of litigation as “an institutional arrangement for using state power to bring a recalcitrant reality closer to our chosen ideals”:

I do not believe that settlement as a generic practice is preferable to judgment or should be institutionalized on a wholesale and indiscriminate basis. It should be treated instead as a highly problematic technique for streamlining dockets. Settlement is for me the civil analogue of plea bargaining: Consent is often coerced; the bargain may be struck by someone without authority; the absence of a trial and judgment renders subsequent judicial involvement troublesome; and although dockets are trimmed, justice may not be done. Like plea bargaining, settlement is a capitulation to the conditions of mass society and should be neither encouraged nor praised.

Fiss, Against Settlement, 93 Yale L.J. 1073, 1075, 1089 (1984) (citations omitted). See Cohen, Revisiting Against Settlement: Some Reflections on Dispute Resolution and Public Values, 78 Fordham L.Rev. 1143 (2009).

4.Settlement terms may be drafted to protect the privacy of the parties to the contract. Retaining the confidentiality of information may be desirable for the parties, but is it desirable for society as a whole? See Macklin, Promoting Settlement, Foregoing the Facts, 14 N.Y.U.Rev.L. & Soc. Change 579 (1986) (stressing the value of judicial factfinding as “a source of tested facts” for use in public policy discussion and planning). Is it appropriate for settlement agreements to block the public from learning about defective products, employment discrimination, and other forms of illegality that reasonably can be expected to cause harm to nonparties? See Levmore & Fagan, Semi-Confidential Settlements in Civil, Criminal, and Sexual Assault Cases, 103 Cornell L.Rev. 311 (2018); Resnik, Uncovering, Disclosing, and Discovering How the Public Dimensions of Court-Based Processes Are at Risk, 81 Chi.-Kent L.Rev. 521 (2006).

5.How does judicial participation in the settlement process affect the judge’s traditional role as decision-maker? Some judges delegate the task of negotiating a settlement to an extrajudicial officer. Other judges may conduct a mediation conference with the goal of settling the dispute. See Brunet, Judicial Mediation and Signaling, 3 Nev.L.Rev. 233 (2002–2003). Is there a danger that judicial mediation will undermine the judge’s ability to be a neutral decision-maker? See Shweder, Judicial Limitations on ADR: The Role and Ethics of Judges Encouraging Settlements, 20 Geo.J.Legal Ethics 51 (2007).

1411

6.In DIAL CO. v. NEWS CO., 317 F.R.D. 426 (S.D.N.Y. 2016), plaintiffs, representing a class of non-retailer consumer packaged-good firms, sought final approval of a $244 million settlement with defendants. The settlement resolved class claims that defendants monopolized the in-store promotion (“ISP”) services market. The agreement provided for distribution of funds to class members, and barred defendants from engaging in future anticompetitive behavior. The agreement also included an ADR clause requiring disputes about the settlement to be submitted to mediation and arbitration. The District Court approved the settlement, but expressed concerns about the ADR provision:

Notably, the Settlement also features structural relief designed to bring transparency to the ISP market and the way retailer contracts are negotiated. This type of relief squarely addresses Plaintiffs’ claims that the length, renewal period, and confidentiality clauses of Defendants’ contracts with retailers created barriers to entry and suppressed prices. While those forms of relief are intended to protect Plaintiffs for at least five years, the ADR clause provides that any dispute arising from the Settlement—including Defendants’ compliance with the structural relief within three years of the final settlement approval—are subject to mediation and arbitration.

In essence, this Court—having supervised this action for four years and becoming intimately familiar with the parties, issues, and facts of this case—must cede its authority to adjudicate any disputes relating to the very issues that gave rise to the action. The ADR clause affords Defendants a non-public forum to litigate any non-compliance with the structural relief. And once the settlement is approved, and the distribution of funds completed, the clarity forged by the adversarial process melts away.

But judicial decisions addressing court-approved class settlement agreements with ADR clauses, let alone rejecting them solely on that basis, are scant. * * *

This Court’s concerns regarding the ADR provision are mitigated by the fact that the Class is comprised of sophisticated businesses far better equipped than the average individual to litigate with Defendants in an opaque arbitral forum should the need arise. Moreover, none of the Class Members, after having adequate time to review the Settlement, objected to its terms. Further, Defendants insisted on adding an arbitration clause, and without it, may not have agreed to the Settlement. (See Sept. 21, 2016 Tr. at 16:6–10 (“Without the arbitration we wouldn’t have a deal.”).) The ADR provision, while not ideal in this Court’s view, represents a “fair proxy” for future disputes.

1412

Id. at 432–33.

D. ASSESSING ADR AND THE ROLE OF CIVIL LITIGATION IN AMERICAN SOCIETY

ADR promises an alternative to the public system of courts that is flexible, participatory, expeditious, and cheaper. Whether ADR succeeds on its own terms remains an open question given limited data about a set of processes that are private and shielded from public scrutiny. See Landsman, ADR and the Cost of Compulsion, 57 Stan.L.Rev. 1593 (2005). Professor Hensler has warned that ADR may have a deleterious effect on democratic norms:

The public spectacle of civil litigation gives life to the “rule of law.” * * * In a democracy where many people are shut out of legislative power either because they are too few in number, or too dispersed to elect representatives, or because they do not have the financial resources to influence legislators, collective litigation in class or other mass form provides an alternative strategy for group action. Private individualized dispute resolution extinguishes the possibility of such collective litigation. Conciliation has much to recommend it. But the visible presence of institutionalized and legitimized conflict, channeled productively, teaches citizens that it is not always better to compromise and accept the status quo because, sometimes, great gains are to be had by peaceful contest.

Hensler, Our Courts, Ourselves: How the Alternative Dispute Resolution Movement Is Re-Shaping Our Legal System, 108 Penn St.L.Rev. 165 (2003). In what ways might a parallel system of private justice affect the operation of the public courts? See Horton, Arbitration as Delegation, 86 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 437 (2011). A noted federal judge has expressed these concerns:

Widespread privatization of dispute resolution has the potential to stunt the common law’s development as entire areas of law are removed from the courts; deprive the public of important information, such as news of a product’s harmful effects; deny plaintiffs the therapeutic benefit of having their “day in court;” degrade constitutional guarantees of the right to a jury trial; and prevent public debate and consensus-building in cases with national public policy implications.

Weinstein, Some Benefits and Risks of Privatization of Justice Through ADR, 11 Ohio St.J. on Disp. Resol. 241, 246 (1996).

1413

Recall the question posed at the outset of this book: “What is the test of a good system of procedure?” See p. 3, supra. What is the relevance of this question to your assessment of ADR?

1415

INDEX

ADMINISTRATIVE LAW
Administrative system, ADR in, 1397 et seq.
Intersystem administrative preclusion, 1379 et seq.

ADMISSIONS
Answering the complaint, 678
Requests to admit, 941 et seq.

ADVERSARY SYSTEM
Generally, 2 et seq.
ADR as response to criticisms of adjudication, 1383 et seq.
 Cost and delay, 1394 et seq.
 Impersonal formalism, 1395 et seq.
 Litigant inequality, 1395
Automatic disclosure, 918 et seq.
Case management system, 987 et seq.

AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSES, 681

AGGREGATE LITIGATION, 794 et seq.
See also Class Actions, Joinder of Claims, and Joinder of Parties

ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION
Generally, 1383 et seq.
ADR and class action waivers, 890
ADR and judicial preference for settlement, 1406 et seq.
ADR as response to criticisms of adjudication, 1383 et seq., 1394 et seq.
Assessment of, 1412 et seq.
Binding arbitration, 1399 et seq.
Changing judicial attitudes toward, 1399 et seq.
Courts, ADR in, 1397 et seq.
Forms, 1386 et seq.
 Arbitration, 1389 et seq.
 Early neutral evaluation, 1393
 Mediation, 1387 et seq.
 Mini-trials, 1393
 Negotiation, 1386 et seq.
 Neutral factfinding, 1392
 Private judging, 1391 et seq.
 Summary jury trials, 1394
 New York Convention, 1403
 “Wholly groundless” doctrine, 1406

AMENDMENTS
Generally, 688 et seq.
Leave to amend “freely given,” 690 et seq.
Relation-back amendments, 694 et seq.
Relation of Rule 15 and Rule 16, 996
Scope of trial court’s discretion to deny, 996 et seq.

AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY
Generally, 318 et seq.
Aggregation of claims, 323 et seq.
Class actions, in, 821 et seq.
Legal certainty standard, 320 et seq.
Means to direct flow of litigation, 300
Supplemental jurisdiction, joined claims, 363 et seq.
Value of non-damages relief, 324 et seq.

ANCILLARY JURISDICTION
 See Supplemental Jurisdiction
Inherent jurisdiction, 379

ANSWER, 678 et seq.

APPEARANCE
Failure to appear at trial, 988 et seq.
General appearance, 234
Limited appearance, 235 et seq.
Special appearance, 234 et seq.

APPELLATE REVIEW
Generally, 68 et seq., 1213 et seq.
Clearly erroneous standard, 1252 et seq.
Departures from final judgment rule, 1219 et seq.
Final judgment rule, 1213 et seq.
First Judiciary Act, 29
From favorable judgment, 1243
Interlocutory request by party, 1227
New York approach, 1218 et seq.
Purpose of, 1217
Record on appeal, 22

Preface

Scope of review, 1242 et seq.
 Factual findings (jury’s), 1248 et seq.
 Factual findings (trial judge’s), 1252 et seq.
 Issues subject to review, 1242 et seq.
Time to appeal, 1240 et seq.
See also U.S. Supreme Court

ARBITRATION

Generally, 1389 et seq.
Binding arbitration, 1399 et seq.
Class action waivers, 871

ARGUMENT

Oral, 22

ASCERTAINING APPLICABLE LAW

Generally, 441 et seq.
Ascertaining content of state law, 518 et seq.
Certification procedure, 482
Interpretive methodology, 521
Klaxon rule, 517
Sources for inquiry, 521

ASSUMPSIT, 574 et seq.

ATTORNEYS AT LAW

Attorney-client privilege, 955 et seq.
Class actions
 Fee awards, 852 et seq.
 Orders appointing class counsel, 844 et seq.
Fees, 6 et seq., 515, 1038, 1408
Sanctions, and Rule 11, 703 et seq.
Sanctions, and Rule 16, 989 et seq.
Sanctions, and Rule 37, 963, 968 et seq.
Work-product immunity, 944 et seq., 955 et seq.

AUTOMATIC DISCLOSURE, 918

BAR AND MERGER, 1270 et seq.

BILL OF DISCOVERY, 45, 578

BILL OF PEACE, 781, 800

BINDING EFFECT OF JUDGMENTS

See Preclusive Effect of Prior Decisions

BURDEN OF PROOF

Generally, 50, 1107 et seq.
Burden of persuasion, 18, 1013 et seq. 1107 et seq.,
Burden of production, 50, 1013, 1107 et seq.
Shifting burdens, 1107 et seq.
Summary judgment burdens, 1013, 1017 et seq.

CAPACITY TO SUE, 717 et seq.

Sue and be sued clauses, 328 et seq.

CASE MANAGEMENT

Generally, 987 et seq.
Case management sanctions, 990 et seq.
Early criticism of, 990
History of, 990 et seq.
Magistrate judges and masters, 1002 et seq.
Operation of, 992 et seq.
Pretrial order, 998 et seq.
State practice, 991 et seq.
Theory and practice, 991 et seq.

CHALLENGING JURISDICTION OVER PARTIES OR PROPERTY

Class action practice, 853
Collateral attack, 235 et seq.
Direct attack, 234 et seq.
Due process concerns, 853

CHALLENGING SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION

Class Action Fairness Act, 385
Collateral attack, 390 et seq.
Direct attack, 387 et seq.
Timing to raise defect, 387

CHOICE OF LAW

See Ascertaining Applicable Law, Erie Doctrine
Class Action Fairness Act and, 517
Jurisdiction and, 128

CHOICE OF LAW CONTRACTUAL PROVISIONS, 127 et seq.

CLAIM AND DEFENSE PRECLUSION

- Generally, 1260 et seq.
- Administrative preclusion, 1323, 1379
- Bar and merger, 1260 et seq.
 - Bar, 1260 et seq.
 - Merger, 1260 et seq.
- Claim preclusion, 1260 et seq.
- Defense preclusion, 1278 et seq.
- Distinguished from issue preclusion, 1260
- Intersystem preclusion, 1356
- Judgment conclusive on parties and their privies, 1260 et seq.
- Quality of judgment requirements, 1311 et seq.
- Rationale for, 1267 et seq.
- Scope of claim preclusion
 - Continuing or renewed conduct, 1277 et seq.
 - Development of tests, 1269
 - Transaction test, 1268 et seq.
- Splitting a claim, 1270 et seq.
 - See also Preclusive Effect of Prior Decisions

CLASS ACTION FAIRNESS ACT

- Aggregate amount in controversy, 307 et seq., 870 et seq.
- Choice of law and, 517
- Diversity of citizenship, 517, 870 et seq.
- Mandatory and discretionary denial of federal jurisdiction, 871
- Removal, 871
- Requirements for coupon settlements, 851 et seq.

CLASS ACTIONS

- Generally, 799 et seq.
- Amount in controversy, 869 et seq.
- Ascertainability, 833
- Attorneys at law
 - Ethical issues, 844 et seq.
 - Fees, 852 et seq.
 - Orders, appointment of counsel, 844
- Carved out claims, 803
- Certification, 810 et seq.
 - Certification order, 833
 - Interlocutory review from certification orders, 846 et seq.
- Due process considerations, 804 et seq.
 - Fair and adequate representation, 804 et seq., 825 et seq.
 - Notice, 839 et seq.
 - Raised by settlements, 850
- Federal prerequisites, 810 et seq.
 - Class and class representative, 810 et seq.
 - Commonality, 813 et seq.
 - Fair and adequate representation, 825 et seq.
 - Impracticability of joinder, 822 et seq.
 - Typicality, 825, 826 et seq.
- Fees and costs
 - Attorney’s fees, 852 et seq.
 - Common fund recovery, 852
 - Cost of notice, 842 et seq.
- “Hybrid” class actions, 801, 831 et seq.
- Initiation of, 810 et seq.
- Interlocutory appeals and, 846
- Issue class, 786, 833, 848
- Mass tort actions
 - Certification historically disfavored, 830 et seq.
 - Settlement classes, 853 et seq.
- NFL concussion suit, 866
- Notice, 839 et seq.
 - Content of notice, 839 et seq.
 - Cost, 842 et seq.
 - Court’s role, 839
- Operation of, 810 et seq.
- Opting out, 827, passim
- Personal jurisdiction, 873 et seq.
- Plaintiffs
 - Absent, 804 et seq.
 - Representative, 804 et seq.
- Preclusive effect of judgment, 886 et seq.
- Pretrial proceedings, orders regulating, 847 et seq.
- Purpose of, 799 et seq.
- Settlement, 850 et seq.
 - Requirements for coupon settlements, 851 et seq.

Preface

Settlement classes, 853 et seq.
Subject-matter jurisdiction, 869 et seq.
Diversity, 306 et seq., 869 et seq.
Federal question, 869
Supplemental jurisdiction, 363 et seq., 870
Trial, orders regulating, 847 et seq.
Types of class actions, 827 et seq.
Damage class actions, 829 et seq., 847 et seq.
Injunctive and declaratory relief, 828
Prejudice class actions, 827 et seq.
Venue, 885
Waivers, 890 et seq.
CLEAN-UP DOCTRINE , 587, 1053 et seq.
COGNOVIT CLAUSES , 251
COLLATERAL ESTOPPEL
See Issue Preclusion and Preclusive Effect of Prior Decisions
COMMON LAW
Federal common law, 525 et seq.
Pleading at, 547 et seq., 603 et seq.
See also Historical Development of Modern Pleading and Procedure COMPLAINT
Generally, 11, 603 et seq.
Detail required under code pleading, 604 et seq.
Facts and details required under FRCP, 608 et seq.
No set of facts, 609 et seq.
Plausibility standard, 621 et seq.
Short and plain statement, 609 et seq.
Motions against complaint
For a more definite statement, 664 et seq.
To dismiss, for failure to state a claim, 670 et seq.
To strike, 664 et seq.
Notice pleading, 612
Plausibility pleading, 621 et seq.
Pleading damages, 658 et seq.
Pleading special matters, 647 et seq.
Prayer for relief, 662 et seq.
State practice, 644
Time permitted for a response to, 664
See also Pleading
CONCURRENT JURISDICTION , 9, 297 et seq.
CONFLICT OF LAWS
See Ascertaining Applicable Law
Relation to class certification, 830
CONSOLIDATION , 794 et seq.
CONSTITUTION
Due process, Ch. 2 & 3 passim
Equal protection and juries, 1100 et seq., 1163 and venue, 399
First Amendment
Appellate review and, 1257
Personal jurisdiction and, 126
Seventh Amendment, Ch. 14 passim
CORPORATIONS
Citizenship of, 312 et seq.
Notice deposition of, 922
“Reasonable particularity” standard, 922
Principal place of business, 96
Service of process on, 262 et seq.

COUNTERCLAIMS
Generally, 724 et seq.
Compulsory and permissive counterclaims, 725 et seq.
Consequence of failing to plead, 732 et seq.
Tests to distinguish, 731
Transaction, definition of, 730 et seq.
History of, 724 et seq.
CROSSCLAIMS , 734 et seq.
CY PRES , 837
DEFAULT JUDGMENT

Preface

Generally, 1041 et seq.
Collateral attack on, for want of personal jurisdiction, 235
Collateral attack on, for want of subject-matter jurisdiction, 390 et seq.
Penalty default, 1045 et seq.
Preclusive effect of, 1295 et seq.
Recovery limitations, 1045

DEMURRER

Generally, 551 et seq., 670
Speaking demurrer, 671
Special demurrer, 558 et seq.

DENIALS

General denials, 679
Improper forms, 679

DEPOSITIONS

Generally, 14 et seq., 921 et seq.
Instructing a deponent not to answer, 923
Non-parties, of, 922 et seq.
Use at trial, 927 et seq.
Written depositions, 925

DIRECTED VERDICT

See Judgment as a Matter of Law

DISCOVERY

Generally, 14 et seq., 897 et seq.
Abuse of, 913, 926 et seq., 973 et seq.
Admissions, requests for, 941 et seq.
Adversarial assumptions and, 897
Anticipation of trial, materials prepared in, 944 et seq.
Attorney-client privilege, 955 et seq.
Automatic disclosure, 918 et seq.
Burden of production weighed against likely benefits, 912 et seq.
Depositions, 921 et seq.
Discovery plan, 915 et seq.
Discretionary limits and proportionality, 897 et seq.
Documents, production of, 929 et seq.
 “Reasonable particularity” standard, 929
Duty of investigation, 927 et seq.
Electronic data, 931 et seq., 978
 Limits and costs, 903, 919 et seq.
 Metadata, 932 et seq.
 Predictive coding, 933
 Sanctions for inadequate preservation of, 975

Equity, availability in, 45, 588
Expedited discovery, 915
Expert information, 965 et seq.
General scope of, 904 et seq.
Insurance coverage, 820
Interrogatories, 926 et seq.
Judicial supervision of, 968 et seq.
Mandatory disclosure, 918 et seq.
Physical and mental examinations, 934 et seq.
Prior to commencing a lawsuit, 898 et seq.
Protective orders, 913 et seq.
Purposes of, 897 et seq.
Relation to motion to dismiss, 898
Relevance, 903 et seq.
Requested discovery, mechanics of, 921 et seq.
Sanctions, 968 et seq.
Supplement responses, duty to, 921 et seq.
Use of discovery at trial, 981 et seq.
Work-product immunity, 955 et seq.

DISMISSAL OF ACTIONS

Generally, 1036 et seq.
Default judgment, 1041 et seq.
Dismissal for failure to prosecute, 1039 et seq.
Motions to dismiss, 670 et seq.
Voluntary dismissal, 1037 et seq.
See also Summary Judgment

DIVERSITY JURISDICTION

Generally, 10, 304 et seq.
Abstention and, 324
Amount in controversy, 307, 318 et seq.
 Aggregation of claims, 323 et seq.
 Class action, 869 et seq.
 Legal certainty standard, 318 et seq.
 Removal and Class Action Fairness Act, 385
Collusive joinder, 317
Determining citizenship, 309 et seq.

- Associations, 312
- Class action, 869 et seq.
- Corporations, 312
- Determining citizenship, 309 et seq.
- Dual citizens, 316
- Natural persons, 311
- Nominal or formal parties, 318 et seq.
- Permanent residents, 315
- Stateless person, 315 et seq.

Divorce proceedings and, 324

Exceptions, judicially created, 324 et seq.

Interpleader and, 307

Rationale for, 304 et seq.

Rule of complete diversity, 309 et seq.

DUE PROCESS

Minimum contacts test, 97 et seq.

Procedural justice, theories of, 4

Requirements for valid judgment, 237

- Opportunity to be heard, 278 et seq.
- Reasonable notice, 237 et seq.

ENFORCEMENT OF JUDGMENTS

Generally, 20 et seq., 1198 et seq.

Child support judgments, 1203 et seq.

Contempt and body execution, 1205 et seq.

Execution, 1198 et seq.

Full faith and credit implications, 1358 et seq.

Garnishment, 1203 et seq.

Liens and priorities, 1210

- “First in time, first in right” rule, 1210
- Writ of execution, 21, 1202, 1210

Rendered by a court in a different

- Country, 1204
- State, 1360 et seq.

Supplementary proceedings, 1204 et seq.

See also Provisional Remedies

EQUITY

Generally, 25 et seq., 579 et seq.

Colonial America, in, 583 et seq.

Discovery, availability in, 588

Merger of law and equity, 589 et seq.

Procedure, in, 584 et seq.

Remedies available in equity and at common law, 586, 1052 et seq.

Right to jury trial, maintenance of law-equity distinction, 1052 et seq.

Rise of Chancery, 579 et seq.

Unique character of equitable relief, 586 et seq.

- Availability of relief, 587
- Remedy for fraud, 588
- Specific relief, 586 et seq.

ERIE DOCTRINE, 445 et seq.

See also Ascertaining Applicable Law

Byrd-balancing test, 462 et seq.

Determining which state’s law governs, 516 et seq.

Erie guess, 521

Federal and state procedural rules, conflict, 466 et seq.

Federal law in state courts, 540 et seq.

Outcome-determinative test, 454 et seq.

Reverse Erie doctrine, 540 et seq.

Rules Enabling Act, 445 et seq., 466 et seq.

Rules of Decision Act, 442 et seq.

State law in federal courts, 442 et seq.

Swift doctrine, 442

EVIDENCE

Newly discovered evidence, relief from judgment for, 1178 et seq.

New trial, verdict against weight of evidence, 1150, 1165 et seq.

Presentation of evidence, 1108 et seq.

- Admissibility problems, 1108
- Examination and cross-examination, 1108 et seq.
- Role of judge in, 1110

Privileged material, 955 et seq.

EXECUTION, 1198 et seq.

EXPERT INFORMATION, 965 et seq.

FEDERAL COMMON LAW

Generally, 525 et seq.

Preface

Admiralty and maritime, 527
Federal common law procedure, 497 et seq.
Federal government contracts and commercial activity, 527 et seq.
International relations, 525
Interstate dispute, 526
Swift doctrine, distinguished, 525
Uniquely federal interest, 533, 539

FEDERAL QUESTION JURISDICTION

Generally, 326 et seq.
Anticipation of defense insufficient, 331 et seq.
Artful pleading, 334, 383
Constitutional “arising under” jurisdiction, 328 et seq.
Creation test, 337 et seq.
Grable inquiry, application of, 347 et seq.
History of, 326
Holmes test, 339
Impact of lack of private cause of action in federal statute, 340 et seq.
Rationale for, 326 et seq.
Significant federal issues implicated, 343 et seq.
Statutory “arising under” jurisdiction, 330 et seq.
“Well-pleaded complaint” rule, 334, 367

FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

Admissions, requests for, 941
Adoption and amendment process, 27 et seq., 600 et seq.
Affirmative defenses, 681
Amendments, 688 et seq.
Automatic disclosure, 918
Case management; pretrial conferences and orders, 987 et seq.
Challenging court’s exercise of jurisdiction over person or property, 234 et seq.
Characteristics of, 600
Class actions, 799 et seq.
Common law procedure, emergence of, 547
Consolidation, 794 et seq.
Counterclaims, 724 et seq.
Crossclaims, 734 et seq.
Default judgment, 1041 et seq.
Demand of trial by jury, 1092 et seq.
Depositions, 921 et seq.
Deterrence of frivolous pleadings, 699 et seq.
Direct attack on a court’s lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, 387 et seq.
Discovery plan, 914 et seq.

Discovery prior to commencing a lawsuit, 898 et seq.
Dismissal of actions, 1036 et seq.
Documents, production of, 929 et seq.
Duty to supplement responses, 921 et seq.
Expert information, 965 et seq.
Findings and conclusions by the court in nonjury cases, 1145 et seq.
Identifying parties who may sue and be sued, 717
Impact on state court procedures, 601
Interpleader, 766 et seq.
Interrogatories, 926 et seq.
Intervention, 786 et seq.
Joinder of claims, 722 et seq.
Joinder of parties, 740 et seq.
Judgment as a matter of law, 1111 et seq.
Judgment on multiple claims or involving multiple parties, 1219 et seq.
Jury instructions, 1128 et seq.
Magistrate judges and masters, 1002 et seq.
Mandatory disclosure, 918 et seq.
Materials prepared in anticipation of trial, 944 et seq.
Motion for a more definite statement, 664 et seq.
Motion for judgment on the pleadings, 684 et seq.
Motions to dismiss, 670 et seq.
Nature and scope of the power to grant a new trial, 1150 et seq.
New trial, 1165 et seq.
Permissive joinder of claims, 720 et seq.
Permissive joinder of parties, 740 et seq.
Physical and mental examinations, 934 et seq.
Pleading, alternative and inconsistent statements, 646
Pleading, damages, 658 et seq.
Pleading, detail required, 608 et seq.
Pleading, prayer for relief, 662 et seq.
Pleading, special matters, 647 et seq.
Pre-suit discovery, depositions, 921 et seq.
Purposes of, 600
Relief from judgment or order, 1177 et seq.
Reply, 684 et seq.

Required joinder of parties, 747 et seq.
Rules Enabling Act, 26, 600 et seq.
Sanctions and judicial supervision of discovery, 968 et seq.
Service-of-process, 251 et seq.
Summary judgment, 1009 et seq.
Supplemental pleadings, 698
Third-party practice, 762 et seq.
Time permitted for responsive pleading, 664
Transsubstantivity, 28, 642
U.S. Supreme Court, role in adoption of, 27 et seq., 600 et seq.
Use of discovery at trial, 981 et seq.
Verdicts, general and special, 1137 et seq.

FIELD CODE

Counterclaims, in, 724 et seq.
Important provisions, 592 et seq.
Precursor of federal rules, 604
Prototype for other states’ codes, 604
Report of commissioners, 590 et seq.
Right to jury trial in, 1083 et seq.

FINALITY PRINCIPLE, 23, 1213 et seq.

State practice, distinguished, 1218

FINAL JUDGMENT RULE

Generally, 1213 et seq.
Advantages of and disadvantages of, 1213 et seq.
Defining finality, 1163 et seq.
Departures from final judgment rule, 1219 et seq.
 Collateral order doctrine, 1223 et seq.
 Discretionary appeals, 1237 et seq.
 Injunction orders, 1239 et seq.
 Mandamus, 1230 et seq.
 Partial final judgments (multiple claims cases), 1219 et seq.
 Pragmatic finality doctrine, 1228 et seq.

FOREIGN-PARTY JURISDICTION, 314

FORMS

Abrogation of, 589 et seq.

FORUM NON CONVENIENS

Generally, 420 et seq.
Alternative forum, 429 et seq.
Appellate review, standard of, 419 et seq.
Factors to be considered, 421 et seq.

FORUM-SELECTION CLAUSES, 197 et seq.

FRIVOLOUS PLEADINGS

Provisions to deter, 699 et seq.
Reasonable inquiry, 704 et seq.
Sanctions, 703 et seq.

FULL FAITH AND CREDIT CLAUSE, 1356 et seq.

See also Intersystem Preclusion

GARNISHMENT, 279 et seq., 1203 et seq.

See also Provisional Remedies

GENERAL JURISDICTION

 Generally, 9, 100, 161 et seq., 300 et seq.
Personal jurisdiction, as a doctrine of, 90, 227
Subject matter jurisdiction, as a doctrine of, 8, 29, 297

HABEAS CORPUS, 1365

HARMLESS ERROR

Appellate review, not warranted for, 1243
New trial, not permitted for, 1150

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN PLEADING AND PROCEDURE

Generally, 547 et seq.
Code pleading, 604 et seq.
Common law pleading, 547 et seq., 559 et seq.
 Main object of, 548, 557 et seq.
 Oral pleadings, 548 et seq.
 Pitfalls of, 557 et seq.
 Response to claim, 551 et seq., 604
 Writ system, 549 et seq.
Field Code, 589 et seq.
 Important provisions, 592 et seq.
 Precursor of federal rules, 604

Preface

- Report of commissioners, 590 et seq.
- Forms of action, 561 et seq.
 - Abolition of, 589 et seq.
 - Action for trespass and action on the case, 565 et seq.
 - Contract law, 574 et seq.
 - Development of forms, 561 et seq.
 - Negligence, 569 et seq.
 - Personal property, loss and detention of, 571 et seq.
- Modern procedure, arrival of, 600 et seq.
- Reforms, 589 et seq.
 - Code pleading, old problems persist, 593 et seq.
 - Field Code, 589 et seq.
 - Merger of law and equity, 589 et seq.
 - Nineteenth-century England, in, 589 et seq.
 - Nineteenth-century United States, in, 589 et seq.

IMPLEADER, 762 et seq.

INJUNCTIONS

- Generally, 26
- Appellate review of, 1239 et seq.
- Class actions, injunctive and declaratory relief, 828
- Creature of equity, 25 et seq., 586 et seq.
- Preliminary injunctions, 1189 et seq.
- Temporary restraining orders, 1190 et seq.

IN PERSONAM JURISDICTION

See Jurisdiction over Parties or Property

INTERLOCUTORY APPEALS, 1221 et seq.

INTERNET

Jurisdiction and, 200 et seq.

INTERPLEADER

- Generally, 766 et seq.
- Historical limitations, 766 et seq.
- Statutory impleader and rule interpleader, 772 et seq.

INTERROGATORIES, 926 et seq.

INTERSYSTEM PRECLUSION

- Generally, 1356 et seq.
- Administrative preclusion, 1379 et seq.
- Federal common law, 1366
- Federal-state, 1372 et seq.
- Full Faith and Credit Clause, 1358 et seq.
- Interstate, 1357 et seq.
- State-federal, 1365 et seq.
 - See also Preclusive Effect of Prior Decisions

INTERVENTION, 786 et seq.

ISSUE PRECLUSION

- Generally, 1286 et seq.
- Actually litigated, 1287 et seq.
- “Change-in-law” exception, 1305, 1306
- Defining and characterizing the issue, 1299 et seq.
- Distinguished from claim preclusion, 1286
- Evergreen* doctrine, 1307, 1308, 1309, 1310
- Issue of fact or law binding on parties and privies, 1286 et seq.
- Judgment requirements, 1286, 1311 et seq.
- Necessarily decided, 1293 et seq.
- Offensive and defensive uses, 1287, 1325 et seq.
 - See also Preclusive Effect of Prior Decisions

JOINDER OF CLAIMS

- Generally, 720 et seq.
- Addition of claims by defendants, 724 et seq.
 - Counterclaims, 724 et seq.
 - Crossclaims, 734 et seq.
- Code approach, 722
- Common law approach, 720
- Permissive joinder of claims by plaintiffs, 720 et seq.
- Historical limitations, 720 et seq.

JOINDER OF PARTIES

- Generally, 740 et seq.
- Mandatory joinder, 747 et seq.
 - Traditional concept of “indispensable” parties, 747 et seq.
- Permissive joinder, 740 et seq.
 - Common questions of law or fact, 743 et seq.
 - Historical limitations, 740 et seq.
 - Transactional test, 743 et seq.
 - See also Impleader and Interpleader

JUDGES

- Article III judges, 9, 1072, 1073
- Case management, 987 et seq.
- Commenting on the evidence, 1130 et seq.
- Findings and conclusions in nonjury cases, 1145 et seq.
- Magistrates, 1002
- Masters, 1004 et seq.

- Non-Article III judicial personnel, magistrate judges and masters, 1002 et seq.
- Province of judge and jury, 1084 et seq.
- Role in presentation of evidence, 1110 et seq.
- Role in settlements, 995
- Supervision of discovery, 968 et seq.

JUDGMENT AS A MATTER OF LAW

- Generally, 1111 et seq.
- Constitutional issues, 1111 et seq.
- Directed verdict (formerly), 1117
- Judgment notwithstanding the verdict (formerly), 1125
- Motion for, after the verdict, 1125 et seq.
- Standards governing, 1117 et seq.

JUDGMENT NOTWITHSTANDING THE VERDICT

See Judgment as a Matter of Law

JURISDICTION DISTINGUISHED FROM MERITS, 274

JURISDICTION OVER PARTIES OR PROPERTY

- Generally, 8, 79 et seq.
- Consent as basis, 194 et seq.
 - By contract, 197 et seq.
 - By court appearance, 194 et seq.
 - By registration, 196 et seq.
- Domicile as basis, 79 et seq.
- Due process and long-arm statutes, 101 et seq.
 - “Arise out of or relate to test”, 114, 178, 179, 186, 187, 188, 225
 - Effects test, 127 et seq.
 - Purposeful availment, 103 et seq.
 - Reasonable foreseeability, 113 et seq.
 - Stream of commerce and “purposeful direction,” 134 et seq.
- General jurisdiction, 103
 - Continuous and systematic contacts, 161 et seq.
- Exceptional circumstances, 167
- Home base, 161
- General jurisdiction distinguished from specific jurisdiction, 161 et seq.
- Implied consent, 92 et seq.
- Internet & other technological contacts, 200 et seq.
- Jurisdictional reach of federal courts, 231 et seq.
 - Bulge provision, 233 et seq.
 - Nationwide service of process provision, 233
 - Rule 4(k)(2), 233
 - Two-step inquiry, 233 et seq.
- Jurisdiction based on power over property, 207 et seq.
- Jurisdiction over citizens abroad, 89
- Minimum contacts, 95 et seq.
- Physical presence in forum as basis, 79 et seq.
- Specific jurisdiction, 101
- Submission theory, 158
- Territorial principle, 93 et seq.
 - Consent and presence theories, 91 et seq.
- Transient jurisdiction, 223 et seq.
 - See also Challenging Jurisdiction over Parties or Property and Quasi in Rem Jurisdiction

JURY

- Generally, 16
- Blue ribbon jury, 1096
- Challenging individual jurors, 1097 et seq.
 - For cause challenges, 1097 et seq.
 - Preemptory challenges, 1097 et seq.
- Composition of, 1093 et seq.
- Criticism of, 1050 et seq.
- Deliberations of, 58, 1137 et seq.
- During its formative period, 1050 et seq.
- Empaneling, 1095 et seq.
- Misconduct and integrity of verdict, 1161 et seq.
- Procedural reforms to enhance performance, 1136 et seq.
 - Asking questions of witnesses, 1134 et seq.
 - Early discussions, 1137
 - Note-taking during trial, 1136
 - Taking instructions into jury room, 1136 et seq.
- Province of judge and jury, 1084 et seq.

Preface

Selection of, 16, 1095 et seq.
Size of, 1095 et seq.
Submission of case to, 1137 et seq.
Voir dire, 1095 et seq., 1105 et seq.
See also Jury Instructions, Jury Trials, Jury Verdicts, and Right to Jury Trial

JURY INSTRUCTIONS

Generally, 19, 49 et seq., 1128 et seq.
Objections to, 1128 et seq.
Requests for, 1128 et seq.
Taking instructions into jury room, 1133 et seq.
Timing of, 1128

JURY TRIALS

Generally, 16 et seq.
Demand and waiver of, 1093 et seq.
Order of jury trial, 1106
Studies of case disposition and waiting periods, 1091
Tactical considerations in deciding between jury or judge, 1091 et seq.
See also Right to Jury Trial

JURY VERDICTS

Generally, 19 et seq., 1128 et seq.
Form of verdicts, 1137 et seq.

General and special verdicts, 19, 53, 1137 et seq.
Impeachment of jury verdicts, 1161 et seq.
Incoherent jury verdicts, 1153 et seq.
See also Judgment as Matter of Law

LIS PENDENS, 294, 1196 et seq.

LOCAL AND TRANSITORY ACTIONS, 399 et seq.

LONG-ARM STATUTES

Due process and long-arm statutes, 101 et seq.
Enactment of, 101 et seq.
General jurisdiction, 102
Specific jurisdiction, 102
See also Jurisdiction over Parties or Property

MAGISTRATES, 1002 et seq.

MANDAMUS, 1230 et seq.

MANDATORY DISCLOSURE, 918 et seq.

See also Automatic Disclosure

MASTERS, 1004 et seq.

MINIMUM CONTACTS

See Jurisdiction over Parties or Property

MOTION PRACTICE, 24 et seq.

MULTIDISTRICT LITIGATION, 417, 795

MULTIPLE PARTIES

See Class Actions, Joinder of Parties, and Multidistrict Litigation

NEW TRIAL

Generally, 1150 et seq.
Evidence, verdict is against weight of, 1165 et seq.
Incoherent jury verdict, 1153 et seq.
Jury misconduct, 1161 et seq.
Newly discovered evidence, 1178 et seq.
Partial and conditional grants, 1170 et seq.
Power of trial court to grant, range of, 1150 et seq.
Standards for new trial motions, distinguished from those for directed verdicts, 1165 et seq.
Timing of request, 1175 et seq.

NFL CONCUSSION LITIGATION, 866

NOTICE

Adequate time to respond to action, 251
Class actions, certification notice requirements, 825 et seq.
Content of notice of action, 251
Due process concerns, 237, 804
Mathews test, 284
Reasonable notice, 238 et seq.
 By mail (various circumstances), 248 et seq.
 By posting on door (eviction notice), 247 et seq.
 By publication and/or posting (various circumstances), 245 et seq.
 Known and unknown parties, 227 et seq.

See also Process and Service of Process

NOTICE OF PENDENCY, 294, 1196 et seq.
See Lis Pendens

OPPORTUNITY TO BE HEARD
Generally, 278 et seq.
Due process concerns, 278
Pre-hearing replevin of consumer goods, 280 et seq.
Prejudgment attachment of real estate, 286 et seq.
Prejudgment wage garnishment, 279 et seq.
Provisional remedies, 279 et seq.
Termination or denials of government benefits, 279 et seq.

PARTIES WHO MAY SUE AND BE SUED
Capacity, 719
Real-party-in-interest rule, 719 et seq.
Standing, 719 et seq.
Sue and be sued clauses, 328

PENDENT JURISDCTION
See Supplemental Jurisdiction

PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES, 1097 et seq.

PERSONAL JURISDICTION
See Jurisdiction over Parties or Property

PHYSICAL AND MENTAL EXAMINATIONS, 934 et seq.

PLEADING
Generally, 603 et seq.
Alternative and inconsistent allegations, 646 et seq.
Burden of pleading, 612
Code pleading, 604 et seq.
Common law, at, 547 et seq., 603 et seq.
Criticisms of plausibility standard, 642
Factual detail, 608 et seq.
 No set of facts, 612 et seq.
 Plausibility standard, 618 et seq.
 Short and plain statement, 609 et seq.
Foreign standards of, 643
Notice pleading, 608 et seq.
Pleading damages, 658 et seq.

Pleading special matters, 647 et seq.
Pleading standards and pro se litigation, 645 et seq.
 See also Historical Development of Modern Pleading and Procedure
State practice, 643

PLEADINGS
Amendments, 688 et seq.
Answer, 678 et seq.
Complaint, 603 et seq.
Motion for judgment on the pleadings, 684 et seq.
Reply, 684 et seq.
Supplemental pleadings, 698

PLEAS
Common law plea of abatement, 663
Dilatory plea, 552, 604
Peremptory plea, 552, 604

PRECLUSIVE EFFECT OF PRIOR DECISIONS
Binding nonparties, 1344 et seq.
 Exceptions to general rule against nonparty preclusion, 1344 et seq.
 Rejection of virtual representation doctrine, 1350 et seq.
Class action judgment, 886 et seq.
Full Faith and Credit Clause, 1357 et seq.
Intersystem preclusion, 1357 et seq.
 Administrative preclusion, 1379 et seq.
 Federal-state, 1372 et seq.
 Interstate, 1357 et seq.
 State-federal, 1365 et seq.
Mutuality
 Decline of, 1327 et seq.
 Defensive nonmutual estoppel, 1330 et seq.
 Offensive nonmutual estoppel, 1331 et seq.
 Privity, 1325 et seq.
 Traditional rule of, 1325 et seq.
Quality of judgment requirements, 1311 et seq.
 Consent judgments, 1311 et seq.
 Default judgments, 1316 et seq.

Judicial tribunals, 1311 et seq.
Nonjudicial tribunals, 1318 et seq.
Rationale, doctrine of former adjudication, 1259 et seq.
Terminology, 1259 et seq.
See also Claim and Defense Preclusion and Issue Preclusion

PRETRIAL

Conferences, 987 et seq.
Discovery, 898 et seq.
Orders, 998 et seq.
Summary disposition and, 1009 et seq.

PRIVATE SECURITIES LITIGATION REFORM ACT

Lead plaintiff, 825 et seq.
Pleading requirements, 654 et seq.
Sanctions, 713
Stay of discovery during pendency of motion to dismiss, 654

PROCEDURAL JUSTICE

Theories of, 4

PROCESS AND SERVICE OF PROCESS

Generally, 10 et seq., 252 et seq.
Agent, delivery to, 257 et seq.
Association, service on, 262 et seq.
Attachment, 82
Corporation, service on, 262 et seq.
Dwelling or usual place of abode, 256
Etiquette of, 276 et seq.
Fraudulent inducement, 278 et seq.
Immunity from process, 272 et seq.
Individual in foreign country, service on, 265 et seq.
Natural persons, personal delivery on, 253 et seq.
Partnerships, service on, 262 et seq.
Return of, 268 et seq.
Sewer service, 269 et seq.
Social media, service by, 253, 841
Statutes of limitations and, 253, 270 et seq.
Waiver of service, 252 et seq.
See also Notice

PROTECTIVE JURISDICTION, 330

PROTECTIVE ORDERS, 964 et seq.

PROVISIONAL REMEDIES

Generally, 278 et seq., 1185 et seq.
Attachment, 286, 1188 et seq.
Civil arrest, 1195 et seq.
Due process requirements, 278 et seq., 1185 et seq.
Garnishment, 279 et seq., 1203 et seq.
Notice of pendency and lis pendens, 294, 1196 et seq.
Preliminary injunctions, 1189 et seq.
Receiverships, 1193 et seq.
Temporary restraining orders, 1190 et seq.
Writ of replevin, 280 et seq.
See also Opportunity to be Heard

QUASI IN REM JURISDICTION

Generally, 207 et seq.
Minimum contacts, 211 et seq.

RACE, CIVIL RIGHTS, AND PROCEDURE

Class actions, 800
Juries, peremptory challenges, 1100 et seq.
Motion to dismiss, 612
Sanctions, 704
Summary judgment, civil rights, 1035

REAL-PARTY-IN-INTEREST RULE, 719 et seq.
Standing, distinguished, 720

RECEIVERSHIPS, 1193 et seq.
See also Provisional Remedies

RELIEF FROM JUDGMENT

Generally, 1177 et seq.
Independent action for, 1182 et seq.
Mistake and excusable neglect, 1177 et seq.
Newly discovered evidence; fraud, 1178 et seq.

REMEDIES

Generally, 25 et seq.

Preface

- Equitable relief, 586 et seq.
- Legal versus equitable relief, 25 et seq., 586 et seq.
 - Right to jury trial, impact on, 1052 et seq.
- Types of judicial relief
 - Damages, 27
 - Compensatory, 353
 - Punitive, 27
 - Declarative, 26
 - Specific, 26 et seq.

REMOVAL JURISDICTION, 380 et seq.

- Amount in controversy, 870
- Class Action Fairness Act, 870
- Diversity jurisdiction, based on, 384 et seq.
- Original jurisdiction, requirement of, 383
- Procedure, 386
- Supplemental jurisdiction, relation to, 386
- Time limits, 386

REPLY, 684 et seq.

RES JUDICATA

See Claim and Defense Preclusion and Preclusive Effect of Prior Decisions

RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL

- Generally, 1049 et seq.
- Actions involving public rights and private rights, 1070 et seq.
- Arbitration, waiver of jury right, 1406
- Complexity exception, 1065 et seq.
- Decisions by non-Article III tribunals, 1070 et seq.
- Demand for jury trial, 1092 et seq.
- Historical test, 1051 et seq.
- Law-equity distinction, maintenance of, 1052 et seq.
- Legal and equitable relief, cases involving both, 1052 et seq.
- Nature of jury right, 1051 et seq.
- Newly established court-based rights to relief, 1067 et seq.
- Seventh Amendment, 1051 et seq.
- State courts, in, 1083 et seq.
- Summary judgment, constitutionality of, 1116 et seq.
- Waiver of trial by jury, 1092 et seq.

RULES ENABLING ACT, 27, 445 et seq., 468 et seq., passim

RULES OF DECISION ACT, 442, 445 et seq., passim

SECURING JUDGMENTS

See Provisional Remedies

SERVICE OF PROCESS

See Process and Service of Process

SETTLEMENT

- ADR and judicial preference for settlement, 1406 et seq.
- Class actions, of, 850 et seq.
- Judicial role in, 995 et seq.
- Rule 16 authority, 990

SEWER SERVICE, 269 et seq.

SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY

- Generally, 301 et seq., 783 et seq.
- Interpleader actions, in, 783

STANDING, 719

STARE DECISIS, 1266

SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION

- Generally, 8 et seq., 297 et seq.
- Class actions, 869 et seq.
- Diversity jurisdiction, 9, 304 et seq.
 - Amount in controversy, 301, 318 et seq.
 - Aggregation of claims, 323 et seq.
 - Class action, 869 et seq.
 - Class Action Fairness Act, 870
 - Legal certainty standard, 318 et seq.
 - Supplemental jurisdiction, 870
 - Collusive joinder, 317
 - Debate over, 306 et seq.
 - Exceptions, judicially created, 324 et seq.
 - Rationale for, 304 et seq.
 - Real party in interest, 317
 - Rule of complete diversity, 305 et seq.
 - Associations, 312
 - Class action, 869 et seq.
 - Corporations, 312

- Determining citizenship, 309 et seq.
- Natural persons, 311
- Nominal or formal parties, 317 et seq.
- Stateless person, 315 et seq.
- Federal question jurisdiction, 326 et seq.
- Anticipation of defense insufficient, 331 et seq.
- Constitutional and statutory “arising under” jurisdiction, 330 et seq.
- Constitutional “arising under” jurisdiction, 328 et seq.

- Grable* inquiry, application of, 347 et seq.
- History of, 326
- Holmes test, 339
- Impact of lack of private cause of action in federal statute, 341 et seq.
- Rationale for, 326 et seq.
- Significant federal issues implicated, 343 et seq.
- “Well-pleaded complaint” rule, 334, 367
- Removal jurisdiction, 380 et seq.
- State courts, of, 297 et seq.
- Supplemental jurisdiction, 353 et seq.
- See also* Challenging Subject-Matter Jurisdiction

SUMMARY JUDGMENT

- Generally, 15 et seq., 1009 et seq.
- Burden, 1012 et seq.
 - Burden of persuasion, 1013
 - Burden of production, 1012
- Concerns involving, 1009 et seq.
- Credibility determinations, 1010 et seq.
- Genuine dispute, 16, 1012, 1016, 1018, 1020, 1025, 1030, 1031
- History of, 1009 et seq.
- Inferences, 1012 et seq., 1024 et seq.
- Material fact, 1012 et seq.
- Standards for evaluating motions, 1027 et seq.
- Timing issues, 1036
- Video evidence, 1032

SUPPLEMENTAL JURISDICTION

- Generally, 353 et seq.
- Ancillary and pendent jurisdiction, 349 et seq.
 - Ancillary, 361 et seq.
 - Pendent claim, 353 et seq.
 - Pendent party, 359 et seq., 362 et seq.
- Statutory supplemental jurisdiction, 353, 363 et seq.
 - Aggregation of claims, 365 et seq.
 - Discretionary declination of supplemental jurisdiction, 374 et seq.

SUPPLEMENTAL PLEADINGS, 698

TAKING CASE FROM JURY, 1111 et seq.

THIRD-PARTY PRACTICE, 762 et seq.

TRANSNATIONAL LITIGATION

- Alternative dispute resolution, 1391
- Foreign-party jurisdiction, 310, 318, 319, 320
- Forum non conveniens, 432
- Jurisdiction and foreign parties, 172

TRIAL

- Generally, 1047 et seq.
- Adjudication without trial, 1009 et seq.
- Burden of proof, 1107 et seq.
- “Chess clock” trial, 1110
- Discovery, 904 et seq.
- Errors committed during, 1150 et seq.
- Findings and conclusions in nonjury cases, 1145 et seq.
- Order of, 1106
- Presentation of evidence, 1110 et seq.
- Setting the case for trial, 1106 et seq.
- Tactical considerations in deciding between jury or judge, 1091 et seq.
- Taking case from jury, 1111 et seq.
- Verdicts, 1137 et seq.
- See also* Right to Jury Trial and Jury Trials

TYPES OF JURISDICTION OVER PERSONS OR THINGS

- Consent and contractual provisions, 198 et seq.
- General, 100, 161 et seq., 196
 - Registration statutes, relation to, 101, 196
- In personam, 87
- In rem, 87
- Quasi in rem, 87
- Service, distinguished, 100

Preface

Specific, 101, 113 et seq.
Tag and, 223

UNINCORPORATED ASSOCIATIONS
Citizenship of, 313 et seq.
Notice deposition of, 922 et seq.
 “Reasonable particularity” standard, 922, 929
Service of process on, 262 et seq.

U.S. SUPREME COURT
Effect of lower courts’ federal question jurisdiction on, 327
Power to promulgate rules permitting interlocutory appeals, 1238
Role in adoption of Federal Rules, 600 et seq.
Writ of certiorari, 21

VENUE
Generally, 10, 395 et seq.
Class actions, in, 885 et seq.
Factual situations underlying venue statutes, 396 et seq.
Federal courts, in, 404 et seq.
General principles, 395 et seq.
Local and transitory actions, 399 et seq.
Substantial part of events, 405 et seq.
Transfer of venue, 410 et seq.
 Applicable law in diversity case, 415 et seq.
 Applicable law in federal question case, 416, 418 et seq.
 Multidistrict cases, 417 et seq.

 When original court lacks personal jurisdiction, 417
 See also Forum Non Conveniens

Venue-selection agreements, 432 et seq.

VERDICTS
See Jury Verdicts

VIRTUAL-REPRESENTATION DOCTRINE, 1350 et seq.

WAIVER
Class action waivers, 890 et seq.
Cognovit clauses, 251
Jury trial, of, 1092 et seq.
Service of process, of, 252 et seq.
Waiver of defense, 735, 736, 737

WEALTH AND PROCEDURE
Adversarial justice, criticisms of, 646
Class action, attorney’s fees, 852 et seq.
Due process and debtor’s prison, 1140 et seq.
Due process and right to counsel, 295
Fee-shifting statute, 7
Litigator finding and American rule, 7, 1409
Pro se litigation, 1383

WITNESSES
Examination and cross-examination of, 1109 et seq.
Expert witnesses, 965 et seq.
Judge’s and jury’s power to question, 1110 et seq.

WOMEN AND PROCEDURE
Diversity jurisdiction, 324
Motion to dismiss, 646
Summary judgment, 1035

WORK-PRODUCT IMMUNITY, 944 et seq., 953 et seq.